

Just Watching? Spectators, Politics and the Theatre Metaphor

Sandey Fitzgerald

BA(Hons I) Macquarie University
BDA National Institute of Dramatic Art

This thesis is presented in the fulfilment of the requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy

Department of Modern History, Politics and International Relations

Faculty of Arts

Macquarie University Sydney

October 2011

Table of Contents

Table of Contents	iii
Appendices	v
Index of Tables	vi
Index of Figures	vii
Summary/Abstract	ix
Declaration	xi
Acknowledgements	xiii
Frontispiece	xiv
 Chapter 1: Introduction: Just Watching?	1
Defining ‘politics’	7
Literatures and Methodology	9
The theatre metaphor	10
Theatre theory	11
Theatre or drama?	12
Some Conceptual Tools	16
Warren’s Logic of Domination	16
Doing, Showing and Watching	17
Thesis Outline	18
 Chapter 2: Seeing Politics through Metaphor	23
Recognizing Metaphors	24
Metaphorology	31
Metaphors or analogies?	46
Metaphormania	47
Doing Politics through Metaphor	50
Interpreting Metaphors	54
Culturally and historically specific	56
 Chapter 3: Seeing through the Theatre Metaphor: some Preliminary Concerns	61
What Constitutes a Theatre Metaphor	67
Performance/Performativity	72
Theatricality	81
Theatre or Drama – Does it Matter?	85
 Chapter 4: Seeing Politics through the Theatre/Drama Metaphor	97
What Does the Metaphor Offer?	101
An expression of upheaval?	106
Green’s ‘Ocular’ Democracy	111
The Pleasures of Spectatorship	121
Whose metaphor?	122
 Chapter 5: Theatre as a Model for Politics	129
What Makes a Viable Model?	131
Theatre as a better known ‘secondary domain’?	135

What kind of theatre?.....	136
Possible Models from Theatre	144
Aristotle	145
Meyerhold.....	148
Barthes and theatrical representation	150
Fischer-Lichte	158
Mori	164
A Viable Model?.....	169
 Chapter 6: Politics as Theatre	173
Mount: Politics and Appearance	189
Manin's Principles of Representative Government	196
Spectators as 'audience'	201
'Liveness'	209
Theatre or publicity?	214
 Chapter 7: Politics in the Theatre/Drama Metaphor:
More than Meets the Eye	217
Seeing Social and Political Life as Theatre	222
The Dramaturgical Approach	227
Symbolic Interactionism	228
Role Theory	232
Dramaturgy	237
Impression Management	243
Dramatism.....	244
A Theory of Misinterpretation	249
Mangham and Overington	255
Seeing at a Distance	260
 Chapter 8: Coming to Terms with Distance.....	263
Acting as a Spectator	266
Closing the gap – the dream of participation	268
Distant Spectatorship	275
Physical distance.....	276
Distance and Cosmopolitanism	280
Psychological distance	282
The problem of limits in a theatrocracy	287
Walt Whitman and the 'Proper Mode' of Spectatorship	289
Sympathy or Empathy?.....	292
 Chapter 9: Towards an Ethics for Political Spectatorship	301
Woodruff's Ethics of Care	302
Quinn's Principle of Charity	305
Gold's Covenantal Ethics	311
 Chapter 10: Conclusion.....	317
 Bibliography	327
 Appendices: A and B (complete)
C to F (notes to accompanying CD)

Appendices

Appendix A: Etymology – Theatre and Related Terms

List 1	Common ‘theatre’ terms – brief etymological history
Table 1	The word ‘theatre’: a brief etymological history of its meanings and derivations in English

Appendix B: Summary Tables

Table 1	Sources of theatre theory
Table 2	‘Universals of Performance’ – summary
Table 3	‘Perfumance’ – Performance/Performativity: range of literature
Table 4	Doing/Showing/Watching: using the theatre metaphor (detail)
Table 5	Theatre as a metaphor: fields of use
Table 6	Use and aim of the metaphor in relation to politics
Table 7	What kind of theatre?
Table 8	Use of role theory, dramaturgy/dramatism and derivatives

Appendix C: The Use of the Theatre Metaphor

Tables 1-17	Historical Tables
-------------	-------------------

Appendix D: Theories of Theatre

Tables 1-51	Historical Tables
-------------	-------------------

Appendix E: Performance/Performativity Tables

Table 1	‘Universals of Performance’ (detail)
Table 2	Defining Performativity

Appendix F: Theatricality Tables

Table 1-3	Defining Theatricality 1837-2007
-----------	----------------------------------

Appendices A and B and brief notes to Appendices C to F can be found after the Bibliography. Appendices C to F are provided on the accompanying CD

Index of Tables

2.1	Schematic view of Pepper's Root Metaphors.....	29
2.2	Schematic view of the field of metaphor study	43
3.1	Vickers' themes/sub-themes of the 'theatre' metaphor	69
3.2	'Universals' of Performance – summary	74
3.3	Diagrammatic view of the development of Performativity (Reinelt 2002)	76
4.1	Using the theatre/drama metaphor	99
4.2	Political uses of the theatre/drama metaphor	100
4.3	Theatre/drama metaphor – fields of use	100
4.4	Characteristics of theatre and their metaphorical application to life	102
4.5	Summary of Green's Two Models of Democracy	113
4.6	Summary of Genuine Events versus Pseudo Events	115
5.1	Practitioner/non-practitioner theorists of theatre	135
5.2	What kind of theatre?	143
6.1	Politics as theatre: implications	174
6.2	Kinds of spectators.....	205
7.1	The 'ideology of theatre'	221
7.2	Role Theory – spread	235
7.3	Dramaturgy – spread.....	242
7.4	Dramatism – spread	246

Index of Figures

1.1	‘Power was measured by the proximity to the body of the king’	1
2.1	‘Mother Barton’	25
2.2	Strengthening Medicare	33
2.3	Hobbes’ Leviathan.....	35
2.4	Close-up of Leviathan.....	35
2.5	‘The allegorical figure of Reason’ 1794	37
3.1	La disputa el sacramento Raffael 1509-10.....	61
3.2	‘Dialling into the Fray’	63
3.3	Delphi Theatre	83
4.1	Session of the Council of the Ancients 1798-9.....	97
4.2	WANTED: ballet for a contemporary democracy	125
5.1	Aristotle’s conception of the theatre relationship	145
5.2	Meyerhold’s ‘Theatre-Triangle’ conception of Realist theatre	149
5.3	Meyerhold’s ‘Theatre of the Straight Line’	149
5.4	Meyerhold’s ‘Theatre of the Straight Line’ reconceived.....	149
5.5	Barthes’ conception of representation	151
5.6	‘Oceanic display leaves neighbours queasy’	157
5.7	Fischer-Lichte’s model of theatre as exchange.....	159
5.8	Modified view of Fischer-Lichte’s model	161
5.9	Mori’s conception of theatre	165
6.1	Use of colour by Iranian protesters 2009	179
6.2	Tony Abbott and the carbon tax protest.....	179
6.3	‘Game Faces’	201
6.4	Abercrombie and Longhurst’s Audiences – front cover	207
6.5	17 th Century Camera obscura	211
7.1	‘Gippsland Scenery’	219
7.2	The field of Symbolic Interactionism	231
7.3	A young girl crying over a dead bird (Greuze 1765)	251
7.4	Portrait of Carle Van Loo and family (Van Loo c1757)	253
8.1	Spectators from the goal-keeper’s position	267
8.2	‘Just Another Kevin’	267
8.3	Back-turning	269
8.4	The ‘eye of surveillance’ 1794	271
8.5	Official Revolutionary Council costumes 1789-99	271
8.6	‘Two Undiscovered Amerindians’	273
8.7	Visual Distortion in collapsing distance	277
8.8	Hall’s ‘hidden dimension’ chart	279
8.9	‘Looking Down Upon Humanity from the Cheap Seats’	281
10.1	Observation	317
10.2	Merlin Luck	321

Summary/Abstract

The aim of this thesis is to bring spectatorship into view for political theory through a consideration of the theatre metaphor. The metaphor has a long history in relation to politics. This presents a contradiction for democratic political theory committed to turning so-called passive spectators into actors, for spectators as such are essential to the existence of theatre.

The thesis explores this contradiction in two ways. Firstly, it pushes the metaphor by filling it out with theatre theory. Support for this move can be found in the work of Arendt, Rancière and Mount. When filled out in this way, the theatre metaphor offers a model of democratic politics that incorporates spectators in positive ways. However, this model is not participatory. Physical distance between actors and spectators is essential, not just because it provides the space in which politics becomes visible but because spectatorship itself is a mode of action that is constrained through conventions of distance. The physical distance between actors and spectators is not a void, but an agreed-upon and protective space. Freed from such agreement, spectators act as spectators, sometimes in harmful ways.

Secondly, the thesis explores the way the theatre metaphor is used by powerful spectators who draw on the theatrical conventions of distancing to reduce those they observe to actors in a theatre. Metaphors themselves invoke spectatorship. They are a way of seeing one thing as if it was another. The theatre metaphor doubles this spectatorship in a way that allows its users to imagine themselves outside any affective relationship with those they observe. They are then able to judge or appropriate the beheld while avoiding or disabling accountability for the effects of their observations. This powerful form of spectatorship is apparent in the social and political sciences, and is crucially in need of an ethics.

Declaration

I certify that the work in this thesis entitled Just Watching? Spectators, Politics and the Theatre Metaphor has not previously been submitted for a degree nor has it been submitted as part of the requirements for a degree to any other university or institution other than Macquarie University.

I also certify that the thesis is an original piece of research and that it has been written by me. Any help or assistance that I have received in my research work and in the preparation of this thesis itself has been appropriately acknowledged.

In addition, I certify that all information sources and literature used are indicated and acknowledged in the thesis.

.....

Sandey Fitzgerald

Student Number:

Date: 31 October, 2011.

Acknowledgments

Difficile non aliquem

Latin is a wonderful language. It expresses so much with so little. Bacon's translation of Cicero's phrase reads:

It is difficult to include everyone, ungrateful to omit anyone (Bacon 1605: 63).

This is the position I find myself in.

But there are some people I must mention specifically:

My supervisor, Professor Murray Goot, who gave me time, space, sympathy, encouragement, advice, a job, and the occasional indignant look. I am particularly grateful for his close reading of the final draft.

My good friend and helpful colleague, Dr Sheila Watkins, and my friends and colleagues at Macquarie, particularly Professor Pauline Johnson in the Sociology Department.

My precious family.

My long-suffering and neglected friends, especially Susan who always thought there was something in spectatorship worth looking at and of course the Second Sopranos.

My very long-suffering husband, best friend and usually patient sounding-board, Peter.

To paraphrase the physicist Wolfgang Pauli, much of the process of this thesis can be summed up as seeming 'too difficult for me', leading me, like Pauli, to 'wish I had been a movie comedian or something of the sort and had never heard of [politics]'. However, just as Pauli found the inspiration in Heisenberg's mechanics 'to march forward' again, so the work of others, turning up at serendipitous moments, also gave me 'hope and joy' and the inspiration to continue. One work, in particular, proved to be a turning point, Blumenberg's Shipwreck with Spectator. This was a book I very nearly did not read. During the sixteen weeks it sat on my desk as a library loan, it had seemed to become increasingly irrelevant. Fortunately it was a very small book. I now have my own treasured copy. Thank you, Herr Blumenberg.¹

Finally, I would like to thank Emeritus Professor Max Deutscher, my first lecturer at Macquarie, for opening up the exhilaration of the life of the mind.

¹ Pauli is cited by Thomas Kuhn in The Structure of Scientific Revolution 1962, p. 84

[A] critique is not a matter of saying that things are not right as they are. It is a matter of pointing out on what kinds of assumptions, what kinds of familiar, unchallenged, unconsidered modes of thought the practices we accept rest on ... Criticism is a matter of flushing out that thought and trying to change it: to show that things are not as self-evident as one believes; to see that what is accepted as self-evident will no longer be accepted as such (Michel Foucault 1988, Politics, Philosophy and Culture: Interviews and Other Writings 1977-1984).

Certainly it is now proper to declare
The audience requires a change of air
(Barker 1997 'On the sickness of the audience' Arguments for a Theatre)

Every breath you take Every move you make Every bond you break
Every step you take
I'll be watching you
(Police: Every Breath You Take)

Images – Acknowledgements

I wish to thank the following artists, photographers and organizations for permission to use their work in my thesis:

Coco Fusco for permission to use a photograph of a performance of Two Undiscovered Amerindians

Chunky Moves for permission to use an image of their flyer for their 2003 ballet Wanted: Ballet for a Contemporary Democracy.

Robbie Cooper for permission to use images from his Immersion Project.

J. Spencer for permission to use and manipulate his created Lego image, Rene Descartes: The Father of Modern Philosophy.

Craig Golding for permission to use his 2006 photograph of football spectators, published in The Sydney Morning Herald

Odyssey Adventures for permission to use their image of the Theatre at Delphi

Bibliothèque nationale de France (BnF) for permission to use images from the French Revolution held in their archives.

Oxford University Press for permission to use the cover image from their 1996 reprint of Thomas Hobbes' Leviathan

Sage Publications for permission to use the cover image from Abercrombie and Longhurst's 1998 book, Audiences: A Sociological Theory of Performance and Imagination.

Medicare for permission to use the cover image from their 2004 brochure Strengthening Medicare.

MIT Press for permission to use the image of a C17th 'camera obscura' from Jonathan Crary's 1992 book, Techniques of the Observer: On Vision and Modernity in the Nineteenth Century.

Fairfax Media Limited for permission to use images from their publications.

Chapter 1: Introduction: Just Watching?

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 1.1: ‘Power was measured by proximity to the body of the king’ (Hunt 1984: 55). King Louis XIII’s ballroom theatre in the Petit-Bourbon Palace, from the 1641 painting Représentation de Mirame au palais Cardinal devant Louis XIII, Anne d'Autriche et Richelieu by Jean de Saint-Igny, Musée des Arts Décoratifs (Louvre Gallery) (Cheney 1930: 340).

What is important about any explanatory perspective is not what it explains, but what it assumes (Spillane 2005: 11).

When power is situated in the sovereign body, literally or figuratively, spectators recede from view. They simply become the backdrop against which the politically significant stand out. Many contemporary democratic theorists, particularly those focusing on participatory democracy, assume that this backdrop is passive, and that this passivity indicates disengagement (Hay 2007: 11, 39-40). Spectators are therefore seen as a threat to the legitimacy of democratic government. The usual solution to this threat is not to engage with spectators per se but to demand that spectators become ‘actors’.

This demand suggests that spectators and actors are mutually exclusive. One can only be one or the other. Yet many spectators of politics are not just part of the background of politics. Nor are they passive or disengaged. Rather, a substantial part of their political activity involves spectating for one reason or another. Some of these spectators – journalists, theorists, surveillance and auditing personnel, UN observers and human rights ‘watchers’ – are not only politically active as spectators, they mean their spectatorship to influence politics in substantial ways.

Is spectatorship then a form of action? Some theorists argue that it is. Rancière for instance insists that:

The spectator also acts, like the pupil or the scholar. She observes, selects, compares, interprets. She links what she sees to a host of other things that she has seen on other stages, in other kinds of place... She participates in the performance by refashioning it in her own way (Rancière 2009/2008: 13).

This is to claim that spectators are cognitively active in relation to what they see. The existence of censorship in virtually every society bears this out. Spectators can ‘make of the rituals, representations and laws imposed on them something quite different from what their [creators] had in mind’ (de Certeau 1984: xiii). But the presence of physical and spatial barriers between spectators and sovereign in Figure 1.1 above also suggests that spectators have the capacity to be physically active as well and that this activity might not be welcomed by political actors. Many political actors would not be happy, for instance, with the way ‘citizen reporters’ use their mobile phones to conduct sousveillance – the surveillance of authority in order to monitor abuses of power (Kohn 2010: 572) – or to report the extent of unrest in a state (Cha 2005). What appears to be passivity may be a matter of convention and discipline rather than an innate characteristic of spectators.

Democratic theorists, however, seem to be reluctant to acknowledge the possibility of spectatorship as an activity in its own right because spectatorship provides a useful foil against which prescriptive accounts of what constitutes political participation can be defined. According to Hay, 'passive' spectatorship also lets theorists and political elites off the hook because it provides a scapegoat for their own failures to improve political life:

It is exceptionally convenient for political elites to be able to pass off voter disaffection and disengagement as a product of the moral fecklessness or simple contentedness of those citizens who failed to participate (Hay 2007: 40).

Hay recognizes that 'it is the perception rather than the reality' of politics that is 'important' in relation to political activity (Hay 2007: 60), but even he is still committed to the distinction between actors and spectators. Political participation is crucially about 'the capacity for agency and deliberation' (Hay 2007: 77). How things come to be seen as issues to be politicized or depoliticized by political elites (the supply side of politics) or those engaged in political activity outside electoral politics (the demand side) is simply referred to as 'perception'. Perception instigates the disengaged responses that citizens demonstrate in surveys and in failures to turn-out at elections because perception is sensitive to the negative discourses that surround politicians and political activity (Hay 2007: 94-5). However, the spectatorship underpinning perception is not addressed by Hay because spectatorship is a foil for him as well. It provides the mechanism by which he can demonstrate the damaging effects of public choice theory on political life.

How then to come to grips with political spectatorship per se? One possible avenue is in the embrace of the concept of performance by politics. Performance is 'the carrying out of a task or fulfillment of some promise or claim' (CMIIF 1995: 5). Performance has been adopted so extensively as an evaluative tool for ensuring public accountability that it has assumed the function of a 'public watchdog' (Gittins 2007). It also now comprises 'a distinct field within political science' (Foweraker and Krznaric 2000: 760) where it is used to assess an enormous range of political activities: the link between trust and government (Yang and Holzer 2006); the effectiveness of public policy (Tilbury 2006); degrees of democratization (Beetham 1994; Foweraker and Krznaric 2000; Foweraker and Krznaric 2001); legislative productivity (Farnsworth and Fleming 1975); declining confidence in government (Pharr and Putnam 2000); ‘best’ kinds of democracy (Foweraker and Krznaric 2003; Hamilton 2005; Lijphart 1994; Schmidt 2002); models of citizenship (Schachter 1995), public sector employee motivation (Durant et al. 2006) and the effectiveness of parliamentary committees (Monk 2009). Typically, performance here is seen as supporting ‘rational government decision-making’, and is thought to be capable of ‘restoring’ legitimacy and credibility to government (Dobell 2003). This, at least, is the rhetoric of performance as it is applied to democratic politics.

Performance is not a property of things, activities or individuals (Mackenzie 2005: 71). A performance is something that is ‘seen to be “done”’ (Fleche 1997: 107).¹ In public accountability this means that ‘one party accounts to a person or body for the performance of tasks or functions conferred ... by that person or body’ (APSC 2009: 5). The aim is ‘to provide assurance’ (Barrett 2001) to some body – usually said to be ‘the people’, the ‘general public’ (Barrett 2001), elected officials or the ‘citizen audience’ (Wallace Ingraham 2005: 394). Performance thus entails a relationship with a spectator. Yet when the question of ‘the watchers’ arises in this literature, it is deflected onto the object of the watchers’ scrutiny. Consequently the authors of ‘Are the Watchdogs Really Watching?’ focus not on the watchdogs themselves (performance auditors) but on a survey of the responses to being watched: more states prefer financial audits than performance audits; few respond to performance audits even when they use them; performance auditing activities have a low profile for these states and are generally poorly resourced (Friedberg and Lutrin 2004). These findings could suggest that the watched don’t like being scrutinized, yet the question of ‘who holds whom accountable for what’ and on what basis (Philp 2009: 45) has barely begun to be raised. Surveillance literature does recognize the impact of being watched, but it too rarely refers to who is doing the watching and for whom. Most surveillance literature draws on Foucault’s influential account of Bentham’s Panopticon in Discipline and Punish (1991/1977) to make the important point that surveillance systems do not in fact need to be operable to have their disciplinary effect. The mere presence of a guard tower, CCTV camera or even just the image of a pair of eyes produces the desired response (Smith 2011: 9). Actual spectators are thus removed from discussion here as well, even though these technologies of surveillance only have their disciplinary effect because people assume that there is or will be an actual spectator observing them.

Performance does however suggest another way of approaching spectatorship, for the term is widely seen as a theatrical term even in public accountability research. This is apparent in Wallace Ingraham's use of 'audience' above (Wallace Ingraham 2005: 394) and in Rasiah's distinction between accountability and performance in his survey of Parliamentary Question Time in Australia. Although intended in the Westminster system to provide a means of holding a government accountable to the Parliament for its actions, now that it is televised Question Time is increasingly being used by politicians to test 'political performances' before media spectators (Rasiah 2006: 6). Performance thus straddles 'two parallel political environments' for politics – one involving 'substantive policy-making' and the other the 'hype making, imagery and mythology' associated with theatre and the mass media (Louw 2005: 17).

Unfortunately mass media spectators tend to be tarred with the same brush as mass political spectators, even when audience research suggests otherwise (Biocca 1988). Not only are they seen as passive (Louw 2005: 31), this passivity can be considered pathological. Green, for instance, sees mediated spectatorship as a disease that 'threatens the political equality prized by democracy' (Green 2010: 4-5). On the other hand, theatre has a very long and occasionally illustrious history as a metaphor for politics in political theory, suggesting that theatre may be a viable way of approaching political spectatorship. If politics is seen as theatre, spectators necessarily become an integral part of politics in two ways, firstly because the user of the metaphor is invariably a spectator and secondly because spectators are an essential component of theatre: theatre 'cannot exist without the actor-spectator relationship' (Grotowski 2008/1966: 369). What is more, the fault of unsatisfactory politics may well lie with the players rather than with the spectators:

¹ Original emphasis

If in the theatre there is no interaction between stage and audience, the play is dead, bad or non-existent: the audience, like the customer, is always right (Styan 1975: 224).

Since spectators are ‘the first prime characteristic of theatrical endeavour’ (Nicoll 1962: 16), then theatre theory would seem to be the obvious place to go for some insight into spectatorship. Yet often theatre theory exhibits the same disdain for spectators as do political theory and media studies. Contemporary theatre in particular, like contemporary liberal democratic politics, is said to be ‘a desert’ (Barthes 2008/1956: 336), ‘deadly’ (Brook 1982/1968), ‘woeful ... institutionally, aesthetically, in every conceivable way’ (Blau 2008/2001: 534), ‘rotten’ (Kershaw 2001), and in ‘dark eclipse’ (Woodruff 2008: 17), and the fault lies with passive, disengaged spectators who ‘look at the stage as if in a trance’ (Brecht 1992/1949: 187). The response to this passivity is to urge spectators to become participants and ‘abolish the system of spectator and performer’ altogether (Brecht ‘The greater and lesser Pedagogy’ (1971) cited in Carlson 1984: 385). On the other hand, the path to political spectatorship through less fashionable theatre theory that relies on the maintenance of the system of spectators and performers, suggests the possibility of a more rewarding form of politics. Theatre theory thus does offer at least some help in bringing political spectatorship into view, despite its current commitment to participation.

Unfortunately however, the theatre metaphor complicates the view of spectatorship that theatre reveals because it demonstrates that the distance that is required to maintain the system of spectators and performers is a two-edged sword. In seeing politics as theatre, users of the metaphor use this distance to double their spectatorship. They are spectators of politics who see politics as if they were spectators in a theatre. In doubling their spectatorship, they double the politics involved in using the metaphor because they allow theatre to shape their responses to politics and their actions in relation to it. This has implications for those designated as actors under the metaphor as well as for the important political value of accountability. Not only are complex human beings reduced to characters in a play, one of the central conventions of theatre is that spectators need not take any responsibility for what they see, nor expect those designated actors to take responsibility for the actions required by their roles. To see politics as theatre and political actors as actors playing roles is therefore to detach actual political life from any obligation on the part of either the metaphor user or the one designated an actor. The theatre metaphor thus brings spectatorship into view as a form of power based on distance which has the capacity to avoid and even disable accountability while reducing others to objects.

Spectators are unlikely to respond to the chidings of participatory democracy theorists to become political actors if they can wield such power. In any case, they may already be ‘acting politically’ in using the metaphor. This should be of deep concern to politics because of the widespread and generally elite use of the metaphor in the social and political sciences. On the other hand, the suggestion that a more rewarding form of politics might also be found by embracing and utilising the system of spectators and performers should also be of interest to political theory because it reveals how spectators can be politically significant, even when they are distant and appear to be ‘just watching’.

Defining ‘politics’

Initially, for the purposes of this thesis, what was meant by politics was taken to be the general, institutionalised forms that are practiced in western liberal democracies. A limited definition of politics had the virtue of allowing power to be talked about in its own right rather than being taken as synonymous with politics, although ‘there is no escaping that politics is about power’ (Freeden 2005: 116). The failure of theories of formal or institutionalised politics to acknowledge spectatorship is itself an exercise of power that limits what constitutes politics, and disguises the powerful ways in which the state itself uses spectatorship. Institutionalised forms of politics are amply reflected in uses of the theatre metaphor, particularly by the media. These particular spectators delight in ‘a theatrical distrust of individual politicians and a furious and calculated indifference to the real-life intricacies of policy-making’ (Flinders 2010: 320). Indeed, much of the media exhibits no real interest in political life or its purposes. Far from politics being a mere ‘spectator sport’ (Forsyth 2004) for the media, it can be a gladiatorial contest. For politicians under twenty-four hour scrutiny, this self-appointed ‘public watchdog’ can seem ‘like a feral beast, just tearing people and reputations to bits’ (Tony Blair 2007 in Crabb 2009: 5).

However in the course of the research into metaphor it soon became evident that this limited conception of politics was inadequate. Other understandings of what constituted politics were required because of the way the theatre metaphor allows aspects of human life to be described in prescriptive ways by largely unseen and unaccountable spectators. This was particularly problematic in relation to the uses of dramaturgy, role theory and impression management in social and political theory but was also apparent in performance auditing and accountability. As a result, it became necessary to expand the conception of what politics entails to include areas in which powerful but often hidden spectators make consequential judgments about others. Feminist critiques of what has become known as ‘the gaze’ probably alone justify this expansion but there are many other ways spectatorship is implicated in exercising power over others. Freedden offers a tentative ‘beginning’ definition that, with the incorporation of Goodin and Klingeman’s definition of politics as ‘the constrained use of social power’ (Goodin and Klingeman 1996:7), serves the purpose:

Politics consists centrally of the area of collective social life that involves decision-making, the ranking of policy options, the regulation of dissent, the mobilization of support for those activities, [‘the constrained use of social power’], and the construction of political visions (Freedden 2005: 115).²

This definition recognizes that political visions are both ‘central to political theory’ (Smith 2009: 367) and part of the reality of political life that should be subjected to analysis along with more mundane facts (Freedden 2009: 150). It also recognizes that dissent and therefore conflict, an essential ingredient of drama, is an inevitable component of any politics worth the name. Conflict is inevitable in a free society because ‘the visible, thinkable and possible can be described in many ways’ (Rancière 2010: x). Politics exists because human beings ‘do not agree with one another' and require mechanisms to express and manage disagreements in ways that allow them 'to rub along with one another' (Stoker 2006: 2-4). However, all forms of management have 'two sides' (Collingwood 1928: 30 in Connelly 2005: 75) and to be on the receiving end is not always to one's advantage. Politics opens up the possibility of dominance through the exercise of power, but should leave open the possibility of contesting this outcome. This makes politics fundamentally a democratic phenomenon, although how this manifests within any one political system will itself be subject to contestation since politics must manage conflict across many levels.³

Literatures and Methodology

Research for this thesis drew on four main bodies of literature: metaphor theory, theatre theory, political theory and philosophy, and history. Within these main bodies, several sub-literatures were considered: conceptual metaphor theory; the semiotics of theatre, performance, performativity, theatricality, dramaturgy, dramatism, rhetoric, surveillance, political participation, political psychology, political communication, sociology, organization and management theory, media studies, history and aesthetics. Additional material from fields as diverse as optics and cognition also arose because of the broad nature of the historical studies involved. Both theatre theorists and users of the theatre metaphor come from a vast number of fields, each bringing their own particular inflection. Film studies, however, although it includes intensive considerations of spectatorship particularly in relation to the cinematic gaze, does not loom large in this study. Much of this literature was not found to be relevant to a study that was specifically considering politics as theatre because of the directed nature of film spectatorship. Although theatre also attempts to direct what spectators see, it is much less able to control what spectators actually look at than film. Conversely, even mediated forms of politics can share the risks of live performance that are a characteristic of theatre but not of film. Although at times users of the metaphor seem to share the single, constitutive point of view of a cameraman, these spectators are never positioned by what they see in the way film spectators or even mass media ‘audiences’ are said to be. Rather they tend to adopt the position of author/director. The question of direct participation also does not arise for film or, generally, mass media spectators.

² Original emphasis.

The complex interconnections between these literatures were managed by tabulating the material chronologically. Two major tables cover the history of the theatre/drama metaphor (Appendix C) and theatre theory (Appendix D). These were arranged by publication date and were set up with some in-built levels of analysis so that they could be used as searchable data bases. Microsoft Word was used in preference to Excel or other table software because it allowed large but variable amounts of text to be recorded within each cell although it had the drawback of requiring sub-files because formatting becomes unstable in large documents. It also does not allow numerical manipulation, but the level of mathematics required was low and could be done manually. Tables were also used to manage the material on Performance, Performativity and Theatricality (Appendices E and F). The aim again was to provide a searchable data base from which the smaller summary tables within each chapter and in Appendix B could be generated. Appendices C to F are provided in the accompanying CD. Appendix A provides a brief etymology of English theatre terms.

The theatre metaphor

Material for this study was initially drawn from Christian’s Theatrum Mundi: the History of an Idea (1987) and Blumenberg’s Shipwreck with Spectator (1997/1979), both of which located a range of primary historical sources. Library and journal searches on keywords located more recent scholarly material. Targeted reading of specific newspapers, magazines and politically oriented websites as well as serendipity provided most of the contemporary references from everyday material.

³ Dunsire (1984) for instance lists six levels at which politics operates to manage conflicting views, each with its own content, space, time and conflictive personnel: insider, public, institutional, cultural, economic and theoretical.

During the course of the research, a number of historical texts became available electronically. This allowed keyword searches along the lines of Corpus Linguistics for some texts.⁴ These were used to verify the extent of the use of the metaphor by a theorist in relation to their complete work. Metaphors are said to be capable of directing an entire way of thinking. This is what Arendt scholars are claiming when they call her conception of politics theatrical or performative. However, the theatre metaphor is a beguiling metaphor that can lead scholars into seeing more of it than might actually be there. Few texts were found to be incontestably underpinned by the metaphor.

Limited keyword searches of foreign language historical texts on words equivalent to/related to English words such as ‘drama’ and ‘theatre’ also allowed translations to be checked. Théâtre for instance has often been translated as drama in the move from French to English. Since the distinction between theatre and drama is important in this study, these searches allowed a consideration of how such substitutions might have affected the meaning of the text.

Theatre theory

Since one aim of the study was to discover whether theatre theory had anything to say about spectators that was useful for politics, the study includes an historical review of what is called ‘theatre’ theory, but which generally turns out to be drama theory, reflecting a problematic reading back into drama of later understandings of theatre. Most classic statements of ‘theatre’ theory are also more concerned with drama as literature than as a phenomenon of theatre (Capon 1965: 261). The recent embrace of performance as a way of countering this literary understanding of drama has more or less reinstated drama as something that is acted, but since many theatre scholars are inclined to see performativity and theatricality as synonymous (Sauter 2007: 6), little has been done to bring theatre itself back into focus.

⁴ Corpus Linguistics undertakes computer searches of vast ‘language banks’ created from the amassing of all kinds of language material from emails and letters to newspapers, magazines, journals and academic texts

Theatre or drama?

The word drama comes from drân, a Greek word for doing. It is the Doric version of what Athenians meant by prattein or practice (Aristotle Poetics 1448b.1), and that Aristotle preferred because he wanted to make a distinction between mere doing (praxis) and making (poetas) that practice did not adequately express:

This fact, according to some, is the reason for plays being termed dramas, because in a play the personages act the story (Poetics 1448a.25).⁵

According to Aristotle, when humans practice politics or engage in contemplation, for instance, doing is an end in itself. When they make ships, houses and dramas, doing is aimed at some external purpose intended to affect others. Drama, as a form of doing engaged in making, uses action to make something designed to affect spectators. Productive affective action is the indispensable, ‘universally evoked’ element of drama, not theatre (Peacock 1974/1957: 42). This action does not have to be represented on a stage in order to be dramatic but if it is, it occurs in a theatre, which is ‘a place where one watches what is done’ (d’Aubignac 1991/1657: 231). Drama is about doing. Theatre is about watching. Because drama does things to be seen, drama is also about showing. What makes drama dramatical ‘is the display of action’ (Hegel 1962/1835: 35).

Although these distinctions seem clear, the terms have converged to such a degree that they are used interchangeably even by theatre scholars. It really isn’t an excuse to use theatre to talk about drama simply because it alliterates with theory – yet that is one of the reasons Carlson offers for describing what is overwhelmingly a history of drama theory as a history of theatre theory (Carlson 1984: 10). Another more serious reason is that he wanted to ensure that his history incorporated the idea of theatre as an activity involving performance, which the conflation of drama with the written text obscured. It is hard to quibble with this move given the historical privileging of literature over performance, but it creates difficulties for a study of theatre metaphors. People who claim they are using theatre as a metaphor are often actually using drama as the metaphor and vice versa, but simply culling these references does not solve the problem because the way the drama metaphor is used can carry with it an implied use of the theatre metaphor. To see others as actors playing roles on a stage is to necessarily include a spectatorial position, whether or not it is acknowledged. On rare occasions, this position is actually backstage – the watcher is a stage-hand or director – and sometimes some spectators are acknowledged by being placed on the stage with the actors, thereby turning them into actors. But who observes this? It can only be a spectator who is separated from the performance, watching from a seeing-place. Any investigation of the theatre metaphor still has to include an investigation of the drama metaphor.

⁵ Although it is generally accepted that the Athenians invented drama (Taplin 1999), they adopted a number of Dorian words because they preferred their sound (Levin 1982). It is possible that the distinction between mere doing and making was not common in Aristotle’s time, though, because he labours for it in a number of places in his work: Nichomachean Ethics VI, 4, 1140a: 2ff; 5,

Bearing this in mind the study draws on five anthologies of theatre and/or drama theory, as well as primary material. Anthologies were chosen because the aim was to produce a searchable data base spread over time that considered in general how interested theatre theory was in spectators. This necessitated a broad study but, given the great variety of sources of theatre theory in the past and the contemporary move of theatre practitioners into academia where publication is a requirement, help was needed to make the task manageable. Anthologies, especially when viewed collectively, can provide this since compilers tend to concur in the material that they select from a theorist even though they have different criteria for selection.⁶ The material they display could therefore be assumed to provide a reasonably accurate representation of a theorist's interests.

1140b: 3ff; Magna Moralia I, 34, 1197a: 3ff; II 12, 1211b: 27ff; Politics I, 2, 1254a:6 and 7; VII, 2, 1325b, 16ff.

⁶ All five anthologies used different criteria for selection. Carlson, who admitted to the 'greatest difficulty' in selecting what to include in general took theatre to include drama but not what has now become known as performance in its widest sense, and sought out 'writings in which the theoretical element is paramount' and has some 'independence' in order to allow him to 'trace the development ... of the idea of what theatre is, has been, should be' (Carlson 1984: 9-11). Sidnell's selections were chosen 'for their intrinsic theoretical interest' and their provision of 'closely reasoned and detailed theoretical arguments' (1991: 3), as well as how best they articulated the recurrent issues which Sidnell had identified (what does it mean to represent or imitate something dramatically; how are written texts related to live performances; how and why are spectators affected, and in what way; how should other arts combine in the theatre; is the actor an artist, a 'primary creator' (Sidnell 1991: 2; Abdoh 2008/1992: 485), an interpreter or an 'artistic medium' for another artist (playwright or director); what distinguishes a genre and how is it to be used) – and sometimes, apparently, because they were Italian (there seemed to be no other reason for

This assumption, however, proved problematic. While all five anthologies reveal a body of theory that appears almost overwhelmingly to ignore spectators, in turning to original texts, one sometimes finds that practitioner-theorists in particular did express quite forceful, albeit fitful, opinions about spectators and how they related to the practices of the theatre. Only Gerould mentions Strindberg's dislike of spectators, although all five anthologies provide background to his work and his period as well as excerpts from his ruminations about his work. Only Krasner's excerpt includes O'Neill's brief but pointed comment in 'A Dramatist's Notebook' (1933) that spectators were 'growing yearly more numerous and more hungry in [their] spiritual need to participate in imaginative interpretations of life rather than merely identify [themselves] with faithful surface resemblances of living' (O'Neill 2008/1933: 189). The eight months run of his 'mask drama' The Great God Brown had not only indicated to O'Neill that large numbers of spectators were receptive to new 'psychological, mystical and abstract' ideas at a time when realist theatre was widely believed to be what they wanted, but that identification, considered by Brecht and others at the time to be a spectator disease, was a function of the kind of play that was offered rather than the spectator's misguided demand. Yet the focus of anthologies tends to be on O'Neill's contribution to the esoteric debate over whether or not tragedies could still be written after the death of the gods, and his arguments for the use of masks. Gertrude Stein also spent some time dissecting including very short pieces by Ingegneri, Giacomini and Metastasio). Gerould's theorists were considered 'essential' as representatives of the interconnections between cultures and between theatre and its political and social contexts who had 'shaped the ongoing theoretical debate about the nature and function of theatre'. His selection had the inestimable virtue of including non-European/Western theorists, undermining the usual assumption that theatre was a specifically western phenomenon (Gerould 2000: 11). Krasner appeared to select writers according to how best they demonstrated his two 'streams' of theatre theory, one emanating from Hegel and the other from Nietzsche (Krasner 2008). Brandt's selection (for the period 1850-1990) was 'themed' (General Theory; Varieties of Realism; Anti-Naturalism; Political Theatre and Semiotic) and 'modest' in scope, including some essential theorists who 'could not' be omitted and some 'less well-known but nevertheless significant items' (Brandt 1998: xvii) – and about drama i.e. text-based theatre. A further discussion of dramatic theory by Crane (1967) which was considered as an adjunct to these anthologies was based on a division of dramatic criticism into Platonic (drama served a function beyond itself as an art form) and Aristotelian (drama was an art form in itself). Crane's aim was to show how each of these divisions constrained subsequent scholarship. Where primary material has been read, a broad understanding of theory has been taken, allowing often quite brief comments about theatre to be included. This is particularly the case with regard to practitioners of contemporary theatre who have yet to commit their ideas to substantial theoretical exposition. Even a throwaway comment in an interview, such as that by actor-director Sean Penn (in Matheson 2005), can reveal theoretical underpinnings.

the experience of being a spectator at a theatrical event. Theatre ‘makes for nervousness’ in spectators because it involves the disruption of time so that ‘the emotion of the one seeing the play is always ahead or behind the play’ (Stein 1995/1935: xxxii). Feelings and action never come together. This was part of the aesthetic experience, the key to which was looking, and why Stein advocated what she called ‘landscape’ theatre in which spectators rather than performers moved. It is a crucial argument against the long-standing insistence that spectators are meant to be reflecting on what they are watching. According to Stein, they simply don’t have time for this. However, the focus of anthologists is on Stein’s ‘use of non-linear plot, repetition, the fragmentation or complete elimination of character, simultaneity and her own unique ‘continuous present’’ (Bay-Cheng 2005: 18). Tennessee Williams argued strongly against participation in theatre because it prevented things being seen clearly (Williams 2008/1951: 276) but again the focus of anthologists was on whether or not tragedy remained a viable genre.

These examples challenge the emphasis in the anthologies on the writing of dramatic texts and the doing of theatre rather than what is involved in watching it. However, for the most part, primary documents support this emphasis. To some extent, this reflects the general disdain non-practitioner theorists have seemingly always shown to practitioners who try to engage in theory (Carlson 1984: 57; Meyrick 2003) as well as the sheer numbers of non-practitioner theorists in relation to practitioner-theorists. Non-practitioner theorists have, at times, outnumbered practitioner theorists by two to one. They also come from an astonishing array of fields. But this in itself makes the neglect of spectators paradoxical. As non-practitioners, these theorists must have been spectators (Gerould 2000: 15), yet few of them are reported as having anything much to say about the experience of spectatorship, although they sometimes puzzled over why other spectators seemed to enjoy tragedy. This neglect of spectators in both primary sources and in anthologies could have been considered fatal for a study that aims to use theatre as a means of taking spectators seriously in relation to politics, but given theatre’s avowed dependence on spectators, it simply highlights the need to reconsider spectatorship in all its manifestations, including in theoretical work. Much influential spectatorship is simply taken for granted.

Some Conceptual Tools

Warren's Logic of Domination

Central to the argument of this thesis is that a logic of domination is at work in the neglect of spectatorship in political theory. This is a form of reasoning in which moral judgments are smuggled into apparently 'value-free' distinctions in order to rationalize a hierarchical order in which one term in the distinction is privileged over the other. It underpins all 'oppressive conceptual frameworks' (Warren 1990: 128), and crucially involves metaphor. Warren uses the logic to demonstrate how discrimination against women is set up and perpetuated through a mapping of the binaries mind/body and reason/emotion onto the distinction between male and female and the metaphoric linking of bodies and emotions to nature, but examples of this logic can also be seen at work in relation to spectators. They manifest through a mapping of the binaries active/passive, change/stagnation onto a distinction between actors and spectators. This mapping underpins all theories of political and social participation to such a degree that it can be identified as a form of 'participation-speak' (Harris 2000), a discourse in which the fifth step in the logic is put into action without any questions being raised about how such a step was reached. The same mapping appears in theatre theory. As a result, spectatorship is diminished and even rejected as any kind of activity, let alone one that has value as a form of participation in itself that has the capacity to transform social and political life.

The logic is as follows (italicized clauses indicate where moral judgment is smuggled in):

- A1: Actors do and spectators don't have the capacity to transform social/political life
- A2: Whatever has the capacity to consciously and radically transform social/political life is morally superior to whatever doesn't, therefore
- A3: Actors are morally superior to spectators

- A4: For any X and Y, if X is morally superior to Y then X is morally justified in subordinating Y, therefore
- A5: Actors are morally justified in treating spectators as inferior to actors, and instigating means to remedy their inaction.

Other binaries and distinctions can be mapped onto each other but the aim is always the same – to privilege one side of the distinction over the other. The irony in the way this logic is used in relation to spectators is that it is used by spectators who discount themselves from the logic. Only Plato seems to have been aware of this paradox. He reversed the logic, but only in relation to philosophers – specialised, elite spectators with the capacity to see more truly than either actors or everyday spectators (Rancière 2009/2008: 4).

Doing, Showing and Watching

In an effort to articulate how the logic of domination works in terms of the mapping of active/passive onto the actor/spectator distinction, the theatre theory and theatre metaphor studies for the thesis have been articulated in terms of three categories – doing, showing or watching – depending on the emphasis of the writer. Although showing does not readily convey the emotional and physical impact drama was thought to have as an example of poesis, it does imply the presence of spectators, and is used in lieu of making, which does not now have this implication. These categories could have been formalized as performance or performativity, signification and theatricality but the simpler terms articulate important and straight-forward distinctions that more complex terms tend to obscure. For instance, both performance and performativity entail more than just doing: they entail doing something to a standard – one generally imposed by others. They therefore entail both showing and watching as well as doing, although this is rarely made explicit in the performance literature. To use either performance or performativity in lieu of doing would be to lose the distinctions between doing, showing and watching while still not necessarily recovering spectatorship. Similarly, signification is no longer tied specifically to what spectators see. The focus is almost entirely on what things signify. Watching, on the other hand, carries a sense of ‘paying attention’. Theatricality did have this sense once, but lacked the care associated with paying attention. It is now most often used in relation to appearance, but has negative connotations that showing avoids.

The use of audience in lieu of spectators has been problematic in much of the literatures surveyed, particular media studies. Audience is a convenient way to talk about specific groups of spectators, but can be misleading because it presents spectators as a single coherent entity when it is generally accepted in theatre theory that it is the task of the performance to bring about this coherence and that this is a fragile achievement that dissipates as soon as the show ends and spectators begin to disperse. It also allows scholars to talk about people as a thing. Since this is one of the criticisms that the thesis will be leveling at users of the theatre metaphor, the term will be avoided as much as possible.

Thesis Outline

The aim of the thesis is to bring spectatorship into view. It does so through a consideration of the theatre metaphor. The thesis begins therefore by considering what metaphor entails, what constitutes a theatre metaphor and how the theatre metaphor has been used in relation to politics. Politics as theatre could refer to any number of aspects of theatre, and one of the difficulties in teasing out the implications of the metaphor is deciding what to include. Chapter 2 reviews the field of metaphor studies in order to solve these problems but finds that the field offers conflicting answers, not least because there is disagreement over what a metaphor actually is and whether or not it is a phenomenon of language or cognition. If it is a phenomenon of cognition, the theatre metaphor will include not just linguistic metaphors but also visual and perhaps even aural metaphors. There is also the problem of deciding what constitutes a political metaphor. Cognitive metaphor theorists argue that all metaphors are political, not just metaphors that refer specifically to politics, because metaphors are strategies of perception that direct the way users think and act towards the phenomena they observe. Accepting this view would mean that a study of the theatre metaphor in relation to politics would have to include all uses of theatre as a metaphor, not just those obviously referring to politics.

This raises the question of what actually constitutes a theatre metaphor. Are performativity, performance and theatricality theatre metaphors? Where does drama fit in? Does it matter whether the theatre metaphor is really a drama metaphor or vice versa? Chapter 3 draws a number of distinctions between terms that are often lumped into the theatre metaphor in order to clear some ground. For some theorists the distinctions are significant. Nevertheless, the frequent confusion between drama and theatre means that the theatre metaphor must encompass both terms in order to locate theatre as a political metaphor.

The theatre/drama metaphor is overwhelmingly a spectator's metaphor. What do users see when they use the metaphor? How does this shape what they see of politics? What are its implications? Chapter 4 explores these questions and considers Green's 'Ocular' theory of democracy. Against Green's theory is a brief discussion of some of the pleasures of spectatorship that the metaphor allows and that might work against his proposal for a plebiscitary democracy in which citizen/spectators play the central 'role' of 'The People'.

Nevertheless, the idea of a politics based on theatre is appealing. Chapter 5 draws on theatre theory in order to see if a viable model of liberal democratic politics could be constructed that would take into account theatre's particular relationship with spectators. It suggests that such a model would be interactive but would not be participatory in the sense advocated by participation theorists in either theatre or politics. It would also not be a form of celebrity politics. Chapter 6 develops the model proposed in Chapter 5 by considering some of the objections that might be leveled at such a model. It then explores the work of two political theorists who have proposed accounts of politics that might fit into the model: Mount's theatre of politics and Manin's audience democracy. The chapter goes on to suggest there is something problematic about spectatorship that is not covered by either theatre theory or the proposed model but that is evident in the way the theatre metaphor is used. Uses of the theatre metaphor appear to support the conceptual metaphor theorists' claim that metaphors are inherently 'political' because they allow the exercise of power against others.

Chapter 7 returns to metaphor theory to address the issue of metaphor use as a form of politics in itself. It reveals that seeing social and political life as theatre has implications for those who are seen as 'actors' in a space that is designated by others as theatrical, for it allows them to be appropriated for the spectator's 'willing and trafficking' (Heidegger 1978/1947: 223). It is here that it becomes apparent that to leave drama out of the theatre metaphor is to miss an essential relationship between distant spectators and the objects of their scrutiny, one that makes the theatre metaphor a political metaphor irrespective of whether it is applied directly to political phenomena or not.

Distance is a fundamental condition of theatre since theatre comes into existence only 'when a separation occurs between spectators and performers' (Schechner 2003: 137). Since this separation is crucial to the model of politics developed in Chapters 5 and 6, the model needs to come to terms with the negative aspects of distant spectatorship. The final chapters of the thesis attempt to do this. Chapter 8 considers firstly whether distance can be eradicated as participation theorists desire, and finds that it cannot without risking disaster. Distance turns out to provide a crucial protective mechanism for the practice of both theatre and politics. The chapter goes on to consider the difference between physical distance and psychological distance and finds that although physical distance presents others to spectators at least initially as objects, it is psychological distance that allows this objectification to be maintained. The distinction between actors and spectators is therefore misleading. The crucial distinction is between spectators and objects, and it is because of this that spectatorship entails power.

A politics that wishes to incorporate spectators as a meaningful component of political life through the retention of the separation of actors and spectators needs to recognize these implications of distance. Part of this recognition may entail an ethics for spectatorship. Chapter 9 considers two proposals from theatre theory in this regard, and a third from anthropology designed specifically to acknowledge the appropriation distance allows. The final chapter, Chapter 10, considers the implications of the thesis' findings for political theory.

As no doubt is evident, the focus of the thesis is not in the end metaphor or theatre (political or otherwise). It is spectatorship and its relationship to politics. Spectatorship is revealed as a form of activity that is constrained by conventions governing physical distance but which remains a power that, when exercised through psychological distance, is currently unaccountable. This power can be seen at work in contemporary social and political theory and should be of concern to political theorists. However, incorporating spectatorship into politics in a vital and constitutive way also offers the possibility of a more rewarding form of political life:

Discoveries may be and often are made by the contrast, which would escape us on the single view (Burke 1808/1756: 85).

Chapter 2: Seeing Politics through Metaphor

Metaphor makes us see one thing as another (Davidson 1984: 247).

One of the ways spectatorship is linked to politics is through the metaphors used to do political work. Metaphors are a way of ‘seeing-as’ (Ricoeur 1987/1975: 236). They invoke spectatorship because they provoke images: ‘The sole aim of a metaphor is to call up a visual image’ (Orwell 1969/1946: 223) in order to ‘set the scene before our eyes’ and give it ‘life’ (Aristotle Rhetoric 1410b.30; 1411b.30).¹ When politics is described as theatre a spectator is thus necessarily invoked because theatre involves spectatorship and metaphor users are spectators.

Spectatorship is also invoked because metaphors prompt their recipients to see a phenomenon differently. Metaphors are ‘other-oriented’: they are directed towards others (Cooper 1986; Nogales 1999). In the process, they can turn auditors into spectators. This capacity was central to Quintilian’s teachings on rhetoric: since images had a greater impact than words, turning auditors into spectators led to more effective persuasion. Metaphors were ‘the best means’ of effecting this transformation (Skinner 1996: 188).

Further, as an ‘imaginative act of ‘seeing as’’ (Nicoll 2001: 127), metaphors evoke an image of one phenomenon in order to convey an idea about another in such a way as to indicate how the latter is to be experienced (Hastings 1970: 188; Peacock 1974/1957: 45). Users and recipients alike are influenced by this prompt. This is why Fernandez calls metaphors ‘the argument of images’ (Fernandez 1986: viii). Some metaphors invoke such strong images that they obviate the need for any argument in support of the view they are promoting. They are simply accepted as true (Nisbet 1969: 7). The metaphor of an iceberg used by Freud to describe the supposed hidden mass of unconsciousness lurking beneath the tiny visible tip of consciousness had such a strong physical reality, particularly in the context of the sinking of the Titanic, that Freud's hypothesis needed 'neither argument nor demonstration' (Arendt 1978/1971: 113). The metaphor was simply accepted as the argument.²

¹ It is because of its connection to imagery that Derrida suggested that studies of metaphor were essentially studies about symbolism (Derrida 1974: 7), while Peirce saw metaphors as iconic signs (Taverniers 2002). Ricoeur (1976) and Goodman (1981) however disagree with the connection of metaphors to symbols, although Ricoeur believes archetypal or ‘root’ metaphors which seem to be common to all human cultures may come close to symbols (Ricoeur 1976: 64-5). However, the term ‘metaphor’ is preferable to ‘symbolism’ when describing how meaning is communicated in the theatre, because metaphor explains the complexity of the process more precisely (Peacock 1957: 242-3).

Recognizing Metaphors

Some metaphors are only metaphors because of the context in which they appear (Steen 1999: 82). Steen's example is the comment 'I walked to the place where the bird of prey hung ready over the crowd' (Steen 1999: 83). Only knowledge of the context (riots in Amsterdam) identifies bird of prey as a metaphor for helicopter rather than a description of an eagle or hawk hovering.³ However, while interpretation of what was meant by a metaphor at the time of its use will crucially depend on context, original context does not limit possible interpretations, which may be 'triggered by what is presupposed, rather than by what is – or seems to be – asserted' by the metaphor (Leezenberg 2001: 14) at the time of reception: '[m]etaphoric meaning is not metaphoric in itself, but only in relation to the ordinary context applied by ... 'the reader'' (Stellardi 2000: 58).⁴ The receiver 'fleshes out' the metaphor (Kitis and Milapides 1997: 585).

A metaphor may gradually be built up, permeating a whole text without ever being stated (Kitis and Milapides 1997). Personification metaphors work this way. As a body, the state or nation 'like a person, has a mind' (Roosevelt Inaugural Address 1940 cited in MacDonald 1957: 9-45). It has arms that are capable of holding a people. Its legislative power, the people, is its 'heart', while 'the executive is the brain, which sets all parts in motion' (Rousseau 1968/1762: 3:11;135). It has eyes and feelings and can be in desperate need of friends as Britain was on the brink of World War II when 'she' 'turned to the League and was disillusioned, turned to Italy and was scorned, looked at France and was looked back at with suspicious eyes, looked to Germany and was treated with flattery, respect and politeness' (Gilbert 1964: xi) and as a consequence 'she' failed to act decisively when it mattered (Churchill 1950/1948: 154). As a body, a nation can engage in 'navel-gazing' and allow 'bad things to sneak up on it', requiring it to 'lift its head up again' (Howard 2004). A state might need to be pulled into line and given a good scrub by its mother. In the cartoon below, the grubby urchin Queensland is about to be scrubbed by a careworn Commonwealth (Mother Barton) for importing Kanaka (black) labour:

² The Titanic sank in 1912. Freud was lecturing and writing at the time. He published his Introduction to Psychoanalysis only five years later in 1917.

³ This kind of metaphor causes huge problems for Corpus Linguistic searches because it is almost impossible to code.

⁴ Sperber and Wilson (1990) argue that it is 'relevance' which is the key to metaphor interpretation but relevance surely depends on context.

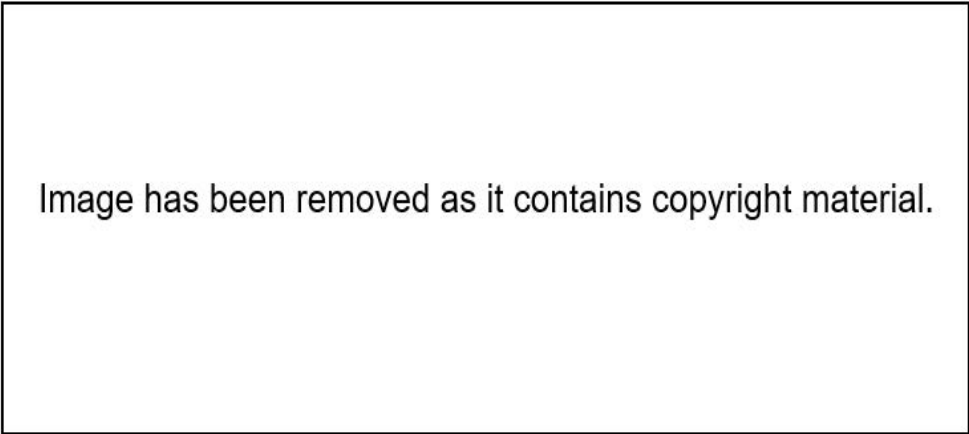

Figure 2.1 'Mother Barton' (Prime Minister Edmund Barton) threatens to scrub Queensland: cartoon entitled 'You Dirty Boy' by Livingston Hopkins for The Bulletin 19 October 1901 (Lack and Templeton 1988: 12).

The state as a person is a dominant thread in much of Churchill's historical writings. Early in The Gathering Storm, he argued that while 'Germany might be disarmed [and] her military system shivered in fragments' she remained intact. Consequently it was with good reason that 'the French nation peered into the future in ... haunting dread' (Churchill 1950/1948: 23). Some one hundred and thirty pages later, the metaphor is applied to Britain who had disastrously weakened 'her' position in Europe over 'her' failure to act over Abyssinia:

She had earned the undying hatred of Italy; she had wrecked the Stresa front once and for all; and her loss of prestige ... contrasted with the growing strength and repute of the new Germany (Churchill 1950/1948: 161).

Systemic uses of the theatre metaphor are very apparent in many historical works on the French Revolution and sixteenth century England. Systemic claims are also made for the theatre metaphor in relation to the work of Aristotle, Adam Smith, Edmund Burke and Hannah Arendt.⁵

Pepper bases his theory of root metaphors on this capacity of metaphors to act as a dominant metaphor but argues that these do more than permeate a single text or a theorist's whole body of work (Pepper 1966/1942). They become 'world hypotheses' that direct the theoretical thinking of an era.⁶ Performance currently works this way across a number of otherwise unconnected fields to the extent that McKenzie considers it the 'New World Order' (McKenzie 2001: 189). Pepper's root metaphors are thus similar to Kuhn's scientific paradigms (Kuhn 1962): understandings that are widely shared until their shortcomings become apparent, whereupon theorists 'look about' for another 'common sense fact' to help them understand whatever it is that they are concerned about (Pepper 1966/1942: 91).

These 'facts' tend to be drawn from the user's everyday life and include recently developed knowledge and ideas (Rigotti 1995: 419; Saccaro-Battisti 1983: 31n2). Weber, for instance, drew many of his metaphors for politics from Goethe whose work dominated the cultural milieu in which he worked. Such references were ones 'that any educated German of the period understood without further explanation' (Garcia 1995: 394). More prosaically, Locke used plumbing metaphors at a time when ‘water closets’ were being installed in London and the need for covered sewerage systems was being recognized in order to prevent plague (Grun 1991; Shapiro 1985-6: 193).⁷ In the age of Newton, Hume believed that the world was a machine, while Hobbes saw bodies as watches:

⁵ These will be discussed in subsequent chapters.

⁶ Pepper's root metaphors are epistemological heuristics. They are quite different to Lakoff's deep or root metaphors, which are ontological as well as epistemological (Arditi 1994). These will be discussed later in the chapter.

For what is the heart, but a spring; and the nerves, but so many strings; and the joints, but so many wheels, giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the artificer? (Hobbes 1996/1651: 7)

In the age of Darwin, Woodrow Wilson argued that government was a ‘delicate organism’ (Landau 1961: 337, 343). In the nuclear era, power became potential, actualized when men acted together (Arendt 1958: 200). Easton (1965) used electronic circuitry in his systems view of political life at a time when computers were rapidly developing (Campbell 1971: 25-26; McDonald 1969: 146) while Deutsch (1963) used neurological metaphors drawn from developing biological knowledge in The Nerves of Government (McDonald 1969: 146). With mass media technologies taking over so much of contemporary life, politics is increasingly being conceived of as communication – ‘a highly idealistic image, which holds out the promise of agreement and consensus’ (Barnett 2003: 3).⁸ These patterns occur so often that they seem beyond coincidence.

Pepper (1966/1942: 151-280) believes that these kinds of metaphors fit into four over-arching root metaphors that have stood the test of time for theory: the similar (formism), the machine (mechanism), the event (contextualism) and the integrated organism (organicism) (see Table 2.1 below): ‘These four keys will open any closet now built that is worth opening’ (Pepper 1966/1942: 149).

All but contextualism aim at providing certainty about unfamiliar aspects of the world based on some familiar certainty. Contextualism challenges assumed certainties based on the uniqueness of events or the presence of rupture, change or disorder. Formism and mechanism are used as analytical models, while contextualism and organicism are synthetic models aimed at integration. Hegel for instance was able to incorporate the French Revolution into his organic conception of history by claiming that such catastrophes were the sacrifices that had to be made on the path to 'world history' (Blumenberg 1997/1979: 53).

⁷ Plumbing remains the dominant metaphor for communication (Reddy 1993/1979; Sless 1985)

⁸ The current fad for using climate metaphors to discuss emotional processes could reasonably be linked to the wide-spread, even obsessive concern about changes to the actual climate which has recently gripped the world. See the Journal of Social Issues Vol 63(2), 2007 for no less than eleven articles which use the metaphor to discuss ‘collective emotions’.

Brown adds to Pepper's four 'keys' the metaphors of language, drama and games that are used extensively in sociological theory (Brown 1977: 78). The language metaphor in which aspects of life are 'texts' that can be 'read' underpins at least three major schools of sociological thought: 'symbolic interactionism, ethnomethodology, and European structuralism' (Brown 1977: 145). The drama metaphor in which life is seen to have coherence and purpose and therefore order also underpins symbolic interactionism as well as its off-shoots: role theory, dramaturgy, dramatism and impression management.

Root metaphors can all be present at the one time, offering competing ways of seeing the world (Brown 1977: 129). They may also appear mixed in theory.⁹ Hobbes' Leviathan metaphor, for instance, is a combination of mechanism and organicism: political life is an integrated machine or system in which one part (the head or sovereign) rules the rest of the body. Contextualism and organicism would also be involved if the theatre metaphor is added into this mix because of the way Hobbes uses personification. Ezrahi (1995) finds that the theatre metaphor used in tandem with the machine metaphor, as he believes it has been since Hobbes, allows social scientists to argue the paradoxical position that human behaviour is both voluntaristic and determined (Ezrahi 1995).

Root metaphors tend to be comprehensive in scope and consistently worked out largely because they become detached from their origins (Brown 1977: 125). They are subjected to significant attempts to develop and elaborate on them before their limitations become apparent and they are dropped in favour of another conception or combination (Brown 1977: 114; Pepper 1966/1942: 115).

⁹ Pepper argues that few theories exhibit a root metaphor in its 'purity'. Theories are weakened when root metaphors are mixed, however, this weakening can, in fact, lead to more insight and creativity. The mixing of root metaphors is most likely to occur during a period of change-over from one dominating metaphor to another (Pepper 1966/1942: 105-7).

Theories generally change when their metaphorical bases change (Kuhn 1962; Rosenthal 1982: 284). This usually occurs when the sets of categories generated by the metaphor break down in the face of insurmountable ‘obstacles in fact’ (Pepper 1966/1942: 94).

Characteristics	Evidence based Models				Faith-based ‘models of badness’
	FORMISM	MECHANISM	CONTEXTUALISM	ORGANICISM	MYSTICISM	ANIMISM
Theorists who use the model	Plato, Aristotle, the scholastics, neo-scholastics, neo-realists	Democritus, Lucretius, Galileo, Descartes, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume	Protagoras (trace), Peirce, James, Bergson, Dewey, Mead, Foucault	Schelling, Hegel, Green, Bosanquet, Royce (tend to be eclectic)
Method of use	Analytical: grouping on the basis of similarity	Analytical: causal working of parts according to time/ space location	Synthetic: focus on change, intensity, and vividness of experience	Synthetic: seeks to integrate	Synthetic	Synthetic
Aim	Certainty	Certainty	Challenge to certainty	Certainty	Certainty	Certainty
Root metaphor implication	Similarity	The rational machine	The event (an act in context)	The integrated organism	Love as the substance of the universe	The world is made in man’s image
Basis of ‘Truth’	Correspondence	Causality	Action in context	Holism	Revelation	Man
Evidence	Categorization	Quantification	Fusion	Integration	Insight	Authority
Powerful concepts	Class Norms Categories Types Kinds Genres	Fields Laws Parts Order Quantity Efficiency	Disorder Change Novelty Quality Texture Relativity	Progress The ideal Efficacy Relationships	Love Spirit The Absolute	Power Spirit
Emphasis	Similarity/ difference Coincidence Model Norm	Cause/effect Frequency Location Reduction	Change Contingency Fragmentation Presentness Relativity	Coherence Connectivity Wholeness Unity	Certainty Inclusion Intuition Love Spirituality	Certainty Human power Spirit
Present manifestation	Classificatory systems Bureaucratic thinking	Quantification Accountability Performance	Post-modernism	Ecology	Spirituality	Nativism

Table 2.1 Schematic View of Pepper’s Root Metaphors (derived from Pepper 1966/1942: 149; Pepper 1973).

Virtually all theoretical conceptions of power can be tied to Pepper’s four root metaphors. Machiavelli’s war/military conception of strategy, Hobbes’ discursive power and Cleggs’ circuits of power (Clegg 1997) fit within the mechanistic view of reality, while Foucault’s circulatory view of power (Foucault 1991/1977) is organic and Arendt’s (1958) could be considered contextualist. Foucault also used spatial metaphors to describe the way power worked in society, a conception that falls under mechanism because of its concern with location (Alvarez and Kilbourn 2001). These metaphors for power have risen and fallen within the historical context of their users, with the consequence that political and social theory has moved from formism to mechanism to circulatory or capillary views based on blood circulating through the social 'body', to contextualism and back to mechanistic conceptions with network and circuitry conceptions of power. Such metaphors are used to disguise 'the bald truth' of power – that it comes down to one of three 'unattractive alternatives': force, persuasion or ideology:

Politics are not markets, individuals are not groups, and neither people nor politics are computing systems. But these metaphors are constitutively powerful in the policy sciences (Rosenthal 1982: 290).

The theatre metaphor in political theory exhibits some of the traits of Pepper's root metaphors. The metaphor can be a dominant theme for a body of work. It has come to influence a substantial body of theory about behaviour since the 1970s. It tends to be read ahistorically. Although it can be systematically developed, the image of theatre that is invoked tends to be stereotyped and even caricatured. Users assume that others know what they mean when they invoke it, indicating that the metaphor has a broad currency. Recipients, on the other hand and for the same reason, often assume on very scanty evidence that the metaphor as they understand it is in play and use this assumption as a spring-board to read theatre into both life and other theoretical material without considering the implications of such a move or checking whether their extrapolations are valid. The metaphor thus takes on a kind of circularity of explanation.

Of course not all metaphors, and not all uses of the same metaphor, are used in this systemic way. Sometimes an attempt at a systemic metaphor simply fails and is dropped in the course of a single work. Rajaram (2003) for instance uses the theatre metaphor to begin his discussion of the use of spectacle by both the government and detention centre inmates in their contest over the status of refugees. His first sub-heading is 'Setting the stage'. However, the metaphor is not really suitable and he drops it after page 9. By the end of the article there is no mention of theatre or performance. The article in fact is strong enough without the metaphor, as he must have realised. Theatre is a distancing device, but so too is spectacle and surveillance. Rajaram's point is that regimes that use surveillance as a form of control must reduce what they are to control to an image. This reduction is not an act of theatre but an act of objectification by a powerful spectator, an 'offshoot of surveillance and the desire to control within strategies of surveillance' (Rajaram 2003: 6). To counter this, the surveilled must insist on their facticity. This is far from theatre. It is a battle over spectatorship in which the watched challenge their reductive image by using their bodies. Theatrical acting tends to try to find ways to overcome the limitations imposed by the body of the actor, whereas 'performance' here is about the assertion of the physical reality of the detained in the face of attempts to undermine that reality.

Some uses of a metaphor can be so open-ended as to admit almost any interpretation while others are simply one-offs, designed to be dismissive rather than to encourage further thought. The relationships in a metaphor can also reverse even within a single work. Politics can be theatre in any number of ways, and theatre can be seen as politics but not only will the metaphors mean something fundamentally different, one will be a theatre metaphor and the other a politics metaphor, even though the terminology is basically the same. The theatre metaphor is particularly slippery in this regard.

Given these capacities and manifestations of metaphors, some guidelines for the recognition of a metaphor would be useful. Unfortunately metaphor theory does not offer a great deal of help in this regard. If anything, it can make recognition even more difficult.

Metaphorology

Although metaphors prompt users and recipients to see one phenomenon as another and Aristotle thought sound could do this as well as language (Aristotle Rhetoric 1405a.35-1405b.5), metaphor is generally described as a phenomenon of language. A metaphor is 'a figure of speech in which a word or phrase is applied to something to which it is not literally applicable' (Concise Oxford 1999: 895), usually according to the formula A is B.¹⁰ Similar definitions appear in specialist literary handbooks such as The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory: ‘A figure of speech in which one thing is described in terms of another’ (Cuddon 1991: 542) and A Handbook of Literary Terms: ‘A figure of speech in which a comparison is made between two objects by identifying one with the other’ (Yelland, Jones, and Easton 1959: 116). The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy defines metaphor as ‘[t]he most important figure of speech, in which one subject-matter ... is referred to be a term or sentence ... that does not literally describe it’ (Blackburn 1994: 240). The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy similarly defines metaphor as ‘a figure of speech (or a trope) in which a word or phrase that literally denotes one thing is used to denote another, thereby implicitly comparing the two things’ (Audi 1996: 488).

These definitions not only locate metaphors in words, they locate them in a particular area of language as if the distinction between literal and figurative language is not only universally accepted but clearly recognizable. Yet there are deep divisions in metaphor literature as to whether metaphors are a phenomenon of language at all. Conceptualist metaphor theorists in particular as well as scholars of the history of ideas such as Pepper and Lovejoy (1936) see them rather as a mode of cognition, operating through perception and at the level of thought. If this is the case, metaphors will be found in all forms of human expression, not just in language: art, cartoons, sculpture, photographs, films, buildings, advertisements, symbols, social institutions, even in actions, social practices (Indurkha 1992; Kaplan 1990; Kennedy, Green, and Vervaeke 1993; Kovecses 2002) and sounds.¹¹ An information booklet outlining a government’s health policy that used the image of metal edges and bindings to suggest that the government’s policy was a strong box or safe as in Figure 2.2 should, according to these theorists, be seen as metaphoric.

¹⁰ Almost identical definitions can be found in The Winston Dictionary (1945), the Reader’s Digest Great Illustrated Dictionary (1984) and the Macquarie Australian Encyclopedic Dictionary (2006)

¹¹ It is because he believed that ‘the sound may be the metaphor’ that Aristotle thought some plays were better read (Aristotle Rhetoric 1413b.10).

Figure 2.2 Front Cover: Strengthening Medicare. An Important Message from the Prime Minister (Australian Government 2004)

Similarly, the composite graphic images called emblems that were popular during the Renaissance operated as visual metaphors to cue connections with and understandings of the words within (Vicari 1993). Hobbes' Leviathan (1651) was accompanied by one such compelling image in which the relationship between the state and its people was represented by an enormous individual containing within his outstretched arms multitudes of tiny figures that were all facing him (see Figure 2.3). Hundert and Nelles (1989), Ezrahi (1995), Boltanski (1999: 26) and Panagia (2003) all argue that this is a theatrical metaphor, in keeping with Hobbes' understanding of representation as what an actor does:

[P]ersona in latine signifies the disguise, or outward appearance of a man, counterfeited on the stage; ... and from the stage, hath been translated to any representer of speech and action, as well in tribunals, as theatres (Hobbes 1996/1651: 106).

Political representation is like theatrical impersonation. The ‘representater’ provides a focus for the gaze of ‘restless’ spectators, which helps to constitute them as a citizen body/audience, thereby unifying them despite their ‘multitude of opinions and beliefs’ (Panagia 2003: 108). The problem for the representater, as for the theatrical actor, is to maintain the attention and therefore the unity of the collective so that order can be maintained. Panagia argues for this interpretation of Hobbes on the basis of the image in Figure 2.3, which is magnified in Figure 2.4. Spectator/citizens within the arms of Leviathan are depicted before their sovereign with their heads covered. The only place where this was permitted at the time was in the theatre.¹²

The development of visual technologies has increasingly ‘seduced us into the belief that we can visualize and empirically verify’ metaphorical images such as ‘the people’ (Lucaites 1997: 282). Photographs in particular now reify the people in representative individuals such as the iconic soldier, sportsman, farmer, worker etcetera to such an extent that ‘[i]mages ... rather than reality ... turn the wheels of the political world’ (Graber 1981: 199). Interaction between imagery and language creates ‘scopic regimes’ by which views of the world are constructed (Fleckenstein et al 2007). It is Leviathan’s image combined with Hobbes’ words that generates the conception of the social contract as a protective device. French revolutionaries were aware of the power of such scopic regimes: they engaged in intense debates over how to utilise visual allegory and metaphor to promote their political ends, and struggled with the problem of limiting likely interpretation (De Baecque 1994: 134). What, for instance, could be made of the metaphorical image of Reason as a woman with a lion’s head-dress and an eye (the eye of surveillance) in her breast (Figure 2.5 on page 35 below)?

¹² Panagia also draws on Hobbes’ interest in optics and in aesthetics to argue, contra Pitkin, that the political and the aesthetic are ‘intimately related’ in Hobbes’ treatment of representation (Panagia 2003: 97). Hobbes rejected a number of other proposed images for his book.

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 2.3 Cover Illustration for Hobbes' Leviathan (1651 Edition)
(from <http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/h/hobbes/thjomas/h681/>)

Figure 2.4 Close-up of Leviathan showing hats (from detailed cover illustration of 1996 edition by Oxford University Press).

Nevertheless, the insistence on metaphor as a linguistic phenomenon not only persists, it brings with it an insistence on a distinction between literal and figurative language. This distinction is generally attributed to Aristotle, who appeared to be the first to formally categorize metaphors. Aristotle, however, made no such distinction (Derrida 1974; Leezenberg 2001: 36; Mahon 1999: 72-79).¹³ Rather, he distinguished metaphors from other uses of words on the basis of appropriateness of purpose. He also drew a distinction between those who could use metaphors and those who could not: free and equal citizens could use them, but slaves could not. This was because metaphors could have a ‘striking’ effect (Aristotle Rhetoric 1404b.5-15), and striking one’s master, literally or figuratively, was unacceptable (Cooper 1986: 152; Pepper 1966/1942: 141). Metaphors were invoked for a particular reason: in order to ‘ornament our subject’ or ‘depreciate it’ (Aristotle Rhetoric 1405a.15). Metaphor use was thus a purposeful and affective practice (Bourdieu 1990: 94), that aimed to affect how their subject was to be perceived.

As a purposeful practice metaphors are particularly suited to politics. Indeed their use in political rhetoric is partly why metaphors came to be viewed negatively in political theory. The ‘great’ metaphors of political theory – human relationships (contracts, markets, promises, sport, games, war, family), making and doing things (medicine, building, tailoring, acting, engineering, horsemanship, piloting), the characteristics of artefacts (buildings, foundations, webs, clocks, machines, engines, computers, communication networks), the capacities of human beings (as persons or bodies), subhuman activities and processes in nature (animal behaviour, organic processes, properties such as attraction, repulsion, revolution, force) and mathematical relations (proportions of various kinds) (Miller 1979: 157) – have all aimed to portray the state or society in a way that is designed to influence how it is to be perceived. Usually this is to indicate that there is some kind of underlying order or stability that the metaphor user sees as threatened (Herrmann 2003). Montesquieu, for instance, claimed governments were mechanical engines. As such their 'springs' and 'actions' could be affected by environmental conditions (Saccaro-Battisti 1983: 38). J.S. Mill invoked society as a vulnerable flock of birds or colony of small animals in order to argue for the state as the protector of liberty:

¹³ There is, however, some evidence of the distinction (untheorised) in Plato, who considered that each word should have a ‘proper’ meaning (for example in Cratylus). The distinction was clearly made by Abd Al-Qahir Al-Jurjani (d. 1078CE), who appeared to have no knowledge of Greek writings on the topic (Leezenberg 2001: 36-46). Much early knowledge of Greek writing in the west came through Arabic scholarship, which is perhaps how the distinction came to be attributed to Aristotle.

To prevent the weaker members of the community from being preyed upon by innumerable vultures, it was needful that there should be an animal of prey stronger than the rest, commissioned to keep them down (Mill 1993/1861: 70).

Figure 2.5 'The allegorical figure of Reason' 1794
(Bibliothèque nationale de France, reproduced in Maslan 2005: 181)

Hobbes certainly believed that the political uses of metaphors could be dangerous. Figurative language invoking strong imagery 'ensnared' the thinking of hearers. This 'art of words' allowed some men to 'represent to others, that which is good, in the likeness of evil; and evil, in the likeness of good ... discontenting men, and troubling their peace at their pleasure' (Hobbes 1996/1651: 113. It was 'like to a spider's web ... for by contexture of words tender and delicate wits are ensnared' (Hobbes, cited in Hanson 1991: 205). The figurative language of religion in particular was politically dangerous because of its inflammatory effect.

Locke too complained (metaphorically) of metaphors, calling them 'perfect cheats':

[I]f we would speak of things as they are, we must allow that ... all the artificial and figurative application of words eloquence hath invented, are for nothing else but to insinuate wrong ideas, move the passions, and thereby mislead the judgment, and so indeed are perfect cheats (Locke 1961/1690: 105).

Hobbes' and Locke's resort to figurative language to complain about the effects of figurative language indicates the difficulties associated with insisting on a clear distinction between literal and figurative language and a privileging of literal language as proper language. Nevertheless virtually all fields interested in metaphors, from literature, language studies and linguistics to art, philosophy and politics, including those using conceptual/cognitive and perceptual conceptions that claim to overcome it, continue to operate with this distinction between 'ordinary' language and metaphor.

As part of this distinction comes the idea that metaphors are also an anomalous form of language, parasitic on 'normal usage' (Ortony 1993/1979: 3). Although again generally attributed to Aristotle, this view appears to have come from the development in the seventeenth century of what Leezenberg calls a 'language ideology' (Leezenberg 2001: 1) that condemned the florid use of metaphors and 'rampant fancy' by mediaeval scholars and rhetoricians (Corbett and Connors 1999: 509; Gentner and Jeziorski 1993) as part of a wider challenge to analogy as the appropriate path to 'scientific' knowledge (Cooper 1986: 212; Foucault 1994/1966: 27).¹⁴ Metaphors and figurative language were considered unfit for rational argument according to scientists because they could not be tied unequivocally to ‘things as they are’ (Locke 1961/1690: 105) and ‘[r]easoning upon them’ led to ‘wandering amongst innumerable absurdities’ (Hobbes 1996/1651: 32). Samuel Johnson refused to use metaphors when addressing ‘the Supreme Being’ because he believed one should ‘[n]ever lie in your prayers’ (reported by Boswell; cited in Fussell 1965: 120).

¹⁴ The profligate use of metaphor and florid analogy amongst Alchemists for whom metaphors and analogies 'were the proper means for depicting a universe of signs and ciphers' because of their 'correspondence' or analogic view of knowledge reached its height with Paracelsus (1493-1541) but, largely because of the spirited critique of 'scientists' such as Hobbes, Bacon and Kepler,

One of the champions of this language ideology was Bacon, who considered philosophers who engaged in fanciful speculation to be creators of ‘idols of the theatre’. Their ‘grand schemes of systems’ were like plays invented for the stage, ‘more compact and elegant, and more as one would wish them to be, than true stories out of history’ and therefore likely ‘to lead the understanding astray’ (Bacon Novum Organum 1620 in Vickers 1971: 213). At its extreme, proponents urged the replacement of words with symbols like mathematical symbols, in order to achieve precision and stability of meaning in ‘things and notions’ (John Wilkins (1614-1672) in Corbett and Connors 1999: 510) so that reasoning on them could be reliable.¹⁵ Language ideology thus posits as an ideal a kind of ‘steno-language’ (Wheelwright 1964) in which the marks called words have a precise and unchanging meaning. This ideal has been implicitly supported by the rise of positivism, and by developments in formal logic. It has also, perhaps inadvertently, been fostered by the synchronic focus in linguistics and semiotics and by current cognitive, individualistic views of language use, all of which ignore the contextualised, dynamic, purposeful, relational and iconic use of language (Leezenberg 2001: 111), possibly because of the difficulties this creates for their work.

The distinction between literal and figurative language and the view that metaphors are anomalous has not been without challenge even within language disappeared within a period of less than seventy years. The subsequent use of analogy and metaphor was so austere as to no doubt seem to its users to be non-existent (Gentner and Jeziorski 1993). The insistence on the omnipresence of metaphor in much contemporary work on metaphor could be seen as a reaction against another set of earlier theorists, the Logical Positivists, who, in turn, were probably reacting against the Romantic view of language (Mahon 1999: 79), itself a reaction against the language claims of Bacon, Locke and Hobbes.

¹⁵ Wilkins was one of the early pillars of the Royal Society. German humanist Wilhelm von Humboldt (1767-1835) also supported the establishment of a science of language for the same reasons.

studies. Condillac (1714-1780) argued that there was no difference between ‘proper expression and figurative expression’ (cited in Todorov 1982/1977: 112). Vico (1968/1744), Rousseau (1990/1781), Sainte-Etienne (1784), Nietzsche (1974/1873), Merleau-Ponty (Gill 1991: xiii) and Gadamer (1981) all argued that language was basically or originally metaphoric, a view shared by Hesse (1995) and Cavallaro (2001: 28). According to Vico, in pre-literate societies and in children’s use of language what scholars called metaphorical language was in fact everyday language. Calling it metaphorical was ‘a conceit of scholars’ who sought to impose an external category onto a phenomenon perceived quite differently by those using the phenomenon (Vico 1968/1744: 427, 436-7).¹⁶ This view is borne out by the ease of metaphor use in everyday language.¹⁷ Corpus linguistic studies of metaphor indicate that humans are inveterate users of metaphor, and that such use is ‘fluid’ and ‘dynamic’ (Deignan 2005: 134). People choose or create metaphors from their social, cultural and historical contexts, from stereotypes, religious beliefs, ‘culturally salient texts, films, [and] pieces of art’ (Zinken 2003: 509). They mix and match them in ways that would horrify any traditional grammarian who finds mixed metaphors offensive, enjoy intertextual referencing, and delight in ‘one-shot’ or novel metaphors that they bandy about for fun (Semino 2001; Semino 2002). People also generally do not see metaphors as violations of normal language (Gibbs 1993: 255) and they appear to understand them ‘effortlessly’ (Gibbs 1993: 253).

This suggests that metaphors are not recognized as such. Indeed, this is the key to the conceptualists’ claim to metaphor’s inherent political nature. The implications of seeing one thing as another are simply taken up without question, coming to constitute human experience by imposing a particular order or pattern on it that structures it (Gill 1991: 105; Johnson 1981: 31; Kovecses 2002: 62). This particularly occurs in relation to what conceptualists also call deep or root metaphors. Like Pepper's root metaphors, these metaphors are conceptual in nature, used implicitly, go unnoticed and yet shape the way the everyday world is understood and managed. Most, however, are ontological. They arise from the biological experience of being in the world. Ontological deep metaphors include such concepts as life is a journey and time moves and are 'basic devices for comprehending our experience' (Lakoff and Johnson 1980: 219). Orientational deep metaphors are also ontological. They reflect existential experiences such as feeling uplifted when happy, leading to root metaphors such as happy is up. These metaphors are thought to be a central and universal part of cognition, not language, since humans everywhere appear to see the world in these terms. They also do not appear to be subjected to the similarity/comparison tests that are widely thought to be the way metaphors come to be understood. According to non-conceptualists this is because these kinds of metaphors are 'dead'. They have become reified or accepted as simply true or literal and so no longer serve a metaphoric function (Furniss and Bath 1996). Conceptualists however argue reified metaphors are far from dead. They underpin virtually every way of thinking and talking about and acting on reality, including other people. This is what makes them 'political'.

¹⁶ This argument was helpful in resolving the issue of whether or not to tackle the voluminous literature on metaphors from the field of anthropology for this study. It was not clear that Vico’s ‘conceit of scholars’ was not at work in this literature, even in the exemplary work of Geertz and Turner. It is particularly problematic in the work of Fernandez. Rather than complicate an already difficult topic with material which may raise questions about the justification of applying a western concept like metaphor to non-western cultures, the study focuses on material which specifically addresses metaphor use within western culture, particularly since theatre is generally assumed to be a western phenomenon – perhaps wrongly as Table 1 in Appendix B and Tables 2/51, 3/51, 9/51 in Appendix D indicate.

¹⁷ See Nerlich and Clarke (2001) for a discussion of 19th century German approaches to the philosophy and psychology of metaphor which argued sometime before Lakoff and other cognitivists that metaphors were necessary ‘for the structure and growth of human thought and language’ and therefore preceded literal language.

Virtually all current theories of metaphor remain inadequate according to Leezenberg, because they continue to be underpinned by an implicit commitment to the ideological view that literal language is proper language and takes precedence over figurative language when: 'as convenient as it may be, literal meaning is, in the final analysis, [an] ideal of academic discourse' (Leezenberg 2001: 304). Yet some distinction is clearly required for 'metaphoricity' to be recognized (Cooper 1986: 278; Tronstad 2002: 218). Lakoff and Turner argue that 'to the extent that a concept is understood and structured on its own terms – without making use of a structure imported from a completely different conceptual domain – it is not metaphorical' (Lakoff and Turner 1989). Understanding the difference between life and death in terms of functioning, to give their example, is not being metaphorical. Transferring this non-metaphorical understanding of life and death onto some non-living entity such as machinery is what produces a metaphor, for example: 'the phone is dead' (Lakoff and Turner 1989: 57-58). However, even this distinction is unreliable, given the implications of usefulness and performance within the term function. Under this definition, too, it would seem non-metaphorical to consider theatre in terms of performance since performance is widely associated with theatre, yet this depends on performance itself being a theatrical term, something that is not at all certain. The following example gives some idea of the problems of definition: is it a literal statement, a metaphorical statement, a pun, or perhaps all three?

Winemaker ... Evans & Tate [concerned about its] commitments to purchase grapes ... said the company was hopeful its continuing talks with its grape suppliers would prove fruitful (Rochfort 2006).

Traditional explanations of metaphor recognition claim that what is involved is an attempt at literal interpretation, failure, and then a search for other explanations by locating some similarity between the two phenomena and/or by comparison between the two. Many theorists still plump for a search for similarity as the most immediate response to a metaphor, despite the view being criticised both because it is always possible to find similarities between any phenomena at some level, and because the view assumes that metaphors can be literally paraphrased, an assumption that again is underpinned by an assumed difference between literal and figurative language. One of the most intriguing characteristics of metaphors is that it is generally not possible to fully capture their meaning with a paraphrase, although '[t]he starting point for philosophical discussion of metaphor is whether or not metaphors are paraphrasable in literal terms' (Sharpe 1995). Recognition is further complicated by views that see metaphors as simultaneously (and selectively) combining both similarity and comparison (Goatly 1997: 2) or as interactive (Black 1962; 1977). Nevertheless literal language remains the standard against which metaphors are recognized and assessed. The three competing perspectives on metaphor that Leezenberg identifies, referentialist, descriptivist and conceptualist, all depend upon an implicit ability to recognize the difference between literal and metaphorical language, although for conceptualists the distinction is made at the level of thought rather than speech. Referentialists subscribe to the comparison view of metaphor interpretation: metaphors are interpreted by virtue of the shared properties the referents have. Descriptivists generally subscribe to the ‘interaction’ view of metaphor interpretation: metaphor interpretation is guided by the descriptive information associated with the expression and is a result of the interaction between both terms. For conceptualists, interpretation arises from general cognitive mechanisms such as reasoning by analogies, propositional argument and the ability to imagine one thing as another, thereby assigning a crucial role to an interpreter’s conceptual and cognitive capacities.

Ortony, whose reader in metaphor study has remained a core text over several editions and reprints divides the field of metaphor study into either a traditional non-constructivist model or a more recent constructivist model (Ortony 1993/1979: 2). Table 2.2 is a schematic view of the field of metaphorology, adapted from Leezenberg (2001) and incorporating Ortony’s distinctions.

Level of interpretation		referentialist (comparison)	descriptivist (interaction)	conceptualist (concept-formation)	perceptualist (sense)
		Non-constructivist		Constructivist
Within Language Theory/ Linguistics	Semantics		Black 1962 Beardsly Goodman Kaplan Kittay	Lakoff & Johnson Goatly
	Pragmatics	Grice	Black 1979 Searle Martinich Kittay	Levinson Sperber & Wilson	Reddy 1979
Outside Linguistics ‘proper’	Cognition	Davidson Hausman		Richards 1936 Reddy Lakoff & Johnson Lakoff & Turner Miller	Dent-Read & Szokolszky
	Art	Hausman			Morris
	Organizational Studies			Schon Mangham & Overington
	Philosophy			Johnson Arendt	Arendt Heidegger
	Theatre Studies				Peacock

Table 2.2 Schematic view of the field of metaphor study (adaptation of the interpretation-oriented guideline of Leezenberg 2001: 11)

The non-constructivist model, which includes semantic and some pragmatic theories, is committed to metaphor as a phenomenon of language, and to the divide between literal and figurative language. Ortony limits the constructivist model, which he dates from the ‘conceptual turn’ instigated by Lakoff and Johnson in their 1980 book Metaphors We Live By. This model sees metaphors as conceptual or cognitive, pervasive, and deeply implicated in the construction of reality.¹⁸ The perceptualist model is also a constructivist model. Its proponents call it a realist or ecological approach to metaphor that supposedly has the advantage over other cognitive models of metaphor of allowing for the inclusion of action and visual metaphors as well as linguistic ones (Dent-Read and Szokolszky 1993). This model situates metaphor at a pre-cognition level. Resonance with the world is the key to metaphor recognition in this model. Resonance sets off a perceptual process involving the ‘active partial transformation’ of the topic ‘under the guidance’ of the ‘vehicle’ (Dent-Read and Szokolszky 1993: 227) because some resonance between the two prompts users of the metaphor to see that the one can be used for the other. Similarly, resonance prompts hearers of the metaphor to follow suit. The example offered is of a child using a shoe as a car. However, perception is itself ‘a combining operation’ (Campbell 1971: 35), so it is unclear whether metaphor is the explanation for the behaviour observed, or a metaphor for it, particularly given Heidegger’s claim that humans utilise whatever comes to hand with ‘not a bare perceptual condition, but rather that kind of concern which manipulates things and puts them to use’ (Heidegger 1962: 95).

The strength of the conceptualist position derives from the existence of implied metaphors that require conceptual analysis rather than linguistic analysis in order to make sense of them (Steen 1999: 82-4). However, even within this model, there is debate over whether metaphors are expressed only in language or can be expressed outside of language, for example, visually or in action, and whether they are a phenomenon of thought by virtue of language (because we think in language), or whether they operate pre-language and therefore direct both thinking and language acquisition. The strong version of this model insists along with perceptualists that metaphor occurs pre-language.

¹⁸ Some trace this approach back to a seminal but largely ignored work on rhetoric by I.A. Richards in 1936.

The problem of recognition becomes particularly acute with the work of Billig who considers that even words such as ‘we’, ‘us’ ‘the’ and ‘this’ operate metaphorically. Although adherents to the distinction between literal and figurative language would deny that these words can be metaphors, there is a sense in which the use of ‘the’ before a noun implies the actual existence of the entity named by the noun, for example, ‘the people’ (Billig 1995: 94), or ‘the Common European House’ (Chilton and Ilyin 1993) and they therefore can provoke us to see something familiar as something else: people as a particular group or a family home housing all Europeans. Forming the many into one can be a way of limiting the problems of plurality associated with democratic politics (Arendt 1958: 221), but it will be seen in Chapter 6 that the use of ‘the’ in conjunction with ‘audience’ bundles casual collectives of spectators in ways that not only allows them to be objectified, but allows them to be disposed of en masse. The politics in this kind of tactic can be seen in the comment of the Australian Education Minister in 2006 that ‘[t]hese people [are] potentially doing significant damage to our future’. ‘These people’ – ‘they’ – who are these malevolent aliens?’ Lumby asked in response. These apparently treacherous people were ‘a group of thoughtful, underpaid and overworked citizens with an average of [at] least twenty years experience in the classroom ... English teachers as the rest of us call them’ (Lumby 2006: 29).

Billig claims that these kinds of metaphors operate insidiously but can have dire political effects. To say that something is ‘the smoking gun’ in the context of a search for weapons of mass destruction in a ‘rogue’ state implies a particular kind of proof that such weapons exist and not only can be found, they ought to be found (Billig and MacMillan 2005: 470). Waging a war can be justified under this imagery. If this is the power of a metaphor then recognition is a pressing problem that requires some definitive answer.

Metaphors or analogies?

The prospects for recognition are not helped when analogies are also seen as extended metaphors (Miller 1979: 156) or conversely, when metaphors are seen as ‘frozen analogies’ (Arendt 1978/1971: 104). Unlike metaphors however, analogies explicitly state how the two fields involved are to be related and point out the similarities to be considered (Indurkha 1992; Way 1991). They follow the formula A:B as C:D. While analogies also require the recipient to fill in the relationship, the requirement for some symmetry between the two things being compared limits interpretation. In response to the analogical question ‘Who is to Great Britain as Nancy Reagan [was] to the US?’, if the answer is Dennis Thatcher, president has been deemed similar to prime minister and wife of the president has been deemed similar to husband of the prime minister. If the answer is Prince Philip, president is considered similar to Queen and wife of the president has been equated with the husband of the Queen (Indurkha 1992: 31). Further responses are possible but limited.

Simple or proportional analogies (gills are to fish as lungs are to humans) simply ‘notice’ existing similarities (Indurkha 1992: 28). However, analogies become predictive when further similarities are projected on the basis of a specified existing similarity. Because Prince Philip is equivalent to Nancy Reagan in being married to a head of state, he will also be like Nancy Reagan in other respects – perhaps he too will consult astrologers. Predictive analogies are widespread both in research and in everyday life but they have ‘a dark side’ in that there is an assumption that one is justified in predicting further similarities because similarities already exist between two domains. Yet such inferences are not always justified, rendering analogy a hindrance rather than an aid to cognition (Indurkha 1992: 28). For example, the assumption that because representative politics and theatre share a relationship with a public they will share other similarities can prevent politics from being taken seriously even though, unlike theatre, politics is continuous, consequential and may require skills and knowledge that are not required by theatre. Similarly, during the lead-up to the Iraq War, an analogy repeatedly drawn between Saddam Hussein and Adolf Hitler encouraged not just predictions of similar dire consequences if action against

Hussein was not taken, but a kind of moral panic about the consequences of not acting. The analogy had traction because of the reluctance of America to act during World War II in the face of Nazi atrocities, yet the situations were different in significant ways that needed to be considered before action was taken.¹⁹

Arguments from predictive analogy can be psychologically compelling because both users and recipients fill in for themselves the required background to make the analogy plausible: '[e]veryone thinks that they have arrived at [the conclusions] by themselves', making such analogies an ideal tool of propaganda and political rhetoric (Indurkha 1992: 337-9).²⁰ While the same thing can occur with metaphors it is the assumption that the analogy can be extended that gives predictive analogy 'all its force' (Indurkha 1992: 33).²¹ Because of this Indurkha insists that predictive analogies should not be confused with metaphors, but perhaps the line between them is not very clear for metaphors too can become 'self-fulfilling prophecies' (Lakoff and Johnson 1981: 321). Certainly some users of the theatre metaphor seem to base their further extrapolations on how humans behave on an initial perception that both theatre and life require individuals to manage a variety of sometimes conflicting but regularly occurring activities over a period of time. The result is that it is now very difficult to talk about such situations without recourse to the word 'role'. Analogies as well as metaphors will need to be considered for this study.

Metaphormania

The problem for metaphorology once visual, aural and 'dead' metaphors as well as articles, pronouns and analogies are admitted is not just recognition but also where to draw the line. Typically metaphorologists resolve this issue by diverting their attention onto what particular metaphors 'do', turning the study of metaphor into a daunting taxonomy (Ricoeur 1977: 11).²² Goatly (1997: 27, 158-166) for instance claims metaphors are used to:

¹⁹ A similar analogy between Obama and Hitler is being drawn by radical Republicans such as Glenn Beck who has claimed that America is in danger of being destroyed by a black president with a 'deep-seated hatred for white people' (quoted in Tiffen 2010)

²⁰ Indurkha cites a research model of the French Revolution which required students to undergo simulated cross-examination at the hands of 'revolutionaries' at different times during the course of the upheavals, and use predictive analogy and induction to decide what they should answer. Almost invariably (and typically for revolutions, according to Indurkha) correct answers at one cross-examination could not be used to predict what would be 'correct' answers at the next.

²¹ Original emphasis.

1. fill lexical gaps by ‘misusing’ a word
2. express emotion
3. dress up concepts to grab attention or conceal unpleasantness (euphemisms).
4. allow prevarication and the avoidance of responsibility
5. disguise or misrepresent
6. cultivate intimacy or create a sense of community or exclude others
7. create a sense of informality
8. explain or model
9. aid reconceptualization
10. foreground a particular aspect of something. Hyperbolic metaphors in particular do this (‘Britain’s butter mountain’; ‘trouble erupted’).²³
11. provide information
12. aid problem-solving
13. direct action
14. organize
15. present meanings as well as represent meanings (metaphors are iconic).
16. compress information
17. exploit intertextuality
18. argue by analogy
19. create humour and allow games
20. express and promote ideological positions
21. enhance memorability
22. fictionalise
23. access allegorical meaning
24. personify things that would otherwise be considered alien or threatening.²⁴

²² Ricoeur blames the decline of interest in rhetoric on this excessive focus on words.

²³ Goatly says that all metaphors are hyperbolic, but see Carney (1993) for an example of metaphoric understatement as a form of rhetoric.

²⁴ Inflation, for instance, when described as ‘the enemy’ becomes both more understandable, and more easily seen as something which requires fighting (Cooper 1986: 166).

Metaphors can do all these things because they encourage users and recipients to see something as if it were something else – a hand-held pointing device for a computer as a mouse; a heart as a pump; the oversupply of produce as a mountain; the nuisance of refugees as criminality, a concern with appearance as theatrical.

Metaphorising is supposedly something we all do every day for all these functions. Although at least some of them could be carried out by visual metaphors, Goatly's belief that for metaphors to be recognized a system of markers is required, places metaphors securely back into language because his markers are all linguistic. Explicit markers provide easily recognized clues (they might use the word 'metaphorically' in the text); domain markers also give obvious clues (a human Catherine Wheel; mental stagnation). Other markers are words like 'literally', 'actually', 'in fact', 'indeed', 'simply', 'fairly', 'just', 'absolutely', 'completely', 'fully', 'quite', 'thoroughly', 'regular.' Some markers can 'kill' a metaphor, while others such as 'literally', 'really' and 'utterly' act as intensifiers. Still others have ambiguous effects ('incredible', 'some kind of') (Goatly 1997: 173-5).²⁵

Socrates said he needed to be 'a diver to get to the bottom' of the thought of Heraclitus who was known as 'the riddler' because he communicated in metaphors (Fernandez-Armesto 1998: 36). Enthusiasts like Goatly seem to make metaphor analysis similarly impenetrable.²⁶ Genette sees this as part of a 'tropological reduction' aimed at reducing rhetoric to metaphor (Genette 1982: 105). Reduction alleviates the problem of metaphor recognition at least in relation to other tropes such as analogies, but tends to locate agency in the metaphor itself rather than in its user, attributing 'power to meaning, instead of meaning to power' (Hodge and Kress 1988: 2). This is another reason why conceptualists see metaphors as political: they allow agency and therefore accountability to be deflected onto the created image. Plato used this strategy when he invoked the image of a fabricated object for the political realm. When the philosopher-king 'construct[s] the happy city' as if 'painting a statue' (Plato Republic 420c-d), 'the ²⁵ Adam Smith is said to have been so consistent in his use of the marker 'if one may say so' that his metaphors can be located through a computer search on the phrase (Rommel 1997).

²⁶ The distinctions Goatly draws have proven difficult to implement for Corpus Linguistics (Deignan 2005: 41) compelling factor lies not in the person of the artist or craftsman but in the impersonal object of his art or craft' (Arendt 1958: 227).

Doing Politics through Metaphor

What constitutes politics is almost always described metaphorically. Besides the state is a body/person, other metaphorical conceptions of politics include:

- politics is a game or sport: 'the Liberal Party is batting for small business' (Howard 2004);
- politics is war: politicians are defensive and embattled Prime Ministers must struggle to keep their 'troops' united; war can be declared on drugs, crime, terrorism or obesity;
- politics is a journey: in the late twentieth century, Australia 'had been drifting ...struggling ... slipping' in a turbulent environment, was now 'heading in the right direction' but 'had come to a fork in the road' (Howard 2004);
- politics is a business providing brand name products (parties) from which voters as consumers could choose at elections;²⁷
- the state is a ship: 'I feel comfortable ... that the ship of state is on course' (Australian Governor-General Michael Jeffery in Alcorn 2008: 4);
- politics is a pilgrimage: the Chinese had engaged in a 'long march'; 'the trumpet summon[ed America] again ... to bear the burden of the long twilight struggle' (President Kennedy in Wilson 1990: 103).

Particular kinds of political participation are implicit in representations of politics as a game, sport, war, theatre or business and in the state as a body or ship or system. Citizens can be inside or outside the state, and even less than human. They may be relegated to the position of mass spectators on the sidelines. Some of these positions are completely at odds with the rhetoric of active citizenship that underpins much political theory yet the metaphors persist even where concerted efforts are underway to promote political participation.

²⁷ Sless (1985) argues that it is inevitable that politicians come to see voters as consumers because both advertising agencies and public opinion polling are committed to an understanding of communication as transmission: a 'plumbing' metaphor which assumes 'a flow must take place' (Sless 1985: 122).

An infamous metaphor that drew on politics is a pilgrimage to the extent that it became part of the language of both political professionals and general society was The White Man's Burden, used to refer to the responsibility of colonising nations for their sequestered populations. Although the idea of white colonisers having responsibility for non-white populations was common beforehand, the metaphor comes from the title of a poem by Rudyard Kipling published in 1899 on the eve of the American annexation of the Philippines.²⁸ It was extensively used to legitimate imperialism on the basis of a civilizing mission.²⁹ American President McKinley invoked the idea because it allowed America to annex another country while at the same time deny that it had any colonial ambitions in Asia:

[T]here was nothing else for us to do but to take them all, and to educate the Filipinos, and uplift and civilize and Christianize them
(cited in Edwardes 1962: 162).

The metaphor was also used in Australia to legitimate the rounding up and sequestering of Aborigines under a 'doctrine of trusteeship' (Stocking 1987: 240) as Kipling became not just the voice of the British empire, but 'the voice of the "Anglo-Saxon Destiny"' (Mazrui 1975: 201).³⁰

²⁸ Kipling's poem reads: 'Take up the White Man's Burden –
Send forth the best ye breed –
Go bind your sons to exile
To serve your captives' needs;
To wait in heavy harness,
On fluttered folk and wild –
Your new caught sullen people
Half-devil and half-child.'

²⁹ For instance, it can be found in Charles Pearson's 1891 book of Australia, National Life and Character to refer to Australia's position regarding both Aborigines and Asians (O'Brien 1995: 71).

³⁰ In one of the ironies of the polysemic nature of culture, one which highlights the dangers of decontextualised metaphor analysis, Kipling also became the poet of "The Black Man's Leader" through his poem If, a poem George Orwell called 'sententious ... given almost biblical status' by jingoistic British imperialists. Black leaders such as Kenya's Tom Mboya and Uganda's R.W. Lwamafa (a Minister in Milton Obote's government) took up If as a kind of anthem. Mboya recited it to a massive crowd in Nairobi on the eve of the elections which brought him to power,

However, while political metaphors can be longstanding, context gives them topical or opportunistic hues. Politics is war tends to surface during periods of actual wars but will be expressed in terms that are relevant to the particular period. Metaphors such as ‘blitz’ and ‘trenches’ in reference to politics were prevalent during the two world wars, while ‘guerrilla warfare’ and ‘minefields’ were favoured during the Korean and Vietnam wars. These have since been replaced by the ‘damage control’ and ‘collateral damage’ terminology of more recent hi-tech wars, although the guerrilla warfare metaphor has continued to be widely used in debates over abortion in the United States (Howe 1988: 98).³¹ After the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center in New York, war metaphors were increasingly combined with religious metaphors in US political rhetoric (Edwards 2004). Several of the weapons developed by the USA’s Defense Threat Reduction Agency under its ‘Hard and Deeply Buried Target Defeat program’ were labelled ‘Divine’ (Divine Strake, Divine Helcat, Divine Warhawk, Divine Hates) (GlobalSecurity.org 2006).³²

Metaphors are routinely mobilised during competitions for power between political elites or competing points of view. In the debate over the appropriate defence role for the Western European Union, for example, European negotiators who favoured an integrated European-run defence role represented the Union as an arm (a body or organic metaphor), while the ‘Atlantic alliance’ (the United States), which favoured a joint defence role, represented the Union as a pillar (a building metaphor) (Luoma-aho 2004). These images of politics are used by political professionals (bureaucrats, negotiators, officials and diplomats), claiming later that ‘[w]hen facing the challenge of nation-building, nobody can claim to have played a manly part if he has not “... filled the unforgiving minute

With sixty seconds’ worth of distance run”’ (cited in Mazrui 1975: 208).

³¹ War as a metaphor for politics is so prevalent these days that it has the appearance of what Lakoff and Johnson would term a deep or root metaphor, but that may be because we live in an era when war is commonplace. In August 2010, there were thirty-six wars underway across the world, four of them involving the United States. Eight were considered to be major wars (military conflicts inflicting 1000 battlefield deaths per year). A distinguishing feature of current wars is that most victims are civilians, bringing war very much into everyday parlance (GlobalSecurity.org 2010).

³² The linking of war and religion has a long history in the United States as Richards demonstrates through the theatrum mundi metaphor (Richards 1991). One politician (Gerry Falwell) claimed, within this rhetoric, that abortionists had to ‘bear some of the burden’ for the attack on the World Trade Center, as did feminists, gays and lesbians (Edwards 2004: 164).

policymakers, think-tanks participants, lobbyists, dissidents, speech-writers, the media, analysts and theorists of all kinds, historians, writers, artists and film-makers – virtually anyone engaged in talking or writing about politics. Politicians (and their speech writers) tend to use familiar, generally available metaphors (Billig 1995: 103; Dyson and Preston 2006). Simple formulations, too, are used more often than complex ones. Mixed metaphors are also very common, despite their ‘logical contradictions’ (Brown 1976: 192; Landau 1965: 8). In his metaphorically entitled Headland speech, Prime Minister Howard mixed sporting metaphors with building metaphors, democracy is a journey and the state is a person (Howard 2004).

Different kinds of metaphors meet different kinds of needs (Lu 1999). The ship of state conveys a sense of order (Nimmo 1974: 21; Saccaro-Battisti 1983: 33), while the representation of the other as a dangerous mass (the Yellow Peril; illegal immigrants) rationalises the exercise of power and exclusion (Rosenthal 1982: 295). Nazi Germany harnessed emerging visual technology to depict Jews as rats and plagues to the German population, while Great Britain used similar technologies and imagery to depict fascist Germany to the British. Such metaphors quickly become part of the common stock in ‘beleaguered’ populations. The Australian movie Romper Stomper (Wright 2003) drew on early Australian immigration policy and rhetoric that routinely invoked the idea of an Asian flood to depict Asian youths as an undifferentiated mass swarming over walls and along narrow alleyways as they chased individualized and fully realised white characters. A study examining the metaphors used to construct Arab and Israeli identities in best-selling contemporary fiction set in the context of the Arab-Israeli conflict, found Arabs described in ways that collectivized them as unpredictable or uncontrollable animals or natural forces. Arabs were ‘a maddened swarm that fell on the wretched quarters of oriental Jews’, an ‘always smoldering rabble [that] ignited into a wildfire that swept over’ the region (Van Teeffelen 1994). Aggressive counter-measures were therefore needed to contain them. These invocations of threatening masses as if they were an enormous single (and single-minded) entity seem to be particularly prevalent at times of upheaval or perceived vulnerability: the French Revolution, the Industrial Revolution, the rise of fascism and communism, the fear of invasion, the movements of political and economic refugees. One consequence and perhaps the main purpose of this imagery, and what makes the metaphor political, is the removal of the possibility of dialogue with such groups since it is clearly impossible to communicate with swarms or wildfires.

Interpreting Metaphors

[T]he figurative meaning is never present except on loan, and is attached to the word only by the very circumstances that led to its borrowing (Fontanier 1967/1818: 385).

The view that it is the receiver of the metaphor who provides the context for a metaphor's interpretation, irrespective of how it is generated, means interpretation is always likely to be contentious. No metaphor user can be sure their metaphor will mean the same thing to recipients as it means to them or that recipients won't appropriate a metaphor and turn it to their own use. Both indigenous Australians and white conservatives, for instance, used the metaphor of the black armband in relation to Australia's colonial history (McKenna 1998): indigenous people to draw attention to the immensity of their losses at the hands of colonists in order to make a claim for justice; conservative politicians in order to signify an unwarranted pre-occupation with the past that stood in the way of successful integration into the mainstream. This latter is more than a misinterpretation of the metaphor. It could even be considered an abuse – a cynical exercise of power to deflect the metaphor back onto its originators with the aim of denigrating and relegating to the past Indigenous concerns with justice – what Skinner calls a 'linguistic sleight-of-hand' (Skinner 1974: 298). On the other hand, it could also be seen as a reinterpretation as part of a genuine response to the problem of collective guilt and aimed at trying to find a more positive and integrative way forward. When American Puritans adopted the theatre metaphor, it was not to counter the negative view the metaphor usually provoked but to establish the glory of America (Richards 1991).

Experiments conducted by Eubanks (1999) and Glucksberg (1989) indicate that when confronted with unfamiliar metaphors (such as trade is a dance), recipients utilise their general knowledge and experience about both phenomena to construct a meaning, although the amount of information held about each term can constrain rather than enhance interpretation. Recipients draw on context but not on the context of the metaphor's origin. Rather, they draw on their own context and the context in which the metaphor is encountered, although knowledge of the circumstances of a metaphor's generation can influence interpretation.³³ They also draw on narratively structured truisms, cultural allegories and long-standing 'master narratives'.³⁴ Metaphors are rarely rejected out of hand, although some can be considered less apt than others because of their inability to invoke a suitable 'licensing story'.

These findings constitute a problem for metaphor analysis, especially of the kind undertaken by conceptualists who engage in forensic analysis of deep or root metaphors. No interpretation of a metaphor can ever be considered completely stable, and analysis itself will be a form of reinterpretation. No metaphors in the studies above were accepted simply because their correspondences were possible or could be constructed (narrativized). Rather, metaphors were accepted, rejected or negotiated depending on the person's political, philosophical, social and personal and cultural commitments (Braman, Kahan, and Grimmelmann 2005; Eubanks 1999), and crucially, the context and topic of the discourse in which they were embedded at the time (Glucksberg 1989). For instance, although gender appeared to be a factor in interpretations of the metaphor trade is a dance because men and women interpreted it differently, neither thought that the metaphor was one that could only be used by one gender, or that the use of it by one gender carried implications for the other gender. Context was the key. In the 'absence' of either context or topic, a plausible context was assumed, even if it was only the research context.³⁵ Thus while context appears to be what determines a metaphor's power and meaning (Brooks 1965: 324; Cameron 1999), that context need not be the metaphor's original context, although knowledge of prior context may create expectations about a metaphor's current meaning (Deignan 2005: 216). Metaphors will always be open to multiple interpretations.

³³ This context may, of course, be the context in which a metaphor is created in the case of novel metaphors – but it is not the origin of the metaphor which matters.

³⁴ For instance they drew on Darwin's 'the survival of the fittest' to interpret 'economic Darwinism' (Eubanks 1999: 429).

³⁵ Researchers often overlook the experiment itself as a context for recipients.

Culturally and historically specific

While certain kinds of ontological metaphors may be 'near-universal' across cultures (happy is up; anger is hot), most metaphors in general use appear to be culturally specific. An attempt to explain the metaphor killer solution to South Korean students engaged in translating an American newspaper report on a new piece of technology revealed that the South Korean language had no comparable concept.³⁶ A long discussion invoking ideas about martial arts, battles and homicide was required before students were able to come up with a way of translating the metaphor.³⁷ Even within a common language, significant differences can occur. For example, African Dutch is rich in both landscape and animal metaphors, neither of which feature in Netherland Dutch, and American English contains 'frontier' expressions that are not found in British English (Kovecses 2002: 186, 188). For this reason, both Cooper (1986) and Semino and Maschi (1996) see metaphors as playing an important role in evoking feelings of intimacy, solidarity and shared experience within a culture because they require some kind of shared knowledge in order to be interpreted successfully. Successful interpretation in turn (and perhaps tautologically) reinforces this sense of sharing. When Kerry O'Keefe described Australian cricketer Brett Lee as 'bowling straighter than Fred Nile' (ABC Radio 702, January 2006), his metaphor, which was actually a double metaphor since it relied on the metaphor working in both directions simultaneously, relied for its success on a 'community' of listeners who knew both that Lee was a fast-bowler, that fast bowlers ought to bowl straight and that Fred Nile was an Australian politician and Christian religious leader renowned for his rigid moral position and straight talking. Whether or not successful interpretation generated a shared enjoyment with other listeners, it depended on at least some shared knowledge.

³⁶ Author's experience when running a conversation class for South Korean students engaged in English language courses for translation purposes.

³⁷ According to UIA, Western business favours metaphors which are derived from either ball games or military combat, giving a mechanistic understanding, whereas Asian business makes use of more non-linear, organic or poetic understandings of sporting or fighting metaphors, for example focusing on the art and strategy of swordsmanship as a metaphor (Union of International Associations (UIA) 1994: Section 2.10).

Although some metaphors also persist through time, their use can also be historically specific. Montaigne, Marx, de Tocqueville, Bagehot and Tompkins all used the theatre metaphor: Montaigne to congratulating himself for surviving revolution unscathed (Montaigne 1985/1580-8); Marx to complain that the organizational cadre responsible for the abortive French revolution of 1848 was ‘dressing itself up’ to give itself the appearance of some historical credibility (Marx 1978/1852: 595, 617); de Tocqueville to point to the way democratic politics in America involved ‘being very appreciative of good acting ... without reference to ... results’ (de Tocqueville 1970/1893: 67); Bagehot to argue that English constitutional politics benefited from the use of ceremony and ritual (Bagehot 1872/1867: 8) and Tompkins to consider the re-negotiation of national identity in Canada and Australia (Tompkins 1995: 142). During the eighteenth century, the focus of the theatre metaphor was on the spectators of politics. At a time of tremendous political upheaval, the metaphor was invoked to rescue the ‘best’ spectators from the apparently invidious position of being a spectator like any other, curious like an animal (Voltaire 1901/1751). In the nineteenth century, theatres became formalised, seating was established and lighting effects became possible (Chaney 1993: 57). For the first time, spectators sat in the dark to watch plays, producing variations of the metaphor that obscured spectators. The rise of the dramaturgical perspective in the 1950s turned the focus increasingly onto performance. Politicians were actors (as was everyone in public): they performed in public (on the stage) and retired to ‘backstage’ to be another kind of self. It is in this sense that Fraser considers Habermas’ concept of the public sphere as ‘a theater in modern societies in which political participation is enacted through the medium of talk ... a theater for debating and deliberating’ (Fraser 1999: 111). With the rise of mass communication technology, contemporary society has come to be considered spectacle (Debord 1970; McKee 2005) and the metaphor is used to point to the mediatised character of modern politics. While conceptualists could certainly claim that underpinning these changing uses of the metaphor is the root metaphor life is theatre, and point to the long history of the metaphor, it is always context that determines the aim, shape, meaning and purpose of a metaphor for the user.

If metaphors are so context dependent, then not only will some metaphors rise and fall in favour, but many of the clues necessary for their interpretation will lie in an understanding of the informational context in which the metaphor comes into public use. The aim, after all, is to be understood whether or not that understanding is to be misleading. This is a considerable relief when confronted with metaphor analyses that plumb the apparently inexhaustible depths of metaphor according to the conceptual view associated with Lakoff, Goatly and Kovecses. It is always possible to find a deeper, more implicit, metaphor when confronted with a metaphor that does not seem to fit those conceptual or root metaphors identified, putting the theory in danger of circularity. In any case, some metaphors seem to operate successfully without such implicit underpinnings (Vervaeke and Kennedy 1996; Zinken 2003). The metaphorical use of the term 'Watergate' is an example. Watergate was the name of the hotel in which the break-in occurred that ended in political scandal for Richard Nixon. It came to be applied as a metonym for the actual break-in but has since come to be widely used to describe any number of subsequent political scandals (White Water Gate; Irangate; Contragate) where political power is used illegally.³⁸ It does not seem reasonable to find deeper, implicit metaphors to underpin this idea in the way that the Great Chain of Being metaphor is said to underpin racist metaphors (Lakoff and Turner 1989: 213), although it is certainly possible to 'construct' some around the concept of gate in the kind of backwards or anachronistic reasoning Vico disparaged.³⁹ Nevertheless, the Watergate example does demonstrate that 'we are all hemmed in by history' (Merleau-Ponty 1964: 109) for if we know about Watergate, whenever we hear the term 'gate' added to some event, we are likely ³⁸ A metonym is a trope in which the name of an attribute or a thing is substituted for the thing itself. White Water Gate refers to a financial scandal involving the Clintons; Irangate to the illegal operations of the CIA in Iran; Contragate to the illegal operations of the CIA in South America.

³⁹ See Conkey (1996) for a discussion of the way western metaphors are used to construct categories for other cultures and societies in this kind of backwards reasoning. In particular the idea of the west as 'present' places other cultures and societies in 'the past' in a way which seems to confirm 'foundation hypotheses' about the west. As a consequence it becomes possible to insist, for instance, that animal imagery from paleolithic digs is 'art' and associated with 'primitive hunting rituals', despite the lack of evidence to support either assumption.

to bring to our understanding of the event (perhaps mistakenly) all that we know of Watergate and its aftermath.⁴⁰

Whether or not metaphors are cognitive, they are cultural and social phenomena that draw from and tap into the ‘cultural imagination’ (Nerlich, Hamilton, and Rowe 2002) and this provides clues if not for recognition then at least for interpretation, once found. With regard to recognition, in the absence of unconflicting expert advice, this study will rely on metaphors that others have identified or that seem to be fairly indisputable. As the next chapter shows, however, even this presents some difficulties for it is not always clear that what some people assume to be a theatre metaphor actually is one.

⁴⁰ The problem is, of course, as Reddy pointed out, that we may know nothing about Watergate, and the addition of ‘gate’ to political scandals will be inexplicable in the way the sudden emergence of ‘sea’ attached to any use of the word ‘change’ in relation to life-style change can not only be inexplicable but irritating if its history is unknown.

Chapter 3: Seeing through the Theatre Metaphor: some Preliminary Concerns

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 3.1 La disputa del sacramento – Raffael (1509-10), Apostolic Palace, Vatican City
(Source: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Disputation_of_the_Holy_Sacrament)

[M]etaphors direct, lead, and mislead, or ... push further and guide a chain of associations (Blumenberg 1997/1979n6)

The theatre metaphor has a long history. By the seventeenth century it was a cliché: ‘a fine comparison’, Sancho tells Don Quixote, ‘though not so new that I haven’t heard it many times before’ (Cervantes 2003/1605: 527). Nevertheless, in 1928, W.A. Holman, speaking about the Australian Constitution, declared that ‘our immediate duty is by setting our own house in order, to maintain intact the last, and possibly, the greatest, theatre in which the law-abiding Anglo-Saxon spirit is to display itself’ (Holman 1928: 83). In the 1980s communication theorists considered that ‘[i]n the age of television ... [t]he drama of politics now is performed on a stage that millions can view simultaneously and instantaneously' (Graber 1981: 212). In 2007, Kevin Rudd was 'a shrewd and patient political observer' of a 'human drama' over leadership (Burchell 2007), but later, as Prime Minister during the APEC summit 'jumped onto the world stage to show off his Mandarin skills' (Lehmann 2007).

The metaphor is a favourite of the media.¹ The picture entitled 'Backstage at the Crisis' in Figure 3.2 appeared in The Bulletin at the height of yet another Middle East crisis involving Israel and Hezbollah. But the metaphor suffers from the same difficulties of recognition and interpretation as any other metaphor. It is not always clear when theatre is being used metaphorically. For example, when Plato condemned theatrocracy (rule by 'clamor') was he using theatre metaphorically or condemning a particular kind of spectatorship? When Hannah Arendt argued that '[f]rom the outset in formal philosophy, thinking has been thought of in terms of seeing' (Arendt 1978/1971: 110), was she invoking the theatre metaphor as many of her commentators claim, or commenting on its use?

Recognition is also complicated by the tendency to collapse theatre into activities that take place within it or are associated linguistically. Goffman, for instance, insisted that he was using theatre as a metaphor for describing how individuals tried to show themselves to be one kind of self rather than another when under scrutiny but the field his work has generated is known as dramaturgy, collapsing theatre into drama and what is being seen to be done with what is being done. Consequently, dramaturgy tends to focus on what it sees as the duplicity of political life since the two things rarely coincide. On the other hand, Kenneth Burke insisted that his concept of dramatism was neither a theatre nor a drama metaphor but a strategy for understanding human motivation utilising dramatic literature. Since dramatists create dramas in which characters act in ways spectators find plausible, they must have some understanding of what motivates human action. Dramas can therefore shed light on what motivates human action in the world. Yet dramatism is routinely considered to be an example of the theatre metaphor even as it is also routinely included in the field of dramaturgy associated with Goffman. Both are used as ‘theatre metaphors’ to examine and explain political life. Habermas uses actor extensively in Between Facts and Norms (1996). For the most part it does not seem to be a metaphor, but then he refers to ‘the players in the arena’ owing their political influence ‘to the approval of those in the gallery’ (Habermas 1996: 382), suggesting it might be a combined theatre/drama metaphor.

¹ Although there are examples of 'politics is television' and politics is media' around they appear to be rare in comparison to the theatre metaphor, possibly because the field of vision is less well defined and it not as easy to assume a God's eye view, which is the standard position assumed by users of the metaphor.

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 3.1 'Dialing into the Fray', Newsweek, The Bulletin 1 August 2006, pp. 38-40

Christian's 'classic statement' of the theatre metaphor by Epictetus (55-135CE) is a drama metaphor for it is about doing:

Remember that you are an actor in a play, the character of which is determined by the Playwright ... For this is your business, to play admirably the rôle assigned you, but the selection of that rôle is Another's (Epictetus Manual cited in Christian 1987: 195).

The most commonly cited source for contemporary versions of the theatre metaphor, is the version expressed by the melancholic Jacques in Shakespeare's As You Like It. It too is a drama metaphor:

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts (Shakespeare As You Like It 2:7).

As is Daley's 2009 comment that:

Those who cringed at Alexander Downer's leadership self-immolated in a blaze of undergraduate comedy ... must have done a double-take at the Wodehouse farce that has engulfed Malcolm Turnbull's Liberals [especially when they knew that Peter Costello was] waiting in the wings (Daley 2009: 41).

Actors with assigned roles that may or may not be played badly are evident in all three metaphors. Although one can apply the theatre metaphor by insisting that a spectator who is describing all this is implied, the focus of the metaphor is on the activity on the stage.

Even where recognition is not a problem, interpretation of historical usage may well be. Historical records are often fragmentary and many times translated and recent terms can be read back into historical documents where they do not belong. Seneca, for instance, was supposed to have said: 'That fellow who strides pompously on the stage and says, with his nose in the air, "Look, I rule over Argos", is a slave ... role-playing' (cited in Bartsch 2006: 225), but even by 1877 there did not appear to be a Latin term for role. Players took parts. Curtius quotes Plato calling life a 'tragi-comedy' in Philebus (Curtius 1990/1948: 138) but no such genre existed then. Rather, life was a mixture of tragedy and comedy and one did not always know which was which at the time or what the purpose of events was (Plato Philebus 50b). Plato's distinction brings out the difficulties of understanding life as it unfolds, whereas Curtius' use of a specific genre structures life according to that genre.

Most contemporary versions of the dramatistic and some versions of the dramaturgical models of social life utilise Burke's 'five key terms of dramatism': act, scene, agent, agency and purpose (Burke 1945: xvii) as part of the theatre metaphor. Raymond Williams, for instance, says that '[t]he specific vocabulary of the dramatic mode – drama ... tragedy, scenario, situation, actors, performances, roles, images – is continually and conventionally appropriated' to describe actions in our present society (Williams 1975: 13). Yet none of these terms are peculiar to the theatre and all but one (scene) appears to have been taken up by theatre as a metaphor from everyday use.² An actor, for instance, was simply someone who was a 'doer' until 1581, when the term was used by Sidney to refer to someone who was doing something in a play (Barnhart 1998: 10). Actor was frequently used by scholars when representing the work of another (West 1999: 265). Play only came to be applied to a dramatic performance in the fourteenth century (Barnhart 1988: 804), but many later translations of pre-fourteenth century texts routinely talk about 'plays'. In the late seventeenth century, actors were still most commonly referred to as 'players'. Richards' (1991) history of the theatre metaphor is weakened considerably if 'actor' is understood as a readily available term for describing simple doing in the world.

The word theatre also has multiple meanings, some of which may not be metaphorical. The Greeks apparently coined the word theatron sometime before 550BCE as their name for a seeing-place and it was used in this sense when it first came into English around 1374 when Chaucer used the term to refer to 'an open-air place for viewing plays and other spectacles' (Barnhart 1998: 1131). However, the Romans also used theatre to mean 'a space and opportunity for the display of one's powers' (Cicero) as well as 'the audience' (Quintilian) (Chambers and Chambers 1877: 381). In 622, in the absence of any actual theatre, and with many ancient sources lost, Isidore of Seville redefined theatrum as amphitheatrum: a place where savage games, chariot races, massacres and orgies were held.³ Since his Etymologies served as a basic reference book for the entire Middle Ages

² See Appendix A in this volume: Etymology – Theatre and Related Terms. Beer and De Landtsheer (2004: 45n56) believe that journalists derive their 'who, what, where, when, why and how' from the dramatistic metaphor, which may be news to journalists.

³ Rome fell in 476, the Church split in 484 and the Athenian schools closed in 529. References to theatre were increasingly collapsed into spectacle.

(Curtius 1990/1948: 23) this misunderstanding persisted through later writers.⁴ Although the recovery of Aristotle's Poetics in the thirteenth century and the rediscovery of Vitruvius' De architectura in 1414 provided 'a (relatively) accurate description of ancient theatres' (McGillivray 2007: 166) and what went on in them, full understanding of Greek theatres was not achieved until the nineteenth century when excavations began on Epidaurus and Delphi.⁵ Consequently the image of amphitheatre still haunts understandings of theatre today. In 2005 Thayer was exasperated enough to say: 'Now before we start, repeat after me: an amphitheatre and a theatre are different types of buildings', with different shapes, used for different kinds of activities (Thayer 2005).⁶ Late Christian/Stoic versions of what most scholars call the theatre metaphor, where life was a drama directed by God and required an ethics of endurance in the face of judgment, were played out in a metaphorical space shaped like a Roman amphitheatre rather than a theatre (Bernheimer 1956: 225). This should make them game/sport metaphors rather than theatre metaphors.

By the sixteenth century theatre had come to refer to a complete treatment or overview of a topic. It was used in this sense by Estienne (1545) to describe the ideal positioning of spectators for anatomy dissections, and by Zwinger (1565) to describe his encyclopaedia.⁷ In 1837 when the historian Carlyle coined theatricality, there were no less than fifteen meanings operational for the term theatre and eight for theatrical. Carlyle's work reflects this multiplicity, and his

⁴ Isidore's Etymologies were a collation of all the writings Isidore could get his hands on. Despite his mistakes, his efforts ensured the survival of many ancient texts, albeit in fragmentary form. His conception of theatre as an amphitheatre probably came from the writings of St Paul (d. c67), Tertullian (c160-c230), John Chrysostom (c347-407) and Augustine (354-430). St Paul makes a direct reference to the Roman circus in which Christians were martyred in 1 Corinthians IV, 9.

⁵ Epidaurus was rediscovered in 1829 and excavated from 1870-1926. It was restored between 1954 and 1963. Excavation of Delphi began in 1893 (Hellenic Ministry of Culture and Tourism, www.culture.gr).

⁶ Although there were two kinds of theatre in Roman times, one for large scale mass performances and another for more serious, intimate performances attended by the cultured elite, even the large scale theatres fell short of the massive arenas called amphitheatra used for gladiatorial contests, chariot races and Christian martyrdom. Pompeii's Great Theatre seated about 5,000 compared to the 80,000 of the Colisaeum (Amphitheatrum Flavium), while the Odeon Theatre next door, the site of serious concerts, poetry readings and intimate theatrical productions of drama, seated less than 1200. The first amphitheatre (literally double theatre) was apparently created by putting together two semi-circular theatres (Smith 2006/1875). Pliny appears not to have been impressed by the arrangement, which was done by Curio for his father's funeral commemoration. In any case, Roman theatres, like Greek theatres, were semi-circular in shape, while amphitheatres were round or oval.

⁷ See Appendix C, Table 3/17 on the accompanying CD.

easy use of theatre and related terms, generally without explanation, indicates that these were common understandings. Even now, eleven definitions of theatre are given in the Macquarie Australian Encyclopedic Dictionary (2006) and six are given in the Concise Oxford Dictionary (Pearsall 1999).⁸

What Constitutes a Theatre Metaphor?

The word for theatre (theatron) comes from thea, to view (Lobkowitz 1967: 6-7). From the beginning, theatre has meant 'a seeing-place'. Of the eleven definitions in the Macquarie Dictionary, six still relate to a place in which something can be observed, as do four of the six definitions in the Concise Oxford. The use of the term theatre for Burbage's new playhouse in 1576 could then be non-metaphorical if the original meaning of seeing-place was intended, or metaphorical from the later understanding of theatre as a space within which a totality was displayed (West 1999: 247).⁹

In the seventeenth century theatre theorists bickered over what should be included in the term. D'Aubignac (1657) drew a clear distinction between theatre and drama on the basis of spectatorship, but his recommendations were largely ignored. In 1668 Dryden formally applied theatre to plays, writing, production and stage-craft (Barnhart 1998: 1131), thereby specifically substituting the content and activity of what was seen for the relationship the space entailed, conflating drama and theatre so that the two terms came to be used as synonyms, and in the process obscuring spectators. A similar elision occurred amongst continental theorists. The theatre metaphor reflects this conflation. Only 140 of the 577 records of the 'theatre/drama' metaphor located in the study of the theatre metaphor underpinning this thesis explicitly referred to theatre as a seeing-place.

⁸ Theatre is: 1. A building or room designed to house dramatic presentations, stage entertainments, or the like; 2. Any site used for dramatic presentations; 3. A cinema [for film]; 4. The audience at a performance in a theatre; 5. Dramatic performances as a branch of art; the drama; 6. Dramatic works collectively ...; 7. Acting, writing, or the like ... for dramatic performance; 8. A room or hall, fitted with tiers of seats ... as used for lectures, anatomical demonstrations; 9. A room in a hospital or elsewhere in which surgical operations are performed ...; 10. A place of action; field of operations: theatre of war, theatre of operations; 11. A natural formation of land rising by steps or gradations (Macquarie Dictionary 2006).

⁹ Burbage's Theatre was either the first or second permanent theatre in Europe after Roman times. There are references to a theatre-like structure at the court in Ferrara, Italy around 1550

Nevertheless, although most examples of the theatre metaphor do not make the distinction between doing and watching explicit, theatre as a place where one watches what is being done by others is the key to the metaphor. The structuring of any phenomenon as theatre ‘happens in the mind of the spectator’ (Kirby 1976: 53). In seeing a phenomenon such as politics as theatre, users are doing more than simply seeing politics as something else, they are imposing an externalised spectator who may or may not be identified with the user. Indeed, most uses of the metaphor obscure the spectatorship of the user, although the user must be a spectator in order to invoke the metaphor. Who but a spectator has the detachment to decide that the Chinese government, faced with a campaign of civil disobedience, ‘made a series of ... performative acts to re-script the drama’ (Ku 2004: 647), that Mark Latham was like ‘some kind of Greek hero’ felled by the gods (Burchell 2007) or that conflict over policy was no more than a ‘politics of posturing’ between two ‘he-man’ politicians (Orr 2010) or a ‘staged brawl’ (Marr in Fidler 2007)?

Yet most studies of the theatre metaphor not only elide drama and theatre, they overlook the constitutive position of this detached spectator. Christian, whose study ends in the seventeenth century, painstakingly traces four variations of what she calls the theatrum mundi from their beginnings in Greek philosophy, but most of the metaphors located are about doing (drama), rather than watching (theatre), and her discussion pays no attention to the spectatorial position of the user.¹⁰ Vickers’ history, which goes up to Shakespeare and is concerned not with the metaphor per se but with Bacon’s use of theatrical imagery, is organized under four main themes: God and Man; The World a Stage; Man the Actor; and Man the Author (Vickers 1971). These themes are broken down into nineteen sub-themes (see Table 3.1 below). Of the nineteen sub-themes, thirteen are to do with drama rather than theatre. Only the six highlighted in the table – God as Judge; God as ¹⁰ The four variations were: Cynic/Satiric, Stoic, Neo-Platonist and Hermetic. Neo-Platonism was made up of elements from Plato, Stoicism, various mystery religions and ‘neo-Pythagoreanism’ (which consisted largely of what Diogenes Laertes said that Pythagoras had said). It is visible in the enriched uses of the metaphor by Philo, Maximus, Aristides, Apuleius, Synesius and Plotinus, whose writings had a significant influence on the Renaissance. The Hermetic variation accounts for most ‘melancholic’ uses of the metaphor. It was particularly favoured by Shakespeare, who had one of his characters (Gratiano) call it ‘melancholly baite’ (Merchant of Venice I,1,16-89,III).

Spectator; Man as Spectator; Theatre as a Structure; Removal of the mask destroys illusion; and Removal of the mask entails judgment – are theatre rather than drama metaphors, although Man as Spectator could be a drama metaphor if the spectator is on the stage. Actors sometimes played ‘spectators’ as part of a drama but it was commonplace for spectators to pay to sit on the stage among the actors until the late eighteenth century. Until the discovery of perspective, it was also usual for monarchs to be seated on the stage. Perspective allowed practitioners to insist that the monarch would see best when seated opposite the stage, thus removing a major distraction from the drama on stage. The idea was accepted largely because it allowed monarchs to rank the seating of nobles according to their standing and whether or not they were in favour.¹¹ In Greek drama, choruses were also often referred to as spectators. Nevertheless, Vickers’ focus is on the content of the metaphor. He recognizes the spectators who are specified in the metaphor but not the spectatorial position of the user of the metaphor.

God and Man	The World a Stage	Man the Actor	Man the Author
1. Man the Puppet:	5. God as Spectator:	11. Man’s ability to act is a sign of Skill	19. Drama, like all literature, is feigning
2. God the Script-writer: acting the given part well in order to win approval	6. Man as Spectator:	12. Man’s ability to act is a sign of hypocrisy and dissimulation
3. God the Script-writer: acting the given part to learn obedience or resignation	7. Life is a Play: the genre can change	13. Death removes all masks at the end of the play
4. God as Judge of the play	8. Earthly life is futile or illusory	14. The removal of the mask allows reality to destroy illusion
	9. The Theatre and its Structure	15. At the removal of the mask there is confrontation or judgment
	10. The Stage: all Human Business	16. To play the King is a brittle glory
		17. Life is unstable and our roles vary
		18. The actor can forget his part

Table 3.1 Themes and sub-themes of the ‘theatre’ metaphor, according to Vickers (1971:189-226).

¹¹ James I used this arrangement to insult the Venetian ambassadors by placing them further away from him than the Spanish (Orgel 1975: 5-14).

McGillivray, whose main concern is theatricality, which he sees as a particular instance of the theatre metaphor, reduces Vickers' nineteen categories to three 'structural definitions' of the metaphor, corresponding to three motifs he finds in Christian. One and two are subordinated to three, which he sees as the over-riding purpose of the metaphor:

1. formalist: 'the organisation of performance space, performers and spectators' as predominant elements ('the world itself is a stage upon which human beings act their roles or ... are positioned as spectators in the theatre of the world; in that capacity the human spectator's role is to interpret what the world displays to be seen');
2. dramaturgical: existence is like a play and men and women are like actors within it ('life as a play cast/directed/watched by either Fortune or Providence or by a mysterious deity'); and
3. moral: to teach 'a moral lesson' ('if life is a play then the human being must be an actor and this is a position to be endured but performed well, or to be laughed at or to be pitied or despised') (McGillivray 2007: 152-3; 166).

Again, these divisions ignore the spectator who constitutes life as a drama in order to teach this moral lesson. Consequently, although the theatre metaphor appears to have a reasonably well-documented history indicating that it is 'endemic' to Western cultural discourse (Cole 1992: 23), has been 'a platitude for centuries' (Wright 1996: 175) and is 'the best known metaphor' for politics (Lunt 2005: 74), not all of this history is actually a history of theatre as a metaphor because most of it leaves out the constituting component of the metaphor: an externalised spectator.

In 1969, Merelman complained that the elision between drama and theatre left 'a systematic reader' of dramatic theory 'depressed' (Merelman 1976/1969: 298). He saw this as one reason why the dramaturgical perspective was not being used more in the social and political sciences: 'those who write on dramatic form should agree on a set of terms so that they can talk to each other sensibly' (Merelman 1976/1969: 298). Then outside scholars could use their concepts more easily. However, although it is true that the elision between theatre and drama is very problematic in both theatre theory and metaphor, the problem Merelman has seems more to do with the slipperiness of theatre as a metaphor. The metaphor is prone to reversal and it is easy to overlook the spectatorship of the user so that examinations of drama for crystallizations of aspects of life come to be used to scrutinize life in order to reveal its theatrical tendencies, creating a problem of circularity (Geertz 1980: 172) because the spectatorship involved in such examination becomes obscured. For instance, Smith, Strier and Bevington describe London between 1576 and 1649 as ‘theatrical’ because of the ‘sheer range of spectacles and experiences’ that occurred. They go on to say that this range ‘testifies to the existence of a theatrical culture of conscious dramatisation on all of the public stages’ (1995: 14). This seems to elide description and explanation as well as spectacle and theatre, ignores much of what went on in the period that was far from self-consciously theatrical (Barton 1974: 421-2; Postlewait 2003: 115-6), and places responsibility for the characterisation of the period on the objects of scrutiny. Similarly, Goldhill and Osborne (1999) use theatre as a ‘lens’ through which to view Athenian democracy – which consequently looks just like theatre.

Merelman’s application of dramaturgy to politics as a way of illuminating politics reveals the slipperiness inherent in the theatre/drama metaphor, suggesting that the metaphor may in the end obscure rather than illuminate its topic. Merelman actually has three metaphors going, each pointing in a different direction. Firstly, he argues that a knowledge of ‘dramatic devices’ can help to illuminate politics, since politicians use such devices (Merelman 1976/1969: 216). The metaphor appears to be politics is drama. However, this does not make politics theatre because ‘dramas are not confined to theaters’, and ‘many of the dramaturgical techniques’ used in theatre ‘are drawn from everyday social behaviour ... playwrights employ dramatic devices which occur in a variety of political situations’ (Merelman 1976/1969: 286). The metaphor, if there is one, is drama is politics – the direction of the metaphor runs from politics to the theatre. Merelman then returns to the first metaphor but in the process elides drama and theatre: ‘[t]here are three characteristics which are especially important in relating aspects of the theater to politics' (Merelman 1976/1969: 286). The metaphor is now politics is theatre. The three characteristics (impression management, interpersonal conflict and mediation) though, are not unique to theatre or to drama in a theatrical sense. Nor are many of the 'dramatic mechanisms' identified as being used by politics: themes, stereotyping, identification, strategy, suspense, the use of symbols. All of these could be better accounted for under political rhetoric, particularly when Merelman argues that these techniques are most likely to be used when 'audiences' and conditions are hostile, a situation that is not often encountered in the theatre, and when encountered, not dealt with in these ways. Unsurprisingly he finds that the connections he draws between politics and drama as theatre present an 'uneasy fit' (Merelman 1976/1969: 298).

The slippage between theatre and drama and the obscuring of the spectator position are just two of the problems associated with accounts of the theatre metaphor even where recognition is not a problem. Another is the tendency to include terms that have come to have some linkage with theatre, often because theatre theorists/practitioners have appropriated them for strategic purposes. The inclusion of performance, performativity and theatricality into the theatre metaphor is a common move, although these inclusions are by no means incontestable.

Performance/Performativity

For anthropologist Victor Turner (1988), performance is the 'natural' way humans express themselves and their social, cultural and political contexts. Turner's conception of performance is supported by the long history of the use of performance outside theatre. Despite coming into English around 1300, perform and its derivative performance only came into use in the theatre in the eighteenth century (Barnhart 1998: 777; Crane 2002: 173).¹² Prior to that, to perform meant what it continues to mean outside theatre: to carry out or accomplish in the sense of taking an action through to completion (Barnhart 1998: 777; Crane 2002; Denning 1996; Pearsall 1999; Schechner 2002; States 1996). It meant this to Virgil and Cicero (Chambers and Chambers 1877) and to La Pérouse in 1799 when he called his book A Voyage Round the World Performed in the Years 1785-1788 by the Boussole and Astrolable (Denning 1996: xiii). It is still commonly understood this way by athletes, sports commentators and sports theorists.¹³ Businesses and governments, too, perform, and are subjected to ‘performance evaluation’ by auditing processes. Cars also perform: Maserati’s automatic Quattroporte has ‘been made easier to manage between traffic lights [but] performance has not been compromised’ (Maserati 2007). During the sixteenth century, a craftsman could ‘perform’ a door, which meant he completed its construction to a required standard (Crane 2002: 172). Actors on the other hand played, shewed, exercised, practiced, personated, presented or represented (Crane 2002: 174). A range of words was thus used to describe activities for which the ‘all-purpose’ word perform is now used. Crane considers this a loss in terms of being able to fully grasp all the aspects of a specifically theatrical performance. For example, shew, present and represent indicated that performances occurred in public, something that is often overlooked in contemporary uses of performance. Enact, act, recite indicated what actors actually did when shewing and keep, use, exercise and practice indicated acting was thought of as a material practice that used skills that could improve with repetition (Crane 2002: 174).

¹² Performance was first recorded as meaning a public exhibition or entertainment in 1709 (Barnhart 1998: 777). See Appendix A: Etymology – Theatre and Related Terms.

Performance does have a number of ‘universals’, though, (Blau 1989a : 250-271) that makes its use as a theatrical term almost inevitable. A performance

- is a completed action: a performance has a beginning and an end;
- is aware of itself as a performance;
- involves the determination and management of time: time is ‘amortized’ across a pre-set interval;
- is always purposeful.
- is visible: performances occur in public before spectators who judge it
- is embedded within conventions by which it is recognized and evaluated. It is therefore always site-specific and context dependent. It must also always be mimetic or reiterative to some extent or it will not be recognized as a performance to be assessed;

¹³ In just one weekday edition of The Sydney Morning Herald, nine articles used performance as a way of describing a sporting activity. (See Appendix E, Table 3: ‘Universals of Performance’ in accompanying CD).

- entails a relationship with an observer in which the performer is separated from the observer¹⁴
- is a practice that may be exemplary

An enormous diversity of fields ranging from performance art to technological evaluation, autism, maternal health, auditing and sport use the concept. A search of Macquarie University's journal database based on titles alone on a single day in August 2010 produced 293 titles across 14 different fields. The majority of these related to Computing (33%). A further in-depth study investigating performance in literature other than Computing and Engineering, covered 236 articles from 87 journals across 19 fields: Anthropology, Auditing, Communication Studies, Cultural Studies, Education, Economics, Fashion/Art, Law, Media Studies, Music, Political Theory/History/Science, Psychology, Public Administration, Public Policy, Queer Theory, Science, Sociology, Theatre and Translation.¹⁵ Most of these reflected at least some of Blau's 'universals' of performance (see Table 3.2 below), although only 13 of the 87 journals were to do with theatre.

PERFORMANCE IS:	Number of articles	All articles %
A completed entity	53	22%
Conscious of itself as a performance	44	19%
Involves management of time	25	11%
Purposeful	126	53%
Visible	121	51%
Conventional	98	41%
Site specific and context dependent	65	27%
Entails a relationship with an observer	96	41%
An exemplary practice	113	48%
Is derived from theatre	69	29%
Is not a theatre term	44	19%
Did not specify	123	52%
Total Number of Articles	236	100%

Table 3.2 'Universals' of Performance – summary of articles using *performance*¹⁶

¹⁴ Blau is sympathetic to anthropological uses of performance as a means of generating trans-cultural communitas (Turner 1982) but believes this 'admirable mission' is doomed to fail because the performer is always the 'other': this fact of performance is 'the only thing which crosses cultures' (Blau 1989a: 269).

¹⁵ See Appendix B Table 3

¹⁶ Appendix B provides an expanded version of this table (Table 2).

Most users of performance did not indicate a source for the concept, reflecting how commonplace the term is. However, those who did were inclined to consider it a theatre term. These theorists were also more likely to use the term in combination with performativity, which they also saw as a theatre metaphor, and with dramaturgy. Reiger and Dempsey (2008), for instance, unproblematically combined theatrical performance, performance in terms of human capacity (from sport) and performativity to argue that giving birth is a performance that is creative, physical and surrounded by normative social discourses containing power configurations. Hajer and Uttermark's (2008) analysis of the assassination of Theo Van Gogh combined dramaturgy, theatre, performance and performativity as if each term belonged quite obviously to the theatre metaphor.

Performativity, however, also began life outside the theatre. The concept was coined by language theorists as a way of describing how words could be actions. Performative utterances such as I apologize or I promise mean more than 'just saying something' (Austin 1978/1975: 6-7). They are a form of discursive action, a way of 'doing things' with language that is consequential and for which the doer can be held accountable (Austin 1975: 5). However, performatives are also always other-oriented because they require the presence of others 'in order to achieve their purpose' (Honig 1991: 101), which can give them a theatrical air.

Reinelt (2002) offers an analysis of the development and entanglement of performance and performative that she claims culminates in performativity as an over-arching concept (see Table 3.3 below). None of the concepts appear to have originated in the theatre, although performance appears to have some connection with popular or folk theatre and performative appears to have been adopted by theatre sometime in the 1960s. Placing her historical analysis within the field of performativity therefore implies that performativity is not a theatre metaphor, although it is generally taken to be one by feminism, gay and lesbian studies, performance studies in the theatre and cultural studies in general (Gingrich-Philbrook 1997: 124).

The Development of the Concept of Performativity
PERFORMANCE	PERFORMATIVE	PERFORMATIVITY
Share: a 'cognate base': perform Use: often used together or interchangeably
From: Non-institutional performance (carnival; commedia dell'arte) 1920s	From: Anthropology (Singer, Turner) 1950s	From: Language theory (Austin); pragmatics 1950s
Taken up by: avant-garde/anti-theatre movements of 1920's and 1960's – 1970's	Taken up by: Schechner, Performance Studies schools	Taken up by: Derrida (language); Butler (the body)
Emphasis: on processes of performing	Emphasis: everyday events	Emphasis: iterability vs reiteration
Condition: the spectator's freedom to make and transform meanings (Diamond 1996: 3)	Condition: collapse of the distinction between theatre and everyday	Condition: failure
Definition: performance is a 'staging of the subject in process'. A rejection of Aristotle (principles of construction) and Plato (mimesis). Performance as embodied, risky and negotiated, and non-reproducible.	Definition: performance is any cultural event – rituals, sports, games, dance, political events, everyday performance. Led to a collapse of the distinction between high/low culture, primitive/mature culture and elite/popular culture, which in turn led to a split between theatre studies and performance studies.	Definition: language is performative because utterances are actions in the world: they constitute the world as they are said (Austin). However, this depends on reiteration and since each reiteration occurs under different circumstances and in different contexts, reiteration cannot be exact. Because of this, there is the possibility of change (as well as an insistence on reiteration).
Path: 1920s - theatre attempted to reintroduce popular forms of performance into institutional theatre practice, and to experiment with alienation , which required the separation between performer and spectator to be explicitly marked. 1960s-1970s – rise of performance art , the 'staging of the subject' as embodied, risky; this became linked to Butler's conception of performativity through a misunderstanding of Butler's performativity as a theatre term	Path: Singer (1959) recognized the performative nature of cultural events. Turner (1957) suggested that performance was the natural form of expression for homo performans . Schechner used concepts and experiences from anthropology to produce experimental theatre aimed at overcoming the divide between performer and spectator (led back to theatre as a sub-set of performance).	Path: Austin introduced performance into language theory; coined performative ; suggested performative utterances could fail. Derrida's critique of Austin brought performatives into performance through iterability (theatre is a place where this occurs); connected the possibility of failure to iterability to argue for the incommensurability of reiteration. Butler picked up on the possibility of failure during reiteration to argue for the possibility of transgressing the social inscription of gender now all considered within the concept of PERFORMATIVITY

Table 3.3 A diagrammatic view of the development of performativity (developed from Reinelt 2002)

Austin insisted that neither performative nor performativity were theatre terms because, when acting in a play, performatives 'would not be seriously meant and we shall not be able to say that we seriously performed the act concerned' (Austin 1970: 228). Performatives could not be performative in the theatre because actions in the theatre could not be bound to their consequences. Performatives are about doing and showing, but not in the theatre.

Performativity is a central concept in the work of Judith Butler on identity construction. Here performativity involves a constant reiteration of discourses containing normative positions as a process of bodily enactment or 'doing', impelled and sustained by constraint (Butler 1993: 94-5): 'a performative is that discursive practice that enacts or produces that which it names' through authoritative citation underpinned by 'historically revisable' identificatory practices that are constantly repeated (Butler 1993: 13-14). In performativity the identity one enacts is practiced and developed in accordance with social norms. One comes to inhabit an identity by repeating the actions that have been socially recognised for this identity and having that repetition recognized as adequate. Yet this reiterative process can never be exact since each reiteration occurs in different circumstances and contexts. This provides some opportunities for challenging the norms. While theatrical implications are present in this kind of reflexivity, Butler explicitly denies these implications: performativity is 'not primarily theatrical' (Butler 1993: 12), although any act may appear theatrical if its historicity is forgotten. It is lack of context that makes any act seem theatrical, whereas performativity is crucially tied to context.

However, the proximity of the reiteration process to the idea of rehearsal suggests that the effort to keep the terms apart may be futile, especially as Butler herself invites a theatrical reading of performativity. In her 1988 essay 'Performative Acts and Gender Constitution: An Essay in Phenomenology and Feminist Theory' she uses drama as a metaphor in a banal way ('De Beauvoir ... sets the stage for her claim') as she argues that we need to extend our idea of act by thinking of it more in terms of the way theatre does: it is rehearsed; has been done before by others but individual actors 'reactualize' it each time giving it slight differences on every occasion; it is nevertheless done with or in relation to others as part of a collective activity; it is embedded in a social, cultural and historical context; it is repeated and it occurs in public. This extension of act is meant to get away from agent-centred, individualistic conceptions of identity construction because it embeds any individual action within a 'culturally restricted corporeal space ... within the confines of already existing directives' (Butler 1988: 526). This contextualisation is precisely what instigated early invocations of theatre as a metaphor. Life seemed to be largely beyond the control of the individual. Seeing it as a drama performed in a theatre suggested that it was directed by hidden but appreciable external forces that saw life holistically. Consequently life gained coherence and meaningfulness since 'each place is fitted to their characters [according to] the rational principle of the universe' (Plotinus Enneads cited in Christian 1987: 224(I)n65). Seeing individuals as actors within a drama that came to an end that brought all, whether they played the king or the slave, to the same level also offered comfort to those cast as slaves as well as opened up the possibility that next time round they might be kings. All these aspects are inherent in Butler's use of performativity as both the requirement to acknowledge that one is subject to social norms as well as offering the possibility of performing something else.

Butler concedes that 'my theory sometimes waffles between understanding performativity as linguistic and casting it as theatrical' (Butler 1999: xxv). Still theatre does not offer an adequate model for the sense of act she is seeking. Unlike in theatre, social actors of gender are 'always already' acting and, as Austin insists, they are subject to punishment if they fail to perform according to social expectations in the way actors might be but characters are not. Gender construction acts might 'bear similarities to performative acts within theatrical contexts' (Butler 1988: 521) but seeing performativity as theatrical robs the concept of its normative and consequential character. The loss is even greater if it occurs in such a way as to obscure the spectatorship inherent in imposing, maintaining or challenging social expectations. It is others, albeit often the internalised self as 'other', who decide whether or not performative expectations are being met and whose gaze must be challenged if changes are to be made to those expectations: 'who exactly is doing the discerning – and whether inside or outside – is so critical an issue in performance that the problem itself can be considered a universal' (Blau 1989a: 251).¹⁷

¹⁷ Original emphasis

Unfortunately both theatrical and non-theatrical uses of performance and performativity now exist in a ‘perfumative’ atmosphere (McKenzie 2001: 235) that overlays performance on so many activities that performance appears to be ‘everywhere’ (Madison 1999).¹⁸ The brief article ‘Marketing students to ponder what being Australian means’ (Macquarie University 2005: 16) epitomises the unproblematic multiplying and overlapping uses of the terms. Students were to ‘perform a business analysis’ (performance incorporating evaluation). The results of their work were to be part of an exhibition of images of Australian life (technical and cultural performance) to be ‘performed live for broadcast’ (theatrical performance before spectators) in which what ‘being Australian means’ was to be displayed (identity performance/Butlerian performativity).

Bell’s discussion of the compatibilities and incompatibilities of Foucault’s and Arendt’s conceptions of freedom is similarly multi-coded. Bell uses the theatre metaphor herself: she ‘rehearses’ arguments (1996: 85), and places ideas ‘centre stage’ (1996: 90). In considering the American Declaration of Independence as ‘a performative utterance’ because ‘[t]he new regime’s authority arose from the performative “We hold”’ (1996: 90), she draws on Austin’s (non-metaphoric) speech action theory. Freedom is performative in this way because it entails the possibility of establishing something new and consequential (Bell 1996: 91). However, freedom is performative in a theatrical sense as well because it is both spatial and public: both conceptions of freedom must be enacted visibly. Arendt explicitly requires a space in which freedom can appear. This space is constituted by spectators (Arendt 1982: 63). Foucault’s aesthetics of the self as a work of art also requires spectators because works of art become recognized as such through being seen. Freedom for Bell is therefore performative in both a non-theatrical and a theatrical sense because it is both a word that does something that has consequences and because a performance must be seen to be done.

Despite this ‘perfumative atmosphere’, however, both performance and performativity have been tied so tightly to theatre by some theorists that their use in other areas is seen as ‘poaching’ (Dolan 1993). Dolan, like many other theatre scholars, is convinced that both terms are theatrical terms and accuses other disciplines of ‘midnight raiding’ (Dolan 1993: 422). This is not mere insularity. Performance has been a ‘keyword’ for Theatre Studies in its efforts to carve out a space from disciplines in which drama has traditionally been treated as a particular kind of literature.¹⁹ Performance as a means of ‘making present’ is what is supposed to make theatre special in this turf war (Lee 1999; Roach and Reinelt 1992: 5), in much the same way theoria was used by Plato to make philosophy a special way of seeing. Performance has also been a keyword in a turf war within theatre as part of an attack on mainstream theatre, defined reductively as ‘the acting out of dramatic literature in a purpose-built building’ (Bottoms 2003: 173-6). The effects of this successful ‘anti-theatre’ campaign in which performance has been appropriated by theatre practitioners and then moved out of the theatre in order to expand what counts as theatre can be seen in Australia in the replacement of formal theatre practice training programmes in universities by Performance degrees (McGillivray 2007: 229-233). Seeing performance as a theatre term has thus been a successful strategy to ‘defend a territory [and] put down rivals’ (Lloyd 1990: 24).

¹⁸ ‘Perfumance’ refers to the way ‘the scents and sensibilities of other performance concepts’ come to overlay each other (McKenzie 2001: 235). The term comes from Derrida. It is one of the reasons Peacock considers metaphors to be richer and more complex than symbols.

Carlson argues that performance marks a shift to the ‘how’ of human activity. Because he sees it as essentially a theatrical term, the uses of performance outside the theatre seem to him to be part of an ever-widening ripple whereby the idea of theatrical performance is swiftly becoming ‘the dominant intellectual trope’ of modern life (Carlson 2004: 213). The downside of this is that theatrical performance is coming to be seen everywhere, with problematic results:

The word “performance” was used not only to describe Bush’s gestures and speeches ... but also to describe those photos taken by US soldiers at Abu Ghraib prison (Cheng 2004).

It also creates the problem for Carlson of defining precisely what a ‘theatrical performance’ might be in order to protect theatre’s ‘particular orientation’ (it is experienced by the individual as part of a group) and its ‘particular utility’ (being ‘separated from the rest of life’ it enables both self-reflexion and experimentation) (Carlson 2004: 215-6). However, these conditions are not unique to theatre either. They could belong to any creative endeavour, including scientific experimentation (Crease 1993: 96; States 1996). This makes theatre a sub-set of performance, rather than the other way round, and performance no longer a theatre metaphor. This does not mean that performance as a concept is not useful to politics or political theory, but rather that it may be more useful as a concept in its own right that shares some characteristics with theatrical performance. For example, Tilly’s (2008) discussion of how ‘contentious performances’ can develop into continuous social movements with a regular social base reveals a broader capacity for building and solidifying over time than theatrical performances, which are typically ephemeral and finally unable to bridge the gap between performer and spectator without ceasing to be a performance.

¹⁹ Keywords are terms which are ‘invested with ... historical weight and cultural capital’. They become the site of contestation because they ‘tap into larger anxieties’ (Lee 1999: 145) about the fields they are intended to define. The term was first used in this sense by Raymond Williams (1976).

Theatricality

As ‘the Eye of History’ the historian’s task was to place momentous events into context (Carlyle 1906/1837: 7). Allowing themselves to be affected by sympathy could obscure their view, preventing them from carrying out this task. The appropriate stance of the historian therefore was one in which sympathy was denied to those affected. Carlyle termed this stance theatricality (Carlyle 1906/1837: 44). Theatricality was thus a ‘mode of perception’ (Balme 2005; Burns 1972: 12) specifically to do with the observation of others under conditions in which the obligation to feel for their predicament was waived in the interests of gaining a better view. Those conditions could apply equally inside or outside the theatre, although the dependence of theatre on sympathy for its impact suggests that Carlyle did not see the concept as a theatre term.

Theatricality is also not a theatre metaphor for Dasgupta. Rather it is a relational mode of being – the ontological condition of being both a spectator of others and an actor for others. However, it is a fragile mode precisely because the actor/spectator relationship is also fundamental to theatre. This has serious implications for democratic politics because when theatricality is transformed into theatre, behaviour comes to be judged aesthetically rather than by its relationships and consequences (Dasgupta 1988: 80). Politics then ceases to be recognized as an art or craft with its own techniques and skills and its own responsibilities that are shared between actors and spectators. Instead, as theatre, all that is demanded of political candidates is that they be ‘desirable in their roles’. Dasgupta believes that American President Ronald Reagan’s incumbency epitomised this transformation from theatricality to theatre. By aestheticising the office of the presidency, by treating it as a theatrical role, Reagan reconstituted it as a ‘mere representation’. As such, the President was no longer obliged to take responsibility for his ‘blatant political misjudgments’ (1988: 79-80) because they became those of his character. At the same time, spectator/citizens were also relieved of any obligation to call the President to account because spectators in the theatre do not take responsibility for the actions of a character either. Both were therefore encouraged to behave in a way they would otherwise have found ‘unworthy and shameful’ (Plato Republic 605e).

These understandings of theatricality, rooted as they are in spectatorship, suggest that it may have been institutional theatre (and the buildings that belonged to it) that were metaphoric. The usual positioning of Greek theatres into the hollows of hills such as the one at Delphi in Figure 3.3 indicates that from the seats of the theatre much more could be seen than just the drama taking place on the orchestra (performance space) at spectators’ feet. Theatre was, quite literally, a place from which to view the world, a place in which the drama being enacted was a very small part of a much larger picture.

Theatricality has lost this sense in most contemporary usage. It is now seen as a quality that inheres in certain activities or things in such a way as to demand attention.²⁰ The position of the observer is obscured in favour of the practitioner or product, and the wider sense of perspective is lost. The following definitions make this clear:

Theatricality [p]resents identity as a play of masks; through fantasy identifications, projections and roles, the self emerges as multiple, always other to itself. Social interaction becomes an ‘acting out’ of identity, an exploration of the artifice at the heart of modern culture ... In the age of spectacle and mass media, theatricality becomes an essential component of self-identity through ‘personality’, the rehearsal of individuality as a distinctive attribute of each person (Jervis 1998: 343).

²⁰ See Appendix A: Etymology in this volume and Appendix F: Defining Theatricality on the CD for details.

Figure 3.3 Delphi Theatre with the Temple of Apollo below²¹

Theatricality ... describes the conscious staging of an event for the purposes of producing a particular effect, the intentional grafting of theatrical elements onto “real” life. The speeches of Mirabeau, for example, or the festivals of the Terror are theatrical in the sense that they are carefully scripted, choreographed, and performed, leaving little to spontaneity (Friedland 2002: 301n4).

By contrast, Friedland defines drama as the ‘inherent pathos or historical import of an event’. Dramatic events, unlike theatrical events, are likely to occur spontaneously:

²¹ Image from Odyssey Adventures in Archaeology, http://www.odysseyadventures.ca/trips/greece/delphi_theatre.jpg accessed 16/10/10.

[T]he quality of theatricality is as different from drama as artifice is different from truth, as representation is different from reality, and as orchestration is different from spontaneity (Friedland 2002: 301n4).

Nevertheless it remains unclear that the term can simply be accepted as an extension of the theatre metaphor. Bernard, for instance, defines theatricality as ‘that which enables a body, at a particular moment in a particular place, to enact theater without realizing it’ (cited in Féral 2002: 9), suggesting that theatricality is an instinctive mode of performance that precedes theatre. As our ‘ontological condition’ it arises prior to any creative act and is its ‘founding principle’ (Féral 2002: 9). A spectator is nevertheless required in order for this performance to be recognized as theatre. Spectatorship is the origin and also the condition of possibility of theatricality as well as theatre (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 190).

As a mode of perception, however, theatricality does allow theatre to be ‘attach[ed] to any kind of behaviour perceived and interpreted by others’ (Burns 1972: 13). This poses a particular problem with historical accounts of the French Revolution that are so regularly described in terms of theatre that its events seem to have taken place ‘on one vast stage’ (Butwin 1975: 141). It also poses a problem for the work of theorists such as Arendt. Arendt’s conception of politics is widely regarded as theatrical but at times it seems as if this interpretation comes about because of the commentator’s commitment to theatre rather than Arendt’s. Curtis, for example, clearly sees herself as an actor in a drama looking to Arendt for direction in order to engage in agonal political life, for ‘the postmetaphysical drama’ that engages Curtis and her colleagues (‘us’) is ‘more dramatic, more difficult to face, more difficult to perform’ than Arendt allows: ‘Our drama is distinctively marked by a postmetaphysical condition in which the “pillars of truth” that have in the past served ... to secure ... no longer have effective force’ (Curtis 1997: 32). In the end, Arendt does not provide sufficient structural support for this kind of politics (Curtis 1997: 34). But who is using the metaphor here, Arendt or Curtis?

The frequent interpretation of Arendt's work as underpinned by theatre, drama or performance as metaphors comes from her insistence that political action occurs in 'a space of appearance' (Arendt 1958: 199). The phrase can be found throughout her work. This space of appearance for action is constituted not by actors but by 'critics and spectators' who see an action as noteworthy. This suggests that Arendt may have been exercising theatricality in Carlyle's sense rather than seeing politics as theatre. Perhaps this is what gave her work 'a tone of coldness' (Curtis 1997: 28). Support for this view lies in Arendt's discussion of drama as 'a kind of repetition', an 'imitation or mimesis' (Arendt 1958: 187). Far from the public realm being for Arendt 'the scene of an existential drama that has as its stage ... a 'worldly space' that unites individuals while simultaneously separating them' (Hansen 1993: 64), the one thing political action is not as Arendt describes it, is imitative or repetitive. Rather dramas like other arts are just one way spectators recount the noteworthy deeds of political actors.

Theatre or Drama – Does it Matter?

Does it matter if someone using drama as a metaphor believes they are using theatre as a metaphor? After all, theatre has come to include drama and all the activities that go with it. Why not talk about the theatre metaphor as Lunt does when he says that 'politics can be conceptualised in terms of the stage and theatrics, incorporating an audience, processes of performance and stage management, perhaps involving behind the scenes machinations, direction and over-production' (Lunt 2005: 74)?

The problem for a study trying to locate spectators is that calling something dramatic when it is actually theatrical can be a deliberate strategy of spectators who wish to disguise or negate their spectatorship (Fried 1980):

The self-interested parties ... vanish at once. The scene presents itself as if by chance and undesigned (Shaftesbury 1711 in Fried 1980: 219n132).²²

The scene can then be enjoyed surreptitiously by spectators who read themselves into the action or who, conversely, are relieved of both the fear that their presence might affect the performance and that their spectatorship might entail any obligation to the ‘performer’. To call something theatrical is to ‘defactualize’ it so that one can think ‘in unreality’ (Justman 1978: 837). The danger of this is that it becomes easy to confuse fiction with fact and vice versa. Fiction that is unrecognized as fiction is ‘unjust to facts’ but can become ‘canonized’ as fact because it is acted upon (Justman 1978: 836), with sometimes dire consequences:

It is too bad that then Assistant Secretary of Defense McNaughton could not see from his own language [in the Pentagon Papers] – “orchestration” of actions, “crescendo,” “scenario,” “dramatic” incident, ““audiences”” of U.S. actions ... that, in a significant sense, he was thinking in unreality (Justman 1978: 837).²³

Conversely, seeing drama as theatre also comes at a cost because it collapses two quite different kinds of activities into one. This can produce the paradoxes that Curtius finds in Plato’s use of the ‘theatre metaphor’, and the incoherence Christian finds in Vives’ Fabula de Homine (Christian 1987: 200). While Vives muddles the two metaphors so that men can both choose their roles and join the gods in judging their performance, Plato uses the metaphors to convey two different ideas. Reading both as theatre obscures these differences and leads to Plato appearing as if he both endorsed theatre and wished to eradicate it. A similar fate occurs with Puritan uses of the theatre metaphor. When both seeing-place and content seen are collapsed into one, the avid use of theatre as a ²² At the time it was common to consider readers as spectators. This however, created a relationship with readers which seemed to make the publishing of a book a theatrical act, something which Shaftesbury wished to avoid since it meant that the author was obliged to keep his audience in mind and thereby risk ‘playing to the audience’ (Shaftesbury 1711, Characteristics in Marshall 1986: 10).

²³ Justman was referring to McNaughton’s contributions to Documents 79 and 85 of the Pentagon Papers.

metaphor to describe how Puritan life entailed acting under the judging gaze of an All-Seeing Eye either alongside vehement attacks on the practice of theatre or in the complete absence of any actual theatre, as occurred in America, can seem paradoxical.

Certainly in Plato ‘lie the seeds of the idea of the world as a stage upon which men play their parts, their motions directed by God’ (Curtius 1953: 138) in which ‘[a]ll of us ... men and women alike, must fall in with our roles and spend life in making our play as perfect as possible’ (Plato Laws 803c). Man was a puppet ‘made by gods, possibly as a plaything’ but ‘possibly with some more serious purpose’ (Laws 803c), which is why it was necessary to make one’s play ‘as perfect as possible’. Thus Plato used drama to explain causal relationships (human beings were puppets, God was the puppet-master manipulating the strings for some unknown/unknowable purpose) and to endorse an ethics of human striving in the face of uncertainty. At the same time, he wanted to either ban it (Republic) or impose censorship on it (Laws) because of what it showed. Humans learnt by imitating what they saw. Too often, drama (particular comedy) provided poor examples for people to copy. Plato’s solution was to limit the models that could acceptably be copied to the kind of behaviour expected of the person in the position they held, partly to reduce temptation and partly because he believed that the more models someone could imitate, the weaker they were as a person: ‘dabbling in many things, he would be mediocre in all’. Trainee guardians, for instance, were to be restricted to imitating only one role, that of ‘the really good and true man’ (Plato Republic 395-6). Because of this, they had to be kept out of the theatre because in theatre really good and true characters rarely came across as well as flawed individuals. This was particularly galling when one considered that the best kind of man was likely to be someone unfamiliar to the common people and who controlled their feelings when in the sight of others:

[T]he prudent and quiet character, which is always at one with itself, is not easily imitated, nor when imitated is it easily understood, especially in crowded audiences when men of every character flock to the theatre. For them it is the imitation of a disposition with which they are not familiar (Republic 604d-e).

But Plato also specifically rejected theatre as a model for politics because it allowed rule by ‘clamor’ (theatrokratia), the worst kind of majoritarianism. In a theatrocracy, citizens would behave as they did in the theatre, not realising that theatre knew no limits other than its own conventions. Politics not only would become subject to mass acclamation rather than considered judgment, but because citizens took part in choruses and minor parts in theatre, they could also take it upon themselves to take up these positions outside the theatre. Choirs would turn up and force themselves on non-theatrical events turning them from solemn occasions to ones that pandered to other spectators for approbation. They would also take their performances home so that even their personal lives would come to be performed for acclamation. Theatre used metaphorically by citizens was thus a destabilizing force: it disturbed order, authority, and spatial arrangements (Laws 700-701c) because ‘consequent’ upon the freedom to judge by acclamation as occurred in the theatre came other ‘freedoms’:

[U]nwilling[ness] to submit to the authorities; then they refuse to obey the admonitions of their fathers and mothers and elders. As they hurtle along towards the end of this primrose path, they try to escape the authority of the laws; and the very end of the road comes when they cease to care about oaths and promises and religion in general (Laws 701a-d).

For Plato, rule ought not to be based on pandering to the crowd. Rather, it should be based on knowledge. Knowledge legitimated rule: the best regime was the one ‘in which the rulers would be found truly possessing expert knowledge’ (Plato Statesman 293c). If a democracy that judged ‘had only consisted of educated persons, no fatal harm would have been done’ (Laws 701) but theatre encouraged ignorance and ignorance, particularly the worst kind of ignorance in which people failed to understand the purpose of rulers and laws and refused to obey either, brought ‘a wretched life of endless misery’ (Laws 701c). This kind of ignorance began when innovators amongst the poets refused to follow the rules of their art. In seeing that the rules could be broken, spectators, who learnt through imitation, came to think that they, too, could break the rules. Suddenly everyone thought they were:

[A]n authority on everything, and of a general disregard for the law. Complete license was not far behind. The conviction that they knew made them unafraid, and assurance engendered effrontery ... a reckless lack of respect for one's betters ... which springs from a freedom from inhibitions that has gone much too far (Laws 701b).²⁴

Plato's rejection of theatre as a metaphor thus lay in his concern for enlightened spectatorship because spectatorship was fundamental to knowledge, which was, in turn fundamental for good rule. Although spectatorship lay at the very foundation of the good society, it was a faculty that was fraught with dangers because ordinary spectators tended to be indiscriminating in its use as well as susceptible to delusion. Even those who were given the opportunity to learn to see better were likely to revert to familiar patterns if only to be able to fit in again with society (Republic 514-539c).²⁵ Philosophical seeing was a better, more productive form of spectatorship but it set philosophers apart from other men in the same way that theoria were set apart from ordinary spectators at religious festivals. However, the superior knowledge that this seeing provided meant that philosophers were particularly suited to rule.

The distinction between drama and theatre is important to understanding Plato's position on politics. To say that he uses theatre as a metaphor is to obscure the differences he sought to highlight between the two phenomena. The distinction is equally important to understanding the way Aristotle's political theory connects to his ethical theory (Porter 1986). This shows up especially in the treatment of tyranny. Since drama illuminates some aspects of life by disregarding or hiding others, politics as drama will use imitation to 'represent things ... as they ought to be' (Aristotle Poetics 1460b.5-10). This means that tyrants will 'act or appear to act in the character of a king' (Aristotle Politics 1314a.35). In the theatre of politics, citizen/spectators will not be able to tell the difference between a tyrant and a king. If the difference between legitimate or benign authority and tyranny cannot be detected, politics will need an ethics in order to overcome this ‘troubling synthesis’ of knowledge, technique and perception (Porter 1986: 22). Theoria (philosophy) offers this ethics because it allows the more considered view that forms the basis for moral action. The separation of drama and theatre is vital for achieving an ethical politics.

²⁴ Emphasis added for clarity.

²⁵ Plato's Cave analogy is often read as a theatre metaphor but it lacks the 'clamor' and freedom from limits that Plato sees in the theatre.

With regard to Arendt, the collapse of what may be theatricality into theatre, drama or performance seems to come about because of a commitment by her commentators to participatory democracy and an assumption that what Arendt calls action is the same thing. Participatory democratic theory all too often tends to operate under Warren’s logic of domination such that spectatorship is seen as the opposite of participation and, since participation is defined as action, must necessarily be passive, and hence of lower value. Consequently, in much the same way that theatre theorists privilege drama over theatre, political theorists with a commitment to participatory democracy tend to privilege what Arendt says about action at the expense of spectatorship, even when they acknowledge her account of spectatorship.²⁶ This becomes apparent in the constant use of ‘we’ and ‘us’, those little words that Billig claims have so much power to gather the right ones together: ‘Arendt has provided us with one of the most subtle and appealing analyses of what participatory politics means’ (Bernstein 1986: 246). This ‘appeals to us, allures us, for we feel ourselves ... to be fragile’ (Curtis 1997: 28) yet we ‘brittle but not yet broken democrats’ (Curtis 1997: 30) want to ‘perform together’ (Bickford 1997: 93), for we now realise that:

Nothing we do ever concerns only ourselves. Yet what we choose to do, or not to do, distinguishes us from others, in the end by showing to what extent we care for our collective milieu ... ‘Who’ we are as individuals depends on how we are with others ... Arendt gives us ... a historically informed account of the ontology of action ... we have now a similar need to act ... Can we do so responsibly and with courage (Hansen 1993: 12,193-4).²⁷

²⁶ For just a few examples of this tendency see Benhabib (2000); Bernstein (1986: 246); Curtis (1997); Bickford (1997); Calhoun and McGowan (1997); Hansen (1993); Tchir (2009); Deutscher (2007); Dietz (1994). It is not that these accounts do not mention spectatorship at all, but they relegate it to part of the human condition: under conditions of plurality, one’s actions are necessarily visible unless one takes significant steps to hide, and even then, one cannot hide from oneself.

Thus Benhabib can call Arendt's understanding of politics 'ocular' (Benhabib 2000: 200), but still not see spectatorship as the necessary condition for the political action she desires, responsible in some way for the outcomes of action through the power to reflect, judge, and to grant or withhold forgiveness. These capacities make spectatorship not just the background for action but a significant counterpart to action for not only does '[t]he spectator, not the actor' hold 'the clue to the meaning of human affairs' (Arendt 1978/1971: 96), spectatorship precedes action:

We ... are inclined to think that in order to judge a spectacle you must first have the spectacle, that the spectator is secondary to the actor – without considering that no one in his right mind would ever put on a spectacle without being sure of spectators to watch it (Arendt 1982: 61-2).

Arendt's privileging of spectatorship clearly causes 'consternation' in her admirers (Jay 1997: 338) because even those who see her account of political life as 'theatrical' gloss over the spectatorship the metaphor implies.

There is no doubt that Arendt used theatre/drama metaphorically on occasions, but those occasions appear to be few and far between and often occur within a discussion about how others used theatre as a metaphor.²⁸ If anything, she appeared to dislike the metaphor, finding a 'profound meaninglessness inherent' in many political versions of it (Arendt 1973: 106). She also on occasions drew distinctions between politics, the everyday world and the arts in ways that suggested that theatre was not central to her account of political life, although vision certainly was. However, vision was not a metaphor for thinking, as philosophy has long considered. Rather it was a simple fact of life for creatures with eyes. One could, however, draw a link between her account of thinking and theatre to suggest that perhaps theatre arose as a solution to the problem of making thinking visible.

²⁷ Emphases added.

²⁸ See, for example, her discussion of the concern over hypocrisy during the French Revolution in On Revolution (Arendt 1973: 98-108) .

Throughout the theatre metaphor's history, efforts have been made by some theorists to keep drama and theatre apart. Usually the distinction is made in order to protect, rescue or condemn spectatorship. For Edmund Burke, however, it was to attempt to rescue politics as a limited activity, while castigating spectators for their inappropriate responses. Thinking of politics as drama allowed activities in politics that would ordinarily be unacceptable. Seeing it as theatre allowed the waiving of sympathy and the appropriation of political events for other ends. Equally strong efforts, beguiled by the action on the stage, have collapsed the terms so that the focus comes to be on the content of what is occurring rather than the place in which it is happening or the position of the observer.

Clearly it would be a losing battle to insist that the theatre metaphor refer only to theatre as a seeing-place. But it is also clear that seeing something as theatre or drama or performance allows it to be appropriated for a variety of purposes. An 'immensely problematic' example of this is the appropriation and interpretation by performance artist Peggy Phelan of a man falling from the World Trade Center tower during the 2001 terrorist attack on New York as a theatrical 'performance' depicting 'the Fall of Adam' (Cheng 2004). Appropriation appears to be an ever present danger of spectatorship that can be summed up in the Latin root for perception: to seize. Appropriation is a 'particular way of seeing, a certain habit of governance' (Valverde 2011: 280) in which spectators 'gaze upon the world ... as if it were owned or could be potentially owned' (Abercrombie and Longhurst 1998: 83).²⁹ It is apparent in the colonial/imperial gaze of eighteenth century explorers such as Bougainville (Balme 2005), and in the way surveillance captures personal data for purposes beyond the control of the observed (Bowker and Star 1999: 31; Clarke 1994; Lyon 2007: 16). Every act of appropriation involves 'expropriation' – 'the deprivation for certain groups of their place in the world' (Arendt 1958: 255). When Phelan appropriated the man falling from the ²⁹ Berger suggests this is a modern trait, but the idea can be seen in the biblical story of Satan's temptation of Christ by showing him 'all the kingdoms of the world': 'All this I will give you' (Matthew 4.8). It also underpins Locke's theory of property and the idea of terra nullius: ownership is established by what can (or cannot) be seen on the land in question.

World Trade tower as a metaphor for the Fall of Adam, she took from him, at least as far as she and spectators of her performances were concerned, his own personal tragedy. Appropriation can thus be cruel, as Blau realised of his immediate response when ‘confronted’ with his new-born daughter: he reached for his camera, his ‘eye of prey’, to ‘capture’ her for himself even before she had uttered a cry (Blau 1987: 79).

Users of the theatre metaphor imagine that they are appropriating characters when they are appropriating actors. Characters are routinely appropriated for jokes, intertextual references, to invent ‘backstories’ as in Peter Carey’s appropriation of Charles Dickens’ character Magwitch for his novel Jack Maggs (1997) or Jean Rhys appropriation of Charlotte Bronte’s Rochester for her novel The Wide Sargasso Sea (1966), to cast aspersions on bureaucrats (MacIntyre 1981: 26) or to come up with a new theory of democracy, as in Green’s and Mount’s appropriations of Shakespeare’s character Coriolanus (Green 2010).³⁰ Appropriating fictional characters is generally not seen as problematic. However, appropriating actors is ‘predatory’ (Zashin and Chapman 1974). This is why the behaviour of some fans is seen as threatening.

Appropriation allows scopophilia but it does not just ‘capture’ others, as the male gaze has been said to capture women and the racialized gaze to capture other cultures. Since it retains those it captures as objects, it also dehumanises and therefore depoliticizes those it appropriates. Although these capacities have been noted in the large body of literature from feminism regarding the way the male gaze appropriates women as objects in cinema, the dehumanising capacity of appropriation can also operate in the seemingly innocuous performance auditing processes associated with public accountability. In these processes, programs and policies rather than people are said to perform. Where the performances of individuals within policies and programs are to be evaluated in relation to the success or failure of a policy or program, they are considered contingent variables in much the same way that unemployed people can be seen as just another expendable resource. Seeing others as things separates agency from activity, making it easier to act against the persons involved. Since it is done to things rather than people, such actions become depoliticised. They become part of 'that's how it is' – 'factual descriptions' in which 'mastery is distributed entirely on the side of the subject who is describing' (Boltanski 1999: 23-4, 33). This is how discrimination can go unchallenged for long periods of time.

³⁰ Carey also appropriates real people for his novels, which is more problematic. For example, he provides a thinly disguised fictional backstory for Alexis De Tocqueville’s trip to America in Parrott and Olivier in America (2009).

When appropriation 'pits the "I" against an "Other"' it creates 'an artificial set of questions about the knowability and recoverability of that Other' (Butler 1990: 478).³¹ These questions not only depend upon an ontological gap between spectators and the other, but they also make the gap a chasm for they are in some sense unanswerable by the beheld. Knowing others is 'always a problematic enterprise' (Jenkins 2000: 11). We need them to tell us about themselves. But telling about themselves may be impossible for the beheld to do if they are recognized only according to an image that is imposed upon them by the spectator. This situation is rendered even more opaque when the appropriating gaze leads those under scrutiny to try to ensure their behaviour is 'appropriate'. When men, for instance, define the rules of what is appropriate for women, women can come to perform accordingly so that men only know their own image of women rather than knowing actual women. The peril of visibility is not just that the other can grasp an aspect of the self that the self is unable to grasp, but that 'the witness is likely to have the advantage over the actor' (Goffman 1959: 133). Consequently 'people ... inhibit themselves out of ... desire for self-protection and privacy' (Deutscher 1983: 26-7). The observed 'take on board how they are seen by others' (Habermas 1984/1981: 95) and learn how to do what is required to satisfy scrutiny (Diefenbach 2009; Hoggett 1996: 24) just as actors in the theatre adjust their performances in response to spectator feedback. Scrutiny can also produce defensive responses (Murray 2011: 5). People in organizations, for instance, become suspicious and evasive when under the scrutiny (Chriss 1995: 559). Consequently '[a]gencies with high levels of accountability often display low levels of innovation and flexibility' (APSC 2009: 9).

Appropriation thus operates in a double way: powerful or critical spectators impose limits on how others can appear, which produces limited performances catering to those spectators (Brent 2008; Kohn 2010: 574). This results in a kind of blindness that Noble (2005) calls unvisibility, the inability or refusal to see beyond certain visible aspects that the observed are obliged to perform in order to be 'seen'. In accountability this can have the paradoxical effect of failing to account for the agency it is seeking to scrutinise, since that agency is bent to compliance (Philp 2009: 41), subterfuge (Gilliam 2005: 77), spin (Murray 2011: 5) or 'impression management' strategies in order to 'deliver the information required' (Hoggett 1996: 24).

³¹ Emphasis added.

Appropriation can be positive for some appropriators. The appropriation of dominant discourses by those who have been its targets, for instance, can be used to challenge dominant views, make social comments, create oppositional statements, bend gender and empower (Sturken and Cartwright 2003: 56). The appropriation and reformulation of 'black as beautiful', 'the political as private' and 'gay pride' are all examples of appropriation for positive political ends. So is the appropriation of the actor/spectator binary to tease out new ways of thinking about political life. However, appropriation always takes from one party for the benefit of the appropriator, generally without permission. The powerful are adept at this game, as the appropriation and distortion by the Howard government of the indigenous 'black armband' history motif indicated (McKenna 1998).

Less cruel but also problematic is Bickford's revision of Arendt's 'theatrical' view of politics so that actors and spectators share the same space on stage, since the relationship between actors and spectators that Arendt draws 'seems more apropos [as] the one between actors ... in the absence of a strong director' (Bickford 1997: 93). This simply makes the metaphor incoherent – if everyone is an actor on the political stage, how does one distinguish between actors and actors acting as spectators? In any case, a crucial function of spectators in Arendt's view of politics is to provide the space in which actors can appear and interact with each other. How is this 'space of appearance' to be generated in the absence of actual spectators rather than actors acting as spectators? Although Arendt leaves open the possibility that actors and spectators may take turns, each has a particular function that cannot be provided by the other. Arendt's rejection of retrospective causality (Arendt 1978/1971: II: 30-31) and her claim that actors show themselves as they act (Arendt 1958: 179) also tell against the theatre metaphor, with or without a strong director.

The following chapter tries to keep the distinctions between theatre and drama as clear as possible, although it must encompass both. To avoid some of the complexities posed by performance and performativity, these concepts are kept separate from this account of the theatre/drama metaphor unless there are clear indications that they are being used as theatre metaphors. Theatricality is also generally avoided, although it is taken up again briefly in Chapter 8 as part of a further discussion on distant spectatorship. Dramaturgy and dramatism are discussed in Chapter 7. They enact their own kind of politics.

Chapter 4: Seeing Politics through the Theatre/Drama Metaphor

Figure 4.1 Session of the Council of the Ancients, France, 1798-1799 (Cabinet des Estampes, Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale; reproduced in Hunt 1984: 79)

[I]t has a theatrical air [that] keeps it from being ... seriously dignified and truly imposing (Henri Meister Souvenirs de mon dernier voyage à Paris (1795) cited in Hunt 1984: 79).¹

This chapter specifically focuses on what will be called the theatre/drama metaphor in relation to political life. What is it that seems to be explained by the metaphor, and what does this say about politics? Is it helpful to politics to be described as theatre or drama? Where do spectators fit in?

In order to answer these questions, the broad historical study of the metaphor alluded to in Chapter 3 was analysed according to the following criteria:

¹ Meister was commenting on the official clothing for government officials prescribed by law in 1795.

- drama or theatre
- relationship to politics
- aspect of life being described
- positive, negative or ambivalent
- aspect of theatre being utilised
- focus of the metaphor:
 - o doing: what was being done
 - o showing: what was being shown
 - o watching
 - o some combination of these categories.
- position of spectator/metaphor user

Users were defined as political if they were long-standing political theorists, had identified themselves through disciplinary association or because the focus of their concern was political in a straightforward way. Aristotle, Plato and Hobbes, for instance, were identified as political users of the metaphor because of their long-standing recognition by political theory and because their focus in using the metaphor was political life. Keith Sutherland (2010), on the other hand, was identified as a political user because of the focus of his commentary (Manin's audience democracy), and the space in which it appeared (openDemocracy).

The spectator position designated by the metaphor was generally implied, but the way the metaphor was used allowed this position to be assessed according to the following criteria:

- external to the world postulated by the metaphor
- internal to the world postulated by the metaphor
- externalized: those whose use of the metaphor suggested a detached position²
- internalized: self-conscious spectators – they observed themselves as the 'actor'

² This is typically the position taken by users of the metaphor.

Of the 577 records of what is widely claimed to be the theatre metaphor located across a broad range of literatures in 774 publications from c550 BCE to 2010, only 191 were clearly theatre metaphors as opposed to drama metaphors operating more or less in conjunction with an implied theatre metaphor.³ For instance although the impression management literature, which began in America in the 1920s then blossomed in conjunction with Goffman's dramaturgy, is focused on the activity of managing appearance, concerns about impressions necessarily imply the presence of spectators. Impression management is essentially 'the process by which individuals attempt to control the impressions others form of them' (Leary and Kowalski 1990: 34). Politicians, for instance, engage in impression management when they use conscience votes 'to play to a constituency' in order to give the impression that they are doing something (Warhurst 2005). Symbolic politics also implies spectators, although studies such as Gusfield's (1963) on the American Temperance Movement use drama rather than theatre as the analysing metaphor. Only 42 records (7%) were explicitly to do with watching, although this expanded to 159 (28%) when users incorporated spectatorship into their use of drama such as in early Christian uses. Table 4.1 displays the breakdown between doing, showing and watching.

Doing/Showing/Watching	Number of uses	Total %
Doing	241	42
- doing politics	84	15
Showing	68	12
- showing politics	27	5
Watching	42	7
- watching politics	13	2
Doing and Showing	108	18
- doing/showing politics	53	9
Doing and Watching	50	9
- doing/watching politics	18	3
Showing and Watching	14	2
- showing/watching politics	6	1
Doing, Showing and Watching	55	9
- doing/showing/watching politics	24	4
TOTAL USERS	577	100

Table 4.1 Using the theatre/drama metaphor – Doing/Showing/Watching⁴

³ See Appendix C Tables 1-17: A history of the theatre metaphor in relationship to spectators (on CD).

⁴ See Appendix B Table 4 for an expanded view of this table. Record tally is by user rather than publication because secondary sources for much of the early literature often consolidated a writer's use of the metaphor into a single record. This approach also allowed consolidation of the Only 55 records incorporated all three components of theatre. Spectatorship is more often than not obscured in both theatre and drama metaphors.

Fewer than half the records (225) were overtly political on the criteria given above, although the use of the metaphors to describe political life and events was the dominant use by far. This use was generally negative (see Table 4.2 below).

Political uses of the theatre/drama metaphor	Number of uses	Total %
Political entries	225	39
Positive view of political life	43	7
Negative view of political life	101	17
Neutral/ambivalent/can't say	81	14

Table 4.2 Political uses of the theatre/drama metaphor

Few of the records were produced by theatre practitioners. Metaphor users came overwhelmingly from outside theatre from areas as diverse as Music, Criminology, Etiquette, Education, Law, Indigenous Rights, Psychiatry, Medicine, Gerontology, Physics and Artificial Intelligence as well as Politics, suggesting that it is not theatre practitioners but spectators who are most attracted to the metaphor. These areas of use have been summarised under ten major fields in Table 4.3 below:

Theatre as a Metaphor: FIELDS IN WHICH THE METAPHOR HAS BEEN USED	To 1CE	1CE-1200	1201-1250	1251-1300	1301-1350	1351-1400	1401-1450	1451-1500	1501-1550	1551-1600	1601-1650	1651-1700	1701-1750	1751-1800	1801-1850	1851-1900	1901-1950	1951-2000	2001-2008
Intellectual Life and Theory
Cultural Life and Theory ⁵
Social Life and Theory
Political Life and Theory
Economic Life and Theory
Psychological Life
History
Communication
Medicine
Science and Technology

Table 4.3 Theatre/drama metaphor – fields of use.⁶

dramaturgical and role theory literature, which would otherwise have swamped the study with the drama metaphor. Multiple authors for a single publication are counted as one author.

⁵ Includes religious life

⁶ See Appendix B Table 5 for an expanded view of this table.

Shading indicates the periods in which the metaphors were located in these fields. As can be seen, the metaphor disappeared from view in some fields for substantial periods of time.

The metaphor is routinely used by the media, to the point of cliché, and often to present entirely opposite views on an issue. For example, Paul Sheehan (2006) and Michael Gawenda (2006) both use it in relation to the Iraq War on the same page of The Sydney Morning Herald, but to present quite different arguments. While only 90 references were by recognizable political writers, this did not prevent the metaphor from being used strategically by non-political users. The first appearance of the theatre metaphor in c550 BCE is likely to have been a backwards attribution to Pythagoras by the astronomer and philosopher Heraclides of Pontus (c388 BCE-c315 BCE) in order to provide some ancient credibility for Plato's appropriation of the word theoria for his model of philosophical spectatorship (Nightingale 2004: 17-18). It proved a very effective strategy because the attribution stood until the end of the twentieth century.

What Does the Metaphor Offer?

As Table 4.4 on page 102 indicates, theatre has a number of characteristics that appear to be valuable to the metaphor. Theatre is structured, designed, selective in what it shows, artful, purposeful and goal-oriented. This can make politics seem ordered, skilful, focused, purposeful and meaningful on the one hand, or determined, superficial, histrionic, deceptive, instrumental and manipulative on the other. However the key to the theatre metaphor is spectatorship because what the metaphor allows users to do is to objectify what lies before their gaze in such a way as to make it seem to have the characteristics of a drama 'performed upon a stage by actors' (McGillivray 2007: 146-150). 'Beholder' is an apt description of this kind of spectatorship because the metaphor renders life 'holdable', allowing the beholder to draw conclusions about what they see.

Whether or not explicitly embedded in an acknowledgement of the spectatorship theatre offers, the metaphor is underpinned by an assumption that

Characteristics of Theatre:	That makes human life seem
	Positive	Negative
A seeing-place	Visible	Distanced
	Knowable	Objectified
	Revelatory	Disguised
Holistic	Comprehensive	Complete
Designed/Stylized/Composed	Skilful	Shallow/False
Visually, spatially and temporally structured	Ordered	Determined
Selective in what it shows	Focused	Misleading/Inauthentic
Emphatic/Intensified	Dramatic and eventful	Compressed/histrionic
Indifferent to facts	Clear	Deceptive
Artful	Under human control	False
Goal-oriented/Closed	Purposeful	Relentless
	Meaningful	Fateful
	Rational	Instrumental
An acting space	Performative	Histrionic
A constructed art	Rational	False, artificial
A composite art produced co-operatively	Harmonious, co-operative	Strategic/Devious
Draws causal connections	Coherent and explicable	Inevitable
	Predictable	Fatalistic
Draws relational links	Shared	Entangled
	Significant	Functional
Imitative	Explicable	False
Universalizing	Significant and shared	Undifferentiated
Teleological	Purposeful	Finite
Directed by unseen forces	Secure, legitimated	Unfree
Ephemeral	Precious	Unstable, contingent
Expressive	Articulate	Rational
Affective	Sympathetic (other-oriented)	Empathetic (self-oriented)
A relationship between actors and spectators	Participatory/Interactive	Polarised/antagonistic
Attention-seeking	Focusing	Histrionic
Attention-directing	Revelatory	Misleading
Conventional	Ordered for mutual benefit	Constrained
Performative	Expressive	Manipulative
	Admirable	Scrutinised

Table 4.4 Characteristics of theatre and their metaphorical application to life

‘there is a greater reality existing outside human existence, and apart from the world as it presents itself to human consciousness and understanding’ (McGillivray 2007: 146-150). This is where, for the most part, the user stands: ‘in the theatre, we look into a comprehensive world from which we are personally excluded. We are outside looking in ... the standard response of the Western man to reality’ (de Kerckhove 1990: 172 in Bartels 1993: 49).

Although users are sometimes included within the drama on the stage, particularly when the metaphor expresses the melancholic view that all life is illusory, ephemeral and ultimately meaningless – ‘a tale/Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury/Signifying nothing’ (Shakespeare Macbeth 5.5: 25-27) – a greater reality is still implied, even if occupied only by ‘idiots’ or puppet-masters:

[W]e’re always on stage, even if we’re finally stabbed to death in earnest ... We are puppets, our strings are pulled by unknown forces, ourselves are nothing, nothing! (Bucher Danton's Death 1835 cited in Rarick 1999).

Most scholars of the metaphor agree that the metaphor reflects a desire ‘to grant meaning and order’ to life by making it part of a larger plan (Christian 1987: 195) ‘which is felt obscurely to be designed’ (Burns 1972: 11) and is therefore significant (Homan 1989: 35). Users draw implicitly on the understanding of a play as an artefact that is already ‘a closed circle of meaning’ (Gadamer 1984: 101) and towards whose end all actions in this particular performance are directed. The metaphor therefore provides a means of asserting power over ‘that which all human beings feel powerless’ (Landy 1991: 30) because actions in theatre lose their ‘air of contingency’ (Arendt 1978/1971: II: 30). The desire to exert this control has been so consistent across the centuries of use of the metaphor as to constitute a Weltanschauung or ‘philosophy of life’ (Lovejoy 1936: 7).

The long-standing use of the metaphor in philosophy supports Arendt’s contention that ‘professional thinkers ... were less “pleased” with freedom than with necessity’ (Arendt 1978/1971: II: 33).⁷ Even jaded uses of the metaphor by contemporary journalists reveal this desire to place human activities such as politics within some larger order, thereby rendering it meaningful because ‘the tragedy of modern life is that nothing happens, and that the resultant dullness does not kill’ (Shaw 1998/1911: 101). To say that ‘Canberra and Macquarie Street are soap operas, sometimes overlapping with crime thrillers and screwball comedies’ (Dale 2008: 13), that South Korean politics is ‘a theatre of the absurd’ (Wehrfritz and Lee 2003), that a politician is ‘waiting in the wings’ (Daley 2009: 41), that student demonstrators are ‘puppets’ whose strings are being pulled by militants (Wallace 2003), or that Australia’s treatment of refugees is ‘posturing’ (Sydney Morning Herald 2003) is to impose orders of genre, authorial and directorial control and performance evaluation on politics by spectators who stand outside the drama while imbuing it with dynamics. It is also to impose a moral order on these activities. Only one of these comparisons could possibly be considered morally neutral (‘waiting in the wings’) although context soon dispenses with that neutrality when the politician is identified as Australia’s longest-suffering Prime Minister-in-waiting, Peter Costello: ‘[t]here is no neutral territory on the stage’ (Seymour 1996: 8) and ‘things are always seen from somewhere’ (Barthes 1986: 96). The spectator ‘is the person for and in whom the play takes place’ (Gadamer 1984: 101).

⁷ Original emphasis.

Theatre is relentlessly instrumental even when it pretends to be free, unstructured and purposeless. Every performance is oriented towards an end, even if that end is only the time limit for the use of the space or spectator inattention: ‘[t]he curtain goes up ... later, the curtain goes down. What occurs between ... is ... a performance’ (Kirby 1976: 55) although the end can come sooner if ‘the audience has seen enough’ (Shaw 1998/1911: 101): ‘in the theatre ... the goal is clear’ as is the time-frame in which it must be achieved (Brook 2008/1968: 379). Theatre only offers the opportunity to see a whole because it shows actions that are structured and contextualised in terms of this goal so that they appear to be coherent, meaningful and purposeful.⁸ Even when performances are ‘improvised’, performers have some plan that, at the very least, must start the performance and bring it to an end. They also need to co-ordinate their activities with other performers. However improvisational the activity, or how meaningless it appears, ⁸ Blau (1989) believed that we lived ‘on borrowed time’ which we were obliged to ‘amortize’ over a life-time, but that we were inclined to forget this. Theatre, however, was a demonstration of just this existential condition both in the way it spread performances over pre-set time periods according to its ends, and in the way performers and spectators shared their actual lives for this period of time. In demonstrating this amortization, theatre also reminded us that, in real life, although we know that an end will come, we cannot control when it will occur, as theatre can.

they will be alert to pre-set cues.⁹ Determinism therefore underpins most uses of the metaphor:

The theatre [can] do something that no politician can do – make a radical transformation so that for a moment the world is seen complete, with all its difficulties, all its riches, and all its potentialities (Peter Brook cited in Brockett and Ball 2004: 18).

With determinism comes fatalism and the opportunity for judgment because how well or badly actors do can be measured against the play's end. Judgment is what makes the location of the metaphor user the key problematic of the metaphor for it is this position that gives the combined metaphor its 'moral force' (McGillivray 2007: 152-3; Vickers 1971) while largely remaining hidden. Historically judgment operated as a warning in the metaphor, particularly in Christian versions in which users placed themselves somewhere between a judging God and the unfolding drama, neither in the world nor quite outside it, in order to urge an ethics of responsible behaviour in the face of the apparent futility of life. There was, after all, some higher purpose or meaning. In contemporary uses that have dispensed with God, the metaphor is more often than not 'pejorative' (McGillivray 2007: 146), focusing on the negative aspects of life: falseness, hypocrisy, illusion, manipulation, the delusion of self-importance and the ridiculousness of taking oneself too seriously. Minnigerodé uses it in this sense to reduce the historical significance of Robespierre and his cohorts: 'The history of the fall of Robespierre is not long: some scoundrels destroyed some scoundrels'. The whole thing played out like a 'magnificent comedy', complete with role reversals. Those who tried to play the heroic parts found themselves reduced to 'tragic fools' at the end (Minnigerodé 1932: frontispiece). Minnigerodé stands a long way from Robespierre in time as well, which no doubt contributes to this assessment of Robespierre's position in history, but his spectatorial position is simply assumed.

⁹ Even dramas which explore meaninglessness, such as Beckett's works, are structured as coherent pieces of work. Indeed, Beckett's dramas are renowned for still being quite rigidly policed long after his death. A director/performer may not deviate from the script or Beckett's instructions for a play's performance.

An expression of upheaval?

Rarick (1999) argues that the theatre metaphor is particularly prevalent at times of political upheaval, although her examples, Lope de Vega (1562-1635), Müller (1815-1892) and Büchner (1813-1837), used the drama metaphor retrospectively to depict revolution or political upheaval rather than to describe contemporary conditions as they unfolded. De Vega's play, Acting is Believing: a Tragicomedy in Three Acts (1607-1608) portrayed Roman politicians as actors striving to be directors in the drama of political life. Müller's painting The Roll Call of the Last Victims (1850) depicted royalist prisoners of the French Revolution 'rehearsing' their execution so as to ensure they gave a noble impression as they faced death. Certainly theatre itself appeared to blossom during the French and Russian Revolutions (Mally 2000; Maslan 2005). An attempt to map the use of the metaphor onto a chronology of wars and revolutions proved inconclusive, however, largely because it was difficult to find a period when conflict was not occurring somewhere where users might have been able to observe it, although there are certainly examples of the theatre metaphor to be found at such times:¹⁰

- Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) based his conception of representation on the focusing power of theatre: as the multitude of spectators focused on the sovereign actor, they cohered as a 'people'.
- Montesquieu (1689-1755) argued that the public visibility offered by theatre was the key to civility and therefore freedom: freedom was the ability to appear in public without fear or restriction, a freedom the conventions of theatre granted to actors. However, visibility outside these conventions was a double-edged sword because it could also be a tool of despotism that used its own visibility to deny or restrict the ability of others to see or be seen (Hundert and Nelles 1989).
- Kant (1724-1804) justified the intense interest by spectators in the French Revolution on the basis of the 'constant progress' of mankind as a whole. Otherwise such events would be 'a sight quite unfit ... even for the most ordinary but honest man': 'It may perhaps be moving and instructive to watch such a drama for a while; but the curtain must eventually descend. For in the long run, it becomes a farce. And even if the actors do not tire of it – for they are fools – the spectator does, for any single act will be enough for him if he can reasonably conclude from it that the never-ending play will be of eternal sameness’ (Kant The Critique of Judgment (1790) cited in Arendt 1982: 51).

¹⁰ See Appendix C, Tables 1-17 (on CD) for details.

- Edmund Burke (1729-1797) worried about the excesses the metaphor allowed when used as a model for politics as in the French Revolution, and then worried about the adequacy of his own performance as a political actor;
- Robespierre (1758-1794) grew paranoid about ‘the public conduct of the personalities who play the principal roles’ and the possibility of treachery (Robespierre 2004/1791) and opted ‘to sit among the spectators [so as to] better judge the stage and the actors’ (Robespierre 2004/1792);
- George Washington (1732-1799) declared that Americans were ‘actors on a most conspicuous theatre, which seems to be peculiarly designed by Providence for the display of human greatness and felicity’ (Washington Circular Letter to State Governors (1783) cited in Albanese 1976: 8) and that for his disbanding army ‘[n]othing now remains but for the Actors of this mighty scene ... to close the drama with applause; and to retire from the military theatre with the same approbation of angels and men which have crowned all their former actions’ (Washington Address to his Army (1783) cited Richards 1991: 262);¹¹
- Alexis de Tocqueville (1805-1859) worried that the 1848 Revolution seemed more like ‘a play about the French Revolution’ rather than a continuation of it and although he ‘foresaw the terrible end to the piece well enough, I could not take the actors very seriously; the whole thing seems a vile tragedy played by a provincial troupe’ (de Tocqueville 1970/1893: 53);
- Karl Marx (1818-1883) complained that the participants of the 1848 French Revolution (heroes, parties and masses) ‘performed the task of their time in Roman costume and with Roman phrases’ when it was, in fact, ‘class struggle in France [which had] created circumstances and relationships that made it possible for a grotesque mediocrity to play a hero’s part’. Marx also refers to Hegel’s remark that ‘all great, world-historical facts and personages occur as it were, twice’, adding ‘the first time as tragedy, the second time as farce’ – and gives examples from French history as ‘the same caricature’. Similarly, ‘Cromwell ... had borrowed speech, passions and illusions from the Old Testament’. The reason why revolutionaries dressed themselves up this way was to conceal their limitations and heighten their passions (Marx 1978/1852: 592-6).¹²

¹¹ Also cited in MacKinnon (2005).

- Vaclav Havel (1936-) believed that all politicians ‘unwittingly become actors, dramatists, directors, or entertainers’ in a world of mediated politics (Havel 1996a) and this ‘makes continuous demands on us all, as dramatists, actors and audience’ (Havel 1996b).
- Raymond Aron (1905-1983) called the 1968 student riots in France a ‘psycho-drama’ because participants took on the roles of famous radicals: ‘I took on the role of de Tocqueville; this has its ridiculous side, but others were playing Saint-Just, Robespierre or Lenin, which all in all was even more ridiculous’ (cited in Mount 1972: 4).
- Apter considered the revolution in Iran to be ‘pure theatre’ in the way it set up ‘cleavages’ between ‘insiders’ and ‘outsiders, the pure against the pariahs’. At such times, ‘all life is on stage and all politics display’ (Apter 2006: 222-3);
- Gurevitch claims that ‘the Gulf War was ‘acted out’ on a global stage’ (Gurevitch 1995: 447).

Both French and American revolutionaries did seem to be particularly fond of the metaphor as a grand description of their revolution’s ‘gleaming place on the stage of history’ (Howe 2004: 124). Post-revolutionary America, in particular, produced an outpouring of triumphalist speeches, poetry and sermons declaring America as a glorious new theatre, 'a theatre of action for every citizen' (Barlow 2010/1787). At the National Jubilee celebrations of July 4, 1826, speaker Josiah Bent declared America, through the intervention of God, 'to be the theatre of new scenery to our race' (cited in Richards 1991: 7). America has always seen itself as a player on the world stage, with the rest of the world as spectators, although Marranca believes that the metaphor has since reversed. The definition of theatre provided in a 1980s US Department of Defence's Dictionary for Military Terms, which defines 'theatre' as the 'geographical area outside the continental United States', indicates to Marranca that the United States is now a spectator of the rest of the world (Marranca 1987: 25). However, given America's penchant for intervention in world affairs, the definition could simply mean that the site of American action has been moved off home soil. Currently it is the Middle East that is meant to be the 'theatre of Western political success' (Aly 2007: 13).

¹² Certainly illustrations from the French Revolution of 1789-1799 indicate some grounds for Marx’s complaint. Not only were ‘heroes’ such as Rousseau routinely depicted in classical Greek and Roman dress, but official dress for members of the revolutionary council (1789-1790) featured Roman drapes over simplified contemporary dress (Hunt 1984: 80). Both Hunt (1984) and Maslan (2005) provide illustrations of this astonishing phenomena which was designed to distinguish members of the council from other citizens attending council meetings and functions. One of these is reproduced in Figure 8.5 in Chapter 8.

In every one of these uses, the metaphor user has shifted their position so that they appear to be outside the reality they are describing. A spectator as a 'separate', externalised concept is necessary to turn the world from 'eternal, senseless play' (Nietzsche 2000/1872) into something that is rendered meaningful and purposeful. This is what theatre does. Robespierre makes this position explicit. However, as his increasing paranoia about the relationship between what could be seen and what remained hidden indicates, this externalised position has its dangers. Theatre renders life meaningful and purposeful through strategies of illusion. Potentially anyone can 'help himself to every 'mask' in the political theatre' while at the same time claiming 'not only sincerity but naturalness' (Arendt 1973: 107-8). One can therefore never be sure that what one is seeing is the truth. Consequently concern over deception seems to drive many political versions of the metaphor: 'Everyone wears the same mask of patriotism', even the enemy (Robespierre 2004/1791).¹³ Politicians engage in 'nothing but a continual acting upon a stage' (Bacon Gesta Grayorum (1595) cited in Vickers 1971: 192) while 'corrupt machinations' go on 'behind the scenes' (Apter 2006: 227; Russell 2007: 13). Political actors 'stick to the script' (Hammer 2007: 18) as public spectacles 'somewhere between a Greek tragedy and a soap opera' play out 'in daily instalments' (Brett 2007: 28) and 'protagonists rehearse well-developed positions' (Leet 2008) in 'an opera without a musical score' complete with 'villains, heroes, love, loss, slaughter, loyalty, betrayal, pathos, comedy, melodrama and long knives' (Warden 1995: 48) in which everyone has 'a fixed role, all decisions were taken in advance; there was no real debate; and nobody listened to anybody else (Van Duyn, Amsterdam City councillor and founder of the anarchist group Kabouterbeweging, cited in Mount 1972: 5). Modern politics in particular is 'just play-acting, a bit of media melodrama to keep the public entertained' (Latham 2007). Election campaigns are 'carnivals' (Apter 2006: 227) that 'star' particular leaders, while their deputies 'do the warm-up act' (Coorey 2007: 11). Four 'sets' of players (politicians, spin doctors, media workers and audiences) collude to produce a 'smoke and mirrors show' (Louw 2005: 1) for spectators while, under cover of the show, policy-makers do what they like (Louw 2005: 182), or what they must to retain power (Apter 2006; Machiavelli 1981/1513), so that politics becomes 'a masquerade without foundation' (Hallward 2006) in which 'the prize' goes '[t]o the artful dodger rather than the true believer' (Vidal 1973).

¹³ According to both Hunt and Arendt, the revolutionaries 'talked incessantly about unmasking people ... at every political level from the beginning of the Revolution' (Hunt 1984: 39).

[W]hen ... a people become an audience and their public business a vaudeville act, then the nation finds itself at risk (Postman 1985:
5-6).

Nevertheless, a certain amount of 'theatricality' has always been 'essential to maintaining ...the reputation of power as well as its actuality' (Baxandall 1969: 53-5). Rulers need to appear 'as one set on a stage, whose smallest actions and gestures, all the people gazingly doe behold' (James I Basilikon Doron (1599) cited in Orgel 1975: 41).¹⁴ This adds to the 'dignity' of politics and encourages 'reverence' in the common people, making them easier to rule (Bagehot 1872/1867: 8). This is why the state 'has uncounted stages, plot-lines, and "routines"' (Baxandall 1969: 53-5) that it uses to produce 'the great hit plays' (Kariel 1970: 1094), including that 'grand pièce de résistance ... the combat of good and evil which goes under the name of the conflict between society and the state' (Pasquino 1991/1978: 107) – a drama that has been revived so often alternative relationships have been forgotten. Yet political theatre appears to come at a cost. Given the jaded views of politics expressed by contemporary versions of the metaphor, spectators seem to have long found such long-running dramas 'laughable' (Pasquino 1991/1978: 117) or worse, a 'yawnathon' (Schofield 2005). Politics as theatre is seen to be episodic, ephemeral, concerned with appearance, untrustworthy in terms of truth, a lot of sound and fury for not much benefit, manipulative and engaged 'in a kind of baby talk' (Postman 1985: 5-6):

¹⁴ Elizabeth I's version of the same metaphor went: 'We princes, I tell you, are set on stages, in the sight and view of all the world duly observed' (Orgel 1975: 41).

We read the newspapers, we listen to and look at political commentators. We hear ministerial statements, and we are conscious of the existence of another world, the other side of the moon. So we become cynical to the point of switching off radio and television during general election broadcasts because, simply, we do not believe what is being said ... Can all this play-acting really be necessary...? (Griffiths 1967: 23).

It is not so much what political actors actually do but how they appear that seems to be the problem for these spectators. As a consequence, modern spectators seem to be as keen as Kant's sceptical spectators to see the curtain go down: '[t]he ideal of a politics without pretending remains strong, even though we regularly support pretenders in politics' (MacKinnon 2005). Appearance is important, but so is credibility.

Green's 'Ocular' Democracy

It is just this situation that Green's proposal for an 'ocular' form of plebiscitary democracy is meant to address. Everyday citizens are the explicit spectators of political performers, and, given the 'fallen' state of liberal democracy, have evidently given up on taking what is presented as politics seriously, largely because they are continually presented with pseudo-events in which political actors stage-manage their appearances for the purposes of propaganda. Consequently:

[T]he unpleasant but acute reality [is] that for most citizens mass democracies today are defined by spectatorship not active decision making (Green 2010: 104).¹⁵

Under these conditions, the dialogic or ‘vocal’ model of deliberative democracy based on communicative speech is no longer viable. Instead, it is necessary to bring spectators or citizens-being-ruled to the ‘centre stage’ of democratic theory. This would redress the overwhelming privileging of the citizen-governor as the ‘central protagonist’ in most accounts of democracy – a privileging for which ‘ordinary’ citizens have consistently been found to be inadequate. Rather than try and change citizens, modern democracy – tied as it is to the principle of equality – should afford ‘dignity’ to all citizens by incorporating those who are usually ‘overlooked by democratic theory: the nonvoter, the nonideologue, the nonaffiliate [and] non-member’ so that they too can have ‘political lives’ (Green 2010: 201). Since modern mass democracy is mediated, ‘most people engage with politics primarily with their eyes’ (Green 2010: 40). Recognizing spectatorship as a collective process, bolstering it with an empowered form of looking (the gaze) and underpinning it with a normative principle (candor) would allow these ordinary citizens to collectively put pressure on political actors and hold them to account in a way that idealist forms of democracy cannot because it would give them ‘a special opportunity to supervise, inspect, and otherwise survey its leadership’ (Green 2010: 133):

[T]he gaze indicates that type of sight that partakes of supervision, inspection, examination, and scrutiny. [It is an] empowered form of sight ... when it can both observe the few without being observed ... and when what it gets to see is not preprogrammed or rehearsed but constitutive of a genuine type of surveillance (Green 2010: 128).

This would be a ‘genuinely collective process’ that would allow the ‘politically aware but not politically active’ (Green 2010: 36) outside the electoral process to be involved ‘in the manner of an audience’ (Green 2010: 148). The differences ¹⁵ Green derives the concept of pseudo-event from Boorstin (1978/1961). A pseudo-event was an event devised for the media.

Green draws between the ‘vocal’ and ‘ocular’ models are laid out diagrammatically in Table 4.5:

	VOCAL Deliberative Democracy	OCULAR Plebiscitary Democracy
Template
Object of Rule	The Law	The Leaders
Organ of Rule	The Decision	The Gaze
Principle of Rule	Autonomy	Candor Characteristics
View of spectacle	Negative	Selective
View of democracy	Attainable Ideal	‘fallen’ (p. 7)
Approach to mass politics	Rejects the visual nature of mass politics	Embraces the visual nature of mass politics
Exercise of popular control	Via control of the means of law-making	Via control of the means of publicity
Grounded in	Institutions of debate	Institutions of scrutiny
Requires	Institutionalised decision-making	Institutionalised publicity
Aim	Empowered decision-making	Empowered looking
Central Protagonist	Citizen-governor	Citizen-being-ruled
Regulates	Citizens	Leaders
Nature of citizenship	Selective	Collective
Requirement	Representation	Appearance
View of Leaders	Means to an end	Ends in themselves
Style	Dialogic	Performative
Occasions	Irregular/Occasional	Constant/Everyday
Vehicle	Periodic elections	Periodic elections
Basis of voting	Policy and interests Party allegiance	Personality Character
Type of control	Positive/participatory	Negative/critical
Means	Communicative speech	Spectatorship
Norms	Reciprocity Sincerity Respect Mutual Understanding	Candor (‘worthy of being watched’)
Processes	Exclusionary	Inclusive
Understanding of Publicity	Controlled by leaders Rehearsed Staged Manipulative	Controlled by ‘the People’ Improvisational Spontaneous Genuine
Scrutiny	Cursory/intermittent	Explicit/constant
Spectators	Passive/non-participatory	Passive/non-participatory but empowered as spectator-actors
Values realized	Autonomy	Intellectual values Aesthetic values Egalitarian values Social Solidarity

Table 4.5 Diagrammatic Summary of Green’s Two Models of Democracy (developed from Green 2010).

Where deliberative democracy is grounded in institutionalised debate and decision-making and voting occurs on the basis of policy, interests and party allegiance, ocular democracy would be grounded in the visual. Scrutiny would be constant via the mass media, but leaders would also be subjected to periodic tests in which their ability to conduct themselves appropriately when subjected to unexpected scrutiny would be assessed. Voting at elections would be on the basis of character as revealed by these tests.

Green claims that he has been forced into conceiving this model by present day conditions. Democratic theorists are not ‘free to choose their protagonists, but must be guided in their selection by the nature of political experience available to everyday citizens’ (Green 2010: 48). That experience is now overwhelmingly a visual experience. Spectators must therefore be made the ‘protagonist’ in the drama of politics.

Characterised as ‘The People’, the task of the protagonist in the drama of ocular democracy is to ‘call out’ political leaders and test their sincerity rather than their ability to govern by putting them under the test of candour – impromptu scrutiny under conditions they cannot control – and watching the false ones squirm. ‘Candid events’ such as press conferences, debates and parliamentary question times are to be utilised for this. Candid events are ‘spontaneous in the sense that [they] cannot be managed or staged or rehearsed from above’, that is, by the leaders themselves. This means that a leader’s image will be ‘subject to the risk of error and misstep, confrontation, inadvertent revelations, and simple shame’. The purpose of a candid event is revelation. Candid events are watchable insofar as ‘something is revealed in the course of the happening itself’. The inability of a leader to fully control their image, for instance, will reveal a divided person, and therefore insincerity (Green 2010: 20-23). The ability of a leader to ‘think on his feet and maintain poise’ on the other hand, will be evidence of someone who is sincere and coherent.

Thus politicians are forced to ‘play admirably the role assigned’ (Cotton Mather c1685 cited in Richards 1991: 148) even though the selection and timing is not in their control (Green 2010: 129). They must ‘earn their acclaim, not receive it ... without effort’ through ensuring that their performances are spontaneous, meaningful and ‘worthy of being watched’ (Green 2010: 20). This will make the event a genuine event rather than a pseudo-event (the differences are displayed in Table 4.5 below). Candid events are therefore a form of empowerment for The People who come to constitute ‘a disciplinary, ocular force with real and potentially critical effects on those compelled to appear before it’ (Green 2010: 132) and, in forcing political actors to produce genuine events, are compensated for the disproportionate power held by political elites.

Genuine Event	Pseudo-Event
Press conference	Rally
Debate	Advertisement
Question Time	Press Secretary Announcement
The Public Inquiry
Criterion of Control	Criterion of Control
Leaders are not in control of their publicity	Leaders are in control of their publicity
Result	Result
A capacity for spontaneity A capacity for unpredictability A capacity for drama A capacity for meaningfulness A possibility of revelation Eventfulness Watchability	No capacity for spontaneity No capacity for unpredictability No capacity for eventfulness No capacity for meaningfulness No possibility of revelation Manipulation Predictability
Judgment based on:	Judgment based on:
Capacity to handle impromptu appearance	Persuasiveness of propaganda

Table 4.6 Diagrammatic Summary of Genuine Events versus Pseudo Events (developed from Green 2010)

Green draws on Arendt’s description of the polis as a space of appearance to underpin this demand for spontaneity and revelation as an alternative to the auditory form of pseudo-event that he claims is currently in force in representative democracies.¹⁶ However, his treatment of what, for Arendt, was a spatial concept akin to theatre as a seeing-place through which ephemeral words and deeds could somehow achieve some permanency, turns appearance into an obligation of the aspiration to rule and subject to the discipline of the Gaze. To not appear and submit to ‘being grinded’ (Green 2010: 138) when summoned means that power-holders are not behaving according to democratic requirements:

¹⁶ Green considers that in the current reality of representative democracy ‘the private citizen is not entirely separated from the work of the government leader or official, but must watch, listen to, or read about such people on a daily basis’. This makes them ‘the audience’ of government, which produces ‘a power-laden division between ruling and being-ruled (Green 2010: 53). However, he doesn’t want to change this situation (indeed doesn’t think it can be changed). He wants to change the power relationship it entails.

The principle of candor forces power-holders out onto the public stage by theorizing nonappearance as undemocratic, no matter how valuable the deeds being achieved (Green 2010: 22).

Yet while Arendt's conception of judgment, as far as it had been worked out, also entailed a suspicion that any project that could not be declared in public might well be a project that would limit freedom, it was not the character of actors that was to be called into question but their actions. Even insincere people might sometimes end up doing the right thing by others, according to Arendt. This does not seem to be a possibility in Green's model.

Green's use of Shakespeare's play Coriolanus as an inspired example of plebiscitary democracy in action and the foundation of his model, however, creates anomalies for his account of plebiscitary democracy. In specifying spectators as the protagonist collectively known as 'The People' who calls out politicians in the same way that Shakespeare's 'citizens' called out Coriolanus and baited him until he lost his self-control, Green places spectators firmly among the 'key actors in the play' (Green 2010: 138). Although the basis for his embrace of spectators is that most politics is experienced through the media, the media disappears in this move, as The People are supposedly in control of the timing of publicity. Since one of those modes of publicity is the Press Conference, the implication is that The People replace the media on the political stage. Yet The People are also 'separated from active engagement' and 'in solitude, in silence, and in a seated position' that renders them 'passive' (Green 2010: 40, 47). It is therefore unclear how they can manage the timing of publicity, particularly when the power of the gaze comes from 'observ[ing] the few without being observed' (Green 2010: 128). This would suggest that his protagonists are not on stage but are a particular kind of permanent, unblinking audience, one that is well versed in the conventions of what Schechner calls the 'minor', orthodox tradition of theatre that developed in the 19th century as a result of the disciplining of spectators (Schechner 1994: xxxvi).

Indeed, Green also reconfigures Weber's 'disciples' and 'charismatic community' through the lens of theatre in such a way as to produce precisely this 'passive', receptive, already constituted and disciplined spectator/citizen body as his weapon in this trial by ordeal, rather than the community generated in interaction with the leader as in Weber. It is nevertheless the leader's task to sustain these spectators 'understood in the threefold sense of having the audience prosper under the leader's attention; doing what is necessary to win and maintain the audience's attention; and, most critically, enduring the surveillance of the public gaze through making candid appearances that are unscripted and unrehearsed' (Green 2010: 148). Green references Weber's chapter 'The Sociology of Charismatic Authority' when he declares that the passive form of recognition is 'in the manner of an audience' (see Green 2010: 148), but Weber does not use the term audience in this chapter, let alone at the point Green indicates. Rather he says '[t]he subjects may extend a more active or passive 'recognition' to the personal mission of the charismatic master. His power rests upon this purely factual recognition and springs from faithful devotion' (Weber 1946: 249).¹⁷

Furthermore, where, for Weber, charismatic leaders attained and maintained their power because of their capacity to promise and deliver change, no such requirement is made of Green's political elite. They are to be judged by their candor not by their actions. This reading thus gives Weber's recognition a twist. It is no longer a reciprocal condition of the relationship between leader and disciples but a weapon of an already constituted community that has the power to grant it to leaders provided they are willing to subject themselves to the demand for self-disclosure. The object of popular power remains the leader, as in Weber, but the source of that power is already constituted and the demand of that power is now deeply personal. Not only must charismatic leaders appear in public as a condition of charisma, but they must subject themselves to what amounts to a trial designed to reveal their sincerity. Publicity collapses into theatre, for the charismatic leader becomes a character behind which is a 'real' person whose qualities spectators can demand to see. What is an aspiration for many performers in the theatre – that spectators see them rather than the character they are playing in order to close the representational gap (Blau 1989a: 257) – becomes a demand imposed on all political actors by The People.

¹⁷ Similarly, Weber does not use the term audience in the more expanded version of his treatment of charisma as it appears in Economy and Society (Weber 1978/1914: 241-245).

Green claims his model overcomes representation because political leaders are forced to appear as they are, not as they would like to be seen. This supposedly undermines attempts at propaganda and scene-setting. However, as theatre demonstrates, as Robespierre discovered, and as Goffman's work reveals, appearance always gets in the way, whether whatever lies 'behind' is thought to be some essential self or some kind of work in progress constituted through appearance. As a model of theatre then, Green's scenario could be said to represent a performer's worst nightmare. Being on-stage all the time, without preparation or support, and subject to the whims of disbelieving onlookers who are seated, silent and permanently present is as horrifying as trying to perform before spectators who are primed to attack (Schechner 1994; Woodruff 2008: 6). Acting is 'one of the most difficult and cruel of artistic activities' (Wilder 2008/1941: 261) but while 'constant observation of oneself is tortuous' (Seneca (4BCE-65CE) On Tranquillity 17.1 in Bartsch 2006: 210), the silence of spectators is appalling (Blau 1986: 38). Even Diderot, the champion of absorption and inventor of 'the fourth wall' in the theatre, did not go this far.¹⁸

For Green, however, this is the price elites must pay for the power they wish to wield. Thus he reverses the connection between sympathy and moral judgment noted by Kant in spectators of the French Revolution. Spectators of that event 'expressed universal yet disinterested sympathy' for 'those who had fixed their gaze on the rights of the people to which they belonged' even though they had not 'the slightest intention of actively participating in their affairs'. From this he deduced that 'men' possessed a 'moral character, or at least the makings of one' (Kant 1991/1798) since they seemed capable of caring for the aspirations of those engaged in a struggle to realize their beliefs and, although unwilling to help them, encouraged and admired them. Plebiscitary democracy, however, imposes a moral principle on actors and ‘from this, deduces the value of the [political] event’ (Green 2010: 19).

¹⁸ See Chapter 7. Diderot required actors to act as if spectators were simply the 'fourth wall' of a room.

In plebiscitary democracy the goodwill and ‘fellow-feeling’ that is normally extended by spectators to performers in the course of an event, most commonly referred to in theatre as ‘the willing suspension of disbelief’, is withheld until the event is over. Theatre theory, the use of the theatre metaphor, and Sartre’s and Goffman’s accounts of life lived under the scrutiny of others all indicate that this is a sadistic requirement to impose on actors. Not only are they exposed, in the first scenario they are unable to protect themselves and in the second they have no way of gauging how they are coming across, for this audience is not so much passive, as Green claims, but impassive. To perform under conditions of such extreme vulnerability has proven impossible for even trained theatre performers to sustain (Schechner 1994: 44-5). Eventually they retreat to less vulnerable positions. Indeed, invisibility has come to be seen as desirable for performance artists precisely because of the impact of the gaze (Phelan 1993). It is hard to imagine even the most power-hungry political actor being able to sustain such exposure. To perform ‘naturally’ requires training:

All of our acts, even the simplest ... become strained when we appear ... before a public ... That it is why it is necessary to correct ourselves and learn again how to walk, sit, or lie down. It is essential to re-educate ourselves ... on the stage (Stanislavski 1948/1936: 73).¹⁹

It may not be for nothing then that spectatorship has a bad reputation for ‘what does anyone gain from adding to the shrill discourse that encourages us to view all politicians ... as corrupt and unreliable’ (Flinders 2010: 323) such that they require such a trial?

¹⁹ Margaret Thatcher underwent voice training after criticism that her voice was shrill (Mount in Moss 2008). Tony Abbott considered acting lessons (Brent 2010); Roosevelt employed poets and playwrights to help him craft a ‘Lincolnesque image’ for radio and newsreels (Nimmo and Sanders 1981: 25). Many political actors seek training to help them relax in interviews (Brent 2010).

In any case, Green's model of spectatorship, which he takes to be the situation of most citizens in contemporary mass democracies, ignores what popular theatre, participatory theatre and more recently environmental theatre has long established: the relationship between spectatorship and performance is fluid, shifting, reciprocal and almost infinitely variable (Schechner 1994: xxix; xxxi): '[t]he total passive audience is a figment of the imagination, a practical impossibility; and, as any actor will tell you, the reactions of audiences influence the nature of a performance' (Kershaw 1992: 16). It is not only that 'no one is "just watching"' but that watching is as much a characteristic of performance as it is of spectatorship. Spectatorship may be one's contribution to the action. Performance can also be imposed on other spectators because 'visually, at least, [they] are part of the performance' for other spectators (Schechner 1994: 18). This is why life can seem to be like theatre and why Arendt wanted to draw a distinction between spectatorship in general, 'blinded' spectatorship that is focused on the experiencing self and reflective spectatorship that seeks to contextualize and understand (Arendt 1978/1971 II: 76). 'Performances' in everyday life are multi-focal in that many are going on at once and spectators have to select which they will watch. They are also local-focused: 'only a fraction' of spectators can see and hear them (Schechner 1994: xxxvii). These are the conditions of everyday spectatorship that Schechner's environmental theater attempts to emulate. They are also the implications of the theatre metaphor.

The requirement to 'authenticate' oneself by displaying one's personal qualities could be considered a 'corrosive' form of Puritanism (Sennett 1978: 11). The Puritan thread underlying Green's use of theatre to allow spectators to keep performers on their toes becomes apparent when Cotton Mather's c1685 Puritan version of the theatre metaphor is mapped onto his proposal. Green's political theatre is specifically designed to eliminate 'An affectation of displaying ones gifts before Throngs' for applause. Rather than politicians engaging in 'abominably proud Fishing for popular Applause', they are to be ready to 'acquit [themselves] well, in the Discharge of the Duties incumbent on [them]', thereby revealing themselves to be sincere (or not) when placed under the 'All-Seeing Eye’ of a peremptory citizenship.²⁰ If the ‘pervasive feeling of surveillance’ by spectators generated by the design of Australia’s new Parliament House leads to politicians absenting themselves from restricted public places such as the Members’ Hall (Warden 1995: 59), what chance is there that many will want to expose themselves, unprepared, to the much more punitive impromptu test of candour from a mass of spectators? What is more likely is that those leaders who already have the ability to manage impromptu scrutiny will come to dominate, or that aspiring leaders will seek out training in order to help them project sincerity, thereby undermining the point of the test of candour. As the French Revolution demonstrated, the desire to ‘unmask’ is a desire that can never be satisfied (Arendt 1973: 86).

The Pleasures of Spectatorship

The theatre metaphor allows its users to take up a position outside and detached from the phenomenon being described. They use this detachment to ‘turn the spotlight’ (Van Onselen 2008: 56) onto political actors from a distance while withholding the same opportunities to those actors. Green implicitly takes up this external position when he says that ‘the People’s control of the means of publicity is a negative ideal: it is realized not in the People’s actual direction of the precise conditions under which leaders appear ... but rather in leaders not controlling these conditions’ (Green 2010: 130). While Green’s explicit recognition of spectators reinstates political theatre as an institutionally sanctioned seeing-place in which citizens supposedly affect the timing of what they see, this power of citizen/spectators can’t actually be realised because they can neither use these mechanisms nor control them. This is because, in the end, citizen/spectators are simply another actor on the stage over which a higher power hangs. As a political actor, The People are themselves subjected not just to scrutiny, but to direction by a spectator they, as a character in the plebiscitary drama, cannot acknowledge or challenge, although it is not clear who or what this is. Since both spectators (as ²⁰ The full quote is: ‘An affectation of displaying ones gifts before Throngs, is too often an abominably proud Fishing for popular Applause; but my work in the Pulpitt, must bee, rather to acquit myself well, in the Discharge of the Duties incumbent on mee there, before the All-Seeing Eye of that Majestie, who to mee, shall be Theatre enough’ (quoted in Richards 1991: xi).

The People) and political actors are on-stage, the only possible candidates for such scenic direction must lie outside the drama, perhaps with the metaphor user.

Whose metaphor?

The news media regularly use theatrical metaphors to describe the world of politics. Such invocations of theatre are like pulling out a crucifix against a vampire, proof of our wariness of being suckered. But what about the reporters themselves? Don't they use makeup? Aren't they under hot lights, introduced by theme music and snazzy graphics, reading from scripts, giving us the most dramatic stories they can? (MacKinnon 2005).

Even a cursory glance at the theatre metaphor's history makes it clear that this is a metaphor used by the literate elite – philosophers, intellectuals, journalists, teachers, scientists. It is difficult to get at mundane uses of the metaphor. That it means something to 'ordinary' people is suggested by the occasional clichéd uses in popular media, most often to do with sport. Daily Telegraph sports journalist, Richard Zachariah claimed that inquiries into racing irregularities were 'pure theatre' featuring 'colourful characters'; the Chief Steward was 'the leading star' who 'might as well be Marcel Marceau' for all he said (Zachariah 2006). Still Zachariah himself is hardly an example of ordinariness, as the reference to the French mime Marcel Marceau indicates. A brief survey of contemporary literature produced for popular consumption revealed no use of the metaphor, even in the lead up to an election when some might be expected.²¹

If only the elite are using a metaphor that either implicitly or explicitly positions others, then the metaphor can be considered a way of exercising power against those others. In 1964, Weisinger claimed that the metaphor's 'main ideological implications' were still untreated (Weisinger 1964). Despite its increased use by both the social sciences and in relation to the media, this remains largely the case, with the possible exception of Role Theory.²² Yet every attempt to impose upon reality is a form of projective propositioning that ‘whittles’ reality to fit (Feuer 1955: 332, 338). Spectatorship may be the key to the theatre metaphor, but it is not just anyone’s spectatorship.

²¹ General interest and women's magazines available from a supermarket check-out were tracked for a period of two weeks leading up to the 2007 Federal election. No instances of the theatre metaphor were located. This supports Kaplan's argument that metaphors are tools for persuading the elite as much as tools of the elite (Kaplan 1990).

Given that most contemporary interpretations of the theatre metaphor are derogatory, Borreca suggests that rather than allowing users to see politics as something they can direct from behind the scenes, seeing politics as theatre is more likely to offer metaphor users a way out of political life because the metaphor gives users the illusion that it is possible to be outside the effects and obligations of their political system. By positioning themselves as spectators in a theatre, they can not only withhold recognition, they can simply ‘get up and leave the play’ (Borreca 1993: 71). The fatalism inherent in the metaphor facilitates this. This freedom to completely avoid politics is delusional of course, since to get up and leave a political system is not at all like leaving a theatre. There is no ‘outside’ within a state. Even if one refrains from political action, one will still be affected by politics. But the illusion allows users to cast judgment on political life without having to act to change it or get their ‘hands dirty’ (Van Onselen 2008: 57). Why would spectators basking happily in this position submit to being forced to become actors when they know both the pleasures of looking without obligation and the kind of scrutiny to which actors are subjected? Theorists might also have a stake in maintaining the opposition between participation and spectatorship that is apparent in the metaphor, for it allows them to retain a privileged position in which ‘bodies, behaviours and communications, seen in the cross-hairs of space and time’ become objects to which significance can be attributed by the spectator (Lyon 2007: 8).²³

This suggests that the path to dealing with political spectators does not lie in reconfiguring the theatre of politics so that spectators are some kind of actor. Rather, spectatorship itself should be considered as a component of political life, just as it is a constituting component of theatre. Despite the overwhelming negativity of the theatre metaphor, and despite theatre theory's generally negative view of spectatorship, can theatre itself provide an adequate model for politics that does this? Plato says not, precisely because theatrical spectatorship is a destabilizing force, but times have changed and the sheer size of the modern state and the globalisation of our interests along with the ubiquity of the mass media mean that some kind of politics involving spectatorship is unavoidable.

²² Role Theory is discussed in Chapter 7.

²³ Lyon was talking about how surveillance works ‘by capturing personal data within certain co-ordinates’ (Lyon 2007: 8), but it seems an apt description of how the application of theatre as a multi-dimensional co-ordinate works to allow its users to make out that certain activities have more significance than others.

Many theatre practitioners already claim to practice democratic politics as they engage in their theatrical work, and they direct this work towards spectators. While Dolan's students, concerned with 'political efficacy', see their theatrical activities as 'rehearsing democracy' (Dolan 2001), Love (2002) argues that musical practices can be 'forms of political communication' that can add to and enhance public democratic discourse. The ballet company Chunky Moves claims to have encouraged spectators to explore democracy in its poll-driven production Wanted: ballet for a contemporary democracy (Obarzanek 2003); David Atkins, artistic director of the opening ceremony for the 2000 Sydney Olympics was disappointed that he was unable to include more on reconciliation and multiculturalism in the spectacle (Reade 2002); actor/environmentalist Leonardo DiCaprio's objective is 'to attract young people to listen about [sic] an issue that wasn't being talked about' (in Smith and Ansen 2005: 52). Indeed Di Caprio complains that political activities by theatre people are not taken seriously by political theorists or politicians even though many take on union activities, stand for council and get elected to legislative assemblies as well as attempt to use theatrical strategies for political purposes: 'There's this stigma that's put upon actors that we aren't allowed to be citizens as well – that somehow we're detached from everyday life ... It's as if we're not allowed to have a voice because of some public persona, some label that's been put upon us' (in Smith and Ansen 2005: 52). In fact the cross-overs between theatre and politics are long-standing, albeit under-theorised, particularly amongst activists (Jestrovic 2000; Scalmer 2002; Schlossman 2002). Both politics and the arts involve dissensus – the bringing to visibility the contingent nature of accepted political and artistic divisions (Rancière 2010: 140).

Theatre theorists and practitioners appear to think that theatre can be a viable model or adjunct to democratic politics even though it includes spectatorship. Theatre studies too may be a useful paradigm for theorists of democratic politics because while both theatre and politics entail the management of actor/spectator relationships in order to maintain their legitimacy, theatre is more reflexive about the relationships it generates and depends upon (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 20). Also, theatre, like politics, entails managing tensions between what is envisioned or intended and what can be achieved and between what actors think they are conveying and what spectators perceive and understand. Politics could benefit from the expertise of theatre practitioners in successfully coming to terms with these tensions (Bailey 1996: 793): '[W]e want democracy: theatre can help in this process – why not?' (Boal 1998: 117).

Figure 4.2 Program flyer for WANTED: ballet for a contemporary democracy

In any case, Evreinov argued that 'in the post-Nietzschean world' where there were 'no certainties' (Collins 1973: xxvii-xxviii) there was no longer the option of rejecting theatre. It was theatre or nothing. Only theatre offered a way to deal with the abyss that confronted human life. Seeing life as theatre allowed it to be 'stage-managed' so that it ran smoothly. Therefore, the essence of government was in fact theatre:

Examine any ... branch of human activity and you ... will see that kings, statesmen, politicians, warriors, bankers, business men, priests, doctors, all pay daily tributes to theatricality, all comply with the principles ruling on the stage (Evreinov 1970/1927: 58).

Actors and spectators are complicit in this political theatre just as they are in actual theatre: '[t]he actor is authorized by the audience, the audience by the actor' (Wilshire 1982: 25). Both agree to follow conventions that allow the 'willing suspension of disbelief' because such conventions protect both parties from the 'murderous truth' of the uncontrollability of life and futility of action that 'almost never achieves its purpose' (Arendt 1958: 184):

There exists at the moment of theatrical perception a sort of silent agreement, a sort of tacitus consensus, between the spectator and the player whereby the former undertakes to assume a certain attitude, and not other, toward the 'make believe' of acting, while the latter undertakes to live up to this assumed attitude as best he can (Evreinov 1970/1927).

Theatre allows humans to 'pick out the significant incidents from the chaos of daily happenings and arrange them so that their relation to one another becomes significant, thus changing ... bewildered spectators of monstrous confusion to [people] intelligently conscious of the world and its destinies' (Shaw 2004/1909: 35). This 'essence' of theatre, whether on stage or as a way of facing 'naked' life, rests on a relationship between actors and spectators that might best be understood by considering the French word for attending a performance: assister. Spectators do not merely watch a show they assist in its presentation (Nicoll 1962: 29). However, spectators always have the freedom to look elsewhere (Brockett and Ball 2004: 15; Fischer-Lichte 1997: 20), disrupt a performance or simply leave. A tacitus consensus places upon them an obligation to exercise an ethics of care towards performers by continuing to watch them: '[a] good watcher knows how to care' (Woodruff 2008: 143). In this way, theatre operates under a form of social contract akin to the political one that people entered 'for their comfortable, safe and peaceable living one amongst many' (Locke 1967/1689: II.95). Theatre at its best, then, may well provide a viable model for politics that does not require spectators to sacrifice their position.

Chapter 5: Theatre as a Model for Politics

[T]heater clarifies the world by placing people in a moving architecture that gives ... the consolation (if not the proof) that life has design. But by adding the clarity of design, the playwright may be falsifying life in the very act of presenting it. And yet how else can we know the world except by exploring the models that artists give us? (Simon 2003: 211).

In 1996, Vaclav Havel defended his long-standing belief that politics was theatre. Theatre expressed the experience of politics as a dramatically structured environment with ‘a beginning, middle, and end’. A politics without this structure was unfocused, ‘a castrated, one-legged, toothless politics’ (Havel 1996a) that damaged confidence in the processes of politics and encouraged knee-jerk reactions for short-term gain. What he believed in and worked for was:

[A] politics that knows it matters what comes first and what follows ... that acknowledges that all things have a proper sequence and order ... that realizes that citizens ... know perfectly well whether political actions have a direction, a structure, a logic in time and space, or whether they lack these qualities and are merely haphazard responses to circumstances (Havel 1996b).

This form of politics involves a spectatorship alert to failures in direction, logic and meaningful action that recognizes when politicians have ‘a direction’ and when they are merely reacting. The wide-spread belief in contemporary western politics that politicians of the left particularly have lost their way suggests that the commitment that comes with the idea of having a direction is seen as an important, structuring component of politics and that this provides security for citizens. It is in this sense, too, that action entails promising, as Arendt argues. This does not mean that action will be determined or not have unforeseen consequences but it will have the possibility of establishing some coherence both because spectators will continue to allow actors a space of appearance and because actors will be able to build on previous actions.

Havel's model of politics need not be democratic or liberal. However, many theatre practitioners and theatre metaphor users see theatre as necessarily having 'democratic potential' simply because of the way any performer can play the king. As the theatre metaphor has long indicated, theatre is a public manifestation of the inappropriateness of arguing that some have more right to rule than others. It epitomizes 'the scandal' at the heart of democracy – that there is no natural entitlement to rule (Rancière 2006/2005-49; Urbinati 2005: 196): 'all the people know right well, that he that playeth the sowdayne [sultan] is percase a sowter [shoemaker]' (Thomas More c1513-18: 80-81; cited in West 1999: 260) and that at the end of the show 'all be stript in the tiring house, for none must carry anything out of the stock' (Thomas Middleton (1580-1627) in Vickers 1971: 203). In any case 'all are at last equal in the grave' (Cervantes 1958: II,iii,12). However, spectators allow the sleight of hand that makes one of their fellow-citizens a king in order to enjoy the public benefits it enables. Indeed, they are likely to get annoyed if one of their number tries to spoil the arrangement:

Yet if one should can so little good [be so ignorant] to show out of seasonne what acquaintance he hath with him, and calle him by his owne name whyle he standeth in his magestie, one of his tormenters might hap to breake his head, and worthy for marring of the play (More c1513-18: 80-81; cited in West 1999: 260).

Theatre thus provides a model of democracy that allows for hierarchical representation but only conditionally. The elevation of position is not permanent but the public will support it as long as they believe they continue to benefit from it.¹

¹ This argument conveniently ignores the hierarchy which operates in theatre. The fact is that the best actors get the best parts, although the best part may be that of a servant as much as a king, and the 'star' system guarantees that stars get more of just about everything than spear-carriers in all but the most communitarian forms of theatre.

Because theatre generates ‘an implied community’ amongst assembled but disparate spectators for the period of the performance, Reinelt considers that it operates as an important ‘corrective’ to liberal politics while not fully endorsing a communitarian position. Theatre therefore also offers an ideal democratic site that avoids the extremes of individualism and communitarianism, a place where ‘liberal-minded people asking liberal humanist questions [can] gather together in a social ritual’ of democracy in practice. Like a town meeting, this model for democracy would serve ‘no permanent social function’ or ‘fixed notion of the common good’. Rather these things would be worked out through engagement at each performance site as actors and spectators worked together to identify ‘opportunities for imaginative mimesis, simulation, or transformation’ designed to find ways to come to terms with the ‘political/ontological/social/cultural crises’ of their time (Reinelt 1998: 284-7).

What Makes a Viable Model?

A promising model is one with implications rich enough to suggest novel hypotheses and speculations in the primary field of investigation. (Black 1962: 231)

A model offers a ‘round about’ way of investigating a phenomenon that resists a more direct approach. It is ‘a framework for understanding’ (Howard 2005: 3) that provides ‘a lens’ to enable us ‘to see new connections’ and ‘reveal new relationships’ so that we can talk about a phenomenon in a different way (Black 1962: 229, 236-9).² All models have their beginnings in metaphor (Black 1962: 219; Brown 1977: 111; Mangham and Overington 1987), although many complex metaphors do not work as models. Their power comes instead from their ability to evoke an image, irrespective of whether or not that image is subsequently ‘put to cognitive work’ (Cooper 1986: 149). But other metaphors are capable of working as models because they are ‘open to multiple possible actualizations’ (Blumenberg 1997: 11). The theatre metaphor is certainly capable of evoking images of politics. It remains to be seen whether it can be a model that opens up politics.

² Hence, there is a connection between models and discourse. Discourse could be said to be a reification of a model so that theoretical speculations get taken up as if the world was really as described, with the subsequent development and institutionalisation of policies and practices according to this assumption.

According to Black there are five conditions for the use of theoretical models:

- there has to be an original field of investigation in which some facts have been established but that needs ‘further mastery’
- there has to be a relatively unproblematic, more familiar or better organized secondary domain that offers some insight
- these fields have to be structurally similar: ‘the key is the identity of structure’.³
- there have to be some ‘rules of correlation’ so that statements about the secondary field can be translated into statements about the original field
- inferences should be capable of being checked against known data from the original field (Black 1962: 231)

If these conditions are present, useful insights can occur even if both fields are abstract. The key condition is that the secondary domain is better known than the first. A model yields results because it allows users to draw on what they already know (Black 1962: 231-6; Myers 1966: 396). These caveats are important because models have their drawbacks. They can be used to avoid thinking, producing merely ‘a strained and artificial description’ of the original field (Black 1962: 237). They can ‘ascribe non-inherent features and dynamics to phenomena’ and over-emphasise similarities at the expense of dissimilarities (Bailey 1996; Ortony 1993/1979) and at the expense of knowledge (Dewey 1969: 307). They can beguile their users into forgetting that they are just models (Geertz 1980: 172), entice them into conflating description and prescription (Howard 2005: 10) or simply create a ‘vicious circularity’ (Myers 1966).⁴ Nevertheless, Mount considers that theatre makes a better paradigm for understanding politics than any other currently available (for example, war or pilgrimage) because theatre is the only paradigm that properly recognizes that politics' relationship with its public lies in satisfying that public (Mount 1972: 9). Theatre, unlike other models of politics, provides a recognized position for spectators.

³ An ‘essential structural relation is necessary for any particular metaphorical activity to take place’ (Pearce 1980: 43).

⁴ Viciously circular metaphors are self-referring e.g. life is drama because life is dramatic. They shed little if any light on either term (Myers 1966)

However, the often muddled and even more often clichéd uses of theatre as a metaphor suggests that theatre as a model, even if it manages to meet Black's five conditions, might suffer from all of the negatives attributed to models. Certainly the metaphor is beguiling. The slide from seeing politics as if it was theatre to seeing politics as being theatre occurs so often that it is hardly noticed, as is the collapse of theatre into drama and actors into the characters they portray. Even though 'a coughing, hacking, sneezing, rasping audience may unsettle [the actor] Richard Burton [while] it can never disturb Hamlet' (Natanson 1976: 47), discussions of Burton easily become discussions of Hamlet and vice versa. The conflation of description and prescription is also evident, particularly in relation to dramaturgy. Thus the theatre metaphor, while pervasive, has the capacity to seriously distort the phenomena to which it is applied (Borreca 1993; Dewey 1969; Geertz 1980). Like Freud's iceberg metaphor, it can hide much more than it reveals so that less rather than more of the phenomenon to be explained is seen (Dewey 1969: 308).

Theatre is also not a 'relatively unproblematic' domain. It is arguably even less known than politics. It also does not, at least currently, share the same structure as politics. Unlike politics, theatre operates with two 'realities' – theatre as a practice and a place involving practitioners and spectators, and the autonomous dramatic artefact generated by practitioners to show to spectators. States (1994: 20) suggests thinking of this as a hologram as a way of coming to grips with this elusive, ephemeral but nevertheless real entity, but this is misleading. The artefact has an existence in its own right, like a bubble once released from the instrument and breath that generated it. Political symbolism, arguably the closest politics gets to such an entity, never achieves this independent status. Once free of its connections it ceases to be specifically political since symbols in themselves do not mean anything (Sperber 1975: 50), whereas the theatrical creation is seen to be the 'essence' of theatre.

Rules of correlation might also prove a stumbling-block. While theatre and politics seem to share many characteristics, there are some things that a liberal democratic politics must do that theatre does not and perhaps must not do in order to be what it is. Whitebrook (1996: 42) lists four things such a politics must offer that art need not or perhaps cannot offer if it wishes to retain its specific identity as art:

1. accountability
2. justification
3. prudence
4. responsibility

As in the ‘narrative turn’ in which political life is seen as a story, a ‘theatrical turn’ can too readily assume that politics can be made to fit the simple beginning-middle-end sequencing of story-telling or play-making while ignoring questions of authorship, voice and closure (Whitebrook 1996: 40).⁵ Who shapes the theatre of politics, and for what purpose? What elements are left out and what elements are made contiguous? Unless these questions can be answered, fundamental political questions regarding authority and legitimacy will be ignored. So too will be the overwhelmingly individualistic viewpoint that creates a play even when it purports to portray multiple points of view.⁶ In the theatre what we see is not different people behaving according to different points of view and beliefs, but impersonations of apparently different people expressing what an author or director thinks are different perspectives. Theorists who draw on theatre as a model ‘cannot claim to be innocent observers’ or mere story-tellers any more than

⁵ The current cult of closure whereby people affected by any kind of traumatic or disturbing event are immediately offered counseling in order to achieve it, is a disturbing consequence of thinking of life as a play or story. One cannot cease to experience something already experienced in the way that an actor can cease to ‘experience’ what a character goes through when a production ends. All one can do is change how one continues to experience one’s past.

⁶ This ‘single consciousness’ which lies behind most novels and plays has been recognized in a recent production of Shakespeare’s Macbeth as a one-man show, Stephen Dillane’s Macbeth: A Modern Ecstasy. The show is premised on the fact that Macbeth in fact speaks more than a third of the play himself, while the rest can be seen as though emanating from his consciousness. Very little of the original text had to be cut to be presented in this way despite the original play’s forty odd characters (Waites 2006: 65), highlighting Whitebrook’s point that authorship is a critical but often hidden dimension of theatre, whether taken literally or figuratively.

theatre makers can. Too many decisions occur before a show is seen by spectators (Apter 2006: 222; Bennett 1997; Seymour 1996: 8).⁷

Theatre as a better known ‘secondary domain’

For a substantial part of its history the practice of theatre has been largely theorised by theorists from fields other than theatre itself: history, mathematics, astronomy, philosophy, sociology, political theory, education, medicine, journalism, cultural theory, literature studies and practice, academia of various kinds, law and psychology.⁸ Table 5.1 displays this phenomenon.

Period	Practitioner	Non-Practitioner	Unknown	Practitioner %	Non-Practitioner %
400BCE-1CE	3	9	2	21	64
1CE-1200	2	18	1	9	86
1201-1500	1	6	-	14	86
1501-1600	19	45	-	30	70
1601-1700	25	30	3	43	53
1701-1800	36	35	1	50	49
1801-1900	50	56	1	48	52
1901-1914	28	18	1	59	38
1915-1917	1	4	-	20	80
1918-1939	40	22	1	63	39
1940-1945	6	6	-	50	50
1946-1959	21	25	-	45	54
1960-1979	54	69	3	43	55
1980-1989	6	27	-	18	82
1990-2008	56	54	2	50	48
Overall	348	425	15	44	54

Table 5.1 Practitioner/non-practitioner theorists of theatre

Theatre theory has been written ‘from the point of view of grammarians and philosophers’ rather than from the point of view of ‘how to succeed in the theatre’ (Corneille 1991/1660: 237), by ‘drones, who do not know how to make the honey that they steal from productive bees’ (de Molina 1991/1624: 207-8) but create rules and principles for practitioners that ignore the affective aspects of theatre (Beaumarchais 1994/1767: 128). Much theatre theory overlooks the ‘thick’ nature of theatre practice’ (Meyrick 2003: 231). Consequently it ‘has no practical application’ (Kirby 1976b: 1).

⁷ Whitebrook particularly targets Richard Rorty, Charles Taylor, Alasdair MacIntyre, Iris Murdoch and Martha Nussbaum, arguing that all have agendas for taking ‘the narrative turn’ without considering the full implications of the idea of life as narrative. For Rorty the narrative turn was part of a quest for ‘liberal hope’. For Taylor and MacIntyre it was a quest for order. For Murdoch it was a quest to regain an other-centred way of thinking, one which recognizes the complexity of life and values truth rather than sincerity, and for Nussbaum it was part of a quest for the recognition of role of emotion and particularity in politics. All are reasonable aims, but ignore the specific circumstances by which life can come to be seen as a story, in particular the presence of a controlling author who is situated outside it and determines when and how it ends (Whitebrook 1996: 33-38).

⁸ See Appendix D for details. Theorists have been identified in a similar way to the users of the theatre metaphor: by long-standing association with a field, by disciplinary association or by profession.

The key issues that engaged theorists historically were almost all to do with the crafting of drama understood as literature. Even at the height of the so-called ‘participatory’ and performance revolutions (1960s to 1980s), when efforts were being made to include spectators as participants in the ‘newly discovered’ art of performance and when semiotics supposedly ‘rediscovered’ spectators (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 240), playwrighting still constituted the major focus of theatre theory. The term theatre was not even mentioned as a book title until 1657. Even now a title search using the word theatre would produce only about a quarter of all available material.⁹ If ‘[h]ow well we understand [A as B] has something to do with how well we understand B to begin with (Schon 1993/1979: 148), then it is difficult to see how much theatre theory, at any rate, can illuminate politics.

What kind of theatre?

One of the first distinctions many theorists of theatre and users of theatre as a metaphor make about theatre is the distinction between theatre and ‘mere entertainment’. At the heart of this distinction is the idea that theatre has or ought to have something significant to say about reality from which spectators can learn, whilst mere entertainment is escapism or a ‘distraction’ from reality (Wilshire 1982: 5).¹⁰ Theatre is ‘a moral institution’ (Schiller 1994/1784), an instrument of instruction (Castelvetto 1991/1570: 131; Trumbull 1998-2006). It ought to have an enlightening effect (Brecht 1992/1949; 2000/1930; Lessing 1994/1767-9).¹¹

⁹ The first was D’Aubignac’s La Pratique du theatre (1657), which appeared in English as The Whole Art of the Stage. The second was Riccoboni’s Historical and Critical Account of the Theatre in Europe (1741). Most publications referred to ‘poetry’, ‘tragedy’ or the titles of plays. (See Appendix D).

¹⁰ Wilshire acknowledges that it might be possible to ‘learn something about human beings’ from escapist entertainment provided spectators recognize that they are being encouraged to be distracted from recognition but on the whole seems to think this is unlikely. What we are meant to learn from real theatre is ‘something about the conditions of our own identity as selves’ (Wilshire 1982: 44).

It is not just 'serious' theatre that carries this heavy load. What constitutes popular theatre has been redefined by theorists to meet this 'drive to enlighten' (Barker 1998/1990: 56). Popular theatre is no longer theatre that attracts large numbers of spectators (Hamilton 1910): 'The mere presence of the people is not sufficient to verify the classification of a show as 'popular' (Boal 1998: 228). It must be community-based and heavily focused on participation and mutual learning. There is apparently only one 'genuine' form of popular theatre that meets the moral role of 'real' theatre: theatre 'in which the people ... themselves ... make the theatre rather than receiving it as consumers' (Boal 1998: 211-234).

This understanding of popular theatre forms the basis of Boal's Legislative Theatre, which aims to foster participatory, interactive democracy and thereby transform voters from spectators into actors:

We do not accept that the elector should be a mere spectator to the actions of the parliamentarian, even when these actions are right: we want the electors to give their opinions, to discuss the issues, to put counter-arguments, we want them to share the responsibility for what the parliamentarian does (Boal 1998: 20).

Created after Boal was elected to the Brazilian parliament in 1992, Legislative Theatre is a development of Boal's Theatre of the Oppressed. Its strategies include 'The Chamber in the Square' – a 'mock-parliament' held in a public square in which legislative questions are publicly discussed and debated by political actors and citizen/spectators and in which 'participants not only vote but must also explain their positions' (Boal 1998: 93). These public debates then influence Boal's vote in the national legislature (Fortier 2002: 212). In this way theatre becomes ‘one of the ways in which political activity can be conducted’ (Boal 1998: 20), albeit along the lines of Habermas’ communicative action.

¹¹ Many theorists who subscribe to this view single out as exemplary the plays of Brecht which explicitly aimed 'to teach the spectator a quite definite practical attitude, directed towards changing the world' (Willett 1959: 176-8), although there is no evidence that Brecht's spectators actually did go out and change the world. Nicoll believes that this obsession with educating spectators has resulted in spectators no longer going to the theatre (Nicoll 1962: 188).

What drives Boal’s work is the desire to ‘restore’ what he sees as theatre’s original form – ‘a celebration of an entire people’ – in which spectators were also actors. Spectators have lost this capacity to act because Aristotle had turned theatre into ‘the most perfect artistic form of coercion’ – a ‘powerful poetic-political system for intimidation of the spectator [and] for elimination of the ‘bad’ or illegal tendencies of the audience’.¹² Under these conditions spectators were denied the opportunity to affect the course of the action. In order to retain some sense of involvement and control, spectators came to identify themselves with the characters instead of with the actors. Encouraged to feel ‘as if he himself is acting – [each] enjoys the pleasures and suffers the misfortunes of the character’ (Boal 2000/1974: 465) not realising that this self-directed experience actually isolates them from the actors, from fellow spectators and from their own ability to still influence outcomes. This results in the ‘dehumanization’ of man: actors become characters who exist outside history and life, unable to be influenced by or influence their fate; spectators become self-absorbed and immobilised. Theatre of the Oppressed and Legislative Theatre were attempts at reversing this situation. They encouraged spectators to assume ‘the protagonistic role’ themselves so that they could challenge the dramatic action, try out solutions and discuss plans for change. When the spectator ‘no longer delegates power to the characters whether to think or act in his place’ but ‘thinks and acts for himself!’ (Boal 2000/1974: 473), theatre becomes a ‘rehearsal for revolution’ (Boal 2008/1974: 396) not just for theatre but also for a politics in which all are actors.

Boal’s work has become ‘a manifesto for revolutionary and socially conscious theatre’ and transgressive politics throughout the world (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 582). It is seen as ‘psycho-therapeutic as well as political in its orientation and impact' (Gerould 2000: 463) and could be seen to epitomise the engagement and resulting efficacy claimed for participatory politics that also wants to convert spectators into actors. But some actors engaged in politically charged theatre, like Latin American performance artist Coco Fusco, argue that Boal's model of theatrical politics acts as a 'straitjacket' for performers who do not engage in politics in this dialogic way, who do not endorse the leftist and essentially Marxist politics of oppression, or who do not wish to engage in politics through their artistic work. For these actors Boal's work has itself become a form of oppression as minority artists find their performances judged according to expectations relating to this kind of critical theatre/politics, limiting their own political and aesthetic expression:

¹² Classical scholars Ober (1989) and Hesk (1999) both argue that Greek theatre was originally used to train the ordinary citizen to accept the rule of elites, who were required to perform the ‘dramatic fiction’ of being ‘common men’ and ‘voice their solidarity with egalitarian ideals’ with which they were not in sympathy (Ober 1989: 190-1). This, in turn, ‘policed the political ambitions of the elite’ so that Athens could benefit from having educated men serving the state, without having to worry about their tendency to want to form an oligarchy (Hesk 1999: 208).

Too many Latin Americans have suffered at the hands of authoritarian systems that reduce all forms of expression – public, private, religious or aesthetic – to a certain political value of meaning for there not to be an enormous amount of scepticism about such approaches to culture ... the reality is that many Latin American artists' primary spectator consists of their peers, other intellectuals, and spectators that do not respond receptively to what they perceive as outdated and dogmatic paradigms (Fusco 2000: 4).

Nevertheless community-based popular theatre that allows people to 'tell their stories' has, since the 1980s, become 'a named genre' with 'a large degree of acceptability and wide public interest' (Salverson 1996: 181). Popular theatre as 'performance created by the people, for the people, with the people, about existential issues they face [carried out] within informal environments, away from elitist control and censure' (Noble 2005: 47), like political participation, is seen as 'efficacious' (Kattwinkel 2003: xiii): it provides vital, engaging and 'indisputable learning' opportunities for both performers and spectators (Salverson 1996: 181). However, while the aim is to engage spectators 'actively', it is clear who is in the driving seat from the list of strategies used by practitioners who have contributed to Kattwinkel's book on 'audience' participation: ask questions of the audience, include some spectators on the stage, encourage vocal response, 'choose audiences carefully'; 'individualise' spectators, 'leave space' for audiences to do something; ‘move into public spaces and create an atmosphere of “community project” rather than performance’ in order to ‘generate “communitas”’ (Kattwinkel 2003: x); encourage activity rather than ‘passivity’; undermine traditional theatre experience and behaviour; encourage a connection with themselves as performers and ‘mobilize for political action’ (Kattwinkel 2003: xi). What this redefinition does, apart from disguise its drivers, is deny ‘theaters which wish to serve simply as “pleasurable stimuli” ... the right of existence’ (Passow 1981: 251) while at the same time denying that spectatorship itself has any value for either theatre or politics. Blau (1989) and Schechner claim that these practices are no longer theatre. Rather ‘[t]heater people are moving into areas once occupied mostly by practitioners of religion and politics’ (Schechner 1988: 146), and using theatrical techniques.¹³

The desire to educate theatre spectators mirrors the desire of participation theorists to convince citizens that they will find political participation rewarding and beneficial if only they’d embrace it. According to Barker, it is ‘shamelessly ambitious’ and paternalistic. Theatre is not about truth, teaching or any other of the ‘platitudes’ theorists use to justify what they do in order to counter accusations of self-indulgence or dilettantism. Theatre is simply ‘play’ in which the question ‘What if ...?’ can be posed and responded to (Barker 1998/1990: 56). This is its power, which is why it has been the subject of censorship and bans throughout its history. Spectators come to the theatre ‘for what [they] cannot obtain elsewhere in any other forum ... for the false ... for the speculative and the unproven’ where ‘there is no burden of proof at any moment’ (Barker 1998/1990: 56) and no requirement to bear the responsibility of apparent consequences: ‘we play for the sake of recreation’ (Gadamer 1984: 91). Rewriting the function of theatre in the way participation enthusiasts have simply reveals a distrust of spectators’ ability to make something of what they see and to share a space of play amicably with unknown others (Barker 1998/1990: 57).

¹³ Schechner, unlike Blau, sees this as a good thing. Certainly one cannot argue with the desire to use theatrical techniques for a variety of purposes, but is it still ‘theatre’? Schechner’s rejection of theatre and move to ‘performance’ is perhaps the clearest indication that it isn’t. The easy conflation of theatre and ritual in this kind of theatre is also problematic. Although it has been a long-standing belief that theatre originated in religious ritual, this belief has recently been called into question (Egginton 2003; Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 8). It is now believed that theatre arose from oratory and/or choral competitions and that the idea of theatre as ritual originated with English anthropologist Gilbert Murray.

However, theatre as play poses problems for a model for politics based on theatre because one thing politics is not to those engaged in it is play. Nor should it be, since, unlike theatre, politics has the capacity to affect ‘the living conditions of large numbers over long periods of time’ (Merelman 1976/1969: 285) and is accountable for those effects. Political activity may use playful means in order to achieve its ends. The 2000 Serbian revolution was described by one journalist as ‘the first regime overthrown by buffoonery’ because of the ingenious use of theatrical strategies by actor/activists (Jestrovic 2000).¹⁴ But politics can never be just play.

One of the problems Plato had with theatre was precisely that spectators did learn from theatre, but learnt the wrong things. Subsequent philosopher/theorists who wish to retain theatre in spite of this problem and who do not want to admit theatre as simply ‘play’ have been obliged to demonstrate that theatre provides positive lessons as well, although few go as far as Krasner in suggesting that theatre’s link with entertainment is in fact an aberration. Krasner argues that since theatre and theory share an etymological root in thea, theatre has ‘traditionally provided a forum of intellectual engagement and philosophical exchange’ (Krasner 2008: 1). This argument must be seen as a strategic move to ‘save’ theatre-loving philosophy since Plato’s adoption of theatre on behalf of philosophy through his use of theoria post-dated theatre by at least 150 years. As a consequence of this kind of move, however, ‘classical’ theatre (Greek tragedies and Shakespeare), avant-garde and experimental theatre, including street theatre, community theatre, political theatre and Brechtian theatre – unlike mere entertainment – apparently all aim ‘to illuminate the ungifted ... correct[] the prejudiced, and ... instruct[] the herd’ (Barker 1998/1990: 56).

¹⁴ For instance, the ‘protest farce’, Broken Cars, was a response to an official proclamation insisting that the thousands of police who were detailed to protest locations were there simply to direct traffic. Protesters drove their cars to the site and ‘broke down’ and then attempted to ‘repair’ their cars using a variety of farcical methods, including asking the assistance of nearby police (Jestrovic 2000). Other protest forms involved having photographs taken with the ‘police guardians’, or conducting ‘Reading Sessions’ in which protesters read poetry and books about democracy to the police.

Artists of course are often more than happy to be complicit in this given their traditionally shaky position in society because it elevates their artistic endeavours. Belgian symbolist poet and playwright Georges Rodenbach (1855-1898) argued that art was not created for ‘the people’. It was too complex and subtle, essentially aristocratic. What was needed was ‘a parody of art’ for the people, something that was ‘a means of propaganda’ (in Carlson 1984: 315). Rodenbach’s distinction makes it clear that the insistence on the efficacy of drama has always been based on a particular view of particular kinds of spectators. Thus the question of what kind of theatre should be a model for politics is ‘not a matter of indifference’ (Gran 2002: 254).

As can be seen in Table 5.2 below, few users of the theatre metaphor mean avant-garde theatre, street theatre, community theatre, political theatre or Brechtian theatre when they invoke theatre as a metaphor for politics, but few mean popular mainstream or commercial theatre either. MacIntyre (1981: 26) used Japanese Nōh, to describe bureaucrats as stock characters that determined ‘the possibilities of plot and action’ in social and political life. Green (2010), Mangham and Overington (1987), Wilshire (1982) and Simmel (1976/1912) favour Shakespeare, as do many clichéd and cynical versions of the metaphor.¹⁵ A handful specify ‘entertainment’, the kind of theatre that most theorists in both theatre theory and metaphor seem to despise but that Goffman found so fruitful.¹⁶ Woodruff claims such theatre is not real theatre but ‘productions that ape film in their use of sound, montage, and illusion’ and to which only ‘tourists ... flock to’.

¹⁵ Green favours Coriolanus, Mangham and Overington Richard III, Wilshire and Simmel Hamlet. Wilshire adds Sophocles’ Oedipus Rex and Becket’s Waiting for Godot – the three plays incorporate his idea of theatre’s ‘essence’ – ‘involvement and identification’ (Wilshire 1982: 43). Simmel uses Hamlet as part of an argument for an organic rather than a mechanistic understanding of the world, which he says is ‘a distinctively modern way of understanding the modern world’ (Simmel 1976/1912: 61). Mangham and Overington further limit theatre when they define it as a formal production during which spectators play close attention (unlike many of Shakespeare’s spectators). Apter (2006) refers to several Shakespearean plays and T.S. Eliot’s Murder in the Cathedral.

¹⁶ Mangham and Overington (1987), like Wilshire, are very critical of Goffman’s use of the theatre metaphor, claiming that it is so banal that it shows that he never went near a theatre (1987: 201n5), but if the theorist has in mind the kind of ‘real’ theatre that very few attend, how does this affect the value of their metaphorical insight, and to whom is it directed? Australian Bureau of Statistics figures for 2005-6 indicate that some 17% of Australians attended ‘theatre performances’. Theatre performances include both ‘classical’ theatre such as that used by Mangham and Overington and Wilshire as well as ‘blockbuster’ productions such as those put on by Cirque du Soleil. However, some 53% of this 17% were repeat visits. The actual percentage of those attending all ‘theatre performances’ is likely to be less than 10% (ABS 2007), compared to the 65% who attended the cinema. ‘Whose metaphor is this?’ is a crucial question (Kirmayer 1992: 340).

But at the same time, he wants to argue that real theatre is a very broad ‘cultural practice’ that encompasses Greek tragedy and American college football, ‘[w]eddings, funerals ... street dancing, church services’ because all are ‘powerful creators for community’ (Woodruff 2008: 11-17). What determines what theatre is, then, comes down to what aspect of theatre a theorist privileges.

What kind of theatre does the metaphor specify?	Number specified	Specified %	First Mention	Last Mention
Tragedy	39	31	c300BCE	2008
Comedy	22	17	c300BCE	2009
Tragicomedy	10	8	1599	1972
Theatre of the Absurd	7	5	1959	2007
Opera	2	2	1995	2007
Farce	12	9	c1CE	2009
Melodrama	10	8	1965	2007
Soap opera	2	2	2007	2008
Entertainment	11	9	c100CE	2002
Vaudeville	2	2	1985	2008
Pantomime	2	2	1791	2006
Puppet show	7	5	c300BCE	2003
Total Specified	126	100

Table 5.2 What kind of theatre?¹⁷

Political communication analyst John Combs claims that there are three types of ‘drama’ appropriate to politics: ‘the theater of heroism [tragedy], the theater of realism [melodrama] and the theater of the absurd [comedy]’. All are ‘an “imitation of life”’ that dramatizes ‘man’s attempt to come to grips with himself and the world’ (Combs 1980: 198), but each has a different purpose. Thinking of politics as tragedy ‘permits us to cope better with historical tragedy’. Thinking of politics as melodrama is optimistic: we see it as ‘the enactment of rational and democratic planning, designed to preserve good order and realize good projects’ (and in which evil always gets its comeuppance). On the other hand, ‘a comic perspective on politics permits us to make light of the drama endlessly unfolding before us ... and teaches us not to take politics ... too seriously’:

If we see ourselves as part of a grand comedy, we can enter the political stage with wit and grace, make the best of a bad show, and exit laughing. After all, it may be that the joke's on us (Combs 1980: 199).

¹⁷ See Appendix A Table 7 for list of users who specify these genres.

It is hard to tell from these descriptions what Combs means by either theatre or politics: at times we are spectators of the 'drama/theatre', at other times we are actors and possibly playwrights. As a model for politics, then, is he talking about a form of politics in which sometimes 'we' act, sometimes 'we' watch and sometimes 'we' authorize what others do? This sounds like Arendt's understanding of politics – a model of politics with which many disagree strongly or consider under-theorised. It could also be a form of strong communitarianism. But at the same time, who are 'we'? Unlike Arendt, we don't seem to take politics very seriously as we sit on the sidelines wearing 'the dramatic "pair of glasses" so we can say 'I see it. I really see it' (Combs 1980: 1-17).

Although generic terms such as 'the stage', 'the drama' or 'the theatre' are what most users talk about when they use the metaphor, as if everyone understands what they imply, where a genre is specified, tragedy is more often than not the genre specified in the records located for this study.¹⁸ Overall however, even omitting entertainment, melodrama, soap opera and theatre of the absurd, comic theatre (comedy, tragicomedy, farce, vaudeville, pantomime and puppetry) is the more favoured general model. The predominance of genres that are likely to make us laugh certainly indicates that many metaphor users think politics should not or cannot be taken too seriously.

Possible Models from Theatre

Models of theatre are not common in theatre theory largely because it is devoted to drama. Existing models are almost always triadic, although the components of the relationship vary. A tri-partite relationship seems to be inescapable for politics however it is conceived, for without it the purpose of politics seems to be lost. Even if politics is reduced to power, as some contemporary conceptions have it, there still needs to be something over which power is to be exercised, someone to exercise it and some purpose for which power is exercised. Foucault, for instance, suggested a power relationship in which sovereignty, discipline and government combined to manage a population (Foucault 1991/1978: 102). Despite his famous use of the Panopticon as a metaphor for a disciplinary power that took the shape of a central tower apparently watching all that surrounded it (Foucault 1991/1977), his tri-partite conception of governmentality places power along the three sides of a bounded population, with its focus on the population. If ‘conceptions of the world ... bear the power of signification’ (Clegg 1997: 21), then the relationship of governed to government must always include a third term that seems to lie somewhere along a continuum from force to popular will. In democratic forms of government the relationship is with popular will, and seems to hinge on representation. Any appropriate model of theatre should therefore consist of three terms. Participatory theatre that collapses watching into doing, thereby making showing incoherent, would not fit this requirement.

¹⁸ There were short periods in theatre theory when drama was seen as a specific genre, different to tragedy or comedy, but drama has predominantly been taken as a generic term, especially amongst metaphor users.

Aristotle

Aristotle saw the theatre relationship as based on a division between praxis, poeisis and theoria, a division that could be loosely translated as doing, making/showing (the product the doer ends up with and that the spectator sees, for example the actor makes a character through action for the spectator to see) and watching (to see in order to ‘grasp and understand’) (Fergusson 1961: 10) (see Figure 5.1 below for a visual representation).

Figure 5.1 Conception of the Aristotelian theatre relationship

Given that Aristotle paid little attention to spectatorship, and saw spectacle as perhaps the least interesting aspect of theatre, this model does not advance politics much beyond what already exists in political theory unless a controversial reading of catharsis, the ‘proper’ effect of tragedy, is admitted. Aristotle only mentions catharsis once in the Poetics, and does not explain how it works, but it is generally thought to be that ‘peculiar pleasure’ spectators experience as a result of feeling ‘fear and pity’ for the plight of the hero (Aristotle Poetics 1453b.10).¹⁹ Else (1963) argues, however, that catharsis is not what spectators experience but something they grant to the hero by way of absolution: ‘catharsis is a purgation of the tragic hero’s actions through the spectator’s full understanding. The spectator acts as a judge in whose sight the hero’s actions are purified ... this ... allows spectators to have pity on him’, and thereby exonerate him. This is what produces tragedy’s ‘peculiar pleasure’.

Else’s interpretation of catharsis is contested, but although magistrates initially judged Greek dramas, ‘guided by the vocal and physically active responses’ of theatre-goers (Pritchard 2007a : 3), by 360BCE judgment in Athens at least was by the whole audience (Taplin 1999: 37). The chorus, which some theorists consider represents an ‘Ideal Spectator’, also commented on and responded to the plight of the hero in ways that could be seen as granting absolution.²⁰ This understanding of catharsis elevates the contribution spectators make to the drama, and brings it into line with the capacity of spectators to judge political action and to grant forgiveness if appropriate. This, Arendt argues, is the necessary function of spectators in political life for it is forgiveness that ‘makes it possible for men to go on’ acting and promising even though they know that:

He who acts never quite knows what he is doing, that he always becomes “guilty” of consequences he never intended or even foresaw, that no matter how disastrous and unexpected the consequences of his deed he can never undo it, that the process he starts is never consummated unequivocally in one single deed or event, and that its very meaning never discloses itself to the actor but only to the backward glance of the historian (Arendt 1958: 233-4).

¹⁹ It is possible he explained catharsis elsewhere, or intended to: ‘It it be asked whether tragedy is now all that it need be in its formative elements, to consider that, and decide it theoretically and in relation to the theatres, is a matter for another inquiry’ (Poetics 1449a.5). This is not necessarily because Aristotle was not interested in these aspects but because he saw them as ‘another inquiry’, perhaps to be answered later. The voluminous scholarship on Aristotle makes it easy to forget that we only have fragments of his work, often only in transcription.

²⁰ Although see Nietzsche (2000/1872) for a criticism of this position.

Catharsis here is something spectators grant to the character through their shared humanity but it is generated by the quality of the dramatic action: 'The best proof is this: on the stage, and in the public performances, such plays, if properly worked out, are seen to be truly tragic' (Aristotle Poetics 1453a.25). A politics based on Aristotle's theatre then would incorporate something like Arendt's judging spectators, who assess the actions of those who enter the space of appearance and determine whether or not to grant recognition and/or forgiveness for the mistakes actors make when they try to achieve something. Although this model is not unlike Green's ocular democracy it lacks the 'grinding' he allows The People to engage in. It may also incorporate political representation if the chorus does stand in for spectators or even if, as Nietzsche argued, the chorus was a barrier designed to maintain the separation between actors and spectators (Nietzsche 2000/1872: 341-2) since representation can work both ways. However, it may make spectators pseudo-actors if Else's understanding of catharsis is admitted, rather than a function and an experience in its own right. There is also no apparent connection between what political practitioners achieve and spectators other than judgment after the event, and spectators need not be engaged. According to Boal, this kind of theatre actually prevents them from being engaged and may work against Else's understanding of catharsis anyway. Such a model may not advance politics any further than the current impasse between spectators and political actors that Green was trying to overcome.²¹

²¹ Sidnell takes exception to this reading of catharsis: 'The interpretation involved in this rendering is dubious and it can be aligned with the many interpretations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that locate the pity and fear in the tragic action rather than in the spectators'. This has advantages for theatre theorists because 'the emotional element can be readily discussed since it supposedly lies in the tragic action itself and the spectators' response, being a rational one, can also be predicted or deduced' (Sidnell 1991: 7). However, given the link Arendt, following Kant, draws between spectatorship and judgment, Sata's comparison of Aristotle's theory of drama with that of the fourteenth century Japanese theorist, Zeami Motokiyo, whose treatment of spectatorship is more extensive, and the use by the Greeks of theatre as a social and political resource which citizens were required to attend (Hesk 1999; Ober 1989), it seems reasonable to see catharsis as absolution.

Meyerhold

Meyerhold suggested that the realist theatre of his day entailed a triadic relationship between Director, Author and Actor in which the director acted as the interface between the production and spectators, who sat outside the process as in Figure 5.2. The production was treated if it were an orchestra with a conductor: author and actor were ‘de-personalised’ and forced to work through the director’s conception as if through a funnel. This narrower conception was directed to spectators in such a way that it denied spectators, actors and authors any creativity. Spectators only saw as much of the author and actors as the director allowed, and vice versa. According to Meyerhold, this model reduced the stage to ‘an antique shop’ with spectators ‘merely looking on’. Many theatre theorists consider commercial theatre to operate according to this attenuated model (when they consider it at all). Few would see this model as an improvement on politics.

Meyerhold opposed this model not with an alternative triangle, but with a ‘Theatre of the Straight Line’. Here the director assimilates the author’s ideas and communicates them to actors, who assimilate the director’s interpretation then use their own creativity to show this conception to spectators, who in turn use their imaginations to fill in any gaps, thereby personalising both the interpretation and the relationship between actor and spectator: ‘The actor reveals his soul freely to the spectator, having assimilated the creation of the director, who, in his turn, has assimilated the creation of the author ... the actor [then] stands face to face with the spectator (with director and author behind him) and freely reveals his soul to him, thus intensifying the fundamental theatrical relationship of performer and spectator’ (Meyerhold 2008/1908: 86). Theatre is thus an intense experience for both actors and spectators that leads to an enlarged understanding of life for spectators. Meyerhold’s representation of this process is reproduced in Figure 5.3, although it could be represented as in Figure 5.4 since his conception appears to involve increasing amplification, with the spectator as a ‘fourth creator, in addition to the author, the director, and the actor’ as a ‘double’ creator (Meyerhold 1968: 60).

Figure 5.2 Diagrammatic view of Meyerhold's 'Theatre-Triangle' conception of Realist theatre (developed from Meyerhold 1969/1908)

Figure 5.3 Meyerhold's 'Theatre of the Straight Line' (reproduced from Meyerhold 1969/1908)

Figure 5.4 Reconceptualization of Meyerhold's 'Theatre of the Straight Line' (Meyerhold 1969/1908)

According to Meyerhold, the 'Theatre of the Straight Line' was the only way in which there could be 'an ideal blend' of those involved in a production. It was based on the recognition that the key to the theatrical experience was the actor: '[a]bove all, drama is the art of the actor'.²² However, the director, although unseen, was a major positive and enabling force since 'the theatre must employ every means to assist the actor to blend his soul with that of the playwright and reveal it through the soul of the director' (Meyerhold 1969/1908: 38). Setting enhanced this revelation because it encouraged spectators to 'no longer see the difference between this and such events in real life, such as maneuvers, parades, street demonstrations, war, and so on'. Ultimately, however, the actor was 'the principal element' (Meyerhold 1969/1908: 38) whose task it was to stimulate spectators' imaginations so that they too could 'create instead of merely looking on' (Meyerhold 2008/1908: 86). Theatre was a constructed art amplified through the medium of the actor in a way that stimulated spectator imagination, allowing a further amplification beyond the limits of the seeing-place so that, for spectators, life began to look like theatre.

Although this conception need not be seen as a liberating form of politics, Meyerhold was the most significant theorist of the external anti-realist movement that introduced what became known as the theatricalist or constructivist approach to theatre. Theatricalists believed in exposing the devices of the theatre, the way theatre machinery worked, in order to make spectators aware that they were watching a construction when watching a performance. Theatricalists also borrowed techniques from the circus, music halls and other popular entertainments (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427), combining aspects of popular theatre into avant-garde theatre. Both commitments thus opened up the practices of theatre so that they were more inclusive and more accountable – desirable traits for a model of politics. However, the model has enormous potential for propaganda because spectators, like the director and actors, also come to be a medium for disseminating the views of the author.

Barthes and theatrical representation

Barthes made the spectator the apex of his 'tripartite' conception of representation, of which theatre was but one practice. However, theatre as a practice of representation has a particular talent: 'theater is that practice which calculates the observed place of things: if I put the spectacle here, the spectator will see this; if I put it elsewhere, he won't see it and I can take advantage of that concealment to profit by the illusion' (Barthes 1986: 89). Figure 5.5 below illustrates this strategy: when attention is drawn to the large, dark star, the pale star at the bottom right corner recedes from view.

²² Original emphasis.

Figure 5.5 Visualisation of Barthes' conception of representation (Barthes 1986: 89)

Theatre is thus a calculated practice of attention manipulation, a magician's sleight of hand that draws spectator focus away from what it does not want seen. Representation is thus not an amplification or a barrier but a reduction. The gaze of spectators is drawn towards the stage, which is the horizon on which a representation is built and which, as it forms a composition, simultaneously nullifies or blocks out any other reality. Theatre is both 'like a magnifying glass, and also like a reducing lens [that] narrows life down' (Brook 2008/1968: 378-9) by enlarging a particular aspect of it.

Attention-seeking in the theatre thus operates on much more than the principle of candour by which performers supposedly become 'worthy of being watched' (Green 2010: 20). It is the result of strategically used effects and spatial arrangements: architecture, lighting, the removal or placement of obstructions, audibility, the way action and speech are broken up, sound effects, proximity. Performers do not become worthy of watching simply by virtue of their willingness to expose themselves to the gaze of spectators. They become watchable because everything that surrounds them compounds the representation even as it directs the gaze of spectators towards it. This was the point of Leviathan in Hobbes' account of representation: since spectators always have the freedom to look anywhere and have their own perspective, the representative had to be ‘perpetually visible’ in order to draw the attention of ‘every particular man’ away from the distraction of their own views so that they could become a unified citizenry: ‘it is the unity of the representer, not the unity of the represented, that maketh [a multitude] one’ (Hobbes 1996/1651: 109). Such unity is a fragile achievement that lasts, as any actor knows, only as long as the attention of spectators can be held. All representations are ‘subject to a spectator’s delicate discrimination’ (Panagia 2003:110).

Representation is generally believed to be unavoidable in theatre but both Artaud and Kershaw argue that theatre reveals representation as entailing cruelty because it requires the amputation of those parts considered extraneous to the purpose of showing. Creators must be unscrupulous when it comes to what they portray or risk muddying what they show with facticity. ‘Everything that acts is a cruelty’ (Artaud 2000/1938: 435) since representations evoke but in no way encompass the full extent of human being (Kershaw 2003).²³ Spectators are complicit in this cruelty but inclined to overlook their part in it, partly because of theatre’s historical privileging of the written text and partly because their position as spectators allows them to avoid the pain of amputation.²⁴ Politics too is inclined to reject the implications of a theatrical understanding of representation: ‘representation in art or theatre has no conceptual connection with representation in court or in government’ (Pitkin 2004: 336; 1989: 132). The core meaning of representation in politics is ‘that somebody or something not literally present is nevertheless present in some non-literal sense ... an inescapable paradox: not present yet somehow present’ (Pitkin 2004: 336; 1967: 6). But it is precisely the special nature of representation and the source of much of its cruelty, that representation does in fact involve a literal presence and a representation simultaneously. A person is physically present along with who or what is being represented. This inescapable characteristic has presented a significant hurdle for minority actors in the theatre as well as in politics. While black actors or politicians may be skilled enough to represent any part they choose (Meyrick

²³ In Andy Warhol’s famous pop-art representation of Marilyn Monroe, Monroe is immediately identifiable, but, reduced to an icon, is available to be used by anyone in any way they please including as a cover for university course notes where she represents ‘Popular Culture’.

²⁴ Artaud’s solution was to require spectators to become part of the representation so that they could experience the cruelty of representation – hence Theatre of Cruelty.

2003), what they look like, their physical presence, is taken by spectators to be significant and meaningful in relation to what they are trying to achieve even if no meaning is intended (Reinelt 1994: 105). Theatre reveals that '[t]here is no defence against this kind of thing' (Kirby 1976a: 62). Indeed story-telling of any kind, including advertising, relies on viewers to 'fill in the blanks' in just this way even if at times they ride 'roughshod' over what is intended (Richardson 2000: 603). People impute meaning to what they see: 'We are incurable interpreters' (Mount 1972: 62).²⁵

White blindness is seen by many to be behind the refusal of politics to recognize the aesthetic dimension of representation as well as its cruelty. Indeed the theoretically disembodied nature of liberal politics epitomises such cruelty. It is a 'radical falsification' to separate representation in politics from aesthetic or cultural representation because it allows both politics and culture to be 'exonerated of any entanglements with power' (Said 1993: 67) especially since it is well recognized that 'reflected appraisals are an important mechanism by which ... identity is constructed' (Noels, Leavitt, and Clément 2010: 754). When representations 'are considered only as apolitical images to be parsed and construed as so many grammars of exchange ... far from this separation of spheres being a neutral or accidental choice, its real meaning is as an act of complicity' (Said 1993: 67). A 'reductive theory about Representation' avoids making representations the target of political analysis and concern (Blau 1987: 201). Consequently responsibility is avoided for:

²⁵ In the Q-Theatre's 1989 production of the Australian colonial play The Currency Lass indigenous actress Justine Saunders played what was originally a male part. This in itself was not detrimental to the play, but the fact that the character was played by an indigenous person while the character's relatives were played by white actors was, because the point of the play was to highlight discrimination within a racial group, not between racial groups. It was therefore crucial to the meaning of the play that all the parts be played by actors of the same colour. In surveys conducted by the theatre after each performance, spectators reported that they did not understand the play. The group believed this was because spectators were uncomfortable with being confronted by racial prejudice (Tait 1994: 95), but it was more likely they were puzzled because the play no longer made sense. A production of three short plays performed as a triple bill by the Pram Factory in Melbourne which cast an indigenous actor firstly in a role in which it was significant that the character was black and then in a role in which colour was not significant also caused confusion. Accepting the significance of colour in the first play, spectators were unable to lose this understanding for the next (Meyrick 2003). In a production of Night Mother in which an obese actress was cast in the role of the suiciding daughter, the cause of the character's suicide was misread by critics and spectators alike as obesity, rather than her despair at being trapped in a suffocating relationship (Dolan 1989: 329). Theatre producers can also be 'costume blind' as well as colour-blind in ways which lead to confusion in spectators (Smith 1973: 5).

[W]ho is wearing [the mask of oppression], where, when, under what circumstances and to what end, with what emotional memories, and at what point in the spectrum of behavior ... between indeterminate Master and ... mirroring and strategically parasitical Slave (Blau 1987: 202).²⁶

Also avoided is recognition of the desire of the masked ‘to wear some masks rather than others’ and choose the moments when they put them on (Blau 1987: 202). Representation is thus ‘doubling disabling’ (Asen 2002: 360). This is particularly the case in dramaturgical applications of the theatre metaphor because it is never the player who gets to choose either mask or circumstances under which they are held to be representative. To do so would be to undermine the metaphor that gives so much power to the spectator.²⁷

Both politics and theatre have dreamt of being able to do without representation precisely because of the dilemmas it generates. Theatre has attempted to realize this dream through ‘an excruciating minimalism’ and the privileging of performance, but in the end has been unable to abolish representation without abolishing theatre (Blau 1987: 198; Honzl 2008/1940: 250; Tronstad 2002: 222-3) : ‘there is nothing more illusory in performance than the illusion of the unmediated’ (Blau 1989a : 253). Similarly politics appears to be only able to avoid representation by reducing political activity to its smallest manifestation – face-to-face discussion. To step beyond this to a wider context necessarily involves representation. However, Rancière argues that this capitulation to representation comes about because both politics and theatre are looking at the wrong thing when they consider representation. Both are fixated on the actor when what is at issue is the image – the ‘third entity’ or ‘bubble’ – that has been generated for both spectators and actors to look at and consider. It is not that it is irrelevant who is generating this manifestation or how they are doing it – contestation over this lies at the heart of politics for Rancière – but that obsessing over these aspects should not occur at the expense of being able to see what is being made visible by the artwork or political activity itself (Rancière 2010: 157). Indeed, a fixation on the actor's person can be a way of refusing to see what it is that the actor is attempting to show. This can itself be a political act.

²⁶ Original emphasis.

²⁷ Blau’s point about the agency of the masked goes some way towards explaining why Goffman dropped the theatre metaphor in favour of the frame metaphor in his later work. While Goffman never subscribed to the idea of a coherent self behind any of the masks a person adopted, there was nevertheless agency, and while some masks were oppressive, many were enabling. This was because they were predicated on social behaviour, not on theatrical pretense.

Showing is a key component of politics as well as theatre. The visible absence from political representation of those affected by the 'five faces of oppression' (Young 1990) that has led to what is known as identity politics indicates this. This recognition has led to an insistence on the need for descriptive representation in politics as well as cross-racial casting in the theatre. Although what these entail is problematic, it is nevertheless recognized that 'showing ... the presence of certain groups ... can lead to higher levels of political engagement and sense of efficacy among members of the group' (Childs and Cowley 2011: 15) whereas '[m]isrecognition by the dominant group harms ... the misrecognized group' (McFarland 2010: 962).²⁸ People respond to visual cues as much as other cognitive sources when assessing their position in relation to political leaders (Masters and Sullivan 1993).²⁹ This is clearly recognized in the 'art of diplomatic signalling' that is a feature of international politics (Cohen 1987). In politics as well as in theatre visibility is 'never simply a technical matter' that can just be dismissed. It has practical, political and normative implications (Brighenti 2007: 327). Identity politics is surely a demand for the recognition of one's identity by others. Spectatorship must form some part of this arrangement of politics because the manifestation or expression of one's identity – or the imposition of an imposed identity to cover difference so that it cannot be recognized – is at heart a spectator-directed activity, 'an opportunity to unveil to other citizens your basic identities, and to have them recognized, judged and received with respect or not' (Conover, Searing, and Crewe 2002: 56).

²⁸ Emphasis added. Young's 'five faces' are exploitation, marginalization, powerlessness, cultural imperialism and violence. She explains the 'faces' in these terms to avoid the 'exclusions and reductions' of terms such as class, ethnicity, sexuality, ageism, disability etc since any individual may encompass more than one of these categories (Young 1990: 69). It is a further indication of the cruelty of representation that any individual can be reduced to just one category of difference.

²⁹ Advances in neuroatomical research indicate that 'facial cues are directly linked to components of the limbic system playing a central role in both social and cognitive behavior' and go some way towards explaining otherwise puzzling changes in attitudes towards political leaders/events (Masters and Sullivan 1993: 177).

One of the reasons that political theory rejects the signifying aspect of representation is because by and large it downgrades spectacle as a distraction from ‘political action proper’ (Williams 1968: 185). Spectacle is seen as a form of political ‘ritual’ that constructs ‘political reality’ for largely unthinking populations (Ross 2000/1997: 53-4) usually to achieve their acquiescence (Edelman 1988): ‘spectacle does not enthrall as much as it encapsulates and neutralizes’ (Ewick and Sarat 2004: 456) or, through ‘the propagation or display of power’ (Egginton 2003: 56), immobilizes or overwhelms, leaving ‘no grounds for political recognition or resistance’ (Debord 1994: 12-18).

Typically, spectacles such as those created by China for the Opening Ceremony of the 2010 Asian Games (see Figure 5.6) are read as ‘messages’ – in this case a reminder to its neighbours of its power (Garnaut 2010: 23). Similarly, in the context of debate and widespread demonstration against Australia’s likely involvement in the impending war against Iraq, the spectacle of the Sydney 2002 New Year’s Eve fireworks under the theme of Let Loose the Dogs of War, accompanied by the strident music of Wagner’s Die Valkyrie, could be seen as signifying to its population that it was necessary to go through war in order to achieve peace.³⁰

But this understanding of spectacle as a form of communication ‘is always a question of showing the spectator what she does not know how to see, and making her feel ashamed of what she [apparently] does not want to see’ (Ranciere 2009/2008: 29-30). This is problematic from the point of view of theatre, since it is by no means accepted that spectacle in theatre can be reduced to the communication of messages, especially messages that require someone who is apparently immune to such messages to point them out (Pateman c1995; Rancière 2010). Most theatre theorists would agree that theatre involves communication but where this communication occurs and how it works continues to be debated, as does whether communication is central, secondary, or a by-product of the aesthetic act. Even the most committed reception theorist/semiotician would not agree to reduce theatre to communication.

³⁰ Demonstrations against the impending war began in Australia in September 2002. A massive demonstration of around 45,000 marched in Melbourne on 13th October. Further large demonstrations took place in Sydney, Hobart, Ipswich, Alice Springs, Adelaide and Canberra on 30th November and again in Melbourne on 1st December 2002 (www.takver.com/history/Melb/peace2003/peace2002.htm and www.wsws.org accessed 16 June 2011).

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 5.6 ‘Oceanic display leaves neighbours queasy’ (Garnaut 2010: 23) – China’s ‘message’ to its neighbours through the opening ceremony of the Asian Games 2010

However, few would now dispute the centrality of spectacle to theatre. Even an ‘empty space’ shows something (Mori 2002: 20).³¹ Any model of politics based on theatre must therefore acknowledge what politics shows, even if it is possible to avoid acknowledging ‘the aesthetic character of the representative relationship’ (Street 2004: 449). This would be particularly important where spectacle is used by politics to impose negative identities on individuals and groups. The representation of refugees for instance, could be seen as a ‘reductionist strategy’ designed to limit what can be seen – ‘a theatre of cruelty, inanity, absurdity and violence designed for the consumption of a public identified and cohered by the spectacle' (Rajaram 2003). Spectacles invite citizens 'to see and willingly reinterpret what [they have] seen many times in a new way, with new eyes' (Marcus 2002: 140). While this can be a strategy to reduce what citizens see, where spectacle is taken seriously enough to offer a range of ways of seeing issues, they might be considered a mark of political freedom. Spectacle would therefore be 'a compelling aspect of political theatre' (Apter 2006: 230). However, the task of a politics as theatre that utilises spectacle would be to ensure as many competing visions as possible.

³¹ Mori takes exception to Brook’s reference to the ‘empty space’ of theatre as the ground on which theatre is built. Empty space ‘does not exist in this world. In both an open-air theater and a proscenium-arch theater, many things have been in existence before the man crosses over the space ... it is the man’s crossing it that makes the place into the “empty space” for the one who watches’ (Mori 2002: 20).

Barthes' model does draw attention to why it is that drama comes to be the focus of both metaphor and theatre theory. It is part of the art of theatre practitioners to render themselves invisible beyond the horizon of the stage so that what is represented appears to take on a life of its own (Lentricchia 1983: 153). Theatre is a 'doing through the guise of pretending' (De Marinis 1993: 149) and 'appropriate consideration must be given to the characteristic of manipulative action' (De Marinis 1993: 190 n12), much of which occurs off-stage. Barthes' conception of theatre brings theatre close to politics in that politics too aims to direct spectators in one direction rather than another and uses a variety of strategies, including representation, to do so, but theatre is expected to do this and provides conventions to account for it (Burns 1972: 138-9).³² Whilst the theatre metaphor amply demonstrates that it is common to believe this same 'deception' operates in politics, there remains an expectation against it and a condemnation when it turns out to be the case. A politics based on this model would continue to attract the kinds of complaints about politics that have so long been a feature of the metaphor: that 'real' politics occurs 'strictly under the counter, or behind closed doors' (Mazrui 1975: 176) and cannot be trusted.

Fischer-Lichte

Fischer-Lichte conceives of theatre as a triadic relationship of exchange between perception, body and language, with the individual performance as 'the place of exchange' (1997: 9-12). Language represents the 'text' incorporating both written play and the visual aspects of production, body the living actor and perception the spectator. All exchanges are regarded as attempts to renegotiate or redefine the boundaries between theatre and other cultural domains, since exchange does not simply occur within theatre but between theatre and everyday life: '[e]xchanges taking place between all kinds of media, art forms, cultural performances, institutions, everyday life, and theatre' are part of an on-going process 'which constantly redefines the whole concept of theatre' (1997: 12-3). Her model is represented in Figure 5.7, with the circle indicating that theatre is 'a communal institution' (1997: 25) embedded in everyday life, which both feeds into and takes from the performance. It places theatre firmly within society, a position that not all theatre theory, let alone political theory would accept.

³² It is ironic that the focus of much of Barthes' thinking about theatre was the work of Brecht who most zealously rejected this conception of theatre. Barthes' conception in the face of Brechtian theatre reinforces what many critics have pointed out – that Brecht's theatre succeeded as theatre in spite of his theories (Barber 1982: 29n87).

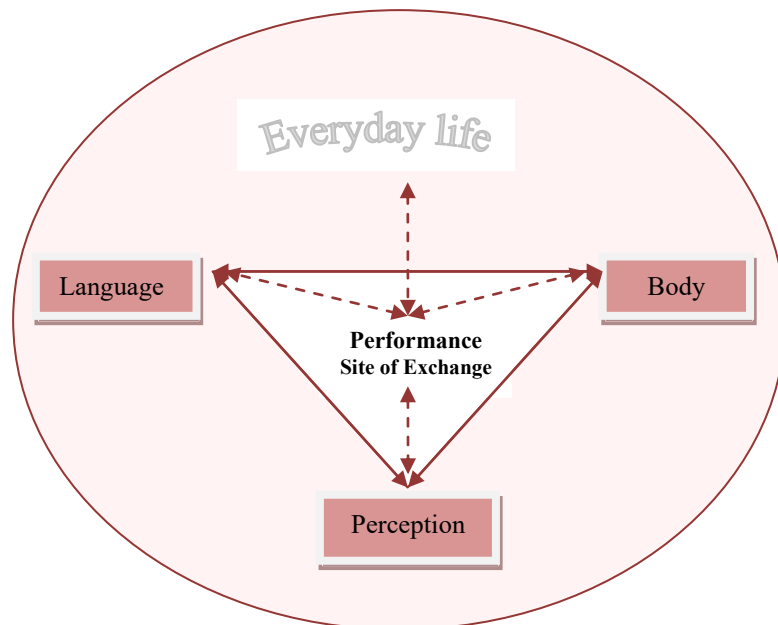

Figure 5.7 Diagrammatic view of Fischer-Lichte's model of theatre as exchange

Although Fischer-Lichte does not explicitly indicate this, it appears that this exchange is historically variable. One particular point will be emphasised at any one time, so that the exchange will take place in a particular mode, for example, through language. This creates a variation in the diagrammatic view of her theory (Figure 5.8 page 161). Where the emphasis is on language, theatre will be thought of in terms of dramatic literature or 'text'. Where the focus is on body, conceptions of theatre will be in terms of the actor: theatre as a living art, as a performed art etc. Where the focus is on perception, theatre will be understood in terms of spectatorship. However, this doesn't mean that spectators per se will be the focus of attention. It simply means that spectators will be recognized as part of the equation. Some spectators may be privileged over others.

Semiotics, Fischer-Lichte's particular interest, is a field that is entirely dependent on spectatorship. She considers it to have been instrumental in bringing spectators back into the exchange relationship. This is a self-serving move designed to privilege the semiotic (and historical) analyst, but Fischer-Lichte also claims that semiotics has been instrumental in bringing back a focus on performance as well, since theatre semiotics is concerned with the analysis of the signs that operate in live performance. Once again, the performer is a medium, this time of signification. In this model of theatre, what is shown to spectators is paramount. What is shown is drawn from everyday life, and fed back to spectators via signification. Actors are the instruments of this signification. Spectators 'read' a performance like they read a book, looking for the implications of what is shown.³³

Although spectators take on a more solid presence in this model, they either remain largely unknown as 'readers' or assume the image of a 'Model Spectator' – a 'composite' of the otherwise missing producer and the knowledgeable and more broadly 'endowed' semiotically-aware spectator/reader (De Marinis 1993: 172) who never misunderstands or rejects a performance because of 'prejudices and stereotypes' about what is appropriate for a genre (De Marinis 1993: 185), and always gets the message.³⁴ As Cullers says about theatre audiences:

³³ Theatre semiotics is closely allied with Reception Theory which also sees spectatorship in terms of reading.

³⁴ This insistence is meant to allow for the 'everyday' fact that people know (and decipher) codes 'they are not capable of actively using' (De Marinis 1993: 173). The model spectator has two essential and 'preliminary' competences: the capacity to recognize a theatrical performance as such and the capacity to relate the 'performance text' to a 'wider class' or genre of performances (De Marinis 1993: 174). A knowledge of genre in particular is required, since 'any performance text ... is always attributable ... to a genre [of some kind] ... it is always readable ... based on the kind of competence activated by that genre' (De Marinis 1993: 178). This sounds like an etymologist pinning down a butterfly.

The question is not what actual readers happen to do but what an ideal reader must know implicitly in order to read and interpret works in ways which we consider acceptable (Culler 1975: 123-4).³⁵

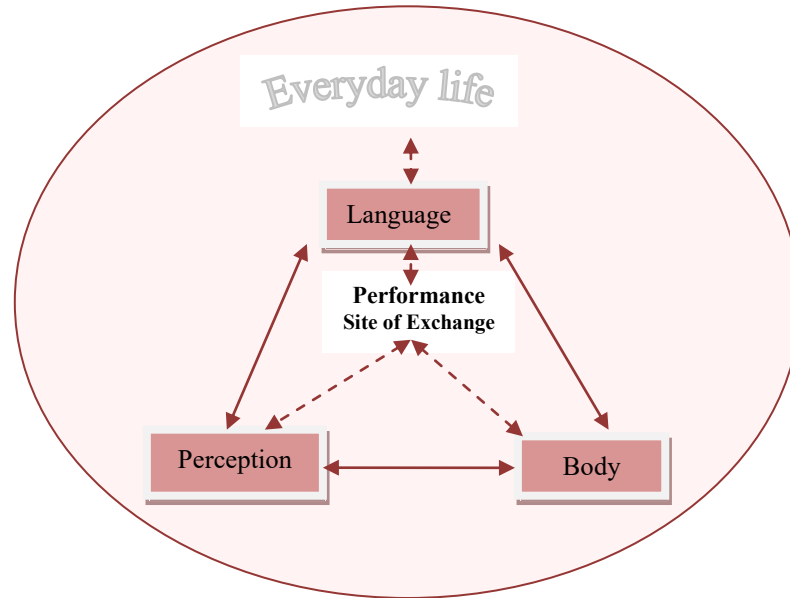

Figure 5.8 Modified view of Fischer-Lichte's model of theatre as exchange, showing possible variations

Once again, ‘it is ... a question of showing the spectator what she does not know how to see’ (Rancière 2009/2008: 29). For all semiotics’ ‘discovery’ of spectators, Fischer-Lichte’s model mirrors theatre theory’s long-standing reluctance to accord any meaningful role to spectatorship other than as a ‘problem’ to be solved (Barker 2004; Green 2010: 5), rehumanized (Boal 2000/1974), compelled to re-assess their perceptions (Pirandello 1992/1924) or otherwise woken up (Sierz 2002), reactivated (Brecht 1992/1949; Kershaw 2001), transformed or taught. Although theatre theory at least purports to recognize the necessity of spectators, like many theorists of political participation, it wants to ‘shake them awake ... [by] making them walk over the acting space’ (Meyerhold 1974: 161-2 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 47). Being a spectator is ‘the gravest sin of which any citizen can be guilty’ (Wilde 2000-2010/1891).

³⁵ Emphasis added.

Like contemporary democratic theory, theatre theory has for the most part privileged action. It has also, for the most part, accused its spectators of passivity in spite of its insistence that the experience of theatre arises through the interaction of actors and spectators, well-documented instances of unruliness (Blackadder 2003) and a long history of disciplining spectators even ‘by a stick’ (Plato Laws 700c-d). Over 90% of the records located in the historical overview of theatre theory for this study, were focused predominantly on the doing of theatre. Slightly less than half (44%) considered watching in some way or another although few privileged it. For instance, Styan (1975) devoted only 18 out of 247 pages of his book Drama, Stage and Audience to spectators although the title could lead one to expect at least an equivalent treatment to ‘drama’ and ‘stage’. Elam spent even less in The Semiotics of Theatre and Drama (1980) – just 9 of 210 pages – despite theatre semiotics’ utter dependence on spectatorship for its craft. The semiotics of theatre is nothing if not a spectator sport, as Fischer-Lichte’s analyses of a variety of theatrical productions clearly indicates.³⁶ Roberts also devoted just 19 of 486 pages of The Nature of Theatre on ‘seeing a play’ even though she claims that ‘the transaction that takes place’ between a live actor and a live audience ‘is the essence of theatre’ and the reason why people go to the theatre (Roberts 1971: 29-30). Burton’s How To See A Play (1914) is devoted to explaining how plays are structured as texts and the various techniques of production rather than what it means to be a spectator. The treatment of spectators, even if it is admitted that they are the focus of what theatre shows and that they ‘determine ... the coherence and completeness of a theatrical event’ (De Marinis 1993: 48), remains ‘simple and cursory’ (Bennett 1997: 7): ‘[t]he most neglected aspects ... of theater studies in general are the audience and its individual spectators’ (Connor (Swietlicki) 1999: 417). Even in eighteenth century writing on the theatre, a period when spectatorship was a topic of considerable debate outside theatre, spectators were ‘absent from prescriptive manuals as well as scientific and philosophical works on delivery and actors (Taviani 1981: 102 in De Marinis 1993: 229n2). Indeed, ‘the spectator scarcely exists in the history of theater’ (Descotes 1964: 2) any more than they do in the history of theatre as a metaphor. In 2004, Barker complained that studies of theatre ‘audiences’ were so few as to be ‘hardly ten a penny’ (Barker 2004), which is why he welcomed the republication of Bennett’s 1990 study of theatre ‘audiences’ despite its shortcomings.³⁷ Like democratic theory, theatre theory exhibits Warren’s logic of domination:

³⁶ See in particular her 1997 book The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: A European Perspective. This exhaustively analytical approach to theatre reception is similar to the cognitive analyses of metaphor.

- A1: Actors do and spectators don’t have the capacity to transform social/political life
- A2: Whatever has the capacity to consciously and radically transform social/political life is morally superior to whatever doesn’t
- A3: Actors are morally superior to spectators
- A4: for any X and Y, if X is morally superior to Y then X is morally justified in subordinating Y
- A5: Actors are morally justified in treating spectators as inferior and either ignoring them or instigating means to remedy inaction (Warren 1990).³⁸

This opposition between action and spectatorship is more than a simple one of logic. It is one of a series of ‘allegories of inequality’ applied in the theatre such that spectatorship and what it entails fails to be acknowledged (Rancière 2009/2008: 12) and that justifies the neglect of both spectators and spectacle in theatre theory while at the same time obscuring the way that theatre has subjected spectators to discipline. The decorum of regular theatre-going, like the conventions of elections, is now so well established that both practitioners and theorists who pine for action forget that it took some four hundred years and the invention of new technologies in architecture and lighting to achieve. In 1924, Stanislavski could still say of Russian theatre spectators that:

We were forced to begin at the very beginning to teach this new spectator how to sit quietly, how not to talk, how to come into the theatre at the proper time, not to smoke, not to eat nuts in public, not ³⁷ According to Barker, Bennett’s book ‘belatedly seized the Althusserian/theoretician phase of cultural studies’ interest in audiences and applied them to the idea of theatre audiences’, making it less enlightening than he had hoped. See the discussion of ‘audience’ in Chapter 6. Part of the disappearance of spectators from the concerns of theorists has to do with the use of the term ‘audience’ for spectators.

³⁸ Rancière’s ‘idea of the proper’ (Rancière 1999/1995) works in a similar way.

to bring food into the theatre and eat it there, to dress in his best so as to fit more into the atmosphere of beauty that was worshipped in the theatre (Stanislavski 1924 in Eddershaw 1996: 21).

Spectators are still exhorted to meet these rules in many theatres. Even now, once mobilized, spectators can be ‘difficult to control’ (Schechner 1994: xxiv), although seasoned theatre practitioners may be able to deal with such difficulties ‘in terms of the performance’ (Schechner 1994: xxix).³⁹ Theatre, like politics, ‘design[s] and construct[s] embankments’ along which spectators must ‘navigate’, although rarely ‘to make their own discoveries’ (Taviani 2005: 288).

Still, Fischer-Lichte’s model provides a place for politics and a mode of action. It would lie within the everyday world and operate along the lines of an exchange. While its activities would still require specialist interpretation to be intelligible to ordinary spectators, spectators would be a recognized component of the relationship politics has with the world. Political actors would be the medium of exchange. This is a model that could encompass institutional forms of political life, although whether it advances politics much beyond current forms of democratic politics is debatable.

Mori

A genuine model should be ‘generalizable to all objects to which it is supposed to be applicable’ and it should be able to ‘explain variance between those objects as well as explaining similarities’ (Dowding 1995: 140). A more complex triadic conception of theatre that recognizes theatre as a social activity that plays with reality ‘in such a way as to turn the taken for granted into a plausible appearance’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 49) and that does not require spectators to be anything other than spectators comes from Mori (2002). This model is specifically concerned with showing but provides an explanation for the differences between theatre and theatre-like phenomena that allows for a wider variety of political forms to be encompassed in a theatre model.

³⁹ It was one of the ‘small but real’ pleasures of environmental theatre that ‘disrupters’ could be ‘thrown out’ of the theatre as if the confrontation was part of the show (Schechner 1994: xlviii11).

Mori sees theatre as operating on two overlapping planes, a fictional plane and a reality plane, somewhat like representation's doubling of presence and representation (see Figure 5.9). Both entail relationships between three elements. To the extent that both planes overlay each other, theatre occurs. To the extent that they move away from each other, either fiction (exemplified by cinema), or reality (exemplified by spectacle) occurs. To the extent that one of the elements of either plane is lost, activities such as sport, or music or literature occur. The reality plane tends to focus on the points of the triangle and the fictional plane tends to focus on the lines between the points but it is the overlap between the two triangular relationships that produces the particular frisson of theatre: it transforms the physical place in which it occurs into a theatrical space, and the experience spectators are having into theatre. Theatre can thus occur in any kind of space, provided that the two planes overlap. The relationship between actors and spectators creates the theatrical space in which what is to be shown appears.

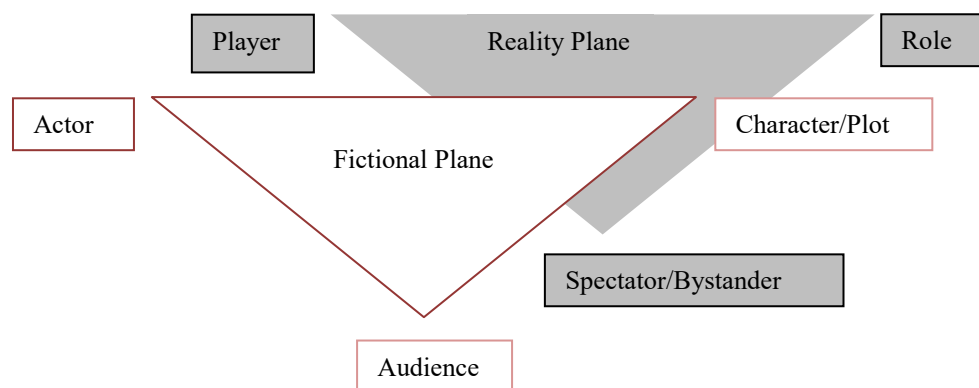

Figure 5.9 Mori's conception of theatre

Performances that do not acknowledge this dynamic relationship between actors and spectators are 'cinematic' rather than theatrical. They consist of a Player-Spectator relationship in which the performer 'performs for him/herself, while the watcher is reduced to a 'mere bystander'' (Mori 2002: 80). The performer thus has the capacity to reduce spectators to mere bystanders by self-absorption.

A crucial distinction between what constitutes theatre as opposed to what constitutes merely spectacle for Mori is the acknowledgement of spectators as the recipients of what the performer is showing as they perform. Mori suggests the term ‘Character’ for that ‘nameless presence’ that brings spectators into a relationship with performers such that they share in generating ‘theatre’. Character ‘is not a person but a conception that spectators come to conceive in the course of the performance’ (Mori 2002: 83). Both Character and Plot are what we end up with at the end of the experience (although neither actually exists at the end of the play any more than they did at the beginning). Mori redefines this as Drama – the result of the interaction between actor, spectator and Character, ‘not something Actor presents to Audience, but something formed between Audience and Character’ through the actor’s ‘playing’ (Mori 2002: 77). Drama here means something like Aristotle’s idea of poesis in that it is a product of the performance, something dependent on but nevertheless independent of both doers and spectators, a ‘third thing that is owned by no one, whose meaning is owned by no one, but which subsists between them’ (Rancière 2009/2008: 15). Fourteenth century Japanese performer and theorist Zeami refers to this as the ‘Flower’. It is generated through the course of the performance and is unique to each group of spectators (Zeami 2000: 97-107). It is crucially about what is generated rather than the actor per se.

Although Mori claims that it is in the power of performers to reduce watchers to mere bystanders by ignoring them, he nevertheless also holds spectators responsible for the failure to generate theatre. The phenomenon of theatre is lost when spectators forget that what they are watching is an actor generating Character in conjunction with spectator attention, rather than performing a character. When this happens, plots tend to remain fragmentary. The performer rather than what he is trying to show takes the spectator’s attention and the theatrical experience dissipates, leaving only the reality plane and perhaps a sense of having been cheated on both sides: ‘[t]o fix one’s desire on a particular actor is to ... negate the theatrical experience’ (Ubersfeld 1982: 138). Theatre is thus a fragile collusion that requires reciprocity and symmetry, the principles of Habermas' communicative action (Habermas 1984/1981), and an on-going indication of the willingness of both parties to continue together in order to achieve something beyond themselves, what Lazorowicz calls the contrat théâtral (cited in Passow 1981). The same condition applies to Arendt's conception of politics. While actors might instigate action, politics occurs when spectators 'make room' by paying attention to an action that promises something. This acknowledgement of action by spectators generates the freedom for the actor to continue to act so that they might achieve what they have promised. Recognition of freedom in action encourages spectators to keep the space of action open, and to grant forgiveness for any unintended consequences. What both spectators and actors end up with, irrespective of the outcome, is an experience of political freedom. However, the more spectators withdraw their attention from what is appearing, the more the action moves away from political freedom. The chance to do 'something new' and generate the experience of political freedom is lost. But focus on the actor at the cost of what they are trying to achieve is also likely to prove as unsatisfactory for politics as a self-absorbed actor who does not recognize the need to woo and engage spectators. This suggests that a politics that attempts to incorporate celebrities will not necessarily conform to a politics modelled on theatre, even though many theorists of celebrity politics draw on theatre as a metaphor.

Mori's model would also accommodate Rancière's more radically egalitarian understanding of politics/democracy as dissensus – the rupture that makes visible the anomaly that tests the 'partition of the sensible' that has come to be accepted as the normal arrangement of the political in a democracy (Rancière 2010: 157). This is a form of politics that is aimed squarely at spectators, since it is about the appearance of the anomaly – the men and women who are not included in the 'universal franchise' or among 'the people' for whom the state claims to be constituted but who nevertheless insist on showing themselves as individuals who should be included on the basis of the state's own claims. Unlike Arendt's view of politics, but like Mori's view of theatre, politics can erupt virtually anywhere where a space of appearance is made. Political subjects do not exist in either a public or a private domain. Rather they appear wherever someone insists that there is something about the way particular subjectivities have been decided in the arrangements of rule that is a public concern. Under such a conception of politics, Rajaram's 'theatre of cruelty, inanity, absurdity and violence' in relation to refugees is demonstrating exactly what the state was trying to paper over: that refugees are being placed outside the 'natural' order of a state that had committed itself to provide a refuge for them. In revealing the very people whom the state hoped to 'discount', politics was being enacted because what was being shown was that the distinctions that allowed this relegation were contingent. The fact that the state felt forced to generate a particular image of refugees indicated that the identity it sought to impose could be otherwise. Thus, although Rancière tends to focus on eruptions instigated by the ruled, his conception does not rule out that rulers also engage in politics when they feel they must 'stage' an appearance, or that contestation of the divisions in a society will not arise through the efforts of those who, while not directly affected, see those divisions as at odds with some principle on which rule is supposed to be based:

This is what the democratic process implies: the action of subjects who, by working the interval between identities reconfigure the distributions of the public and the private, the universal and the particular (Rancière 2006/2005: 61).

Although Rancière insists on a distinction between art and politics because they operate in different ways, Mori's model of theatre does map onto Rancière's distinction between politics and police, where police is the established order or consensus about what is 'real' while politics continually strives to demonstrate that that 'real' is a fiction in that it too is constructed and may well be constructed in ways that cut across principles on which the society claims to be based.⁴⁰ The disruptions of police with alternate constructions that demonstrate this equality is what generates politics in the same way that the overlay of the fictional plane on the reality plane disrupts both and generates theatre.

⁴⁰ Blaug (2002) offers a similar distinction when he divides democracy into incumbent (institutional) and critical as a means of locating points where democracy is stifled because the incumbent manages to subsume the critical.

Although both Arendt and Rancière see human beings as simultaneously actors and spectators, they recognize that spectatorship requires a certain distance and that one mode might prevail over the other at any one time. Mori's model suggests that a satisfactory experience of politics for both actors and spectators would not depend on spectators becoming actors. Indeed, an insistence on this form of participation would prevent such an experience. The model makes it clear that attempts to make theatre participatory by turning spectators into actors end up destroying theatre because they destroy the space in which Drama can appear. As in Arendtian and Rancièrian politics, theatre relies on the separation between actors and spectators that allows the space of appearance. This distance is a 'pact' between actors and spectators that protects each of them from the other, so that 'each can do for the other what the other cannot do for itself' and hence 'discover our power over possibility' (Wilshire 1982: 23-24). A politics that attempts to collapse the space between actors and spectators may take on an 'an intensely real feel' (Selaiha 1998) but this is only because it suffers from a 'surfeit of reality' (Simmel 1976/1912: 59). As such it prevents precisely what politics claims to want: a reasoned and thoughtful response from citizens to political phenomena.

A Viable Model?

Any model will be selective about what aspects of the secondary domain will be included and what will be left out, but a viable model should not be required to fit rules of correlation that truncate or obscure what is essential to it. Although there are significant differences between the models above, they all see theatre as a relationship of some kind between practitioners and spectators, and all recognize the difference between doing and showing. Theatre is an activity that shows something to someone (Pateman c1995): 'The attitude of showing must never be forgotten' (Brecht in Eddershaw 1996: 8). Practitioners both onstage and behind the scenes are involved in doing things that result in something other than them as practitioners becoming visible to spectators. This entity is most frequently manifested through the medium of the actor. As a physical medium, the actor unavoidably contributes physical attributes to this entity, which can lead spectators to collapse the entity into the performer, creating representation as a problem to be solved. This is a risk of performance (Meyrick 2003: 235) that practitioners generally try to manage, may also play with but sometimes also forget, suggesting that the task is difficult. Mori's three-dimensional model indicates why this might be so and why sometimes we might have the appearance of theatre but not the experience.⁴¹

Meyerhold and Barthes make it clear that the actor/performer is not the only 'doer'. Rather, the successful generation of this other entity is underpinned and supported by many other practitioners whose chief characteristic is to make themselves invisible. What appears, generally though not always through the medium of the actor, is the end point of a collaborative process of distillation, compression and control. If successful, the theatrical experience is something like that of opening a Jack-in-a-Box, although the release process is extended. The combination of compression, tension and slow release can be expansionary for both spectators and performers.

However, this experience is fraught with risks for both sides. The process of getting spectators to focus on the space of appearance rather than the performer necessarily involves a sleight of hand that can cut across the desire of both spectators and performers for authenticity. Where it doesn't come off, spectators can be left deflated or feeling that they have been manipulated while performers can feel that they have been hung out to dry by unsympathetic and cruelly judging observers. Where it is deliberately avoided, the experience is reduced to something other than theatre. Nevertheless, spectators and what theatre shows are crucial elements of any politics based on theatre. That politics may occur in familiar institutionalised spaces or it may generate its own space of appearance as dissensus. It may involve representation. However, it is not likely to be a form of celebrity politics in which the relationship between actors and spectators is skewed in favour of the actor. Nor is it likely to be participatory in the sense of 'popular' community theatre or political participation theory.

⁴¹ Many theatre practitioner/theorists have wished to dispense with the facticity of the actor because of its interference with what they were trying to show. The history of theatre is full of experiments with über-marionettes, masks and a variety of other strategies designed to hide the human body of the actor while still retaining the actor as a vehicle of representation. Arguably the current trend towards animation in film is about overcoming the same problem of representation: the interference caused by the body of the performer.

Chapter 6: Politics as Theatre

Political action ... is the intention to make an object which bears one's conviction and which might bring another to himself (Cavell 2003/1987: 118).

Some political theorists have accused other political theorists of producing theories of politics that are 'essentially unpolitical' (Pitkin 1973: 524).¹ A political theory should provide:

[A] vision in which 'we' might actively and collectively govern ourselves, in which politics might be the concern of an entire, self-consciously engaged community, and freedom might consist in shared, self-governing rather than protected privacy (Pitkin 1973: 524).

It should also be 'optimistic about the creative promise of politics while also acknowledging that politics is full of conflict, power, interest, and so on' (Hauptmann 2004: 47). There is nothing in these requirements that would necessarily reject a politics in which spectatorship was a crucial component, although the inference is towards participation. Indeed, from Evreinov's point of view, this is precisely what these requirements do entail: political actors generate their vision of collective life in collaboration with spectators within a shared space that is opened up and protected by spectators who freely and willingly hold it open because they value what actors do on their behalf: generate visions of a bearable life.

However, a politics as theatre would also need to incorporate systems of accountability, justification and responsibility (Whitebrook 1996: 41), and perhaps exercise more prudence towards its activities than seems to be required of theatre. These conditions draw a crucial distinction between the content of any particular theatrical activity and the practice of theatre. A politics modelled on theatre is not about how characters interact in a fictional world although that seems to be what people think of when they invoke theatre as a metaphor. That would be a model based on a play. Theatre is a place and an activity in the real world. As such it is accountable and must justify and take responsibility for its actual activities, even if this is limited to taking out public liability insurance, meeting fire regulations, paying bills and finishing performances more or less on time so that those involved can meet their other obligations as social beings. The differences in this respect are ones of degree (see Table 6.1 below). Although it is true that crimes portrayed on stage escape actual punishment (Klapp 1976: 254), actual crimes committed in the theatre do not:

¹ Pitkin criticises Oakeshott and Wolin criticises Rawls on these grounds (Hauptmann 2004: 47-8).

Politics as Theatre	Implications for politics:
Triadic: involves doing, showing and watching	Politics will be an activity that shows something to someone who is watching and who judges what is shown . What appears has significance
Enacted through the medium of the actor	It may or may not be representational but will be signifying
Not all practitioners will be visible	It will be multi-layered, subject to direction and selection by unseen and unacknowledged actors
Focused	It will be attention-seeking and attention-focusing in its activities
Creates a space of appearance	Requires no 'proper place' (Rancière 2010: 39) however some spaces may become institutionalised
Episodic but conventionalised	It may appear to have the nature of an 'event' although it will be underpinned by routine activities
Collaborative	It will require co-operation but not necessarily agreement
Addresses a collective	Requires 'a broad field of interest and a clear forward movement in the action' to cohere disparate spectators into a collective ²
Offers a view/vision of the world	Will promote credible views of social and political life that may challenge or endorse existing views
Does not require the continuous attention of spectators	Will recognize that spectators have other obligations
Does not require spectators to become actors	Will not be a form of participatory politics/direct democracy
Is not about 'truth' although it may give insight	Trust is based on the capacity of spectators to influence what politics achieves, not on the sincerity of political actors as political actors

Table 6.1 Politics as theatre: implications

² American playwright Thornton Wilder, cited in Carlson 1984: 406

All the world is not a stage – certainly the theatre isn't entirely ... you need to find places for cars to park and coats to be checked, and these had better be real places, which, incidentally, had better carry real insurance against theft ... social life is dubious enough and ludicrous enough without having to wish it further into unreality (Goffman 1986/1974: 1-2).

Although Green's ocular democracy meets some of these requirements – it considers the doing of politics and its watching, which is put to work determining that what is shown is credible, and it apparently occurs in particular institutional spaces – it solves the problem of the relationship between doing and watching by turning watching into doing, while downgrading political action. Ultimately it is a form of participatory democracy in which what some political actors do is less important than what other political actors (The People) can make them show when they put them on the spot. This, in the end, is not much of an improvement on the relentlessly negative scrutiny politics is already subjected to by the media (Flinders 2010: 321). Also, apart from the problem of the hidden management of institutional structures, not only could political actors conceivably undertake great evil as long as they were 'sincere' when called out, the prospect of 'being grinded' (Green 2010: 138) is likely to produce strategies of coping that would undermine its aims. The possibility that insincere actors might still be capable of doing good is also denied.

The models of theatre discussed in Chapter 5 suggest a number of characteristics from theatre that could round out the initial tripartite model of doing, showing and watching in ways that did not collapse watching into acting, or showing into the 'inner truth' of the performer. Doing would be performative, purposeful and structured, responsive to a form of watching on which it depended but that was not concerned about sincerity so much as the plausibility and relevance of what was shown and the ability of the actor to generate an experience of politics that satisfied spectators that their interests were being considered. It would be on this basis rather than 'honesty' that spectators would consider trusting political actors. Neither theatre nor politics is about ‘truth’ and grinding for it is simply destructive.³

Nevertheless, politics as theatre would be concerned about what appeared in the space of politics. There would be a genuine and reasonable concern with ‘impression management’ or decorum, and a concern with attention-seeking and focus particularly in relation to what are seen as ‘important matters’ (Merelman 1976/1969: 287). The existence of a tacitus consensus between actors and spectators whereby some acted conditionally for both while others watched means that the collaborative nature of theatre would also need to extend to spectators: ‘[w]illingness to interact [would be] a key attribute’ of this form of politics (Gilmore 1988: 205). The sincerity or otherwise of either actors or spectators would only come into question if there was some concern about how either tried to influence what was generated at the expense of the other: ‘Nature may be seen in the market-place, or at the card-table, but we expect something more than this in the playhouse’ (Erasmus Darwin 1799 cited in Wasserman 1947: 271).

Political actors would still put themselves ‘on the line’ (Meyrick 2003: 238), as any one appearing in public does, but they would be entitled to learn how to do this well and should also be able to expect forgiveness from spectators for minor mishaps and misjudgements, because to do otherwise would in the long run be counter-productive:

Accountability systems that punish public servants for unforeseen or unpreventable errors will constrain policy innovation ... and limit capacity to deal with new and emerging problems (APSC 2009: 10).

The longstanding acceptance of composed behaviour as normal for theatre but abnormal and unacceptable for politics would also need to be overthrown: ‘bad faith is expected and accepted in the actor – what is required is versatility’ (Burns 1972: 134). Political actors would be permitted to take the time to prepare themselves and to learn forms of behaviour appropriate for the conditions in which they find themselves – as in fact new parliamentarians are already expected to do. It would be expected ‘that they should make the best of themselves’ (Mount 1972: 110). Training that helped them do this would not be considered hypocritical if the task at hand required those skills. Appearing before ‘hungrily watching’ spectators can be terrifying for actors of all kinds. Much of the work of training actors is about helping them to appear ‘natural’ in the face of their fears of the ‘black hole of the audience’ (Schechner 1994: 72).⁴

³ Opinion polling on the very public dispute between Prime Minister John Howard and Treasurer Peter Costello over who was telling the truth about leadership discussions indicated that honesty is not the prime political value. Although most people believed that Costello was telling the truth (46% to 35%) they preferred Howard as leader (63% to 25%) (Metherell 2006).

Recognition of the signifying aspects of theatre would require politics to pay more attention to both visual representation and symbolic politics than it currently does. Politics has been plagued by two competing views of representation: whether or not representatives act for those they represent, or reflect them? Manin terms this a debate between trusteeship and likeness. Resemblance is the key to the likeness model. Representatives ‘know’ what is wanted because they belong to the represented group. Under trusteeship, political actors do not have to resemble those they represent. They are trusted to make decisions on behalf of the represented because of some other quality: notability or expertise, for instance. These qualities allow them some freedom of action. Theatre’s view of representation indicates that this may be a null debate. Representation is about whether or not actors are recognized and accepted as legitimate for the task (Rehfeld 2006). Signification is a criterion of recognition but is related to the coherence of the task rather than just to similarity to constituents, although the two may overlap.⁵ The distinction means that although some form of signification will always be a feature of representation, descriptive or identity-based representation may not always be the most effective way to have one's interests met. In general, 'people ... respond only to images that "do something" for them' (Klapp 1976: 34). What it is that is being done 'for them', though, is more complex than simply showing themselves to themselves.

⁴ Some people (and very young children) do lack self-consciousness and either do not mind scrutiny, or manage it well. Most people, however, require some training before being able to handle being watched with ease. ‘Stage-fright’ can affect even the most seasoned performers. Laurence Olivier claims to have been almost immobilised by it prior to a performance and attributed his ability to get through the performance to a reliance on his training and rehearsal. Most public speaking training focuses on helping the speaker manage stage-fright symptoms such as shaking hands and voice and breathlessness.

⁵ See Schneider and Bos (2011) for a discussion of the way stereotypes of Blacks change according to the position under consideration. Rehfeld makes the point that circumstances can determine the criteria by which recognition is accorded. He gives the example of the recognition of a particular prisoner as appropriate for the role of Hamlet because he was the only person in the prison camp who knew the lines. Attractiveness can also outweigh other qualities (Hart, Ottati, and Nathaniel 2011).

Symbols are 'tools of communication' (Gusfield 1963: 170) that have their roots in shared understandings. They point to what certain things/events are to mean. Governments everywhere engage in symbolic politics to such an extent that Gronbeck (1990: 212) considers politics itself 'a symbolic process'. Politics uses symbolic acts, such as the passing of legislation, public ceremonies and addresses 'to organize the perceptions, attitudes and feelings of observers' (Gusfield 1963: 170).⁶

Key symbols 'provide a unifying experience fostering sentiments that may transcend limitations of culture, class, organization, and personality' (Lasswell 1964/c1954: 201). They are 'our most important means of bringing things together' (Walzer 1992: 66). Gusfield suggests that the down-playing or dismissal of symbolic politics by theorists is to do with the difficulties it creates for a pluralistic understanding of politics that is seen in terms of 'bargaining, compromise, and detached trading' (Gusfield 1963: 183). It also comes about because of the down-playing of the significance of spectatorship. Yet the concept of symbolic politics offers a strong strategy for explaining how mass movements for political change can gather momentum. The use of colour in the 2009 mass uprisings in Georgia, Thailand and Teheran as in Figure 6.1 provided a culturally specific symbolic mechanism for signifying solidarity. To a watching world it was also a powerful visual sign of the demand for political change. Similarly, the strategic placement of signs (or the supposed failure by his minders to police this placement) in relation to Opposition Leader Tony Abbott at an anti-climate change rally (Figure 6.2) positioned him in such a way that he could reap the benefits of the attention the media gave the incident and appear to support the position of the protesters while also denying responsibility or complicity with protesters.

⁶ Emphasis added. Too often, linguistic models of interpretation are used to talk about the effects of symbols and it becomes easy to overlook their generally visual form: they are targeted at spectators not readers, and are seen not read. Reading is a metaphor for the perceptive process (Ricoeur 1971).

Figure 6.1 Use of colour by an Iranian protester during 2009 protests (Sydney Morning Herald 6 June 2009; AP Photo/Fars News)

about any symbol that requires that it stand for only one thing' (Edelman 1964: 11).

Since theatre has made an art of visual strategy, no model of politics based on theatre can ignore the showing dimension of politics. However, as failures in this art have shown, representation and symbolism can cut across each other. Representations that do not take account of their symbolic load undermine their legitimacy while symbols that do not take account of representation can be vulnerable to challenge or misinterpretation since, in themselves, they have no meaning. The significance of green as opposed to any other colour to Iranian protesters is lost if what it represents is unknown: '[t]here is nothing

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 6.2 Opposition Leader Tony Abbott addressing a Canberra carbon tax protest March 2011 (Adelaide Now 24 March 2011 <http://www.adelaidenow.com.au/ipad/tax-revolt-sees-some-ugly-scenes/story-fn6bqphm-1226027060737>; photo unattributed; original article in The Australian 23 March 2011).

Finally, since theatre is not tied to a particular institutional base but can appear anywhere where interaction occurs between actors and spectators, politics as theatre would generate its own spaces of appearance (Apter 2006: 221-2) in much the same way that demonstrations already do – or at least try to given that there are often public order requirements that organisers have to meet. Although it would therefore have no ‘proper place’ (Rancière 2010: 39) it may use institutions as a way of solidifying relationships between practitioners and spectators, but the existence of institutions would not necessarily generate politics anymore than the existence of theatre buildings necessarily generate theatre (Goldfarb 2005; MacKinnon 2005).⁷ While a politics as theatre would be ‘inherently spatial’ since theatre is spatial (Scolnicov 1987), politics specifically occurs in any place ‘where being together has to be negotiated’ (Elden 2001: 6, 74).

This suggests a particular edge to politics as theatre: it would specifically be about ways of living together. This would remove one of the concerns expressed about politics as theatre – that it reduces politics to entertainment so that there is no requirement for either what is being enacted or how it is being seen to be taken seriously (Friedland 2002: 202). Politics is meant to be effective. It is also consequential. To make entertainment its primary value would be in a crucial sense to miss or disguise the significance that politics can have on life and fundamentally downgrade its value.

However, since with very few exceptions, theatre theorists and practitioners claim that theatre should do ‘work’ in the world (George Bernard Shaw in Carlson 1984: 234) Elden’s requirement should not be too onerous to meet. Even commercial theatre has almost always aimed to provide ‘models’ of behaviour and show spectators ‘what we must avoid’ or ‘that which we must imitate’ (Giraldi 1991/c1543: 126) – to tell spectators ‘please don’t do this’ (Sellars 1999: 30-4). Theatre is said to ‘illuminate’ politics (David Hare in Tusa 2005a), ‘humanize’ (Brockett and Ball 2004), enrich ‘the human spirit’ (Peter Hall in Tusa 2005b), expose ‘the present’ (Weber 2004: 103), reflect what is going on in our lives (Sean Penn in Matheson 2005), circulate symbolic experiences (Werry 2005), generate a communal experience (Nicholas Hytner in Topham 2006), hold up a mirror to society in order to inspire change (Edward ⁷ Goldfarb’s experience of street theatre in Poland demonstrated that the existence of a building for theatre in fact impeded both performers and spectators. It was not until some spectators took over the performance and moved it into the street that the show came to life. Başgöz (1975) describes how different venues can produce enormous differences in reception to the same show.

Albee in Gibson 2006), provide an imaginative means of coming to terms with the existence of the other (Krasner 2006), teach lessons about survival (Darren O'Donnell in Morgan 2007), demonstrate democracy (Sewell 2007), enhance political life (Woodruff 2008) and provide 'a medium in which criticism can be more safely spoken' (Guest 2005: 1112). Already 'the artist and the statesman ... occupy some of the same ground and pursue many of the same objectives' (Barber and McGrath 1982: ix).⁸

There are, of course, fundamental differences between theatre and life. Theatre as an activity produces experiences that are constructed, dynamic and complete in themselves and have carefully calculated relationships between cause and effect, while life is in an 'absolutely unfinished condition', has 'extraordinary monotony' and reveals a lack of design (Wilde 2008/1889: 48-50): 'life carries on, everybody knows that' (Goll 1988/1922: 175). Theatre is also affective: it appeals to desire and emotion, and tends to promote the extreme and exceptional, which exacerbates conflict (Weber 2004: 3). However aspects of political life also share design and finish, and politics is not above appealing to desire and emotion and provoking extremes (Apter 2006: 251) even if some claim it should appeal to reason and be about finding effective means of regulating and controlling conflict. Theatre itself may appeal to reason and 'promote what is shared' (Weber 2004: 31) as much as the reverse: the crucial factor is what kind of theatre is invoked. In any case 'the active use of reason' in political life is 'fundamentally dependent on emotion' (Marcus 2002: 7), particularly the emotion of anxiety because 'conflict and the attention it brings' is what produces the rationality theorists so desire in politics: 'people are motivated to be rational not by rational imperatives but by emotional appraisals' (Marcus 2002: 136n6, 148; Miller 2011).

The dynamics that generate drama are already dimensions of public life (Klapp 1976: 8; Turner 1988). Life can turn into drama because:

1. almost anyone can steal the show.

⁸ Television soap operas and activist theatre for instance are already being used to promote desirable social aims such as safe sex practices, gender equality, land rights etc (Van Zoonen 2005; Williams 2001).

2. a small part has an advantage over a large one (more freedom);
3. almost any kind of struggle or issue can become important;
4. any confrontation can produce unexpected outcomes;
5. the 'scale' of individuals can be changed by mere juxtaposition;
6. timing is enormously important (although there is no way one can be sure to 'get the timing right')
7. spectators have expectations that create pressure on those under scrutiny
8. outcome does not necessarily equal input: no-one can predict from the input what the outcome of confrontation will be, or indeed when something one might call an outcome might be achieved since endings are often not known until it is too late (Klapp 1976: 68-75).

These same 'peculiar laws' of dramatic encounters also apply to theatre. People can 'steal the show' in theatre as well as in politics. Some experimental and participatory theatre is in fact predicated on just these possibilities. In any case, humans have a natural tendency to try and impose order on life through the use of devices that mark and break up time (Turner 1988: 72). Aspects of political life are often episodic, while theatre as a practice has a similar longevity to politics. The apparent autonomy and ephemerality of any one particular performance, production or even company does not mean that theatre as a practice has no continuity: 'theater is not only signification and communication' (De Marinis 1993: 1) and [D]emocratic politics cannot be solely a space of calm deliberation. It must also be a sensational place, one that attracts and engages spectators ... Only by doing so can it create the conditions for new possibilities ... democratic citizens [can] be at their very best and of the highest order ... because they can feel and think (Marcus 2003: 148).

There is still one aspect of theatre that may prove problematic. As an art, theatre is said to be 'absolutely indifferent to facts ... a form of deception [that] has nothing to do with reality' (Wilde 2008/1889: 48-50). A politics indifferent to reality would indeed be disturbing. Concern about deception is an almost constant theme of the theatre metaphor when applied to politics. It is also a long-standing concern in theatre theory. However, theatre is only like this in certain respects. As a practice anchored in reality and dependent on reality for survival, it can only be indifferent to facts in relation to the images it stages and even there, for a performance to be experienced collectively, some anchoring in reality has to exist if only as a point of departure (Bullough 1912: 92; Capon 1965: 263-6; McGillivray 2007: 128). Although the illusions produced on stage are the major source of the criticism of theatre as well as the most prominent concern of users of theatre as a political metaphor, this criticism needs to be considered with some scepticism. It is almost invariably elite spectators who claim that other spectators are easily taken in by these illusions as they are apparently by political illusions while critics somehow remain immune. Yet the evidence for this mass deception is largely apocryphal: '[r]are indeed is the theatregoer who mistakes a play for real life' (Merelman 1976/1969: 285).⁹ There have certainly been riots and 'scandals' in the theatre but these have not been because spectators were deluded (Blackadder 2003). Although sometimes these were because of factors such as ticket prices, more often than not they occurred because the conventions of theatre that would have allowed a willing suspension of disbelief had been broken: particular actors were felt to be miscast; topics or language not considered fit for public presentation were aired or subjects mishandled in some way that offended.¹⁰ Spectator response to the first production of June Jordan's play I was looking at the ceiling and then I saw the sky: earthquake/romance in 1995 indicates that spectators were far from deluded. They were capable of differentiating between the performers and those responsible for the production, applauding the actors but loudly booing the director and composer, and reacting with both ‘vitriol’ and glee ‘at something so awful coming from such a lauded group of American artists’ (Bennett 1997: 183).¹¹ Self-serving is not a trait spectators welcome in theatre practitioners any more than in political actors (Birch and Allen 2010: 55; Smith et al. 2007: 296).

⁹ The usual story is of some 'yokel' being so taken in by the drama before him that he leapt on stage to wrest the gun from the actor's hands and rescue the heroine. Although no-one seems to know when this actually occurred, the involvement of a gun suggests that the story arose in the nineteenth century when popular melodrama was at its peak.

¹⁰ The Old Price riots of 1809, in which, for sixty-one performances in Drury Lane, spectators rhythmically shouted 'O-P, O-P, O-P' throughout the performance, and devised a dance called the O-P dance which it would break into, along with much stamping of feet and canes, cat-calls, ringing of bells and hissing, were about rising ticket prices. Riots over Victor Hugo's Hernani were over the style and rules of a drama which marked a shift from neo-classicism to romanticism. The riots raged over fifty-five nights and often involved actual fighting (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 360). Spectators were scandalised by George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion because of his use of the expletive 'bloody' (Mount 1972: 197-8). Ibsen's play The Ghosts also brought a violent reaction. The play dealt with both syphilis and divorce. Neither subject was considered acceptable on the stage. Ibsen was accused of attacking the family as an institution and violating standards of decency (Brockett and Ball 2004: 155).

The belief in the deceptiveness of theatre that underpins most casual or unthinking uses of the theatre metaphor in Western culture has consequences for the way spectators are viewed. Not only are they considered passive, unquestioning receivers of the illusions presented (Schieffelin 1998: 202), they need to be passive since they are likely to be deluded.¹² Yet it may not be that spectators are susceptible to illusion but that practitioners have a very blinkered idea of both the interests of spectators and the intersections between their spectators and the wider society. When Irish playwright W.B. Yeats and his partner Lady Gregory brought in the British police to quell a protest against a play that appeared to attack the Irish at a time when the desire for Irish nationalism was at its height, and were surprised that this proved ‘as a match to ... resin’ (Lady Gregory in Blackadder 2003: 80-1), they indicated that practitioners rather than spectators were the ones deluded by theatre.¹³ The fact is ‘that people are difficult to fool’ (Lewis-Beck and Stegmaier 2011: 267; Smith 2009; Smith et al. 2007: 297). One of the vital tasks of spectators may be to keep actors grounded (Arendt 1958: 233-4).

In any case, theatre has developed a variety of strategies and conventions to manage the possibility that the illusions it generates might be mistaken for reality. Although it plays with these conventions, eventually the limits of any performance will be reached and performers will signal that spectators should disperse: '[n]ot only are we never deluded, or anything like it; but the highest possible degree of delusion to beings in their senses sitting in a theatre' is an absurdity (Coleridge 1994/1808: 222).¹⁴ Two forms of convention are used by theatre: rhetorical and authenticating (Burns 1972: 43-6). Rhetorical conventions govern the relationship between practitioners and spectators. They are controlled and determined by practitioners, but can be rejected by spectators if they do not meet expectations. They include a variety of dramatic devices as well as architecture (Carlisle 1991), social settings, ticketing requirements, methods of signalling starting and finishing times, intervals, applause cues etc (Burns 1972: 43-6; Elam 1980; Willis 2002). Authenticating conventions refer to the relationships between characters and events within a play that are designed to 'turn the taken for granted into a plausible appearance' (Mangham and Overington 1987: 49).¹⁵ The current discourse of transparency and accountability in relation to political life and the regulation of political events such as elections, political advertising and political dissent indicate that such strategies are already in existence. The fact is that much political activity is as invisible to spectators as theatrical activity and spectators must trust that things are carried out as they should be in both areas as they observe what does appear. To insist that politics as theatre, unlike actual politics, would be entirely 'indifferent to facts' and a 'form of deception' is to not only idealise (and limit) political activity but to confuse the limited activity on-stage with the entire activity of theatre and collapse the two forms of conventions.

¹¹ Director Peter Sellars’ response to this reaction is apposite. He declared that ‘[i]n a culture like America’s, which offers gross gratification to every desire, it’s important sometimes to frustrate the audience’s expectations. It even becomes a point of honour’ (cited in Bennett 1997: 183).

¹² This, of course, does not stop theatre practitioners such as Artaud or Richard Schechner or any number of performance artists from trying to stir up spectators, but they do so on the assumption that they are passive.

¹³ Typical of this displacement is Hoipoloi’s actor/director Dale-Jones’ puzzlement over how spectators seem to ‘know they’re watching a piece of theatre but ... leave thinking it’s real’ (Tovey 2009: 13) when he has gone to extraordinary lengths to ensure that the line between his character and himself is so blurred as to be almost invisible. The character Dale-Jones plays in Floating is listed in the program as a collaborator, is intentionally autobiographical, and has a Face-book identity which is easily locatable. Outside theatre, people who go to such lengths to dupe people for money are generally considered criminals.

It is appropriate at this point to revisit the definition of politics proposed in Chapter One:

¹⁴ Emphasis added.

¹⁵ Authenticating conventions were recognized by Aristotle but confused by later theorists with what Burns calls rhetorical conventions, leading to lengthy debates over where the requirements lay: within the play or between play and spectators. At its most extreme, a misunderstanding of what Aristotle meant by unity of time led to torturously long performances as playwrights tried to pack the events of a play within actual time to meet the restrictions of verisimilitude or truthfulness. Users of the theatre metaphor continually confuse the two kinds of conventions.

Politics consists centrally of the area of collective social life that involves decision-making, the ranking of policy options, the regulation of dissent, the mobilization of support for those activities, [‘the constrained use of social power’] and the construction of political visions (Freeden 2005: 115; Goodin and Klingeman 1996: 6).

Certainly theatre as an activity fits this description. Like politics, it is an area of collective life in which decisions are made about what to do, how to do it and who it is for. Conventions regulate disruptive behaviour as well as the possibility of misunderstanding, but, more so than in politics, there is a recognized place for transgression. Dissent is a long-accepted characteristic of most kinds of theatre, even commercial theatre. The long slide-show of the faces of mixed-race children at the end of Miss Saigon, for instance, clearly demonstrates one of the most heart-breaking but usually hidden consequences of war.¹⁶ Nevertheless, all theatre including subversive forms must attract support if they are to succeed. All are also engaged in generating visions of life. Some of these visions will appear more ‘real’ than others, but will be no less constructed. Indeed, unlike politics, theatre has the virtue of being widely understood as an art of construction.

One political writer has seriously considered institutionalised politics as theatre: Ferdinand Mount. Mount argues that there is a ‘theatrical element running through all political activity’ (Mount 1972: 5). These theatrical elements are not add-ons for pandering to or distracting the masses. Rather, they are an essential part of what makes politics what it is: ‘the idea that there is real (efficient, useful) politics which is masked by an unreal (superficial) sham show is one of the most potent delusions of our time’ (Mount 1972: 8). The value of recognizing politics as theatre for Mount lies in theatre’s interactive relationship with its public. If ‘the theatrical element is central and ubiquitous’ in politics ‘then a major role ... must be conceded to the actual opinions of the public’ (Mount 1972: 9). Mount’s view of politics thus maps readily onto the requirements of the model presented here.

¹⁶ Miss Saigon was widely criticised on a number of grounds, including its racially insensitive casting policy, but it nevertheless brought home to a huge audience some of the costs, and hidden victims, of war.

It is possible to see Bernard Manin's representative government fitting the model too, not so much because he uses the term audience democracy or because of his use of the theatre metaphor, which is very modest, but because of the separation he reveals as inevitable between rulers and ruled, a separation that articulates the relationship between actor and spectators required by the model. Although Arendt also insists on this separation, her understanding of politics is problematic in that there does not seem to be much place for regular politics or a politics that infiltrates the social sphere. Manin's conception covers both possibilities, as well as allowing for dissent.

One aspect of Freedman's definition of politics that might prove problematic is the implication that politics lies within social life. For much of their theoretical history, both politics and theatre have been seen as lying outside social life. Arendtian politics draws a very sharp and highly contested distinction between politics and the social, but most conceptions of politics draw this line to some extent. Hays, for instance, incorporates a significant amount of life into his realm of the 'political', but there is still a remainder: a 'realm of necessity' or fate where politics does not operate (Hay 2007: 79). Similarly, of the models of theatre discussed in the previous chapter, only Fischer-Lichte's clearly embeds theatre within society. Mount sees politics and society as separated in much the same way as actors are separated from spectators in theatre. The political actor moves in the political realm like an actor on stage, but retains the social and cultural links with the society from which he comes to the extent that he can be recognized as an appropriate representative, capable of speaking for his constituents.

Various forms of rule have attempted to close the gap between rulers and ruled just as various forms of participatory and communitarian theatre have attempted to close the gap between actors and spectators. Theatre shows that this can only be done at the expense of theatre. Politics as theatre, at any rate, cannot do without this gap. However, Manin's analysis of representative government and its historical metamorphosis shows some of the shifts that might explain why politics and society come to be seen as separate by some and more or less indivisible by others. The key lies in the way the gap between rulers and ruled manifests. Manin argues that even in the most committed democracies there is always a gap between rulers and ruled that makes it seem like politics lies outside of society because candidates must find ways to distinguish themselves from other candidates in order for choice to be meaningful and because electors required to choose will always select the ‘truly superior’ (Manin 1997: 74, 139-149), although the criteria used to judge superiority vary. Where the criteria have something to do with a capacity for trusteeship (e.g. trust, notability, long-standing commitment to the region, expertise), the gap between representatives and represented, politics and society, will be horizontal and very evident. Where the criteria include likeness (both representative and represented come from the same group) the gap will be vertical, and will match exactly the cleavages within society. Politics and society will then appear to be deeply interconnected along lines of similarity, but divided along lines of social differences. Vertical cleavages are more likely to shift because there are multiple ways a society can be split according to similarity and difference, which may add to the perception that politics resides within the social, but it is the nature of the gap that will determine where politics is seen to reside.¹⁷ Indeed Rancière suggests that politics (which he equates with democracy) resides in this gap, a view supported by the later theories of Wolin and Pitkin (Hauptmann 2004: 53; Xenos 2001): ‘Democracy is a political moment, perhaps the political moment, when the political is remembered and recreated’ (Wolin 1996: 55). What lie on either side are either institutionalised forms of political power (police) or society. That Manin is able to demonstrate that his four principles of representative government apply to quite different forms of government entailing different kinds of cleavage indicates that there is a certain routine to government that could be equated to police and that would be the equivalent to the routine and largely unseen administration of any theatre. The widespread understanding of politics as a ‘realm of contingency and deliberation’ (Hay 2007: 79) would then occur at the visible site of theatre: on the stage – wherever that might be.

¹⁷ This perhaps explains why critical theory underpinned by an appreciation of Marx has been more ready to see politics ‘everywhere’.

Mount: Politics and Appearance

Like Green, Mount cites Shakespeare's Coriolanus but not to draw attention to the possibilities of politicians 'being grinded' (Green 2010: 138) – he already considers politics a 'grinding trade' (Mount in Moss 2008) – but to explore why politicians in representative forms of government, like actors, are so frequently reviled as 'insidious and crafty' individuals 'whose councils are directed by the momentary fluctuations of affairs' (Adam Smith in Mount 1972: 123):

This feeling of revulsion goes beyond a healthy distrust of any politician's motives; it even goes beyond the distaste [felt] for the spectacle of someone 'on the make', a spectacle which is of course heightened by the spotlights of the political theatre (Mount 1972: 123).

Dissatisfaction with leaders appears to be one of the 'enduring features of modern representative democracy' (Smith et al. 2007: 285). It seems 'nobody loves a politician' (Gollop 2004). Mount sees this situation as hugely problematic because politics in the end depends on appearance. The function of political actors is to manage the worst of life so that it becomes bearable for all. To do this, they must communicate across distance. Visibility is a 'necessity' of their craft (Mount 1972: 113) but is also one of its perils. What to show and how to ensure that it is understood as intended are primary dilemmas facing any kind of actor.¹⁸ Representation always involves the possibility of misunderstanding. Even a politician's absence from the 'scene' will be considered significant and interpreted as meaningful: '[t]o appear always means to seem to others' (Arendt 1978/1971: 21).¹⁹

¹⁸ Mount suggests that the much-publicised incident when Lincoln removed his hat and bowed to an old Negro amongst a cheering crowd 'helped to provoke' his assassination not long after and that Lincoln knew at the time that his gesture was risky: 'for nobody knew better than Lincoln himself the depth of the feelings which the gesture embodied, the bitterness of the hatred which it was bound to inflame' (Mount 1972: 255-6).

¹⁹ Emphasis added. An example of this aspect of politics was the failure of then Australian Opposition Leader Mark Latham to immediately publicly comment on the tsunami which devastated south-east Asia in 2005. Latham was ill at the time and left comment to his deputy,

Since politics and theatre share this fundamental problem, theatre is the most appropriate paradigm for politics.²⁰ No other alternative takes account of the central problem of politics, that ‘the material answers back’ (Mount 1972: 48). However, the consequence of this paradigm is that ‘a major role on the political stage must be conceded to the actual opinions of the public’ and how they are transmitted to the actor, for it is the public who judges the show and decides whether or not it ‘corresponds with [its] notion of how the part should be played’ (Mount 1972: 9, 113). While the first task of an aspiring politician is to ‘gain an audience’:

[H]is next task is to respect the autonomy of that audience, to recognise that its support is voluntarily given and may be equally voluntarily withdrawn and also that the politician cannot forcibly seize or regain its attention (Mount 1972: 225).

The politician’s main task, like the actor’s, is persuasion. It is thus ‘exquisitely political’ (Nadia Urbinati in Landemore 2007). It does not matter whether politicians are sincere or truthful. What matters is that they are effective at gaining and maintaining the public’s attention. An actor who cannot hold spectator attention is a failure as an actor. Similarly ‘a politician who cannot gain or keep an audience is no politician at all’. Both end up out of a job because neither theatre nor politics can afford ‘self-obsession’ (Mount 1972: 11, 234).

Good politics, like good theatre, should be a kind of conversation between ‘friends’ that seeks to build on life through the vehicle of consent (Mount 1972: 67, 234). It should be based on recognition of the feelings of affection and aspiration that drive all human beings. In large scale representative systems this conversation is carried on visually. It therefore appeals to the receptivity, patience and sympathy of constituents as an 'audience'. Politics is about the public expression, in a common language, of common concerns. Political actors draw on their own experience and the experiences of their audience to propose solutions to the problems of living together, and constituents respond by giving or refusing consent to these proposals.

Jenny Macklin. This was not considered to be appropriate behaviour in a political leader and Latham was widely condemned by the government, the media and members of the opposition who did not support him as leader. He lost his position not long after (Lagan 2005: 23).

²⁰ Mount cites three alternative paradigms: politics as battle (continuous open-ended struggle, as in Hobbes and Machiavelli); politics as pilgrimage (continuous movement forwards as in Lenin, Turgot or Bacon); and politics as science (something which aims at changing society for the better, as in the work of Condorcet and Marx). All describe the world in a way that allows the world to be acted upon. They exhibit a distrust of the masses (Mount 1972: 37).

However, constituent response, like spectator response, can be unpredictable (Mount 1972: 48; Parry and Richardson 2011). The usual response of politics to this unpredictability is to silence spectators. 'Inferior' forms of theatre do this as well. Theatre of shock or novelty such as avant-garde theatre, for instance, treats spectators with disdain, harassing them into silence or assaulting them in order to change them in some way. It does this by collapsing the distance between actors and spectators, which destroys the possibility of communication (Crick 1971/1963: 138).²¹ Theatre of embarrassment on the other hand elongates and distorts the communication lines between actors and spectators in order to provoke situations that embarrass spectators (Mount 1972: 88).²² Both treat spectators 'like a school child' (Lorca 2008/1934: 205). Consequently not all kinds of theatre are suitable models for politics, although they can be invoked. Revolutionary politics, for instance, is a theatre of novelty or shock because it tries to turn everyone into actors and contemporary representative politics can be a theatre of embarrassment when it forces people to shout to make themselves heard and then accuses them of being over-demanding. All these kinds of political theatre do is suppress opinion until it reaches a critical mass whereupon it explodes in revolution, scandals or riots. 'Good' theatre, the theatre of sentiment, on the other hand, offers politics a model that does not aim to act upon the people.

²¹ Mount includes happenings and physical theatre such as the confrontational work performed by the Living Theatre in this category. The Living Theatre was an American experimental theatre group formed by Julian Beck to explore techniques in non-naturalist acting. The group desired to 'free the individual to feel and to create' (Beck 1970 in Carlson 1984: 469). During their production of Paradise Now, naked actors mingled with spectators, urging them to remove their clothes, and spat on them if they didn't (Brockett and Ball 2004: 228). The critic Charles Marowitz wrote 'An Open Letter to the Becks' arguing that such aggressive antagonism of their spectators was not only at odds with the group's professed belief in non-violence, but was counter-productive because it mustered 'intellectual resistance' amongst people who would otherwise have supported their work, and thus prevented what they were trying to achieve – the obliteration of 'that impregnable line that separates life and art' (Brockett and Ball 2004: 229). Marowitz blamed the aggression on 'the more psychopathic members' of the company, suggesting again that it may be practitioners rather than spectators who get carried away by a theatrical activity.

²² Hoipoloi (see note 13) would be an example of this kind of theatre, as would any kind of theatre which picks on spectators and puts them on the spot.

It avoids this danger because it recognizes that theatre is a public activity in which spectators are an essential constitutive element as well as its judge. Its form is conventional, its sentiments familiar, it uses the given language, it generally reflects society, it presents 'roles' with which spectators can easily identify, when it wants to break new ground it does it 'with old spades' (Mount 1972: 234), and it understands that, whether practitioners like it or not, the audience 'answers back' (Mount 1972: 48).

The theatre of sentiment 'relies on a universe of discourse shared by both actors and audience' (Mount 1972: 196-7). Mount calls this shared discourse prejudice, a term he borrows from Edmund Burke along with the theatres of novelty and sentiment. Prejudice simply means a strongly held belief based on what is already known. It need not be negative. Prejudice is convenient, efficient and useful, particularly in a crisis, because it reduces hesitation. It encompasses 'a sense of pride, partiality, or real affection' (Burke 1969/1790: 329) and is 'the commonest fuel' of public feeling (Mount 1972: 160). Burke believed that politics was 'inseparable from prejudice' (Mansfield Jr 1987: 705). This is why he argued that politics should make use of its existing institutions rather than try to overthrow them for 'it is far more effective to make use of the natural affection felt both by the political actor and the political audience for existing institutions than to start entirely afresh' (Mount 1972: 169).²³ In any case, it was often the particular 'play' rather than the institution that was at fault. Politics, like theatre, had both a visible, showy, episodic aspect and a largely unnoticed routine aspect. To pan a show did not require overturning the entire institution.

The theatre of sentiment tends to be commercial theatre since commercial theatre recognizes that its existence depends on its ability to attract and keep spectators. It therefore recognizes people as they are. It also recognizes the impact of affection and prejudice and tries to build on that rather than knock it down. Commercial theatre is thus an example of the way a relationship between strangers can be conducted as a friendship (Mount 1972: 234). Mount argues that the antagonistic relationships with spectators engaged in by radical politics and radical theatre that are designed to collapse the distance between actors and spectators simply ‘wreak havoc’ on both (Mount 1972: 235). Calls for participation in decision-making were not only difficult to implement in large societies, they were misguided. The more important participatory avenues occur before and after decision-making, when constituents/spectators articulate their views, politicians/actors announce and defend their proposed solutions and account for the results, and constituents/spectators make their judgments by consenting or not to the continued presence of the political actor (Mount 1972: 251). It is this public responsiveness that makes both ‘good’ politics and ‘good’ theatre.

²³ Both Mount and Mansfield consider that Burke has been widely misunderstood, especially when linked with conservatism, which simply reveals that 'standing up for the truth of experience is uphill work' (Mount 2006). Burke's often inordinate praise of the English Constitution was based to a large extent on its unfixed nature. It did not impose a plan so much as reflect the varied interests of a free society at any one time, supported by a principle of 'inherited property' – by which he meant not the acquisition of property so much as that the products of human activity, of which government was one, were inherited. Change occurred because of the constant need to match this inheritance with changing circumstances. The people were 'the masters' and let their rulers know when they were 'sufferers'. Politicians were 'workmen' who generally repaired and maintained the inheritance, but were nevertheless capable of removing parts which no longer functioned properly (Mansfield 1987: 700-02; Mount 1972: 158-167).

As a sometime political figure Mount is in a position to understand the importance of public visibility to politics, although his rejection of both radical politics and radical theatre suggests a conservative leaning.²⁴ Does this make politics theatre? Some aspects of his account tell against this. For instance, although actors and politicians engage in much the same work, the political spotlight is an enduring one for the political actor. It ‘allows him no real distinction between public and private life’ (Mount 1972: 256), a condition experienced by celebrity politicians and film stars, but not by most theatre actors or even minor politicians (Parry and Richardson 2011). Like actors, politicians must master the craft of self-projection. The self that is projected must encompass the ‘dual’ aspect of representation: that it involves both presence and representation, the self and the function one is undertaking. However, unlike the actor, this duality is not between a real person (the actor) and a fictional creation (the character) but between the need for a public persona and a personal morality. Representation for political actors entails ‘a duty to the public and a duty to ²⁴ Mount was head of the Policy Unit under the Thatcher government from 1982-3 and wrote the Conservative Party’s 1983 general election manifesto. He is currently a political commentator for The Spectator. Nevertheless, the book under consideration here, Theatre of Politics, is listed as a ‘novel’ in Wikipedia (see http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ferdinand_Mount).

[one's] own conscience' that can entail a conflict 'between detachment and involvement'. Theatrical actors have long had to manage this dilemma (Mount 1972: 117), and theatre theory has periodically debated how they do it. This may make some actor training useful for politicians, but need not turn politics into theatre.

Mount also gets caught up in his metaphor. He divides his book into Acts, as if it was a play. An account of the theatre metaphor embedded in a theatre metaphor and that at times uses quotations from plays to support its points can obscure as much as illuminate.²⁵ One thing that is obscured is Burke's vehement rejection of theatre as an appropriate model for politics based on his experience of the French Revolution.²⁶ Although Burke also describes politicians as 'expert artists' he goes on to say they are 'skilful workmen' (Burke Speech on the Oeconomical Reform cited in Mount 1972: 166). They may be craftsmen rather than actors under this description. In any case, for Burke, rhetoric was 'the natural theatrical element in politics' (Mount 1972: 194), although visibility was important. If Burke epitomizes the kind of politician Mount has in mind –

²⁵ Fortunately Mount provides many examples from politics and political literature as well. It is not that these are any less constructed than a piece of fiction, but their authorship is acknowledged. This is important not from the point of view of interpretation – a reader can make what they like of the words – but in understanding that one mind has generated what appears to be multiple points of view (Whitebrook 1996).

²⁶ Many theorists read Burke as a prolific user of the theatre metaphor, particularly in his reflections on the French revolution. See, for example, Paine (1961/1791-2), Boulton (1963), Hindson and Gray (1988). He certainly thought of theatre as a seeing-place and there is no doubt that he used theatrical terminology, and he occasionally appeared to give a succinct account of the stoic version of the theatrum mundi: 'We are on a conspicuous stage, and the world marks our demeanour' (Burke 1852/1780a: 422); 'It was with regret that [King] Richard found himself obliged to leave a theatre, on which he had planned such an illustrious scene of action' (1876: 310); 'I still keep a look towards [public affairs], and gratify my mind with the dream of doing something on the English stage' (1852/1792: 120); 'our sovereign condescends himself to act not only the principal, but all the subordinate parts in the play' (1852/1780b: 358). Burke speaks of his death as a 'departure from the public stage' (Burke 1852/1796: 314). But his actual use of theatre metaphors is quite modest, with none at all used for nearly 200 pages in Reflections – a book of only 307 pages (Todd's 1959 edition published by Holt, Rinehart & Winston). Love (1965) argues that Burke's dominant metaphors in his political writings were related to images of a body corporate, machinery, architecture and inheritance. He also used the metaphor of seduction in an extended way in the Regicide Letters. An electronic search of Volume 1 of The works and correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke on a number of possible theatrical terms (drama, players, tragic, tragedy, tragicomedy, stage, theatre, theatrical, artificial, spectator, image, plot, scene, eyes, perform, performance, role, part, audience) revealed a minimal usage of those terms. Volume 1 was selected for study because it was generally devoted to his correspondence and parliamentary addresses between 1744 and 1791. If Burke was a prolific user of the theatre metaphor, it should have shown up in such material. Certainly, he was an inveterate user of metaphors in general. Boswell claimed to be astonished at Burke's use of figurative language: 'He was like a man in an orchard where boughs loaded with fruit hung around him, and he pulled apples as fast as he pleased and pelted the Ministry' (Boswell cited in Fussell 1965: 167).

principled, articulate and enormously energetic in striving for what he thinks is right, as well as capable of gaining sufficient support from his constituencies to keep him a politician for almost all his adult life (Mansfield 1987: 687) – then at heart Mount’s book is a plea for a return to a more full-bodied appreciation of the importance of rhetoric, including visual rhetoric or gesture, rather than theatre.²⁷

However, Mount’s paradigm is valuable in that it brings out a different relationship between political actors and spectators than that brought out by Green: one of friendship and reciprocity. Rather than reverse the relationship between actors and spectators so that political power appears to lie with spectators, Mount shares it between the two, for both rely on each other in order to exercise it. Although Mount’s invocation of theatre turns the onus for public satisfaction and involvement on to the performers of politics, spectators too have an obligation to the relationship: to understand that the job that politicians do, like the job that actors do, requires them to do many of the things that spectators might prefer not to do: appeal to men’s baser instincts in order to achieve necessary things for social life; generalise issues in ways that appear to treat people as objects; balance and reconcile interests while trying to keep their own interests and values uncontaminated; draw on artifice to stage moments of intimate contact with their constituents, and operate levers of management and persuasion. What is more, they must operate ‘in full and constant view of their clients’ and their failures are highlighted while their successes at improving the lot of their constituents are rarely acknowledged (Mount 1972: 123-4).²⁸ Much of this work is banal, and may even be as odious to politicians as it appears to be to spectators.

²⁷ Although Burke’s constituents were clearly satisfied with him, it appears he was distrusted both by the leading statesmen of his time and members of his own party, and never rose above the office of Paymaster-General. He was thought to be too passionate, ‘too heated in counsel’. Mansfield believes it was also because of his ability ‘to see deep into the root of events’, which made the seemingly mundane appear too significant, and what was deemed foolishness at the time has come to seem ‘wise ... for posterity’ (Burke in Mansfield 1987: 688). Mallory, on the other hand, attributed his ‘manic self-presentation’ to boredom (Mallory 2003: 235), although it is hard to see even the most loyal constituents re-elect time and time again some-one who was just ‘acting out’. Given Mount’s point regarding the need for people to shout to make themselves heard in the theatre of embarrassment, it may be that Burke felt pushed to histrionics to make his point.

²⁸ Young (2001: 174) suggests that, in Australia anyway, this is partly because there is a lack of ‘straightforward, objective ‘performance indicators’ by which the public can assess political performance.

Both theatre and politics fail when the relationship between practitioners and spectators is not reciprocal. If, as Mount suggests, representative government requires a different approach to get its message across because of the difficulty of ‘easy and intimate dialogue between rulers and ruled’ (Mount 1972: 71) then thinking of politics as the theatre of sentiment may offer an alternative to the personality politics currently associated with representative politics because it offers a more equal connection between rulers and ruled in which there is a positive recognition of the skills and needs of both sides. All rule requires some degree of consent. Freely given consent in a spirit of friendship rather than antagonism, although it still holds rulers to account, is likely in the end to be a more satisfactory form of rule for both sides. Mount’s account also draws a useful distinction between the kinds of theatre likely to achieve ‘good’ politics. Not all kinds of theatre make an appropriate model for an institutionalised form of representative government. The key lies in the way the gap between rulers and ruled is managed.

Manin’s Principles of Representative Government

Manin argues that all forms of representative government share the same four principles:

1. Election of representatives at regular intervals;
2. Partial autonomy of representatives;
3. Freedom of public opinion and
4. Trial by discussion (Manin 1997: 197-9).

These principles are worked out differently in each form, however since all forms have these principles, the principles can be used to analyse different kinds of representative government. To demonstrate this, he develops three historically based ‘ideal-types’: parliamentarianism, party democracy and audience democracy. He argues that representative government has moved from its initial appearance as parliamentarianism to party democracy to audience democracy in Western forms of representative government, sometimes smoothly, but sometimes with ruptures in which other forms of government have intervened. Nevertheless, whenever representative government is in place, the four principles come into operation.

Manin opposes representative government to what he calls ‘absolute representation’ along the lines theorised by Hobbes, on the basis of ‘freedom of public opinion’. In representative government, the ‘collective voice of the people ... can always manifest itself beyond the control of those in government’ whereas in absolute representation, ‘the representative entirely replaces the represented. They have no other voice than his’ (Manin 1997: 173-5). In representative government, a representative can never speak with complete confidence and certainty as ‘the people’ because the people are made up of many different possible groupings and can always manifest these different groupings through petitions, demonstrations, polls etc. Representatives are thus never substitutes for their constituents.

There is also always a gap between those who rule and the ruled. No matter how strong the principle of equality, elites of some kind are elected as representatives although the criteria for selection will vary from form to form and the gap between rulers and ruled will manifest differently. For example, under parliamentarianism, the elected tend to be ‘notables’ of some kind, usually known to electors, the gap between representatives and electors is horizontal and many of the concerns of electors are quite different from the concerns of the elected; under party democracy, the elected tend to be the most capable activists and organisers, the gap tends to be vertical and concerns are shared between the political realm and the social realm along this vertical divide; under audience democracy, the elected tend to be ‘media experts’ (individuals who are capable of utilising communication media well), the gap is once again horizontal and once again the concerns of the electors tend to differ from the concerns of the elected since ‘public opinion and electoral expression do not coincide’ (Manin 1997: 193-235). Finally, in representative government of any kind, the right to rule has to be renewed regularly (Manin 1997: 175). Representative government does not have to be democratic, but will be democratic the more strongly it adheres to these principles.

Audience democracy arises under conditions of mass communication where parties have lost their ability to enforce vertical cleavages on the society and where governmental activity has increased in scope and complexity (Manin 1997: 220). It involves a 'personalization of electoral choice' (Manin 1997: 226). Campaigns are increasingly dominated by media specialists, polling experts and journalists, and representatives acquire political power because of their media skills rather than their resemblance to their constituents. Voters are 'floating' (Manin 1997: 232), but are likely to be well-informed in comparison to party voters because they are exposed to a wider variety of political communication since the avenues of political communication are for the most part independent of political parties in that they are not owned and run by parties. This does not mean that some avenues will not favour some parties over others but that their economic survival will require them to present a broader spectrum of information than party owned media. In all forms of representative government, but particularly in audience democracy, 'the search for political information is costly', which is why electors are quick to pick up new forms of information short-cutting. Personalities rather than platforms represent one such informational short-cut (Manin 1997: 222, 228).

In all elections 'a candidate ... must not only define himself, but also his adversaries' in order to 'present a difference'. Candidates who could not do this 'would not win an electoral contest' (Manin in Landemore 2007). This is particularly problematic in audience democracy. There are so many social and cultural lines along which a candidate could construct differentiation and they must try and accurately predict 'which of these potential splits will be more effective and advantageous to them' (Manin 1997: 223). This does however leave the initiative with them for constructing the terms under which they present themselves 'on the political stage'. It is because of this relative autonomy that Manin designates this form of representative government audience democracy (Manin 1997: 222). Audience is however, a misnomer. It is clear from Manin's argument that this kind of democracy operates through the use of images pitted against each other (Manin 1997: 227). Electors are in fact spectators. Spectators elevate 'the media expert' into government and pass judgment reactively via acclamation or declamation, based on their media performance (Manin 1997: 220-1).

Although the media here does not appear to be theatre, Manin argues that the ‘metaphor of stage and audience is more adequate’ to express this reality (Manin 1997: 225). Audience democracy is a more democratic form of representative government than either alternative type in that neither the media nor the means of ascertaining public opinion are under the control of politicians. Opinion surveys also ‘give a voice to the “apathetic” and uninterested citizen’ (Manin 1997: 231).

Manin argues that each stage through which representative government has passed has arisen because of a ‘crisis’ in relation to democracy. Party democracy was seen as bringing parliamentarianism closer to the ‘grassroots’ (Manin 1997: 193). Audience democracy was the response to a crisis in party democracy: falling party membership and the fracturing of political allegiances across lines other than class. Nevertheless all accord with his four principles. Unlike Mount’s account of representative government, however, none of the spectators of Manin’s representative forms of government appear to hold equal power with political actors or anything like a reciprocal relationship. Although voting remains important as a mechanism of acclamation or declamation, the interaction occurs between political personalities as they confront one another through the media.

While recent research by Parry and Richardson (2011: 4) indicates that spectators with access to new forms of media (e.g. Twitter) are not only far from passive, but creative and sometimes wildly irreverent about the images of the politicians they see in the media, the question of spectator passivity in Manin’s account raises a crucial question about the idea of politics as theatre, for one of the major complaints of theatre theory throughout the twentieth century against ‘orthodox’ theatre (by which was generally meant nineteenth century proscenium arch theatre with its distinct separation between performers and spectators) was spectator passivity. Spectators were apparently leaving their normal behaviour in the 'cloakroom' with their hats and simply accepting whatever was 'dished up' (Brecht 2000/1930: 450-1). To see them in the theatre was to see:

[S]omewhat motionless figures in a peculiar condition: they seem strenuously to be tensing all their muscles, except where these are flabby and exhausted. They scarcely communicate with each other; their relations are those of a lot of sleepers ... True, their eyes are open, but they stare rather than see, just as they listen rather than hear. They look at the stage as if in a trance (Brecht 1998/1948: 237-8).

Under such conditions, it does not seem likely that there could be a reciprocal relationship between actors and spectators. This would be a considerable blow to the model being presented here as well as to Mount's conception of politics as theatre, because the theatre of sentiment is precisely the kind of theatre Brecht was complaining had this soporific effect. It would also be a blow to Manin's third and fourth principles because on this account, spectators would not be capable of either an opinion or discussion.

There are two issues to be considered here. The first is that what Brecht was seeing may have been intense concentration. Absent-mindedness and immobility are the most visible signs of thinking (Arendt 1978/1971: 72). The images of children filmed while engaging intensely in a video game in Figure 6.3 on page 201 indicate that staring as if in a trance may be the result of concentration on a visual medium. The fact is that perception cannot be observed directly (Hershenon 1999: 4).

The second issue concerns the use of the term audience in lieu of spectators. Both Mount and Manin use the term when they mean spectators, as do far too many theatre theorists. This is not only to reduce disparate human beings to a single, monolithic object, but, according to theatre theory, it is to presuppose a coherence that a theatrical performance is meant to generate in the course of the performance through the interaction of actors and spectators.

Figure 6.3 'Game Faces' by photographer Robbie Cooper for his 'Immersion' project (Woodard 2009)

Spectators as 'audience'

The Generality of those who frequent Plays, may rather be called Spectators, than an Audience; their whole Delight is in their Eyes (Edmund Burke cited in Hindson and Gray 1988: 132).

When the word audience first appeared in both French and English around 1387, it meant 'a hearing' before an authority figure who, in granting the opportunity, thereby committed himself to pay attention to what the suppliant had to say (Pearsall 1999: 64).²⁹ It later came to be applied to a group of listeners. There is no clear record of when it came to mean spectators. As late as 1877, a standard Latin dictionary for schools provided no connection between audience and theatre (Chambers and Chambers 1877). Plays were spectaculum or fabula, attended by spectators.

The Greeks had a term for listeners had they wanted to privilege hearing over seeing, but Greek theatre-goers were spectators.³⁰ Although the acoustics of ²⁹ Requests for hearings were often accompanied by sweeteners. A young James, Prince of Wales, angry that critics were cavilling at Royal Audiences and fearful that such a thing would no longer exist by the time he became king, wrote a poem in 1688 in which he demanded an immediate 'State of Audience' which would bring him 'Toys' (James 2009/c1688).

³⁰ The Latin for 'to hear' (audire) was taken from the Greek aiein.

Greek theatres are astonishing, and actors used masks for amplification as well as stylisation, Greek theatre was a clamorous affair that was watched rather than listened to. The Romans also used the term spectators in relation to theatre despite the availability of audire. All the church fathers who wrote polemics against theatre wrote about the way it affected spectators.

Around 60^{CE}, Seneca referred to theatre-goers as both viewers and listeners. The Roman elite had a number of small theatres for intimate performances and it is possible that under these circumstances, words could come to be considered as important as actions especially in a culture that valorised oratory. In 622, Isidore defined drama as poetry that was recited, pushing it towards being an auditory rather than a visual art form. Theatre history however indicates that up to the late nineteenth century, theatre attendance was a social practice that ‘by no means necessitat[ed] engagement’ with a performance (Blackadder 2003: 5):

Men of Quality ... some Ladies of Reputation and Virtue, and an abundance of Damsels that hunt for Prey, sit all together in this Place, Higgle-dy-piggle-dy [and] chatter, toy, play, hear, hear not (French visitor to English Restoration theatre cited in Blackadder 2003: 5).

Voltaire demanded that spectators be removed from the stage during performance: ‘[t]he seats for spectators that are on the stage reduce the playing space, and make it almost impossible to show any kind of action’. They also meant that ‘stage décor ... is seldom appropriate to the play’ (Voltaire 1994/1736: 27). In 1780, regulations were passed in France that prohibited shouting or ‘any noise’ or disruption such as blowing whistles, booing or putting on one’s hat during the course of a performance (Blackadder 2003: 3). These ‘reforms’ were slow to spread. A German tourist to England in the late 1820s reported that ‘English freedom here degenerates into the rudest license ... and amuse many in the audience’ (Hermann Pücker-Muskau Tour in England 1829 cited in Brockett and Ball 2004: 143). Many theatre practitioners despaired of this disorderly spectator behaviour. Dryden’s prologue to Cleomenes expressed the hope that ‘our Bear-

Garden Friends ... Who bounce with Hands and Feet, and cry Play, Play' were not present at the performance (quoted in Blackadder 2003: 8). In Germany, Goethe set out rules of conduct for spectators that also removed them from seats on the stage and insisted that they behave like listeners at an orchestral concert. The only appropriate response was applause, and this was to be withheld until the end of the performance. Wagner dimmed the lights in the auditorium in a bid to focus spectator attention on the performance rather than other spectators (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 382).³¹

There appears to have been a theoretical battle over the terms spectator and audience throughout this period, although the ground has been muddied by translations that read 'spectators' as 'audiences'. However the insistence on silence that helped establish 'our modern tradition of audience decorum' (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 348) no doubt contributed to the now easy interchangeability of the two terms, often within the same sentence.³² The following statements are typical:

The defining characteristic of theatre is the fact that it takes place in the presence of spectators ... a live audience (Rokem 2002: 167).

All types of theatrical performance require an audience because it is in the mind and imagination of the spectator that the final step in the creative process occurs (Brockett and Ball 2004: 16).

Although Beckerman declares that the purpose of theatre is 'to affect spectators', his book refers overwhelmingly to audiences, defined as 'a hastily assembled community of roughly similar outlook' (Beckerman 1979/1970: 5, 135). However, many theatre theorists continue to insist on a distinction between the two terms because what is otherwise lost is the experience of the process of generating 'communion' (Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 193-5) through the interaction of actors and spectators in the course of the performance. For them, the unity called 'an audience' is an achievement of the performance (Apter 2006: 225; Blau 1990: 25; O'Toole 1992: 33; Peacock 1974/1957: 189; Schechner 1988: 142; Simon 2003). It was on this ability of theatre to forge disparate individuals into a whole that Hobbes based his understanding of representation: '[a] multitude of men, are made one person, when they are by one man, or one person, represented' (Hobbes 1996/1651: 109).

³¹ Blackadder sees this as marking a distinct change in the 'social contract' with spectators, which relegated them to mere spectatorship rather than participatory spectatorship (Blackadder 2003: 11).

³² Translation from French is particularly problematic because the French word assistant could refer to either spectators in the theatre or those present at an audience.

Calling spectators the or an audience thus presupposes a unity that is supposed to be achieved during the course of the performance. This allows theorists to talk about complex heterogeneous and always differently mixed multitudes, crowds or 'throngs' (McQuail 1997: 1; Sennett 1990: xiii; Wilder 2008/1941: 261) as if they were what Walter Benjamin saw as the nightmare of teatrocracy: an autonomous, monolithic 'naturalised' entity impervious to change (Weber 2004: 35). Bennett (1997) posits an ideal audience with already formed 'horizons of expectation' based on what it knows and has experienced both in general and in relation to the particular theatre performance it is attending. She then engages in the application of a variety of theoretical perspectives to 'the role' this entity undertakes to 'play' once it turns up at a theatre and enters into the 'social contract' to behave itself appropriately as an audience, rather than a discussion of actual audiences and how they are formed from disparate spectators.

Mass media research indicates that actual spectators do not readily conform to such a model (Abercrombie and Longhurst 1998; Ang 1991; Balnaves and O'Regan 2002; Barker 1998; Clayton 2008; McQuail 1997; Van Zoonen 2004). Nor do theatre spectators, according to the limited non-demographic surveys that have been done (Goodman 1996).³³ Theatre practitioners and critics such as Pirandello and Fielding and Morgan mention an enormous range of kinds of spectators, their likely reasons for attending and their responses in their work (see Table 6.2), although theatre history reveals that disparate spectators can be trained into some semblance of a united response (Blackadder 2003).

³³ A survey carried out by Goodman of 300 theatre groups which could be considered 'feminist' asking which groups had carried out spectator surveys, yielded just 98 candidates. Analysis of these surveys added little more than demographic information, although the reported ages and backgrounds of spectators 'varied enormously', as did reasons for attending (Goodman 1996).

Pirandello – Each in Their Own Way	Fielding – Tom Jones	Morgan – ‘The sound of no hands clapping’
The artistic director	Author (privileged spectator but not responsible for casting).	The Bounder – leaves during curtain call to get to car park
Other actors/actresses	Manager who stares ‘at nothing’	The Spoiler – gives running commentary
The theatre manager	Director (allocates the parts): also stares at nothing	The Rattler – unwraps lollies slowly
The Administrative Director of the Company	The ‘man of candour and of true understanding’	The Twat – forgets to turn off mobile after tweeting during interval
Theatre Staff	Reason, the ‘patentee’ (although he is idle and seldom exerts himself) (Fielding 1749)	The Oracle – male; whoops at first guitar riff to show off ‘deep knowledge’
Policemen	The actor (regarding his part)	The Phlegmatic – coughs and hacks through arias and symphonies
Five Drama Critics	Those in the ‘upper gallery’ (vociferous and reproachful)	The Crane – neck-swivelling social climber
Unsuccessful old author	Those in the next level down (mostly women; quietly reproachful)	The Freeloader – dozes through performance in preparation for after-show party
Young author	The pit: (divided as usual): those who delight in virtue and condemn the character but don’t want to punish him
Placid spectator	The pit: those who condemn the act and the character ‘and fell a groaning’ (clerks and apprentices)
Irritated spectator	The pit: young critics trying to make a name for themselves (who also fell a groaning)
Spectators who like the play	The lowest of all wretched – apt to cry out low and be the first to condemn
Hostile spectators	The boxes: (polite but distracted): ‘Most of them were attending to something else’
Socialite spectators	The boxes: (polite): those who condemn the character
Persons who think the play is about them	The boxes: (polite): those who wait to see what their betters think
Bored spectators	The ‘man of candour and of true understanding’ who is ‘never hasty to condemn’
Perplexed spectators	The credulous
Hasty spectators (keen to leave)	Those who can’t tell the difference between Garrick and Hamlet and attribute all human action to divine providence
Attackers (enemies of the author)	Those who constantly misinterpret events
Admirers (of the author or the actors)	Those who can censure the action but not the person
Eavesdropping spectators	Those who understand that the same person may be both villain and hero
Naïve spectators (don’t understand what’s happening)
Spectators ‘in the know’
Stupid spectators who hate the play and then go out and do exactly the same thing
Intelligent spectators who think art predicts life

Table 6.2 Kinds of spectators who attend theatre (Fielding 1962/1749: Bk VII: 253-4; Morgan 2011: 7; Pirandello 1992/1924).

McQuail offers ten ‘key dimensions’ along which ‘throngs’ might vary: degree of activity or passivity; degree of interactivity and interchangeability; size and duration; locatedness in space; group character; simultaneity of contact with source; heterogeneity of composition; social relations between sender and receiver; message vs. social/behavioural definition of situation; degree of ‘social presence’ and sociability of context of use (McQuail 1997: 150). However, while admitting that the term audience is problematic and perhaps even outmoded (McQuail 1997: 143), he defends the use of audience in lieu of spectators, even though ‘[i]t is hard to imagine any word that can cover the situations of media exposure, ranging from in-flight movies to messages inscribed on every conceivable item that catches our attention’ (McQuail 1997: 149), because he wants to retain spectators as a residual, unsatisfactory form of audience – one which doesn’t listen to the messages being conveyed (McQuail 1997: 42).

What is hard to imagine is that these kinds of exposure are auditory. McQuail simply indicates the extent to which communication has come to be the dominant paradigm of visual media, an understanding which has largely been imposed on theatre through the influence of semiotics and which most theatre theorists would reject as a limited understanding of what theatre does.

Harder to explain as an auditory undertaking is Balnaves and O’Regan’s account of audience research:

We are watching someone watching. We are measuring him, arraying him, inspecting him. To be an audience is to watch and be watched (Balnaves and O’Regan 2002: 9).

In Abercrombie and Longhurst (1998) spectators disappear altogether, even though their new paradigm for audience research is crucially based on spectatorship, as the front cover of their book indicates:

Figure 6.4 Front cover of Abercrombie and Longhurst's 1998 book Audiences

The argument in Audiences 'is that the world, and everything in it ... is constituted as ... a performance; the objects, events and people which constitute the world ... perform for those watching and gazing' (Abercrombie and Longhurst 1998: 78). Indeed, life is 'a constant performance; we are audience and performer at the same time; everybody is an audience all the time ... people simultaneously feel members of an audience and that they are performers'. They feel this because they are both 'watchers and being watched' (Abercrombie and Longhurst 1998: 73-5).

The language of audience has come to dominate ways of thinking about spectators to such an extent that not just theatre theorists and mass media audience researchers, but policy-makers, public auditors, opinion-makers, other academic disciplines, the arts, marketing, business and spectators themselves use it both to articulate the experience of 'the spectator', and to act upon or make judgments about other mass spectators. Often this is simply because it is easier to talk about a group of spectators as a single entity. Yet this discourse is underpinned by largely unexamined assumptions about what it means to watch or look at something. Actual viewing even for a single individual is complex (Perkins 1994; Sturken and Cartwright 2003: 87) and terms such as active, passive, decoding, perception, needs and desires and meaning may have little to do with collective viewing (Barker 1998: 189). In some cases such ideas have already been debunked but continue to be used. For example, the hypothesis that mass spectators simply ‘decoded encoded messages’ in a straight-forward and homogenous way was challenged during the 1980s but audience response is still often spoken of in this simplistic way (Barker 1998: 189).³⁴ Given that one of the major tasks of theatre is to generate a collective experience for a multitude of disparate strangers, the disappearance of spectators into audience in theatre theory creates such a serious blind-spot that one has to imagine there is another benefit accruing from it. This appears to be control (Kershaw 2003: 603). This is borne out by the way theatre theorists who are aware of the blind-spot deal with it. Rather than confront the differences between spectators and audiences, they invoke theatre as a metaphor, retain the description of spectators as audience, give this entity a ‘role’, and make it part of the play:

[A]ll playwrights everywhere have had to deal with the same problem – how to keep [spectators] in their seats – which they have all solved the same way, by giving the audience a powerful role (Simon 2003: 24).

It is little wonder that theorists find it difficult to discuss either spectators or audiences when they confuse them with characters. More problematically, to then go on to argue, as many do, that ‘audiences’ are therefore active (since actors playing spectator/characters are acting) in no way illuminates what spectators are or are not doing. In any case, pushing the metaphor to its extreme, it is hard to see how the idea of an audience having a role to play in a theatrical event accords with the generally concurrently held view that theatre is a form of communication that uses roles to convey its ‘message’ to that audience.

³⁴ The hypothesis was tested by David Morley (Morley 1980; Morley 1981). Audiences did not simply ‘decode’ an encoded ‘message’ so that it was received as it had been sent. Rather spectators ‘decoded’ what they were seeing according to their social and cultural backgrounds, and this changed as their circumstances changed. A study by Clayton (2008), although confined to a single cohort (first year university students) and exploring a single issue (Dissociative Identity or DI), indicates that spectators draw many different inferences from what they see. Although these inferences can at times be seen to reflect discourses which are dominant in the society, how these influences are used and the kinds of inferences which are drawn by each person can be highly individual, complex and frequently unpredictable. It is also by no means certain that an apparently similar response indicates the same thinking

The whole disciplinary process that Blackadder is at pains to demonstrate also gets swept away in this confusion. Blackadder's argument is that spectators gradually became domesticated over a period of two hundred years into audiences, and that this process is evident when one looks at 'theater-scandals' – occasions when spectators behaved outside the norms and conventions of audience behaviour. This process paralleled the gradual domestication of citizens to accept elections rather than riots as the most appropriate form of political expression (Ginsberg 1986: 34). As outbreaks of theatre scandals and political dissent show, domestication may manage a problem but it in no way removes it.

In a politics based on theatre it is to be hoped that: '[s]pectators should simply be as they are' (Grotowski 1968/1964: 129) for it is on the basis of their being spectators that a reciprocal relationship with political actors that recognizes the values of both rulers and ruled is possible.

'Liveness'

Theatre is generally considered to be 'art with real bodies' (Phelan 1997: 3) requiring 'human beings to be in the same room at the same time' (Deavere Smith 1995: 50-1). This characteristic of theatre is known as liveness. The intensity of performance is said to arise because performing live is risky. Does this mean that politics as theatre would be passé in a mass media age? After all, Manin's understanding of audience democracy does not include the reciprocal relationship between actors and spectators that is being claimed for politics as theatre.

Most contemporary theatre theorists see mediatisation as a threat to theatre, even though practitioners have been engaged in exploring the theatrical possibilities of media technologies for some time. Generally it is fairly banal forms of mass media such as televised or recorded versions of live productions that are condemned, suggesting that the concerns are not about liveness per se but authenticity (Auslander 2008: 59).³⁵ The possibility that a theatrical performance may be simultaneously recorded as well as performed and then be replayed continually is thought to turn theatre into a 'reproduced art' rather than a 'produced art' (Goodman 2000). Although reproduced art is accepted as having its own attractions (Benjamin 1999/1936) and mediated theatrical performances still require spectators for 'completion' as any performance does, it is believed that such performances are no longer genuine theatre largely because ephemerality and 'presentness' are lost and with them that special frisson that the risks of liveness supposedly create. More troubling for performers, at least according to Goodman, is that distance, the mechanism that practitioners use to manage their relationship with spectators, comes under the control of spectators rather than practitioners (Goodman 1996: 34-6). Performances become susceptible to increased but misleading scrutiny in the same way that scrutiny of a still photo of a dancer or sportsperson in full flight eliminates the experience of their movement as it occurs within the context of other movements and as an undertaking that may fail. At the same time, any possibility of actors adjusting their performances in response to spectator feedback is also removed. Mediation thus provides spectators with complex and layered visual encounters that are not only not usually accessible and that leave them 'bereft' as they see 'what is not "there", but not ... the materiality of what is' (Herst 2002: 123), but with lop-sided encounters.

³⁵ The first reference to liveness arose in the context of radio in the 1930s, well after the advent of recording and broadcasting technologies, as part of a concern over whether listeners would know if they were hearing a recording rather than a live performance (Auslander 2008: 59).

The implication of these concerns over liveness is that any reciprocal relationship with actors is severed. Spectators gain the freedom of disembodiment and multiple perspectives and encounters while actors lose any capacity to modify their performance to take account of spectator response. Spectators also lose sight of the physicality of the actors and the limitations that this puts on their performances. Expectations of what is possible may therefore rise beyond reasonable limits. This may tempt actors into tricks designed to meet these expectations. Alternatively, the scrutiny of spectators may encourage actors to deviousness in order to achieve their own ends. Either way, each side loses knowledge of the other as understandings are reduced to stereotypes, easily susceptible to the manipulations of powerful spectators who look both ways: critics, a negative press and cynical analysts (Hay 2007: 162). Spectators and actors then appear to exist 'on either side of a moat' (Allen and Birch 2011: 2) with each side thinking the worst of the other, and no way of actors proving their performances are genuine or being able to respond to spectators. The results '[o]n both sides are great reservoirs of doubt and distrust' (Schechner 1994: 60).

This is a grim picture that already seems familiar to politics. However, such a picture should not be accepted as inevitable for either theatre or politics as theatre. Firstly, it is a picture that is based on a mistaken conception of spectatorship that twentieth century theatre itself has supposedly already dispelled: that spectators of mediated performance are new kinds of spectators: fragmented, partial, prone to 'tricks of the eye', compromised by technologies they cannot control and 'lulled into ... body-amnesia' (Herst 2002: 123-5) – a 'hybrid viewer' – 'part virtual seer ... part insensate observing machine' and 'part disembodied eye' produced by spectatorship taking on both the capabilities and limitations of technologies that extend visual capacity. As Figure 6.5 indicates, Spectators have always found ways to extend their visual capacity, just as they have found ways to extend their other senses. From the late sixteenth until the early nineteenth century, they used the camera obscura both physically and metaphorically to extend their visual capacity in ways that appeared to ‘decorporalize’ vision (Crary 1992: 39):

Camera obscura. 1646.

Figure 6.5 Drawing of a 17th Century camera obscura. The spectator does not observe the scene (the tower in the left background) but the image of the scene that is projected through the aperture in the wall A-B onto the screen the observer is facing on the right side of the chamber). Cameras varied in size from small portable devices that used mirrors to reflect the image onto a horizontal table, to large chambers. A variety of reflective devices or screen shapes were also used to reverse the naturally inverted projection. The device allowed spectators to imagine that they were observing objects as they really were, unaffected by human intervention (See Crary 1992: 25-66).

Reprinted figure: Courtesy of The MIT Press, from Techniques of the Observer: On Vision and Modernity in the Nineteenth Century, by Jonathan Crary.

Nothing can be more pleasant for great men and Scholars, and ingenious persons to behold; That in a dark Chamber by white sheets objected, one may see as clearly and perspicuously, as if they were before his eyes, Huntings, Banquets, Armies of Enemies, Plays and all things else that are desireth ... those that are in the Chamber ... see Trees, Animals, Hunters, Faces, and all the rest so plainly, that they cannot tell whether they be true or delusions (Giovanni Battista della Porta 1558 Natural Magick cited in Crary 1992: 37-8n26).

The long-standing debates over distance and its relationship to sympathy are precisely about spectators being lulled into body-amnesia and insensitivity, and being taken in by ‘tricks of the eye’ (Enders 2003: 40-60) has always been one of the pleasures of theatre.

Secondly, concerns about liveness reduce both theatre and politics to practices that exist only as one-off performances when both are institutions that have a physical reality extending far beyond any single performance no matter how often it is replayed. They also reduce both to a focus on actors as persons, rather than on what it is that actors are attempting to achieve on behalf of a society that they and their spectators share. What is desired in the model of politics as theatre presented here is that spectators allow a space of appearance in which actors can generate a vision of political life that promises something. There doesn’t seem to be any reason to think that this space of appearance could not be a mediated space, or that reciprocity could not be extended over time.

All theatrical performances are ‘mediatised’ in some way or another and insisting on liveness simply prevents practitioners from exploring these alternative forms of representation (Auslander 2008; Birringer 1991). Contemporary experiments with media technologies in theatre indicate that the media can be ‘the partner of theatre and not the enemy’ (Wehle 2002: 139). The idea of the media as a ‘Fourth Estate’ having the responsibility of mediating between political actors and citizens, admittedly an idea too often found in the breach these days, has long recognized this partnership in relation to politics. De Tocqueville, for instance, argued that newspapers, for instance, were essential to the ability of citizens to form associations and develop social solidarity across distance as well as keeping them informed (de Tocqueville 1959/1835-40: 2.II: 119-121).

To accept mediatization is not to argue that deception ought to be excused in political actors but rather that the possibility of deception does not mean that every mediated performance will be intended to deceive and that what actors are attempting to achieve for spectators as well as themselves should not be ignored in favour of witch-hunts about their sincerity. This distinction does raise the ‘Gauguin problem’: whether or not ethical considerations may be made subservient to other aims (Blackburn 1994: 153) – but the cost of achievement is itself a question that should be part of a supportive relationship between spectators and actors, as Mount insists.³⁶

Perhaps ironically, liveness has been taken up as a concept by mass communications scholars to argue that television creates an illusion of intimacy because its ‘liveness’ (its temporal immediacy) encourages people to think of people on the screen as ‘guests’ present in their homes (Thyagarajan 2002). Much television coverage of political actors where the recording device is not controlled by the performer is ‘live’ in this sense and carries the risks associated with live performance: ‘Microphones are always on; someone is always watching, expecting the worst’ (Crabb 2009: 5). If anything, the risks of mediated performances for political actors are greater than unmediated performances because not only is there no opportunity to repair slip-ups, slip-ups are recorded and can be continually thrown back at performers or manipulated by a variety of spectators whose interests may be quite remote from those of the actors.³⁷

³⁶ It is called the Gauguin problem because of the way Gauguin treated his family in order to pursue his art. It could equally be called the Marx, Rousseau or even the ‘great’ individual problem. Marx fathered a child with one of his servants, his family lived very poorly in a squalid part of London and several of his six children died in childhood as he pursued his studies. Rousseau had all five of his children placed in orphanages and then went on to write influential material on how others should bring up children. Many great individuals have achieved what they have at considerable cost to their families. Great soldiers sometimes turn out to also be wife-beaters.

Spectators have always been willing to try out new forms of attention-paying. This leads to different kinds of interaction between spectators and performers, not the cessation of interaction. Electronic media such as television require an interactive spectator, as does theatre, although the interaction is of a different kind and is likely to be multi-layered and complex and occur around the programme rather than within it. Mediatisation does raise questions about spectator advantage, for example in filmed performance, but many artists are already finding ways to work with this (Wehle 2002). Current advances in media technologies indicate that media spectators are ‘tinkerers’ (Sturken and Cartwright 2003: 186). More spectator interaction is likely rather than less and much of this will occur in real-time and be in the control of performers.³⁸

Both theatre and politics must come to terms with mediatisation since it is likely that neither will be able to avoid the mass media (Cardosa 1996: 15). Some ‘fan communities’ have already taken on the characteristics of political constituencies and seem capable of developing ‘the ‘affective intelligence’ needed ‘to keep political involvement and activity going’ (Van Zoonen 2004: 39). If anything this makes a politics that takes spectatorship seriously even more vital and theatre at least offers some of the tools with which to do this.

Theatre or publicity?

Rosen argues that proposals for seeing politics as theatre represent ‘a half-way discourse’ about the relationship of modern democratic politics to publicity. Publicity means that power is limited, surely a desirable thing. Collapsing publicity into theatre means that we are unable to tell when politics becomes ³⁷ The malicious cartooning on the internet of aspects of Prince William’s wedding in 2011 provides ample evidence of the vulnerability of public figures in a mediated world.

³⁸ ‘Live-streaming’ is rapidly becoming available across a number of art forms, including theatre. A recent article in The Sydney Morning Herald which reviewed some of these experiences generally found the experience lacking, but few of the critics treated the experience seriously. Rather, they saw it as an opportunity to accompany their viewing with eating, drinking and even child-care. More seriously, none appeared to have adequate technology to actually have the experience they were commenting on (McDonald et al. 2011).

'merely theatre' (Rosen 2003). Rosen's argument is based on an analysis of President George Bush's secret flight to Baghdad on Thanksgiving Day, 2003. Although the event was recorded as an independent occurrence that journalists supposedly 'simply observed', the press was in fact a crucial 'player' in the event's construction.³⁹ This made the press 'part of the presidency', and put it into the paradoxical position of being both player and spectator, a position Rosen thinks needs to be recognized and discussed because of its implications regarding the position of the media in mass democracies that rely on publicity. Rosen's argument suggests that seeing politics as theatre may be to lose something valuable about the theatre for politics, for theatre provides 'a denotatively specific vocabulary with which to distinguish ... phony, false, make-believe behavior' (Dewey 1969: 309). This cost is evident in the inability of theorists to agree on terminology such as 'role'. Does one play a role or occupy a role? Who determines what behaviour is a role and on what basis (Dewey 1969: 308)? Do we mean that human beings are like actors (who play many different roles), or like the characters actors play?

Still, it is a 'will to see things differently' that places everything 'under the sign of the theater' (Evreinov 1970/1927: 219). The use of the theatre metaphor for politics indicates a clear desire not just to hold politics accountable for the way it appears, but to see politics differently. A concern with publicity would still not meet this desire for it is still focused primarily on political actors. The model developed here offers some idea of how seeing politics differently might play out. However, as also indicated in Chapter 4, some political spectators gain much more from their separation from the action than simply the opportunity to engage in a reciprocal relationship with actors, however rewarding that might be. Some of them even see this detached form of spectatorship as crucial to their efforts to affect political life. Van Dyke, for instance, was quite explicit about his aim as a political scientist to provide criticism and direction to political actors and spectators. It was for this reason he entered 'the political theater' (Van Dyke 1960: 15) even while acknowledging that it was not always clear in life which was play and which was 'audience', or which actors belonged to which of the many, often indiscernible 'plots'. He saw his task as critical observation in order to orient other spectators, ‘and perhaps, to advise and train some of the actual or potential actors’. He could only do this by taking a kind of super-spectator position, similar to the position taken by ‘the best spectators’ of Plato’s analogy with theoria. As a critical and engaged spectator he knew what was ‘desirable’ in politics (although he did not say what this was) and intended to encourage these ends. His intention was to:

³⁹ This would have made it a pseudo-event according to Boorstin (1978/1961).

[P]rovide orientation most adequately, guide actual and aspiring actors most wisely and effectively and perhaps, affect one or more of the forthcoming scenes in a desirable way (Van Dyke 1960: 15).

So far, the model for politics developed here has failed to take into account spectatorship as a form of power in itself. Yet this is what the theatre metaphor too often reveals. The distance the metaphor creates between spectators and actors allows some spectators to cast judgment on the beheld, impose structure on their lives, make assumptions about them, and even render them available for their ‘willing and trafficking’ (Heidegger 1978/1947: 223) without having to concern themselves with the impact of their behaviour on the observed. The next chapter will consider the implications of this form of power.

Chapter 7: Politics in the Theatre/Drama Metaphor: More than Meets the Eye.

Politics occurs wherever a community with the capacity to argue and to make metaphors is likely ... to crop up (Rancière 1999/1995: 60)

Conceptual metaphor theorists such as Lakoff and Turner argue that metaphors are inherently political because of the way they structure perception and therefore responses to phenomena. They also believe that many of the metaphors that are used to do political work go unrecognized. Lakoff and Turner's reading of the metaphor The Great Chain of Being illustrates what they mean by this. The metaphor in its general form allows its users to link all of life hierarchically, from the most base (rocks) to the most exalted (humans) based on perceptions of consciousness (thinking being the highest form of consciousness).¹ Within this chain, humans are 'naturally' superior to higher order animals, lower order animals, plants, rivers and rocks. According to Lakoff and Turner, this long-standing but now barely recognized metaphor underpins the gender, racial and cultural discriminations that beset the modern world as well as much of its attitude towards nature and the environment. Virtually any form of discrimination can be slotted into its hierarchical framework, including degrees of 'humanness': male over female; white over coloured; civilised over 'primitive'; theoria over ordinary/mass spectators etcetera because the chain sets up a basis for comparison that is also hierarchical.

Conceptualists argue that such metaphors do not merely provide a way for their users to talk about what they think, reason, imagine or experience, they guide the way they act towards phenomena (Gill 1991: 105; Johnson 1981: 31; Kovecses 2002: 62): 'to choose the right metaphors ... is at the same time to propose an interpretation' (De Baecque 1994: 116) that 'shapes the nature of ... discourse' (Green 1987: ix) and therefore the nature of response. Since the chain implicitly underpins conceptualisations of the value of other entities in the world, the preservation of superior species can be promoted over the preservation of ‘inferior’ ones and human activity can be given precedence over the environment (Lakoff and Turner 1989: 208-213).²

¹ This is a secular reading of The Great Chain of Being metaphor. According to McEvoy (2000), the original chain extended from rocks to God, with creation, not consciousness being the ultimate value. Conceptualists would argue it could still be used to justify the domination of some beings by others.

The description of an indigenous man as Gippsland Scenery in an 1886 publication (see Figure 7.1) appears to support the conceptualists’ reading of this metaphor in relation to racism. Here a black man has been relegated to the level of the landscape. Despite his dominance in the photograph and his European clothing, he is not even accorded the status of an animal. Conceptualists would argue that the image is a potent illustration of how the Great Chain of Being can put some beings ‘in chains’ (Justman 1978: 835). However, the metaphor also relegates rocks below animals and plants, something that even the most ecologically conscious may not see as oppressive. The metaphor by itself may be just a form of taxonomy based on the principle of degrees of consciousness into which Lakoff and Turner have read a particularly negative interpretation. Such a taxonomy could equally be used, as is suggested in Heidegger and some Christian versions of ecological thinking, to argue for a duty of care and responsibility whereby humans are the ‘shepherd of Being’ (Heidegger 1978/1947: 245) in its totality. It may not be the taxonomy that is the problem, but the importation into a taxonomic scheme of a logic of dominance whereby a ‘description of similarities and differences’ (whether or not they are hierarchical) slides into a ‘moral’ argument that justifies the subordination of some elements on the list to others (Warren 1990). The steps in such an argument are as follows (the points of importation of the logic of domination are indicated in italics):

(A1) Humans do, and plants, fauna and rocks do not, have the capacity to consciously and radically change the community in which they live.

(A2) Whatever has the capacity to consciously and radically change the community in which it lives is morally superior to whatever lacks this capacity.

² Biologists involved with preservation despair over discrimination against so-called ‘lower order’ species. In 2006, Australian biologist Jean Joss was forced to turn to petitioning in order to pressure the government to preserve the last remaining habitat of the Australian Lungfish, a ‘living fossil’ said to be ‘the last common ancestor of land vertebrates’ but not only lower in the order to tigers and orang-utans but much less appealing (Pearson 2006).

(A3) Humans are morally superior to plants, fauna and rocks

(A4) For any X and Y, if X is morally superior to Y, then X is morally justified in subordinating Y

(A5) Humans are morally justified in subordinating plants, fauna and rocks.

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 7.1 Karit-lakarat (aka William Bull) photographed in 1886 by N.J. Caire. The photograph appeared in a publication by the photographer entitled ‘Gippsland Scenery’ (reprinted in Pepper and De Araugo 1985: 145)

For the Great Chain of Being metaphor to be used to discriminate among human beings an additional step must be taken in which another metaphor is implicated, for it is this second metaphor that allows some humans to imagine other humans as something else in ways that the self-evident categorizations in the chain support (landscapes are not conscious beings, therefore a person who is scenery/nature need not be considered a conscious being) and through which they cannot refute their positioning (scenery can’t talk back). Warren argues that this logic has long been used to justify the superiority of men over women based on an initial identification of women with nature and men with reason. Karit-lakarat is similarly discriminated against here, not so much by the Great Chain of Being itself, but through the importation of a logic of domination into the chain through a second metaphor that sees some humans as nature. Nevertheless, the discrimination is clear.

Typically, uses of the theatre/drama metaphor that have become associated with the fields of role theory and dramaturgy feature a similar logic of domination. Users of the metaphor define other people as ‘actors’ in a way that seems self-evident (some-one doing something is acting in the broadest sense of the word) but which they cannot refute (they are characters in a play). This happens because metaphor users almost invariably elide those they designate ‘actors’ with the ‘roles’ they are playing, thus blocking the normal reciprocity between actors and spectators in the theatre. Seeing people as their roles ‘is something like seeing persons in painted portraits ... There is an ontological distance’ that separates them from their spectators and makes them impervious to them (Natanson 1976/1966: 48, 51). Spectators cannot affect them because they do not ‘dwell’ in the same world. Users of the metaphor thus violate the normal conditions of reciprocity in actual theatre because they position themselves outside the world in which the actors playing the designated roles dwell, as if it was the same as the ‘world’ in which the characters defined by those roles dwelt. As a consequences, ‘[a]ll the world’ does appear to be a stage on which ‘all the men and women’ other than the metaphor user are ‘merely players’. Men and women are thus made available for the spectator’s ‘willing and trafficking’ (Heidegger 1978/1947: 223), even if it is only to ‘sneak in and watch the way people snore’ (Goffman 1986/1974: 158).

The tool through which this operates is not so much theatre as an ideology of theatre (West 1999) in which spectatorship occurs at a distance and the separation between actors and spectators is rendered unbridgeable. The characteristics of this ideology in relation to actual theatre are laid out in Table 7.1, but the crucial distinction is that spectatorship is divorced from any impact on or obligation to the observed. This can only occur if the observed are seen as characters rather than actors portraying characters even though the observed are most often described as ‘actors’. This is what makes the theatre/drama metaphor a political metaphor. It operates as a ‘constrained use of social power’ (Goodin and Klingeman 1996:7) through the way it positions others so that they cannot ‘answer back’ (Mount 1972: 48). It appears to offer the agency attributed to an actor in the theatre, but agency is in fact all in the hands of the beholder.

The Ideology of Theatre	Actual Theatre in Execution
A place of looking	A place of action
Unbridgeable separation between actors and spectators	Interaction between spectators and actors
Distanced	Affective and reciprocal
Absolute vision	Perspectival
Instant intelligibility through retrospectivity	Temporal unfolding
A picture of reality	A part of reality
Static	Dynamic
A demarcated space	A demarcated space
Distanced from action	Centred on action
Absolutely simple	Complex
Absorption	Theatricality(self-awareness; self-reflexivity)
Blurring of actor and author	Clear distinction between actor and author
A neutral space where information is displayed	A predefined space of activity
Characters	Actors portraying characters

Table 7.1 The distinctions between metaphoric theatre and actual theatre that constitute an ‘ideology of theatre’ (derived from West 1999: 258-266).

All users of the theatre/drama metaphor are such spectators, even when they see themselves as players because ‘[i]t is the onlooker ... who perceives [the] structure’ that makes the metaphor possible (Brown 1977: 155). Thus those being observed are placed into a drama of the spectator’s making as if they were characters in a play. As in actual theatre, these ‘characters’ are impervious to the spectator. Unlike in actual theatre however, power is strictly in the hands of a spectator who is beyond the ability of the actor to reach. Furthermore, when the actor/spectator relationship is blocked in this way so that the observed appear to exist in an alternative world, responsibility for the observer’s interpretation can be easily deflected so that it falls onto the beheld. The beheld then appear to be in a drama of their own making. However, when it becomes apparent that their behaviour is not consistent with the rules of drama, as must happen given that the beheld are not in a drama but embedded within the endless stream of life and subject to contingency, the beheld also appear to be in need of expert advice. The spectatorship in the metaphor is doubly powerful here. Not only is the user of the metaphor able to imagine that they can observe the beheld without affecting them, they can also imagine that they are in a superior position. This is why the spectatorship involved in all uses of the theatre/drama metaphor should be of central concern to political theory.

Seeing Social and Political life as Theatre

[I]s it not precisely the social theorist who is the spectator of social life? (Brown 1977: 155)

When Vives declared that men could only remake their connection with God through their interactions with other men in their social world, he offered himself as their ‘experienced drama coach’. He would reveal and explain ‘the nature of God’s plan’ to them (Fernández-Santamaria 1998: 6-7) since he knew what was required.³ He would offer the same ‘wise and effective’ guidance that Van Dyke aimed to provide to potential political actors and spectators some four hundred years later in relation to political life (Van Dyke 1960: 15). Lyman and Scott make this position of privileged spectator/explicator explicit by referring to themselves as theoria. As such they would ‘see the world ... report on the world, and, more significantly ... elucidate the seen but unnoticed features of that world’. Theoria were able to see these features because they adopted an attitude of ‘wonder, astonishment, and naïve puzzlement’ (Lyman and Scott 1975: 2) – the attitude of a theatre spectator who ‘bracket[s] the action on stage in a special frame’ so that ‘each object, gesture, and speech’ can be seen as significant. Similarly the social scientist must:

[B]racket the scene of his [sic] investigation. By doing this he refuses ... to take for granted the meanings-in-the-world that are typically and regularly available to and enacted by his human subjects. Thus, the theoretical stance of the social scientist is ... best described as a hyper-conscious awareness which can be characterized as a coercive but searching naiveté. The object of this attitude is the ordinary world of everyday man; the aim is the suspension of the mundane world that ... covers its ultimate truths (Lyman and Scott 1975: 163-4n5).

³ Although God was the demiourgos or artisan creator, both God and man were originally spectators of the play of life. After the Fall, God assigned man his parts and at death he was rewarded or punished according to how well he played them. Reward was reunion with the divine. Vives believed that this was not clear to most people. Vives was ‘one of the most prolific thinkers within the northern humanist tradition’. His influence during his lifetime was considerable. He taught at Oxford between 1523 and 1528, and was tutor to Catherine of Aragon, Henry VIII’s first wife, and to Henry’s daughter, Elizabeth (Fernández-Santamaria 1998: vii).

Since 'reality is a drama, life is theatre, and the social [and political] world is inherently dramatic', this approach would 'uncover the nature and operations of dramatic practices in everyday life' for critical sociologists who 'take the trouble to look' (Lyman and Scott 1975: 111, 2). For instance, examining 'dramatic' texts such as political speeches, campaign performances and the writings of Edmund Burke, Machiavelli and Weber through the 'prism' of Shakespeare, whose 'tragedies, comedies, and histories are a dramatic commentary on the forms in which human praxis reveals itself' (Lyman and Scott 1975: 159), would reveal that authority to rule is simply 'a particular and complex form of impression management' (Lyman and Scott 1975: 115). A critical sociology that elucidated this would be helpful, even emancipatory.

This position of social scientist as privileged spectator/explicator under the metaphor is particularly problematic in Alexander's use of the Holocaust in The Meanings of Social Life (2003). Alexander sees his 'strong' program of cultural sociology as a means of bringing 'the social unconscious up for view' in order 'to reveal to men and women the myths that think them' (Alexander 2003: 4). This entails applying a mixture of hermeneutics and 'thick description' to events such as the Holocaust in order to demonstrate how 'cultural traumas' are socially and culturally constructed through narrative: 'Events are not inherently traumatic. Trauma is a socially mediated attribution' driven by 'carrier groups' with social and political agendas (Alexander 2003: 91). The Holocaust is recognized as 'a tragic, devastating event in human history' because it has been 'dramatized – as a tragedy' (Alexander 2003: 55). Trauma 'is not the result of a group experiencing pain. It is the result of this acute discomfort entering into the core of the collectivity's sense of its own identity' (Alexander 2003: 93). In other words, individuals do not experience the 'trauma drama' (Alexander 2003: 98) until someone tells them that they do. They merely experience an event.

Alexander accuses 'lay' understandings of trauma that locate such experiences within the events that cause them of being 'naturalistic fallacies'. He can do this because he forgets that he is not just using trauma metaphorically, but also seeing it through the lens of a grotesque coupling of theatre and speech act theory: 'The trauma process can be likened ... to a speech act' because both contain speaker, audience and situation. This understanding produces a host of questions that can be asked about the understanding of an event or 'trauma claim' all of which ignore the issue of actual injury since: 'we are not primarily concerned with the accuracy of social actors' claims, much less with evaluating their moral justification. We are concerned only with how and under what conditions the claims are made, and with what results' (Alexander 2003: 91-4).

These are the kind of questions that can only be asked, and answered, by a privileged spectator who is positioned both outside traumatic events and separate from ordinary 'men and women'. The issue is not that the narration of traumatic events is not socially and politically constructed as Alexander argues, or even that such narration might be fitted into particular genres (tragedy; heroic drama; comedy; farce) but that the collapse of that narration into the injury itself requires a new expression to be found for trauma ('acute discomfort'). Experiencing trauma is no longer to be seen as suffering an injury or wound around which multiple narratives of victimhood or blame (or sheer bad luck) might be told, but 'as a sociological process that defines a painful injury to the collectivity' and then 'establishes the victim, attributes responsibility, and distributes the ideal and material consequences' (Alexander 2003: 103). Who better to do this than the dedicated theoria who is safely outside the event?

It was exactly this position of spectatorship that triggered debate and the invocation of the theatre metaphor to avoid its moral implications during the eighteenth century. In a period in which wars, executions and shipwrecks were common events attracting large numbers of spectators and in which the high point of elite European theatre was Greek tragedy, many philosophers and theorists pondered why it was that humans seemed to enjoy watching tragic events. The focus of debate was on Lucretius' much repeated 'shipwreck with spectator' metaphor:

'Tis pleasant, when the seas are rough, to stand
And view another's danger, safe at land
(cited in Voltaire 1901/1751).

Much of the debate was couched in terms of curiosity. Voltaire, who took exception to the implications of Lucretius' comment, considered that spectators who 'climbed up the surrounding trees to have a view of the slaughter' were simply curious, like any animal (Voltaire 1901/1751). Curiosity, for Voltaire, was no more than an absorbing and engaged passion that humans shared with other animals and that over-rode their usual concern for their own safety or the sufferings of others. This could be seen by the precarious positions spectators often took to improve their view. Galiani, however, not only saw curiosity as a particularly human trait. He also saw it as a reflective capacity that was dependent precisely on those conditions of safety, detachment and pleasantness that Voltaire rejected. Curiosity, as a mode of spectatorship, was the source of 'all the sciences', but the key to it lay 'in the security ... of the curious being' (Galiani 1771 in Blumenberg 1997/1979: 40). This however raised an ethical dilemma, according to Voltaire: how could it be acceptable to watch unmoved let alone happy, the terrible suffering of others? Would not this make even the best of scientists no better than 'Beelzebub' (Voltaire 1901/1751)? To rescue his conception of curiosity and its relationship to detached spectatorship and knowledge, Galiani invoked the theatre metaphor. Detached spectatorship from a secure position (what Lucretius called '[t]he top of high philosophy') was not unethical because the situation was artificial. The tragedy was 'played on stage' (Blumenberg 1997/1979: 40). The justification for taking this position was that distance and security allowed knowledge. Detached spectatorship was thus rescued from an unpleasant moral dilemma in relation to real events by reconfiguring it aesthetically and collectively as theatrical spectatorship in the service of knowledge.

Many spectator/scientists still hold to this exalted and blame-free position (de Kerckhove 1990: 172). In a particularly questionable instance, wild-life filmmakers Jan Aldenhoven and Glen Carruthers refrained from intervening to assist a kangaroo they had designated as ‘absent-minded’ to locate her lost joey, ‘Jaffa’, on the grounds that they were simply observers of nature in the wild. They took this position even though they had ‘lived with the mob’ long enough to have named a number of the animals and for the animals to have become comfortable enough with them to show a ‘personality ... behind every face’ (Aldenhoven and Carruthers 1992).⁴ At the very least this suggests some responsibility towards the group that had allowed them such proximity, if not culpability for the situation in which the joey became lost and the mother disoriented since even science has long since recognized that observation has an effect on the phenomenon being observed.⁵ Yet Aldenhoven and Carruthers continued to film the joey as it died and its mother searched for it. Viewers were then treated to the heart-rending spectacle of the mother’s fruitless search and subsequent distress so that they could see how life was ‘in the wild’.

Voltaire’s point was that such spectatorship could not be excused on the basis of a search for knowledge by philosophers and scholars. Yet this is precisely the kind of spectatorship that the theatre metaphor allows. It is an approach that has been taken up with alacrity in the social sciences where the metaphor has come to assume the status of a root metaphor (Brown 1977: 78). It now underpins a substantial body of social theory that began with symbolic interactionism, and burgeoned into role theory and dramaturgy. Along the way, it has gathered in Kenneth Burke’s dramatism, a field of study that is widely but mistakenly assumed to be based on the theatre metaphor, and impression management. In each case, the metaphor produces anomalies but the power of distanced spectatorship ensures its continued embrace. The entire field is now generally known as the dramaturgical approach to social and political theory.

⁴ Quotes are from cover descriptions of the film on its DVD and VHS releases. They are repeated in publicity and review material (see for example Green Cape Wildlife Films Http://www.wildlifefilms.com.au/).

⁵ Science seems to have been late accepting this realisation, though. The Romans recognized it; it was certainly much discussed during the eighteenth century – Diderot, Shaftesbury, Adam Smith and David Hume made a point of it – but it seems to have taken until Heisenberg for science to grasp the idea. Many scientists are clearly still reluctant to entertain it, for the same reasons Galiani rejected it: its moral obligation.

The Dramaturgical Approach

During the eighteenth century and again in the 1920s, the expectations and artifice involved in successful social interaction were often the subject of spectator comment and recommendation:

To liken a charming young girl in the prettiest of frocks to a spider is not very courteous; and yet the role of spider is what she is forced by the exigencies of ballroom etiquette to play. She must catch a fly, meaning a trousered companion, so as not to be left in placarded disgrace (Post 1922).

Attention was drawn to the way some ‘parts’ seemed to be continuous, even though inhabited by different ‘actors’:

Cast a glance on the theater of the State. The decoration alone has changed, but the same actors remain, the same masks, the same intrigues, the same tricks: still a despot surrounded by his lackey, still the vexatious and oppressive ministers ... Today the principal actors are behind the curtain; it is there that they plot at their ease with those who play the parts before our eyes. Most of the latter have already disappeared, new actors have come forth to play the same roles (Marat 1792 in Butwin 1975: 148); and suggestions were made that studying such behaviour could be both entertaining and enlightening:

[T]hose who have never minded the Conversation of a spruce Mercer, and a young Lady his Customer ... have neglected a Scene of Life that is very Entertaining ... [One should] examine these People separately, as to their Inside and the different Motives they act from (Mandeville 1723 in Hundert 1994: 148).

In the early twentieth century, the idea of ‘role-taking’ was developed to refer to the way structurally generated expectations and norms of behaviour adhered to particular positions in social life that were learned through play, particularly in childhood:

[I]n a game where a number of individuals are involved, then the child taking one role must be ready to take the role of everyone else... He must know what everyone else is going to do in order to carry out his own play. He has to take all of these roles ... at some moments he has to have three or four individuals present in his own attitude [as] a set of responses (Mead 1962/1934: 151).

Role-taking provided a way of talking about how aspects of other ‘selves’ could come to be incorporated into a self and be used as a guide to anticipate and carry out socially coherent actions. The idea of role-taking indicated that: ‘selves can only exist in definite relationships to other selves’ (Mead 2007/1934: 30).

Symbolic Interactionism

When symbolic interactionism formalised Mead’s program to approach conduct socially and from ‘the outside’ (i.e. in terms of the diverse social positions it revealed), it took up role and developed it as a key concept, in the process differentiating between ‘unmindful’ behaviour (like scratching an itch) and meaningful action – conduct shaped by how watchful individuals thought others would interpret and respond to their actions. Meaningful actions, unlike mere behaviour, incorporated a ‘reciprocity of effect’ (Levine, Carter, and Gorman 1976: 823) made up of an expectation, even calculation, of their effects on others and a consequent effort to ensure that these anticipated effects coincided with what was intended, measured against the responses of others to previous actions of the same kind. This reflexivity turned actions into a symbolic activity or role, which in turn stabilized their effects thereby reducing the burden of anticipation and self-monitoring. This made role an ideal vehicle for communication, bringing symbolic interactionism into the field of political communication (Nimmo 1978: iv). The perspective allows political communication to focus on symbolic action to such an extent that Gronbeck (1990) claims that political symbolism and political communication are basically synonymous.

Many theorists who use symbolic interactionism in political communication insist that role is a theatre metaphor. Combs and Mansfield (1976), for instance, argue that implied in the approach is the metaphor life is theatre because role 'is, of course, directly borrowed from drama' (Combs and Mansfield 1976: xix): '[t]he homo sociologus of the symbolic interactionists then, is a role-player in an on-going social drama' in which 'society provides the script. The only reason that symbolic interactionists do not acknowledge their debt to 'theatre' is because they have not 'filled out the implications of their argument' (Combs and Mansfield 1976: xix).

It is true that what characterizes the task that actors undertake in the theatre is that it involves pretending to act like any number of different kinds of people and that this task, elevated to an art form, is known as role-playing – the process of distilling perhaps even caricaturing generalised behaviour patterns of people when engaged in particular recognizable activities (being a father, mother, drunk, teacher, leader, etc). This however does not make role a theatre term. Indeed insisting that it is a theatre metaphor creates anomalies for symbolic interaction as well as some of the troubling aspects of what has become known as role theory. This can be seen by mapping theatre onto the four principles that Gronbeck claims operate in symbolic interactionism in relation to the position of individuals in society and the way meaning is created and derived:

1. The social order 'preexists and postdates the individual';
2. Nevertheless, 'it is the individual who conceptualizes, symbolizes and evaluates the world';
3. 'Meaningfulness' is not stable but negotiated; '[p]ermanency is not a feature' of social life; and
4. The social order is a continuous process of negotiation that occurs at both material and symbolic levels (Gronbeck 1990: 195-7).⁶

⁶ Gronbeck's italics.

As an activity of the social order, theatre operates according to these principles: it preexists and postdates any individual; it is affected by how individuals see it; what it means is not stable and is the subject of continuous negotiation. However, drama does not operate according to these principles and this is where the linking of role to the theatre metaphor and the collapse of the distinction between drama and theatre can become deeply problematic. The social order of a drama exists only for the duration of the performance. The conceptualization of this social order begins outside that world, in the mind of someone who often does not continue to be involved in its recreation or its evaluation. Meaningfulness is negotiated, but not between the characters in the drama's social order but between other individuals who are outside the social world being presented. The social order presented is also not a 'continuous process' of any kind, although those creating it and/or watching it may continue to rethink the meaning of what they see, and this will, no doubt, inform their responses if they re-create or see the 'play' another time or even reflect on their own 'roles'. Social man cannot be a 'role-player in an on-going social drama'. To be in a drama he can only be a character. Actors are role-players who play characters in dramas in the theatre, a social order that does exist in the real world and that does pre-exist and post-date them as social actors. Social man can be a role-player in the theatre as he can be in any other social order, but not in a drama: '[p]eople play Roles. Actors play characters' (Mori 2002).

Indeed, the idea of role predates theatrical uses of the concept.⁷ It arose because of the use of scrolls (rolled paper) on which instructions for public behaviour, proclamations or speeches were written. Role was any public behaviour that was guided by instruction, a long-held understanding that easily conforms to symbolic interactionists' use of the term without turning it into a theatrical term. The argument of symbolic interactionism is that everyone engages in role-play: people learn how to be fathers, mothers, drunks, teachers and leaders through observing the conduct of people engaged in those activities and practicing this conduct in their interactions with others, modifying their demeanor according to the responses they get. Symbolic interactionists also argue that such empathetic activity is functional. It is a mechanism for learning. What is implied in this perspective is not so much theatre as a metaphor but the centrality of spectatorship to social learning. Actors use it just like anyone else and they generally hone roles in much the same way that everyone does as well – through feedback from others (directors, other actors in rehearsal, spectators of the play and possibly other ‘guinea-pig’ spectators).

⁷ It appears to have been used in France as a theatrical term during the sixteenth century because Montaigne uses the term in relation to the theatre metaphor (Montaigne 1985/1580-8: 29), but was not recorded in England as a theatrical term until 1790-1. In French it has retained its use to mean part, turn, register or roster. À tour de rôle means 'in turn'.

Instead of thinking of theatre as a metaphor, Borreca suggests that sociology would be better off recognizing it as a form of symbolic interaction in itself, in which case its relationship to the rest of the social order would appear as in Figure 7.2. In such a relationship, to draft theatre onto politics (or any other form of social order) would inevitably produce anomalies because it would place theatre in the position of being both one of the range of objects of study and the perspective from which some of those objects were being studied. This move would either collapse the distinctions between the objects or remove theatre from reality itself, creating an alternative framework for studying social interaction to symbolic interactionism.

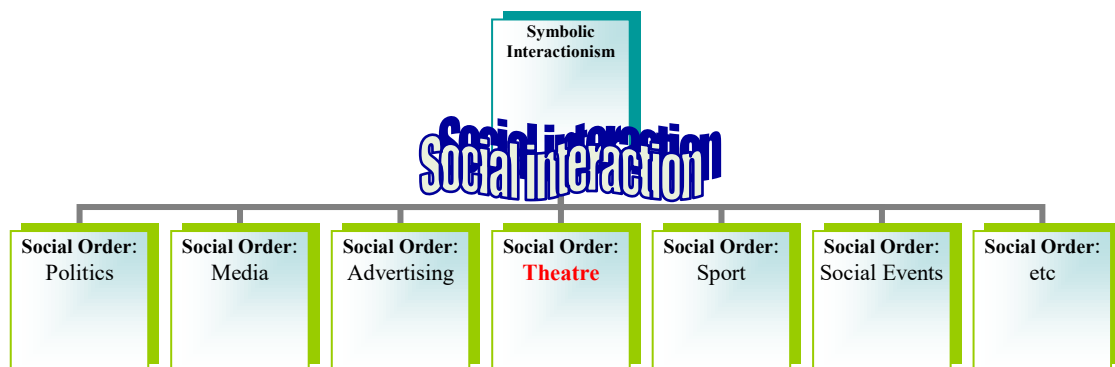

Figure 7.2 The field of Symbolic Interactionism

It is apparently a ‘perennial’ question for the dramaturgical perspective as ‘a mode of meta-awareness’ as to whether it organizes social conduct or describes it (Borreca 1993: 59). If it organizes it, the approach can be considered metaphorical, and theatre is outside reality and an alternative perspective to symbolic interactionism. If it describes it, the approach is literal and theatre remains within reality as just another social order. One could still take drama as a perspective because drama is not a social order, but roles do not exist within a drama. To maintain its position as a method of describing reality and retain the concept of role, symbolic interactionism needs to see role in its ordinary rather than its theatrical sense.

Role has spread rapidly throughout the social sciences as an explanatory concept. It has broadened in scope in some respects, but not in relation to its attribution to theatre, despite the anomalies this creates. Role is now not only applied to selves, including others' selves, it is applied to others as 'players in a play' i.e. characters, as well as entities such as 'audiences', businesses, organizations and institutions. Elevated to a theory, role provides a convenient way of 'rounding up' (Apter 2006: 225) and bundling disparate individuals so that their activities can be talked about as socially determined in much the same way that 'audience' rounds up and bundles spectators so that they can be talked about as a single already-coherent thing.

Role Theory

In 1966, Natanson complained that the 'contemporary theory of social roles and role-playing [was] quickly becoming part of the casual order of existence which they were meant to illuminate' (Natanson 1976/1966: 46) – a concern Mangham and Overington repeated in 1987. Zashin and Chapman (1974), as well as Connell have also been extremely critical of a 'fad' that seems to have become 'domesticated' (Connell 1979: 7) to such an extent that the idea is used unthinkingly. Both they and Gerhardt (1980) believe role theory supports an essentially conservative ideology, because it provides 'socially available formulae' for imposing patterns of behaviour in such a way as to eliminate 'dissonance' (Zashin and Chapman 1974: 321). Feminists have been particularly critical of role theory, which they see as locking women into gendered positions to which they are obliged to conform. For them, 'the language of roles' not only collapses essential differences between life and theatre, it 'retains its functionalist roots', while focusing on the individual rather than the social structure, paradoxically both suggesting and denying agency (Komarovsky 1992: 301). Komarovsky believes that role theory has been able to assume a dominant position as an explanation of gender only because of the failure to generate more appropriate explanatory paradigms.

Underpinning the idea of role theory as a theatre metaphor are two metaphors drawn from drama: dramatis persona and script (Connell 1979: 8). The first distinguishes between the person (character) and the social position they occupy while the second suggests that there are a set of prescribed behaviours and tasks assigned to this position:

[R]ole theory is the approach to social structure which locates its basic constraints in stereotyped interpersonal expectations ... it offers a framework of social analysis which allows a simple and straightforward account of the insertion of people into social relations [as well as] a way of analysing social learning in substantial units (Connell 1979: 9).

Connell critiques role theory on the basis that, as a theatre metaphor, it is reductive, theoretically sterile and unable to account for dissent other than as deviance: prescribed roles are all one can play (although one might play several), and all one's roles should be enacted in the prescribed way. To do otherwise is to be deviant. Role theory is therefore simply 'a theoretical ideology developed to cope with the stresses in the cultural order created by movements of resistance' (Connell 1979: 14). But apart from the conservative ideology that Connell sees as inherent in the concept, the idea, as a theatre metaphor, also invokes a hidden meta-controller, beyond the structure of the drama. Role theory as described by Connell and as generally used takes the script to have been produced by the social order within which the individual acts, but the scriptwriter is actually outside this social order. Role theory as a theatre metaphor can only function in the presence of a god or puppet-master for in the theatre both roles and social order are in the control of the playwright not the performer. This is true even where the playwright and performer are the same person (Burns 1972: 182).

Arditi highlights the problem with role theory when he says 'it is only the detachment of the individual from any particular position that provides the basis for the full emergence of social roles' (Arditi 1987: 567). This is part of his argument for considering role as used in social theory as articulating 'a definitely modern perception of the world' (Arditi 1987: 570) because it is underpinned by an ideal of individualism.⁸ However, it is detachment that is the keyword here. The realization or understanding of a particular mode of behaviour as a role can only come about because of a detachment from that behaviour. This is what happens in the theatre for both performers and spectators – the role is a thing apart for both, but it is not the same as the character. It is a means of achieving the character. Role helps performers find a way of adapting themselves to the requirements of the character they intend to play. Role also helps spectators accept the necessity of the 'willing suspension of disbelief' or disattendance (Elam 1980: 90) that is required to see the actor, who may be a well-known and familiar face already seen in a variety of parts or someone unsuited in some respects for the part, as if they were the character.⁹ The idea of role helps both achieve their aims. The same applies outside theatre.

Without detachment, roles cannot be easily seen. This makes the idea of role a useful weapon for both actors and spectators: actors can manufacture a role for effect and spectators can belittle someone who is immersed in some form of social participation as simply playing a role. When Nietzsche suggested that 'the care to make a living ... compels almost all male Europeans to adopt a particular role, their so-called occupation' to such an extent 'he becomes an actor' (Nietzsche 1974/1887: 302-3), he made this judgment irrespective of how male Europeans themselves saw or thought about what they were doing.

Roles only exist as roles in the eyes of a distanced beholder, even if that is one's self-conscious self. Only distanced spectatorship can reveal or apply the necessary edges to an activity so as to allow detachment to occur. However, to place oneself outside of social existence in order to do this is to play the part of 'the Great Playwright' or the 'Great Director'. Arditi's differentiation between the authority of a Melanesian ‘big-man’ and that of a Polynesian chief on the basis that the supposedly less modern Melanesian owes his authority to charisma, while the apparently more modern Polynesian owes it to ‘his position at the top of a political ladder’ (Arditi 1987: 568) relies entirely on an authorial position outside both social structures that imposes hierarchical valuations on both cultures in relation to western conceptions of authority. Role Theory allows its users to ignore the relations of power involved in constructing settings and producing characterizations as they ‘write[] the script and set[] the stage’ in order to appropriate ‘the given’ and turn it into what they consider to be ‘the real’ (Connell 1979: 15) – all in all ‘a slightly disturbing imperialism’ (Bradbury, Heading, and Hollis 1972: 48).

⁸ Both Connell and Arditi see role theory as 'eminently American' (Arditi 1994: 605), part of a general, and historical, discovery of the 'role-player' in American culture in the 1920s.

⁹ The acceptance of heavily built middle-aged sopranos such as Joan Sutherland in the role of the young temple-dancer Lakme in Delibes' opera of the same name takes a considerable disattendance or willingness to suspend belief. Opera lovers do it because of the benefits to the music.

Despite these criticisms, role theory continues to flourish. Table 7.2, based solely on the incidence of the concept amongst the theatre/drama metaphor records collected for this study indicates the wide-spread use of the metaphor since 1900.

ROLE THEORY: spread of located records – first to last	1900-1910	1911-1920	1921-1930	1931-1940	1941-1950	1951-1960	1961-1970	1971-1980	1981-1990	1991-2000	2001-2010
- Theatre Practice ¹⁰
- Sociology
- Etiquette
- Anthropology
- Theatre Theory/Studies
- Social Psychology
- Social Science
- Behavioural Psychology
- Management Studies/Theory
- International Relations (IR)
- Media Studies
- Education
- Organization Research/Theory (OR)
- Social Communication
- Gerontology
- Political Studies/Education

Table 7.2 Role Theory – spread of records located through the theatre metaphor study from 1900¹¹

¹⁰ Pirandello produced a number of reflections on role from 1908 but these were not widely known, even in the theatre (Bentley 1986/1946). Goffman, however, appears to have been familiar with them for he claims them as one of his sources. This perhaps accounts for his more sympathetic account of social interaction (see Goffman 1986/1974: 152) .

¹¹ Sources prior to 1900 can be dubious because of the problem of reading-back into historical records. In any case, use of the term appears to have been rare at least as a theatre metaphor.

The concept is used to describe an enormous variety of social activity: how business leaders manage crises (Smits and Ally 2003); how spouses negotiate retirement (Szinovacz and Davey 2004); gendered responses to communication technology (Thompson 2004); caregiving (Rozario, Hunterlong, and Marrow-Howell 2004); gender difference per se (Pierce et al. 2003; Schmitt 2003); drug use (Andia 2003); education (James and Mullen 2002); international relations (Cronin 2001), employee performance (Welbourne, Johnson, and Erez 1998) and dying (Parker-Oliver 2000). It has such wide currency because the metaphor seems to offer a plausible explanation for ‘socially-defined behavior norms for persons in given positions’ (Dahrendorf 1973/1958: 13). The thought that one was ‘just fulfilling a role’ (Rarick 1999) has probably occurred to most people ‘on some occasion’ (Riggins 1993: 153), making it an easy inference to fill out.

However, Pirandello suggests that if role is not seen as a theatrical term, role-playing can be conceived of as a form of ethics. In an unstable world, roles provide individuals and those around them with comfort and stability. They help humans know ‘what to do and what to expect others to do’ (Scott 2001). Since there is no ‘true self’ and individuals have to construct their selves as they go along, it may be ‘most human and right to play the roles those one loves wishes one to play’ (Bentley 1986/1946: 39). Willingness to accept these roles could even be seen as a virtue.¹² The conservative implications of theatrical role conceptions are avoided however because unlike in theatre where actors generally play one role at a time, individuals juggle many different roles and role expectations simultaneously and to manage this successfully they require a certain amount of latitude.

¹² Pirandello’s play Henry IV (1922), in which a man, after an accident, comes to see the part he was to play in a pageant as his real self, demonstrates this ‘enlarging of the area of love’, for his friends, unable to convince him that he is deluded, arrange for him to be able to live as Henry. But it also demonstrates the burdens of this love, for roles are imposed on them which become increasingly onerous, and they engage a doctor to work out a way of bringing the man back to reality. In the meantime, however, the man has come to realise he isn’t ‘Henry’, but has taken on the burden of continuing to play his role either out of love for his friends, as a joke, or to punish them for trapping him in a role he no longer wants. The question is, who are the ‘crazy’ ones and what is the way out of such a dilemma? Pirandello suggests that there is no way out once we forget we are playing a role, even if we later come to our senses. The interconnections we have made are so strong that they can only be severed by death. Any attempt to solve the situation through ‘enquiry’ and ‘analysis’ only makes things worse.

However, ‘the determination to impose a role upon another’ was a vice, as was the attention of ‘scandal mongers, prying reporters and amateur psychoanalysts’ who attempted to interfere with the roles people had chosen to burden themselves with (Pirandello 1908 in Bentley 1986/1946: 4-5). It was bad enough that all human life had to occur under the gaze of onlookers, but these kinds of enquiring onlookers only increased suffering because they refused to allow individual selves the latitude they needed – ‘a little territory’ of their own – partly because they mistook an individual’s roles for their selves. It was wrong to give precedence to enquiry and understanding over sympathy and help. People ‘suffer, and need help, not analysis’ as they attempt to negotiate the confused and poorly defined expectations of themselves and others through their lives. Roles, as non-theatrical concepts, help them to do this both for themselves and for those they love.

Unfortunately, the caricatured way role is used now virtually precludes any possibility of it being seen as a dimension of human being consistent with an authentic, caring and ethical response to other human beings. This is a pity because it leaves people who do undertake functional tasks because they care for others vulnerable to charges of insincerity, bad faith or the endless regress of self-interest, leaving little room for redemption.

Dramaturgy

The dramaturgical perspective developed primarily from the work of Erving Goffman, although Goffman himself did not embrace the label (Berger 1986; Brissett and Edgley 1990: 43). He preferred to refer to his field of work as social interaction, a perspective in which ‘that which uniquely transpires in social situations ... in which two or more individuals are physically in one another’s response presence’ is seen as an ‘analytically viable’ interaction order (Goffman 1983: 2). In his early work, he used role in the sense used by symbolic interactionism, but overlaid it with the theatre metaphor to focus on ‘deceptions’ on the grounds that ‘one can learn how our sense of ordinary reality is produced by examining ... how reality is mimicked and/or ... faked’ (Goffman 1986/1974: 160). He later discarded theatre in favour of frame partly because his use of theatre had provoked the misleading idea that individuals had ‘two selves, one manipulative, the other performative' (Manning 1991: 78) when he was in fact committed to a rejection of the notion of any essential self:

The self ... as a performed character, is not an organic thing that has a specific location ... it is a dramatic effect arising diffusely from a scene that is presented (Goffman 1959: 252-3).

Although selves usually try to fit into social expectations, they exhibit 'a certain recalcitrance' to attempts to pin them down (Goffman 1976: 319). This is why admission to 'total institutions' such as asylums, prisons or army barracks that insisted on a single obedient self was such a mortifying experience. The deviousness that many theorists attributed to Goffman's theatricalised performers was not necessarily intentional. It could come about because individuals were unable to quite realise how they wished to be seen: 'ordinary conduct ... is an imitation of the proprieties, a gesture at the exemplary forms' (Goffman 1974: 562) that does not always come off because as a 'sign vehicle' the body possessed 'a limited range of sign-equipment' and individuals had to make 'unhappy choices' when in the position of having to present a 'front' to onlookers (Goffman 1959: 22-9). It could also occur in the face of concerted authoritarian attempts to impose particular identities on a hapless self. These rather than willful deception could account for a certain amount of prevarication in the performer.

In any case, theatre seems to have proven an unwieldy metaphor for Goffman's interests. The interaction between performers and spectators is but one possible interaction in theatre. Performers also interact with others onstage as well as with others in the wings, and it is not always possible to distinguish between these interactions. This makes the idea of role problematic because performers generally interact with spectators in the auditorium through the characters they play, while they generally interact with back-stage spectators as fellow theatre-workers. However their interactions with onstage spectator/actors, although likely to be reciprocal, could be actor to actor, character to character, actor to character and/or character to actor. The move to frame resolves these conflicting spectator/performer positions by placing control firmly in the hands of an externalised analyst/observer and reducing the dimensions of any one 'strip' of social interaction (Goffman 1986/1974: 155) to visible persons within a designated area. Frame thus turns theatre back into a ‘natural’ seeing place ‘in which all bodily displays are enacted and in which all bodily displays are read’ (Goffman 1983: 4). This has the advantage of bringing out much more clearly the peril of visibility – that ‘regardless of how many steps have occurred in the information game, the witness is likely to have the advantage over the actor, and the initial asymmetry of the communication process is likely to be retained’ (Goffman 1959: 133). Unlike performers, who only have access to what they think they are trying to do, observers are provided with two different levels of information that can be compared: what performers announce to be the situation or ‘give’, and how they act in this situation or what they ‘give off’ (Goffman 1959: 129). A politician who has been put on the spot, for instance, may announce his sincerity but at the same time run his hand through his hair or pull at his ear, thus ‘giving off’ the impression that he is lying. Spectators take both giving and giving off into account when assessing a performance. Generally they are fairly forgiving of disparities between the two because they are aware that they too are under scrutiny, and might also fail ‘validity’ tests: ‘few impressions could survive if those who received the impression did not exert tact in their reception of it’ (Goffman 1959: 137).

Civility, particularly on the part of spectators, is what enables communication to continue and information to flow. Spectators are willing to grant this civility because they wish the same tact to be accorded to them when they are in a similarly vulnerable position. Thus although spectators have considerable power over any situation in which someone attempting to express themselves has to take account of the impression they are making, this power is generally not exerted. Instead, spectators show a concern about the ‘face’ of others, hoping that this concern will be reciprocated when their ‘face’ comes under scrutiny. They will engage in evasion and ‘disattention’ rather than provoke a confrontation that is risky and might prove embarrassing to both. They are alive to the difficulties involved in social exchange and generally try to smooth the course of interaction rather than make it more difficult, even when they do not agree with what is going on (Goffman 1985: 611). The value of Goffman here is to provide a more complex view of showing and how it impacts on people’s social lives, particularly as it places spectators in a position where they can injure others if they choose:

[T]he possibility is always there ... it is through body signs that persons present signify to each other that they can be trusted not to exploit these threatening possibilities. Only when these signs are received may the individual feel secure enough to forget about defending himself (Goffman 1963: 197).

This of course can mean that 'whatever it is that generates sureness is precisely what will be employed by those who want to mislead us' (Goffman 1986/1974: 160) but does not necessarily mean that everyone is out to deceive.

Goffman's actors are both actors and spectators. As in Arendt, appearance is a key mode of existence and 'the most revealing insights to be gleaned about human beings lie ... right on the surface' (Brissett and Edgley 1990: 36). Appearance constitutes spectators and actors as both social collectives and as individuals with interests associated with both ways of being. These dimensions may at times conflict such that each can resort to defensive responses because although society is necessarily interactive, consensus is not necessarily the aim. Advantages accrue to members who act in concert with others, but those advantages may cut across individual interests. Individuals must therefore find a balance between their collective and their individual behaviour as both actors and spectators. One of the ways they do this is through accepting the 'frames' within which certain actions occur, simultaneously ignoring what is outside the frame and performing according to the rules within it. They may, however, engage in rim talk, which occurs when the normal frame of interaction or setting, and therefore the behaviour required within it, comes under question. Rim talk occurs at the edges of frames and allows the development of counter-frames 'without risking much damage to one's own or the coordinator's face' (Gamson, Fireman, and Rytina 1982: 116). Rim talk is only possible if people habitually engage in some kind of watchfulness because they don't want to embarrass either themselves or others (Gamson 1985: 617).

Dramaturgical analyses account for 6% of all theatre metaphor records located for this study. Even when they claim to draw directly on Goffman's work, these analyses almost invariably apply drama rather than frame or theatre to the phenomena under observation so that they lose the spatial dimension of theatre with its link to distanced spectatorship as well as the reciprocity between actor and spectator.¹³ To treat something as a drama is to impose quite different limits to those imposed by either theatre or frame. Dramas have a trajectory that is 'amortized' over time (Blau 1989a): a drama is fully spent by the end of the performance, making it a complete object. This is why Kenneth Burke thought drama could help us understand motivated action (see dramatism below). The 'strips' of behaviour Goffman cuts out for examination, on the other hand, continue to bleed beyond the frame.

A dramaturgical approach based on drama tends to favour (and sometimes artificially imposes) cause and effect relationships because it imposes beginnings and endings on fluid situations. It also reduces complex webs of interconnection and the dilemmas they entail to coherent, linear, time-conditioned and visible connections, and stereotypes individuals as character-types in the light of their observable behaviour, even though, wherever individuals go, 'the role-irrelevant need for basic catering' must follow and may impact on the choices individuals make (Goffman 1986/1974: 160).

As can be seen from Table 7.3 on page 242, based solely on records collected for the theatre/drama metaphor study, the approach 'has become a most ubiquitous form of scholarship' (Brissett and Edgley 1990: 1).¹⁴

¹³ Framing has also developed as a perspective in its own right. Some of this work incorporates Goffman.

¹⁴ A search of just two politics databases (Academic Search Premier and Project Muse) on 20th August 2007 produced 1,968 articles using 'impression management', 1,110 articles which combined 'dramaturgy' and 'politics', 5,039 articles drawing on Erving Goffman and 1,969 drawing on Kenneth Burke. A search of Google on 'dramaturgical perspective' produced 10,100 articles, and a search on 'impression management' produced 26,000. Brissett and Edgley's 'sourcebook' for dramaturgy containing 'A Comprehensive List' of material which provided 'a statement of the dramaturgical point of view' and entailed criticism of the perspective and/or utilized the perspective in a research setting, had 395 entries of which at least 130 were empirical studies.

DRAMATURGY: spread of located records – first to last	1900-1910	1911-1920	1921-1930	1931-1940	1941-1950	1951-1960	1961-1970	1971-1980	1981-1990	1991-2000	2001-2010
- Sociology
- Political Science/Studies
- Management Studies/Theory
- Political Communication
- Social Psychology
- Social Science
- Theatre Practice
- Philosophy
- Organization Research/Theory
- Anthropology
- Leadership Studies/Theory
- History
- Nursing
- Theatre Studies/Theory
- Education
- Public Policy Research

Table 7.3 Dramaturgy – spread of records located through the theatre metaphor study

Dramaturgy is particularly popular in organization theory and research where it is frequently linked with conceptual metaphor theory to explain the spectacular crashes of multi-nationals such as Enron (Boje 2002), what makes a good leader (Harvey 2001; Starratt 1993; Tichy and Devanna 1986), the ‘resilience’ of organizational actors (Vickers and Kouzmin 2001), and the management of ‘organizational dynamics’ (Gardner 1992). As Gardner’s discussion, ‘Lessons in Organizational Dramaturgy: The Art of Impression Management’ (1992) indicates, the approach can now also incorporate impression management: ‘the process by which individuals attempt to control the impressions others form of them’ (Leary and Kowalski 1990: 34). Although usually attributed to Goffman, this concept arose in 1920s American motivational literature founded on the idea of positive thinking and associated with the New Thought Movement. Its most famous text was Dale Carnegie’s best-selling How to Win Friends and Influence People (Carnegie 1999/1936).¹⁵ Goffman adopted the term, defining it as ‘the way in which the individual ... presents himself and his activity to others, the way he guides and controls the impression they form of him, and the kinds of things he may and may not do while sustaining his performance before them’ (Goffman 1959: preface).

¹⁵ By 2006, over 30 million copies of the book had been sold (Dale Carnegie Training 2006).

Impression Management

Starratt (1993) and Tichy and Devanna (1986) enthusiastically embrace the combined dramaturgical/impression management perspective as a way of training leaders. Starratt considers the approach a ‘breakthrough in the literature’ on leadership (1993: 125) and sees himself as ‘a kind of ‘dramatist of change’ (1993: viii) as he develops the approach pedagogically. Tichy and Devanna use the metaphor of a three-act play in their description of the pattern they perceive in transformational leadership:

[B]eing a leader today involves one in a drama whose outcomes are largely unknown. Leaders have to improvise on available plots and scripts and, in many cases, rewrite the script as the drama unfolds. Leadership means being a playwright, a lead actor, a stage director, a drama critic and a director all in one (Tichy and Devanna 1986: 17).

Analyses that combine dramaturgy, impression management and Burke’s dramatism (see below) total 17% of all the theatre/drama metaphors recorded in this study. Impression management easily maps onto dramaturgy, although it has also continued its own life in contemporary motivational literature. It has also come to be recognized as an element of psychological life so that it consists of ‘both conscious and unconscious activity’ rather than just ‘people’s conscious and “frontstage” attempts to manage impressions of themselves through the use of ‘props’ and strategies’ as in Goffman’s theatricalised account (Bilbow and Yeung 2010/1998: 406). It is thus loosening its relationship to the theatrical language in which it was originally embedded. McGraw’s overview of the field of impression management in political psychology (2003), for instance, is virtually free of any dramaturgical language, although it retains the problematic link with manipulation and deception so often made through the metaphor.

Political psychology uses impression management to study ‘how citizens think about politicians and the strategic attempts by politicians to influence those perceptions’, although the two topics tend to be treated as separate rather than inter-related tasks (McGraw 2003: 395). Perception in this literature is treated as cognitive: it is about thinking about what politicians do rather than seeing what politicians show. Technically, what is being measured in these kinds of studies is what Granberg calls ‘placement judgments, estimates, or attributions’ rather than perceptions, based on ‘the cumulative set of impressions and memories’ built up over time. Granberg notes, however, that the ‘battle for terminological purity has been fought ... and lost’ and perception is now taken to be these backward-looking things rather than ‘the more or less immediate organization of the sensory stimulation impinging ... at a given time’ (Granberg 1993). Thus, while it is ‘axiomatic in politics that politicians take an active role in trying to shape and manipulate citizens’ perceptions’ (McGraw 2003: 397), and ‘most scholars take it as a given that politicians on occasions mislead, manipulate and deceive the public’ (McGraw 2003: 416) the links between how citizens form impressions and how politicians manage the impressions they give off are not only little understood, (Granberg 1993) certainly in terms of any reciprocity (McGraw 2003: 420), but the literature seems to have dispensed with the fundamental step in the process made visible by Goffman: spectatorship. Instead, the field adheres to Locke’s camera obscura conception of spectatorship whereby ‘all objects of sight, and the idea of them’ manage to fall into ‘a closet ... and lie so orderly as to be found’ when required (Locke 1671 in Bartels 1993: 57-8) by both ‘actors’ and theorists.¹⁶

Dramatism

According to Lyman and Scott, ‘the method appropriate to theorizing was, from the beginning, dramatic’:

[D]rama – by providing an opportunity for an audience to discover the hidden truths that it both reifies and universalizes – is the primordial “social science” (Lyman and Scott 1975: 1-2).

Dramatism, the field associated with the work of Kenneth Burke, therefore provides the ‘sociological’ method whereby these truths can be revealed to critical sociologists, who in turn would reveal them to ‘the ordinary person’ (Lyman and Scott 1975: 110).

¹⁶ The quote is from the first draft of Locke’s An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, republished in 1959 by Dover Publications (NY). The Essay is usually dated 1690. See Chapter 6 for a discussion of the camera obscura.

Dramatism is about the way dramas express motivated action. Since dramatists clearly have to solve questions of motivation in ways that seem plausible to observers, analyses of dramas offer an implicit theory of motivation that can be applied to everyday life. Social life, while not theatre, is inherently dramatic since it involves ‘conflict, uncertainty, rhetoric and choice’ (Riggins 1993: 161). Hence the use of drama to study motivated action in everyday life is not metaphorical. Rather, theatrical dramas are highly stylized forms of motivated action that utilise a dramatistic pentad composed of agent, act, scene, agency and purpose in consistent and coherent ways to connect motivation to action in persuasive ways. For example, it is ‘a principle of drama that the nature of acts and agents should be consistent with the nature of the scene’ (Burke 1945: 393). Therefore the relationships between the elements of the pentad will provide clues as to the weighting of the influence of those elements, and these ‘ratios’ can be found to apply to ‘legal judgments, in poetry and fiction, in political and scientific works, in news, and in bits of gossip offered at random’ (Burke 1945: xv). Where inconsistencies arise, it can be assumed that factors were impinging on the ‘drama’ through the ‘offending principle’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 70). Investigation of that particular principle would reveal motivation.

Although those who draw on Burke’s work, including Lyman and Scott, tend to see it as metaphoric, what Burke was pointing to was a continuum of life in which theatre, as a part of life, had elevated theories about motivated action (drama) to an ‘art’, that could be applied to more opaque actions in other parts of life. Many fields have found this idea attractive, particularly in connection with dramaturgy, which helps to fill in the elements of the pentad. Although the concept has not been taken up with as much alacrity as Role Theory because its methodology tends towards the ‘baroque’ and elusive’ (Geertz 1980: 172), it has still found its way into a number of fields. Table 7.4 on page 242 indicates the spread of records using the approach located in the theatre/drama metaphor study.

DRAMATISM: spread of located records – first to last	1900-1910	1911-1920	1921-1930	1931-1940	1941-1950	1951-1960	1961-1970	1971-1980	1981-1990	1991-2000	2001-2010
- Literature
- Sociology
- Political Communication
- Political Studies
- Social Psychology
- Social Sciences
- Communication Theory
- Anthropology
- Organization Research/Theory

Table 7.4 Dramatism – spread of records located through the theatre metaphor study

Public Policy has been the most recent field to embrace dramatism, using it as a framework for participant observation research into the behaviour and motivations of key policy makers.¹⁷ Although enthusiasts such as Beer and De Landtsheer claim that Burke's 'dramatistic metaphor' is about locating what is visible in order to make guesses about what is not (Beer and De Landtsheer 2004: 16-18), the process is actually about the relationships between the visible (the elements) and how plausible they are. It is an agent-centred approach towards motivation that only works because the end of the drama is known. Analysis works backwards in the way that actors piece together the first act motivation of characters from their behaviour in the third act. However, this requires a text to be 'fixed' like a script, which omits salient features of most social action (Ricoeur 1971: 538):

The artifice which is the play is a structured form of projection composed by a playwright. It is not, even when it attempts to be, a wholly realistic depiction of life, but ... a highly selective arrangement of plots, characters and themes [with] a beginning, middle and some identifiable end (Merelman 1976/1969: 286).

While consistency is 'a principle of drama' (Burke 1945: 393) and one should be able to 'deduce the quality of the action from the quality of the setting' (Burke 1945: 7), such consistency is rare outside theatre. Settings may have wider audiences and may offer multiple possibilities in terms of consistency or coherence depending on where one stands. For example in President Nixon's historic visit to China in 1972, '[t]here [were] so many performers and audiences in this spectacle' that it was 'impossible' for the reporter 'to sort them out': '[t]here is the mammoth American television audience ... the vast population of China ... the Russians ... And ... multiple audiences right inside the secret summit' (Frankel 1972), not to mention the press itself.

¹⁷ See for instance Hajer (2005), Hajer and Uttermark (2008), Freeman and Peck (2007), Shields (1981), Gusfield (1963), Bealing, Dirsmith and Fogarty (1996; 2007).

The danger in these situations is that analysts give their own voice to the material under observation. In dramas of any kind '[a]ctions occur within the framework of a social scene or milieu' and that action 'is conducted by an agent with a conception ... about what is "appropriate" to the scene'. It is also true that 'the actor uses the means at his disposal to accomplish the action and the action is done for some purpose' (Combs and Mansfield 1976: xviii). However, in a dramatisitic analysis of non-theatrical dramas such as a political speech, the analyst decides what constitutes each of these elements. Consequently dramatism 'tends to redefine motives rather than account for them' (McGee 1980: 1n1).

That Burke's work is problematic is evidenced by the modifications to his pentad that even his disciples make. Duncan, Burke's 'major sociological disciple' who was responsible for bringing Burke's work from literature into social inquiry renamed the dramatisitic pentad as: stage or social institutions, kind of act, social role, means of expression, and ends, goals or values (Combs and Mansfield 1976: xviii). For Nimmo (1974: 132-3), 'the key elements ... are the act (or acts), actor, motive, role, scene, and vehicle for addressing an audience'. These basically boil down to a distinction between motion and action, in which action is motion imbued with significance and purpose. Individuals 'make actions of [their] motions' by giving meaning to their motions. They do this through paying attention to the impressions they want to convey, the contexts in which they act and what they might use to help them achieve their purposes. Politics in particular is 'dramatic action' (Nimmo 1974: 154).¹⁸ The similarities to symbolic interactionism indicate the slippage that has occurred as dramatism has come into the social sciences.

¹⁸ Nimmo's emphasis

Lyman and Scott begin their ‘dramatistic’ account of social life with Burke because they believe he offers a ‘theoretical generality’ unavailable in Goffman (Lyman and Scott 1975: 168-9 n1). However, they soon slide into dramaturgy and finally, via Evreinov, into a declaration that ‘reality is a drama, life is theatre’. This slide occurs because they collapse drama as ‘an imitation of life’ into drama as life (Lyman and Scott 1975: 2-3). For Burke, however, life could only share some aspects of human action with theatre, not be theatre itself. Otherwise it made no sense to use drama as a means of accessing life.

Nimmo and Combs urge the dramatistic approach on anyone wanting to investigate the use of symbols or images in politics because it provides ‘principal qualities of dramatic action relevant for dealing with political images’ (Nimmo 1974: 131) and allows political processes to be given ‘episodic boundaries’ (Combs 1981: 53). Thinking of communication according to Burke’s pentad supposedly allows theorists to overcome the problem of describing something that continually escapes them because it is in flux: ‘reality is always more complex, inchoate, contradictory, and inexplicable than our images and metaphors of it’ (Combs 1981: 54-5). Dramatism is supposed to hold reality still for a moment so what it is communicating can be analysed, although this seems to confuse dramatism, which is about the relationship between elements within a scene, with the theatre metaphor.

Geertz argues that Burke’s work represents a shift in the sociological project away from the functionalist connection between behaviour and its determinants of role theory towards action and its ‘sense’ to the actor and those around him (Geertz 1980: 178). In other words, the ‘sociological’ problem has shifted from a focus on impressions onto how to inspect and interpret expressions (Ichheiser 1990/1970), based on a belief that individuals mean something by their expressive behaviour. Dramatism, with its method of analysing ‘texts’ that express action, is one means of approaching this problem of ‘making, not faking’ (Geertz 1980: 172).

A Theory of Misinterpretation

Although impressions and expression run together, the terms denote two different problems and should be kept analytically distinct (Ichheiser 1990/1970). This is important in relation to the arts because what is called ‘expression’ is actually ‘the artful planting of certain clues ... that allow ... ventriloquism’ by the viewer (Mitchell 1986: 41). It is crucial in politics when considering political events. Otherwise analysts risk taking their own understanding of what they see for granted when in fact this should also be examined. Elision between the two concepts happens particularly in applications of the drama metaphor because the metaphor encourages users to deflect responsibility for what they are seeing onto their ‘actors’, who then must bear the burden of both expression and impression, but a similar burden is put on individuals engaged in so-called expressive politics. Analysts deflect assumptions about what motivates these individuals based on their own understanding of what properly constitutes politics back onto the actors. Since these motivations clearly do not gel with what the observed are seen to be doing, the observed are taken to be engaged in merely expressing their identities and values when they may in fact be attempting to make an impression on the views of others in order to achieve a change in those views. Ichheiser calls his investigation into ‘impression’ a theory of misinterpretation to highlight the gap between what spectators see and how they interpret it but this is a benign description for what too often is a wilful exercise of spectator power designed to render the activities of political activists invisible. This can be clearly seen in the designation of thousands of demonstrators as a ‘noisy minority’ compared with an unseen and therefore irrefutable ‘silent majority’.

Ichheiser’s description of his theory as misinterpretation nevertheless indicates how inappropriate the use of the theatre/drama metaphor is in relation to discovering the ‘real’ meaning of people’s behaviour, for one thing theatre is manifestly not a theory of misinterpretation. If anything, it is the opposite: an art of interpretation whereby ‘embankments’ are designed and constructed in order to guide the interpretative capacities of spectators along particular channels.

This is made possible because performers already know the end of the drama and have attributed meaning to it as a whole ‘beforehand, right from the beginning’ (Taviani 2005: 288, 292). It is the non-coincidence between the spectators’ impressions as the drama unfolds and the performers’ timely management of expression that provoke these impressions that makes theatre an art (Stein 1995/1935).¹⁹ By attempting to apply this art to ordinary (or even extra-ordinary) human behaviour, dramaturgy suggests that observers can simply know what people are expressing, but in fact what they know is only what has impressed them: what they think people mean when they see them do certain things. Even when they can check this against what people say they are doing, they still cannot be sure.²⁰

To refuse to take responsibility for impression is to place an unwarranted burden onto actors. The extent of this burden and its consequences can be seen by drawing on the influential eighteenth century art connoisseur, critic, dramatist and theatre theorist, Denis Diderot, who introduced the concept of the ‘fourth wall’ into theatre in the eighteenth century.²¹ Under this conception, actors were required to think of spectators as the inert fourth wall of a ‘room’ in which they were performing so that the characters they were presenting appeared to be totally absorbed in their drama. The device was meant to relieve spectators from enduring the disruptive ‘grimaces’ and ‘caricatures’ produced by actors in their efforts to engage with spectators so that spectators could concentrate on the unfolding action of the drama. A similar rule was to be applied to painting and sculpture:

Whether you compose or act, think no more of the beholder than if he did not exist. Imagine, at the edge of the stage, a high wall ... Act as if the curtain never rose (Diderot 1994/1758).

¹⁹ This is why semiotic analyses of theatre are of little value to performers, since these analyses assume that meaning comes at the end of the process: ‘The results of the analyses made by those who seek to understand how a performance is seen by the spectators are not very helpful to those who must make the performance live’ because they comes too late (Taviani 2005: 291).

²⁰ NIDA theatre students asked actress Jacqueline Kott how she managed to maintain the intensity of her performance in O’Neill’s A Moon for the Misbegotten (Old Tote Theatre 1968) during a long scene where she sat alone in silence on the stage waiting for the morning (a period of about 15 minutes – a long time to be on stage with nothing apparently happening). She claimed to be planning her summer wardrobe.

²¹ Diderot also re-defined drama as a genre rather than a generic term which encompassed genres.

It was also to be applied to everyday social behaviour, otherwise:

Every personage who departs from what is appropriate to his state or his character – an elegant magistrate, a woman who grieves and artfully arranges her arms, a man who walks and shows off his legs [can be considered] false and mannered (Diderot Salons III in Fried 1980: 99-100).²²

Although what Diderot sought was paradoxical because works had to be consciously constructed with viewers in mind in order to ‘annihilate’ them, in each case responsibility for the effects of beholding was deflected onto the object being beheld. The demand for absorption in the object of one’s gaze is a demand for an unfettered right of spectatorship. But this freedom to make whatever spectators want of what they are observing can have alarming consequences. These are epitomised by Diderot’s comments below on Greuze’s Une jeune fille qui pleure son oiseau mort (A young girl crying over a dead bird) (1765), an example of the new mode of absorption that Diderot particularly liked. Left alone to spectate in peace, Diderot convinces himself that the girl is grieving over her lost virginity:

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 7.3 Greuze (1765) Une jeune fille qui pleure son oiseau mort
(A young girl crying over a dead canary) National Gallery of Scotland (Fried 1980).

²² Original emphasis

But, my child, your sadness is very profound, very considered! What is the meaning of this abstracted, melancholy air? What! For a bird! You are not crying. You are grieved, and thought accompanies your grief. There, there, my child, open your heart to me. Tell me the truth. Is the death of this bird really what makes you withdraw so firmly and sadly within yourself? ... You lower your eyes; you do not answer me (Diderot Salons II in Fried 1980: 58).²³

Unfettered spectatorship changes what is observed into whatever suits the observer (Balme 2005; Fortier 2002: 3-4) but deflects accountability and agency for the observer's response onto the beheld (Arendt 1958: 227). Consequently the beheld becomes 'eminently analysable and understandable, eminently readable' (Fortier 2002: 24-5) as the observer 'speaks' for the beheld. Although critical of Diderot, Fried engages in the same deflection when he describes Courbet's depiction in The Quarry (1857) of an exhausted hunter leaning against a tree over which he has slung a slain deer as depicting 'the Freudian problems of castration' even though, as he admits, 'the hunter isn't looking at the roe deer' and the organ 'isn't actually depicted'. Rather it is 'the absence of any signs of special or excessive affect [or] anxiety' in the hunter that leads Fried to this understanding (Fried quoted in Kimball 2004: 50-1). Courbet, however, insisted that 'painting ... can only consist of the representation of REAL AND EXISTING objects ... an ABSTRACT object, invisible and non-existent, is not part of a painting's domain' (Courbet (1861) in Kimball 2004: 52).²⁴ Fried offers 'a violation of Courbet' rather than an interpretation (Kimball 2004: 52).

Diderot's demand for absorption was designed to counteract the kinds of 'theatrical' performances and art that *demand*ed to be looked at. The painting by Louis-Michel Van Loo: Portrait de Carle Van Loo et sa famille (c1757) sums up the spectator's predicament as Diderot saw it (see Figure 7.4). All members of the Van Loo family are fully absorbed in what is going on in the picture except ²³ Diderot's favourite technique for examining both painting and drama was to put his hands over his ears, so that he could watch 'mutes' converse amongst themselves (Fried 1980: 79), emulating Walter Lippman's 'deaf spectator' (Baran and Davis 2009: 84). Goethe ridiculed Diderot for his extravagant and sometimes completely mistaken readings of artworks in his novel Elective Affinities (1809).

²⁴ Courbet's use of capitals.

Madame Van Loo. Beholders of this picture are free to gaze at Monsieur Van Loo and his children at will, imagining as they like what the individuals might be thinking or doing. However, Madame Van Loo challenges the beholder's gaze by looking directly out of the picture. This has the effect of drawing the beholder's eyes to her and away from her family, exactly the power of le théâtrale that Diderot sought to annihilate.

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 7.4 Louis-Michel Van Loo: Portrait de Carle Van Loo et sa famille (c1757); Replica of original exhibited in the Salon of 1757 and today at Paris, Ecole des Artes Décoratifs (Fried 1980: 110).

Nor is this representation of the power of the theatrical accidental. Madame Van Loo was a singer who performed in the theatre. The painting thus brings together le théâtrale (translated by Fried as theatricality) and its opposite, absorption, creating a tension for beholders: if they return Madame Van Loo's gaze, they are unable to freely observe her family; if they attempt to observe the family, they are aware of and distracted by Madame Van Loo watching them. Diderot's solution to this problem, a solution endorsed by many in the arts at the time, was to banish Madame Van Loo, but spectators may well need actors to keep them in line as much as actors need spectators. Indeed, the demand by early twentieth century avant-garde theatre for spectators to 'wake up' was a response to exactly the kind of spectatorship Diderot's demand for absorption produced:

Stage and spectator are too much separated, too obviously divided into active and passive, to be able to produce creative relationships and reciprocal tensions. It is time to produce a kind of stage activity that will no longer permit the audience to be silent spectators (Moholy-Nagy in Brockett and Ball 2004: 289).

Moholy-Nagy suggested using runways, suspended bridges and drawbridges to 'place the spectator in a dynamic relationship with the action'.²⁵ Artaud's Theatre of Cruelty proposed attacking 'the spectator's sensibility on all sides' so that stage and auditorium became part of 'a revolving spectacle which spreads its visual and sonorous outbursts over the entire mass' (Artaud 2000/1933: 435-7), thereby physically incorporating spectators into the show. Italian theatre critic, futurist performer, lecturer and political agitator Filippo Marinetti wanted to 'introduce surprise and the need to move' to spectators by spreading glue on some of the seats so that the unfortunate spectators 'stay glued down and make everyone laugh' or 'sell the same ticket to ten people: traffic jams, bickering, and wrangling – offer free tickets to gentlemen or ladies who are notoriously unbalanced, irritable, or eccentric and likely to provoke uproars', or 'sprinkle the seats with dust to make people itch or sneeze' (Marinetti 2000/1913: 425) – anything was justified to prevent spectators from remaining ‘static like a stupid voyeur’ (Marinetti 2000/1913: 422) or ‘Peeping Toms’ (Artaud 2008/1938: 218).

²⁵ Moholy-Nagy (1895-1946) was an Hungarian Bauhaus designer and photographer. Gropius's Total Theater of 1926, and Molnár's 'U-Theater' were the most famous attempts to realize this vision, but it still appeared in the participatory aims of theatre groups in the 1970s in England (e.g. Joan Littlewood's studio) and Australia (experimental theatre-in-education group, Pageant Theatre), and the mid-to-late C20th trend of moving the action off the stage and into the spectators which has been incorporated even into commercial block-busters.

Left to their own devices, spectators as well as actors are apparently capable of going to extremes in ways that damage the other. In the case of theatre, actors seem to be able to fight back, eventually renegotiating the relationship along less harmful lines. No such possibility exists for those designated ‘actors’ under the metaphor. This can be seen in the following application of the dramaturgical approach to organization theory.

Mangham and Overington

Mangham and Overington believe that theatre offers a general model for organizations that achieves considerable explanatory power for both individual and group behaviour ‘without resort to ad hoc additions from other metaphoric frameworks’. In particular, it allows inquiry into the symbolic construction of meaning without resort to specialized research techniques. Researchers need ‘only the same practiced skill which theatergoers bring to their appreciation of the drama’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 25).

If nothing else, this claim highlights the constitutive role of spectators in relation to the metaphor, for Mangham and Overington are proposing nothing less than to constitute aspects of social interaction within the organizations they study as a theatrical performance based on the belief that both theatre and organizations are ‘products of human action’. They see this as ‘a principled view of human life ... free from the absurd belief that our world is made by forces over which humans exercise no control’ because it recognized human agency:

Humans write the plays, humans characterize the parts and humans sit in the audiences. This is our world. The organizations which promise us life and death are the products of human action: we want a perspective which forcibly makes that point and allows us a part as moral actors to do what we can to work for life and against death, to give the world high comedy and not great tragedy (Mangham and Overington 1987: 26).²⁶

According to Mangham and Overington most sociological research reduces the complexity of persons to the demographic characteristics of age, gender, ethnicity, social status, religion, educational level etcetera. In doing so they claim that researchers are using an implicit and unrecognized theatrical model in which the 'scientific dramatist' casts multi-dimensional persons into one-dimensional categories, thus ensuring that their data matches their script. Not acknowledging the degree of contrivance involved in these kind of studies allows researchers to pass off results that prove nothing more than their own scenario because 'typecasting' is an outcome of the research 'script', not an attribute of persons (Mangham and Overington 1987: 80). Mangham and Overington promise to provide 'a model' that overcomes these short-comings. Their approach will 'make it impossible to employ 'stock' types of persons or characters ... without accounting for their creation' (Mangham and Overington 1987: 80).

What they actually come up with is an elaborate and somewhat repetitive argument as to why the theatre analogy is applicable to social interaction in organizations, and a sample of how the analogy might be employed. They apply some of the elements of theatrical production to what are supposed to be transcripts from meetings at which they appear to have been observers. Although critical of the reductionist use of theatre metaphors, they remove 'hesitations and false starts' and 'the background noise of conversations pursued simultaneously' from these transcripts (Mangham and Overington 1987: 201n1). They also insert descriptions of scene and dress, as well as their ideas of the characterisations 'signified' by such dress. In other words, they reduce and embellish their transcripts so that they look like a drama script in order to demonstrate how much like a drama a board meeting can be. They do anticipate some objections to this process, but believe that such objections lie in either the misguided belief that all that can be said about theatre lies in reading a text, or that the objector is committed to some other tradition of social theory (such as Marxism).

²⁶ Good intentions or not, it is worrying that the writers appear to see themselves as actors in a drama despite their insistence that their use of theatre is strictly metaphoric. Their love of theatre, which clearly comes through in the text, appears at times to get in the way of their argument.

Of course it is possible ‘to see the exchanges between [board members] as monologues in which they reveal their subjective states to themselves, to each other.’ It is also possible ‘to regard the patterns’ and feelings Mangham and Overington ‘apprehend ... as representations, images of their relations’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 107), but this does not mean that these exchanges are monologues, that such representations are all that these exchanges involve or that they are in fact intentional as they are in theatre, or even that the ‘hesitations and false starts’ are not in themselves significant. In the end, Mangham and Overington’s argument can be reduced to the belief that expressive behaviour (which they claim is characteristic of art) is an integral part of the way even managing directors interact and that this has an impression on spectators:

A great deal of ordinary, everyday intercourse in organizations is marked by expressive activity ... people do things and in so doing effect and affect patterns of relationships ... and ... emblemize their relationships (Mangham and Overington 1987: 114).

There is no argument with Mangham and Overington’s hypothesis that a theatrical metaphor might be useful in isolating and studying these effects. What is problematic is their belief that spectators (including analysts) ought to use their ‘theatrical consciousness’, honed on seeing performances of ‘good’ theatre such as Shakespeare’s Richard III to ‘separate actor from action, consciousness from mere behaviour’ (such as scratching a nose or ear) and thereby avoid showing when the actors merely ‘interact with others in a relatively mindless fashion’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 114). How do they know what is mindless behaviour under the theatre metaphor?

The problem at the heart of Mangham and Overington’s argument lies in their idea of a ‘theatrical consciousness’. Initially this quality is used to explain how theatre emerged from everyday life: ‘the conditions for human self-awareness are precisely the formal conditions for dramatic performance’ (Mangham and Overington 1987: 5). Subsequently, it is used to explain why a model of theatre can usefully be applied to everyday life. But surely this is the wrong way round. If theatre developed because humans exhibited a theatrical consciousness (as is also suggested by Arendt's analysis of thinking) then it seems quite likely that their lives would exhibit this quality. The thing to be explained would be the differences between theatre and everyday life, not the similarities.

Mangham and Overington continually conflate the doing and showing aspects of theatre whilst downplaying and at times completely obscuring watching, in particular as it constitutes their roles as theorist-observers gifted with a particularly acute theatrical consciousness. It may well be true that:

[T]heatrical performances can be considered as events which occur in the presence of audiences who are led into assuming a theatrical consciousness – a willingness to concentrate upon an appearance of reality (Mangham and Overington 1987: 118).

This in itself is not an argument for portraying a segment of life as a theatrical event on the grounds that it provides only 'an appearance of reality' to an observer.

In any case, for Goffman, appearance was reality. That was why it was worth studying. People did scratch their noses when they were interacting with others and this could signify a great variety of things: unselfconsciousness when it came to relieving an itch suggesting they either didn't care what others thought or were on quite intimate terms with them; guilt, boredom; concentration; restlessness; insolence. Goffman was at pains to point out how fraught with error social interaction can be. Appearances can deceive. Impressions can be mistaken for expressions. The purpose of everyday 'face-work' and 'body signing' is designed precisely to overcome these problems and for him, it is to the credit of both actors and spectators that misunderstandings are so often avoided.

The scrutiny of others, whatever the reason, is an exercise of power in which the observed are doubly vulnerable, firstly by the simple fact of being under scrutiny, and secondly through the attribution of motives and feelings that they may not have because spectators are inclined to attribute their impressions to ‘the biological innards’ (Goffman 1974: 547) of the observed. However, spectators have no privileged access to the whole person. Rather what they see is a presentation, ‘animated’ by the person to meet the occasion (Goffman 1974: 547). What is at stake for people on an everyday basis is the successful negotiation of relationships with others when each only has access to this animation. This is difficult enough in itself without the added problem of being scrutinized by observers who place themselves outside any affective relationship, let alone when they use their position to appropriate the beheld for their own dramas.

Appropriation is a risk of any performance, hence actual theatre hedges performances with conventions and strategies designed to reduce it. What constitutes a theatrical performance or drama is also not entirely in spectators’ hands so there is a limit to what can be appropriated. However, these safeguards do not exist when everyday activities are seen as theatre or drama. Spectators determine that someone’s activities have the nature of a theatrical performance, determine what kind of drama is underway and determine the extent and limits of that drama. They generally do this as if their spectatorship has no impact on the object of their observation. This can only happen if, in seeing others as ‘actors’, observers are actually seeing them as characters, that is, as objects.²⁷ Seeing others in this way is a way of resisting their claims to subjectivity, whether the aim is to achieve a particular ‘ethics of comportment’ for oneself as in Stoic uses of the metaphor, to come to ‘know’ oneself in relation to others as in psychotherapeutic forms, or to analyse and perhaps make judgments about human behaviour for wider purposes.²⁸

²⁷ Spectators could be just seeing people acting (i.e. engaged in an activity). However, if that were the case the metaphor would largely be irrelevant or misleading, as Goffman discovered. In any case, few users of the metaphor are content with this, particularly when their aim is to understand motivation or make causal connections, and they would also have to deal with the possibility that their presence affected the actors. The point of the metaphor is precisely to avoid this problem.

²⁸ Psychotherapeutic forms of the metaphor consider that viewing one’s life as a play allows individuals to move from the personal to a more general view of both themselves and others and to position themselves in relation to others – in other words, to objectify themselves. This apparently ties individuals into social life in explicable ways, as well as allowing them to propel themselves towards new ways of conceiving themselves, particularly in relation to others, in their ‘personal dramas’. In particular, it supposedly ‘asserts the power of human beings as subjects of their destiny’ (Brissett and Edgley 1990: 3). This use of the metaphor is thought to be ‘empowering’. This in itself is a troubling application because it gives the individual power over others by reducing those others as human beings. The approach has however been found helpful for children who have been traumatised by witnessing terrorist attacks (Landy 2009). Presumably reducing

Seeing at a Distance

Theatre creates the illusion that spectators can fully see a human being and understand them from their actions, but there is in fact ‘no place for men to know one another completely’ (Sartre 2008/1960: 319). It seems possible only because the characters that spectators see have already been defined and their actions and motivations determined in order to create this impression. Theatre separates spectators from actors so that they can see better but ‘what we in everyday life lack and what the actor in a stage-play has is an author’ (Edie 1967: 225) and the benefit of hindsight.²⁹

The theatre metaphor, however, combines spectatorship with authorship and hindsight. It allows spectators to see what they think they see in the theatre in real life. This distanced spectatorship that renders other human beings objects in scenes defined by the spectator is the fundamental characteristic of the theatre metaphor. This ‘ideology of theatre’ (West 1999) allows easy, caricatured conceptualizations of human beings while at the same time relieving what is basically an unacknowledged form of participant observation of any responsibility for its impact on or obligation to the observed.

The harm entailed by this distanced spectatorship is considerable. In imposing an author on human activity, action becomes decontextualised. It gains beginnings and endings and loses its ‘air of contingency’ (Arendt 1978/1971: II: 30). It loses richness and complexity, spontaneity, humour and irony and any chance of correcting mistaken impressions because reality is unable to impinge (Deutscher 1983: 21). The metaphor disrupts these characteristics of behaviour for both observer and beheld, but the observer does not recognize this disruption because the metaphor places them outside any affective relationship with the beheld. The disruption becomes simply part of the drama. Any knowledge spectators think they might have gained through this ‘dead fish objectivity’ must terrifying others to objects in context can help the traumatised regain some sense of themselves as other than victims i.e. they come to see themselves differently.

²⁹ Emphasis in original

consequently be suspect because without interaction with the beheld there is ‘no test, no measure’ by which this knowledge can be validated (Deutscher 1983: 21). Distanced spectatorship inflicts ‘violence on reality’ (Cheng 2004) and is ‘hurtful’ (Voltaire 2009/1764) for both parties.

Graham Smith (2009) argues for a political theory that embraces spectatorship because spectatorship is necessarily perspectival. It should therefore offer theory multiple views, which would encourage engagement with others. Users of the theatre metaphor do not endorse this conception of spectatorship. Rather, the metaphor provides them with a form of spectatorship that uses distance to specifically deny engagement with what they see. The metaphor’s point of view is also not recognized as just one perspective among others. It is a position of ‘absolute vision’ (West 1999: 266) – a ‘God trick’ – a way of looking which promises something it cannot deliver: the ‘transcendence of all limits and all responsibility’ (Haraway 1988: 583). It goes further than theatricality because it is not even conscious of having waived sympathy, and it operates in ways that hide its power. A politics based on theatre will need to come to terms with the harmful effects of distanced spectatorship revealed by the metaphor.

Chapter 8: Coming to Terms with Distance

Distance is not an evil that should be abolished, but the normal condition of any communication (Rancière 2009/2008: 10).

Politics as theatre requires a gap between actors and spectators. The gap allows the space of appearance within which both sides can explore aspects of their shared life in a mutually productive and rewarding relationship that does not damage either party. It also provides the distance necessary for what Arendt considers are the two primary functions of spectatorship, witnessing and judgment. One of the vital tasks of spectators is to keep actors grounded (Arendt 1958: 233-4) and they do this by watching and assessing what actors do in relation to what they show and promise and deciding whether or not to let them continue by keeping the space of appearance open. Actors, on the other hand, make visible issues that they consider need attention. They may do this in conjunction with other major players in formalised settings, or in dispersed and spontaneous sites according to their needs. They may utilise media to try and extend their visibility. Distance is crucial to these tasks. Distance also makes it easier to see abuses of power and to judge them without becoming implicated in them (Grant and Keohane 2005: 32).

Yet spectators can utilise distance for decidedly non-mutual experiences of political and social life in which witnessing and judgment in the name of objective knowledge occurs at the expense of actors and often in complete ignorance or disregard of what actors are themselves trying to achieve or if indeed they are 'acting'. It appears that spectators have the power to turn any action into a performance simply by virtue of watching it, and they always have the capacity to take from an actor's performance understandings and experiences that are not part of the actor's intentions, to see things that are not there, or appropriate the observed for their own purposes. They also appear to be capable of great cruelty towards those they observe.

Since this is likely to cut across the aims of a politics as theatre, a way must be found to come to terms with the negative uses of distance. One way to do this would be to concede politics to the participation theorists who are committed to turning spectators into actors, since one of the purposes of politics is to constrain power. Eliminating spectators should solve the difficulties associated with distant spectatorship. However, there are a number of problems with going down this path – problems that set off this search for spectators in the first place.

Firstly, what Harris (2000) calls ‘participation-speak’ is a limited discourse. It only urges spectators to become political actors according to a narrow repertoire of activities – usually electoral politics (Arvanitakis and Marren 2009; Dalton 2008; Hay 2007: 25; Norris 2002; O’Toole et al. 2003; Vromen 2003). Politics for participation theorists is the formal, institutionalised activity of government, and political participation is to be ‘a predictable part’ of that governance (Gustafsson and Driver 2005: 528). Spectators would be free to continue utilising distant spectatorship in other areas of their lives, including in the social sciences where it is so powerful.

Secondly, even within politics, participation-speak is only directed at some spectators, leaving others ‘unmarked’ (Phelan 1993). No-one seems to be suggesting that the media, for instance, cease being a ‘public watchdog’, and although the Citizenship Development Research Centre recommends ‘seeing like a citizen’ this is only so that theorists can understand what it is like to be a citizen-actor. It is ‘an actor-oriented approach’ in which theorists pretend to be in the shoes of active citizens so that they can gain insight into what motivates and sustains political action and thereby promote participation in non-active citizens (Citizenship DRC 2011: 5). ‘Seeing like a citizen’ is thus a form of dramatism through which theorists observe some actors in order to prescribe appropriate behaviour for other actors who are deemed passive. Theorists retain their position of spectator.

Thirdly participation is linked to action in such a way as to render spectatorship passive (Beresford and Phillips 1997; Rancière 2009/2008: 13; Stoker 2006: 15). This discourse is apparent even in states such as Australia where compulsory turn-out already ensures that most citizens not only participate, but do so along electoral lines. Here it is used to justify programs designed to act on these already participating citizens in prescriptive ways. Participation-speak is thus a form of tutelage that continually raises the bar of what counts as participation for others (Rancière 2009/2008: 8-11) so that being a citizen in a democracy today ‘feels a bit like being the student at the bottom of the class. We are continually reminded of how we are falling down on the job’ (Strand 2003: 25) as explanations for the fall in engagement almost exclusively blame citizens (Hay 2007: 39-40).¹ The usual justification for this tutelage is that most voters are ignorant (Vromen 2003; Claassen and Highton 2006) and this threatens legitimacy but ignorance itself is measured in limited ways. It is equated to not knowing, for instance, what constituency a senator represents, whether or not Australia has a bill of rights (Pusey and Jones, in press) or whether Senate elections are based on proportional representation (McAllister 1998). In any case, in a democracy this should not be sufficient justification to force citizens to not just participate, but participate according to some standard of quality based on an ideal of direct democracy imposed on them by others who appear to be denying their own spectatorship.

Finally, participation-speak assumes that the gap between spectators and actors is the same as the gap between pacified and active spectators and that this gap represents a loss of agency for spectators, but spectatorship can be exercised in a variety of ways, some more obviously active than others (Rancière 2001; Sibley 1967: 149). Spectator passivity is an illusion that is itself generated by distance coupled with a long history of discipline that utilises distance to limit what spectators can do.

¹ Hay in fact disagrees with these explanations. He finds they don’t agree with the (admittedly limited) evidence; they ‘shoot the messenger’, providing expedient ‘alibis’ for political elites and, in the end, are tautological: voter apathy is explained by voter apathy (Hay 2007: 40).

Acting as a Spectator

Acting as a spectator in the theatre can involve hurling both abuse and objects at hapless actors as well as other spectators, creating so much noise that nothing can be heard, or just carrying on socially (or not so socially) with other spectators:

[I]t is not uncommon in the midst of the most affecting part of a tragedy ... to hear some coarse expression shouted from the galleries ... This is followed ... either by loud laughter and approbation, or by the castigation and expulsion of the offender. Whichever turn the thing takes, you can hear nothing of what is passing on the stage ... And such things happen not once, but sometimes twenty times, in the course of a performance, and amuse many in the audience (Hermann Pücker-Muskau, Tour in England ... 1829 quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 143).

Theatre spectators still interject, boo loudly or walk out of shows they don't like (Morgan 2011).² Even cinema spectators exhibit a range of activities, especially in relation to other viewers whose presence matters to them not just socially but in terms of their attendance at that particular film and their appreciation of it (Barker and Brooks 1998).

Mass media presentations of major sporting events also reveal that although from the point of view of the players, spectators might seem to be an undifferentiated blur as in Figure 8.1, spectators interact with each other constantly. They use their spectatorship to 'enrich their social psychological lives' (Melnick 1993: 44), as well as to make comments on social and political events and they interact with distant spectators as well as with the media, itself an active, interventionary spectator (see Figure 8.2).³ They do this to such an extent that

² Morgan lists a number of shows in Australia between 1995 and 2011 where spectators booed, interjected or left. She provides a list of unpleasant spectator 'types' (see Table 6.2 in Chapter 6).

³ One recent particularly boring World Cup cricket match in Australia featured spectators holding up signs asking what the midday movie was or asking their mother what was for dinner.

Figure 8.1 Spectators at a soccer match seen from the goal-keeper's position
(Sydney Morning Herald 6 March 2006; photographer Craig Golding)

sporting associations have found the need to introduce codes of behaviour for spectators. Football Federation Australia for instance requires spectators to 'respect the rights, dignity and worth of every person', not use violence in any form, not engage in discrimination, harassment or abuse, comply with regulations regarding public nuisance, not raise flags or offensive banners and not throw missiles (Football Federation Australia 2007).

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 8.2 'Just Another Kevin', Ashes Tour 2010 (TripleM/Getty Images 2010)⁴

⁴ A reference to the ousting of the Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd by his deputy Julia Gillard and the English cricketer Kevin Peterson who had just been dismissed by Australia.

Acting as a political spectator is clearly evident in the ‘back-turning’ responses of indigenous spectators during political speeches that they consider treat indigenous peoples inadequately (see Figure 8.3 page 269). Turning one’s back has long been a metaphor for refusing to pay attention to another. Non-indigenous spectators of indigenous efforts to make this long-standing white practice manifest reacted to this display of spectator-action by objecting to what they saw as incivility, suggesting that even the refusal to see can be active, many-layered and involve an unedifying tit-for-tat. When Senator Vanstone was subjected to this kind of protest during the 2005 Reconciliation Conference she claimed not to have noticed it (Landers 2005).

These relatively ordered forms of spectator action work with the gap between spectators and actors. It can be a different story altogether when the barrier of distance is removed.

Closing the gap – the dream of participation

In revolutionary France between 1789 and 1794 ‘direct audience control over theatrical production [made] the theatre ... a major crucible for the development of public opinion [and] a central institution of direct democracy’ (Maslan 2005: vii). For this brief, ‘thrilling if terrifying moment’ spectators were urged to be actors. However they rarely took to the revolutionary stage as performers. Rather, they responded by becoming more active as spectators. They interrupted and halted performances they did not like, challenged representations that contravened revolutionary principles and insisted on the right to decide ‘what would be performed and what would not’ (Maslan 2005: 1, 24).

Initially these active spectators distinguished between actors and their representations but under the influence of a revolutionary movement preoccupied with ‘closing the gap’ between representative and represented both on stage and off (Maslan 2005: 132), that saw privacy as ‘superfluous’ if not subversive (Johnson c1992: 69) and that advocated surveillance as the means of achieving a perfectly transparent society, there was a complete collapse of the distance between actors and spectators that enabled spectators to tell the difference between truth and illusion. Paranoid over being deluded by unscrupulous actors who had 'spent their lives perfecting the art of deception', spectators 'saddled [actors] with the precarious burden of actually being their roles' and denounced them for the merest hint of 'insufficient zeal' in relation to the revolution (Johnson c1992: 70). Scripts were ruthlessly censored, whole companies were incarcerated and at least one actor was guillotined for the words of the character he played (Johnson c1992: 55).

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 8.3 Indigenous attendees turn their backs on Opposition Leader Brendan Nelson during his reply to Prime Minister Rudd's Apology speech (Eckermann 2008).

Outside the theatre the invitation to participate politically was also taken up with alarming alacrity (Hunt 1984: 60, 76-83; Maslan 2005: 153-170). However citizen/spectators did not want to become politicians or legislators here either. They wanted to see more and their wishes were accommodated under the discourse of transparency:

In February 1792 ... more than two hundred Parisians went to the Legislative Assembly to demand not only that legislative sessions be subject to public scrutiny but that all kinds of government business ... be open to public observation (Maslan 2005: 155).

However, politics in revolutionary France under the influence of Rousseau was conducted as a form of participatory theatre or festival. All were actors, even if they were actors engaged in spectatorship. When Robespierre grew paranoid about the possibility of treachery and opted ‘to sit among the spectators [so as to] better judge the stage and the actors’ (Robespierre 2004/1792) he remained an actor. The only acknowledged spectator was the ‘eye of surveillance’ (see Figure 8.4).

With everyone in the play, opening up the legislative sessions led to such confusion over which citizens were authorised actors and which were acting as spectators engaged in scrutinizing those in authority that the government had to introduce a costume to be worn by officials in order to differentiate between them and ensure that ‘the site of sessions will no longer be an unstable scene’ (Grégoire, Du Costume des fonctionnaires publics 1795 cited in Hunt 1984: 77) (see Figure 8.5).

Distance in the name of ‘tranquillity’ was also reinstated in the theatre when the minister of police Fouché took upon himself ‘the duty of watching for all, and over all’ (Fouché Memoirs cited in Maslan 2005: 170). By the end of the 1790s structural and disciplinary measures had been re-introduced to encourage ‘restraint and orderliness, both on stage and off’ (McClellan 2005). Spectators quickly embraced the freedom from fear and paranoia that the return to the conventional separation between themselves and actors offered. With the re-establishment of distance spectators could not only sit in companionable safety with strangers who were similarly engaged in watching something else rather than them, they no longer mistook actors for their parts or fiction for truth. Actors could again safely play parts that challenged prevailing social policies without fearing that the beliefs of their characters were going to be taken to be a reflection of their own position. Despite the exhilaration active spectatorship involved ‘no one seemed to miss the moments of solidarity between stage and audience that the Terror had achieved’ (Johnson c1992: 77) for when surveillance became intertwined with a concern with appearance and spectators were encouraged to participate, spectatorship turned out to be a tyranny from which neither actor nor spectator was safe.

Figure 8.4 The ‘eye of surveillance’: engraving inspired by the Festival in Honor of the Supreme Being (1794), Bibliothèque nationale de France (Maslan 2005: 175)

Figure 8.5 Official Revolutionary Council costumes, 1798-99 (Cabinet des Estampes, Courtesy of the Bibliothèque nationale; reproduced in Hunt 1984: 80).

More than any other political event, the French Revolution demonstrated what can happen when spectators are turned into actors leaving no-one to delineate to the actors 'the moral basis for right action' (Christian 1987: 7). Only Edmund Burke seems to have attempted to retain this crucial spectator position, but he was too far away. As can happen to disruptive spectators in the theatre, he was turned on by other spectators and accused of attempting to steal the show:

I cannot consider Mr Burke's book in scarcely any other light than a dramatic performance; and he must, I think, have considered it in the same light himself, by the poetical liberties he has taken of omitting some facts, distorting others, and making the whole machinery bend to produce a stage effect (Paine 1961/1791-2: 296).

However, '[f]ree political action is seductive' (Honig 1991: 98). Around the late 1960s democracy and the idea of transparency became fashionable again for both politics and theatre. Both were supposed to be 'nurtured and legitimized' by participation (Boal 1998; Dolan 2001; Kershaw 2001). Becoming an actor in theatre as well as in political life was thought to be efficacious: it would generate feelings of well-being (Klar and Kasser 2009) and 'democratic and civic attitudes' and promote further participation (Evans 2006: 9; Stolle and Howard 2008).

Once again, however, theatre reveals that encouragement to participation can have undesirable results. Even in restricted venues underpinned by long-standing conventions, spectators can prove difficult to control (Schechner 1994: xxiv). Having learnt that opportunities existed to participate in a performance, spectators can turn up 'in bad faith', with the intention of being 'disruptive' (Schechner 1994: xlviii). Invitations from actors to break down 'barriers' can produce chaos, uncertainty, embarrassment, anxiety (Coppieters 1981: 41) and even panic amongst some spectators.⁵ Alternatively theatre can be reduced to something akin to religious ritual as spectators enthusiastically embrace the opportunity to get close to performers. Where participation is harnessed to radical challenges to social mores such as attitudes to sexual exploitation and understandings of pornography, such ritualistic responses can veer close to orgy (Czekay 1993).

⁵ The most common complaint against early Theatre-in-Education performances by Australian group Pageant Theatre was to do with the amount of noise and movement they produced in their child spectators. Supervisory spectators (usually teachers) could panic and run into the performance area in order to restore 'order' i.e. silence and a reduction in spectator movement. Children could be told they were badly behaved and made to sit on their hands. Children who leapt to their feet in response to a request for help from the actors could be grabbed and sent to the headmaster's office. Some schools refused to take further performances of this nature. Others

Invoking participation allows spectators to see the physical distance between themselves and actors as something they are ‘free to traverse’ (Jonas 1954: 518). While attempts to ‘free’ spectators from the constraints of so-called Aristotelian theatre according to the theories of John Cage by ‘allowing’ them to look anywhere proved too much for actors carrying the burden of maintaining a performance (Schechner 1994: 45; Schmitt 1990: 31-2), when no-touch conventions are dismantled, participation can produce physically harrowing experiences for actors (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 96; Schechner 1994: 44).

Figure 8.6 Two Undiscovered Amerindians ... (Fusco 2011)

Fusco and Gómez-Peña’s parody on the colonial exhibitions of ‘primitive’ cultures that travelled throughout Europe and America between 1874 and 1931, Two Undiscovered Amerindians Visit ... (1992-3), which hid its theatrical conventions behind the conventions that applied to museums, led not just to relished the interaction and not only booked more performances but asked the company to teach them how to set up similar programs for themselves.

spectators apparently being unable to recognize irony, but to a readiness on the part of some groups of spectators to behave in ways that had long been considered unacceptable. In particular ‘the reactions of the white Europeans and Americans betray[ed] a continuation of a colonial mentality’ of racism and sexual predation (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 230) that the lack of distance from the actors allowed them to exploit.

The line between spectatorship and scopophilia also proves to be very fine not just in provocative performance art where such responses might be expected and can be exploited by canny, cynical or equally cruel performers but also in participatory community theatre projects in which victims of trauma are encouraged to ‘tell their stories’ to supposedly sympathetic spect-actors (Salverson 1996: 182).⁶ Participation changes the nature of events, blurring boundaries and creating uncertainty as well as opportunities for exploitation. It produces unforeseen consequences for performers and spectators alike (Jackson and Lev-Aladgem 2004: 212) and it isn’t long before many on both sides have ‘had it with participation’ (Schechner 1994: 44).

Conventions of separation long supposed to thwart the experience of both politics and theatre are conventions that may well protect their practice and uphold their identity. Focusing strategies provide psychological protection for actors as much as they impose on spectator ‘freedom’ and the separation between actors and spectators and use of clear spaces of appearance turn out to provide physical protection for both. While the idea of activated spectators is ‘exciting to contemplate’ it was a disaster for the French Revolution, and as far as modern theatre is concerned, ‘Stanislavski ... didn’t particularly like it, and while Meyerhold liked it to begin with he eventually came to regret it, and disappeared for saying so’ (Blau 1989b: 96).⁷ Grotowski gave up theatre altogether.⁸ Still, participation enthusiasts appear to be an inveterate lot because Kershaw (2001) continues to dream of ways of provoking spectators of contemporary theatre to act, if not as actors, then at least as the unruly spectators they used to be before theatre ‘tamed’ them. He suggests reintroducing professional provocateurs or ‘clagues’ to stir them up against each other, or requiring actors to push the boundaries of bad taste rather than baulk at the risk of a spectator backlash – anything to ‘revitalize’ theatre’s ‘crucial freedoms’ (Kershaw 2001: 152). As far as participation goes, ‘[t]here are some very good minds ... who enunciate a politics in theory that they cannot possibly live with in reality (Blau 1987: 11), something Kershaw admits.

⁶ Scopophilia incorporates both voyeurism and exhibitionism. It is an important concept in psychoanalytic film theory where it is used to emphasise the relationship of pleasure and desire to spectatorship (Sturken and Cartwright 2003: 365). The concept has made its way into theatre theory which utilises psychoanalysis as, for instance, in Blau (1990).

⁷ Meyerhold’s belief that art should confront ‘past with future’ turned out to be unacceptable to Stalinist Russia. He was arrested in June 1939 and suffered seven months of interrogation and torture before being executed in 1940. He was ‘rehabilitated’ during the 1960s (Gerould 2000: 407).

Clearly there are dangers in assuming that spectators are passive. However, simply arguing that spectatorship is a form of action that is best restrained by distance does not resolve all the problems associated with spectatorship because of the range of spectator positions in both theatre and politics that exercise their power at a distance. These include the ‘outside eye’ or ‘eye of prey’ of a director or theorist (Blau 1987; Schechner 1994: 71) as well as the ‘public watchdog’, the media. Physical barriers may be sufficient to manage active spectatorship but distant spectatorship remains a problem.

Distant Spectatorship

Distant spectatorship has two components: actual spatial distance and psychological distance. It is the tendency to forget or take for granted the existential basis of distance that leads to the belief that the gap between actors and spectators can finally be eradicated. Physical distance determines ‘zones of involvement’, the level of interaction and the sensory apparatus required (see Figure 8.5 below). Physical distance is thus the ‘hidden dimension’ of all social interaction and communication. Although the extent of this space is culturally ⁸ It is perhaps inevitable that the two practitioners who most wanted ‘at-onement’ with spectators either ended up mad (Artaud) or turning to drama therapy (Grotowski). Both strove to drive theatre towards ritual for the sake of some kind of ‘communion’ between performer and spectator, something which theatre ultimately cannot provide (Fried 1968). Grotowski came to consider the ‘phenomenon called theatre devoid of meaning’ (Grotowski 1968/1964: 122).

variable (Hall 1966), humans see each other in space, experience themselves and their relationships with others spatially (Zerubavel 1991: 15), place conventions around the use of space and use space strategically (Foucault 1991/1977; Rajchman 1988: 104; Scott 1998; Valverde 2011). Actual spatial distance is both the condition for and metaphoric basis of psychological distance (Jonas 1954: 519). Aesthetic distance, the form of distance that has most concerned theatre theorists, is a sub-set of psychological distance.⁹

Physical distance

[I]n sight the distant ... is left in its distance, and if this is great enough it can put the observed object outside the sphere of possible intercourse and of environmental relevance (Jonas 1954: 519).

All humans are spatially differentiated, making them simultaneously subjects and objects for each other and, metaphorically, for themselves: 'there is no subject that is not also an object and appears as such to somebody else' (Arendt 1978/1971: 1: 19). There is no way of overcoming the physical distance between oneself and another (Sartre 1995/1943: 388): '[j]oin hands as we may, one of the hands is mine and the other is yours' (Cavell 2003/1987: 110).

Physical distance between individuals is 'the most basic condition for the functioning of vision' (Arendt 1978/1971: 1: 111). Sight offers 'a tremendous biological advantage' in that it allows foreknowledge and time and therefore some freedom of choice in relation to action (Jonas 1954: 519; Torey 2004: 148): '[o]ur sight is there for us to find our way, to get through and get by' (Torey 2004: 158).

Although the mechanics of spatial cognition are still not well understood (Cheng 2010: 68), physical distance presents others as objects. It therefore has the capacity to put them 'out of gear with practical needs and ends' for the spectator ⁹ Aesthetic distance can also refer to how a piece of art can set up viewing positions for readers or spectators, the degree to which a work departs from the expectations of its first readers, the difference between the view of the work at the time of its first appearance compared to its present reception (Cuddon 1991: 11) as well as what Bullough refers to as the 'represented spatial distance, i.e. the distance represented within the work' (Bullough 1912: 87). Theatre theory can attend to all of these aspects which accounts for some of the disparities in theories of distance.

(Bullough 1912: 91-2). It is physical distance that determines whether ‘we can look at a man as if he were a shape cut out of cardboard, and see him ... as something as having little connection with ourselves’ (Maurice Grosser The Painter's Eye in Hall 1966: 71). Grosser specifies this distance as from about thirteen feet. At eight feet, portraiture

becomes possible. Shortening this distance leads to increasing visual distortion and the increasing distraction of the actor’s ‘personal warmth’ such that seeing becomes difficult. At touching distance, visibility is so impaired that vision is likely to capitulate to ‘physical expression of sentiments, like fisticuffs, or the various acts of love’ (Maurice Grosser The Painter's Eye in Hall 1966: 72) unless it is redirected. It is these kinds of responses that prove so harrowing in participatory theatre. Close proximity impairs the ability to assess the intentions of the other (Dickson 2009) while simultaneously increasing the ability of the other to resist the beholder’s gaze: ‘the best view is by no means the closest view’ (Jonas 1954: 518).

The range of public distance begins at around twelve feet (Hall 1966: 117). This distance not only allows better visibility; it enforces a no-touch rule (Natanson 1976/1966: 50). Conventional theatrical distance tends to begin here as well. Public distance is ‘well outside the circle of involvement’ (Hall 1966: 116) and extends in relation to the imbalance of status between spectators and the observed. In western cultures, ‘thirty feet is the distance set around important public figures’ (Hall 1966: 117). Attempts to broach this distance without permission will generally be interpreted as threatening.

The most important aspect of physical distance for any individual is ‘what can be done in a given space’ (Hall 1966: 108). Theatrical distance, which is generally stabilized architecturally, enables spectators to distinguish between actors as persons and the characters they are playing. At this distance, spectators are also able to see a unified picture, respond to characters while appreciating the skill of performers, relate what is being seen to wider contexts, and perhaps learn the lessons portrayed. On the other hand, they can also become distracted by something else within their field of vision and cease to pay attention, or choose to withdraw attention since distance allows judgment not just on the capacities of actors but on whether or not what is being shown is worth watching. Spectators also have the power to look elsewhere or simply refuse to see. However, paying attention to what is on stage rather than the proximity of those around them allows them to enjoy being in a crowd, for the focus on a ‘common amusement’ reduces the scrutiny of nearby spectators (Barker 1998/1990) and thereby reduces the threats inherent in physical proximity: ‘[i]n all collective culture your neighbour controls you by his gaze’ (Barker 1998/1990: 57). Focusing strategies and spatial conventions relieve spectators of this concern.¹⁰

Figure 8.7 Visual Distortion in collapsing distance; image by J. Spencer (Booklicious 2011)

The activities of spectatorship that are enabled by public distance for theatre are also enabled for political life. Political spectators are able to assess the skills of political actors as they go about their duties, place their activities in context, take up or reject the messages they are attempting to convey, make judgments, decide whether or not to continue paying attention, or pretend actors are simply objects such as characters on a stage. The desire by participation theorists to remove this freedom from citizen/spectators by attempting to turn them into actors may well be a way of avoiding these responses, particularly as spectators are inclined to judge political behaviour more harshly than political actors (Allen and Birch 2011). However, this move may turn out to be a loss for political actors because distance is also thought to be crucially involved in the generation of sympathy. Some degree of sympathy would seem to be necessary for reciprocity since reciprocity entails at least a willingness to pay attention to the other. Sympathy is also likely to be essential to Arendt’s notion of forgiveness. Physical distance is not only ineradicable it may have benefits that outweigh the negatives of distant spectatorship.

¹⁰ It is perhaps because of this that theatre is able to generate what some theorists see as a sense of ‘communion.’ Arguments for the defence of theatre on these grounds can be seen as far back as Alberti (1485) and are still apparent in Krasner’s analysis of empathy (Krasner 2006).

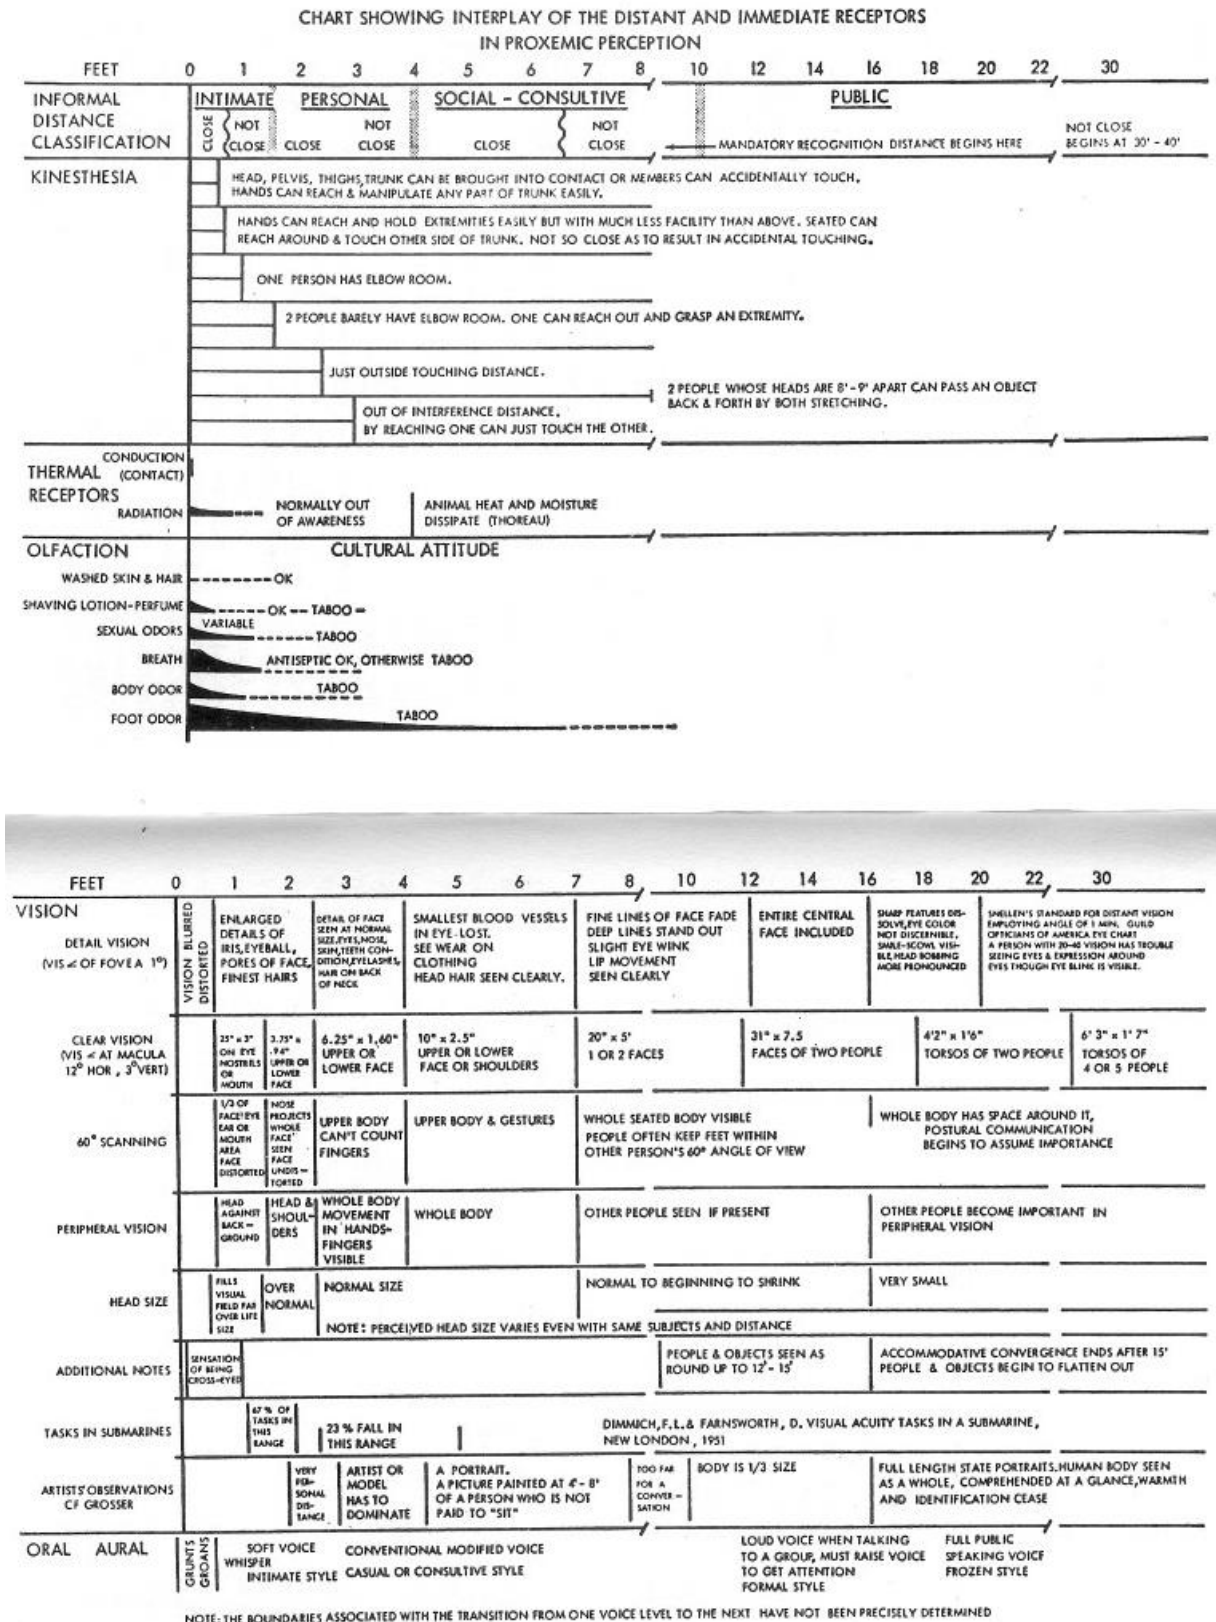

Figure 8.8 Hall's 'hidden dimension': the effects of physical distance (Hall 1966)

Distance and Cosmopolitanism

Physical distance is one of the major issues cosmopolitanism has to address in arguing for a globally applicable solidarity. Communitarian critics argue that cosmopolitanism is an impossible dream because ‘relations between distant strangers are usually characterized by indifference or mild concern’ (Linklater 2007: 33). They consider that ‘the bonds of nationality ... are the key to deep solidarity’ (Linklater 2007:33). Even Kant, who otherwise argued for a broader obligation to others, expressed concern that ‘oceans might make a community of nations impossible’ (Kant 1965:126 in Linklater 2007: 25), not least because their own concerns tend to be foremost in people’s minds. Although distance was crucial to his account of sympathy, Adam Smith also believed that a person was more likely to lose sleep over the threat that he would ‘lose his little finger tomorrow’ than over ‘the ruin of a hundred million of his brethren’ (Smith 2002/1790: 157).

Distance is thought to prevent the development of any obligation to alleviate the plight of others not just because it is an obstacle to intervention but because it makes suffering ‘inaudible’ (Bauman 1989: 192-3 in Linklater 2007: 25). Distance therefore encourages indifference, or ‘a blasé self’ who is interested only to the extent that they can see what is happening as a spectacle (Tester 1998). Worse, given that the media ensures that spectacles of suffering are virtually unavoidable, a pernicious form of detached spectatorship can develop where spectators don’t simply enjoy suffering as a spectacle, they enjoy the spectacle of suffering (Linklater 2007: 44; Rozario 2003: 421). The ‘cruelty’ of forcing spectators to see what they do not wish to see, which is what Blau claims the alienation techniques of theatre from Artaud and Brecht to contemporary performance art try to achieve, can back-fire (Blau 1989a). Devastation from a distance can simply seem ‘aesthetic’ (Dunleavy 2011) (see Figure 8.9).

Indifference to others, of course, is no prerogative of physical distance. The failure to respond compassionately to suffering occurs in intimate relationships as well as distant ones and cosmopolitans can point to many instances in which responses to distant suffering have been neither indifferent nor cruel. For them, the financial and other support provided by distant spectators in the wake of natural disasters, as well as the interventions by multi-national forces in humanitarian and political crises, indicate that there is already an ethic in place that at least encourages, if not insists, that others should be helped no matter how far away they are. However physical distance can create dilemmas for spectators: whether or not they should act; how and to what degree; at what cost (Boltanski 1999; Dolven 1999); and how to deal with the realisation that there may be nothing that can be done. To do nothing confirms ‘the final fact of our separateness’ (Cavell 2003/1987: 110). Much agonising about intervention acts as ‘a kind of shelter from full recognition’ of this unbearable fact (Dolven 1999: 185).

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 8.9 Spectators, Voyeurs and Looking Down Upon Humanity from the Cheap Seats: ‘seen from on high, Japan’s earthquake -- container cars and automobiles scattered helter skelter -- create a surreal portrait of devastation’ (Dunleavy 2011). Such an image could be seen as beautiful.

These dilemmas of spectatorship were explored by Spenser in his epic allegory The Faerie Queen (1596) but he was unable to resolve them. Sympathetic spectators who acted often made things worse. Hasty intervention that cut across the desires of actors, robbing them of the chance to undertake an action that they saw as meaningful, was greeted with hostility and could leave spectators encumbered with unexpected responsibilities. Interventions that used excessive force left dead or dying innocents in their wake. Actions that were too timid failed so that both actor and spectator perished. On the other hand, spectators who hung back while people suffered were chastised for not intervening and accused of indifference or worse, seeing tragedies as sport (Spenser 1995/1596). Distance seemed to be necessary for maintaining perspective because spectators were often able to prevent actors from over-doing things, but it could turn spectators into cruel voyeurs. On the other hand acting resulted in a loss of perspective and could also wreak havoc (Dolven 1999: 184n16).

Boltanski's more recent effort to address the dilemmas of morally acceptable distant spectatorship by expanding Adam Smith's concept of sympathy finds that ultimately there is no solution that does not carry within it the possibility of undesirable consequences. To respond to distant suffering by denouncing evil can simply lead to persecution and revenge while leaving the unfortunate a victim. To respond 'tenderheartedly' can too easily tip into self-indulgence, turning the unfortunate into a passive recipient of a new kind of 'colonisation' through charity. To respond aesthetically depoliticises the situation even as it turns the unfortunate into an object of aesthetic appreciation, yet '[t]o adopt an acceptable attitude, the spectator cannot remain indifferent nor draw solitary enjoyment from the spectacle' (Boltanski 1999: 114).

Spenser's resort to forgetfulness bestowed by a sympathetic faerie queen as a way out of these dilemmas, a response mirrored by the post-Revolutionary 'collective forgetting' that began after the death of Robespierre and that seemed to provide 'a way out of the Terror and back to a semblance of order and national unity' for France (Johnson c1992: 78), suggests that the inability to go on to which Arendt points with regard to actors may afflict spectators as well. This should lead them to sympathise with and value those who have the courage to be 'the man ... in the arena ... who does actually strive to do the deeds' in spite of inevitable errors and short-comings (Roosevelt 1999-2011/1910), but may also account for the invocation of psychological distance and perhaps even the in-turning of empathy.

Psychological distance

When Galileo invented the telescope in 1609 he not only demonstrated that the senses could not be trusted as sources of knowledge, he legitimated psychological distance as the foundation of observation (Arendt 1958: 257). Psychological distance had of course been recognized long before Galileo. It appeared at its most extreme in apatheia: 'the psychological state of an individual liberated from dependence on the external world’ so favoured by Epictetus and the Stoics (Green 2004: 756) and described by Deutscher as ‘dead fish objectivity’ (Deutscher 1983: 21), the kind of extreme subjectivity that imagines that it can exist outside of and unaffected by reality. With the invention of the telescope however, humans could henceforth imagine that they could quite reasonably extend their visual capacity to Wollheim’s ‘no one’s standpoint’ – an ‘Archimedean point’ of observation outside the world – so that the world could be observed as an object in itself (Arendt 1958: 257). This is an illusion to which we have long been ‘inclined to remain willing victims’ (Deutscher 2007: xvii).

The phenomenon of psychological distancing brings into question the idea that perception is a ‘single unitary phenomenon’ (Warnock 1967: 6). Rather perception is an ‘emergent’ process in which memory and cognition fill out an initial sensory experience (Hershenon 1999: 205-6; Menzel Jr 2010: 85) sometimes in wildly imaginative ways that are irretrievably individualistic (Honzl 2008/1940: 256): ‘it is not what “stimuli” fall on the retina but what one thinks or assumes is out there that counts’ (Menzel Jr 2010: 85) when it comes to what one will ‘see’:

Nothing is more free than the imagination of man; and though it cannot exceed that original stock of ideas furnished by the internal and external senses, it has unlimited powers of mixing, compounding, separating, and dividing these ideas, in all the varieties of fiction and vision. It can feign a train of events, with all the appearance of reality, ascribe to them a particular time and place, conceive them as existent, and paint them out to itself with every circumstance, that belongs to any historical fact, which it believes with the greatest certainty. Wherein, therefore, consists the difference between such a fiction and belief? (Hume 1975/1751: 47).

In perception ‘[w]e make, on the basis of ... one or more of our senses, judgments of immensely various kinds’ (Warnock 1967: 6), including the choice of psychological distancing through which we separate ‘our own self’ from ‘anything which affects our being, bodily or spiritually’ so that we can continue to consider the source or vehicle of that effect as an object ‘outside our personal needs and ends’ (Bullough 1912: 89) and available for ‘mixing, compounding, separating and dividing’ (Hume 1975/1751: 47).

Psychological distance has both ‘a negative, inhibitory aspect’ in that it displaces a phenomenon so that it can no longer involve us emotionally and ‘a positive side’ in that it enables us to see and experience the phenomenon differently because our normal responses are inhibited (Bullough 1912: 89). It works both consciously and metaphorically: “‘seeing as’ is the single unique feature’ of psychological distance (Ben Chaim 1984: 76-7). While physical distance initially causes spectators to see ‘actual men’ as cardboard cutouts, it is psychological distance that retains them as objects and places them and their actions on a metaphorical stage so that they appear like characters in a drama (Bullough 1912: 92).¹¹

Seeing something as fictional frees spectators from ‘the constraints of the world’ (Ben Chaim 1984: 75). Since ‘[t]hese people on the stage do not return our looks’, spectators ‘do not have to answer their questions nor make any sign of being in company with them, nor do we have to compete with their virtues nor resist their offences’ (Williams 2008/1951: 276). Instead, spectators can project their emotions onto the observed, appropriate them for some purpose, or remain detached and unmoved irrespective of the consequences for either themselves or the subject of observation.¹² While physical distance provides the space of appearance actors require in order to work, psychological distance provides opportunities to spectators to refuse to fulfil or to deny their obligations to those actors because it allows continued objectification, detachment and appropriation to be selected over reciprocity.¹³ Psychological distance (what Bullough calls ‘psychical’ distance) underpins the perceptions expressed by binaries such as subjective/objective and realism/anti-realism that simply refer to the degrees of psychological distance applied to a phenomenon. It is because of psychological distance that we can even conceive of the opposites that operate in binary relationships (Bullough 1912: 89).

¹¹ Ben Chaim (1984: 5-6) argues that Bullough has the relationship the wrong way round: it is fiction which enables distance, not vice versa. However, her account of distance forgets about physical distance which is what underpins the perception of unreality distance allows. The theatre metaphor bears out Bullough’s account.

¹² Psychological research on abuse indicates that victims are able to apply psychological distancing as a defensive mechanism at very close range but it appears to cause damage to the psyche.

¹³ In 1972, Lyotard accused semiotic theorists of the theatre of treating living performers as lifeless objects for intellectual analysis after he had endured an analysis of the performance of some visiting Japanese actors. He considered that the living art of Japan was being subjected to ‘semiotic imperialism’ (Carlson 1984: 506).

Bullough's account of 'psychical' distance suggests that the aesthetic distance said to be 'intrinsic to the art experience' (Ben Chaim 1984: 71) and fundamental to the theatre metaphor, is a sub-set of psychological distance but one that has a 'peculiar character'. A certain amount of concordance between spectators and the object of regard is required for a satisfactory experience of the work, but too much concordance breaches the distance limit of spectators, the point at which the object comes too close to their personal lives and spectators lose the degree of detachment that recognizes fiction. Breaching this limit makes spectators so 'acutely conscious' of themselves and their particular circumstances that they are unable to experience the object as an object or the actor as an artist, inclining them towards 'sensory over-investment' (Bullough 1912: 98) and the 'surfeit of reality' Simmel referred to (Simmel 1976/1912: 59). The risks involved in this difficult balancing act are particularly severe for theatre because it is an embodied art that is experienced collectively. Distance limits, while broadly conventional, are also deeply personal. They may be breached for an entire body of spectators, or only in some spectators at a performance but not others. On the other hand, too much detachment or 'over-distancing' also leads to a loss of the aesthetic experience. The object/performance simply fails to resonate with spectators (Bullough 1912: 92-117). This may lead to an overly critical or negative response or to spectators rejecting the object/performer entirely. This is the paradox of aesthetic distance: it requires 'the utmost decrease of Distance without its disappearance' (Bullough 1912: 99) and it requires it of both practitioners and spectators.

Disputes over the function of distance in theatre theory are likely to have their origins in this paradox. Within the two poles of aesthetic distance – the distance limit and over-distancing – different kinds of theatre operate with and must work within different degrees of distance. This occurs within the broader frameworks of both psychological and physical distance. The combinations produce different styles of theatre, and different spectator experiences of the same production (Bullough 1912; Pavis 1998: 109). Twentieth century theatre practitioners in particular have consciously played with or attempted to manipulate aesthetic distance (Ben Chaim 1984: 78-9).¹⁴ These attempts generally overlook distance as a fundamental condition of spectatorship that spectators themselves play with and manipulate. Under the influence of distance, spectators can be selective about what they will allow to affect them. This is why Edmund Burke believed that sympathy on its own was insufficient to enable sociability. It needed to be underpinned by ‘awe and respect’ for long-standing institutions of government and the traditions, habits and conventions of society so that spectatorship could be channelled along appropriate avenues (White 1994: 47). Under the influence of aesthetic distance in particular, spectators are inclined to interpret their emotional responses ‘not as modes of our being but rather as characteristics of the phenomenon’ (Bullough 1912: 89) so that the phenomenon comes to seem to be ‘just like them’ and hence ‘truthful’ (Ben Chaim 1984: 16). This perception of ‘truthfulness’ then encourages further identification, producing empathy. Empathy carries its own emotional charge but ‘the emotion is ours and ... so are the qualities we confer ... we are seeing ourselves’ (Ben Chaim 1984: 16) rather than the object. This makes it unsuitable as a basis of sociability.

Both Bullough (1912: 93) and Brecht believed that empathy was the result of too little aesthetic distance between spectators and the phenomenon under observation. Empathy is a particular danger of theatre because theatre is an embodied art in which the distinctions between character and actor can become blurred.¹⁵ However, where spectators maintain sufficient distance from the phenomenon they can observe it as an entity in its own right. While this carries the opposite dangers of objectification, appropriation or outright and unfeeling rejection, where the balance was right spectators could choose instead to extend sympathy to the phenomenon in relation to its situation. Thus sympathy, although also enabled by distance, was a qualitatively different experience to empathy. In sympathy the phenomenon, not the self, is the beneficiary of the spectator's emotional response and remains independently visible.

¹⁴ Artaud and Brecht were renowned for this, even though their work (and their theories) pulled in different directions. Brecht demanded greater distance to break up the ‘empathic’ response of spectators to so-called Aristotelian theatre which he saw as ‘culinary’: designed for consumption rather than thought. Artaud, on the other hand, thought this kind of theatre was over-distanced and looked for ways to reduce distance.

¹⁵ Some theatrical productions deliberately blur these distinctions and then ridicule spectators for being unable to distinguish between character and actor. Bullough however, provides an example where the spectator blurs the distinction because his personal life has made his distance limit particularly sensitive to a portrayed situation. The blurring can occur on both sides.

Under the influence of psychological distance, however, theatricality could kick in, allowing sympathy to be waived in favour of continued observation. For the historian, this allowed the capture of 'the solidity of action ... its "breadth" and "depth" in a linear narrative' (Schoch 1999: 29). Theatricality offered an expansive view of often simultaneous events, allowing them to be placed into a broader context so that their relationships and 'real' meaning could be seen.¹⁶ Theatricality was the difference between Carlyle's account of the French Revolution and Madame Roland's partisan account that he criticised. What Madame Roland thought was a world changing event as she immersed herself in it was revealed, with the benefit of the historian's larger view, to be simply a show, something that Nature's 'fire-flames' soon showed 'with terrible veracity' to be false (Carlyle 2008/1841). Apter engages in this mode of perception when he reduces the Iranian revolution to 'pure theatre' (Apter 2006: 222). This was precisely the response to revolution that Burke found so offensive, particularly when it generated enthusiasm for what was in fact a tragic event.¹⁷ The psychological distancing of theatricality turns the situation of the observed simply into grist for the mill of the observer's purpose. The distinction between actors and spectators is therefore a false one from the point of view of spectators. The actual distinction is between spectators and objects, and it is because of this that spectatorship entails power, and theatrocracy (rule by clamour) is dangerous.

The problem of limits in a theatrocracy

Plato argued that the problem with theatrocracy was that spectators came to disregard the normal order of a society because their experience of judgment by clamour in the theatre led them to believe they had the capacity to judge everything else as well. Emancipated from the influence of people ‘of taste and education’ spectators ‘began to use their tongues; they claimed to know what was good and bad’. Everyone was sure ‘that he was an authority on everything’ (Plato Laws 700c-701). On the other hand, Walter Benjamin believed teatrocracy was dangerous because it invoked a universalised audience as ruler. This obscured the differences and therefore the possibilities for change that actually existed within a body of spectators and led not to chaos and disorder but to the perpetuation of an intolerable state of affairs in the name of a ‘monolithic, unchangeable, natural’ public (Weber 2004: 35). Either way, the upshot was ‘a wretched life of endless misery’ (Plato Laws 701c).

¹⁶ Theatricality might manifest itself in either sincere or insincere ways, although Carlyle believed the former would always outdo the latter for impact.

¹⁷ The nineteenth century spectator known as the flâneur also chose to view the world without sympathy, but as a 'cool', self-absorbed spectator rather than an enthusiastic one. Baudelaire claimed the flâneur 'aspires to insensitivity' as well as anonymity – 'a prince who everywhere rejoices in his incognito' (cited in Mazlish 1994: 46-9).

Misery and violence is what Burke predicted would be the outcome of the teatrocracy of the French Revolution, although his concerns were directed towards actors as well as spectators. For the actors there was no requirement to observe any external limiting factors such as existed in real life because they could claim that their actions were driven by the logic of the drama. Any extreme need only be justified according to the fiction within the play, including terror. Yet the inconsistencies in the behaviour of participants should have indicated to spectators at least that what was happening was not a play. There was simply too much contingent activity. Unlike life, dramas were highly selective, choosing their parts according to the ends playwrights had in mind and, unlike life, ‘avoiding ... the intermixture of any thing which could contradict it’ or destroy its design (Burke 1852/c1765). This made the responses of spectators who were ‘exulting’ in the event shameful: only a ‘perverted mind’ was capable of weeping at a tragedy in the theatre and exulting in it in real life (Burke 1969/1790: 217). There were significant differences between life and theatre. These differences protected each from the other. To collapse the two together was to generate the worst of both. Action was not answerable to any external force in terms of morality, long-term considerations, economics or concerns about human life. The revolutionaries could engage in any atrocity and not consider themselves responsible for it. But, given that they had immobilised observers by relegating them to the position of spectators in their teatrocracy, ‘the proper state of mind for observers of the French Revolution [was] that appropriate to watching a tragedy' (Boulton 1963: 143-4). It was not to cheer on from the sidelines.¹⁸

Walt Whitman and the 'Proper Mode' of Spectatorship

Poet and political actor Walt Whitman used theatre as a metaphor extensively throughout his writings. Towards the end of his life he imagined himself 'as an actor making his way to the flies, or exit door of "earth's stage" and nostalgically recall[ed] his life "out in the brilliancy of the footlights"' (Ackerman 1999: 42). Yet, as an actor, he was essentially a spectator. Even at the theatre, he 'always scann'd an audience as rigidly as a play' (in Ackerman 1999: 83), and was estranged enough to observe and report on 'a collective experience of the highest order ... of the most diverse social and intellectual types' when it occurred (Whitman 'Sparkles From the Wheel' 1956: 360-1).¹⁹

Whitman saw theatre as a metaphor for American democratic life, a way of overcoming the tension between individualism and collectivity:

[W]hat is more dramatic than the spectacle we have seen repeated, and doubtless long shall see – the popular judgement taking the successful candidates on trial in the offices – standing off, as it were, and observing them and their doings for a while, and always giving, finally, the fit, exactly due reward? (Democratic Vistas 2008/c1892).²⁰

¹⁸ The French Revolution was something of a spectator sport: 'Philosophers ... became cheerful and optimistic [and] converted to a faith in the progress ... of knowledge [and] human affairs' (Arendt 1978/1971: 2: 154). Herder sailed from Riga in order to watch it since 'God' had put 'this great scene before our eyes ... so that we might witness ...and learn' (Herder Letters for the Advancement of Humanity 1792 cited in Blumenberg 1997/1979: 44-6) .

¹⁹ Whitman was a member of the Democratic Party during the 1840s . He engaged in political debates and was elected to the position of secretary of the General Committee of Queens County for two years (Ackerman 1999).

²⁰ This conception of democracy was of course based on the exclusion of much of the population – not just women but also the more refined – for it was based on the popular theatre of the 1830s at the Bowery where spectators were almost exclusively male. The interaction he sought was the 'electric force and muscle' generated 'from perhaps 2000 full-sinew'd men' (November Boughs in Ackerman 1999: 82) uninhibited by the presence of women or Puritanism.

The aim of most political actors was not to delude unsuspecting spectators or manipulate their willingness to extend sympathy. Rather they were trying to demonstrate through their performance, sometimes repeatedly, their ability to generate a sense of communion for spectators. Essential to this conception of the relationship between performers and spectators, politicians and citizens is Whitman's conception of the performer as 'a personality perfect and sound', capable of standing before spectators who were 'at the play-house perpetually' and who were 'perpetually calling [them] out from behind [the] curtain' (Manuscript Notebook cited in Ackerman 1999: 42) to 'play the part that looks back on the actor or actress'. Actors thus revealed themselves even as they revealed the character being portrayed ('Crossing Brooklyn Ferry' 2008/1855) in the way that the personalities of the great actors and actresses of the nineteenth century stage shone through whatever part they undertook. The counterpart to this 'perfect and sound' performer was an equally well-endowed spectator, one 'that confronts all shows he sees by equivalents out of the stronger wealth of himself' (cited in Ackerman 1999: 85).

In political life as in theatre, according to Whitman, there was a tension between 'critical detachment, the responsibility of the individual to make political and moral judgements, and a desire for complete, almost ecstatic, immersion in experience' (Ackerman 1999: 84). The key to overcoming the tension between both performers and spectators, and between individual spectators and the experience of being part of a collective, was sympathy. Sympathy was 'the proper mode' of response in both theatre and politics because it 'called out' the best in performers and enabled the electricity to be created that brought about cohesion between all the diverse individuals involved, including the performers.²¹ Because they were prepared to extend sympathy, spectators had the 'inalienable right' to 'call out' for more effort from both performers and other spectators. It was on the basis of this right that they were then in a position to cast judgment – which they did through their applause.

²¹ The idea that a theatrical performance could generate an 'electric power' was first suggested by Hiffeman in 1770.

This is not a timid conception of either theatre or politics. The power to ‘call out’ the performer has shades of Green’s plebiscitary democracy, but sympathy modulates the power of spectators so that their demands become more of an encouragement to actors to show what they can do. Showing themselves was a by-product of a skilled performer, not a requirement of candour. It is thus a more positive approach that helps to generate the ‘electric’ interaction between spectators and actors that brings both theatre and politics alive so that ‘enacted on the visible stage of society, solid things and stupendous labors are to be discover’d’ (Democratic Vistas 2008/c1892).²² But this was an interaction that could also be generated between strangers on the street simply through the act of spectatorship:

I am a man who, sauntering along without fully stopping, turns a casual look upon you and then averts his face,
Leaving it to you to prove and define it,
Expecting the main things from you (‘Poets to Come’ 2008/1855).

The spectator as a casual observer calls on those who observe him looking at them to also rise to the occasion as actors in a performance, but leaves them to find their own way of doing this. The right to demand the best of others thus falls equally on every spectator, as does the right to find one’s own way to rise to the occasion fall on every actor. In a society that privileged individuals, Whitman believed that this was a positive, interactive way to achieve a sense of social cohesion. It recognized that action took courage, and required encouragement, and that spectatorship that provided this encouragement and was prepared to extend sympathy but refrained from exerting more scrutiny than the occasion warranted, contributed positively to political life.

As in Burke and Bullough, sympathy seems to offer a way to mitigate the negative effects of distance. However, Boltanski’s and Spenser’s struggles with the dilemmas of spectatorship indicate that this is no straightforward solution, particularly now that sympathy and empathy have become inextricably entwined.

²² Whitman nevertheless saw this as requiring the augmentation of a rich American culture

Sympathy or empathy?

Sympathy and empathy are now commonly collapsed into or confused with each other, however their differences remain significant. Sympathy, which came into English around 1579 meant to feel in agreement with others, to experience a ‘fellow feeling’. Until the sixteenth century, it was considered one of the four elements of similitude whose task it was to ‘draw things together’ (Foucault 1994/1966: 23). Hume expressed it in terms of music: sympathy explained the resonance that a note played on an instrument could evoke in ‘strings equally wound up’ (Hume 2006/1739: 315). As it was always other-oriented, the idea easily developed into the sense of human companionship that Adam Smith, and later Brecht, tried to exploit.

Empathy, on the other hand, came into English in 1909 as a translation of emfühlung, a term supposedly coined by Theodor Lipps in 1903 to argue that art appreciation depended on the viewer’s ability to project onto the object their own feelings and perceptions (Barnhart 1998: 326; Bate 1945: 145n3; Makkreel 1996: 219).²³ Empathy is an imposition on the object or person under regard: ‘[i]n empathy, we substitute ourselves for the other’ (Wispé 1986). Empathy ‘stands opposed, in its subjectivity, to that insight of the sympathetic imagination by which objective understanding of people is achieved’ (Bate 1945: 160-164).²⁴ These differences between sympathy and empathy might best be illustrated by Buber’s description of the I-Thou relationship in dialogue (Buber 1958/1923). In dialogue, in which two minds meet and interact the Thou ‘is not an object of my experience’ (Kim and Kim 2008: 57) as it is in empathy.²⁵ Rather, the I-Thou relationship is a social relationship, a ‘meeting’ with the other in which the other’s feelings remain their feelings: ‘The otherness of the Other is maintained throughout the act of genuine feeling-with; in this way, the genuine article is distinguished from contagion or identification’ (Bartky 2002: 77). Central to this is the continuing ‘awareness of distance between selves’ (Scheler 1970/1913: 23 cited in Bartky 2002: 77). An empathic response, according to Brecht, led spectators to say:

²³ Both Krasner and Gauss claim that the German term was used as early as 1872-3 by Robert Vischer, who thought of it as a ‘contractive’ effect on both the muscles and emotions and that Lipps took it up from Vischer (Gauss 2003/1973: 87; Krasner 2006: 266).

²⁴ Emphasis added.

²⁵ Emphasis added.

Yes, I have felt like that too – Just like me – It’s only natural – It’ll never change – The sufferings of this man appal me, because they are inescapable – That’s great art; it all seems the most obvious thing in the world – I weep when they weep, I laugh when they laugh (Brecht 2008/1936: 174).

Whereas a sympathetic response led them to say:

I’d never have thought it – That’s not the way – That’s extraordinary, hardly believable – It’s got to stop – The sufferings of this man appal me, because they are unnecessary ... I laugh when they weep, I weep when they laugh (Brecht 2008/1936: 174).

Sympathy ‘stops short of total identification’ (Eddershaw 1996: 16). Spectators can feel ‘different emotions from those being experienced by the characters on stage’ (Eddershaw 1996: 16). They could also feel sympathy for someone who was unaware they were in a situation that warranted it (Smith 2002/1790: 15-6). Empathy makes no sense in such a case since it is impossible for the observer to ‘feel like’ the person in that position and retain their awareness of feeling for that person (Eisenberg and Miller 1987: 292): ‘When the spectators’ feelings turn into empathy, the character as object is lost’ (Eddershaw 1996: 16). Empathy is about the construction of the self through the appropriation of the other’s position (Little 1985: 61-3).

Sympathy is argued by some theorists to be an ‘immediate and unthinking’ response to the sight of others suffering that acknowledges them as human beings like oneself. It precedes thought, and takes an effort of will not to respond (Taylor 2002: 5-6): ‘the effect of sympathy is instantaneous’ (Smith 2009/1759: 17). It ‘is an instinct that works us to its own purposes without our concurrence’ (Burke 1808/1756: 144). Theatre practice rather than theatre theory supports these claims. Although theatre theorists talk about the theatrical experience in terms of reflection, opportunities for reflection rarely if ever arise during a performance because theatre is a temporal art that can only be experienced sequentially. A performance is watched sequentially, building moment by moment (Hamilton 2006: 232). Indeed, the tension of performance for spectators is generated by the need to keep up even when unsure (Simon 2003: 213; Stein 1995/1935: 193; Taviani 2005: 288). People are suddenly already there and one has to 'get acquainted' very quickly (Stein 1995/1935: xxxvi). The less that is known the more focused the attention has to be on what is unfolding (Meunier Les Structures de l'expérience filmique 1969 cited in Sobchack c1999: 242-244). Reflection can only occur afterwards, and may in fact make what was an intense experience seem 'denatured and disappointing' (Hamilton 2006: 235). Secondly, theatre is hedged by conventions designed to prevent spectators from actively responding to what they see, which would not be necessary if sympathy was a reflective response. Bullough suggests that censorship too would not be necessary (Bullough 1912: 97).

Some psychologists recognize this immediacy of sympathy but as a consequence downgrade what was once considered an indicator of mental health and maturity (Klapp 1964: 256), 'a measure of [one's] personality' and 'a requisite to social power' on which 'effectiveness depends' (Cooley 2009/1902: 106, 140-1) to a mere motor response to stimuli (Beavin Bavelas et al. 1987). If anything, this downfall in sympathy's status reinforces the view that humans are other-oriented first, before they become self-oriented. Recent psychological descriptions of empathy suggest that empathy may be a distortion of sympathy in that the immediate out-flowing of feeling towards the other is brought back onto the self in a 'just like me' movement that Salverson (1996: 184) sees as having voyeuristic implications that are damaging to actors. Whether or not this is the case, empathy seems to be a more complex response than sympathy, as the following definition indicates:

When I visually imagine, or visualize, an event, there are two modes of doing so. I can imagine the event from no one's standpoint: it unfolds frieze-like, across a divide. Or I can imagine it from the standpoint of one of the participants in the event, whom I then imagine from the inside. This latter mode I call centrally imagining (Wollheim 1987: 29 cited in Nanay 2006: 250).

This ‘imagining from the inside’ is ‘a form of self-imagining characteristically described as imagining doing or experiencing something (or being a certain way)’ (Walton 1990: 29 cited in Nanay 2006: 250). It is a ‘two-step’ process of identification through which, if one finds one’s emotions in agreement with those of the character, one then ‘identifies’ with the character (Currie 1995: 153 in Nanay 2006: 251).²⁶ To be empathetic is to be interested in one’s own experience rather than the experience of the other. Everything that is being observed is self-directed:

Empathy supposes a fusion of subject and object, while sympathy supposes a parallelism between them in which I am aware of the distinction between myself and the other. In sympathy I feel with; in empathy I feel in (Gauss 2003/1973: 87).

In empathy whatever happens to the character ‘happens vicariously to the spectator’ (Boal 1979/1974: 102) who, in order to maximise the experience must exclude others. Arendt considers this self-orientation ‘looking with blinded eyes’ (Arendt 1978/1971 II: 76).

Although the differences between the two concepts seem clear, sympathy is now frequently collapsed into or simply misread as empathy. A recent article on neurophysiological research that found that humans were ‘hard-wired for sympathy’ by networks of ‘mirror neurons’ in the brain was entitled ‘Cut-throat behaviour makes empathy flow’ (Gruen 2009).²⁷ Baron-Cohen’s book on empathy erosion, which he claims lies behind human cruelty, begins with the question: ‘how do humans come to switch off their natural feelings of sympathy’ (Baron-Cohen 2011: 2). His examples also imply that sympathy and empathy are the ²⁶ Nanay is critical of this use of identification. He argues that it is ‘ill-defined’, covers too many different possibilities and implies a negative view of spectators. He prefers the term ‘character engagement’: we engage with a particular character, which may be why we project onto them the possibilities of action we perceive in the space of performance (Nanay 2006: 254n6).

²⁷ Emphasis added.

same thing: ‘When I see you struggle with the suitcase and I experience a pang of sympathy, but turn away, I would say that I have still empathized (Baron-Cohen 2011: 145nviii). Griswold argues in his analysis of Adam Smith’s work that Smith ‘invites’ Griswold’s application of the theatre metaphor to his work because of ‘the role he gives to the empathetic imagination’ (Griswold Jr. 1999: 65). Smith also apparently opposes ‘the view that we emphathize with others only when we think it to our advantage to do so’ (Griswold Jr. 1999: 78).²⁸ These substitutions for the sympathetic imagination and sympathise are hard to understand in someone engaging with Smith’s work because Smith is quite explicit about his terminology and was well-known for his care with it (Haakonssen 2002: xxii-xxiii). Yet many theorists claim that Smith and Hume use empathy and sympathy ‘interchangeably’ (Clark 1987: 294n3) or really mean empathy when they say sympathy but lacked the word (Slote 2010: 5; Snow 2000: 67-78; Soutphommasane 2011).²⁹ As with so many of the distinctions drawn in this study, this is to lose important differences in meaning. It is also to lose a body of literature from theatre theory that has wrestled over such differences. More importantly, it is to lose sight of the social function that has historically been attributed to sympathy and that accounts for how humans can find ‘delight’ in the suffering of others. Any response that is required by social life must offer some pleasure or it is unlikely to be exercised (Burke 1808/1756: 123-146). In real life, the relief of being able to alleviate another’s pain even to a small extent brings pleasure because it relieves our own pain at seeing them suffer. This is likely to encourage the responsiveness to others that might overcome distant spectatorship.

Even though he insisted that sympathy was an instantaneous response, Adam Smith’s account of sympathy as the basis of social morality did entail reflexivity, which is perhaps why many theorists of empathy claim that what he really describes is empathy. However, in Smith the double action is related to propriety not identification. If spectators who are ‘not a party to the conduct’ consider a person’s behaviour appropriate under the circumstances, something they test by considering how they think they might respond under the same circumstance, they approve of the actor’s conduct by continuing to offer sympathy ²⁸ Emphasis added.

²⁹ Snow also claims that John Stuart Mill meant ‘what I am calling “empathy”’ (Snow 2000: 67-78).

(Raphael 2007: 17). They ‘go along’ with the actor. If they find they can’t approve, they withdraw their sympathy. The actor, who is a spectator of his spectators, observes this withdrawal and modifies his behaviour in order to gain the approval and continuing sympathy of his spectators:

The general rule ... is formed, by finding from experience, that all actions of a certain kind, or circumstanced in a certain manner, are approved or disapproved of [according to whether they] excite for the person who performs them, the love, the respect, or the horror of the spectator (Smith 1976/1759: 159-160).

The approval of others is the key to Smith’s conception of sympathy and its impact, which is why he called it ‘fellow-feeling’ (Smith 2002/1790: 13).

The conflation of empathy and sympathy becomes very problematic when the position of Smith’s internalised ‘impartial spectator’ who plays the other for the acting self is considered. The impartial spectator is a projection of the self-conscious acting self, similar to Shaftesbury’s ‘inspector or editor ... within us’ (Shaftesbury Characteristics of Men 1711 cited in Marshall 1986: 29). Its task is to help the acting self see itself as others who are not involved might and let it know whether it should modify its conduct. For this spectator to identify with the acting self would be to undermine this task. The last thing the acting self would want of its impartial spectator-self, given its task of ensuring the self’s social approval, is for it to identify with the actor-self:

I, the examiner and judge, represent a different character from that other I (Smith 1976/1759: III.I.6).³⁰

However, sympathy may be an option that spectators need not exercise or can ‘withdraw’ (Baron-Cohen 2011; Clark 1987: 291; Taylor 2002: 122). It is ‘selective’ (Cooley 2009/1902: 155). Its extension can depend on both grounds and status (class, age, friend/enemy distinctions, gender) as well as which passion is involved (Smith 2002/1790: 37-44). In general grounds that are unavoidable are more likely to attract sympathy than grounds where the sufferer is at fault. Sympathetic responses may also depend on four ‘rules’: don’t make unwarranted claims; don’t claim too much or accept too readily; claim some even if you don’t want to so as to ‘keep sympathy accounts open’ and repay with gratitude or reciprocal sympathy or both (Clark 1987: 290).³¹ Where these rules are broken, sympathy can be withheld or withdrawn.³² Theatre supports this view. Spectatorship can, as a consequence of distance, waive sympathy and become a form of cruelty. There is a thrill for spectators in seeing an individual tread the fine line at the limits of their control without having to take responsibility for the consequences of failure. As a spectator ‘[y]ou always want more, more, but how far do you go ... before somebody does get hurt’, especially when you ‘really wanted to see it’, that moment just before control is lost (Blau 2008/2001: 537). When watching someone performing at the limits of their ability, one simultaneously wants to see them both succeed and fail. This is not a vicarious thrill where spectators imagine they are the actor, but a thrill, even a ‘malicious glee’ (Clark 1987: 295) that seems to only be available to spectators by virtue of being spectators: ‘Tis pleasant’, even exciting, to view human beings at their extremity (Joanna Baillie Plays on the Passions 1798, cited in Murray 2004: 1043; Lucretius, cited in Voltaire 1901/1751):

³⁰ Emphasis added.

Look at a man in the midst of doubt and danger, and you will learn in his hour of adversity what he really is. It is then that the true utterances are wrung from the recesses of his breast. The mask is torn off (Lucretius De Rerum Natura III in Vickers 1971: 204).

Tied to politics, as it is in Green’s ocular democracy, such spectatorship is unlikely to be pleasurable for those ‘in the arena’.

Schiller, Scheler and Brecht believed that distance was required for sympathy; Lord Kames thought distance had to be overcome in order to enable sympathy; Burke, Rousseau, Lamb and Carlyle thought distance prevented or disabled sympathy. Freud believed that empathy collapsed distance thereby enabling sympathy, whereas Brecht and Scheler believed that when empathy disabled distance it prevented sympathy. Blau's 'eye of prey' indicates that even were these differences over sympathy to be resolved, sympathy would still not resolve the problems of distance because psychological distance provides pleasures that ensure that it will remain a strategy to 'transform the emotions, making pain a source of pleasure and rendering ethical feelings a matter of aesthetic enjoyment' thereby providing 'immunity' from obligation (Augustine 1961/397: 3, 2-4). This would continue to leave the beheld vulnerable to the 'willing and trafficking' of the beholder. The problem of coming to terms with distant spectatorship remains.

³¹ Clark believes that sympathy is preceded by empathy, which she sees as ‘role-taking’, after Mead (1934) – it is empathy which stimulates sympathy.

³² The recent appearance of Münchhausen By Internet (MBI) syndrome where internet support group users fake illness in order to elicit sympathy indicates that the abuse of their sympathy can produce a great deal of anger in sympathisers as well as shame for being taken in (Kleeman 2011).

Chapter 9: Towards an Ethics for Political Spectatorship

Constant observation of oneself is tortuous, and one fears to be caught out of one's usual role. Nor can we ever relax, when we think we're being assessed every time we're looked at; ... many chance occurrences can bare us against our will and ... even granted that all this effort over oneself is successful, it's not a pleasant life, nor one free from anxiety (Seneca Tranquillity of Mind 63CE).

Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments was written as a corrective to Mandeville's The Fable of the Bees, which claimed that duplicity was functional in a society (Hundert 1994: 173).¹ Smith endorsed Mandeville's theatrical idea of society functioning more or less in spite of the efforts of individuals, but the idea that a society could function equally well whether or not people were moral seemed not only distasteful but ultimately incoherent. Some level of social cohesion was necessary or people would not be able to interact with others in the way necessary to the invisible hand of economics. Sympathy was not only the mechanism whereby this interaction became possible, because sympathy was centred in the desire for approval, it tended to encourage human striving:

From whence, then, arise that emulation which runs through all the different ranks of men, and what are the advantages [of] bettering our condition? To be observed, to be attended to, to be taken notice of with sympathy, complacency, and approbation (Smith 2002/1790: 44).

This desire to be worthy of watching brought actors to modify their behaviour since 'nothing is so mortifying as to be obliged to expose our distress to the view of the public', especially as spectators have 'a streak of malice' that inclines them to see 'little uneasinesses' as diverting (which is why they enjoy teasing and raillery) (Smith 2002/1790: 37-44). To be an actor in the public arena therefore takes courage (Arendt 1958: 186-7; Mount 1972). Sympathy should be sufficient to recognize this but sympathy is selective – there are some passions into which spectators will not willingly enter even for a moment (Smith 2002/1790: 37-44) and others that they can choose to ignore. This leaves actors vulnerable to the spectator's whims. This is especially problematic in politics, which relies on political actors to do the often unsavoury balancing work necessary for a viable collective life (Mount 1972: 123-4). Political actors must operate 'in full and constant view of their clients', risking their failures being highlighted while their successes go unacknowledged (Mount 1972: 124).

¹ Fielding also objected to Mandeville's book, declaring he had 'A BAD MIND' (Fielding 1962/1749: 203). He wrote Tom Jones as a response to The Fable. His characters Thwackum and Square represent Mandeville's views. He also summarised The Fable in Joseph Andrews (Hundert 1994: 156)

Two ethics designed to recognize the courage required for acting and even out the power imbalances between actors and spectators have recently been proposed for theatre: Woodruff's ethics of care and Quinn's principle of charity. A third, Gold's covenantal ethics, has been proposed for visual sociology in an effort to come to terms with appropriation. Can they provide an adequate approach to an ethical spectatorship for politics that can overcome the power offered by distance?

Woodruff's Ethics of Care

Woodruff argues that since the onus of judgment falls on spectators, spectators need to learn to 'respond virtuously to whatever it is they watch' (Woodruff 2008: 204) and be 'on the lookout for human agency' (Woodruff 2008: 70). They can learn how to do this through watching theatre because theatre operates on a principle of human agency: 'actors' (characters) are assumed to have chosen their actions, and therefore invited the judgments that fall on them. Because of this, theatre spectators can learn to distinguish ways by which actions outside theatre should be judged since, through theatre, good watchers learn 'the difference between good and evil ... and the merely obnoxious' (Woodruff 2008: 192).

Good watching outside theatre entails ‘paying attention to’ others. Like Smith, Woodruff sees this as a means of building social cohesion. Since all humans need the attention of others to thrive, paying attention to them is a way of caring for them: ‘[l]earning to pay attention to others is basic to living ethically ... A good watcher knows how to care’ (Woodruff 2010: 142-3). Good watchers care when they exhibit four ‘virtues’ in relation to actors and their actions: reverence, compassion, courage and justice. Through reverence they offer respect to actors because of the effort involved in action. They extend compassion to actors for the predicaments they get into and they appreciate the courage it takes to act. They are also prepared to be courageous both in resisting the urge to rush in and take over and in ensuring actions serve the interests of justice, for good watching also entails knowing when to act and when not to, including when to respond with laughter. These are virtues on which everyday actors should be able to rely and therefore have the courage not just to act but to act in ways worth watching (Woodruff 2008: 72).

However the only tool for learning these virtues that is offered by Woodruff is frequent preferably informed attendance at ‘good’ theatre. Good watching thus seems to carry many of the same tutelary demands political participation theorists want to place on citizens: that they be informed and thoughtful about politics, and ‘participate’ along conventional lines, and to learn this through political participation. This is supposed to hold actors accountable for what they do while at the same time assuring them of some appreciation for their efforts. However, the specification of characters rather than actual actors as the agents through which the ethics of care is rehearsed in Woodruff’s account lets practitioners (real life actors and dramatists) off the hook even as the ethics of care places the burden for poor results onto spectators. We are to extend the ethics of care to the personas created by political actors rather than to the actors themselves, yet personas, like characters, are fully determined by others.

Cavell suggests that good watching requires spectators to do more than pay attention to characters or personas. They must acknowledge actual actors. They do this by revealing themselves, thereby allowing themselves to be seen in the actor’s presence. This is what spectators do when they applaud actors at the end of a performance: they show themselves to be present as spectators. But far from theatre teaching spectators how to acknowledge others, it actually relieves them of the obligation they owe to others since spectators can never be in the presence of a character (Cavell 2003/1987: 103; Natanson 1976/1966). This is precisely the problem with the theatre metaphor: '[w]hen we keep ourselves in the dark, the consequence is that we convert the other into a character and make the world a stage for him. There is fictional existence with a vengeance', which theatre is meant to 'make ... plain' (Cavell 2003/1987: 104). Theatre allows spectators to experience another's pain 'which [they] are not called upon to relieve' (Augustine 1961/397: 3.2). Theatre cannot teach good watching because 'in theatre something is omitted which must be made good outside' (Cavell 2003/1987: 105).²

Good watching in political life would require political spectators to reveal themselves as spectators to political actors.³ Arguably this is what demonstrators do when they appear outside the parliament. They don't demand 'to take back the decision-making power or reaffirm direct government by the people' (Urbinati 2005: 198): they show themselves to have been watching what political actors have been doing, they reveal themselves as having taken a position towards those activities and they place themselves in the presence of those actors. Demonstrators under Cavell's conception of good watching are then exemplary spectators. So too is Boltanski's committed spectator of distant suffering who 'renders himself present' in the public sphere in order to generate sufficient public opinion to force his government to address the suffering on his behalf (Boltanski 1999: 29-31). Visibility is the key to good watching, but not just the visibility of actors. Spectators must be visible too.

The appropriate response according to these principles of good watching is then for the political actors who are watching these spectators to acknowledge them in turn. However, since it is often in the interests of powerful political spectators to remain hidden or to refuse to acknowledge what they can see neither

² Original emphasis.

³ This is precisely what Addison refused to do as The Spectator for his magazines The Spectator and The Rambler. He kept his identity secret because he wanted to avoid 'being stared at' (Addison, The Spectator No 1, 1:3-5 cited in Marshall 1986: 10).

Woodruff's nor Cavell's principles are likely to solve the problem of power in relation to spectatorship, although at least spectatorship is recognized as something that entails obligation.

Quinn's Principle of Charity

The principle of charity is an element of what Quinn calls theatricality, which he defines as 'the shared consciousness of performance' (Quinn 2006: 312). This shared consciousness comes about when actors signal to spectators that they are engaged in a performance and spectators, under the principle of charity, agree to recognize what the performer does as a performance, at least for the moment. When both actors and spectators agree that what is occurring is a performance, theatricality comes into operation and with it come the everyday conventions of communication that operate on the assumption of truth-telling. This does not mean that spectators simply believe what is being communicated. Rather, they assume that what actors are showing or communicating is what they wish to communicate, and pay attention to that rather than looking for what isn't said. The principle of charity thus incorporates two aspects: recognition and 'interpretive charity'. What the principle allows is successful communication, which Quinn says is overlooked in the focus on unsuccessful communication since deconstruction came into vogue:

Successful communication has not been a popular topic in the age of deconstruction, which is predicated on an argument about the failure of representations to be the things they represent [but] at some level of understanding deconstruction [itself] communicates to people in a convincing way [because] its arguments about the impossibility of representing truth have themselves been accepted as true (Quinn 2006: 306-7).

The key to successful communication lies in recognition and the key to recognition is the principle of charity: in recognizing an action as a performance, spectators assume it is intended to communicate something and try to interpret it as if that something was meaningful. This presumption works against the almost knee-jerk response under the theatre metaphor that all political actors are engaged in trying to delude the public. It is also what saves Quinn's theatricality from the aestheticisation of performance. The principle of charity prevents both spectators and actors from shedding responsibility for the wider implications of a performance by reducing it to an aesthetic object and attributing any affective response to it rather than the spectator. As an extension of everyday communication principles the principle of charity also carries with it one of the fundamental 'rules' of interaction, that of turn-taking. It therefore leaves open the possibility that having agreed to pay attention for a while, spectators may then choose to signal that they wish to perform and require attention, as in Arendt's conception of politics. Quinn's principle of charity thus seems to meet Cavell's requirement of acknowledgement through revelation as well as allowing for the possibility that spectators might also want to become the person 'in the arena'.

Although beyond Quinn's concerns, the pact that invokes this understanding of theatricality avoids the extremes of both participatory theatre and the invocation of the theatre metaphor because not all actions are to be recognized as performances, let alone performances that are intended to communicate. This removes the burden of being 'bared' against one's will and grinded for sincerity simply because of visibility or even the desire to exert some care over oneself. To 'put on a sprightly appearance' may just be a way of encouraging oneself to go on rather than an attempt to go on stage (Deutscher 1983: 138) and ought not to be judged as a performance. Quinn's theatricality thus also removes the demand that spectators respond to every action they see as if it was performed for them. Both these conditions can produce actual failures of communication because they encourage evasion and distrust when the willing suspension of disbelief is displaced. Finally, the requirement that performers signal their intentions avoids placing spectators in positions where they are somehow required to respond appropriately precisely when the conventions that would normally guide and perhaps discipline them have been overthrown. Not all forms of discipline are negative or oppressive – some originate in concerns for well-being. Although it can remain a 'fetish of the avant-garde' to be wilfully transgressive and 'destructive of all human values' (Erickson 1990: 233), and it may well be fun for artists to generate ‘invisible theatre’ in the streets in order to put spectators on the spot, if they want spectators to pay attention to what they have to show and say as a performance rather than to their mere presence, they have at least to signal that they are engaged in a performance.⁴ There is thus a courtesy extended on both sides that relieves spectators of the obligation to pay attention, with all the dilemmas that this might present, and allows actors to engage in some activities without having to concern themselves about the impression they are making. It was just this kind of courtesy that allowed John Howard when Prime Minister to attend his son’s soccer matches as just any other parent. While there is no doubt that both sides could abuse this courtesy, under a principle of charity this would not be the automatic presumption and such abuse when detected would itself be the basis of judgment. Circumstances might warrant the breaking of such conventions.

Quinn’s principle of charity lays the ground for Arendt’s account of political action because it sets up the conditions by which spaces of appearance can arise without limiting who actors can be. There are, at all times and in all levels of society, ‘entrepreneurs of problem-making’ (Glazer 1994) whose job it is to raise issues to the level of problems requiring attention. As actors in the public realm they are responsible for signalling that they want attention not for themselves but for the problems they wish to highlight. In this sense they promise something worth watching. In responding to the signal, spectators can agree to open up a space of appearance in which this can happen and in doing so agree to pay attention to what is shown rather than to the person of the actor. Spectators can of course refuse to allow a space of appearance, but this would be to void the principle of charity. They must at least agree to consider the performance. Both sides thus fulfil the demand for sufficient distance for this ‘third thing’ that Mori defines as ‘Drama’ and Xenos (2001), Rancière, Arendt and Wolin call ‘politics’ to appear. This can occur in formal settings as well as spontaneous ones although performances that occur in recognized spaces relieve some of the burden of signalling from the actors and recognition and interpretation from spectators. However, while spectators agree to pay attention, they are not obliged to continue to pay attention if they don't think the 'show' warrants it. The principle of charity need only be extended where sharing rather than 'blatant provocation' or artistic narcissism is the aim (Erickson 1990: 233).

⁴ Invisible theatre was initially associated with Boal. It consists of ‘the presentation of a scene in an environment other than the theatre, before people who are not spectators’ but are ‘there by chance’ and who ‘must not have the slightest idea that it is a ‘spectacle’, for this would make them ‘spectators’” (Boal 1998: 256). It ‘erupts in a location chosen as a place where the public congregates’ so that, theoretically at least, all those nearby become ‘involved in the eruption’. This is supposed to ensure that the effects of the performance linger on after the skit has ended. However, it is based on deception and imposition which not only makes its outcomes unpredictable but unsuitable for a long-term cooperation with a community (Lorek-Jezinska 2002).

Once again, a focus on personality would be out of place here, as would, arguably, be 'attack' politics that oppose any political communication on principle. The freedom to close down a space of appearance requires spectators to exercise judgment, though, for although in the end it may be spectators not actors who are in the best position to decide the value of a performance simply because they are able to see more clearly, they are required by the principle of charity to be accountable to actors for doing so. They do this on the basis of 'interpretive charity' and persuasion: having judged shortcomings and errors on the basis of what actors have promised, they must try to persuade actors to their point of view (Arendt 1982: 71). Where errors have arisen because actors are unable to foresee the consequences of their actions, spectators can extend forgiveness and may be prepared to let actors try again. Thus what is shown is treated with a temporary respect akin to the willing suspension of disbelief that is offered actors in the theatre and that is generally extended to those we converse with, thereby allowing them to unfold what it is they have to present without fear of premature judgment or over-reaction. Time is thus also extended as well as space. Actors need to be able to trust that the world is a place 'fit for ... appearance' (Arendt 1958: 204) and spectators assure them of this by revealing themselves (Cavell 2003/1987: 103). However, there is no obligation on spectators to put up with a politics that they see as destructive, negative, counterproductive or just plain boring. Indeed to do so would be 'to continue ... sponsorship of evil in the world' (Cavell 2003/1987: 110).

The kind of judgment Arendt envisages for spectators is non-specialised. It is exercised 'freely' by anyone 'who knows how to choose his company among men, among things, among thoughts', that is, anyone who is capable of exercising discrimination in relation to the things they care about. All humans engage in this kind of judgment: '[t]he fact that humans are able to communicate linguistically with one another provides ... the clearest and most certain evidence that reliable and accurate judgment is possible' for without judgment, it would be impossible to distinguish the meaning of what is being said (Steinberger 1993: 157). It is through judgment that humans come to make choices about how best to act or not act or forestall action for the time being and adopt a 'wait and see' attitude. Judgment is not about 'truth' but about knowing 'how to take care and preserve and admire the things of the world' (Arendt: 225-6), including other people. It thus partakes of Woodruff's ethics of care.

However Goffman's work indicates that spectators generally exercise judgments regarding 'the clash between appearance and reception' (Bickford 1997: 90) through 'disattention' (Klapp 1990: 630), tact towards actors (Goffman 1959: 137) or 'systematic impoliteness' (Goffman 1983: 13) rather than discrimination, and more often 'on the run' rather than through reflection (Deutscher 2007: 134). They ignore actors rather than account to them for their decision to cease paying attention. Both Arendt and Cavell would see this as a dereliction of duty in relation to politics because spectators may need to reject the work of actors in the name of justice or freedom, or simply a more positive and inclusive political vision. Life under scrutiny may be more bearable if it is accepted that 'the honest and just bounds of observation by one person upon another, extend no farther but to understand him sufficiently, whereby not to give him offence' but not at the expense of failing 'to give him faithful counsel, or whereby to stand upon reasonable guard and caution in respect of a man's self' (Bacon 1866/1605: 20). An ethics of spectatorship must extend further than just allowing spectators judgment if all that judgment offers is disattention and tact. This is to 'exit running' (Cavell 2003: 110).

In any case, although judgment has always been considered something that theatre spectators do, theatre theory reveals a long history of concern about the capacity of spectators to exercise it reasonably. In general, theorists and practitioners reflect a jaundiced view of ordinary spectator judgment, which could be as 'brutal as the death sentence' (Zola 2000/1873: 354). Practitioners generally '[m]ourns a thin Pit, yet dreads it when 'tis full' (Trapp, Prologue, Abra Mule (1704) cited in Scouten 1962: clviii). Plato specifically condemned judgment by clamour. It simply encouraged both practitioners and spectators to break the rules. Few theorists and practitioners stand up for the ability of ordinary spectators to judge appropriately, although they rarely go as far as Yeats in coming onstage and bellowing that they had ‘disgraced’ themselves ‘again’ (cited in Kershaw 2001: 138). Much like political theorists, most see judgment as one of the things spectators must be taught. It is ‘always a question of showing the spectator what she does not know how to see’ (Ranciere 2009/2008: 29-30).

Both Arendt and Rancière do however provide two quite similar criteria by which political action should be judged, and there seems to be no reason why ‘ordinary’ spectators could not apply them since they are centrally involved in enjoying the conditions that enable political life. For Arendt, any political action should be judged according to the degree that the freedom for future action is opened up or shut down (Heather and Stolz 1979: 16). The kind of bureaucratic actions engaged in by the Nazis clearly fail this test since they were aimed at depriving substantial numbers of people of this freedom, but so would the responses that declared that demonstrators against Australia’s involvement in the Iraq War were supporting Saddam Hussein and his regime by their protests (Riley 2003). These too were aimed at limiting freedom – the freedom of those opposed to the war from having their dissent recognized as a legitimate political response to their government’s policy.⁵

For Rancière, it is a necessary condition of a democratic system that a space of appearance can be grasped and utilised by anyone who lives within that system. Democracy in a sense guarantees that such a space should be equally available to all. Access to it is therefore a measure of the promise of equality to which a democratic system claims to be committed. More than that, however, the criterion for judging what appears in the space is the degree to which what appears draws attention to areas in which the state contravenes its own principles and declarations – for example by violating a convention to which it is a signatory or upholding a law discriminately. The eruption of refugee protests in a state such as Australia can therefore be judged on the basis of Australia’s signature to the

⁵ The Howard government utilised talk-back radio in particular to peddle this line.

United Nations conventions on refugees. Similarly, protests over the intervention into indigenous Australian lives could be judged on the basis of the specific waiving of anti-discrimination legislation that is simultaneously upheld for non-indigenous members of the population.⁶

Gold's Covenantal Ethics

[I]t is difficult to articulate the harm entailed by surveillance
(Kohn 2010: 572).

Woodruff and Quinn require spectators to show care in relation to the efforts of actors, and Arendt and Rancière provide principles by which spectators can judge performances, but what can be required of spectators in relation to those they behold when appropriation rather than performance is the basis of their observation, that is when spectators rather than those under observation, as an act of power, designate that the beheld are performing? Anthropology, which is dedicated to the comparative observation and study of human activity carried out by groups it designates as 'other', has struggled to come to terms with appropriation. The problem afflicts all anthropological activity but is particularly acute in relation to visual ethnography where observers take photographs of indigenous people and then weave these images into stories of the observer's own making as data to support their findings. Photography can be one of 'the most aggressive and threatening of data-gathering techniques' (Gold 1989: 100) particularly because the belief that photographs 'are objective and truthful records' remains widespread (Sturken and Cartwright 2003: 17).

Anthropologists and sociologists who are engaged in similar work have responded to the problem of appropriation in a number of different ways. Some have attempted to deflect their own spectatorship by studying pre-existing photographs. This merely relieves the researcher of the responsibility for having procured the images. Others have engaged in a search for social theory that would support and justify the continued taking of photographs. This has occurred particularly in relation to the recording of poor social conditions. The appropriation of visual glimpses of people in these circumstances can supposedly be justified on the basis that the photographer/researcher 'should expose social problems in order to educate the public, in order to change society' (Harper 1998: 28). Like 'fledgling Marxists' who justify their intervention in the lives of the proletariat on the basis of arming them for struggle (Rancière 2009/2008: 18), researchers here try to justify their appropriation by recasting it as a form of political action performed on behalf of the appropriated. However, to achieve this end, the images produced must be harrowing for those they are intended to affect and who generally are outside the group portrayed. This tends to reduce the group to their 'unacceptable' conditions, stereotyping them in harmful ways. Images of indigenous youths engaged in petrol-sniffing in Australia have worked in just this way. Still other researchers have tried to embed themselves into the communities they wished to study so that they become 'participant-observers'. As such they may well offer some compensatory benefits to the group: access to the wider world; a way of seeing themselves; an opening up of embedded and perhaps stultified customs and habits etcetera (Simmel 1971/1908). However, none of these tactics adequately address the problem of appropriation, which can occur outside any interaction or opportunity for negotiation with the beheld.

⁶ Note that Rancière does not restrict such considerations to citizens. Any member of the population of a democratic state should have the ability to challenge the way the commitments of the state are practiced, particularly when those practices may intend to prevent them from being counted amongst the people for whom the state cares.

Contemporary anthropological research now generally entails the consent of the group to be studied. Gold argues, however, that visual ethnography requires more than just consent. What is required is some promise by observers about what is to be done with what can only ever be a partial account of the lives of the beheld but which will be made to serve the interests of the observer. He proposes a covenantal ethics (Gold 1989: 107). A covenant is a promise made with a largely unknown other subject who has the capacity to harm (in the past generally a God). It is different to a contractual agreement because it recognizes that not only is the subject always more than can be observed, but that they have within their power the ability to thwart what can be seen. A covenantal ethics thus reverses the long-standing relationship in anthropology in which the visiting observer holds the position of power. It also reverses the relationship to promising proposed by Arendt. It recognizes from the beginning that observers can never know all that there is to know (Fairchild, Bayer, and Colgrove 2007; Gilliam 2005) and that the only way they can be sure that their observations will not provide false information is to make a promise regarding the way their appropriations will be used. In return the subjects of observation agree, as an act of ‘grace’(Maston 1967: 17), to allow themselves to be glimpsed. A covenantal ethic thus recognizes both the partiality inherent in any observation and the limits of spectatorship (Gold 1989: 104-5) as well as meets Cavell’s demand that spectatorship reveal itself to those observed: ‘there must be in any ‘encounter’ the recognition that we are all looking at each other’ (Pagden 2000: xxxiv).

Gold lists a number of ‘techniques’ that might be used under this ethic. They reveal appropriation as a technical as well as moral issue, one that requires skill and inventiveness to negotiate (Rancière 2009/2008: 83-105). Gold’s techniques provide a significant challenge to those who would use the theatre metaphor as a means of acquiring ‘knowledge’ about those they observe. They include:

- collection manners that do not alienate subjects;
- attention to subject reactions during the process;
- guarding against the imposition of obligation on the subject;
- requests for feedback, especially in relation to the selection of images to be used;
- contextualising images to avoid stereotyping;
- taking special care when dealing with vulnerable groups with limited self-determination;
- encouraging subjects to use the technology themselves to benefit themselves and their communities.

‘At the heart of a covenant is an exchange of promises, an agreement that shapes the future between the two parties [that] emphasizes gratitude, fidelity, even devotion, and care’ to the more vulnerable party (May 1980: 367).

Film-makers Aldenhoven and Carruthers, as well as many users of the theatre metaphor and performance auditors in public policy accountability practices, clearly fail this test of ethical spectatorship. Their 'that's how it is' position, which Boltanski specifically ties to so-called 'factual descriptions' in which 'mastery is distributed entirely on the side of the subject who is describing' (Boltanski 1999: 23-4, 33) is untenable under this ethic.⁷ It is also likely that the call to utilise empathy more in anthropology, as argued by Hollan and Throop (2008), would fail this test as well, particularly as it is not clear whether empathy does provide a mechanism for understanding the other, or simply a mechanism for understanding the self in relation to the other. Empathy that ignores the desires of the beheld or simply assumes that these can be known through a one-sided, unequal or discontinuous relationship remains appropriative. Empathy 'requires ongoing dialogue for its accuracy' for only the beheld can say that the spectator has achieved 'a first-person-like understanding' of their experience, and this can only happen if they are 'willing and able to be understood' (Hollan 2008: 476, 480-4). Beholders 'should assume neither that they are mind-readers nor that their experience of understanding the [other] will be matched by the [other] feeling understood' (Elliott et al. 2011: 48).

In the end Gold believes that nothing can guarantee appropriate appropriation: 'no code, outlook, or technique insures that all ethical problems will be resolved'. The very idea of a 'technique' works against it because to think of spectatorship in terms of technique is itself to keep something back from those under scrutiny. Gold tries to overcome this with one final 'technique': the readiness to 'alter or abandon the use of visual methods if [observers] have good reason to believe subjects are being adversely affected' (Gold 1989: 107). This is what Agee and Evans chose to do when it became apparent that the task they had been given to 'document' a celebratory 1940s America was in fact a request to overlook the deep disparities between what America promised all its people and what it actually delivered to many of them. They altered the task they had been set to one in which an ethical relationship with those they photographed was woven into their work, and signalled their position in relation to their task by using the ironic title Let Us Now Praise Famous Men for their subsequent publication (Agee and Evans 1960/1941).⁸ However, even this technique cannot prevent appropriation because the onus for ‘good reason’ appears to stay with the observer, and the theatre metaphor indicates that observers ought not to be trusted with this responsibility. Unless the glance is mutual, each remains concealed from the other (Simmel 1969/1908: 359) and all one is left with is ‘the continual disappearing act of the subject’ on both sides of the ontological divide (Kershaw 2003: 611).

⁷ Original emphasis.

Nevertheless, a covenantal ethics at least recognizes that a spectatorship that appropriates others as ‘objects’ never really achieves the knowledge that it seeks because these ‘objects’ are themselves subjects who have the capacity to deflect and thereby thwart spectators. It recognizes, for instance, that ‘most ... do not want or need to be understood by outsiders; ... do not want to be key informants for [outsiders]; ... do not want their voice amplified by others; and ... do not think of themselves as in need of cultural advocacy by outsiders’ (Valentine 2002: 281). It thus addresses the imbalance between spectators and the beheld not by insisting that spectators become actors or by relegating spectators to the sidelines, but by drawing attention to the limits of spectatorship even as it acknowledges spectatorship as an inevitable activity, a result of living in a world of appearance. It insists that ‘whatever it is we see, there is more than meets the eye’ (Blau 1990: 223) and that to try and ‘catch sight suddenly of a landscape or a human being as they exist when we are absent ... is an impossible dream’ although ‘we have all cherished’ it (de Beauvoir 1965: 5). Perhaps the best that an ethical spectator can do is to subject what they think they know of the other to the test of the other’s scrutiny for ‘we stand in need of the other’ (Deutscher in Saunders 2007) to verify what we know. Boltanski suggests a further response in relation to distant suffering: to speak out about what they see and how they feel about it. This takes courage because it makes the spectator’s position vulnerable to challenge, but it also opens up the possibility of gathering sufficient support from like-minded others to effect a change on what they see. Obligation thus does fall on spectators, but not the obligation to turn themselves into ‘actors’. It is inherent in spectatorship itself. A political spectatorship that took this obligation seriously might well overcome the harmful aspects of appropriation as well as help to bridge the ‘moat’ dividing political actors from those who watch them and reduce the disdain that is apparent on both sides.

⁸ Needless to say it was not the best-selling coffee-table pictorial atlas which had been commissioned and it took some time to find a willing publisher.

Chapter 10: Conclusion

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 10.1 Observation (Image from Open Channel <http://www.openchannel.org.au/mom/index.html>)

[A]sking unfamiliar questions of a familiar discourse can open up both new avenues of inquiry and re-open others confined to the ‘dustbin of history’ (Kelly 2006: 53).

The aim of this thesis has been to bring spectatorship into view as a topic of concern for political theory. It has tried to do this by taking the long-standing metaphor politics is theatre seriously, and tracing a somewhat convoluted path through metaphor and theatre theory. In the process it has revealed that the theatre metaphor is overwhelmingly an elite spectator’s metaphor that is used to cast judgment on what this spectator sees. Spectatorship here is a form of power exercised through psychological distance. Furthermore, it can be an appropriative power that retains those it observes as objects for the spectator’s ‘willing and trafficking’ (Heidegger 1978/1947: 223). This alone should make spectatorship of central concern to politics.

These findings also indicate that metaphor analysis should not be relegated to the edges of political theory any more than spectatorship should be. Metaphor analysis can provide a useful way to broach a topic that seems to be unapproachable. It can also provide additional insights about phenomena that are otherwise unavailable. Because metaphors treat phenomena in a relational way, they provide a back-door into a phenomenon through its relationship with its comparison. In this case, although theatre also seems to oscillate between despair over and fear of spectators, it recognizes them as essential to its existence. When politics is considered theatre, the metaphor brings spectatorship into politics. It also directs how this political spectatorship is to be considered: as constitutive of politics, as it is in theatre. Pushing the metaphor in conjunction with theatre theory opens up the possibility of a different kind of politics: a form of representative democracy that incorporates spectatorship in a vital and constitutive way.

However the implications of distance in both metaphor and theatre pose a challenge for democratic theory that is committed to turning spectators into actors. Not only does politics as theatre insist on a gap between spectators and actors, the study of distance indicates that this gap between actors and spectators cannot in any case be overcome by turning spectators into actors. This is firstly because at an ontological level, all humans are spatially separated and are both actors and spectators for each other and secondly because spectators are already active. Distance conventions simply allow sufficient separation between actors and levels of activity to make it seem as if some are acting while others are merely looking on. Spectators are only ever ‘partially and temporarily separated from the playing field’ (Deutscher 2007: 59) and their perceived passivity is only relative.

Here the value of historical analysis is revealed. Attitudes towards spectatorship turn out to be historical in nature rather than a reflection of something eternal and essential in the spectator. The desire to control spectators in the theatre developed from their unrestrained and enthusiastic involvement in what they were seeing. The subsequent desire to awaken them came about largely in response to spectators learning too well the conventions, regulations and pleasures of a certain kind of theatre that restricted their capacity to move but compensated for this by increasing their focus and therefore the intensity of the theatrical experience. Spectators, however, have the capacity to respond differently depending on the conventions, regulations, divisions of spatial arrangements and kinds of theatre cued by performers (Coppieters 1981; Fischer-Lichte 1997). One capacity of spectators that must now be beyond doubt is their willingness and ability to adjust to what is demanded of them, often with great enthusiasm, even glee.

History also indicates, however, that while spectating may be a variable form of activity in its own right, the separation between actors as performers and spectators can never be bridged without loss because they essentially involve two different modes of activity (Arendt 1980/1954: 217). To turn spectators into actors ends the possibility of judgment other than by the standard of utility, while to turn actors into spectators ends the possibility of public action. Paradoxically, turning spectators into actors can also mean the loss of action, because to perform requires a 'space of display' (Arendt 1980/1954: 218). This was made evident in the theatre where efforts to create participatory theatre by enticing spectators to become actors led to the disappearance of theatre into ritual, orgy or therapy (Blau 1989a), but also in revolutionary politics. Both offer a salutary warning to participation enthusiasts in politics who would insist that all be actors. Far from rescuing politics, turning spectators into actors can risk its loss.

In reviewing the literature on the relationship between mediated politics and citizenship, Graber argues that 'outdated paradigms of citizenship that ignore the information-processing capabilities of human beings' must be abandoned (Graber 2004: 545). Given that the gap between actors and spectators is only one of degree and convention, recognition of spectatorship requires the abandonment of the model of politics that opposes active citizenship to spectatorship. Recognizing citizenship only in terms of apparently active citizens leads to the obscuring, and sometimes the outright denial, of spectatorship. Under that paradigm it is impossible to see how the 'information-processing capabilities' of everyday spectators can contribute to a better appreciation of political action. It is also impossible to see how the same capabilities in the hands of powerful but hidden spectators damages citizen/actors by turning them into actor/objects. Consumer activists seem to be way ahead of theorists in perceiving how the soft surveillance involving volunteered information, automated recognition systems and the design of public spaces, for instance, works to harm the beheld by reinforcing and reproducing social divisions and disadvantage (Lyon 2007: 116). Lyon suggests theorists themselves need to develop ‘a kind of ‘counter-surveillance imagination’ in order to be able to conceptualise the new kinds of politics that surveillance now requires (Lyon 2007: 116). Part of this shift would require a consideration of how political activity entails spectatorship both as tool and target.

There are three points where spectatorship can be most powerful, and therefore of most concern to political theory, while paradoxically seeming most inert:

- in the refusal to grant recognition and therefore visibility;
- in the imposition of a certain kind of visibility in order to grant recognition;
- in the instrumental use of what lies within the spectator’s field of vision.

All are forms of despotism (Hundert and Nelles 1989) that can make public life torturous for those affected. Politicians whose careers depend on being visible know the cost of having visibility withdrawn, turned against them or simply not ‘conferred’ (Brighenti 2007: 335). So too do political demonstrators when their actions are recognized only as expressive politics rather than actions that are intended to influence onlookers. These powers of spectatorship are inherently political because: ‘[i]f there is someone you do not wish to recognize as a political being, you begin by not seeing them as the bearers of politicalness’ (Rancière 2001: S23). This means that Boltanski’s solution to morally acceptable distant spectatorship – the demonstration – can easily be thwarted by other, more powerful spectators who simply refuse to see ‘politicalness’. This was the fate of Merlin Luck when he used his eviction from Big Brother in order to make his position on Australia’s treatment of refugees visible: Clegg (2005a) focused on how he got into the show; Senator Vanstone ‘questioned his facts and his right to enter into the debate’; the show’s host ‘was outraged because he deviated from the scripted questions and the show’s running order’ (Kenny 2004:

11) and the ‘Newsmakers 2004’ feature in The Bulletin (14th December) focused on his ‘spelling mistake’ (The Bulletin 2004).¹

Image has been removed as it contains copyright material.

Figure 10.2 Merlin Luck using his eviction from Big Brother to make himself ‘present’ as a political spectator with regard to Australia’s treatment of refugees; image by Channel 10 (Clegg 2005a)

Opening up politics to a full recognition of spectatorship and the implications of both physical and psychological distance need not be seen as a limitation on politics. Rather it would help to make sense of some of the anomalies and failures of politics and explain the catastrophic consequences of attempting to close the gap between represented and representative in the name of transparency. The problem of trying to see would also come into view as a problem for accountability. It is possible, as those searching for deception during the French Revolution or for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq between 2001 and 2003 discovered too late, that what one is assiduously seeking may not exist if it cannot be seen. Of course, if people cannot scrutinize things they cannot see, the obvious thing to do if one doesn’t want something scrutinized is to hide it, but both the French Revolution and the search for weapons of mass destruction provide easy illustrations of how searchers can convince themselves of the existence of something simply because they want to or fear seeing it. Accountability, democratic or otherwise, requires seeing and visibility but it also requires a readiness to believe what one actually sees.² A reasonable confidence in spectatorship's on-going ability to provide adequate answers for most human needs would provide at least some safe-guard against phantoms and moral panics instigated by inappropriate predictive analogies. While there is no doubt that humans can be mistaken about what they see, particularly under traumatic circumstances (Lithwick 2009: 17), the long-standing prejudice in Western theory and philosophy against looking at what is before one's eyes in order to search for whatever lies behind it in the belief that 'ordinary judgments are always mistaken' (Warnock 1967: 4) is a prejudice that favours 'experts' to correct these judgments. Elite users of the theatre metaphor perpetuate this prejudice by relegating the beheld to objects, thus removing the possibility of being refuted.

¹ The ‘E’ actually fell off Luck’s sign as he pulled it out from under his t-shirt.

This is not to say that all forms of spectatorship will be of a similar quality any more than all forms of action are equal in their efficacy, quality or value, but who decides these value issues is a question that should be worked out between spectators and the observed. The questions Philp (2009) raises regarding accountability – what does it mean for A to be accountable? how are they to be accountable? to whom? and for what? – are thus good starting points for questions relating to spectatorship of all kinds:

1. what does it mean for a person to be observed?
2. how is a person to be observed?
3. for whom are they to be observed and on what grounds?
4. who is to be observed?
5. what aspect of the person is to be the subject of the observation?

Each of these questions has a corollary:

1. who decides what the normative implications of observation entail?
2. who decides how a person is to be observed and by whom or what?

² What was clearly to be seen in Iraq was that there were no weapons of mass destruction to be seen.

3. to whom is the result of this observation to be given?
4. who decides who is to be observed and why?
5. who decides the limits of this observation and how is it to be related to the person?

Addressing these questions would go some way towards meeting Gold's covenantal principles:

1. collection manners that do not alienate subjects;
2. attention to subject reactions during the process;
3. guarding against the imposition of obligation on the subject;
4. requests for feedback;
5. contextualising to avoid stereotyping;
6. taking special care when dealing with vulnerable groups with limited self-determination;
7. encouraging subjects to use the processes themselves for their own benefit;
8. withdrawal where domination occurs (Gold 1989).

Surveillance, performance auditing, accountability and transparency should all involve these kinds of questions and conditions but, without a full recognition of spectatorship, none of them can even begin to be addressed meaningfully let alone be held to an ethical form of spectatorship. This is to allow powerful spectators to continue their activities unaccountably.

Further, a democratic political system that utilises powerful and appropriative forms of spectatorship even as it chastises citizens for being spectators rather than actors is actually disempowering citizens. The increasing use of visual media makes spectatorship more and more a key part of political participation whether or not political theory takes spectatorship seriously. New forms of visual media are becoming tools of spectator/activists often long before politicians or theorists get the hang of them. 'Citizen reporters' are already providing the world with photographs of political events as they unfold (Cha 2005) and engaging in their own surveillance. Politically committed individuals have become adept at using media opportunities to press their political claims or to engage in ‘culture jamming’ (Clegg 2005b: 10; Sharkey 1993).³ Television has also widened the range of issues that can be considered valid subjects of interest and concern. Not only does political interest no longer end ‘at the water’s edge’ (Aldrich et al. 2006: 477; Arvanitakis and Marren 2009; Sharkey 1993) even though much of the participation literature does (Pritchard 2007b), distant spectatorship is an increasing feature of a political life:

To the extent that today’s citizens are ... ensconced in a world comprised of television’s split screens, zoom lens and instant replay and the computer terminal’s graphics, spread sheets, databases and search and revise routines, it is difficult to imagine that the capacities that they bring to politics remain unaffected (Rosenau 1995: 26).⁴

To not recognize the spectatorship involved in these activities under a discourse of participation, particularly where this discourse is tied to electoral politics, is to reduce those engaged in them to unvisibility while leaving politics open to surprises.

Bringing spectatorship into focus in political theory will allow distance to be considered as a form of power. Distance between spectators and actors needs to be managed because it has social and moral as well as political significance. Too small a gap leads to a loss of perspective and the likelihood of injury. Spectators and actors can be ‘like soldiers fighting in a narrow valley: they see nothing but what is close around them, and that imperfectly, as everything is in motion' (Trollope La Vendée 1850 in von Rosador 1988: 14). The right distance can allow spectators to 'see what an action really is' because they can see it 'contextualised, embedded in the story of which it is an essential part' (Rorty 1992: 7) while leaving actors to work unhindered. They can also see abuses of power and call them to account without becoming implicated in them (Grant and Keohane 2005: 32). On the other hand, too great a gap can lead to the fragmentation of the space of appearance, the possibility of 'observations made in cold blood' (Kariel 1970: 1093) and the unbridgeable 'moat' of suspicion and defence that is currently all too apparent on both sides (Allen and Birch 2011) in many modern liberal democratic states.

³ ‘Culture jamming’ uses elements of popular culture for political protest, as Luck attempted to use Big Brother. It originated in efforts by New York guerrilla artist Rodriguez de Gerada to modify existing bill-board advertising in order to parody them or ‘talk back’ to them to make a political comment, creating ‘a climate of semiotic Robin Hoodism’ (Klein 2000: 279-80).

⁴ Based on UNESCO statistical reports, Rosenau produces tables that indicate the phenomenal growth in access to television receivers throughout the world. Between 1965-1985, developing countries’ access to such technology increased from 11 million to 130 million; the number of radio receivers increased from 75 million to 517 million in the same period (1995:21;24). Education underwent ‘phenomenal growth’ since 1945 in all parts of the world and at all levels (1995:27). Rosenau is positive about this development, but not all theorists are (Street 2004).

While some distance is unavoidable simply because humans exist in a 'realm of appearance', the fact is that scrutiny of others, for whatever reason, can be rewarding and even pleasurable for the observer irrespective of the situation of the observed or the 'truth' of what they think they see. Although spectators may offer sympathy, there is no guarantee they will do so. They may instead appropriate what they observe for whatever purpose suits them, including disdain (Balme 2005; Fortier 2002: 3-4). They may also transfer their own sentiments onto 'the biological innards' of the observed (Goffman 1974: 547) thereby deflecting accountability and agency for those sentiments away from themselves (Arendt 1958: 227). This makes actors doubly vulnerable, firstly by the sheer fact of visibility as objects, and secondly through the attribution of motives and feelings that they may not have but cannot, and perhaps must not refute (Gilliam 2005: 82). The actor 'must be thinking all the while of his appearance because he knows that all the while the spectators are judging of it' (Lamb 2000/1811).

Objectification is an inevitable effect of vision at a distance but to insist that those living entities that one sees remain objects, even in the name of science, is not so-called objectivity but an exercise of power against the beheld, particularly when this insistence is geared towards the appropriation of them for the spectator's purposes. This power is evident in the difficulties some people have in over-riding data images of themselves held by influential institutions and organizations, particularly when those organizations come to define what that data means (Andersson and Heywood 2009). Distance is the fundamental condition for the operation of this power for it is distance that allows spectators to ignore the ways in which the observed are always more than can be appropriated. In the end it is not objectivity that is generated by this kind of spectatorship but error because ‘[c]onditions which interfere with the interchange of subject and object ... diminish the objectivity of the subject’ rather than enhance it when the object is not permitted to correct the perceptions of the observer (Deutscher 1983: 136).

Spectatorship is of crucial concern to politics because of the way it is implicated with power. Political theory needs to address the gap between spectators and actors because of these implications, for ordinary spectators are vulnerable to powerful spectators who have an interest in turning them into actors. Although history shows that this is likely to be a counterproductive exercise, participation-speak serves to render these powerful spectators invisible. Recognizing rather than discounting spectatorship will allow political theory to come to terms with ordinary spectators in ways that are constructive rather than punitive, and with all spectators in ways that are tuned to ‘care for the world’ – the common ground spectators and actors share. To this end:

We do not have to transform spectators into actors ...

We have to recognize ... the activity peculiar to the spectator

(Rancière 2009/2008: 17).

Bibliography

- Abdoh, Reza 2008/1992, 'Los Angeles', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 483-488.
- Abercrombie, Nicholas and Brian Longhurst 1998, Audiences: A Sociological Theory of Performance and Imagination, London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications.
- ABS 2007, 4172.0 Arts and Culture in Australia: A Statistical Overview, 2007, Australian Bureau of Statistics, www.abs.gov.au, accessed 18 June 2007.
- Ackerman, Jr., Alan 1999, The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage, Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press.
- Agee, James and Walker Evans 1960/1941, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, Boston, Cambridge: Houghton Mifflin Company/The Riverside Press.
- Albanese, Catherine 1976, Sons of the Father: The Civil Religion of the American Revolution, Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Alcorn, Gay 2008 'The G-G's intervention: It's a good life for black Australians', The Sydney Morning Herald 1 September, pp. 1,4.
- Aldenhoven, Jan and Glen Carruthers 1992, Kangaroos: Faces in the Mob, directed by Jan Aldenhoven and Glen Carruthers, Sydney: Green Cape Wildlife Films; multiple releases on DVD and VHS.
- Aldrich, John H., Christopher Gelpi, Peter Feaver, Jason Reifler and Kristin Thompson Sharp 2006, 'Foreign Policy and the Electoral Connection', Annual Review of Political Science, 9, pp. 477-502.
- Alexander, Jeffrey 2003, The Meanings of Social Life: A Cultural Sociology, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Allen, Nicholas and Sarah Birch 2011, 'On Either Side of a Moat? Elite and Mass Attitudes Towards Right and Wrong', European Journal of Political Research, Early View (11 May 2011), pp. 1-28.
- Alvarez, Isabel and Brent Kilbourn 2001, 'Mapping the Information Society Literature: Topics, Perspectives, and Root Metaphors', First Monday, 7 (1).
- Aly, Waleed 2007, 'Blowback the sequel: harder, faster', The Sydney Morning Herald, 15th October, p. 13.
- Andersson, Staffan and Paul Heywood 2009, 'The Politics of Perception: Use and Abuse of Transparency International's Approach to Measuring Corruption', Political Studies, 57, pp. 746-767.
- Andia, Jonny F. et al 2003, 'Towards an HIV role theory: drug-related peer beliefs and role strain indications as predictors of injection risk behaviors among Puerto Rican injection drug users in New York and Puerto Rico', Journal of Drug Issues, 33 (4), pp. 963-983.
- Ang, Ien 1991, Desperately Seeking the Audience, London and New York: Routledge.

- APSC 2009, Delivering Performance and Accountability, Canberra: Australian Public Service Commission.
- Apter, David 2006, 'Politics as theatre: an alternative view of the rationalities of power', in Social Performance: Symbolic Action, Cultural Pragmatics and Ritual, edited by J. C. Alexander, B. Giesen and J. Mast, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 218-256.
- Arditi, Jorge (George) 1987, 'Role as a Cultural Concept', Theory and Society, 16 (4), pp. 565-591.
- Arditi, Jorge (George) 1994, 'Geertz, Kuhn and the Idea of a Cultural Paradigm', British Journal of Sociology, 45 (4), pp. 597-617.
- Arendt, Hannah 1958, The Human Condition, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Arendt, Hannah 1973/c1963, On Revolution, Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Arendt, Hannah 1978/1971, The Life of the Mind, San Diego, New York, London: A Harvest Book, Harcourt Brace and Company.
- Arendt, Hannah 1980/1954, 'The Crisis in Culture: Its Social and Its Political Significance', in Between Past and Future: Eight Exercises in Political Thought, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, pp. 197-226.
- Arendt, Hannah 1982, Lectures on Kant's Political Philosophy, edited by R. Beiner, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.
- Aristotle 1984/nd, The Complete Works of Aristotle, edited by J. Barnes, Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Artaud, Antonin 2000/1933, 'The Theater of Cruelty', in Theatre Theory Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, NY: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 437-443.
- Artaud, Antonin 2000/1938, 'The Theatre and Its Double', in Theatre Theory Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, NY: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 433-443.
- Artaud, Antonin 2008/1938, 'On the Balinese Theatre', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 207-216.
- Arvanitakis, James and Siobhan Marren 2009, 'Putting the politics back into Politics: Young people and democracy in Australia', Sydney: The Whitlam Institute within the University of Western Sydney.
- Asen, Robert 2002, 'Imagining in the Public Sphere', Philosophy and Rhetoric, 35 (4), pp. 345-367.
- Audi, R. (ed) 1996, The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy, Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Augustine 1961/397, The Confessions of Saint Augustine, translated by R. S. Pine-Coffin, London: Penguin.
- Auslander, Philip 2008, Liveness: performance in a mediatized culture, 2nd ed., London and New York: Routledge.
- Austin, J.L. 1970, Philosophical Papers, edited by J. O. Urmson and G. J. Warnock, 2nd ed., Oxford: Clarendon Press.

- Austin, J.L. 1978/1975, How to Do things with Words, edited by J. O. Urmson and M. Sbisà, 2nd ed., Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Bacon, Francis 1866/1605, The Advancement of Learning, edited by G. W. Kitchin, London: J.M. Dent and Sons Ltd (facsimile edition by Heron Books n.d.).
- Bagehot, Walter 1872/1867, The English Constitution, London: Henry S. King and Co.
- Bailey, James R. 1996, 'Theater and the laboratory enterprise', Journal of Social Behavior and Personality, 11 (4), pp. 193-804.
- Balme, Christopher 2005, 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific', metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.
- Balnaves, Mark and Tom O'Regan 2002, 'Introduction', in Mobilising the Audience, edited by M. Balnaves, T. O'Regan and J. Sternberg, St Lucia: University of Queensland Press, pp. 1-9.
- Baran, Stanley and Dennis Davis, 2009, Mass Communication Theory: Foundations, Ferment, and Future, Boston: Wadsworth/Cengage Learning.
- Barber, Benjamin R 1982, 'Rousseau and Brecht: Political Virtue and the Tragic Imagination', in The Artist and Political Vision, edited by B. R. Barber and M. J. G. McGrath, New Brunswick and London: Transaction Books, pp. 1-30.
- Barber, Benjamin R., and Michael J. Gargas McGrath 1982, 'Introduction', in The Artist and Political Vision, edited by B. R. Barber and M. J. G. McGrath, New Brunswick and London: Transaction Books.
- Barker, Howard 1997, 'On the sickness of the audience', in Arguments for a Theatre, Manchester, New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 124-125.
- Barker, Howard 1998/1990, 'Theatre without a Conscience', in Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt, Oxford: Clarendon Press, pp. 55-61.
- Barker, Martin 1998, 'Critique: audiences 'Я' us', in Approaches to Audiences: A Reader, edited by R. Dickinson, R. Harindranath and O. Linne, New York: Arnold, pp. 184-191.
- Barker, Martin 2004, 'Reviews by Martin Barker', Particip@tions 1 (2), http://www.participations.org/volume%201/issue%202/1_02_blackadder-kattwinkel_review.htm, accessed 13/10/2011.
- Barker, Martin and Kate Brooks 1998, 'On Looking into Bourdieu's Black Box', in Approaches to Audiences: A Reader, edited by R. Dickinson, R. Harindranath and O. Linne, London, NY: Arnold, pp. 218-232.
- Barlow, Joel 2010/1787, 'The Columbiad (The Vision of Columbus)': Gutenberg <http://www.gutenberg.org/dirs/etext05/8clmb10h.htm> accessed 23/9/2010.
- Barnett, Clive 2003, Culture and Democracy: Media, Space and Representation, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Barnhart, Robert K., ed., 1998, Chambers Dictionary of Etymology, Edinburgh: Chambers.
- Baron-Cohen, Simon 2011, Zero Degrees of Empathy: A New Theory of Human Cruelty: Penguin Australia.
- Barrett, Pat 2001, 'Evaluation and Performance Auditing: Shared Ground', Canberra

- Bulletin of Public Administration*, 102 (December), pp. 42-48.
- Bartels, Klaus 1993, 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater', Diogenes, 163, pp. 45-70.
- Barthes, Roland 1986, 'Diderot, Brecht, Eisenstein', in The Responsibility of Forms: Critical Essays on Music, Art, and Representation: Oxford, Basil Blackwell, pp. 89-97.
- Barthes, Roland 2008/1956, 'The Tasks of Brechtian Criticism', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 336-339.
- Bartky, Sandra 2002, 'Sympathy and Solidarity', in 'Sympathy and Solidarity' and Other Essays, Lanham, Boulder, NY, Oxford: Rowman and Littlefield, pp. 70-86.
- Barton, Anne 1974, 'Review: The Theater and the Dream: From Metaphor to Form in Renaissance Drama by Jackson I. Cope', Modern Language Quarterly, 35 (4), pp. 420-422.
- Bartsch, Shadi 2006, The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.
- Başgöz, İlhan 1975, 'The Tale-Singer and his Audience', in Folklore: Performance and Communication, edited by D. Ben-Amos and K. S. Goldstein, The Hague, Paris: Mouton, pp. 143-203.
- Bate, Walter Jackson 1945, 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism', ELH, 12 (2), pp.144-164.
- Bauman, Zygmunt 1989, Modernity and the Holocaust, Cambridge: Polity.
- Baxandall, Lee 1969, 'Spectacles and Scenarios: A Dramaturgy of Radical Activity', The Drama Review: TDR, 13 (4), pp.52-71.
- Bay-Cheng, Sarah 2005, Mama Dada: Gertrude Stein's Avant-Garde Theater, New York: Routledge.
- Bealing, William E. Jr., Mark W. Dirsmith and Timothy Fogarty 1996, 'Early regulatory actions by the SEC: An institutional theory perspective on the dramaturgy of political exchanges', Accounting, Organizations and Society, 21 (4), pp. 317-338.
- Beaumarchais, Pierre-Augustin Caron de 1994/1767, 'Essai sur le genre dramatique serieux', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 128-133.
- Beavin Bavelas, Janet, Alex Black, Charles Lemery and Jennifer Mullett 1987, 'Motor Mimicry as Primitive Empathy', in Empathy and its Development, edited by N. Eisenberg and J. Strayer, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 317-338.
- Beckerman, Bernard 1979/1970, 'The Nature of Theatrical Response', in Dynamics of Drama: Theory and Method of Analysis, New York: Drama Book Specialists, pp. 130-144.
- Beer, Francis A., and Christ'l De Landtsheer, eds, 2004, Metaphorical World Politics, East Lansing, Michigan: Michigan State University Press.
- Beetham, D 1994, 'Key Principles and Indices for a Democratic Audit', in Defining

- and Measuring Democracy*, edited by D. Beetham, London: Sage.
- Bell, Vikki 1996, 'The promise of liberalism and the performance of freedom', in Foucault and Political Reason: Liberalism, Neo-liberalism and Rationalities of Government, edited by A. Barry, T. Osborne and N. Rose, London: UCL Press, pp. 81-97.
- Ben Chaim, Daphna 1984, Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response, Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press.
- Benjamin, Walter 1999/1936, 'The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction', in Illuminations, edited by H. Arendt, London: Pimlico, pp. 211-244.
- Bennett, Susan 1997, Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception, 2nd ed., London and New York: Routledge.
- Bentley, Eric 1986/1946, The Pirandello Commentaries, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press.
- Beresford, Quentin and Harry Phillips 1997, 'Spectators in Australian politics? Young voters' interest in politics and political issues', Youth Studies Australia, 16, pp. 11-16.
- Berger, Bennett M 1986 'Foreword', in Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience, Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- Bernheimer, Richard 1956, 'Theatrum Mundi', The Art Bulletin, 38 (4), pp. 225-247.
- Bernstein, Richard J. 1986, Philosophical Profiles: Essays in a Pragmatic Mode, Cambridge and Oxford: Polity Press in association with B. Blackwell.
- Bickford, Susan 1997, 'Propriety and Provocation in Arendt's Political Aesthetic', in Hannah Arendt and the Meaning of Politics, edited by C. Calhoun and J. McGowan, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 85-95.
- Bilbow, Grahame, and Sylvester Yeung 2010/1998, 'Learning the Pragmatics of 'Successful' Impression Management in Cross-Cultural Interviews', Pragmatics, 8 (3), pp. 405-417, <http://www.elanguage.net/journals/index.php/pragmatics/article/viewArticle/272>.
- Billig, Michael 1995, 'Flagging the Homeland Daily', in Banal Nationalism, London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications, pp. 93-127.
- Billig, Michael and Katie MacMillan 2005, 'Metaphor, idiom and ideology: the search for 'no smoking guns' across time', Discourse and Society, 16 (4), pp. 459-480.
- Biocca, Frank 1988 'Opposing Conceptions of the Audience: The Active and Passive Hemispheres of Mass Communication Theory', Communication Yearbook 11 pp. 51-80.
- Birch, Sarah and Nicholas Allen 2010, 'How Honest Do Politicians Need to Be?' The Political Quarterly, 81 (1), pp.49-56.
- Birringer, Johannes 1991, Theatre, Theory, Postmodernism, Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Black, Max 1962, Models and Metaphors: Studies in Language and Philosophy, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
- Black, Max 1977, 'More about Metaphor', Dialectica, 31 (3-4), pp. 431-457.

- Blackadder, Neil 2003, Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience, Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.
- Blackburn, Simon 1994, The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Blau, Herbert 1986, 'Odd, Anonymous Needs: The Audience in a Dramatized Society (part 2)', Performing Arts Journal, 10 (1), pp. 34-42.
- Blau, Herbert 1987, The Eye of Prey: Subversions of the Postmodern, edited by K. Woodward, Vol. 9, Theories in Contemporary Culture, Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Blau, Herbert 1989a, 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play', in By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, edited by R. Schechner and W. Appel, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272.
- Blau, Herbert 1989b, 'Receding into Illusion: Alienation, the Audience, Technique, Anatomy', New German Critique, 47 (Spring-Summer), pp. 93-117.
- Blau, Herbert 1990, The Audience, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Blau, Herbert 2008/2001, 'The Limits of Performance: The Insane Root', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 533-538.
- Blaug, Ricardo 2002, 'Engineering Democracy', Political Studies, 50, pp. 102-116.
- Blumenberg, Hans 1997/1979, Shipwreck with Spectator: Paradigm of a Metaphor for Existence, translated by S. Rendall, Cambridge Mass, and London: The MIT Press.
- Boal, Augusto 1979/1974, Theatre of the Oppressed, London: Pluto Press.
- Boal, Augusto 1998, Legislative Theatre: Using performance to make politics, translated by A. Jackson, London and New York: Routledge.
- Boal, Augusto 2000/1974, 'Theater of the Oppressed', in Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 464-473 (excerpt).
- Boje, David M. 2002a, 'Define Metatheatre Terms', in Theatres of Capitalism, San Francisco: Hampton Press.
- Boje, David M. 2002b, 'Enron in Theatre', Dialogs, Septet
<http://cbae.nmsu.edu/~dboje>, accessed 24/7/2005.
- Boje, David M. 2002c, 'Metatheatre: Theory and Method', in Enron is Metatheatre, <http://cbae.nmsu.edu/~dboje/enron/metatheatre.htm> accessed 24/7/2005.
- Boje, David M. 2001, 'Leadership Theater Event', http://cbae.nmsu.edu/~dboje/388/leadership_theatre_event.htm accessed 24/7/2005.
- Boltanski, Luc 1999, Distant Suffering: Morality, Media and Politics, translated by G. Burchell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Booklicious 2011, René Descartes: The Father of Modern Philosophy <http://www.bookliciousblog.com/2011/01/literary-legos-writers-transformed.html>, accessed 18/2/2011.
- Boorstin, Daniel J. 1978/1961, The Image: a Guide to Pseudo-events in America,

- New York: Atheneum Paperbacks.
- Borrecia, Art 1993, 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View', The Drama Review, 37 (2), pp. 56-79.
- Bottoms, Stephen J. 2003, 'The Efficacy/Effeminacy Braid: Unpicking the Performance Studies/Theatre Studies Dichotomy', Theatre Topics, 13 (2), pp. 173-187.
- Boulton, James T. 1963, The Language of Politics in the Age of Wilkes and Burke, London and Toronto: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Bourdieu, Pierre 1990, 'Structures, Habitus, Practices', in The Logic of Practice, Cambridge: Polity Press, pp. 52-65.
- Bowker, G.C., and S.L. Star 1999, Sorting Things Out: Classification and its Consequences, Cambridge Mass: The MIT Press.
- Bradbury, M., B, Heading and M, Hollis 1972, 'The Man and The Mask: A Discussion of Role Theory', in Role, edited by J. A. Jackson, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Braman, Donald, Dan Kahan and James Grimmelmann 2005, 'Modeling Facts, Culture, and Cognition in the Gun Debate', Social Justice Research, 18 (3), pp.283-304.
- Brandt, George, ed., 1998, Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Brecht, Bertold 1992/1949, 'A Short Organum for the Theatre', in Brecht on Theatre: the Development of an Aesthetic, edited by J. Willett, New York: Hill and Wang, pp. 179-205.
- Brecht, Bertold 1998/1948, 'A Short Organum for the Theatre', in Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt, Oxford: Clarendon Press, pp. 233-246.
- Brecht, Bertold 2000/1930, 'The Modern Theatre is the Epic Theatre', in Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 446-453.
- Brecht, Bertold 2008/1936, 'Alienation Effect in Chinese Acting', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 178-184.
- Brent, Peter 2008, 'Rear Vision', Inside Story 27 November <http://inside.org.au/rear-vision/> accessed 2/12/2008.
- Brent, Peter 2010, 'Exit, stage right', Inside Story, <http://inside.org.au/exit-stage-right> accessed 15/4/2010.
- Brett, Judith 2007, 'Exit Right: The Unravelling of John Howard', Quarterly Essay 28, pp. 1-96.
- Brighenti, Andrea 2007, 'Visibility: A Category for the Social Sciences', Current Sociology, 55 (3), pp. 323-342.
- Brissett, Dennis and Charles Edgley eds., 1990, Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook, 2nd ed., New York: Aldine de Gruyter.
- Brockett, Oscar and Robert J. Ball 2004, The Essential Theatre, 8th ed., Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.

- Brook, Peter 1982/1968, The Empty Space, Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Brook, Peter 2008/1968, 'The Immediate Theatre', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, London: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 378-380.
- Brooks, Cleanth 1965, 'Metaphor, Paradox and Stereotype', British Journal of Aesthetics, 5 (4), pp. 315-328.
- Brown, Richard H. 1976, 'Social Theory as Metaphor: On the Logic of Discovery for the Sciences of Conduct', Theory and Society, 3 (2), pp. 169-197.
- Brown, Richard H. 1977, A Poetic for Sociology: Toward a logic of discovery for the human sciences, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brown, Steven D. 2005, 'The Theatre of Measurement: Michel Serres', The Sociological Review, 53 (s1), pp. 215-227.
- Buber, M. 1958/1923, I and Thou, translated by R. G. Smith, Edinburgh: T & T Clark.
- Bullough, Edward 1912, 'Psychical Distance' as a Factor in Art and an Aesthetic Principle', British Journal of Psychology, 5 (June), pp. 87-118.
- Burchell, David 2007, 'Politics: Learning from his opponents', Australian Policy Online, 01.03.2007 www.apo.org.au.
- Burke, Edmund 1808/1756, 'A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, with an Introductory Discourse concerning Taste, and several other Additions', in The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London: Law and Gilbert, for F.C. and J. Rivington, St Paul's, pp. 81-322.
- Burke, Edmund 1852/c1765, 'Hints for An Essay on the Drama', in The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available through Making of Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1852/1780a, 'Speech at Bristol, previous to the Election, 1780', in The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available through Making Of Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1852/1780b, 'Speech on presenting to the House of Commons, a Plan for the Better Society .., and Economical Reformation of the Civil and Other Establishments (Plan for Economical Reform)', in The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available through Making of the Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1852/1792, 'Correspondence: Right Honourable Edmund Burke to the Countess of Inchiquin July 1792', in The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available through Making of Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1852/1796, 'Correspondence: to Mrs Crowe, Friday, February 26, 1796', in The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available

- through Making of Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1876, 'An Abridgment of English History [excellent and full]', in Essays by Edmund Burke, London/Philadelphia: Ward, Lock and Tyler/electronic version available through Making of Modern Law database.
- Burke, Edmund 1969/1790, 'Reflections on the French Revolution', in Edmund Burke: On Taste; On the Sublime and Beautiful; Reflections on the French Revolution; A Letter to a Noble Lord, edited by C. Eliot, New York: P.F. Collier & Son Corporation, pp. 143-379.
- Burke, Kenneth 1945, A Grammar of Motive, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.
- Burns, Elizabeth 1972, Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life, London: Longman.
- Burton, Richard 2010/1914, How To See A Play, New York: The Macmillan Co/Project Gutenberg, <http://manybooks.net/titles/burtonri3243332433-8.html> accessed 27/6/2010.
- Butler, Judith 1988, 'Performative Acts and Gender Constitution: An Essay in Phenomenology and Feminist Theory', Theatre Journal, 40 (4), pp. 519-531.
- Butler, Judith 1990, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the subversion of identity, New York: Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1993, Bodies that Matter: On the Discursive Limits of Sex, New York and London: Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1999, 'Preface (1999)', in Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, 2nd ed., New York and London: Routledge, pp. vii-xxvi.
- Butwin, Joseph 1975, 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi', Research Studies, 43 (3), pp. 141-152.
- Calhoun, Craig and John McGowan 1997, 'Introduction: Hannah Arendt and the Meaning of Politics', in Hannah Arendt and the Meaning of Politics, edited by C. Calhoun and J. McGowan, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 1-24.
- Cameron, Lynne 1999, 'Identifying and describing metaphor in spoken discourse data', in Researching and Applying Metaphor, edited by L. Cameron and G. Low, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 105-120.
- Campbell, Colin 1971, 'Current Models of the Political System: An Intellectual-Purposive View', Comparative Political Studies, 4 (1), pp. 21-39.
- Capon, Eric 1965, 'Theatre and Reality', British Journal of Aesthetics, 5 (3), pp. 261-269.
- Cardosa, Fernando 1996, 'In Praise of the Art of Politics', Journal of Democracy, 7 (3), pp. 8-19.
- Carey, Peter 1997, Jack Maggs: a Novel, New York, London: Vintage International.
- Carey, Peter 2009, Parrot and Olivier in America, Australia: Hamish Hamilton /Penguin Books.
- Carlisle, Janice 1991, 'Spectacle as Government: Dickens and the Working-Class Audience', in The Performance of Power: Theatrical Discourse and Politics, edited by S. Case and J. Reinelt, Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, pp. 163-180.

- Carlson, Marvin 1984, Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present, Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.
- Carlson, Marvin 2004, Performance: A critical introduction, 2nd ed., New York and London: Routledge.
- Carlyle, Thomas 1906/1837, The French Revolution, Vol, II, London: Macmillan and Co, Limited.
- Carlyle, Thomas 2008/1841, On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History, Boulder, Colorado: NetLibrary: Champaign, Ill: Project Gutenberg <http://www.netlibrary.com> accessed 28/04/2008.
- Carnegie, Dale 1999/1936, How to Win Friends and Influence People (1936), Australia: HarperCollins Publishers.
- Carney, Lora Senechal 1993, 'Not Telling Us What to Think: The Vietnam Veterans Memorial', Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 8 (3), pp. 211-219.
- Castelvetro, Ludovico 1991/1570, 'Poetics of Aristotle, Translated into the Vernacular and Explicated', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 130-144.
- Cavallaro, Dani 2001, Critical and Cultural Theory: Thematic Variations, London and New Brunswick, NJ: The Athlone Press.
- Cavell, Stanley 2003/1987, 'The Avoidance of Love', in Disowning Knowledge: In Seven Plays of Shakespeare, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cervantes, Miguel de 2003/1605, Don Quixote, translated by E. Grossman, New York: ecco/HarperCollinsPublisher.
- Cha, Ariana Eunjung 2005, 'About the people by the people', The Sydney Morning Herald, 25 July, p. 10.
- Chambers, William and Robert Chambers 1877, School Dictionary of the Latin Language, London and Edinburgh: William and Robert Chambers.
- Chaney, David 1993, Fictions of Collective Life: Public Drama in Late Modern Culture, London and New York: Routledge.
- Cheney, Sheldon 1930, The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft, 2nd ed., London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co.
- Cheng, Ken 2010, 'Common principles shared by spatial and other kinds of cognition', in Spatial Cognition, Spatial Perception, edited by F. Dolins and R. Mitchell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 54-74.
- Cheng, Khoo Gaik 2004, 'Perform, State, Interrogate - Then What?', in Is Everything a Performance? Are prisoners of war performing? Are torturers performing? Can Performance Studies academics save us?, edited by P. Khee, Malaysia: Kakiseni.com, kakiseni.com Sdn, Bhd, accessed 28/02/2008.
- Childs, Sarah and Philip Cowley 2011, 'The Politics of Local Presence: Is there a Case for Descriptive Representation?', Political Studies, 59 (1), pp. 1-19.
- Chilton, P.A, and M. Ilyin 1993, 'Metaphor in Political Discourse: The Case of the "Common European House"', Discourse and Society, 4, pp. 7-31.
- Chriss, James 1995, 'Habermas, Goffman, and Communicative Action: Implications for Professional Practice', American Sociological Review, 60 (4), pp. 545-565.
- Christian, Lynda G. 1987, Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea, New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc.

- Churchill, Winston 1950/1948, The Gathering Storm, Vol, I, The Second World War, London: The Reprint Society.
- Citizenship DRC 2011, 'Seeing like a Citizen', in Blurring the Boundaries: Citizen Action Across States and Societies, edited by N. Benequista, Brighton UK: The Development Research Centre on Citizenship. Participation and Accountability, www.drc-citizenship.org accessed 4/07/11, pp. 4-5.
- Citrin, Jack, Herbert McClosky, J. Merrill Shanks and Paul Sniderman 1975, 'Personal and Political Sources of Political Alienation', British Journal of Political Science, 5 (1), pp. 1-31.
- Claassen, Ryan and Benjamin Highton 2006, 'Does Policy Debate Reduce Information Effects in Public Opinion? Analyzing the Evolution of Public Opinion on Health Care', Journal of Politics, 68 (2), p. 410ff.
- Clark, Candace 1987, 'Sympathy Biography and Sympathy Margin', The American Journal of Sociology, 93 (2/September), pp. 290-321.
- Clarke, Roger 1994, 'The digital persona and its application to data surveillance', The Information Society 10 (2), pp.77-92.
- Clayton, Kymbra 2008, 'Selves in the World: a Question of Functionality', PhD thesis submitted to the Department of Psychology, Macquarie University, Australia.
- Clegg, Cath 2005a, 'How Does a Non-Conformist Break Through the Big Brother Front Door?' The Bulletin, 15 February, p. 10.
- Clegg, Cathy 2005b, 'Television', The Bulletin, 15 February, p. 10.
- Clegg, Stewart R. 1997, Frameworks of Power, London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications.
- CMIIF 1995, Measuring and Improving Infrastructure Performance, Washington DC: Committee on Measuring and Improving Infrastructure Performance (CMIIF), National Research Council, National Academy Press.
- Cohen, Raymond 1987, Theatre of Power: The Art of Diplomatic Signalling, London, New York: Longman Group.
- Cole, David 1992, Acting as Reading, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Coleridge, Samuel 1994/1808, 'Desultory Remarks on the Stage and the present state of the Higher Drama', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 221-225.
- Collins, Christopher 1973, Life as Theatre: Five Modern Plays by Nikolai Evreinov, An Arbor, Michigan: Ardis.
- Collins French Dictionary Plus* 2007, Credo reference <http://www.credoreference.com.simsrad.net.ocs.mq.edu.au>, accessed 2/07/2008.
- Combs, James E. 1980, Dimensions of Political Drama, Santa Monica, CA: Goodyear.
- Combs, James E. 1981, 'A Process Approach', in Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders, Beverly Hills and London: Sage Publications, pp. 39-65.
- Combs, James E. and Michael W. Mansfield eds, 1976, Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings

- House Publishers.
- Conkey, Margaret W, 1996, 'A history of the interpretation of European 'paleolithic art': magic, mythogram, and metaphors for modernity', in Handbook of Human Symbolic Evolution, edited by A. Lock and C. R. Peters, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 288-349.
- Connell, R.W. 1979, 'The Concept of Role and What to Do With It', Journal of Sociology, 15 (3), pp.7-17.
- Connelly, James 2005, 'Patrolling the Boundaries of Politics: Collingwood, Political Analysis and Political Action', British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 7, pp.67-80.
- Connor (Swietlicki), Catherine 1999, 'The Preceptistas and beyond: Spectators Making "Meanings" in the Corral de Comedias', Hispania, 82 (3), pp. 417-428.
- Conover, P.J., D.D. Searing and I.M. Crewe 2002, 'The deliberative potential of political discussion', British Journal of Political Science, 32, pp. 21-62.
- Cooley, Charles Horton 2009/1902, Human Nature and the Social Order, London: Charles Scribner's Sons/Cornell University Library Digital Collection.
- Cooper, David E. 1986, Metaphor, Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- Coorey, Phillip 2007, 'Jedi Master Costello to coach mystery successor', The Sydney Morning Herald, 12 November, p. 11.
- Coppieters, Frank 1981, 'Performance and Perception', Poetics Today, 2 (3), pp. 35-48.
- Corbett, Edward P.J. and Robert J. Connors 1999, Classical Rhetoric for the Modern Student, New York, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Corneille, Pierre 1991/1660, 'On the Purpose and the Parts of a Play', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 235-244.
- Crabb, Annabel 2009, 'Centre stage and vulnerable', The Sydney Morning Herald September 5-6, p. 5.
- Crane, Mary Thomas 2002, 'What Was Performance?' Criticism, 43 (2), pp. 169-187.
- Crane, R.S. 1967, 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism', in The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.
- Crary, Jonathan 1990, Techniques of the Observer: On Vision and Modernity in the Nineteenth Century, Cambridge Mass., London: MIT Press.
- Crease, Robert P. 1993, The Play of Nature: Experimentation as Performance, Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Crick, Bernard 1971, '"Them and Us": Public Impotence and Government Power', in Political Theory and Practice, London: Allen Lane, pp. 135-160.
- Cronin, Bruce 2001, 'The Paradox of Hegemony: America's Ambiguous Relationship with the United Nations', European Journal of International Relations, 7 (1), pp.103-131.
- Cuddon, J.A. 1991, The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, 3rd ed., London: Penguin Books.
- Culler, Jonathan 1975, Structuralist Poetics, Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

- Currie, Gregory 1995, Image and Mind: Film, Philosophy, and Cognitive Science, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Curtis, Kimberley 1997, 'Aesthetic Foundations of Democratic Politics in the Work of Hannah Arendt', in Hannah Arendt and the Meaning of Politics, edited by C. Calhoun and J. McGowan, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 27-52.
- Curtius, Ernst Robert 1909/1948, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, translated by W. R. Trask, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Czekay, Angelika 1993, 'Distance and Empathy: Constructing the Spectator of Annie Sprinkle's Post-POST PORN MODERNIST—Still in Search of the Ultimate Sexual Experience', Journal of Dramatic Theory and Criticism VII (No. 2: Spring), pp. 173-192.
- d'Aubignac, François Hédelin, Abbé 1911/1657, 'La Pratique du theatre (The Whole Art of the Stage)', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 221-233.
- Dahrendorf, Ralf 1973/1958, Homo Sociologicus, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Dale Carnegie Training 2006 "How to Win Friends and Influence People" Celebrates 70th Anniversary', http://www.dalecarnegie.com/about_us/press_release.jsp?id=AAAHbsAAEA AAdtvAAA accessed 1/4/2011.
- Dale, David 2008, 'Gotta love the guy - even caught in traffic eccentric Rees is looking triffic', The Sydney Morning Herald, 27 October, p. 13.
- Daley, Paul 2009, 'Turnbull in a china shop', The Sydney Morning Herald, 22 February, p. 41.
- Dalton, Russell 2008, 'Citizenship Norms and the Expansion of Political Participation', Political Studies, 56 (1), pp. 76-98.
- Dasgupta, Gautam 1988, 'The Theatricals of Politics', Performing Arts Journal, 11 (2), pp. 77-83.
- Davidson, Donald 1984, 'What Metaphors Mean', in Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- De Baecque, Antoine 1994, 'The Allegorical Image of France, 1750-1800: A Political Crisis of Representation', Representations, 47, pp. 111-143.
- de Beauvoir, Simone 1965, 'Preface', in La Bâtarde: an Autobiography, by Violette Leduc, London: Peter Owen.
- de Certeau, Michel 1984, The Practice of Everyday Life, translated by S. Rendall, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- de Kerckhove, Derrick 1990, 'Virtual Reality for Collective Cognitive Processing', in Ars Electronica 1990: Band II: Virtuelle Welten, edited by G. Hattinger, M. Russel, C. Schopf and P. Weibel: Linz, pp. 171-185.
- De Marinis, Marco 1993, The Semiotics of Performance, translated by A. O'Healy, Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- de Molina, Tirso 1911/1624, 'The Country Houses of Toledo', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- de Tocqueville, Alexis 1959/1835-40, Democracy in America, translated by H. Reeve, Vol, 1 & 2, New York: Vintage Books.
- de Tocqueville, Alexis 1970/1893, Recollections, translated by G. Lawrence, edited by J. P. Mayer and A. P. Kerr, London and New York: Anchor Books, Doubleday.
- Deavere Smith, Anna 1995, 'Systems of Lights', Theater, 26 (1/2), pp. 50-2.
- Debord, Guy 1970, Society of the Spectacle, Detroit: Black and Red.
- Deignan, Alice 2005, Metaphor and Corpus Linguistics, Amsterdam/Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Company.
- Dening, Greg 1996, Performances, Victoria: Melbourne University Press.
- Dent-Read, Cathy H. and Agnes Szokolszky 1993, 'Where Do Metaphors Come From?' Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 8 (3), pp. 227-242.
- Derrida, Jacques 1974, 'White Mythology: Metaphor in the Text of Philosophy', New Literary History, translated by F.C.T. Moore, 6 (1), pp. 5-74.
- Descotes, Maurice 1964, Le public de théâtre et son histoire, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.
- Deutsch, Karl 1966, The Nerves of Government: Models of Political Communication and Control, New York: Free Press.
- Deutscher, Max 1983, Subjecting and Objecting: An Essay in Objectivity, St Lucia: University of Queensland Press.
- Deutscher, Max 2007, Judgment After Arendt, Aldershot and Burlington: Ashgate.
- Dewey, Richard 1969, 'The Theatrical Analogy Reconsidered', The American Sociologist, 4, pp. 307-311.
- Dickson, Eric 2009, 'Do Participants and Observers Assess Intentions Differently During Bargaining and Conflict?' American Journal of Political Science, 53 (4), pp. 910-930.
- Diderot, Denis 1994/1758, 'Discours sur la poésie dramatique: essay accompanying the play Le pere de famille', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 57-68.
- Diefenbach, Thomas 2009, 'New Public Management in Public Sector Organizations: The Dark Side of Managerialistic 'Enlightenment'', Public Administration, 87 (4), pp. 892-909.
- Dietz, Mary 1994, 'The Slow Boring of Hard Boards': Methodological Thinking and the Work of Politics', American Political Science Review, 88 (4), pp. 873-886.
- Dobell, Rod 2003, 'The Role of Government and the Government's Role in Evaluating Government: Insider Information and Outsider Beliefs': Panel on the Role of Government, University of Victoria www.law-lib.utoronto.ca/investing/reports/rp47.pdf accessed 19/11/2007,.
- Dolan, Jill 1989, 'Bending Gender to Fit the Canon: The Politics of Production', in Making a Spectacle: Feminist Essays on Contemporary Women's Theatre, edited by L. Hart, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 318-345.
- Dolan, Jill 1993, 'Geographies of learning: theatre studies, performance, and the "performative"', Theatre Journal, 45 (4), pp. 417-442.
- Dolan, Jill 2001, 'Rehearsing Democracy: Advocacy, Public Intellectuals, and Civic Engagement in Theatre and Performance Studies', Theatre Topics, 11 (1), pp.

- 1-17.
- Dolven, Jeff 1999, 'Spenser and the Troubled Theaters', English Literary Renaissance, 29 (2), pp. 179-200.
- Dowding, Keith 1995, 'Model or Metaphor? A Critical Review of the Policy Network Approach', Political Studies XLIII, pp. 136-158.
- Dunleavy, Dennis, Spectators, Voyeurs and Looking Down Upon Humanity from the Cheap Seats, April 2011 http://ddunleavy.typepad.com/the_big_picture/2011/04/spectators-voyeurs-and-looking-down-upon-humanity-from-the-cheap-seats.html accessed May 2011.
- Dunsire, A, 1984, 'The Levels of Politics', in What is Politics? The Activity and its Study, edited by A. Leftwich, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 85-105.
- Durant, Robert F., Robert Kramer, James L. Perry, Debra Mesch and Laurie Pearlberg 2006, 'Motivating Employees in a New Governance Era: the Performance Paradigm Revisited', Public Administration Review, 66 (4), pp. 505-514.
- Dyson, Stephen Benedict and Thomas Preston 2006, 'Individual Characteristics of Political Leaders and the Use of Analogy in Foreign Policy Decision Making', Political Psychology, 27 (2), pp. 265-288.
- Easton, David 1965, A Systems Analysis of Political Life, New York: Wiley.
- Eckermann, Ali Cobby 2008, 'Why They Turned Their Backs', in The Drum: Australian Broadcasting Corporation <http://www.abc.net.au/unleashed/37114.html> accessed 27/6/2011.
- Eddershaw, Margaret 1996, Performing Brecht: Forty Years of British Performances, London and New York: Routledge.
- Edelman, Murray 1964, The Symbolic Uses of Politics, Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Edelman, Murray 1988, Constructing the Political Spectacle, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Edie, James 1967, 'Comments on Maurice Natanson's Paper 'Man As Actor'', in Phenomenology of Will and Action: The Second Lexington Conference on Pure and Applied Phenomenology, edited by E. Straus and R. Griffith, Pittsburgh: Duquesne University Press, pp. 221-231.
- Edwardes, Michael 1962, Asia in the European Age, 1498-1955, New York: Frederick A. Praeger.
- Edwards, John 2004, 'After the fall', Discourse and Society, 15 (2-3), pp. 155-184.
- Egginton, William 2003, How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity, New York: State University of New York Press.
- Eisenberg, Nancy and Paul Miller 1987, 'Empathy, Sympathy and Altruism: Empirical and Conceptual Links', in Empathy and its Development, edited by N. Eisenberg and J. Strayer, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 292-316.
- Elam, Keir 1980, The Semiotics of Theatre and Drama, London: Methuen.
- Elden, Stuart 2001, Mapping the Present: Heidegger, Foucault and the Project of a

- Spatial History*, London and New York: Continuum.
- Elliott, Robert, Arthur Bohart, Jeanne Watson and Leslie Greenberg 2011, 'Empathy', Psychotherapy, 48 (1), pp. 43-49.
- Else, Gerard 1963, Aristotle's Poetics: The Argument, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Enders, Jody 2003, 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)', in Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 40-64.
- Erickson, Jon 1990, 'Appropriation and Transgression in Contemporary American Performance: The Wooster Group. Holly Hughes, and Karen Finley', Theatre Journal, 42 (2), pp. 225-236.
- Eubanks, Philip 1999, 'The Story of Conceptual Metaphor: What Motivates Metaphoric Mappings?' Poetics Today, 20 (3), pp. 419-442.
- Evans, Tim 2006, Compulsory Voting in Australia, Australian Electoral Commission: http://www.aec.gov.au/About_AEC/Publications/voting/index.htm.
- Evreinov, Nicolas 1970/1927, The Theatre in Life, translated by A. I. Nazarov, New York: Benjamin Blom.
- Ewick, Patricia, and Austin Sarat 2004, Review: 'Hidden in Plain View: Murray Edelman in the Law and Society Tradition', in Law and Social Inquiry, 29 (2), pp. 439-463.
- Ezrahi, Yaron 1995, 'The Theatrics and Mechanics of Action: The Theater and the Machine as Political Metaphors', Social Research, 62 (2), pp. 299-323.
- Fairchild, Amy, Ronald Bayer and James Colgrove 2007, Searching Eyes: Privacy, the State, and Disease Surveillance in America, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
- Farnsworth, David and James Fleming 1975, 'Quantitative Dimensions of Congressional Performance in the Twentieth Century', Quality and Quantity, 9 (3), pp. 265-276.
- Féral, Josette 2002, 'Foreword', SubStance #98/99, 31 (2&3), pp. 3-16.
- Fergusson, Francis 1961, 'Introduction', in Aristotle's Poetics, London: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Fernandez, James W, 1986, Persuasions and Performances: The Play of Tropes in Culture, Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Fernandez-Armesto, Felipe 1998, Truth: A History, UK: Black Swan.
- Fernández-Santamaria, J.S, 1998, The Theater of Man: J.L. Vives on Society, Vol, 88 Part 2, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society held at Philadelphia for Promoting Useful Knowledge, Philadelphia PA: American Philosophical Society.
- Feuer, Lewis S, 1955, 'Political Myths and Metaphysics', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, 15 (3), pp. 332-350.
- Fidler, Richard 2007, 'David Marr and Anthony Gunn: a conversation', in The Conversation Hour, Sydney: Australian Broadcasting Commission <http://www.abc.net/au/queensland/conversations/stories/s1950274.htm?sydney> 13th June.
- Fielding, Henry 1962/1749, The History of Tom Jones, London: Heron Books.

- Fischer-Lichte, Erika 1997, The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective, Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.
- Fleche, Anne 1997, 'Echoing Autism: Performance, Performativity, and the Writing of Donna Williams', TDR, 41 (3), pp. 107-121.
- Fleckenstein, Kristie 2007, 'Testifying: Seeing and Saying in World Making', in Ways of Seeing, Ways of Speaking: The Integration of Rhetoric and Vision in Constructing the Real, edited by K. Fleckenstein, S. Hum and L. Calendrillo, West Lafayette, Indiana: Parlor Press, pp. 3-30.
- Flinders, Matthew 2010, 'In Defence of Politics', The Political Quarterly, 81 (3), pp. 309-326.
- Fontanier, Pierre 1967/1818, Commentaire raisonne sur les tropes de Du Marsais, Geneva.
- Football Federation Australia 2007, 'Spectator Code of Behaviour', <http://www.footballaustralia.com.au/site/-content/document/000000028-source.pdf> accessed 8/08/2011.
- Forsyth, James 2004, 'Politics as a Spectator sport', Foreign Policy, 140 (Jan-Feb), pp. 86-87.
- Fortier, Mark 2002, Theory/Theatre: An Introduction, 2nd ed., London and New York: Routledge.
- Foucault, Michel 1988, Politics, Philosophy and Culture: Interviews and Other Writings 1977-1984, edited by L. D. Kritzman, New York: Routledge.
- Foucault, Michel 1991/1977, Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison, translated by A. Sheridan, Harmondsworth, Middlesex: Penguin Books.
- Foucault, Michel 1991/1978, 'Governmentality', in The Foucault Effect: Studies in Governmentality, edited by G. Burchell, C. Gordon and P. Miller, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, pp. 87-104.
- Foucault, Michel 1994/1966, The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences, New York: Vintage Books.
- Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2000, 'Measuring Liberal Democratic Performance: an Empirical and Conceptual Critique', Political Studies, 48 (4), pp. 759-788.
- Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2001, 'How to Construct a Database of Liberal Democratic Performance', Democratization, 8 (3), pp. 1-26.
- Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2003, 'Differentiating the democratic performance of the West', European Journal of Political Research, 42 (3), pp. 313-340.
- Frankel, Max 1972, 'Actors, Audience Interchangeable in Peking Drama', New York Times, February 23.
- Fraser, Nancy 1999, 'Rethinking the Public Sphere: A Contribution to the Critique of Actually Existing Democracy', in Habermas and the Public Sphere, edited by C. Calhoun, Cambridge Mass.: The MIT Press, pp. 109-142.
- Freeden, Michael 2005, 'What Should the 'Political' in Political Theory Explore', The Journal of Political Philosophy, 13 (2), pp. 113-134.
- Freeden, Michael 2009, 'Failures of Political Thinking', Political Studies, 57 (1), pp. 141-164.

- Freeman, Tim and Edward Peck 2007, 'Performing Governance: A Partnership Board Dramaturgy', Public Administration, 85 (4), pp. 907-929.
- Fried, Michael 1968, 'Art and Objecthood', in Minimal Art: A Critical Anthology, edited by G. Battcock, New York: E.P. Dutton & Co., pp. 116-147.
- Fried, Michael 1980, Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot, Berkeley: California University Press.
- Friedberg, Asher, and Carl Lutrin 2004, 'Are the Watchdogs Really Watching? Assessment of Audit Institutions in the Fifty United States of America', Iyunim - The Periodical of the Office of the State Comptroller and Ombudsman [Israel] 60 www.mevaker.gov.il/serve/site/docs/iyunim60e.pdf accessed 26/11/2007, p. 91ff.
- Friedland, Paul 2002, Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press.
- Furniss, Tom and Michael Bath 1996, 'Dead Metaphor and Poetic Metaphor', in Reading Poetry: an Introduction, London, New York: Prentice Hall: Harvester Wheatsheaf.
- Fusco, Coco 2000, Corpus Delecti: Performance Art of the Americas, London: Routledge.
- Fusco, Coco 2011, Two Undiscovered Amerindians: Coco Fusco <http://www.thing.net/~cocofusco/performance.htm> accessed 6/07/22.
- Fussell, Paul 1965, The Rhetorical World of Augustan Humanism: Ethics and Imagery from Swift to Burke, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Gadamer, Hans-Georg 1984, Truth and Method, New York: Crossroad.
- Gamson, William A. 1985, 'Goffman's Legacy to Political Sociology', Theory and Society, 14 (5), pp. 605-622.
- Gamson, William A. 1992, Talking Politics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gamson, William A., Bruce Fireman and Steven Rytina 1982, Encounters with Unjust Authority, Homewood, Ill: The Dorsey Press.
- Garcia, José M. González 1995, '"Search for the Daimon", "Pact with the Devil" and "Fight of Gods": On Some Metaphors of Goethe in Max Weber's Sociology', in From A Metaphorical Point of View: A Multidisciplinary Approach to the Cognitive Content of Metaphor, edited by Z. Radman, Berlin, NY: Walter de Gruyter, pp. 391-418.
- Gardner, William L, III 1992, 'Lessons in Organizational Dramaturgy: The Art of Impression Management', Organizational Dynamics (Summer 1992), pp. 33-46.
- Garnaut, John 2010, 'Oceanic display leaves neighbours queasy', The Sydney Morning Herald, November 20-21, p. 23.
- Gauss, Charles 2003/1973, 'Empathy', in Dictionary of the History of Ideas: Studies of Selected Pivotal Ideas, edited by P. Wiener, Charlottesville, VA: Charles Scribner's Sons/University of Virginia Library <http://xtf.lib.virginia.edu/xtf/view?docId=DicHist/uvaGenText/tei/DicHist2.xml> pp. 86-89.
- Gawenda, Michael 2006, 'Hatred of Bush misses broader point about this war of ideas', The Sydney Morning Herald, 11th September, p. 11.

- Geertz, Clifford 1980, 'Blurred Genres: The Refiguration of Social Thought', The American Scholar, 49, pp. 165-179.
- Genette, Gerard 1982, Figures of Literary Discourse, translated by A. Sheridan, New York: Columbia University Press.
- Gentner, Dedre and Jeziorski, Michael 1993, 'The shift from metaphor to analogy in Western science', in Metaphor and Thought, edited by A. Ortony, Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 447-480.
- Gerhardt, Uta 1980, 'Toward a Critical Analysis of Role', Social Problems, 27 (5), pp. 556-569.
- Gerould, Daniel, ed., 2000, Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.
- Gibbs, R. 1993, 'Process and products in making sense of tropes', in Metaphor and Thought, edited by A. Ortony, Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 252-275.
- Gibson, Joel 2006, 'Way Outside the Comfort Zone: Interview with Edward Albee', The Sydney Morning Herald, 12 June, p. 15.
- Gilbert, Martin 1964, Britain and Germany between the Wars, Burnt Mill: Longman.
- Gill, Jerry H. 1991, Merleau-Ponty and Metaphor, New Jersey, London: Humanities Press.
- Gilliam, John 2005, 'Resisting Surveillance', Social Text, 23 (2), pp. 71-83.
- Gilmore, Samuel 1988, 'Schools of Activity and Innovation', The Sociological Quarterly 29 (2), pp. 203-219.
- Gingrich-Philbrook, Craig 1997, 'The Unnatural Performative: Resisting Phenomenal Closure (Review Essay)', Text and Performance Quarterly, 17, pp. 123-133.
- Ginsberg, Benjamin 1986, 'The Domestication of Mass Belief', in The Captive Public, New York: Basic Books, pp. 32-58.
- Giraldi, (Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio) 1991/c1543, 'Prologue to Altile (excerpt)', in Sources of Dramatic Theory edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, p. 122.
- Gittins, Ross 2007, 'What politicians and economists don't get about conflicts of interest', The Sydney Morning Herald, 1 October, p. 19.
- Glazer, Nathan 1994, 'How Social Problems are Born', Public Interest, 115, pp. 31-45.
- GlobalSecurity.org, 2006, 'Divine Strake', in Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD): www.globalsecurity.org/wmd/ops/divine-strake.htm accessed 11/08/2006.
- GlobalSecurity.org, 2010, 'Current Conflicts', in The World at War: www.globalsecurity.org/military/world/war/ accessed 1/09/2010.
- Glucksberg, Sam 1989, 'Metaphors in Conversation: How Are They Understood? Why Are They Used?' Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 4 (3), pp. 125-143.
- Goatly, Andrew 1997, The Language of Metaphors, London and New York: Routledge.
- Goffman, Erving 1959, The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, New York: Anchor Books, Doubleday.
- Goffman, Erving 1963, Behavior in Public Places: Notes on the Social Organization

- of Gatherings, New York and London: The Free Press; Collier-Macmillan.
- Goffman, Erving 1974, Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience, New York: Harper and Row.
- Goffman, Erving 1976, Asylum, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books.
- Goffman, Erving 1983, 'The Interaction Order: American Sociological Association, 1982 Presidential Address', American Sociological Review, 48 (1), pp. 1-17.
- Goffman, Erving 1986/1974, Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience, Boston: Northeastern University Press.
- Gold, Steven 1989, 'Ethical Issues in Visual Field Work', in New Technology in Sociology: Practical Applications in Research and Work, edited by G. Blank, J. McCartney and E. Brent, New Brunswick and London: Transaction Publishers, pp. 99-112.
- Goldfarb, Jeffrey C. 2005, 'Why Theater? Sociological Reflections on Art and Freedom, and the Politics of Small Things', International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society, 19 (1/2), pp. 53-67.
- Goldhill, Simon and Robin Osborne, eds, 1999, Performance-culture and Athenian Democracy, Cambridge, UK; New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Goll, Yvan 1988/1922, 'Preface to Methusalem, the Eternal Bourgeois', in Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt, Oxford: Clarendon Press, pp. 174-175.
- Gollop, Leigh 2004, 'Distrustful, Disenchanted, Disengaged Citizens: Are Australians an Exception?' in Australasian Political Studies Association Conference, University of Adelaide: Paper presented 29th September-1 October 2004.
- Goodin, Robert E. and Hans-Dieter Klingeman, eds, 1996, A New Handbook of Political Science, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Goodman, Lizbeth 1996, 'Feminisms and theatres: cannon fodder and cultural change', in Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell, Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 19-42.
- Goodman, Lizbeth 2000, 'The Politics of Performativity in the Age of Replay Culture', in The Routledge Reader in Politics and Performance, edited by L. Goodman and J. De Gay, London: Routledge, pp. 288-294.
- Goodman, Nelson 1981, 'Metaphor as Moonlighting', in Philosophical Perspectives on Metaphor, edited by M. Johnson, Indianapolis: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 221-227.
- Graber, Doris 1981, 'Political Languages', in The Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders, Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, pp. 195-223.
- Graber, Doris 2004, 'Mediated Politics and Citizenship in the Twenty-First Century', Annual Review of Psychology, 55, pp. 545-571.
- Gran, Anne-Britt 2002, 'The Fall of Theatricality in the Age of Modernity', SubStance, 31 (2&3), pp. 251-264.
- Granberg, Donald 1993, 'Political Perception', in Explorations in Political Psychology, edited by S. Iyengar and W. McGuire, Durham and London:

- Duke University Press, pp. 70-112.
- Grant, Ruth and Robert Keohane 2005, 'Accountability and Abuses of Power in World Politics', The American Political Science Review, 99 (1), pp. 29-43.
- Green, David 1987, Shaping Political Consciousness: The Language of Politics in America from McKinley to Reagan, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
- Green, Jeffrey Edward 2004, 'Apathy: the Democratic Disease', Philosophy and Social Criticism, 30 (5-6), pp. 745-768.
- Green, Jeffrey Edward 2010, The Eyes of the People: Democracy in an Age of Spectatorship. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Griffiths, John 1967, 'On Telling People', in Essays on Reform, edited by B. Crick, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Griswold Jr., Charles 1999, Adam Smith and the Virtues of the Enlightenment, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gronbeck, Bruce E. 1990, 'Popular Culture, Media, and Political Communication', in New Directions in Political Communication: A Resource Book, edited by D. L. Swanson and D. D. Nimmo, Newbury Park, CA: Sage Publications, pp. 185-222.
- Grosser, Maurice 1951, The Painter's Eye, New York: Rinehart and Co.
- Grotowski, Jerzy 1968/1964, 'The Theatre's New Testament': Interview with Cislowski', in Towards a Poor Theatre, edited by J. Anderson and J. Barba, New York: Simon and Schuster.
- Grotowski, Jerzy 2008/1966, 'Towards the Poor Theatre', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA; Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 367-372.
- Gruen, Nicholas 2009, 'Cut-throat behaviour makes empathy flow', The Sydney Morning Herald, 10-12 April.
- Grun, Bernard 1991, The Timetables of History: a Horizontal Linkage of People and Events, 3rd ed., New York: Simon and Schuster (Touchstone).
- Guest, Katie Rose 2005, 'Review: Entertaining Politics: New Political Television and Civic Culture by Jeffrey Jones (2005)', The Journal of Popular Culture, 38 (6), pp. 1111-1112.
- Gurevitch, M. 1995, 'Taken by storm: The media, public opinions, and US foreign policy in the Gulf War', Public Opinion Quarterly, 9, pp. 445-447.
- Gusfield, Joseph 1963, 'A Dramatistic Theory of Status Politics', in Symbolic Crusade: Status Politics and the American Temperance Movement, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, pp. 166-188.
- Gustafsson, Ulla, and Stephen Driver 2005, 'Parents, Power and Political Participation: Sure Start, an Experiment in New Labour Governance', Social Policy and Administration, 39 (5), pp.528-543.
- Haakonssen, Knud 2002, 'Introduction', in Adam Smith: The Theory of Moral Sentiments, edited by K. Haakonssen, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. vii-xxiv.
- Habermas, Jurgen 1984/1981, The Theory of Communicative Action, translated by T. McCarthy, London: Heinemann.

- Habermas, Jurgen 1996, Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy, translated by W. Rehg, London: Polity Press.
- Hajer, Maarten 2005, 'Setting the Stage: A Dramaturgy of Policy Deliberation', Administration and Society, 36 (6), pp. 624-647.
- Hajer, Maarten, and Justus Uttermark 2008, 'Performing Authority: Discursive Politics After the Assassination of Theo Van Gogh', Public Administration, 86 (1), pp. 5-19.
- Hall, Edward 1966, The Hidden Dimension: Man's Use of Space in Public and Private, London, Sydney, Toronto: The Bodley Head.
- Hallward, Peter 2006, 'Staging Equality', New Left Review, 37 (January-February), pp. 109-129.
- Hamilton, Clayton 1910, The Theory of the Theatre and Other Principles of Dramatic Criticism, New York: Henry Holt and Company.
- Hamilton, Jennifer 2005, 'Comparative Democratic Institutions in Fourteen African Regimes: The Implications for Democratic Performance', Paper read at Annual Meeting, Midwestern Political Science Association, at Chicago.
- Hamilton, James R. 2006, 'Understanding Plays', in Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 221-243.
- Hammer, Chris 2007, 'Inside the machine', The Bulletin, 9 October, pp. 18-20.
- Hansen, Phillip 1993, Hannah Arendt: Politics, History and Citizenship. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.
- Hanson, Donald W. 1991, 'Thomas Hobbes on "Discourse" in Politics', Polity, 24 (2), pp. 199-226.
- Haraway, Donna 1988, 'Situated Knowledges: The Science Question in Feminism and the Privilege of Partial Perspective', Feminist Studies, 14 (3), pp. 575-599.
- Harper, Douglas 1998, 'An Argument for Visual Sociology', in Image-Based Research: A Sourcebook for Qualitative Research edited by J. Prosser, London: Falmer Press, pp. 24-41.
- Harris, Patricia 2000, 'Participation and the New Welfare', Australian Journal of Social Issues, 35 (4), pp. 279-300.
- Hart, William, Victor Ottati and D. Nathaniel 2011, 'Physical Attractiveness and Candidate Evaluation: A Model of Correction', Political Psychology, 32 (2), pp. 181-203.
- Harvey, Arlene 2001, 'A dramaturgical analysis of charismatic leader discourse', Journal of Organizational Change Management, 14 (3), pp. 253-265.
- Hastings, Arthur 1970, 'Metaphor in Rhetoric', Western Speech, 34 (3), pp. 181-194.
- Hauptmann, Emily 2004, 'A Local History of "The Political"', Political Theory, 32 (1), pp. 34-60.
- Havel, Vaclav 1996a, Acceptance of an Honorary Degree from the Academy of Performing Arts Prague Castle
http://old.hrad.cz/president/Havel/speeches/index_uk.html accessed 4/10/2007.
- Havel, Vaclav 1996b, 'Politics and Theatre', Project Syndicate www.project-

- sydnicate.org accessed 23/05/2006.
- Hay, Colin 2007, Why We Hate Politics, Cambridge: Polity.
- Heather, Gerard and Matthew Stolz 1979, 'Hannah Arendt and the Problem of Critical Theory', The Journal of Politics, 41 pp. 1-22.
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich 1962/1835, 'Tragedy as a Dramatic Art', edited by A. H. Paolucci, The Philosophy of Fine Art, New York: Harper Torchbooks, Harper and Row.
- Heidegger, Martin 1962, Being and Time, translated by J. Macquarrie and E. Robinson, London: SCM Press.
- Heidegger, Martin 1978/1947, 'Letter on Humanism', in Basic Writings from 'Being in Time' (1927) to 'The task of thinking' (1964), edited by D. F. Krell, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, pp. 217-265.
- Herrmann, Richard 2003, 'Image Theory and Strategic Interaction in International Relations', in Oxford Handbook of Political Psychology, edited by D. Sears, L. Huddy and R. Jervis, Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 285-314.
- Hershenon, Maurice 1999, Visual Space Perception: A Primer, Cambridge, Mass.: The MIT Press.
- Herst, Beth 2002, 'The Disembodied Eye', PAJ: A Journal of Performance and Art, 24 (1), pp. 122-126.
- Hesk, John 1999, 'The Rhetoric of Anti-rhetoric in Athenian Oratory', in Performance Culture and Athenian Democracy edited by S. Goldhill and R. Osborne, UK, New York: Cambridge University Press, pp. 201-230.
- Hesse, Mary 1995, 'Models, Metaphors and Truth', in From a Metaphorical Point of View: A Multidisciplinary Approach to the Cognitive Content of Metaphor, edited by Z. Radman, Berlin, New York: Walter de Gruyter, pp. 351-372.
- Hindson, Paul and Tim Gray 1988, Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics, Aldershot, UK; Brookfield, USA: Avebury.
- Hobbes, Thomas 1996/1651, Leviathan, edited by J. C. A. Gaskin, Oxford World's Classics, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hodge, R., and G. Kress 1988, Social Semiotics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hoggett, P. 1996, 'New Modes of Control in the Public Service', Public Administration, 74 (1), pp. 9-32.
- Hollan, Douglas 2008, 'Being There: On the Imaginative Aspects of Understanding Others and Being Understood', Ethos, 36 (4), pp. 475-489.
- Hollan, Douglas, and C. Jason Throop 2008, 'Whatever Happened to Empathy?: Introduction', Ethos, 36 (4), pp. 385-401.
- Holman, W.A. 1928, The Australian Constitution, Its Interpretation and Amendment, Sydney.
- Honderich, Ted, ed., 1995, The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Honig, Bonnie 1991, 'Declarations of Independence: Arendt and Derrida on the Problem of Founding a Republic', The American Political Science Review, 85 (1), pp. 97-113.
- Honzl, Jindřich 2008/1940, 'Dynamics of Sign in the Theatre', in Theatre in Theory

- 1900-2000: An Anthology*, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 249-257.
- Howard, Cosmo 2005, 'The Policy Cycle: A Model of Post-Machiavellian Policy-Making', Australian Journal of Public Administration, 64 (3), pp. 3-13.
- Howard, John 2004, 'Getting the Big Things Right: Goals and Responsibilities in a Fourth Term', Enterprise Forum, Hilton Hotel, Adelaide July 8: The Sydney Morning Herald www.smh.com.au/articles/2004/07/08/1089000281126.html?oneclick=true accessed 27/05/2005.
- Howe, John 2004, Language and Political Meaning in Revolutionary America, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Howe, Nicholas 1988, 'Metaphor in Contemporary American Political Discourse', Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 3 (2), pp. 87-104.
- Hume, David 1751/1751, 'An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals', in Enquiries Concerning Human Understanding and Concerning the Principles of Morals, edited by P. H. Nidditch, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Hume, David 2006/1739, A Treatise of Human Nature: Being an Attempt to introduce the experimental Method of Reasoning into Moral Subjects, Adelaide: eBooks@Adelaide <http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/h/hume/david/h92t/B2.3.3.html> accessed 26/04/2011.
- Hundert, E.J. 1994, The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hundert, E.J. and Paul Nelles 1989, 'Liberty and Theatrical Space in Montesquieu's Political Theory: the Poetics of Public Life in the Persian Letters', Political Theory, 17 (2), pp. 223-246.
- Hunt, Lynn 1984, Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution, Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.
- Ichheiser, Gustav 1990/1970, 'Appearances and Realities', in Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook, edited by D. Brisset and C. Edgley, New York: Aldine de Gruyter, pp. 425-431.
- Indurkha, Bibin 1992, Metaphor and Cognition: an Interactionist Approach, Dordrecht, Boston: Kluwer Academic Publishers.
- Jackson, Anthony and Shulamith Lev-Aladgem 2004, 'Rethinking Audience Participation: Audiences in Alternative and Educational Theatre', in Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames, edited by V. A. Cremona, P. Eversmann, H. van Maanen, W. Sauter and J. Tulloch, London, Amsterdam: International Federation for Theatre Research, pp. 212-214.
- James, Prince of Wales 2009/c1688, The Audience: EEBO: Early English Books Online <http://eebo.chadwyck.com> accessed February 2009.
- James, Wayne and Carol Mullen 2002, 'Advocating for a Social Roles Curriculum Framework at the Secondary School Level', Educational Studies, 28 (2), pp. 193-208.
- Jay, Martin 1997, 'Afterword: Reflective Judgments by a Spectator on a Conference That Is Now History', in Hannah Arendt and the Meaning of Politics, edited - by C. Calhoun and J. McGowan, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 338-349.

- Jenkins, Richard 2000, 'Categorization: Identity, Social Process and Epistemology', Current Sociology, 48 (3), pp. 7-25.
- Jervis, John 1998, Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization, Oxford: Blackwell.
- Jestrovic, Silvija 2000, 'Theatricalizing Politics/Politicizing Theatre', Canadian Theatre Review, 103, pp. 42-46.
- Johnson, James c1992, 'Revolutionary Audiences and the Impossible Imperatives of Fraternity', in Re-creating Authority in Revolutionary France, edited by B. Ragan and E. Williams, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, pp. 57-78.
- Johnson, Mark 1981, 'Introduction: Metaphor in the Philosophical Tradition', in Philosophical Perspectives on Metaphor, edited by M. Johnson, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 3-47.
- Johnson, Mark 1981, 'Selected Annotated Bibliography of Key Sources', in Philosophical Perspectives on Metaphor, edited by M. Johnson, Indianapolis: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 329-352.
- Jonas, Hans 1954, 'The Nobility of Sight', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, 14 (4), pp. 507-519.
- Justman, Stewart 1978, 'Political Fictions', College English, 39 (7), pp. 834-840.
- Kant, Emmanuel 1965, The Metaphysical Principles of Virtue, New York: Bobbs-Merrill.
- Kant, Immanuel 1991/1798, 'The Contest of Faculties', in Kant: Political Writings, edited by H. Reiss, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press; reproduced with permission by the Centre for History and New Media, Department of History and Art History, George Mason University, Fairfax Virginia, <http://chnm.gmu.edu/revolution/d/564/> accessed 16/04/2010, pp. 182-183.
- Kaplan, Stuart Jay 1990, 'Visual Metaphors in the Representation of Communication Technology', Critical Studies in Mass Communication, 7, pp. 37-47.
- Kariel, Henry S. 1970, 'Creating Political Reality', The American Political Science Review 64 (4), pp. 1088-1098.
- Kattwinkel, Susan 2003, 'Introduction', in Audience Participation: Essays on Inclusion in Performance, edited by S. Kattwinkel, Westport Connecticut, London: Praeger, pp. ix-xviii.
- Kelly, Paul 2006, 'How To Do Political Theory', Politics, 126 (1), pp. 47-53.
- Kennedy, John M., C.D. Green and John Vervaeke 1993, 'Metaphoric thought and devices in pictures', Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 8, pp. 243-255.
- Kenny, Kath 2004, 'Heaven forbid we let reality into politics', The Sydney Morning Herald, 26 July, p. 11.
- Kershaw, Baz 1992, The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention, London: Routledge.
- Kershaw, Baz 2001, 'Oh for unruly audiences! Or, patterns of participation in twentieth-century theatre', Modern Drama, 44 (2), pp. 133-156.
- Kershaw, Baz 2003, 'Curiosity or Contempt: On Spectacle, the Human, and

- Activism', Theatre Journal, 55 pp. 591-611.
- Kim, Joohan and Eun Joo Kim 2008, 'Theorizing Dialogic Deliberation: Everyday Political Task as Communicative Action and Dialogue', Communication Theory, 18, pp. 51-70.
- Kimball, Roger 2004, The Rape of the Masters: How Political Correctness Sabotages Art, California: Encounter Books.
- Kirby, Michael 1976a, 'Structural Analysis/Structural Theory', The Drama Review: TDR, 20 (4), pp. 51-68.
- Kirby, Michael 1976b, 'Theatrical Theory Issue', The Drama Review: TDR 20 (4), p. 1.
- Kirmayer, Laurence J. 1992, 'The Body's Insistence on Meaning: Metaphor as Presentation and Representation in Illness Experience', Medical Anthropology Quarterly New Series, 6 (4), pp. 323-346.
- Kitis, Eliza and Michalis Milapides 1997, 'Read it and believe it: How metaphor constructs ideology in news discourse: A case study', Journal of Pragmatics, 28, pp. 557-590.
- Klapp, Orin 1964, Symbolic Leaders: Public Dramas and Public Men, Chicago: Aldine.
- Klapp, Orin 1976, 'Dramatic Encounters', in Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield, New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 270-285.
- Klapp, Orin 1990, 'Book Review: The Drama of Social Life: Essays in Post-Modern Social Psychology by T.R. Young, 1990', Contemporary Sociology, 20 (4), pp. 630-632.
- Klar, Malte and Tim Kasser 2009, 'Some Benefits of Being an Activist: Measuring Activism and its Role in Psychological Well-Being', Political Psychology, 30 (5), pp. 755-777.
- Kleeman, Jenny 2011, 'Faking it', The Sydney Morning Herald, 16 April, pp. 29-30.
- Klein, Naomi 2000, 'Culture Jamming', in No Logo: No Space No Choice No Jobs, London: Flamingo, pp. 279-309.
- Kohn, Margaret 2010, 'Unblinking: Citizens and Subjects in the Age of Video Surveillance', Constellations, 17 (4), pp. 572-588.
- Komarovsky, Mira 1992, 'The Concept of Social Role Revisited', Gender and Society, 6 (2), pp. 301-313.
- Kovecses, Zoltan 2002, Metaphor: A Practical Introduction, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press.
- Krasner, David 2006, 'Empathy and Theater', in Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 255-277.
- Krasner, David 2008, 'Introduction', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.
- Krasner, David and David Saltz 2006, 'Introduction', in Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 1-15.
- Ku, Agnes S. 2004, 'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power,

- Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations', The China Quarterly, pp. 647-664.
- Kuhn, Thomas 1962, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, Chicago, University of Chicago Press.
- Lack, John and Jacqueline Templeton 1988, Sources of Australian Immigration History: 1901-1945, Melbourne: History Department, The University of Melbourne.
- Lagan, Bernard 2003, 'Jail bait', The Bulletin, 24 June, p. 13.
- Lakoff, George and Mark Johnson 1980, Metaphors we live by, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.
- Lakoff, George and Mark Johnson 1981, 'Conceptual Metaphor in Everyday Language', in Philosophical Perspectives on Metaphor, edited by M. Johnson, Indianapolis: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 286-325.
- Lakoff, George and Mark Turner 1989, More than Cool Reason: A Field Guide to Poetic Metaphor, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Lamb, Charles 2000/1811, 'On the Tragedies of Shakespeare considered with reference to their fitness for stage representation', edited by C. Lloyd, The Works of Charles Lamb: <http://www.angelfire.com/nv/mf/elia1/trag1.html> accessed 13/06/2011.
- Landau, Martin 1961, 'On the Use of Metaphor in Political Analysis', Social Research, 28 (3), pp. 331-353.
- Landau, Martin 1965, 'Due Process of Inquiry', American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (2), pp. 4-10.
- Landemore, Hélène 2007, 'Is Representative Democracy really Democratic? Interview of Bernard Manin and Nadia Urbinati', La vie des idées March 27, 2008 laviedesidees.fr accessed 1/7/2011.
- Landers, Kim 2005, 'Vanstone Snubbed by Aboriginal Leaders', in The World Today: Australian Broadcasting Corporation <http://www.abc.net.au/worldtoday/content/2005/s1381072.htm>] Tuesday, 31 May, accessed 27/6/2011.
- Landy, Robert J. 1991, 'The Dramatic Basis of Role Theory', The Arts in Psychotherapy, 18, pp. 29-41.
- Landy, Robert J. 2009, 'Drama as a means of preventing post-traumatic stress following trauma within a community', Journal of Applied Arts and Health, 1 (1), pp. 7-18.
- Lasswell, Harold 1964/c1954, 'Key Symbols, Signs and Icons', in Symbols and Values: An Initial Study: Thirteenth Symposium of the Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion, edited by L. Bryson et al., New York: Cooper Square Publications, pp. 199-204.
- Leary, M.R., and R.M. Kowalski 1990, 'Impression Management: A literature review and two-component model', Psychological Bulletin, 107 (1), pp. 34-47.
- Lee, Josephine 1999, 'Disciplining Theater and Drama in the English Department: Some Reflections on 'Performance' and Institutional History', Text and Performance Quarterly, 19, pp. 145-158.
- Leet, Martin 2008, 'Seeing Only the Prejudices of Others', The Brisbane Line, 01

- May 2008 www.brisinst.org.au/issue-details.php?article_id=205 accessed 14/05/2008.
- Leezenberg, Michel 2001, Contexts of Metaphor, Oxford, UK: Elsevier.
- Lehmann, John 2007, 'Talking the talk', The Bulletin, 18 September.
- Lentricchia, Frank 1983, Criticism and Social Change, Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Lessing, Gotthold 1994/1767-9, 'Hamburg Dramaturgy', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 107-126.
- Levin, Saul 1982, 'The Significance of Dialect Words in Greek Literature II, The Doric Tinge in Lyrical Passages of Attic Tragedy', General Linguistics, 22 (2), pp. 79-98.
- Levine, Donald, Ellwood Carter and Eleanor Miller Gorman 1976, 'Simmel's Influence on American Sociology I', American Journal of Sociology, 81 (4), pp. 813-844.
- Lewis-Beck, Michael and Mary Stegmaier 2011, 'Citizen forecasting: Can UK voters see the future', Electoral Studies, 30, pp. 264-268.
- Lijphart, A. 1994, 'Democracies: forms, performance and constitutional engineering', European Journal of Political Research, 25, pp. 1-17.
- Linklater, Andrew 2007, 'Distant Suffering and Cosmopolitan Obligations', International Politics, 44, pp. 19-36.
- Lithwick, Dahlia 2009, 'When Our Eyes Deceive Us', Newsweek, 23 March, p. 17.
- Little, Graham 1985, Political Ensembles: A Psychological Approach to Politics and Leadership, Melbourne: Oxford University Press.
- Lloyd, G.E.R. 1990, Demystifying Mentalities, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lobkowicz, Nicholas 1967, Theory and Practice: History of a Concept from Aristotle to Marx, Notre Dame, London: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Locke, John 1959/1671, An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (Draft A), New York: Dover Publications.
- Locke, John 1961/1690, Essay concerning Human Understanding, edited by J.W. Yolton, London and New York: Dent.
- Locke, John, 1967/1689, Two Treatises of Government, edited by P. Laslett, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lorca, Federico García 2008/1934, 'The Prophecy of Lorca', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 203-205.
- Lorek-Jezinska, Edyta 2002, 'Audience activating techniques and their educational efficacy', Applied Theatre Research 3 (4), Article 6.
www.gu.edu.au/centre/cpci/atr/journal/number4_article6.htm.
- Louw, P. Eric 2005, The Media and Political Process, London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications.
- Love, Nancy S. 2002, '"Singing for Our Lives": Women's Music and Democratic Politics', Hypatia, 17 (4), pp. 71-94.
- Love, Walter D. 1965, 'Edmund Burke's Idea of the Body Corporate: A Study in

- Imagery', Review of Politics, 27 (2), pp. 184-197.
- Lovejoy, Arthur O. 1936, The Great Chain of Being: A Study of the History of an Idea, New York: Harper Torchbooks/The Academy Library.
- Lu, Xing 1999, 'An ideological/cultural analysis of political slogans in Communist China', Discourse and Society, 10 (4), pp. 487-508.
- Lucaites, John Louis 1997, 'Visualizing "The People": Individualism vs, Collectivism in Let Us Now Praise Famous Men', The Quarterly Journal of Speech, 83 (3) pp. 269-288.
- Lumby, Catharine 2006, 'Public debate and moral posturing', The University of Sydney Gazette, Summer, pp. 28-29.
- Lunt, Neil 2005, 'A Note on Political Science and the Metaphorical Imagination', Politics, 25 (2), pp. 73-79.
- Luoma-aho, M. 2004, "'Arm" versus "pillar": the politics of metaphors of the Western European Union at the 1990-91 Intergovernmental Conference on Political Union', Journal of European Public Policy, 11 (1) 106-128.
- Lyman, Stanford M. and Marvin B. Scott 1975, The Drama of Social Reality, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Lyon, David 2007, Surveillance Studies: An Overview, Cambridge, UK: Polity
- MacDonald, Dwight 1957, 'The Responsibility of Peoples', in The Responsibility of Peoples and Other Essays in Political Criticism, London: Victor Gollancz Ltd.
- Machiavelli, Niccolò 1981/1513, The Prince, translated by G. Bull, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books.
- MacIntyre, Alasdair 1981, After Virtue: a Study in Moral Theory, London: Duckworth.
- Mackenzie, Adrian 2005, 'The Performativity of Code: Software and Cultures of Circulation', Theory, Culture and Society, 22 (1), pp. 71-93.
- MacKinnon, Ian Maxwell 2005, Elect Better Actors
http://www.guthrietheater.org/pdf/elect_better_actors.pdf accessed 12/05/2005, available from http://www.guthrietheater.org/pdf/elect_better_actors.pdf.
- Macquarie University 2005, 'Marketing students to ponder what being Australian means', Macquarie University News, July, p. 16.
- Macquarie Australian Encyclopedic Dictionary* 2006, Sydney, New South Wales: Macquarie University.
- Madison, D. Soyini 1999, 'Performing Theory/Embodied Writing', Text and Performance Quarterly, 19 (2), pp. 107-124.
- Mahon, James Edwin 1999, 'Getting your sources right: What Aristotle didn't say', in Researching and Applying Metaphor, edited by L. Cameron and G. Low, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 69-80.
- Makkreel, Rudolf 1996, 'Einfühlung', in The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy, edited by R. Audi, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, p. 219.
- Mallory, Anne 2003, 'Burke, Boredom, and the Theater of Counterrevolution', PMLA, 118 (2), pp. 224-238.
- Mally, Lynn 2000, Revolutionary Acts: Amateur Theater and the Soviet State, 1917-

- 1938, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
- Mangham, Iain L. and Michael A. Overington 1987, Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances, Chichester: John Wiley and Sons.
- Manin, Bernard 1997, The Principles of Representative Government, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Manning, Phil 1991, 'Drama as Life: The Significance of Goffman's Changing Use of the Theatrical Metaphor', Sociological Theory, 9 (1), pp. 70-86.
- Mansfield, Harvey Jr 1987, 'Edmund Burke', in History of Political Philosophy, edited by L. Strauss and J. Cropsey, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 687-709.
- Marcus, George 2002, The Sentimental Citizen: Emotion in Democratic Politics, Pennsylvania: The Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Marcus, George 2003, 'The Psychology of Emotion and Politics', in Oxford Handbook of Political Psychology, edited by D. Sears, L. Huddy and R. Jervis, Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 182-221.
- Marinetti, Filippo 2000/1913, 'The Variety Theatre', in Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 420-426.
- Marranca, Bonnie 1987, 'Performance World, Performance Culture', Performing Arts Journal, 10 (3), pp. 21-29.
- Marshall, David 1986, The Figure of Theater: Shaftesbury, Defoe, Adam Smith and George Eliot, New York: Columbia University Press.
- Marx, Karl 1978/1852, 'The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte', in The Marx-Engels Reader, edited by R. C. Tucker, New York and London: W.W. Norton & Company, pp. 594-617.
- Maserati 2007, 'The New Quattroporte Automatic', The Bulletin, 25 September p. 5.
- Maslan, Susan 2005, Revolutionary Acts: Theatre, Democracy, and the French Revolution, Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press.
- Masters, Roger and Denis Sullivan 1993, 'Nonverbal Behavior and Leadership: Emotion and Cognition in Political Information Processing', in Explorations in Political Psychology, edited by S. Iyengar and W. McGuire, Durham and London: Duke University Press, pp. 150-182.
- Maston, T. B. 1967, Biblical Ethics: A Guide to the Ethical Message of the Scriptures from Genesis through Revelation, Cleveland: World Publishing Co.
- Matheson, Craig 2005, 'A Perfect Penn', The Bulletin, 28 June, pp. 62-63.
- May, William F. 1980, 'Doing Ethics: The Bearing of Ethical Theories on Fieldwork', Social Problems, 27, pp. 358-370.
- Mazlish, Bruce 1994, 'The flâneur: from spectator to representation', in The Flâneur, edited by K. Tester, London and New York: Routledge, pp. 43-60.
- Mazrui, Ali A. 1975, The Political Sociology of the English Language: An African Perspective, The Hague, Paris: Mouton and Co.
- McAllister, Ian 1998, 'Civic education and political knowledge in Australia', Australian Journal of Political Science, 33, pp. 7-24.

- McClellan, Michael E. 2005, 'Staging the Revolution: Traces of Theatrical Culture in French Revolutionary Pamphlets', NLA News, May 2005 National Library of Australia <http://www.nla.gov.au/pub/nlanews/2005/may05/article4.htm>; accessed 28/05/2007.
- McDonald, John, Harriet Cunningham, Jason Blake, Joyce Morgan and George Palathingal 2011, 'Like Being There?' The Sydney Morning Herald, 18-19 June, pp. 6-8.
- McDonald, Lee C. 1969, 'Myth, Politics and Political Science', The Western Political Quarterly, 22 (1), pp. 141-150.
- McEvoy, Sean 2000, 'History and Power', in Shakespeare: the Basics, London, New York: Routledge.
- McFarland, Sam 2010, '(Review) The Political Psychology of Democratic Citizenship - edited by Eugene Borgida, Christopher M. Federico and John Sullivan (2009)', Political Psychology, 31 (6), pp. 961-964.
- McGee, Michael Calvin 1980, 'The "Ideograph": A Link between Rhetoric and Ideology', The Quarterly Journal of Speech, 66 (1), pp. 1-16.
- McGillivray, Glen James 2007, 'Theatricality, A Critical Genealogy', PhD Thesis, Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007, accessed 27/04/2008.
- McGraw, Kathleen 2003, 'Political Impressions: Formation and Management', in Oxford Handbook of Political Psychology, edited by D. Sears, L. Huddy and R. Jervis, Oxford: Oxford University Press, pp. 394-432.
- McKee, Alan 2005, The Public Sphere: An Introduction, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McKenna, Mark 1998, 'Metaphors of Light and Darkness: The Politics of 'Black armband' History', Melbourne Journal of Politics, 25, p. 67ff.
- McKenzie, Jon 2001, Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance, London, New York: Routledge.
- McQuail, Denis 1997, Audience Analysis, Thousand Oaks, London, New Delhi: Sage Publications.
- Mead, George Herbert 1962/1934, Mind, Self and Society from the Standpoint of Social Behaviorism, edited by C. W. Morris, Chicago, Ill: University of Chicago Press.
- Mead, George Herbert 2007/1934, 'The Self', in Classic Readings in Sociology, edited by E. Howard, Belmont, CA: Thomson, pp. 25-32.
- Melnick, M.J. 1993, 'Searching for Sociability in the Stands: A Theory of Sports Spectating', Journal of Sports Management, 7 (1), pp. 44-60.
- Menzel Jr, Emil 2010, 'To be buried in thought, lost in space, or lost in action: is that the question?' in Spatial Cognition, Spatial Perception, edited by F. Dolins and R. Mitchell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 75-96.
- Merelman, Richard M. 1976/1969, 'The Dramaturgy of Politics', in Drama in Life: The uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield, New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 285-301.

- Merleau-Ponty, Maurice 1964, Signs, translated by R. M. McCleary, Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.
- Metherell, Mark 2006, 'Voters believe Costello but still prefer Howard', The Sydney Morning Herald, 17 July, p. 1, 4.
- Meyerhold, Vsevolod Vaslov 1968, 'The Stylized Theatre', in Meyerhold on Theatre, edited by E. Braun, New York and London: Hill and Wang; Methuen.
- Meyerhold, Vsevolod Vaslov 1969/1908, 'The New Theatre Foreshadowed in Literature', in Meyerhold on Theatre, edited by E. Braun, New York and London; Hill and Wang; Methuen.
- Meyerhold, Vsevolod Vaslov 1974, Theaterarbeit 1917-1930, edited by R. Tietze, Munich: Hanser.
- Meyerhold, Vsevolod Vaslov 2008/1908, 'First Attempts at a Stylized Theatre', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford, Carlton: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 84-87.
- Meyrick, Julian 2003, 'The Limits of Theory: Academic versus Professional Understanding of Theatre Problems', New Theatre Quarterly (NTQ), 19 (3), pp. 230-242.
- Mill, John Stuart 1993/1861, 'On Liberty', in Utilitarianism, On Liberty, Considerations on Representative Government, edited by G. Williams, London, Vermont: J.M. Dent/Charles E. Tuttle, pp. 1-67.
- Miller, Eugene F. 1979, 'Metaphor and Political Knowledge', The American Political Science Review, 73 (1), pp. 155-170.
- Miller, Patrick 2011, 'The Emotional Citizen: Emotion as a Function of Political Sophistication', Political Psychology, 32 (4), pp. 537-728.
- Minnigerodé, Meade 1932, The Magnificent Comedy: Some Aspects of Public and Private Life in Paris from the Fall of Robespierre to the Coming of Bonaparte July 1794 to November 1799, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode.
- Mitchell, W.J.T. 1986, Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Monk, David 2009, 'In the Eye of the Beholder? A Framework for Testing the Effectiveness of Parliamentary Committees', in Parliamentary Studies Paper, Canberra: Parliamentary Studies Centre, Crawford School of Economics and Government, ANU College of Asia and the Pacific, www.parliamentarystudies.anu.edu.au.
- Montaigne, Michel Eyquem 1985/1580-8, Essais, Paris: Bordas.
- Morgan, Clare 2007, 'Trust me, I've just tidied up the back', The Sydney Morning Herald, Thursday 20 December, p. 14.
- Morgan, Joyce 2011, 'The Sound of No Hand Clapping', The Sydney Morning Herald, 5-6 February, pp. 6-7.
- Mori, Mitsuya 2002, 'The Structure of Theater: A Japanese View of Theatricality', SubStance #98/99, 31 (2&3), pp. 73-93.
- Morley, David 1980, The 'Nationwide' Audience: Structure and Decoding, London: British Film Institute.
- Morley, David 1981, 'The 'Nationwide' Audience: a Critical Postscript', Screen Education, 39, pp. 3-14.

- Moss, Stephen 2008, 'I'm just a butterfly', The Guardian, Friday 25 April 2008 www.guardian.co.uk/books/2008/apr/2025/culture.features/print accessed March 2011.
- Mount, Ferdinand 1972, The Theatre of Politics, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.
- Murray, Andrew 2011, 'Transparency, Scrutiny and Responsiveness: Fashioning a Private Space within the Information Society', The Political Quarterly, 82 (4), pp. 1-6.
- Murray, Julie 2004, 'Governing Economic Man: Joanna Baillie's Theatre of Utility', ELH, 70, pp. 1043-1065.
- Myers, C. Mason 1966, 'The Circular Use of Metaphor', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, 26 (3), pp. 391-402.
- Nanay, Bence 2006, 'Perception, Action, and Identification in the Theater', in Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 244-254.
- Natanson, Maurice 1976/1966, 'Man as an Actor', in Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield, New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 46-56.
- Nerlich, Brigitte, and David D. Clarke 2001, 'Mind, meaning and metaphor: the philosophy and psychology of metaphor in 19th-century Germany', History of the Human Sciences, 14 (2), pp. 39-61.
- Nerlich, Brigitte, Craig A. Hamilton and Victoria Rowe 2002, 'Conceptualising Foot and Mouth Disease: The Socio-Cultural Role of Metaphors, Frames and Narratives', Metaphorik.de 02/2002 www.metaphorik.de/journal/ accessed 28/07/2006.
- Nicoll, Allardyce 1962, The Theatre and Dramatic Theory, Westport, Connecticut:
 Greenwood Press, Publishers.
- Nicoll, Fiona Jean 2001, From Diggers to Drag Queens: Configurations of Australian National Identity, Annandale NSW: Pluto Press Australia.
- Nietzsche, Friedrich 1974/1887, The Gay Science, translated by W. Kaufmann, New York: Vintage Books.
- Nietzsche, Friedrich 2000/1872, 'The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music', in Theatre Theory Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 339-350.
- Nightingale, Andrea Wilson 2004, Spectacles of Truth in Classical Greek Philosophy: Theoria in its Cultural Context, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Nimmo, Dan D. 1974, Popular Images of Politics: A Taxonomy, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, Inc.
- Nimmo, Dan D. 1978, Political Communication and Public Opinion in America, Santa Monica, CA: Goodyear Publishing Company.
- Nimmo, Dan D. and Keith R. Sanders 1981, 'Introduction', in Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders, Beverly Hills, London: Sage Publications, pp. 11-36.

- Nisbet, Robert A. 1969, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Noble, Steven E. 2005, 'Mental Illness Through Popular Theater: Performing (In)Sanely', in Artistic Ways of Knowing: Expanded Opportunities for Teaching and Learning: New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education, www.josseybass.com/WileyCDA/WileyTitle/: A Print on Demand title from Jossey-Bass (John Wiley & Sons Inc), accessed March 2011.
- Noels, Kimberly, Peter A. Leavitt and Richard Clément 2010, "'To See Ourselves as Others See Us': On the Implications of Reflected Appraisals for Ethnic Identity and Discrimination', Journal of Social Issues, 66 (4), pp. 740-758.
- Nogales, Patti D. 1999, Metaphorically Speaking, Stanford, California: CSLI Publications.
- Norris, Pippa 2002, Democratic Phoenix: Reinventing Political Activism, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Obarzanek, Gideon 2003, 'Wanted: Ballet for a Contemporary Democracy', Program Notes, Sydney: Glen Street Theatre and Chunky Move.
- Ober, Josiah 1989, Mass and Elite in Democratic Athens: Rhetoric, Ideology, and the Power of the People, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- O'Brien, Patrick 1995, The People's Case: Democratic and Anti-Democratic Ideas in Australia's Constitutional Debate, Perth: Constitutional Press.
- O'Neill, Eugene 2008/1933, 'A Dramatist's Notebook', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 188-189 (excerpt).
- Orgel, Stephen 1975, The Illusion of Power: Political Theater in the English Renaissance, Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.
- Orr, Graeme 2010, 'From operating theatre to political theatre', Inside Story 22 April, <http://inside.org.au/from-operating-theatre-to-political-theatre> accessed 23/04/2010.
- Ortony, Andrew, ed., 1993/1979, Metaphor and Thought, 2nd ed., Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Orwell, George 1969/1946c, 'Politics and the English Language', in The English Language, Volume 2, edited by W. F. Bolton and D. Crystal, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- O'Toole, John 1992, The Process of Drama: Negotiating Art and Meaning, London, NY: Routledge.
- O'Toole, Therese, Michael Lister, Dave Marsh, Su Jones and Alex McDonagh 2003, 'Tuning out or left out? Participation and non-participation among young people', Contemporary Politics, 9 (1), pp. 45-59.
- Oxford English Dictionary* 1933, Vol XI, Oxford: Oxford at the Clarendon Press.
- Pagden, Anthony 2000, 'Introduction', in Facing Each Other: The World's Perception of Europe and Europe's Perception of the World, edited by A. Pagden, Aldershot: Ashgate/Variation, pp. xvii-xxxvi.
- Paine, Thomas 1961/1791-2, 'The Rights of Man', in Reflections on the Revolution in France and The Rights of Man: Edmund Burke and Thomas Paine, Garden City, New York: Dolphin Books, Doubleday and Company, pp. 267-515.

- Panagia, Davide 2003, 'Delicate Discriminations: Thomas Hobbes's Science of Politics', Polity, 36 (1), pp. 91-114.
- Parker-Oliver, Debra 2000, 'The social construction of the "dying role" and the hospice drama', Omega – The Journal of Death and Dying, 40 (4), pp. 19-38.
- Parry, Katy and Kay Richardson 2011, 'Political Imagery in the British General Election of 2010: The Curious Case of 'Nick Clegg'', The British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 1 (March), pp. 1-16.
- Pasquino, Pasquale 1991/1978, 'Theatrum politicum: The genealogy of capital - police and the state of prosperity', in The Foucault Effect: Studies in Governmentality, edited by G. Burchell, C. Gordon and P. Miller, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 105-118.
- Passow, Wilfried 1981, 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art', Poetics Today, 2 (3), pp. 237-254.
- Pateman, Trevor c1995, 'Art is not a Message', www.selectedworks.co.uk accessed September 2008.
- Pavis, Patrice 1998, 'Distance', in Dictionary of the Theatre: Terms, Concepts, and Analysis, Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Peacock, Ronald 1974/1957, The Art of Drama, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers.
- Pearce, Howard D. 1980, 'A Phenomenological Approach to the Theatrum Mundi Metaphor', PMLA, 95 (1), pp. 42-57.
- Pearsall, Judy, ed., 1999, The Concise Oxford Dictionary, Tenth ed., Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Pearson, Helen 2006, 'Dam project threatens living fossil', Nature 442 (20/7/2006), pp.232-233.
- Pepper, Phillip and Tess De Araugo 1985, 'The Kurnai of Gippsland', Vol 1, What did happen to the Aborigines of Victoria?, Melbourne: Hyland House.
- Pepper, Stephen C. 1966/1942, World Hypotheses: A Study in Evidence, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Pepper, Stephen C. 1973, 'Metaphor in Philosophy', in Dictionary of History of Ideas, edited by P. P. Wiener: Charles Scribners Sons.
- Perkins, David 1994, The Intelligent Eye: Learning to Think by Looking at Art, Santa Monica, CA: The J, Paul Getty Trust.
- Pharr, Susan and Robert Putnam 2000, 'A quarter-century of declining confidence', Journal of Democracy, 11 (2), pp. 5-26.
- Phelan, Peggy 1993, Unmarked: The Politics of Performance, New York: Routledge.
- Phelan, Peggy 1997, Mourning Sex, London: Routledge.
- Philp, Mark 2009, 'Delimiting Democratic Accountability', Political Studies, 57 (1), pp. 28-53.
- Pierce, David, R.A. Sydnie, Rainer Stratkotter and C. Kroll 2003, 'Social Concepts and Judgments: A Semantic Differential Analysis of the Concepts Feminist, Man and Woman', Psychology of Women Quarterly, 27 (4), pp. 338-347.
- Pirandello, Luigi 1992/1924, 'Each In His Own Way', in Pirandello: Collected Plays: Volume Three, edited by R. Rietty, Paris, London, New York: Calder Publications - Riverrun Press, pp. 61-134.

- Pitkin, Hannah Fenichel 1967, The Concept of Representation, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Pitkin, Hannah Fenichel 1973, 'The roots of conservatism: Michael Oakeshott and the denial of politics', Dissent, 20, pp. 496-525.
- Pitkin, Hannah Fenichel 2004, 'Representation and Democracy: Uneasy Alliance', Scandinavian Political Studies, 27 (3), pp. 335-342.
- Plato 1997/nd, Plato: Complete Works, edited by J. M. Cooper, Indianapolis/Cambridge: Hackett Publishing Company.
- Police 2009, Every Breath You Take, from LyricsFreak http://www.lyricsfreak.com/p/police/every+breath+you+take_20110051.html
 accessed 1/9/2009
- Porter, James I. 1986, 'Aristotle on Specular Regimes: The Theater of Philosophical Discourse', Pacific Coast Philology, 21 (1/2), pp. 20-24.
- Post, Emily 1922, 'The Ordeal by Ballroom', in Etiquette, New York: Funk and Wagnells, <http://www.gutenberg.org/files/14314/14314.txt>, accessed 2010.
- Postlewait, Thomas 2003, 'Theatricality and antitheatricality in renaissance London', in Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 90-126.
- Postman, Neil 1985, Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business, New York: Penguin.
- Pottenger, Marty 2001, 'How Do You Make Social Change?' Theater, 31 (3), pp. 62-93.
- Pritchard, David 2007a, 'Democracy and War: The Case Study of Ancient Athens', paper presented at the Inaugural Meeting, Sydney Democracy Forum, The University of Sydney, 29 June 2007.
- Pritchard, David 2007b, 'Welcome Speech of David Pritchard: Friday 25 May 2007', Inaugural Meeting, Sydney Democracy Forum, The University of Sydney, 25 May.
- Pusey, Michael and Paul Jones (in press), 'Media Consumption and Political Communication in Australia', in Third Report on Australian Social Attitudes, Canberra: ANU ePress.
- Quinn, Michael 2006, 'Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity', in Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz, Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 301-316.
- Rajaram, Prem Kumar 2003, 'The Spectacle of Detention: Theatre, Poetry and Imagery in the Contest over Identity, Security and Responsibility in Contemporary Australia', Asia Research Institute Working Paper Series No 7 (August) www.ari.nus.edu.sg.
- Rajchman, John 1988, 'Foucault's Art of Seeing', October, 44 (Spring), pp. 88-117.
- Rancière, Jacques 1999/1995, Disagreement: Politics and Philosophy, Translated by J. Rose, Minnesota, London: University of Minnesota Press.
- Rancière, Jacques 2001, 'Ten Theses on Politics', Theory and Event 5 (3).
- Rancière, Jacques 2006/2005, Hatred of Democracy, translated by S. Corcoran, London, New York: Verso.
- Rancière, Jacques 2009/2008, The Emancipated Spectator, translated by G. Elliott,

- London, New York: Verso.
- Rancière, Jacques 2010, Dissensus: On Politics and Aesthetics, translated by S. Corcoran, edited by S. Corcoran, London/New York: Continuum.
- Raphael, D.D. 2007, The Impartial Spectator: Adam Smith's Moral Philosophy, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Rarick, Jennifer 1999, 'Revolution as Theatre', in Fresh Writing, <http://www.nd.edu/~frswrite/snite/1999/Rarick.shtml> accessed 28 May 2007.
- Rasiah, Pareswary 2006, 'Does Question Time fulfil its role of ensuring accountability?' Discussion Paper 14/06, Democratic Audit of Australia, pp. 1-6.
- Reade, Catherine 2002, Interview with David Atkins: Powerhouse Museum www.phm.gov.au accessed 2003.
- Reddy, Michael J. 1993/1979, 'The conduit metaphor: A case of frame conflict in our language about language', in Metaphor and Thought, edited by A. Ortony, Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 164-201.
- Rehfeld, Andrew 2006, 'Towards a General Theory of Political Representation', The Journal of Politics, 68 (1), pp. 1-21.
- Reiger, Kerreen and Rhea Dempsey 2008, 'Performing Birth in a Culture of Fear: An embodied crisis of late modernity', Health Sociology Review 2008 eContent Management Pty Ltd, www.e-contentmanagement.com/ accessed 12/4/2008.
- Reinelt, Janelle 1994, 'Staging the Invisible: The Crisis of Visibility in Theatrical Representation', Text and Performance Quarterly, 14 (2), pp. 97-107.
- Reinelt, Janelle 1998, 'Notes for a Radical Democratic Theater: Productive Crises and the Challenge of Indeterminacy', in Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theatre, edited by J. Collier and J. S. Spencer, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 283-299.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2001, 'Performing Europe: Identity Formation for a "New" Europe', Theatre Journal, 53 (3), pp. 365-387.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2002, 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality', SubStance, 31 (2&3), pp. 201-215.
- Reverso Dictionary 2008 <http://dictionary.reverso.net/french-english/th%20c3%A9%20tralit%C3%A9> accessed 2/07/2008.
- Rhys, Jean 1982/1966, Wide Sargasso Sea, New York, London: W.W. Norton and Coy.
- Richards, I. A. 1936, The Philosophy of Rhetoric, London: Oxford University Press.
- Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991, Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789, Durham and London: Duke University Press.
- Richardson, Glenn W. Jr 2000, 'Pulp Politics: Popular Culture and Political Advertising', Rhetoric and Public Affairs, 3 (4), pp. 603-626.
- Ricoeur, Paul 1971, 'The Model of the Text: Meaningful Action considered as a Text', Social Research, 38 (3), pp. 529-561.
- Ricoeur, Paul 1976, 'Metaphor and Symbol', in Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning, Fort Worth, Texas: The Texas Christian University Press, pp. 45-69.
- Ricoeur, Paul 1977, The Rule of Metaphor, Toronto: University of Toronto Press.

- Ricoeur, Paul 1987/1975, The Rule of Metaphor: Multi-disciplinary Studies of the Creation of Meaning in Language, translated by R. Czerny, London: Routledge.
- Riggins, Stephen Harold 1993, 'Life as a metaphor: Current issues in dramaturgical analysis', Semiotica, 95 (1/2), pp. 153-165.
- Rigotti, Francesca 1995, 'The House as Metaphor', in From a Metaphorical Point of View: a Multidisciplinary Approach to the Cognitive Content of Metaphor, edited by Z. Radman, Berlin, New York: Walter de Gruyter, pp. 419-445.
- Riley, Mark 2003, 'PM denounces protesters for aiding Saddam', Sydney Morning Herald, 23 February.
- Roach, Joseph and Janelle Reinelt 1992, 'Introduction', in Critical Theory and Performance, edited by J. Roach and J. Reinelt, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Roberts, Vera Mowry 1971, The Nature of Theatre, New York, Evanston, San Francisco and London: Harper and Row.
- Robespierre, Maximilien 2004/1791, 'On the King's Flight; Speech given at the Jacobin Club, June 22, 1791', translated by M. Abidor, Creative Commons (Attribute and Share Alike) marxists.org <http://www.marxists.org/history/france/revolution/robespierre>, accessed 28 May 2007.
- Robespierre, Maximilien 2004/1792, 'Prospectus for "Le Défenseur de la Constitution"', Creative Commons (Attribute and Share Alike) marxists.org <http://www.marxists.org/history/france/revolution/robespierre/1792/defence.htm>, accessed 28 May 2007.
- Rochfort, Scott 2006, 'Winemaker hopes to avoid cellar glut', The Sydney Morning Herald, 27 March, p.19.
- Rokem, Freddie 2002, 'Witnessing Woyzeck: Theatricality and the Empowerment of the Spectator', SubStance #98/99, 31 (2&3), pp. 167-183.
- Rommel, Thomas 1997, 'A reliable narrator? Adam Smith may say so'. Paper read at Joint International Conference of the Association for Computers and the Humanities and the Association for Literature and Linguistic Computing, June 3-7, at Queens University Kingston Ontario Canada, June 3-7.
- Roosevelt, Theodore 1999-2011/1910, '"The Man in The Arena": Speech at the Sorbonne, Paris, France, 23 April 1910', in Almanac of Theodore Roosevelt, Chapultepec, Inc, <http://www.theodore-roosevelt.com/trpresident.html>.
- Rorty, Amélie Oksenberg 1992, 'The Psychology of Aristotelian Tragedy', in Essays on Aristotle's Poetics, edited by A. O. Rorty, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Rosen, Jay 2003, 'Governing Incorporates the Press and Vice Versa: The President's Secret Flight to Baghdad', in PressThink http://journalism.nyu.edu/pubzone/weblogs/pressthink/2003/12/03/bush_trip.html, accessed 23/05/2006.
- Rosenau, James N. 1995, 'Changing Capacities of Citizens, 1945-1995', in Issues in Global Governance: papers written for the Commission on Global Governance, London, Boston: Kluwer Law International in association with

- the Commission on Global Governance, pp. 1-57.
- Rosenthal, Debra C. 1982, 'Metaphors, Models, and Analogies in Social Science and Public Policy', Political Behavior, 4 (3), pp. 283-301.
- Ross, Marc Howard 2000/1997, 'Culture and Identity in Comparative Political Analysis', in Culture and Politics: A Reader, edited by L. Crothers and C. Lockhart, New York: St Martin's Press, pp. 39-70.
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 1968/1762, The Social Contract, or Principles of Political Right, translated by M. Cranston, Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Rozario, Philip, James Hunterlong and Nancy Marrow-Howell 2004, 'Role Enhancement or Role Strain', Research on Aging, 26 (4), pp. 413-429.
- Russell, Andrew 2007, 'Principles abandoned for the sake of power - please explain', The Sydney Morning Herald, 15 October, p. 13.
- Saccaro-Battisti, Giuseppa 1983, 'Changing Metaphors of Political Structures', Journal of the History of Ideas, 44 (1), pp. 31-54.
- Said, Edward 1993, Culture and Imperialism, London: Chatto and Windus.
- Salverson, Julie 1996, 'Performing Emergency: Witnessing, Popular Theatre, and the Lie of the Literal', Theatre Topics, 6 (2), pp. 181-191.
- Sartre, Jean-Paul 1995/1943, Being and Nothingness: An Essay on Phenomenological Ontology, London: Routledge.
- Sartre, Jean-Paul 2008/1960, 'Beyond Bourgeois Theatre', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 318-323.
- Saunders, Alan 2007, 'Thinking and judging with Hannah Arendt: an Interview with Max Deutscher', in Philosopher's Zone, Sydney: Australian Broadcasting Corporation www.abc.net.au/rn/philosopherszone/stories/2007/2060510.htm accessed 22/10/2007.
- Sauter, Willmar 2007, 'Introduction: Currents and Trends in Contemporary Scholarship', Nordic Theatre Studies, Advances in Reception and Audience Research, 19 (January), pp. 5-8.
- Scalmer, Sean 2002, Dissent Events: Protest, the media and the political gimmick in Australia, Sydney: University of New South Wales Press.
- Schachter, Hindy Lauer 1995, 'Reinventing government or reinventing ourselves: two models for improving government performance', Public Administration Review, 55 (6), pp. 530-537.
- Schechner, Richard 1988, Performance Theory, New York: Routledge.
- Schechner, Richard 1994, Environmental Theater: An Expanded New Edition including "Six Axioms for Environmental Theater", New York, London: Applause.
- Schechner, Richard 2002, Performance Studies: An Introduction, London and New York: Routledge.
- Schechner, Richard 2003, Performance Theory, London: Routledge.
- Scheler, Max 1970/1913, The Nature of Sympathy, translated by P. Heath, Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books.
- Schieffelin, Edward L. 1998, 'Problematizing Performance', in Ritual, Performance, Media, edited by F. Hughes-Freeland, New York and London: Routledge, pp.

- 194-207.
- Schiller, Friedrich 1994/1784, 'The Stage Considered as a Moral Institution', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 155-162.
- Schlegel, August Wilhelm 1994/1809-11, 'Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature 1809-11', in Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 189-205
- Schlossman, David A. 2002, Actors and Activists: Politics, Performance, and Exchange Among Social Worlds, New York and London: Routledge.
- Schmidt, Manfred 2002, 'Political performance and types of democracy: Findings from comparative studies', European Journal of Political Research, 41 (1), pp. 147-164.
- Schmitt, David 2003, 'Are men universally more dismissing than women? Gender differences in romantic attachment across sixty-two cultural regions', Personal Relationships, 10 (3), pp. 307-332.
- Schmitt, Natalie Crohn 1990, Actors and Onlookers: Theater and Twentieth-Century Scientific Views of Nature, Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.
- Schneider, Monica and Angela Bos 2011, 'An Exploration of the Content of Stereotypes of Black Politicians', Political Psychology, 32 (2), pp. 205-233.
- Schoch, Richard W. 1999, '"We Do Nothing but Enact History": Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past', Nineteenth-Century Literature, 54 (1), pp. 27-52.
- Schofield, Leo 2005, 'Ordure in the house', The Bulletin, 1 November, p. 61.
- Schon, Donald A. 1993/1979, 'Generative Metaphor: A perspective on problem-setting in social policy', in Metaphor and Thought, edited by A. Ortony, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 137-163.
- Scolnicov, Hanna 1987, 'Theatrical Space, Theatre Space, and The Theatrical Space Without', in Themes in Drama, 9, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Scott, James 1998, Seeing Like a State, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Scott, J. 2001, 'Status and Role: Structural Aspects', in International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences: Elsevier Science <http://www.sciencedirect.com.simsrad.net.ocs.mq.edu.au> accessed 20/10/2004.
- Scouten, A.H. 1962, The London Stage, Illinois: Illinois University Press.
- Selaiha, Nehad 1998, 'Making a spectacle', Al-Ahram Weekly On-line, 10-16 September, Issue 394, <http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/>.
- Sellars, Peter 1999, 'Peter Sellars - Cultural Activism in the New Century', ABCTV 19 August, www.abc.net.au/arts/sellars/text.htm.
- Semino, Elena 2001, 'Variation in Conventional Metaphoricity in a Particular Discourse Context', paper given at the Fourth Conference on Researching and Applying Metaphor, University of Manouba, Tunis 2001.
- Semino, Elena 2002, 'A sturdy baby or a derailing train? Metaphorical representations of the euro in British and Italian newspapers', Text, 22, pp. 107-139.
- Semino, Elena, and Michaela Maschi 1996, 'Politics is football: metaphor in the discourse of Silvio Berlusconi in Italy', Discourse and Society, 7, pp. 243-

- 269.
- Seneca 2000/63, Tranquillity of Mind, translated by W. B. Langsdorf, edited by M. Russo, Sophia Project: <http://www.molloy.edu/sophia/seneca/tranquility.htm>, accessed 2011.
- Sennett, Richard 1978, The Fall of Public Man, New York: Vintage Books.
- Sennett, Richard 1990, The Conscience of the Eye: The Design and Social Life of Cities, New York, London: W.W. Norton & Company.
- Sewell, Stephen 2007, 'The Forum', The Weekend Australian, 6-7 October.
- Seymour, Anna 1996, 'Culture and political change: British radical theatre in recent history', Theatre Research International, 21 (1), pp. 8-17.
- Shakespeare, William 1997/c1599, 'As You Like It', in The Norton Shakespeare, based on the Oxford Edition, edited by S. Greenblatt, W. Cohen, J. Howard and K. E. Maus, New York, London: W.W. Norton, pp. 1600-1657.
- Shakespeare, William 1997/1600, 'The Comical History of the Merchant of Venice, or Otherwise Called the Jew of Venice', in The Norton Shakespeare, based on the Oxford Edition, edited by S. Greenblatt, W. Cohen, J. Howard and K. E. Maus, New York, London: W.W. Norton, pp. 1081-1146.
- Shakespeare, William 1997/c1606, 'The Tragedy of Macbeth', in The Norton Shakespeare, based on the Oxford Edition, edited by S. Greenblatt, W. Cohen, J. Howard and K. E. Maus, New York, London: W.W. Norton, pp. 2564-2618.
- Shapiro, Michael 1985-6, 'Metaphor in the Philosophy of the Social Sciences', Cultural Critique, 2 (Winter), pp. 191-214.
- Sharpe, Robert 1995, 'Metaphor', in The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, edited by T. Honderich, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, p. 555.
- Sharkey, Jacqueline 1993, 'When pictures drive foreign policy', American Journalism Review, 15 (10), pp. 14-19.
- Shaw, George Bernard 1998/1911, 'Against the Well-Made Play', in Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt, Oxford: Clarendon Press, pp. 98-105.
- Shaw, George Bernard 2004/1909, 'How To Write a Popular Play', in The Essential Theatre, edited by O. Brockett and R. J. Ball, Belmont, CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.
- Sheehan, Paul 2006, 'The war is over: now to proceed on our terms', The Sydney Morning Herald, 11 September, p.11.
- Shields, Donald C. 1981, 'A Dramatistic Approach to Applied Communication Research: Theory, Methods and Applications', in Applied Communication Research: A Dramatistic Approach, edited by J. F. Cragan and D. C. Shields, Prospect Heights, Illinois: Waveland Press, Inc., pp. 5-13.
- Sibley, F.N. 1967, 'Seeking, Scrutinizing, and Seeing', in The Philosophy of Perception, edited by G. J. Warnock, London: Oxford University Press, pp. 127-149.
- Sidnell, Michael ed., 1991, Sources of Dramatic Theory, Vol, 1: Plato to Congreve, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sidnell, Michael ed., 1994, Sources of Dramatic Theory, Vol, 2: Voltaire to Hugo,

- Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sierz, Aleks 2002, 'Still In-Yer-Face? Towards a Critique and a Summation', New Theatre Quarterly, 18 (1), pp. 17-24.
- Simmel, Georg 1969/1908, 'Sociology of the Senses: Visual Interaction', in Introduction to the Science of Sociology, edited by R. Park and E. Burgess, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 356-361.
- Simmel, Georg 1971/1908, 'The Stranger', in On Individuality and Social Forms, edited by D. Levine, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, pp. 143-149.
- Simmel, Georg 1976/1912, 'The Dramatic Actor and Reality', in Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield, New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 57-61.
- Simon, Mayo 2003, The Audience and the Playwright: How to get the most out of live theatre, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.
- Skinner, Quentin 1974, 'Some Problems in the Analysis of Political Thought and Action', Political Theory, 2 (3), pp. 277-303.
- Skinner, Quentin 1996, Reason and Rhetoric in the Philosophy of Hobbes, Cambridge, New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Sless, David 1985, 'Whose Image?' in Communication in Government: Issues, Policies and Trends, edited by T. Smith, G. Osborne and R. Penman, Canberra: Canberra C.A.E., pp. 120-136.
- Slote, Michael 2010, Moral Sentimentalism, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, Adam 1976/1759, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, edited by D. D. Raphael and A. L. Macfie, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Smith, Adam 2002/1790, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, edited by K. Haakonssen, 6th edition, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Smith, C. Ray 1973, 'Introduction', in The Theatre Crafts: Book of Costume, edited by C. R. Smith, Emmaus, PA: Rodale Press.
- Smith, Denis 2009, 'Michael Ignatieff: Is he just acting?' The Globe and Mail, 11 September, <http://license.icopyright.net/user/viewFreeUse.act?fuid=MTM1NTg0NDU%3D> accessed 25/07/2011.
- Smith, Deborah 2011, 'Why one look will put the fear of god into you', The Sydney Morning Herald, Saturday 11 June, p. 9.
- Smith, David L., Richard Strier and David Bevington, eds, 1995, The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Smith, Graham 2009, 'Through a Glass, Darkly: The Vision and Visions of Political Theory', British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 11, pp. 360-375.
- Smith, Kevin, Christopher Larimer, Levente Littvay and John Hibbing 2007, 'Evolutionary Theory and Political Leadership: Why Certain People Do Not Trust Decision Makers', The Journal of Politics, 69 (2), pp. 285-299.
- Smith, Philip 2006/1875, 'Amphitheatrum', in A Dictionary of Roman and Greek

- Antiquities*, edited by W. Smith, London: John Murray, Lacus Curtius, http://penelope.uchicago.edu/Thayer/E/Roman/Texts/secondary/SMIGRA*/Ampitheatrum.html accessed 8/3/2007, pp. 82-90.
- Smith, Sean and David Ansen 2005, 'Picture Perfect: Interviews with Paul Giamatti, Kate Winslet, Hilary Swank, Leonardo DiCaprio, Jamie Foxx and Annette Bening', Newsweek, The Bulletin, 1 February, pp. 44-52.
- Smits, Stanley J. and Nivee Ezzat Ally 2003, '"Thinking the Unthinkable" - Leadership's Role in Creating Behavioral Readiness for Crisis Management', Competitiveness Review, 13 (1), pp. 1-24.
- Snow, Nancy 2000, 'Empathy', American Philosophical Quarterly, 37 (1), pp.65-78.
- Sobchack, Vivian c1999, 'Toward a Phenomenology of Nonfictional Film Experience', in Collecting Visible Evidence, edited by J. Gaines and M. Renov, Minneapolis, London: University of Minnesota Press, pp. 241-254.
- Soutphommasane, Tim 2011, 'A Compelling Social Experiment', The Australian, 2 July.
- Spenser, Edmund 1995/1596, The Faerie Qveene, etext prepared by R.S. Bear from The Complete Works in Verse and Prose of Edmund Spenser, London, Grosant 1882, ed, Renascence Editions, Oregon: University of Oregon <http://darkwing.uoregon.edu/%7Erbear/fqintro.html> accessed January 2011.
- Sperber, Dan 1975, Rethinking Symbolism, translated by A. L. Morton, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sperber, Dan and Deidre Wilson 1990, 'Rhetoric and Relevance', in The Ends of Rhetoric: History, Theory, Practice, edited by D. Wellbery and J. Bender, Stanford: Stanford University Press, pp. 140-155.
- Spillane, Robert 2005, 'Questionable Behaviour: Birth of a Third Lecture Series on the Mind', Look Magazine, Sydney: Art Gallery of NSW, July, pp. 11-13.
- Stanislavski, Constantin 1948/1936, An Actor Prepares, New York: Theatre Arts.
- Starratt, Robert J. 1993, The Drama of Leadership. London and Washington, DC: The Falmer Press.
- States, Bert O. 1994, The Pleasure of the Play, Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- States, Bert O. 1996, 'Performance as Metaphor', Theatre Journal, 48 (1), pp. 1-26.
- Steen, Gerard 1999, 'Metaphor and discourse: Towards a linguistic checklist for metaphor analysis', in Researching and Applying Metaphor, edited by L. Cameron and G. Low, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 81-104.
- Stein, Gertrude 1995/1935, 'Plays', in Last Operas and Plays, edited by C. Van Vechten, Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, pp. xxix-lii.
- Steinberger, Peter 1993, The Concept of Political Judgment, Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Stellardi, Guiseppe 2000, Heidegger and Derrida on Philosophy and Metaphor: Imperfect Thought, Amherst, NY, Humanity Books.
- Stocking, George W. Jr 1987, Victorian Anthropology, New York, London: The Free Press/Collier Macmillan Publications.
- Stoker, Gerry 2006, Why Politics Matters: Making Democracy Work, Hampshire and New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Stolle, Dietlind and Marc Morjé Howard 2008, 'Civic Engagement and Civic

- Attitudes in Cross-National Perspective: Introduction to the Symposium', Political Studies, 56, pp. 1-11.
- Strand, Palma 2003, 'Forced to bowl alone? (Downsizing Democracy: How America Sidelined Its Citizens and Privatized Its Public) (Review)', The Nation, 276 (5), p. 25.
- Street, John 2004, 'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation', The British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 6, pp. 435-452.
- Sturken, Marita and Lisa Cartwright 2003, Practices of Looking: an Introduction to Visual Culture, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Styan, J.L. 1975, Drama, Stage and Audience, London: Cambridge University Press.
- Sutherland, Keith 2010, 'Ashes to Ashes and the Theatre of Democracy', openDemocracy 4 May, <http://www.opendemocracy.net/ourkingdom/keith-sutherland/ashes-to-ashes-and-theatre-of-democracy>, accessed 25/04/2010.
- Szinovacz, Maximilian and Adam Davey 2004, 'Honeymoons and Joint Lunches: Effects of Retirement and Spouse's Employment on Depressive Symptoms', Journals of Gerontology Series B: Psychological Sciences and Social Sciences, 59B (5), pp. 233-245.
- Tait, Peta 1994, Converging Realities: Feminism in Australian Theatre, Sydney: Currency Press.
- Taplin, Oliver 1999, 'Spreading the Word Through Performance', in Performance Culture and Athenian democracy, edited by S. Goldhill and R. Osborne, Cambridge, New York: Cambridge University Press, pp. 33-57.
- Taverniers, Miriam 2002, Metaphor and Metaphorology: A selective genealogy of philosophical and linguistic conceptions of metaphor from Aristotle to the 1990s, Gent: Academia Press.
- Taviani, Ferdinando 1981, 'Da Dorat a Diderot, da Diderot a Dorat, un'indagine sulla questione dell'attore nel settecento', Quaderni di teatro, 11, pp. 73-106.
- Taviani, Ferdinando 2005, 'Views: The view of the performer and the view of the spectator', in A Dictionary of Theatre Anthology: The Secret Art of the Performer, edited by E. Barba and N. Savarese, London: Routledge, pp. 288-299.
- Taylor, Craig 2002, Sympathy: A Philosophical Analysis, Hampshire and New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tchir, Trevor 2009, 'Who's on stage? Performative disclosure in Hannah Arendt's account of political action', UMI Proquest Dissertations and Theses <http://gradworks.umi.com/NR/51/NR51253.html> accessed 20/11/2010.
- Tester, Keith 1998, 'Bored and Blasé: Television, the Emotions and Georg Simmel', in Emotions in Social Life: Critical Themes and Contemporary Issues, edited by G. Bendelow and S. Williams, London: Routledge.
- Thayer, Bill 2005, 'Roman amphitheatres', in LacusCurtius, Chicago: University of Chicago, <http://penelope.uchicago.edu/Thayer/E/Gazetteer/Periods/Roman/Topics/Architecture/Structures/amphitheatres/home.html>, accessed 2008.
- The Bulletin* 2004, 'Newsmakers 2004: Your 15 Minutes Are Up', 14 December.

- The Sydney Morning Herald* 2003, 'Refugee theatre: absurd and ugly', Editorial: 7 November.
- Thompson, Isabelle 2004, 'Sex Differences and Technical Communication: A Perspective from Social Role Theory', Journal of Technical Writing and Communication, 34 (3), pp. 217-233.
- Thyagarajan, Mrinalini 2002, 'Popular Theater, Development and Communication', Carolina Papers: International Development, 8 (Spring).
- Tichy, N.M. and M.A. Devanna 1986, The Transformational Leader, New York: John Wiley and Sons.
- Tiffen, Rodney 2010, 'The centre cannot hold', Inside Story 29 October <http://inside.org.au/the-centre-cannot-hold/print/> accessed 19/11/2010.
- Tilbury, Clare 2006, 'Accountability via Performance Measurement: The Case of Child Protection Services', Australian Journal of Public Administration, 65 (3), pp. 48-61.
- Tilly, Charles 2008, Contentious Performances, New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Todorov, Tzvetan 1982/1977, Theories of the Symbol, translated by C. Porter, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press.
- Tompkins, Joanne 1995, 'The story of rehearsal never ends', Canadian Literature, 144, pp.142-162.
- Topham, Gwyn 2006, 'And today's lesson is how to revive a theatre company', The Sydney Morning Herald, 3 June, p. 13.
- Torey, Zoltan 2004, Out of Darkness: A Memoir, Sydney: Picador.
- Tovey, Josephine 2009, 'Island in the Mainstream', The Sydney Morning Herald, 25-26 February, p. 13.
- TripleM/Getty Images 2010, 'Ashes 2010, Gabba', in Say It Like You Mean It with These Funny Cricket Banners: <http://www.triplem.com.au/melbourne/sport/cricket/photos/banners>, accessed August 2011.
- Trollope, Anthony 1850, La Vendée London: Henry Colburn
- Tronstad, Ragnhild 2002, 'Could the World become a Stage? Theatricality and Metaphorical Structures', SubStance, 31 (2-3), pp. 216-224.
- Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006, 'Introduction to Theatre--the online course', Northern Virginia Community College <http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm>, accessed 2/3/2007.
- Turner, Victor 1974, Dramas, Fields and Metaphors: Symbolic Action in Human Society, Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.
- Turner, Victor 1982, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play, New York: Performing Arts Journal Press.
- Turner, Victor 1988, 'The Anthropology of Performance', in The Anthropology of Performance, New York: PAJ Publications, pp. 72-98.
- Tusa, John 2005a, 'David Hare: Interview with John Tusa', in Interviews exploring the creative process: The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/hare_transcript.shtml

- accessed 2/04/2007.
- Tusa, John 2005b, 'Peter Hall: Interview with John Tusa', in Interviews exploring the creative process: The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/hall_transcript.shtml,
accessed 2/04/2007.
- Ubersfeld, Anne 1982, 'The Pleasure of the Spectator', Modern Drama, 25 (1), pp. 127-139.
- Union of International Associations (UIA) 1994, 'Governance Through Metaphor Project', in Encyclopedia of World Problems and Human Potential, Brussels: Union of International Associations (UIA) <http://www.uia.org/metaphor/metacom.php> accessed May 2006.
- Urbinati, Nadia 2005, 'Continuity and Rupture: The Power of Judgment in Democratic Representation', Constellations, 12 (2), pp. 194-222.
- Urry, John 2000, 'Metaphors', in Sociology beyond Societies: Mobilities for the twenty-first century, London and New York: Routledge, pp. 21-48.
- Valentine, Kristin Bervig 2002, 'Yaqui Easter Ceremonies and the Ethics of Intense Spectatorship', Text and Performance Quarterly 22 (4), pp.280-296.
- Valverde, Mariana 2011, 'Seeing Like a City: The Dialectic of Modern and Premodern Ways of Seeing in Urban Governance', Law & Society Review, 45 (2), pp. 277-312.
- Van Dyke, Vernon 1960, Political Science: A Philosophical Analysis, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press.
- Van Onselen, Peter 2008, 'Stump Cam', The Bulletin, 22 January, pp. 56-57.
- Van Teeffelen, Toine 1994, 'Racism and metaphor: the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in popular literature', Discourse and Society, 5, pp. 381-405.
- Van Zoonen, Liesbet 2004, 'Imagining the Fan Democracy', European Journal of Communication, 19 (1), pp. 39-52.
- Van Zoonen, Liesbet 2005, Entertaining the Citizen: When Politics and Popular Culture Converge, Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
- Vervaeke, John and John M. Kennedy 1996, 'Metaphors in Language and Thought: Falsification and Multiple Meanings', Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 11(4) (4), pp. 273-284.
- Vicari, Patricia 1993, 'Renaissance Emblematica', Metaphor and Symbolic Activity, 8 (3), pp. 153-168.
- Vickers, Brian 1971, 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery', Studies in the Literary Imagination, 4 (1), pp. 189-226.
- Vickers, Margaret, and Alexander Kouzmin 2001, 'Resilience' in Organizational Actors and Rearticulating 'Voice', Public Management Review, 3 (1), pp. 95-119.
- Vico, Giambattista 1968/1744, The New Science of Giambattista Vico, translated by T. G. Bergin and M. H. Fisch, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Vidal, Gore 1973, 'Barry Goldwater: A Chat', in Homage to Daniel Shays: Collected Essays, 1952-1972, New York: Random House.
- Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet 1901/1751, 'Curiosity', in Philosophical Dictionary, Vols III-VII, The Works of Voltaire, A Contemporary Version, New York:

- E.R. DuMont, The Online Library of Liberty, http://oll.libertyfund.org/Texts/Voltaire_0265/Works accessed 2/07/2005.
- Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet 1994/1736, 'Preface to L'enfant prodigue', excerpt reprinted in M. Sidnell ed., 1994, Sources of Dramatic Theory, Vol, 2: Voltaire to Hugo, Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 27-30.
- Voltaire, Francois Marie Arouet 2009/1764, 'Figured - Figurative', in A Philosophical Dictionary, Adelaide SA: eBooks@Adelaide, The University of Adelaide Library <http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/v/voltaire/dictionary/chapter211.html>, accessed 5/4/2011.
- von Rosador, Kurt Tetzeli 1988, 'Metaphorical Representations of the French Revolution in Victorian Fiction', Nineteenth-Century Literature, 43 (1), pp. 1-23.
- Vromen, Ariadne 2003, '“People Try to Put Us Down ...”: Participatory Citizenship of ‘Generation X’', Australian Journal of Political Science, 38 (1), pp. 79-99.
- Waites, James 2006, 'Theatre', The Bulletin, 7 February, p. 65.
- Wallace Ingraham, Patricia 2005, 'Performance: Promises to Keep and Miles to Go', Public Administration Review, 65 (4), pp. 390-395.
- Wallace, Tim 2003, 'The innocence of student protesters - they can't see their puppet strings', On Line Opinion March 31 www.onlineopinion.com.au, accessed March 2003.
- Walton, Kendall 1990, Mimesis and Make-Believe: On the Foundations of the Representational Arts, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Walzer, Michael 1992, 'On the Role of Symbolism in Political Thought', in The Self and the Political Order, edited by T. B. Strong, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 64-76.
- Warden, James 1995, 'Parliament, Democracy and Political Identity', in Constitutions, Rights and Democracy: Past, Present and Future, Papers on Parliament No 25, June, Parliament House Canberra: Department of the Senate, pp. 47-62.
- Warhurst, John 2008, 'Limits to reining in the lobbyists', Australian Policy Online, 18 January, http://www.apo.org.au/webboard/print-version.chtml?filename_num=190212, accessed January 2008.
- Warnock, G.J. 1967, 'Introduction', in The Philosophy of Perception, edited by G. J. Warnock, London: Oxford University Press, pp. 1-7.
- Warren, Karen J. 1990, 'The Power and Promise of Ecological Feminism', Environmental Ethics, 12 (Summer), pp. 125-146.
- Wasserman, Eric 1947, 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting', Journal of English and Germanic Philology, 46, pp. 264-272.
- Way, Eileen Cornell 1991, Knowledge Representation and Metaphor, Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Kluwer Academic Publishers.
- Weber, Max 1946/1917, 'The Sociology of Charismatic Authority', in From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, edited by H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills, New York: Oxford University Press, pp. 245-252.
- Weber, Max 1978/1914, 'Charisma and its Transformation', in Economy and Society:

- An Outline of Interpretive Sociology*, edited by G. Roth and C. Wittich, Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press, pp. 111-1157.
- Weber, Max 1978/1914, 'Charismatic Authority', in Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, edited by G. Roth and C. Wittich, Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press, pp. 241-245.
- Weber, Samuel 2004, Theatricality as Medium, New York: Fordham University Press.
- Wehle, Philippa 2002, 'Live Performance and Technology: The Example of Jet Lag', PAJ: A Journal of Performance and Art, 24 (1), pp. 133-139.
- Wehrfritz, George and B.J. Lee 2003, 'Theater of the Absurd', The Bulletin, 7 October, p. 57.
- Weisinger, Herbert 1964, 'Theatrum Mundi: Illusion as Reality', in The Agony and the Triumph: Papers on the Use and Abuse of Myth, Michigan: Michigan State University Press, pp. 58-70.
- Welbourne, Theresa, Diane Johnson and Amir Erez 1998, 'The Role-Based Performance Scale: Validity Analysis of a Theory-Based Measure', The Academy of Management Journal, 41 (5), pp. 540-555.
- Werry, Margaret 2005, '"The Greatest Show on Earth": Political Spectacle, Spectacular Politics, and the American Pacific', Theatre Journal, 57 (3), pp. 355-382.
- West, William 1999, 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe', in Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall, Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287.
- Wheelwright, Philip 1964, The Burning Fountain, Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- White, Stephen 1994, Edmund Burke: Modernity, Politics, and Aesthetics, Thousand Oaks, London, New Delhi: Sage Publications.
- Whitebrook, Maureen 1996, 'Taking the narrative turn: What the novel has to offer political theory', in Literature and the Political Imagination, edited by J. Horton and A. Baumeister, London: Routledge, pp. 32-52.
- Whitman, Walt 1956, 'Sparkles From the Wheel', in The Penguin Book of English Verse, edited by J. Hayward, London: Penguin Books, pp. 360-361.
- Whitman, Walt 2008/1855, 'Leaves of Grass', The Project Gutenberg EBook <http://www.gutenberg.org/files/1322/1322-h/1322-h.htm> accessed 4/8/2011.
- Whitman, Walt 2008/1884, 'Election Day, November, 1884', in Leaves of Grass, edited by E. Folsom and K. Price, The Walt Whitman Archive, www.whitmanarchive.org/published/LG/1891/poems/329 accessed 29/05/2008.
- Whitman, Walt 2008/c1892, Democratic Vistas, Virginia: American Studies at the University of Virginia <http://xroads.virginia.edu/~hyper/whitman/vistas/vistas.html> accessed 6/6/2008.
- Wilde, Oscar 2000-2010/1891, The Critic as Artist: with Some Remarks upon the Importance of Doing Nothing, The Literature Network, Jalic inc.,

- www.online-literature.com/wilde/1305 accessed 12/01/2010.
- Wilde, Oscar 2008/1889, 'The Decay of Lying: An Observation', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Oxford, Malden, MA: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 47-50.
- Wilder, Thornton 2008/1941, 'Some Thoughts on Playwrighting', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 258-265.
- Willett, John 1959, The Theatre of Bertold Brecht, London: Methuen.
- Williams, Carol 2001, 'Soaps reach places politicians and doctors can't touch', The Sydney Morning Herald, 27 April.
- Williams, Raymond 1968, Drama in Performance, Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Williams, Raymond 1976, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society, Croom Helm: Fontana.
- Williams, Raymond 1991/1975, 'Drama in a Dramatized Society', in Writing in Society, London and New York, Verso, pp. 11-21.
- Williams, Tennessee 2008/1951, 'The Timeless World of the Play', in Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner, Malden, MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 274-277.
- Willis, Ken 2002, Making Sense of Humour: Some Pragmatic and Political Aspects, London Metropolitan University http://www.pragmaticshumour.net/makingsenseofhumour/2.3theatrical_space.htm accessed 10/10/2010.
- Wilshire, Bruce 1982, Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor, Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Wilson, Edwin and Alvin Goldfarb 2004, Living Theatre: a History, 4th Edition, Boston: McGraw Hill.
- Wilson, John 1990, Politically Speaking: The Pragmatic Analysis of Political Language, Oxford and Massachusetts: Basil Blackwell.
- Wispé, Lauren 1986, 'The Distinction Between Sympathy and Empathy: to Call Forth a Concept, a Word is Needed', Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 50 (2), pp. 314-321.
- Wolin, Sheldon 1996, 'Fugitive democracy', in Democracy and Difference: Contesting the Boundaries of the Political, edited by S. Benhabib, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Wollheim, Richard 1987, Painting as an Art, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Woodard, Amanda 2009, 'Game Faces', The Sun Herald Magazine, 5 April, pp. 17-19.
- Woodruff, Paul 2008, The Necessity of Theater: The Art of Watching and Being Watched, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Wright, Elizabeth 1996, 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance', in Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell, Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 175-199.
- Wright, Geoffrey, dir., 2003, 'Romper Stomper', Australia: Roadshow Entertainment.
- Xenos, Nicholas 2001, 'Momentary democracy', in Democracy and Vision: Sheldon

- Wolin and the Vicissitudes of the Political*, edited by A. Botwinick and W. E. Connolly, Princeton: Princeton University Press, pp. 25-38.
- Yang, Kaifeng and Marc Holzer 2006, 'The Performance-Trust Link: Implications for Performance Measurement', Public Administration Review, 66 (1), pp.114-126.
- Yelland, H.L., S.C. Jones and K.S.W. Easton 1959, A Handbook of Literary Terms, 3rd ed., Sydney: Angus and Robertson.
- Young, Iris Marion 1990, Justice and the Politics of Difference, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Young, Sally 2001, 'Why Australians hate politicians: exploring the new public discontent', in For the People: Reclaiming our government, Labor Essays 2001, edited by D. Glover and G. Patmore: Pluto Press, pp. 171-182.
- Zachariah, Richard 2006, 'Colourful characters take centre stage; Theatre at the Track', The Sunday Telegraph, 2 July, pp. 47-48.
- Zashin, Elliot and Phillip C. Chapman 1974, 'The Uses of Metaphor and Analogy: Toward a Renewal of Political Language', Journal of Politics, 36 (2), pp. 290-326.
- Zeami 2000, 'On the Art of the Nō Drama', in Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 96-107.
- Zerubavel, Eviatar 1991, The Fine Line: Making Distinctions in Everyday Life, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Zinken, Jorg 2003, 'Ideological imagination: intertextual and correlational metaphors in political discourse', Discourse and Society, 14 (4), pp. 507-523.
- Zola, Emile 2000/1873, 'Le naturalisme au théâtre ', in Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel, edited by D. Gerould, New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books, pp. 353-357.

Appendix A

Etymology – Theatre and Related Terms

List 1	Common ‘theatre’ terms – brief etymological history
Table 1	The word ‘theatre’: a brief etymological history of its meanings and derivations in English

The tables summarise a review of the original usage of so-called theatre terms in English. The purpose of the study was to establish whether or not the terms should be considered theatre metaphors.

Referencing: references for the etymological table are provided in endnotes. List 1 uses author/year in text referencing. A bibliography is provided.

Appendix A List 1: Theatre-related terms - etymology

A. From life to theatre

- Act

First recorded use in Chaucer's House of Fame, about 1380, borrowed from Old French acte, from Latin actus, meaning 'a doing' and actum meaning 'a thing done', both from agere, the Greek word for do, set in motion, drive. (Similarly for 'action') (Barnhart 1998: 10).

- Actor

First appeared in English in the Wycliffe Bible in 1384, borrowed from Latin actor, meaning an agent or doer. The Romans used the word histrion to mean what we now call a (male) stage performer, or cōmoedus or tragoedus if distinguishing between comic or tragic actors. Female actors were called mima. The Greeks used the word mimos for imitator or actor, from their words for to imitate (mīmēis-thai) and imitative (mīmētikós), also hypokritai

From life to theatre: 1581: As one who acts in plays, actor was not used in English until 1581 (in Sidney's Defence of Poesie). The word actress first appeared in 1589 and meant a female 'doer' or agent, not a stage performer. Female stage performers were also called actors until 1666. (Barnhart 1998: 10).

- Agent

First recorded English use in 1471 in Ripley's The Compend of Alchemy, probably borrowed from Latin agentum, from agere, to do, act, lead, drive and from the Greek ágein, to lead. (Barnhart 1998: 19).

- Agency

First recorded use in English in 1658, borrowed from the Latin agere. This word was 'in the air' in cultivated circles in mid-17th Century Europe. (Barnhart 1998: 19).

- Audience

Appeared in English around 1387 from the Anglo-French audience, from Old French, a learned borrowing from the Latin audientia, meaning a hearing, itself taken from audire, to hear, and cognate with the Greek aiein, to hear (Barnhart 1998: 64). It is as likely to have arisen from accounting processes, which were carried out verbally because so few could write, or from legal proceedings in which appellants had a right to be heard. When it appeared in English, the word meant 'an opportunity to be heard', only later coming to mean 'a group of listeners' (Pearsall 1999: 64). Consequently its use in relation to theatre was probably initially metaphoric, and could only have arisen when it became both possible and important to hear the words being spoken by the performers. As late as 1877, a standard Latin dictionary for schools, provided no connection between audience and theatre (Chambers and Chambers 1877). Plays were spectaculum or fabula, attended by spectators.

- Cast:
has long meant ‘to throw’, and is still used in this sense today. Its theatrical meaning derives from C17th, as so many theatrical terms do, and is considered a ‘special use’ of its original meaning (Pearsall 1999: 219).
- Character:
initially meant mark or symbol. Came into English around C14th. Dryden applied the term to mean ‘a person in a play or book’ in 1664 (Barnhart 1988: 160).
- Burlesque
Literary or dramatic parody 1667, from earlier adjective (1656) meaning droll or jocular, borrowed from French. The verb ‘to burlesque’ meaning to parody or caricature dates from 1676. The modern sense of a variety show frequently with striptease acts appeared in 1870 in American English (Barnhart 1988: 127)
- Drama
From the Greek word drama meaning play, action, deed, from drân meaning to do, act or perform. First came into English as drame as a term for play or action in 1515 (Barnhart 1998: 299). Ben Jonson wrote it as drama in 1616. First used to mean a serious play not necessarily a tragedy by Diderot. The Romans took the word drama directly from the Greek. They applied the word fabula to spectacle and stories until the time of Cicero, when it became more or less interchangeable and synonymous with drama (Christian 1987). Plays could still be called fabula or carmen in Latin to the late 19th century.
 - Dramatic
 - Into English 1589 in Puttenham’s The Art of English Poesi.
 - Dramatist: into English in 1678
 - Dramatize: into English around 1780-83
- Farce
A play of ridiculous situations and absurd people meant to be funny (Barnhart 1988: 369). From Old French farcir meaning to stuff – taken into English in 1530 to mean an interlude in a mystery play (stuffing) – related to the Greek word phrássein to fence in, hedge round or fill full (Barnhart 1998: 369).
- Perform to carry out, accomplish, or fulfil (an action, task, or function) to work, function, or do something to a specified standard to yield a profitable return to present to an audience (Pearsall 1999: 1060)
Originally from Old French parfournir: to furnish/provide through/ to completion 1300: to do, carry out, go through or render (borrowed from parfournir).

- Performance
 - an act of performing a play, concert, or other form of entertainment
 - a person's rendering of a dramatic role, song, or piece of music
 - a display of exaggerated behaviour; an elaborate fuss
 - the action or process of performing a task or function
 - the capabilities of a machine or product
 - the extent to which an investment is profitable
 - an individual's actual use of language, including hesitations and errors (Pearsall 1999: 1060)

C1500: performing or thing performed
1709: a public exhibition or entertainment (Barnhart 1998: 777)
- Performer

1711: one who performs in a public exhibition or entertainment (Barnhart 1998: 777)
- Performative

C20th: Denoting a statement by means of which the speaker performs a particular act (linguistics/philosophy) (Pearsall 1999: 1060), although Hobbes had recognized the phenomenon of utterances as actions (Blackburn 1994: 282).
- Play

1200: game, martial sport, joke, revelry
1325: dramatic or theatrical performance (Barnhart 1998: 804)
- Player

c. 1340: a reveller (Barnhart 1998: 804)
- Public

1394: open to general observation, sight or knowledge (pupplik) c1500: publike: public view, place open to all persons 1600: revival of Latin spelling: public
1665: people in general (Barnhart 1998: 859)
- Publicity

1791: condition of being public
1826: advertising, making something known (Barnhart 1998: 859).
- Purpose

First recorded use as a noun in English about 1300 to mean intention, aim or goal. Used as a verb in 1380 by Chaucer in his translation of Boethius' De Consolatione Philosophiae, and as an adverb, purposely, by Shakespeare in 1590 in Comedy of Errors. Came into English via Old French, from the Latin prō (forth) and prōpos (part of the word for 'put forward' (Barnhart 1998: 866).
- Role

'Role' as the part an actor plays was once the metaphorical application of the term for the scroll (rolled paper) on which instructions, proclamations or speeches were written, itself a metaphorical application of the term ‘rolle’ meaning to roll over. The bread rolls we eat unthinkingly were similarly the metaphorical application of the term ‘rolle’ because in making them, the dough was rolled over. The term ‘role’ has since been applied metaphorically to describe both how we change our behaviour according to the context in which we find ourselves, and to the parts played by those people who take on the job of politician. In this application, we are drawing on the theatrical term to suggest that what we do or what politicians do is an ‘act’, something which is not ‘real’ – yet in bringing the term out of the theatre, we are in fact returning it to an earlier relationship with the idea of acting – meaning simply to do.

c460BCE: In Trojan Women, Euripides compared the human heart to a written scroll which is rolled up (Curtius 1990/1948: 304n2). Scroll was the term from which the word role was devised.

1606: part or character played by a person in society or life, from roll (of paper) on which the part was written (spelt rolle until 1790-91, when it was changed to the French réle. The word rolle referred to the technique of making a bread-roll by turning the bread over) (Barnhart 1998: 935).

1790-91: the word was first recorded as meaning an actor’s part in a drama.

- Script

A piece of writing. First used to mean a manuscript of a play in 1883. First used as a verb to mean the writing of a play (to script) in 1935 (Barnhart 1988: 973).

- Soliloquy

Word coined by St Augustine to mean speaking to oneself – used in his Liber Soliloquiorum – taken into Middle English in that meaning with the translation of St Augustine’s book in 1380, but not in common use until 1604. First recorded use to mean a literary or dramatic monologue (i.e. taken up into the theatre) in 1640 (Barnhart 1998: 1032)

- Stage

About 1250, a story or floor of a building, later, raised platform for public performance; step in a sequence (before 1325, in Cursor Mundi); borrowed from old French estage a story, floor, stage for performance, from vulgar Latin staticum a place for standing, from Latin statum, past participle of stāre, to stand. The specific sense of the theater, the actor’s profession is found in 1589. The sense of period of development or time in life is first recorded in Shakespeare’s Pericles (1608). The meaning of to put into a play is first recorded in Ben Jonson’s The Poetaster (1601); that of put (a play etc) on the stage in 1879, and the general sense of mount or put on (an action, spectacle, etc) in 1924. Stage-coach – as a vehicle doing part of a journey dates from 1658 (Barnhart 1998: 1056).

- Spectacle: from the Latin specere (to look) and spectare (to view, to watch) i.e. similar to the Greek thea (to see, to behold).

1340: spectakit public entertainment

pre 1586: spectator – onlooker, observer

1709: spectate the verb, meaning to look
 OED definition (1999): a visually striking performance or display (Pearsall 1999).

- Theatre

from life to theatre (see Table 1):

Greek: a place for viewing

For early Latin writers, theatron could be translated as either ‘theatre’ or ‘spectacle’. It was this latter use which was recorded by Isidore of Seville in his Etymologies. Theatre thus became associated with, and mistaken for, amphitheatron, a move which brought the ill-repute of events which occurred in amphitheatres such as The Colosseum into association with theatre. Theatres, in the absence of any actual theatre, became known as places of orgies and gross spectacles, contributing to the disrepute in which theatre has continued to be held to this day. During the Middle Ages, the term theatrum was also used to designate a market-place where goods were laid out for display, an assembly area, a complete treatment of a topic (The Theatre of Women’s Fashion Gynaeceum sive theatrum mulierum by Jost Amman 1586, Frankfurt), a scholarly scheme or a philosopher’s system (see Bernheimer 1956: 226).

c1374: a place constructed in the open for viewing dramatic plays or other spectacles (Chaucer Boeth) OED 1933: XI: 261). The first mention of the word in English (by Chaucer c1374) referred to ‘an open-air place for viewing plays and other spectacles’ (Barnhart 1998: 1131)

1382: a ‘comune biholdiing place’ (a Wycliffite Bible manuscript – see McGillivray 2007: 192n11 and West 1999: 247). NB: the emphasis was on the act of seeing C15th: The word theatre was ‘an unfamiliar one. But it is not just a question of the word, the concept of theatre does not seem to have existed. Putting on plays was rather one of a variety of ways of telling stories and entertaining ... The word “theatre” in England is really one of those that the Renaissance used to recover the lost Classical past; and the idea of “theatre” as a branch of the arts is one that does not develop until the seventeenth century’ (Meredith et al 1985: 2 in McGillivray 2007: 192).

1560’s: the title of a book with images e.g. The Theatre of Women’s Fashion (Gynaeceum sive theatrum mulierum) by Jost Amman 1586, Frankfurt; this understanding continued well into C17th: 1605: Theatrum anatomicum by Gaspard Bautin (1560-1624), on modern anatomy; Theatrum of Great Britain (1610) by John Speed, a collection of maps; Theatrum botanicum (1640) by John Parkinson, a herbal.

1565: theatrum is defined by Thomas Cooper in his Thesaurus Linguae Romanae et Britannicae (1565) as ‘Sometime the multitude that beholdeth. Sometime the sight or play set forth in that place’ (Cited in West 1999: 282n31). West argues that this indicates that there was no radical separation between spectators and performers at the time, which goes some way towards explaining the ‘radical effectiveness’ of Elizabethan theatre.

1577: a building where plays are shown

1581: a place of action

1589: defined by John Rider in his Bibliotheca Scholastica as a ‘looking place’ and placed under the conceptual heading of ‘To looke’ rather than under ‘Stages to see plaies’ (West 1999: 248).

1668: plays, writing, production, the stage

1829: the rediscovery of the Greek theatre at Epidauros, part of the Sanctuary of Asklepios; excavated 1870-1926 and restored 1954-63.

1850s: excavation of The Odeon of Herodes Atticus

1893: excavation of Delphi began

1999: (OED) (1) a building (2) writing/production of plays (3) a play or other activity (4) a room for lectures (5) an operating room (6) the area in which something happens. Theatre is still essentially a space in which spectacles occur. Uses of the term to relate to plays etc are derived/shorthand.

2007: discovery of another Greek theatre under a suburb of Athens

- Theatrical

Greek: to do with show/showing

From life to theatre: 1558: connected with the theatre

1657-1683: dramatic performance

1995: ‘Theatrical’ is used in a flexible sense, and is applied to the civic rituals and public spectacles of the capital (e.g. the execution of King Charles I) as well as to the elite and the popular theatre’: a period is ‘theatrical’ because of ‘the sheer range of spectacles and experiences enacted’ ... this range of activities ‘testifies to the existence of a theatrical culture of conscious dramatisation on all of the public stages’ (Smith, Strier, and Bevington 1995: 14) [a circular definition: they see a period as theatrical and then claim that the events they describe reveal ‘a theatrical consciousness’ in the participants!]

- Thespian

1675: to do with drama, especially tragedy

1827: actor/actress (Barnhart 1998: 1133)

B. From Theatre to Life

- Scene

First recorded use in English in 1540 to mean part of an act of a play as well as stage scenery (as Burke uses it). Borrowed from Middle French scène and from the Latin scaena to mean scene, stage, from the Greek skēnē meaning ‘tent’ (military) and later ‘stage’ (Christian 1987). The development of the term into scenery (stage representations of a scene) occurred as late as 1774, and did not appear to have been applied to natural features of the landscape until about 1784. This it may be one of the few terms to come from the theatre into everyday life, rather than the other way around. It is first recorded in English to mean natural scenery in Dickens’ American Notes (1842). (Barnhart 1998: 966).

- Tragedy

Into English about 1375 (as tragedie) – a play or other serious literary work having an unhappy ending (used by Chaucer), borrowed from the French which was borrowed from the Latin tragoedia a tragedy or a lofty style, or a great commotion or disturbance. From the Greek tragōidīā meaning a dramatic poem or play in formal or stately language and action having an unhappy resolution – literal meaning: a goat song – possibly because the actors or singers wore goatskins – or were awarded a goat as a prize.

The figurative sense of an unhappy event, calamity, or disaster is found in 1509 (Barnhart 1998: 1157).

- Tragic

1545: calamitous, disastrous, fatal; shortened form of earlier tragic (1489) modelled on Latin tragicus – of or pertaining to tragedy; literally, of or pertaining to a goat, and probably to a satyr impersonated by a goat singer or satyric actor from trágos meaning goat from tragein meaning nibbler.

The sense of pertaining to tragedy as a part of drama, of the nature of or acting in tragedies, is first recorded in English in 1563. The original meaning of this word in English was influenced by the figurative sense of tragedy (Barnhart 1998: 1157).

Bibliography

- Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers.
- Bernheimer, Richard. 1956. 'Theatrum Mundi'. The Art Bulletin 38 (4) pp. 225-247.
- Blackburn, Simon. 1994. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Chambers, William, and Robert Chambers. 1877. School Dictionary of the Latin Language. London and Edinburgh: William and Robert Chambers.
- Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc.
- Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI).
- McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008].
- Pearsall, Judy, ed. 1999. The Concise Oxford Dictionary. Tenth ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, David L., Richard Strier, and David Bevington, eds. 1995. The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287.

Appendix A Table 1: The word ‘theatre’: a brief etymological history of its meanings and derivations in English¹

Shading indicates first known use.

DATE	WORD	MEANING	USER	IN
Origins: Greek word designating ‘a seeing place’ from the word thea – to see. ² Came into Latin as theatrum also as ‘a place where spectacles are seen.’ Cicero used the word to mean playhouse or theatre, as well as the spectators therein. He also used it to refer to ‘a space and opportunity for the display of one’s powers.’ Virgil used theatrum to refer to ‘a place where public games are held, a place of exhibition’, and Quintilian used the word to refer to the audience. ³ c1374	theatre	1. a place constructed in the open air for viewing dramatic plays or other spectacles	Chaucer (trans)	Chaucer’s translation of Boethius’ Consolation of Philosophy c1380 (spelling): theatre or teatre
1382	theatre	2. a ‘comune biholdyng place’	Wyclif Bible	Acts XIX, 29 ⁴ (note the emphasis on the act of seeing).
c1386	theatre	3. an amphitheatre	Chaucer	The Knight’s Tale (Canterbury Tales)
C15th: The word theatre was ‘an unfamiliar one. But it is not just a question of the word; the concept of theatre [as we know it] does not seem to have existed. Putting on plays was rather one of a variety of ways of telling stories and entertaining ... The word “theatre” in England is really one of those that the Renaissance used to recover the lost Classical past; and the idea of “theatre” as a branch of the arts is one that does not develop until the seventeenth century’. ⁵ However, in Italy between the discovery of Vitruvius’ work in 1414 and 1585 when the Teatro Olimpico was built in Vincenza, ‘the best part of a century of experimentation in building theatres according to the sketchy principles outlined by Vitruvius’ took place. ⁶ In 1473 , a temporary wooden theatre was built in Rome for a wedding celebration: ‘with strong beams of wood ... we prepared a tall theater’, ⁷ one of a number of temporary theatres built before 1585. In Italian as in English teatro referred ‘to the seating arrangements of the audience. A “teatro” was a “place for watching” and the term was commonly applied to the specific place from which one watched’. ⁸
1550-1700 (dominant spelling: theater). McGillivray argues that ‘already in the sixteenth century “theatre” did not simply stand for an art form, but was a term to which values had been assigned’ ⁹ but as we can see, theatre continued to mean a large number of things not necessarily related to theatre as an art form – nor was the art form recognized as ‘theatre’ in C16th. In the C16th in both England and Europe ‘theatre’ ‘referred simply to a place which allowed people to watch anything being displayed’ and ‘come to know the world’. The emphasis was on the act of seeing . McGillivray claims that social life was theatrical prior to the development of specific spaces called theatres. West also argues that the idea of theatre in philosophy existed before theatres themselves did and suffered in its aims of education and enlightenment in its intersection with the reality of theatre and the need to entertain in order to keep the audience’s attention. ¹⁰
In 1545 , Charles Estienne published a textbook on the theory and practice of dissection in which he describes an ideal form of anatomy theatre based on Vitruvian principles because ‘anatomy was comparable to any other public show and a dissected human body to “anything that is exhibited in a theatre in order to be viewed”’. ¹¹
1557: An anatomy theatre was constructed in London 19 years before Burbage’s playhouse. ¹²
1558	theatrical	1. pertaining or connected with the theatre or ‘stage’ or with scenic representation ¹³
1566	theatre	4. a book giving a ‘view’ or ‘conspectus’ of some subject; a textbook; a manual. (This use continued until well into C18th). ¹⁴	J. Alday (trans)	Alday’s translation of Boastuau’s Theatrum Mundi, the Theatre or rule of the world, wherein may be sene the running race and course of everye man’s life, as touching miserie and felicity

1576: the first English playhouse built
1577	theatre	5. an edifice specially adapted to dramatic representations; a playhouse 1577: theatre-houses	Northbrooke	Dicing (1579)
1581	theatre	6. something represented as a theatre ... in relation to a course of action performed or a spectacle displayed especially a place or region where some thing or action is presented to public view (literally or metaphorically)		Confer 11 (1584): 'They ... are set before all mens eyes, and in the midst of the Theatre of the whole world'.
1587	theatre	7. a temporary platform, dais, or other raised stage for any public ceremony	Fleming	Contn. Holinshed : 'It was found better for them by the aduise of the prince of Orange ... to tarie for his highnesse upon a theater which was prepared for him
1589	theatre	2. a 'comune biholdyng place'	George Puttenham	The Arte of English Poesie : 'theatrum, as much to say as a beholding place'. ¹⁵
1589	theatre	8. the stage or platform on which a play is acted	Rider	Bibl. Schol. : 'A theater, or scaffold whereon musitions, singers, or such like shew their cunning, orchestra
1594	theatral	1. of or pertaining to or connected with the theatre, theatrical, dramatic	R. Ashley (trans)	Loys le Roy : 'They pardoned Roscius, the Author of the Law Theatral
1596	theatre	4. a book giving a 'view' or 'conspectus' of some subject; a textbook; a manual.	Jean Bodin	Universae Naturae Theatrum ¹⁶
1599	theatre	4. a book giving a 'view' or 'conspectus' of some subject; a textbook; a manual.	R. Allot	Wit's Theater of the Little World
C17th : theatre/ theatrum retained its broad meaning of 'seeing-place'. ¹⁷
1600	theatre	6. something represented as a theatre ... in relation to a course of action performed or a spectacle displayed especially a place or region where some thing or action is presented to public view (literally or metaphorically)	Shakespeare	As You Like It
1602	theatre	9. a theatreful of spectators, the audience or 'house' at a theatre	Shakespeare	Hamlet
1606	theatre	10. a thing displayed to view; a sight, scene, spectacle; a gazing-stock	Sylvester	Du Bartas : 'All cast their eyes on this sad Theater.'
1611	theatre	4. a book giving a 'view' or 'conspectus' of some	Speed	The Theatre of the Empire of Great

		subject; a textbook; a manual.		Britaine: Presenting an exact Geography of the Kingdomes of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Iles adjoining.
1613	theatre	11. a room or hall fitted with tiers of rising seats facing the platform, lecturer's table or president's seat, for lectures, scientific demonstrations, etc.	Purchas	Pilgrimage : 'That is now rather become a Sepulcher of Science, then a Theater, there being not above five Students'.
1615	theatre	12. a place where some action proceeds; the scene of action	G. Sandys	Trav. : 'The most renowned countries and Kingdoms ... the theaters of valour and heroical actions...'
1616 London theatres were still an 'unusual landmark'. ¹⁸
1621	theatre	7. a temporary platform, dais, or other raised stage for any public ceremony		Execution at Prague : 'The theatrum, or scaffold of timber, which was to be erected, and whereupon the ... execution of the prisoners was to be performed.'
1639	theatre	6. something represented as a theatre ... in relation to a course of action performed or a spectacle displayed especially a place or region where something or action is presented to public view (literally or metaphorically)	Fuller	Holy War : 'Asia, the theatre whereon they were acted is at a great distance'.
1640	theatre	4. a book giving a 'view' or 'conspectus' of some subject; a textbook; a manual.	Parkinson	Theatrum Botanicum. The Theater of Plantes, or An Universall and Compleate Herball
1640	theatre	10. a thing displayed to view; a sight, scene, spectacle; a gazing-stock	Peter Leighton	Chandler: Hist. Persec. (1736): 'He was made a Theatre of Misery to Men and Angels.'
1640	theatre	13. dramatic works collectively		Bromes: Antipodes
1641	theatre	11. a room or hall fitted with tiers of rising seats facing the platform, lecturer's table or president's seat, for lectures, scientific demonstrations, etc.	Evelyn	Diary 28 August: 'I was much pleased with a sight of their Anatomy schole, theater, and repository adjoining'.
1645	theatre	14. a circular basin of water	Evelyn	Diary 5 May: 'A stream precipitating into a large theater of water ... In one of these theaters of water is an Atlas spouting up the streame to a very great height.'
1646	theatre	10. a thing displayed to view; a sight, scene, spectacle; a gazing-stock	Evance	Noble Ord. : 'If there be any that are made a Theature unto the world ... it is such as Paul

1647	theatre (theature)	8. the stage or platform on which a play is acted	Trapp	Comm. Rom. : ‘Clearly seen: As in a mirror or as on a theatre’.
1647	theatrically	1. in a theatrical manner or style	Trapp	Comm. Epistles : ‘The Pharisees ... did all theatrically, histrionically, hypocritically, to be seen of men.’
Mid 1600’s: theatrical takes on ‘an additional meaning of simulation, artificiality, and affectation. Thus, besides evoking and referencing stage performances, it indicated role-play off the stage’. ¹⁹
1649	theatrical	2. that ‘plays a part’; representing or exhibiting in the manner of an actor; that simulates, or is simulated, artificial, or affected, assumed	John Hall	Motion to Parl. Adv. Learn : ‘Man in businesse is but a Theatrical person, and in a manner personates himselfe’
1652	theatre	15. a natural formation or place suggesting such a structure	Donne
1654	theatre	12. a place where some action proceeds; the scene of action		Martini’s Conq. China : ‘Which country was the Theater of all his Brutalities.’
1656	theatric	1. suggestive of the theatre (theatrical)		Artif. Handsom : ‘What is there in any civil order ... which doth not put on something Theatrick and pompous’
1657	theatre	4. a book giving a ‘view’ or ‘conspectus’ of some subject; a textbook; a manual.	S. Purchas	A Theatre of Politicall Flying-Insects
1657	theatrical	3. the performance of stage plays
1657-83	theatrical	4. a dramatic performance ²⁰
1659	theatre	8. the stage or platform on which a play is acted	Stanley	History of Philosophy : ‘Some plead in the Forum, others act on the theater’.
1665	theatral	1. of or pertaining to or connected with the theatre, theatrical, dramatic	Braithwait	Comment Two Tales : ‘He ... in Theatral actions personates Herod in his Majesty.’
1668	theatre	16. dramatic performances as a branch of art, or as an institution; the drama	Dryen	Ess. Dram, Poesy
1667	theatre	15. a natural formation or place suggesting such a structure	Milton
1678	theatrize	1. to make a spectacle or show of	J. Brown	Life of Faith (1824): ‘They were exposed to ... public shame ... when made open spectacles and theatrized.’
1679	theatrize	1. to make a spectacle or show of	J. Brown	Life of Faith (1824): ‘We read of some ... who were theatrized, brought to open scaffolds.'

1680	theatre	7. a temporary platform, dais, or other raised stage for any public ceremony		London Gazette No 1475 : 'Then his Lordship conducted their Royal Highnesses to the Hall, at the South end whereof, was erected a Theater of 42 Foot in length, and 40 in breadth, covered with Carpets and rising five steps from the ground.'
1684	theatre	6. something represented as a theatre ... in relation to a course of action performed or a spectacle displayed especially a place or region where some thing or action is presented to public view (literally or metaphorically)	T. Burnet	The Earth : 'Earth was the first theater upon which mortals appear'd and acted'.
1691	theatrical	2. that 'plays a part'; representing or exhibiting in the manner of an actor; that simulates, or is simulated, artificial, or affected, assumed	Boyle
C18th : the term theatre began to be restricted to mean a particular institution, its buildings and its products i.e. efforts were made to limit the term. ²¹
1702	theatrically	1. in a theatrical manner or style; in relation to the theatre; dramatically; as a public spectacle	Pope	Imit. Earl. Dorset, Artemisia : 'Her voice theatrically loud...'
1704	theatre	4. a book giving a 'view' or 'conspectus' of some subject; a textbook; a manual.	R. Monteith	A Theater or Mortality; Or, the Illustrious Inscriptions ... upon the several Monuments ... within the Grey-friars Church-Yard [etc] of Edinburgh
1706	theatric	2. of or belonging to, or of the nature of the theatre	Steele
1706	theatric	3. artificial	Steele
1709-10	theatrical	5. having the style of dramatic performance; extravagantly or irrelevantly histrionic; 'stagy'; calculated for display, show; spectacular	Steele and Addison	Tatler No 136 : 'His Theatrical Manner of Making Love'.
1711	theatrical	2. that 'plays a part'; representing or exhibiting in the manner of an actor; that simulates, or is simulated, artificial, or affected, assumed	Shaftesbury	Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711): 'The good painter must ... take care that his Action be not theatrical, or at second hand; but original and drawn from Nature her-self' ²²
Shaftesbury's concern with the theatrical marks a period when the issue of spectatorship becomes problematized. Fried argues that Shaftesbury, Defoe and other eighteenth century writers, including Diderot some fifty years later, had 'an obsessive concern with the problem of theatricality , by which they meant the implications of an awareness of audience.' ²³ The theatre at the time demonstrated a constant awareness of the audience, which, they believed, led to dramatists and performers writing and playing to the audience rather than maintaining coherency (or at least the illusion of it) in the scene. Both Shaftesbury and Diderot (who drew on Shaftesbury's work) argued that paintings which demonstrated this awareness of the beholder were second-rate (theatrical) and that this interfered with the naturalness of the scene, making it 'mannered', 'false and petty' (Diderot) and interfering with its ability to portray action convincingly. Thus, the issue of how to observe without affecting the scene so that the behaviour of those in the scene remained natural became critical. Steele and Addison's 'Spectator' insisted on remaining anonymous in order to prevent the observed becoming aware they were being scrutinised. [It is easy to see how paranoia can become a companion to spectatorship in a society of spectators, as it did during the French Revolution}.

1711	theatrize	1. to make a spectacle or show of	Hickes	Two Treat. Chr. Priesthood (1847): 'He endeavours to expose and theatrize us.'
1712	theatrical	6. (perjorative) studied, artificial, 'second-hand'	Shaftesbury	Second Characters, or The Language of Forms (1712): 'studied action and artificial gesture may be allowed to the actors and actresses of the stage. But the good painter must come a little nearer to the truth, and take care that his action be not theatrical, or at second hand; but original, and drawn from nature herself'. ²⁴
1720-1750: 'theater' dropped in favour of 'theatre' in England
1720	theatre	12. a place where some action proceeds; the scene of action	Ozell	Verlot's Rome : 'The Theatre of a Civil War.'
1727	theatricalness	1. the quality or condition of being theatrical	Baily	Theatricalness : 'the being according to the Custom or Manner of the Theatre'
1743	theatrical	2. that 'plays a part'; representing or exhibiting in the manner of an actor; that simulates, or is simulated, artificial, or affected, assumed	(appears in French as a perjorative)	Dictionnaire de Trévoux : 'The gravest fault of a dramatic poem is to have only theatrical passions, passions that are not natural, that are seen only on stage' ²⁵
1755	theatral	1. of or pertaining to or connected with the theatre, theatrical, dramatic	Johnson
1758	theatrical (le théâtral)	7. (perjorative) theatrical drama and painting are works which play to the beholder or audience (a problematization of the spectator which also affected Shaftesbury).	Diderot	Entretiens sur le Fils naturel (1757); also in Discours de la poésie dramatique (1758) and De La Manière (1767)
1760	theatric	1. suggestive of the theatre (theatrical)	Walpole	Four C. Eng. Lett (1880): 'It was very theatric to look into the vault, where the coffin was, attended by mourners with lights.'
1764	theatric	4. resembling a theatre or amphitheatre in shape or	Goldsmith	Travels form

1774	theatre	12. a place where some action proceeds; the scene of action	J. Adams	Fam. Lett. (1876): 'To-morrow we reach the theatre of action.'
1777	theatrical	suitable only for the theatre	(used in France as a perjorative)	Dictionnaire de l'Académie française : a mode of action or expression which is suitable only for the theatre ²⁶
1778	theatricalize	1. to make or render theatrical	Mme. D'Arblay	Diary September : 'I shall occasionally theatricalize my dialogues'
1781	theatric	4. resembling a theatre or amphitheatre in shape or form	Mason	English Gardens
1788	theatric	1. suggestive of the theatre (theatrical)	Mme. D'Arblay	Diary (1876): 'So theatric an attitude'.
1794	theatricalize	2. to act on the stage; to attend or frequent theatrical performances	Coleridge	Letters to Southey (1895): 'It is an Ipswich Fair time, and the Norwich company are theatricalizing.'
1798	theatre	6. something represented as a theatre ... in relation to a course of action performed or a spectacle displayed especially a place or region where something or action is presented to public view (literally or metaphorically)	Washington	Letter & Writings (1893): 'The propriety of my again appearing on a Public theatre, after declaring the sentiments I did in my Valedictory address ...'
1809	theatric	2. of or belonging to, or of the nature of the theatre	W. Irving
1812	theatric	2. of or belonging to, or of the nature of the theatre		The Examiner 21 September
1815	theatrical	8. matters pertaining to the stage and acting
1816	theatric	3. artificial	J. Gilchrist	Philos. Etym : 'A poor dull servile, imitative, theatric set of artificial creatures, strutting about the stage of life in pompous insignificance'.
1825	theatralize	1. to adapt for performance on the stage	Carlyle	Schiller : 'Schiller had engaged to theatralize his original edition of the Robbers '.
1830	theatrical	2. that 'plays a part'; representing or exhibiting in the manner of an actor; that simulates, or is simulated, artificial, or affected, assumed	Macaulay
1833	theatricalize	2. to act on the stage; to attend or frequent theatrical performances	E. FitzGerald	Letters (1889): 'He and I have been theatricalizing lately. We saw an awful Hamlet the other night.'
1835 ²⁷	theatricality	1. a spectacle	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'For the present she gazes, nothing doubting, into this grand theatricality'. ²⁸

1835	theatricality	2. the quality or character of being theatrical (insincere or artificial)	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'By act and word he strives to do it, with sincerity if possible; failing that, with theatricality'. ²⁹
1835	theatricality	3. the expression of a people's temperament or spirit	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'For the theatricality of a People goes in a compound-ratio: ratio indeed of their trustfulness, sociability, fervency'. ³⁰
1835	theatricality	4. expressions which indicate distraction (stammers, babbling)	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'Pardonable are human theatricalities; nay perhaps touching, like the passionate utterance of a tongue which with sincerity stammers; of a head which with insincerity babbles. – having gone distracted'. ³¹
1835	theatricality	5. something unreal made manifest	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'In the month of June next, this Camp of Jales [which had 'waned faint and again waxed bright' but remained unpersuaded] will step forth as a theatricality suddenly become real; Two thousand strong ... with flags flying, bayonets fixed'. ³²
1835	theatricality	6. exaggerated but not necessarily untrue; melodramatic	Carlyle	French Revolution : 'Journngniac's ... defence generally ... is long-winded; there is a loose theatricality in the reporting of it, which does not amount to unveracity, yet which tends that way'. ³³
1836	theatricality	1. the quality or character of being theatrical (insincere or artificial)	Jane Carlyle	Letter to Eliza Stodart 29 February: 'When I fly into any ones arms now and "swear everlasting friendship" it is always with a secret misgiving, and a secret and almost risible conscious of a certain theatricality in the transaction'. ³⁴
1839	theatrize	2. to act theatrically; play a part		Watchman 18 September: 'The Pope's militia ... can splendidly theatrize in

				Protestant England.’
1840	theatricality	7. a theatrical personage; someone given to insincerity	Carlyle	Heroes : ‘This Mahomet ... we will in no wise consider as an Inanity and Theatricality’. ³⁵
1852	theatricize	1. to make or render theatric or ‘stagy’		Fraser’s Magazine : ‘theatricized Stolzenfels as a glaring example of the monstrosity which may be bred from restoration with its pasteboard battlements and tawdry gothic ornaments’.
1854	theatricalism	1. the practice of what is theatrical; theatrical style or character; ‘staginess’	L.D. Coleridge	Life : ‘The dangers of sentimentalism and theatricalism in religion ...’
1855	theatric	2. of or belonging to, or of the nature of the theatre	Milman
1859	theatrical	9. a professional actor
1865	theatricalness	1. the quality or condition of being theatrical	Bagehot	Fortn. Rev. : ‘A change of government is one of those marked events which by its suddenness ... its theatricalness, impresses men more even than it should.’
1866	theatricality	8. a theatrical matter; a dramatic performance	Carlyle	Reminiscences (1866): ‘I remember once taking her to Drury Lane Theatre ... of the theatricality itself that night, I can remember absolutely nothing.’ ³⁶
1869	theatric	1. suggestive of the theatre (theatrical)	McCarthy	Own Times : ‘He was picturesque and perhaps even theatric in his dress and bearing.’
1872	theatricism	1. a manner or mode of action suited to the stage; artificial manner		Daily News 12 April: ‘The superb theatricisms (if we may employ such a word) of the elder Pitt and the sonorous solemnities of the younger’.
1875	theatricalization	1. the process of making theatrical; dramatization	Howell	Foregone Conclusions : ‘Terris was an uncompromising enemy of the theatricalization of Italy.’
1880	theatricality	1. the quality or character of being theatrical (insincere)	R.L. Nettleship	Hellenica : ‘A tendency to theatricality and effusiveness’.
1880	theatricism	1. a manner or mode of action suited to the stage; artificial manner	McCarthy	Own Times : ‘The monstrous excesses, the preposterous theatricism of the Paris

				Commune.'
1884	theatricalism	1. the practice of what is theatrical; theatrical style or character; 'staginess'	Hales	Notes and Essential Shakespeare : 'There is nothing normal or calm, but incessant eccentricity and theatricalism...'
1888	theatreize	3. to make theatrical or dramatic; to dramatize		Scribner's Mag. October: 'It became necessary to 'theatreize' or idealize history'.
1889	theatricality	1. the quality or character of being theatrical; theatricalness		Times 27 February: 'The absurd theatricalities with which the ... campaign is now mainly carried on'.
1892	theatricality	7. a theatrical personage		Review of Rev. January : 'Two such theatricalities with which the ... campaign is now mainly carried on'.
1894	theatre	9. a theatreful of spectators, the audience or 'house' at a theatre	Gladstone	Hor. Odes : 'The theatre thrice clapped you then
C20th : 19 th century efforts to limit the concept of theatre begin to unravel as the boundaries of the concept are broadened. By the end of the twentieth century, theatre is an art form, a genre of cultural performance, a medium and a form of communication, and the field of theatre is seen as interdisciplinary. ³⁷
1904	theatral	1. of or pertaining to or connected with the theatre, theatrical, dramatic		The Times 16 August: 'Impressiveness ... depends ... on the vast extent and theatrical disposition of the whole.'
1909	theatricalize	1. to make or render theatrical		Daily Chronicle 9 September: 'As Lamb has said, any attempt to theatricalise the grandeur of Shakespeare's conception must fail.'
1975	theatre	2. a 'comune biholdyng place' (a viewing place)	Joseph Butwin	'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi : theatre is used in the Greek sense of 'a viewing place', and is distinguished from 'drama': it is about watching. ³⁸
1981	theatrality	1. 'those[semiotic] processes by which theater can be defined as a unique artistic form' ³⁹	Jean Alter	'From Text to Performance: Semiotics of Theatrality': 'The neologism "theatrality" will be used here instead of the more normal term "theatricality" [because] 'The very concept it identifies is relatively new and not uniformly defined, and within its linguistic and conceptual confusion, "theatricality" already has undesirable connotations which “theatricality” may help to avoid’. The word is ‘inspired by the French “théâtralité” which, in modern critical practice, antedates “theatricality”, and has gained widespread acceptance’. ⁴⁰

1997	theatre	13. an art form 14. a genre of cultural performance: ‘the performative genre par excellence ’. ⁴¹ 15. a medium 16. a mode of performance 17. a mode of being 18. a form of communication 19. a signifying practice	Erika Fischer-Lichte	The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: A European Perspective (1997): ‘Exchanges taking place between all kinds of media, art forms, cultural performance, institutions, everyday life, and theatre are renegotiating the concept of theatre ... the boundaries between theatre and other cultural domains’ are being reassessed in ‘a process which constantly redefines the whole concept of theatre’ which can no longer be defined solely as ‘the performative mode’. ⁴²
2004	theatre	12. a place where some action proceeds; the scene of action	Weber 2004	‘Whatever else it is, a “theater” is a place ... in which events take place’. ⁴³

¹ Unless otherwise noted, material derives from Oxford English Dictionary 1933, Volume XI: T-U, Oxford, Oxford and the Clarendon Press, and Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers.

² Lobkowitz, Nicholas. 1967. Theory and Practice: History of a Concept from Aristotle to Marx. Notre Dame, London: University of Notre Dame Press.

³ Chambers, William, and Robert Chambers. 1877. School Dictionary of the Latin Language. London and Edinburgh: William and Robert Chambers. 380

⁴ Quoted in Meredith, Peter, William Tydeman and Keith Ramsay 1985, Acting Medieval Plays, The Honeywood Press, Lincoln Cathedral Library Publications; cited in McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]. 192

⁵ Meredith et al 1985: 2 in McGillivray 2007: 192

⁶ McGillivray 2007: 194

⁷ Porcellio Pandonis, quoted in Light, Meg 1996, ‘Elysium: A Prelude to Renaissance Theater’, Renaissance Quarterly 49(1). 7; cited in McGillivray 2007: 194.

⁸ McGillivray 2007: 195

⁹ McGillivray 2007: 21

-
- ¹⁰ West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287. See also McGillivray 2007: 26-8
- ¹¹ Ferrari, Giovanna 1987, 'Public Anatomy Lessons and the Carnival: The Anatomy Theatre of Bologna', Past and Present 117; cited in McGillivray 2007: 200-202.
- ¹² McGillivray 2007: 200-202
- ¹³ Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers.1131
- ¹⁴ Schramm, Helmar 1995, 'The surveying of hell. On theatricality and styles of thinking', Theatre Research International 20(2), pp. 114-119; p. 115.
- ¹⁵ Cited in Vickers, Brian. 1971. 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery'. Studies in the Literary Imagination 4 (1) pp. 189-226. 214.
- ¹⁶ Blair, Ann 1997, The Theater of Nature: Jean Bodin and Renaissance Science, Princeton, Princeton University Press.
- ¹⁷ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.12
- ¹⁸ McGillivray 2006: 26
- ¹⁹ Davis, Tracy C. 2003. 'Theatricality and civil society'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 127-155.128
- ²⁰ Barnhart 1988: 1131.
- ²¹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 12
- ²² Balme says that the 1989 Oxford English Dictionary records this as the first documented use of theatrical (See Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.).
- ²³ Fried, Michael. 1980. Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot. Berkeley: California University Press.
- ²⁴ Quoted in Fried, Michael 1980: 218n132. This use was taken into French by Diderot who was familiar with Shaftesbury's work, and 'virtually paraphrases portions' of Second Characters (Fried 1980: 209n56).
- ²⁵ Fried, Michael 1980: 218n132
- ²⁶ Fried, Michael 1980: 218n132
- ²⁷ The usual date for Carlyle is 1837, when The French Revolution was published however the manuscript of Volume 1 was accidentally burned whilst in the care of John Stuart Mill in 1835. Carlyle had to rewrite it, suggesting that he coined the term earlier than 1837.
- ²⁸ Carlyle, Thomas. 1906/1837. The French Revolution. 2 vols. Vol. II. London: Macmillan and Co. Limited. 332-3
- ²⁹ Carlyle 1906/1837: 332-3
- ³⁰ Carlyle 1906/1837: 334
- ³¹ Carlyle 1906/1837: 336-7
- ³² Carlyle 1906/1837: 44
- ³³ Carlyle 1906/1837: 152
- ³⁴ From The Carlyle Letters online, Duke University press 2008, <http://carlyleletters.dukejournals.org/> accessed 28/04/2008.
- ³⁵ Carlyle, Thomas. 2008/1841. On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History. Boulder, Colorado: NetLibrary: Champaign, Ill: Project Gutenberg <http://www.netlibrary.com> accessed 28/04/2008.
- ³⁶ Davis 2003: 145
- ³⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 12

-
- ³⁸ Joseph Butwin 1975, 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi, in Research Notes 43(3), pp. 141-152.
- ³⁹ Alter, Jean. 1981. 'From Text to Performance: Semiotics of Theatricality'. Poetics Today 2 (3: Drama, Theater, Performance: A Semiotic Perspective) pp. 113-139.113
- ⁴⁰ Alter 1981:113
- ⁴¹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 16
- ⁴² Fischer-Lichte 1997: 12-19
- ⁴³ Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press. 97-8

Appendix B

Summary Tables

Table 1	Sources of theatre theory
Table 2	‘Universals of Performance’ – summary
Table 3	‘Perfumance’ – Performance/Performativity: range of literature
Table 4	Doing/Showing/Watching: using the theatre metaphor (detail)
Table 5	Theatre as a metaphor: Fields of Use
Table 6	Use and aim of the metaphor in relation to politics
Table 7	What kind of theatre?
Table 8	Use of role theory, dramaturgy/dramatism and derivatives

These tables represent either a summary or a refinement of aspects of the primary analyses undertaken in the tables in Appendices C to F on the accompanying CD.

Appendix B Table 1: Sources of theatre theory

COUNTRY	To 1CE	1CE-1200	1200-1250	1251-1300	1301-1350	1351-1400	1401-1450	1451-1500	1501-1550	1551-1600	1601-1650	1651-1700	1701-1750	1751-1800	1801-1850	1851-1900	1901-1950	1951-2000	2001-2008
Greece
Rome
India
Syria
Constantinople (Byzantium)
Hippo (now Algeria)
Spain
Germany
Italy
Japan
France
Belgium England Holland
China Scotland
America – Euro
Ireland
Austria
Russia
Poland
Denmark
Switzerland
Sweden
Latin America America – African Hungary
Moravia
Czechoslovakia
Rumania
Canada
Mexico
New Zealand
Brazil
Nigeria
Australia
Iran
America – Asian

Appendix B Table 2: ‘Universals’ of Performance - summary

PERFORMANCE IS:	SUB-THEMES IDENTIFIED	NO OF AUTHORS ¹	TOTAL ²
An ‘ado’ (a complete/d entity) (Blau)	Productive	6	53 22%
	An accomplishment	49
Conscious of itself as performance (Blau)	A separation/estrangement (from everyday/everyone)	16	44 19%
	Reflexive: (conscious of itself as performance)	37
	Liminoid	3
Involves management of time (Blau)	A process which has an end point/is complete/d	22	25 11%
	Temporal	8
Purposeful/ Intentional (Blau)	Deliberate/planned/designed/staged	12	126 53%
	Prepared, rehearsed	34
	Goal-oriented/end-determined	16
	Strategic	34
	Designed to meet a standard/image	52
	Purposeful	75
	Issues a challenge	4
Site Specific and Context dependent (Blau)	Context dependent	33	65 27%
	Contingent	25
	Risky	31
	Ephemeral	13
Visible: appearance dominates (Blau)	About visibility	53	121 51%
	A form of ‘presencing’ (making present)	47
	A form of objectification	16
	Semiotic/Signifying	12
	Representational	7
	Occurs in a social space	39
	A way of seeing/looking	33
	Exemplary	14
	Noticeable when it fails	13
Conventional (Blau)	Rule or convention governed (even if transgressive)	10	98 41%
	Reiterative	25
	Citational	13
	Framed as ‘special’/‘announced’	15
	Recognizable as performance	4
	Subject to expectations	53
	Subject to regulation	32
Entails a relationship with an audience/spectator/ observer (Blau)	A relationship (with the self or others as spectators)	58	96 41%
	Interactive	36
	Negotiated	17
	Transactional	2
	Participatory	21
	Co-operative	10
	Coercive	17
	Mediated	13
Affective	A mode of communication	19	74 31%
	Affective	13
	Integrative	12
	Inclusive	6
	Creates the illusion of inclusion	3
	Transformative	33
	Pleasurable	5
	Possibly transgressive	27
	Usually normative	4

PERFORMANCE IS:	SUB-THEMES IDENTIFIED	NO OF AUTHORS ¹	TOTAL ²
A form of behaviour	A sub-set of behaviour	2	94 40%
	Between behaviour and action	8
	A public act or action	65
	A natural way of expression	13
	Gestural	16
	Dramatic	6
	Utopian	5
	An oral presentation of some kind (including theatre)	20
	Involves social ritual	14
A practice (Blau)	A practice (not about text)	88	113 48%
	An embodied and articulated praxis	64
	Exemplary	14
Accountable	Designed/expected to meet a standard (explicit or implicit)	49	87 37%
	Subject to evaluation/judgment	62
	Measurable	33
	Accountable to others	20
	Concerned with democratic government	33
Concerns power	A form of power	2	78 33%
	A form of politics	50
	Contains configurations of power and authority	50
	Appropriative	7
	Coercive	17
Constructs reality/the world	Generates reality/identity	67	76 32%
	Constructs knowledge	10
	Related to discourse	17
	Meaning-generating	8
Functional	Functional	47	48 20%
	A vehicle/tool	7
A theoretical instrument	A way of seeing/looking	3	101 43%
	A way of knowing	10
	Reflexive/partially reflexive	36
	A theory	17
	A theory of action	14
	A concept	56
	A tool or vehicle	10
	A movement	1
	'Anti-disciplinary'	2
	A zeitgeist	4
	A cult	1
	A Western concept	3
	Essentially contested	18
	Can be read as text	3
Is derived from theatre	Performance is a theatre term	69	69 29%
Is not a theatre term	Performance is/was not a theatre term	44	44 19%

-
- ¹ Total number of authors: 236 (NB articles written by more than one author are counted as one author)
- ² Some authors recognize more than one sub-theme. They are counted once within a ‘universal’.

Appendix B Table 3: ‘Perfumance’ - Performance/Performativity: range of literature

JOURNAL TITLE	FIELD of STUDY	SURVEYED AUTHORS
acciones y lugares	Theatre	Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999
American Anthropologist	Anthropology	Bauman 1975, Isbell 1998
American Educational Research Journal	Education	Pineau 1994
American Ethnologist	Ethnology	Schieffelin 1985, Brenneis 1987, Calkowski 1991
American Journal of Political Science	Political Theory	Jackman 1973, Lapinski 2008
Angelaki: Journal of the Theoretical Humanities	Political History	Kochhar-Lindgren 1999
Annual Review of Political Science	Public Administration	Thompson & Riccucci 1998
Annual Review of Sociology	Sociology	Orbuch 1997
Anthropological Quarterly	Anthropology	Buckner 2004
Anthropology Today	Anthropology	Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000
ARTnews	Theatre	1993
The Australian Journal of Anthropology	Anthropology	MacGowan 2000
Australian Journal of Public Administration	Public Administration	Tilbury 2006
Australian Policy Online	Political Commentary	Waterford 2007, Barker 2008, McKinsey 2008, Sodhi 2008
BJPIR	Cultural Studies	Street 2004
The Bulletin	Current Affairs	Shand 2006, Dredge 2007
Canberra Bulletin of Public Administration	Auditing	Barrett 2001
College Literature	Education	Rothenberg & Valente 1997
Communication Education	Education	MacKinley 2003
Communication Monographs	Rhetoric	Fine & Speer 1977; Erickson 2001
Criticism	Theatre History	Crane 2002
Current Anthropology	Anthropology	Stoeltje 1978
Democratic Audit of Australia	Political Theory	Brenton 2005
Democratization	Political Theory	Foweraker & Krznaric 2001
Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education	Education	Meadmore & Meadmore 2004
Downbeat	Music	Aiges 1995
The Drama Review	Theatre	Schechner 1973
Economist	Economics	Economist 1990, 1991
Economy and Society	Economic Sociology	MacKenzie 2004
Encyclopedia of Public Administration and Public Policy	Auditing	Burke & Haynes 2005

European Journal of Political Research	Political Science	Lijphart 1994, Schmidt 2002
Eurozine	Cultural Theory	Friedman 2002
Evaluation	Auditing	Green 1999
glq: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies	Queer Theory	Sedgwick 1993
Health Sociology Review	Health Sociology	Reiger & Dempsey 2008
Interdisciplinary Science Reviews	Philosophy of Science	Crease 2003
International Journal of Qualitative Studies in Education (QSE)	Education	Sanders 1999
International Social Science Journal	Political Theory	Sartori 1991, Welsh & Carrasquero 1995
Journal of American Folklore	Anthropology/Ethnography	Bauman 1986
Journal of Democracy	Political Theory	Pharr & Putnam 2000
Journal of Popular Music Studies	Ethnomusicology	Tang 2005.
Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory (JPART)	Public Administration	Lynn 2006
Language Arts	Education	McLaren 1988
Law and Policy	Public Administration	May 2008
MIA	Media Studies	Paget 2002
Modern Drama	Translation	Godard 2000
Music Educators Journal	Music Education	Hinkley 1998
New Republic	Political Theory	New Republic 1977
New York Times	Theatre	Watrous 1994, Lachmann-Haupt 1996
PAJ: Journal of Performance & Art	Fashion/Art	Chin 1998
Performance Research	Theatre, Cultural Studies	Harrop 2004, Bleeker 2005
Performing Arts Journal	Theatre, Performance Studies	Marranca 1987, Robinson et al 1987
Philosophical Quarterly	Political Philosophy	Parry 1967, Skinner 1971
PMLA	Theatre	Worthen 1998
Poetics Today	Theatre	Passow et al 1981
Policy Studies Journal	Public Policy	Darnall & Sides 2008
Political Studies	Political Theory	Gibson & Harmel 1998, Foweraker & Krznaric 2001, Newton 2008
Political Theory	Political Theory	Pocock 1973
Polity	Political Theory	Kulynych 1998
Public Administration	Organization Theory, Public Policy	Andrews, Boyne, Law, Walker 2008, Hajer & Uttermark 2008
Public Administration Review	Auditing, Public Administration/HR,	Schachter 1995, Wallace Ingraham 2005, Durant et al 2006; Pandey & Garnett 2006, Yang & Holzer 2006, Bourdeaux and Chikoto

	Organization Theory	2008, Garnett et al 2008, Kassel 2008
Public Culture	Cultural Theory	Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993
Publius	Public Administration	Rice & Sumberg 1998
Qualitative Inquiry	Auditing	Jackson 2004
Quality and Quantity	Public Administration	Farnsworth & Fleming 1975
Quarterly Journal of Speech	Oral Communication	Pelias & VanOosting 1987
Representations	Political History	Ahmed 2002
Research in Drama Education	Education	Thompson 2006
Review of Policy Research	Public Policy	Clarke & Chenoweth 2006
Social Text	Feminism, Sociology	Anderson 1998, Joseph 1998
The Sociological Review	Sociology	Ward & Winstanley 2005, Mallard 2007
Sociological Theory	Political Theory	Giesen 2005
The Speech Teacher	Oral Communication	Campbell 1971, Sandifer 1971
Studies in Comparative International Development	Political Science	Myers 1995
Studies in Philosophy and Education	Education	Stone 1999
Studies in Theatre and Performance	Theatre, Political Theory	Dimple 2004, Roms 2004
SubStance	Cultural Theory	Reinelt 2002
The Sydney Morning Herald	Law, Education	Schauble 2000, Roche 2006, Prichard 2008, Pandaram 2008, Lawton 2008, Hanlon 2008, Growden 2008, Reuters 2008, Focus 2008, Halloran 2008
TDR	Psychology	Fleche 1997
Text and Performance Quarterly	Theatre, Rhetoric, Cultural Theory, Political Theory, Ethnography, Education, Communication/Linguistics, Oral Communication	Benton 1993, Foster-Dixon 1993, Fuoss 1993, Jackson 1993, Reinelt 1994, Ward 1994, Cherwitz & Darwin 1995, Jarmon 1996, Gingrich-Philbrook 1997, Hawes 1998, Warren 1999, Langellier 1999, Lee 1999, Madison 1999, Papa 1999, Sadono 1999, Kane 2000, Gray 2001
Theatre Journal	Theatre	Blau 1983, States 1996, Dolan 2001, Reinelt 2001
Theatre Research International	Theatre	Fitzpatrick 1999
Theatre Survey	Theatre	Steadman 1992
Theory, Culture and Society	Queer Theory, Political Theory, Information Technology	Fraser 1999, Lloyd 1999, Mackenzie 2005
Today's Speech	Oral Communication	Campbell 1971
World Press Review	Economics	Giardinelli 2001
The Yale Journal of Criticism	Cultural Theory, Literature	Mounsef 2003, Walker 2003

Appendix B Table 4: Doing/Showing/Watching – using the theatre metaphor (detail)

Doing/Showing/Watching	To 1CE	1CE-700	1001-1574	1576-1700	1701-1776	1777-1900	1901-1939	1940-1969	1970-1974	1975-1979	1980-1985	1986-1989	1990-1994	1995-1999	2000-2003	2004-2006	2007-2010	TOTALS	% of total
Doing	10	7	2	21	2	12	13	32	15	12	12	9	16	13	23	20	22	241	42
- doing politics	-	2	1	6		5	3	5	6	8	4	1	4	4	9	10	16	84	14
Showing	2	6	7	8		2	3	2	1	1	-	7	7	8	3	6	2	65	11
- showing politics	-	-	3	5		2	1	1		-	-	1	1	3	3	5	2	27	5
Watching	3	2		3	5	2	1		2	1	1	1	5	7	3	4	1	41	7
- watching politics	-	-			2		1		1	1	-	-	2	3	-	1	1	12	2
Doing and Showing	-	2	8	12	3	6	4	6	3	3	16	7	5	16	8	8	6	113	20
- doing/showing politics	-	-	2	4	1	5		3	3	2	8	2	1	10	3	7	4	55	9
Doing and Watching	2	2	1	8	4	6	5	4	1	2	-	1	2	2	3	1	6	50	9
- doing/watching politics	-	-		2	1	3	1	2	1	1	-	-	-	1	1	1	3	17	3
Showing and Watching	1	1	1	2	2	2		1	1	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	2	14	2
- showing/watching politics	-	-		1	1	2				-	-	-	-	1	-	-	1	6	1
Doing, Showing and Watching	8	4	4	5	7	3	1	3	1	3	4	3	1	4	-	1	-	52	9
- doing/showing/watching politics	4	-	1	2	4	3		1	1	3	1	2	1	2	-	1	-	26	4
TOTAL RECORDS*	26	24	23	59	23	33	27	48	24	22	33	28	37	51	40	40	39	577
Political entries	4	2	7	20	9	21	6	12	12	15	13	6	9	24	16	25	27	228
Percentage (Political User/Total)	15	8	30	34	39	64	22	25	50	68	39	21	24	47	40	62	69		39
All Doing	20	15	15	46	16	27	23	45	20	20	32	20	24	35	34	30	34	456	79
All Watching	14	9	6	18	18	13	7	8	5	6	5	5	8	14	6	6	9	157	28
No of Publications listed	29	37	36	83	40	48	50	75	35	33	45	34	41	61	47	42	40	776
- political	18	2	9	31	15	31	6	16	17	24	17	8	10	31	16	27	29	307	40
Theatre metaphor	8	8	10	14	15	21	7	15	8	2	11	9	7	18	12	13	13	191	33
- in Theatre Theory Tables	8	8	5	17	9	17	11	17	3	4	4	4	4	5	4	2	2	124	21
Positive view of theatre	3	3	6	10	7	11	19	9	4	7	4	1	10	17	5	14	7	137	24
- political use	0	0	1	3	2	6	4	1	1	5	3	1	-	5	-	10	2	44	7
Negative view of theatre	9	12	5	33	8	11	3	10	8	5	9	11	6	13	21	12	20	196	34
- political use	1	1	1	11	4	8	1	6	7	5	4	4	3	8	12	8	19	103	18
Neutral/ambivalent/can't say	14	9	12	16	8	11	5	29	12	10	20	16	20	21	14	14	12	243	42
- political use	3	1	5	6	3	7	1	5	4	5	6	1	6	11	4	7	6	81	14

Appendix B Table 5: Theatre as a metaphor: fields of use (detail)

FIELDS of STUDY in which the METAPHOR has been/is used	To 1CE	1CE-1200	1201-1250	1251-1300	1301-1350	1351-1400	1401-1450	1451-1500	1501-1550	1551-1600	1601-1650	1651-1700	1701-1750	1751-1800	1801-1850	1851-1900	1901-1950	1951-2000	2001-2008
Dates indicate date of first recorded use located
Intellectual Life and Theory
- Philosophy	c400
- Scholarship	c400												1713
- Critique
- Education									1548
Cultural Life and Theory
- Theatre (drama/playwrighting/theory)	c450
- Performance Studies																		1977
- Music										1597
- Art/Aesthetics/Design											1634
- Cultural Studies																1869
- Film Studies																		1991
- Literature	c300
- translation								c1473
- publishing																			2007
- Religion/Theology	c500
Social Life and Theory
- Sociology/Social Science																1835
- Social Psychology																	1923
- Social Philosophy																		1981
- Critical Sociology																		1985
- Gender Studies																		1988
- Criminology																			2002
- Anthropology																1890
- Etiquette
Political Life and Theory
- Statesmanship/Rule	c400
- Political Philosophy	c400
- Political Theory																1852

FIELDS of STUDY in which the METAPHOR has been/is used	To ICE	ICE-1200	1201-1250	1251-1300	1301-1350	1351-1400	1401-1450	1451-1500	1501-1550	1551-1600	1601-1650	1651-1700	1701-1750	1751-1800	1801-1850	1851-1900	1901-1950	1951-2000	2001-2008
Dates indicate date of first recorded use located
- Political Science																		1970
- Political Sociology																		1997
- Political Communication																		1996
- Political Education																			2005
- Revolutionary Politics/Political Activism										1583
- Public Opinion/Polling																		1988
- Public Policy																		1988
- Law	c400
- Public Relations																			2006
- International Politics																			2007
- International Relations/Diplomacy									1541
- Terrorism																			2007
- Nationalism																			2002
- Military Engagement														1781
- Indigenous Rights																		1997
Economic Life and Theory
- Business												1700
- Management Studies/Theory																		1961
- Organisation Studies/Theory																		1982
- Leadership Studies/Theory																		1986
- Economics														1770
Psychological Life
- Psychology																	1925
- Psycho-analysis															1900
- Psychiatry																		1966
- Cognition/Perception																	1934
History
- History (general)	c404
- Social History																		1995
- Exploration											1608
Communication

FIELDS of STUDY in which the METAPHOR has been/is used	To 1CE	1CE-1200	1201-1250	1251-1300	1301-1350	1351-1400	1401-1450	1451-1500	1501-1550	1551-1600	1601-1650	1651-1700	1701-1750	1751-1800	1801-1850	1851-1900	1901-1950	1951-2000	2001-2008
Dates indicate date of first recorded use located
- Communication Studies																		1965
- Oratory/Rhetoric	c100
- Media Studies																		1965
- Language														c1751
- Journalism											1647
Medicine
- Medicine									1545
- Nursing																		1992
- Gerontology																			2004
Science and Technology
- Science/Invention									1550
- Physics
- Philosophy of Science																		1982
- Space Travel																		1996
- Artificial Intelligence/Computing																		1990

Appendix B Table 6: Use and aim of the metaphor in relation to politics

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
1	Plato	Gods	Philosopher	Other men		Learning through seeing	Better seeing
1	Aristotle		Philosopher	Other men		Judgment of action	Contemplation
1	Cato the Elder			Other men/ Elderly		Determinism	Detachment
1	Cicero	Gods		Other men	The self	Visibility	Strategies of performance
2	Marcus Aurelius	The Playwright		Others		Determinism	Detachment
2	Dio Cassius			Others	The self	Visibility	Strategies of performance
3	John of Salisbury	God, angels, sages	Critics	Others		Visibility; the possibility of delusion	Strategies of performance; Detachment
3	Machiavelli		Adviser	Men in general		Keeping power	Visibility
3	Sir Thomas More	God		Observers	Performers	Fatalism	Detachment
3	Castiglione			The Court		Credibility	Decorum
3	Sir Thomas Elyot		Teacher	Students		Learning	Visibility
3	Queen Elizabeth I		Monarch	Subjects		Recognition of power	Visibility
3	Thomas Sackville	God				Determinism	Detachment
4	Jean Bodin		Observer			Knowledge	Visibility
4	Francis Bacon	God Angels	Critic, Philosopher	Theatre-goers		Credibility	Detachment which enables critique
4	King James I		Monarch	The People		Recognition of power; obedience	Visibility
4	Giambattista Guarini			Powerful others	The Self	Credibility	Strategies of performance
4	Felix Lope de Vega		Historian			Political ambition	Visibility
4	Sir Walter Raleigh	God	Historian			Determinism	Detachment
4	Campanella	God,	Critic			Fatalism; need to act under imperfect	Detachment

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
		Angels				knowledge
4	William Prynne	God, Angels				To show the glory of God	Visibility
4	Thomas Carew		Critic	The Court, The People		To demonstrate power	Visibility
4	Charles I		Monarch	Subjects		Representation of monarchy	Visibility
4	Ben Jonson		Monarchy	The Court, The People		Preservation of order	Visibility of power
4	Baltasar Graciàn			Man		The possibility of deception	Revelation (after death)
4	Thomas Hobbes		One in Exile		Self-conscious humans	Maintenance of order	Visibility
4	Needham		Journalist			Record of events	Dramatisation
4	John Milton		Critic	Citizens		Appearances are deceptive	Criticism (of King)
4	Robert Brown			Spectators		Consequences of political events (King's execution)	Dramatisation
4	Andrew Marvell		Reporter	The People		Record of events; lack of sympathy for King	Dramatisation
4	La Rochefoucauld		The wise man			Exhibition and deception at court	Detachment
4	Cotton Mather	God,	The rest of the world	The People of America		Development of America (the New World)	Visibility
4	Jacques Esprit		Critic	Others		Deceptiveness of court life	Criticism
5	John Digby		The Wise Man	Ordinary spectators		The confusion caused by the emotions	Detachment
5	Sir Erasmus Phillips			The People		Public Credibility	Strategies of performance
5	Montesquieu			Others	The self	Freedom	Visibility
5	Francis Hutcheson			Spectators		Perception of virtue	Visibility
5	David Hume	The		Each other	The self	The basis of social life	Sympathy

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
		Beholder
5	Rousseau			Citizens	The self-conscious individual	The problem of corruption; the separation between actors and spectators; obedience	Public performance (communitarian)
5	Adam Smith		The Impartial Spectator	Spectators	The self-conscious individual	Moral life	Visibility leading to sympathy
5	John Adams	God	Rest of the world			The position of America	Visibility
5	Joel Barlow	Eternal Truth	Other countries	American citizens		American patriotism	Revelation
6	James Madison		The watching world	Americans		The position of America	Revelation
6	Marquis de Lafayette			Participant in war		Experience of war	Dramatisation
6	George Washington	Angels	Other countries		The self-conscious actor	Visibility	Decorum
6	Jeremy Bentham		Power		The self-conscious individual	The problem of order	Visibility
6	Immanuel Kant		Philosophers, historians, Spectators			Aesthetic judgment	Spectatorship
6	Edmund Burke		Critic	Other spectators		Problem of the limits of politics	Critique
6	Thomas Paine		Critic	Other spectators		Representative politics	Ridicule
6	Jean-Paul Marat		Critic	Deluded citizens		The duplicity of revolutionary government	Revelation
6	Robespierre			The Citizen	The self-	The possibility of deception	Surveillance

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
					conscious actor
6	Mme de Stael		Critic, playwright	Performer		Suppression of intellectual freedom	Fatalism
6	Hegel		Philosopher/historian – a disinterested observer			The unfolding of history	Revelation
6	Georg Buchner	The Goddess of chance	Dramatist			The powerlessness of men to change anything	Acceptance
6	De Tocqueville		Critic	The inattentive crowd		The danger of despotism	Revelation
6	Thomas Carlyle		Historian	Audience members	Writer as stage manager	The presentation of historical events	Dramatisation Revelation
6	Jules Michelet		Historian			The presentation of historical events	Dramatisation
6	Charles-Louis Muller		Artist	Viewers		The presentation of historical events	Dramatisation
6	Karl Marx		Theorists, critics	Followers; the 'fairly competent' observer	Self-conscious actors	The staging of political events for persuasion	Strategies of performance
6	Walter Bagehot		Simple people	The superior spectator		The maintenance of order	Visibility (spectacle)
6	Walt Whitman		Critic	Absorbed spectators		The forging of a collectivity	Visibility; sympathy
6	James Mill		Critic	Deluded masses		The value of human life	Revelation
6	Philadelphia Bar		Readers			The recognition of the power of political rhetoric	Performance

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
7	Trotsky		Political strategist			The stage management of Revolution	Stagecraft
7	Lenin		Political strategist			The organisation of revolution	Strategies of performance
7	Keynes		Critic			Failure to achieve agreement between nations post-war	Ridicule
7	Max Weber			Observers		Understanding motivation	Empathy
7	Evreinov			Everyone		Facing the senselessness of human life	Theatre (a relationship between actors and spectators)
7	Holman		Other nations			Appearance of a country's spirit	Display
8	Bertold Brecht		Playwright, Alienated spectators	Pacified spectators		Provoking political change	Distance
8	Carl Schmitt		Philosopher	Politics and law		The site of conflict	Theatricality
8	Vernon Van Dyke		Pol. scientist/ educator	Ordinary spectators		The improvement of political life	Critical Spectatorship
8	Orrin Klapp			The whole world		Dramatic nature of political life	Dramatisation in order to recognize spectatorship
8	W. Sypher		Soc. scientist			Political theory is aesthetic	Dramatisation
8	Richard Merelman		Soc. scientist	Gullible citizens		Statecraft	Revelation
8	John Griffiths			Disenchanted citizens		Credibility of political life	Disbelief; ridicule
8	Joseph Gusfield		Soc. scientist	Groups under threat		Use of symbolism in political life	Revelation
8	Che Guevara			Radical activist		To describe conflict	Dramatisation

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
8	Raymond Aron			Radical activist		Impact of radical politics on participants	Role Theory
8	Lee Baxandall		Pol. theorist, political actors	The masses		Statecraft	Dramatisation
9	Lyman and Scott		Soc. scientist	Deluded citizens		Legitimation of power	Dramatisation
9	Donald Fread		Playwright	Citizens		Statecraft	Dramatisation
9	Jerry Rubin			Activist		Radical action	Dramatisation
9	Henry Kariel		Pol. scientist	Managed citizens		Legitimation of power	Dramatisation
9	Michel Foucault		Spectators; theorists		Self-disciplined individual	Theory as visualization; Description of historical events	Dramatisation
9	Roel van Duyn			Political actor		Political life as role-play	Dramatisation
9	Ferdinand Mount		Pol. theorist; critic;	Citizens		Position of spectators in relation to politics	Theatrical interaction
9	Peter Hall		Soc. scientist	Manipulated /deluded citizens		Statecraft	Revelation
9	J. Rosenau		Pol. scientist			Characteristics of political life	Objectification
9	Gore Vidal		Observer			The nature of politics	Objectification
9	Dan Nimmo		Pol. scientist	Others		Dramatic nature of politics; concern of politics with appearance	Objectification
9	Robert Brustein		Critic			Political life is performative	Performance
10	Raymond Williams		Theorist	Everyone		Political life is now dramatized	Importance of spectatorship
10	Joseph Butwin		Historian	Participants		Political life involves both actors and spectators	Objectification
10	Michael Oakeshott		Pol. theorist			The problems of theorising political and	Detachment

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
						social life
10	Ali Mazrui			Analyst, spectators		Politics as a public exercise	Visibility
10	Combs and Mansfield		Pol. Scientist (scholars)	Citizens		Politics uses theatre techniques and can therefore be described as theatre	Objectification
10	Paul Hare		Pol. scientist			Conflict resolution and collective behaviour	Dramatisation
10	P. Brooks		Pol. theorist			Political life as struggle	Dramatisation
10	Wole Soyinka		Playwright			Position of art in relation to social and political life	Theatre as communion
10	P.K.Manning		Soc. scientist			Political life is mediated and uses spectacle to achieve its ends	Objectification
10	Young & Massey		Soc. scientist	Deluded citizens		Statecraft in capitalist societies	Revelation
10	Norman Shrapnel		Journalist			Describing political life	Objectification
10	Pasquale Pasquino		Soc. scientist			Discourses about the state are staged	Revelation
10	Edward Said		Critic	Self-deluded westerners		Misrepresentation	Theatricality
10	James Mayo		Soc. scientist			Political life has a spatial dimension which is staged	Revelation
10	Jacques Donzelot		Critical theorist	Deluded spectator/ citizens		The construction of theory	Objectification
11	Dennis Altman		Pol. theorist	Pacified and deluded citizens		Utopian thinking – rehearses position	Objectification
11	J.D. Barber		Pol. theorist	Deluded citizens		Describing political life	Objectification
11	Alasdair MacIntyre		Pol. theorist			Describing of political life	Objectification, caricature

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
11	Lloyd Bitzer		Pol. theorist	Political subjects		Position of rhetoric in political life	Objectification
11	Doris Graber		Pol. theorist, media analyst	Media audiences		The craft of political language	Objectification
11	Judith Shklar		Pol. theorist	Humans in society		Functionality of deception and hypocrisy	Revelation
11	Bonnie Marranca		Drama critic	Deluded citizens		Politics' relationship with spectators	Performance
11	Michael Shapiro		Theorist			Political life is constructed	Objectification
11	John Welsh		Soc. scientist	Deluded citizens		Statecraft	Revelation
11	Neil Postman		Theorist	Politician performer, passive spectator		Effect of the media on politics	Objectification
11	Jacques Attali		Theorist, spectators			Relationship between art and the political economy	Dramatisation
11	Murray Edelman		Pol. theorist	Deluded and manipulated citizens		Statecraft	Objectification; revelation
11	Joel Schecter		Drama critic	Political candidates		Description of political activity	Performance
12	Vaclav Havel		Playwright, active spectator	Victim	We are spectators to and of ourselves	The explain the structure of the world and politics	Objectification
12	James Porter		Speculator (philosopher)	Deluded users of theory		Description of theory	Theatre (seeing)
12	Hindson & Gray		Historical analyst			Description of the crises of political life	Objectification, dramatisation

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
12	Sandra Lee Bartky		Theorists who use theatre as a metaphor	Theorist, critic	Women in a patriarchal society	Relationship between theatre, theory and patriarchal society	Objectification
12	Gautam Dasgupta		Theorists who use theatre as a metaphor; actors avoiding responsibility	Critical spectators, deluded pacified citizens		Consequential nature of politics	Objectification
12	Sarat & Silbey		Theorist	Students	Future human beings	Places of learning	Theatre – seeing-place
13	Parker		Historian/theorist			Description of historical events	Dramatisation
13	Gowers & Walker		Biographers	Readers who may be misled		Organization of a biography	Dramatisation
13	Bauman		Theorists/critics			Descriptions of modern life; predictions of the future	Dramatisation
13	Lyneham		Cynic, journalist	Bemused or deluded voter		Description of political life	Dramatisation
13	Benford & Hunt		Soc. scientist			The communication of power	Dramatisation
13	Esherick & Wasserstrom		Soc. scientist			Description of political protest	Dramatisation
13	Hundert		Theorist/historian		Self-reflective individual	Historical account - Augustine	Theatrical Distance
13	Borreca		Pol. scientist			Description of politics	Dramatisation
13	Stephen White		Pol. theorist			Historical account – Burke	Dramatisation
14	Ezrahi		Soc. scientist			Describing human behaviour	Dramatisation
14	Douglas Guthrie		Pol. scientist			Description of political dissidence	Dramatisation

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
14	Joanne Tompkins		Pol. scientist			Describing the construction of national identity	Rehearsal
14	James Warden		Pol. scientist			Description of political space	Theatre (seeing place)
14	Ranciere		Philosopher			Description of democratic political life	Visibility
14	Mancini & Swanson		Pol. scientist	Citizens of mediated politics		Mass media turns politics into show business	Spectacle
14	Vikki Bell		Pol. scientist			Comparison between theorists	Performance
14	Habermas		Soc. theorist			Communication in the public sphere	Theatre (r/ship between actors and spectators)
14	Lewis Lapham			Cynical citizen		Statecraft	Dramatisation
14	Bealing et al		Soc. scientist			How organizations legitimate their authority	Dramatisation
14	Marshall		Theorist	Citizens	Celebrity politicians		Dramatisation
14	Bernard Manin		Pol. theorist	Electors	Political actors	Political life under mediated conditions involves visibility	Theatre (r/ship between actors and spectators)
14	Michael Dodson		Critic	The excluded		Discriminatory citizenship	Distance
14	Brooks Lawton		Pol. scientist	Hapless citizen		Use of spectacle to pacify citizens	Dramatisation
14	Bent Flyvberg		Soc. scientist			Visibility	Theatre
14	Weisberg & Patterson		Soc. scientist	Sceptical public, acerbic media, interested parties		Visibility	Theatre

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
14	Kuusisto		Pol. scientist	Audiences		How political actions are framed	Dramatisation
14	Nancy Fraser		Pol. theorist	Passive, disengaged citizens		How to improve the public sphere	Theatre (seeing-place)
14	Jennifer Rarick	Playwright			Self-awareness	Description of political events	Dramatisation
14	Sean Scalmer		Pol. theorist			How to gain attention	Visibility
14	Eveline & Booth		Pol. theorist	Male politicians	Female politicians	Situation of female politicians	Visibility
14	Goldhill & Osborne		Historian	Athenian citizens		Description of historical life	Performance
14	John Hesk		Pol. scientist	Democratic citizens, the media		Description of historical life	Performance
14	Amos Kiewe		Soc. scientist	Citizens		Impression management	Rehearsal
15	Dingxin Zhao		Pol. scientist			Description of political dissent	Dramatisation
15	Greenfield & Williams		Pol. scientist	Media; manipulate spectators		How media structures sporting events	Dramatisation
15	Bruce Cronin		Pol. scientist			Relationships between nations	Role
15	Pilkington		Pol. scientist	Pro-conflict spectators		Consequences of framing politics as theatre	Visibility
15	T. Meyer		Theorist, citizen/spectator			Relationship between media and politics	Role
15	Friedland		Historian	Citizens		Description of historical event	Dramatisation
15	Bob Jessop		Pol. scientist			Need for politics to gain support	Theatre (r/ship between actors and spectators)
15	Brett Neilson		Theorist	Sport spectators		Visibility of sporting events	Dramatisation

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
15	Alan Filewood		Theorist			Relationship between national identity and theatre	Performance
15	Jay Rosen		Soc. scientist	Deluded consumers of political images, media		Relationship between politics and media	Dramatisation
15	Sid Spindler		The media	Politicians, citizens		Mediatization of politics	Theatre (r/ship between actors and spectators)
15	Tim Wallace		Journalist	Deluded activists		Manipulation of political activists	Dramatisation
15	Corner and Pels		Media theorist			Impact of media on politics	Stagecraft
15	Rajaram		Pol. theorist	The public		Demonstration of power	Spectacle
15	Editorial			Journalist		Demonstration of power	Spectacle
15	Wehrfritz & Lee		Journalists			Describing another country's political system	Dramatisation
16	Van Zoonen		Soc. scientist	Citizen/spectator		Relationship between celebrities and politics	Stagecraft
16	John Street		Pol. theorist	Citizens		Relationship between celebrities and politics	Stagecraft
16	Beer & De Landtsheer		Soc. scientist	Spectators of politics		Signifying activities	Dramatisation
16	McClellan		Historian, later generations	Targets of documents		Use of historical documents	Dramatisation
16	Agnes Ku		Soc. scientist			Description of political strategies	Stagecraft
16	Kath Kenny		Journalist			Description of political life	Dramatisation
16	Michael Crozier		Pol. scientist			Understanding innovative policy-making	Performance
16	Stephanie Bunbury		Journalist			Visibility of national policies	Stagecraft

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
16	P. Eric Louw		Media Theorist	Informed spectators; deluded citizens		Strategies used by politics to communicate with citizens	Stagecraft
16	John Warhurst		Theorist/ commentator	Deluded constituent		Visibility of political life	Stagecraft
16	Andrew Schaap		Teacher	Students		Learning about politics	Role
16	Bernhard Giesen		Pol. theorist	Deluded citizens, faithful citizens		Visibility of political life	Stagecraft, Performance
16	Balme		Soc. scientist			Appropriation of other countries/cultures	Distance
16	Margaret Werry		Soc. scientist	Manipulated but not nec. deluded spectators		Use of spectacle by politics	Theatre practice, stagecraft
16	Hajer		Pol. scientist			Describing policy-making	Dramatisation
16	US Senate		Historians	Citizens		Use of political space	Dramatisation
16	Robert Brown		Soc. scientist	Citizens	Candidates	Management of visibility	Dramatisation, stagecraft
16	Scott Davies		Critic	Interested spectator; deluded masses		Political life	Dramatisation
16	Lucy Winner		Soc. scientist	Participant/ observer		Describing public trials	Distance
16	Richard Wolffe		Critic	Political actors		Describing political response to crises	Theatre practice
16	Paul Sheehan		Journalist			Description of political life	Dramatisation
16	Michael Gawenda		Journalist	Targets of spectacle		Description of political strategy	Stagecraft

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
16	Andrew Rehfeld		Pol. theorist	The represented		Relationship between political actors and spectators	Theatre (r/ship between actors and spectators)
16	Andrew Parker		Journalist	Campaign manager, constituent		Visibility of political activity	Stagecraft
16	Peter Hallward		Philosopher			Critique of a philosopher's thinking	Dramatisation
16	Apter		Pol. scientist			Visibility of political life	Dramatisation
17	Burchell		Journalist			Actions of political actors	Dramatisation
17	David Marr		Journalist			Behaviour of politicians	Dramatisation
17	Lawrence Freedman		Pol. scientist			Political strategies	Dramatisation
17	Ben Mor		Pol. scientist			Concern with political image	Stagecraft
17	Waleed Aly		Observer			Political strategy	Stagecraft
17	Dave Stewart		Journalist	Citizens		Appearance of political actors	Stagecraft
17	Andrew Russell		Observer	Concerned citizen		Modern electoral politics	Stagecraft
17	John Garnaut		Journalist			Political campaigning in another country	Theatre (r/ship between actor and spectator)
17	Guy Pearse		Adviser/ lobbyist	'backstage' worker		Political strategy in relation to visibility	Stagecraft
17	Mark Latham		Disaffected observer	Deluded public		Political strategy	Dramatisation
17	Paul Sheehan		Journalist			Political strategy in relation to visibility	Stagecraft
17	Richard Woolcott		Actor	Diplomat		Visibility of political life	Risks of acting
17	Phillip Coorey		Commentator	Deluded masses		Political strategy in relation to leadership	Distance, Stagecraft
17	John Lehmann		Journalist			Political behaviour	Distance
17	Paul Daley		Journalist	Disaffected citizens,		Strategies of political behaviour; visibility	Distance, Stagecraft

Table	Metaphor User/Externalised Spectator	Spectators in the Metaphor				Aim of the Metaphor
		External	Externalised	Internal	Internalised	Problem	Solution
				other political actors
17	Chris Hammer		Journalist	Deluded citizens		Political strategies	Stagecraft
17	Freeman & Peck		Pol. scientist			Strategies of policy making	Dramatisation
17	Judith Brett		Pol. theorist			Description of political life	Dramatisation
17	Martin Leet		Critic			Political strategies	Stagecraft
17	Joel Gibson		Journalist			Innovative political action	Dramatisation
17	David Dale		Journalist	Bemused citizens		Political leadership – impression management	Stagecraft
17	Abjorensen		Commentator			Political life	Dramatisation
17	Jeffrey Green		Pol. theorist	Jaded citizens		Approaches to political life under conditions of mass media	Dramatisation
17	Hang No & Kidder		Soc. scientist	Media, media-watchers	The performative , reflexive self	How politicians manage their emotions	Stagecraft, performance
17	Peter Brent		Critic	Citizens	Politicians	Managing political visibility	Stagecraft
17	Graeme Orr		Pol. theorist	Grumpy electorate, other states		Relationships between states/commonwealth	Stagecraft
17	Keith Sutherland		Commentator	Voter/audience		Mediated politics	Stagecraft

Appendix B Table 7: What kind of theatre?

What kind of theatre does the metaphor use?
Genre	No	Users
Tragedy	39	Plato c300BCE, Diogenes c300BCE, Lucian c180CE, Tertullian c198 CE, Corpus Hermeticus c250CE, Iamblichus c300CE, Honorius c1100, Ficino c1450, Boaistuau 1558, Spenser 1590, Boissard 1596, The Revenger's Tragedy 1607, Fletcher 1633, Brown 1649, Marvell c1650, Calef 1700, Fielding 1730, Burke 1790, Paine 1791, Stael 1810, Marx 1852, De Tocqueville 1893, Nietzsche, Solugub 1908, Simmel 1911, Keynes 1919, Weber 1922, Minnigerodé 1932, Combs 1980, McDougall 1982, Wilshire 1982, Hunt 1984, Mangham & Overington 1987, Maguire 1989, Kuusisto 1998, Alexander 2003, Brett 2007, Woodruff 2008, Green 2010,
Comedy	22	Plato c300BCE, Plautus c200BCE, Horace c20BCE, Lucian c180CE, Iamblichus c300CE, Augustine c400CE, John of Salisbury 1159, Ficino c1450, Erasmus 1509, Vives 1518, Montaigne 1580, Tomkis 1615, Campanella c1600, Mandeville 1723, Cheney 1929, Minnigerodé 1932, Fread 1970, Combs 1980, Mangham & Overington 1987, US Senate 2005, Stewart 2007, Daley 2009
Farce	12	Seneca c1CE, Augustine c400CE, John of Salisbury 1159, Mandeville 1723, Kant 1790, Marx 1852, Keynes 1919, McDougall 1982, Bauman 1991, Pearse 2007, Abjorensen 2009, Daley 2009
Entertainment	11	Juvenal c100CE, Erasmus 1509, Patrizzi c1570, Nicole 1667, Mandeville 1723, Prince 1736, Klapp 1964, Postman 1985, Bauman 1991, Marshall 1997, Meyer 2002
Tragi-comedy	10	Guarini 1599, Lope de Vega 1607, Burke 1790, Paine 1791, Schopenhauer 1851, Wilde 1891, Langen 1934, Arendt 1971, Camus 1959, Bradbury 1972
Melodrama	10	Sypher 1965, Leslie 1973, Combs 1976, Brooks 1976, Blau 1987, Byers 1991, Alexander 1995, Jervis 1998, Washington 2007, Latham 2007
Theatre of the Absurd	7	Camus 1959, Lyman & Scott 1970, Fread 1970, Combs 1980, Wehrfritz & Lee 2003, Editor, SMH 2003, Stewart 2007
Puppet show	7	Plato c300BCE, Horace c68, Luther c1500, Paine 1791, Buchner 1835, Sartre 1943, Wallace 2003
Pantomime	2	Paine 1791, Leslie 1973
Vaudeville	2	Postman 1985, Dale 2008
Opera	2	Warden 1995, Washington 2007
Soap opera	2	Brett 2007, Dale 2008

Appendix B Table 8: Use of role theory, dramaturgy/dramatism and derivatives

(authors in bold indicate a theatre theorist)

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
This table summarises the findings of a literature review of the fields in which the concepts associated with role theory and dramaturgy/dramatism are used. The purpose of the study was to bring out the widespread use of the concepts and to establish which aspect of theatre was the focus of the concept: doing , showing or watching . As the table shows, the concepts are overwhelmingly used to talk about doing – the actions of others as if they were theatrical actors on a stage – across a broad range of fields of study. Referencing: see Appendices C and F for bibliographic details.
1908	Pirandello	Theatre Practice	Role Theory	Drama	D	Social interaction	The self
1913	Mead	Sociology	Role Theory	Drama	D	The idea of the self/the self and others	The self
1922	Eichler	Etiquette	Role Theory	Performance	D	Self-awareness in relation to social expectations	The self
1922	Post	Etiquette	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social expectations forces roles on individuals	The self
1923	Swett Marden	Sociology	IM	Performance	D	Self-awareness in relation to social expectations/personal aims	The self
1931	Burke	Literature	Dramatism	Drama (text)	D	Understanding motivated action	Everyone
1936	Linton	Anthropology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social interaction guided by social expectations	Everyone
1936	Carnegie	Business	IM	Performance	D	Self-awareness allows behaviour modification for success	The self
1937	Parsons	Sociology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social action is structured and performed	Everyone
1946	Bentley	Theatre Theory	Role Theory	Performance	D	We dramatise life to give it structure	The self
1956	Biddle	Social Psychology	Role Theory	Theatre	S	Characteristic behaviour (structured behaviour)	Others
1957	Merton	Social psychology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social action is guided behaviour	Everyone
1957	Nadel	Anthropology	Role Theory	Performance	D/W	Social action: we perform under the gaze of others	The self
1958	Gross et al	Social Science	Role Theory	Performance	D	Role conflict requires negotiation	The self
1958	Dahrendorf	Sociology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Social structures constrain behaviour	Everyone
1959	Goffman	Sociology/Anth	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	We act under the gaze of others	Everyone
1960	Van Dyke	Political Science	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	Political life involves both action and spectatorship	Others
1961	Thompson	Mgement Studies	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	Business life involves both action and spectatorship	Others
1962	Blumer	Sociology	Role Theory/SI	Drama	D	Social action/interaction is structured	Everyone
1962	Turner	Social Science	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social interaction was creative	Others
1962	Berryman	Anthropology	IM	Performance	D/S	Visibility requires impressions to be managed	Everyone
1962	Messinger etal	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/W	Visibility requires an attention to appearance	Everyone
1962	Duncan	Sociology	Dramatism	Drama	D/S	Social action is expressed symbolically	Everyone
1964	Klapp	Sociology	Dramaturgy/RT	Drama	W	Spectators direct political life because they influence action	Others

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
1966	Louch	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/W	We act under the scrutiny of others	Everyone
1966	Merelman	Political Comm.	Dramatism/IM	Drama	D	Analysis of dramas give insight into impression management	Others
1967	Gusfield	Political Studies	Dramatism	Drama	D/S	Politics uses symbols	Others
1968	Cicourel	Social Science	Role Theory	Drama	D	How meaningful social structure arises – via roles	Others
1968	Sarbin & Allen	Behavioural Psy.	Role Theory	Performance	D	Behaviour modification through rehearsal	Others
1969	Dewey	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Critical of over-use of the metaphor	Others
1970	Lyman & Scott	Social Psychology	Dramatism	Drama	D/W	The performance of politics	Others
1971	Bradbury et al	Sociology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Predictable behaviour	Others
1972	Hall	Sociology	IM	Performance	S	The exercise of political power	Others
1974	Snyder	Social Psychology	IM	Performance	D/W	Self-awareness	The self
1974	Nimmo	Political comm.	IM	Performance	D/S	Strategies of performance	Others
1976	Combs	Political comm.	Dramaturgy /Dramatism	Drama	D/W	How politics is dramatic	Others
1976	Hare	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D	Social interaction	Others
1976	Stokes & Hewitt	Social sciences	Dramatism	Drama	D	Predictable behaviour	Others
1976	Heilman	Social Sciences	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Social interaction	Others
1977	Schechner	Theatre Practice	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Performance – reiterated behaviour	Others
1977	Manning	Social Sciences	Dramaturgy	Drama	D/S	How spectacle is used in political life	Others
1977	Young et al	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/S	Powerful elites use image management	Others
1978	Mayo	Political Studies	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D	Propaganda uses structure	Others
1979	Harre	Philosophy	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	The analysis of conduct	Others
1980	Gronbeck	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	We shape our conduct according to the expectations of others	Everyone
1981	Perinbanayam	Social Philosophy	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	Actions signify	Everyone
1981	Cragan & Shields	Comm. Theory	Dramatism	Drama	D	People express their meaning and motivation	Others
1981	Tedeschi	Social Psychology	IM	Performance	D/S	Self-awareness	Everyone
1982	Wilshire	Sociology	Role Theory	Theatre	D/W	Imitation is the way we approach life and our identities	Everyone
1982	Mangham & Overington	OR	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S	We are self-aware as actors	Others
1982	Zurcher	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Drama	D/S	We stage emotions in organisational settings	Everyone
1983	Hochschild	Social Science	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/S	People in public life perform their emotions	Others

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
1984	Gioia & Poole	Mgement Theory	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	We conduct ourselves according to scripts	Others
1984	MacAloon	Anthropology	Dramatism/ Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Cultural performance is reflexive	Others
Rise of cynicism/critique of the approach?
1985	Welsh	Critical Sociology	IM	Theatre	D/S	Political life generates false impression designed to deceive	Others
1985	Schlenker	Social Psychology	IM	Theatre	D/S	Self-aware behaviour	Others
1986	Ritti & Silver	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Strategies of interaction	Others
1986	Tichy & Devanna	Leadership Theory	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Leadership is an organized performance	Others
1986	Cochran	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Life is structured as a narrative	Others
1987	Rosen	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	The operation of power	Entity
1987	Boorstin	History	Dramaturgy	Drama	S	Historical events are theatricalised by the media	Entity
1987	Arditi	Sociology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Sociological research	Others
1990	Brissett & Edgeley	Social Psychology	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Social and political encounters are dramatic	Others
1990	Bennett	English Studies	Role Theory	Drama	D/W	Audiences play a role	Entity
1990	Leary & Kowalski	Sociology	IM/ Dramaturgy	Theatre	S	Self-awareness/management of appearance	Others
1991	Landy	Drama Therapy	Role Theory	Drama	D	The working of the unconscious mind	Others
1991	Baker & Faulkner	Sociology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Norms of behaviour (roles) are resources	Others
1991	Czarniawska-Joerges	OR	Dramatism	Drama	D	Motivated action	Others
1992	Benford & Hunt	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Social movements are dramas	Entity
1992	Esherick & Wasserstrom	Political Science	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Political protest involves strategic action	Entity
1992	Holmes	Nursing	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Nursing is an aesthetic praxis	The self
1992	Jacobs	Social Science	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Social life may require deception	Others
1992	Tseelon	Sociology	IM	Performance	D	Self-awareness re appearance	Everyone
1992	Gardner	Mgement Theory	IM	Performance	D/S	Organization life required attention to appearances	Entity
1993	Starratt	Leadership Theory	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Leaders as active players	Others

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
1993	Borrecia	Theatre Studies	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S	Politics is dramatic because it is representational	Entity
1993	Bryant	OR	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D/S/W	Organization life involves setting, dress, staging etc for audiences	Entity
1994	Callero	Social Psychology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Roles are the link between structure and agency	Everyone
1994	Osburn	Theatre Studies	Dramaturgy	Drama	D/W	Drama structures life and narrations of life	Others
1995	Guthrie	Political Science	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Protests as staged conflicts	Entity
1995	Alexander	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Theatre	D	Theatre provides terminology to analyse social life/theory	Others
1996: Vicki Bell uses Performance/Performativity in political theory
1996	Bealing et al	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	The performance of authority	Entity
1997	Eldridge	Theatre Studies	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Social interaction	Others
1998	Welbourne et al	Mgement Theory	Role Theory	Performance	D	Measuring employee productivity	Others
1998	Flyvberg	Political Studies	IM	Drama	D	Politics is an endless drama involving front/back-stage action	Others
1998	Clark & Salaman	Mgement Theory	IM	Performance	D/S	The production of persuasive images	Entity
1998	Gardner & Avolio	OR	Dramaturgy/IM	Performance	D/S	Charismatic leadership	Others
1998	Bilbow & Yeung	OR	IM/ Dramaturgy	Theatre	S	Self-awareness/management of appearance cross-culturally	Others
1999	Vogelgesang	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Role play is a form of experimentation	Others
1999	Pine & Gilmour	Organization Studies	Dramatism	Drama	D/S/W	Organizations engage in strategies of presentation/interpretation	Entity
2000	Zhao	Political Science	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Strategies of political activism	Others
2000	Parker-Oliver	Social Science	Role Theory	Drama	D	Organized social interaction	Others
2001	Cronin	IR	Role Theory	Drama	D	Nations can suffer from 'role strain'	Entity
2001	Oswick et al	Mgement Theory	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Organizational change	Entity
2001	Harvey	OR	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Charismatic leadership	Other
2001	Kärreman	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Purposeful behaviour	Entity
2001	Morgan & Krone	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Leaders engage in manipulative behaviour	Others
2001	Boje et al	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Organizations engage in manipulative behaviour	Entity
2001	Vickers & Kouzmin	OR	IM	Performance	D/S	Policy tools affect the way actors behave	Others
2002	Jewkes	Criminology	IM	Performance	D/S	Social interaction under the gaze of others	Others

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
2002	Meyer	Media Studies	Role Theory	Drama	D/S	The media structures performances for spectators	Entity
2002	Wood	OR	Dramatism/ Dramaturgy	Drama/ Cinema	D/S	Organizations stage their appearances	Entity
2002	Monk-Turner	Sociology	Role Theory	Performance	D/	Gendered behaviour	Others
2002	James & Mullen	Education	Role Theory	Drama	D	Preparation for life	Others
2003	Smits & Ally	OR	Role Theory	Performance	D	Leadership in a crisis	Others
2003	Pierce et al	Social Psychology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Gendered behaviour	Others
2003	Covaleski et al	OR	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Conflict management	Entity
2003	Schmitt	Social Psychology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Gendered behaviour	Other
2003	Simon	Theatre Practice	Role Theory	Drama	W	Audiences play a role in the theatre	Entity
2004	Szinovacz & Davey	Social Psychology	Role Theory	Drama	D	Humans inhabit roles	Everyone
2004	Thompson	Social Comm	Role Theory	Performance	D	Gendered behaviour is patterned	Others
2004	Rozario et al	Gerontology	Role Theory	Performance	D	Social life involves patterned behaviour	Others
2004	Clark & Mangham	Mgement Studies	IM	Performance	D	Organizations use strategies of deflection	Entity
2004	Beer & De Landtsheer	Political Studies	Dramaturgy/ Dramatism	Performance	D/S	Political life and political theory are signifying activities	Entity
2004	Ku	Political Science	Dramaturgy	Drama	D	Politics uses strategies to control events	Entity
2004	Hughes & Wilson	Theatre Studies	Role Theory	Performance	D	Patterned behaviour	Others
2005	Warhust	Political Studies	IM	Performance	D	Political life involves strategies of appearance	Entity
2005	Schaap	Political Studies/ Education	Role Theory	Performance	D	Patterned behaviour	Other
2005	Brown	Political Comm	Dramaturgy/ Dramatism	Performance	D/S	Political life is a theatrical and symbolic domain	Entity
2005	Winner	Theatre Studies/ Education	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/W	Participant Observation	Entity
2005	Hajer	Public Policy	Dramaturgy	Performance	D	Engaging in public policy making involves strategies of performance	Others
2007	Mor	Political Science/IR	IM	Performance	D/S	Diplomacy	Entity

Date	Author	Field	Theory	From	Focus	To Describe	In relation to:
2007	Freeman & Peck	Public Policy	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/S	Policy actors engage in strategies of performance and appearance	Others
2009	Hendriks	Public Policy	Dramaturgy	Drama	D/S	Representation is staged and performed	Others
2010	Hang No & Kidder	Sociology	Dramaturgy	Performance	D/S	The expression of emotion	Others

Totals: 125 records (22% of all theatre metaphor records listed in Appendix C Tables 1-17)

Role Theory	37	29%
Impression Management	22	17%
Dramatism	14	11%
Dramaturgy	60	48%

(Note: 11 records use a combination of streams)

Focus

Doing	75 records
Showing	5 records
Watching	2 records
Doing/Showing	26 records
Doing/Watching	10 records
Doing/Showing/Watching	7 records

Appendix C: The Use of the Theatre Metaphor (CD files)

Tables 1-17: Historical Tables

Table 1/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator to the Christian era
Table 2/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: early Christian era
Table 3/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: Middle Ages to 1574
Table 4/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1576 to 1700
Table 5/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1701 to 1776
Table 6/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1777 to 1900
Table 7/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1901 to 1939
Table 8/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1940 to 1969
Table 9/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1970 to 1974
Table 10/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1975 to 1979
Table 11/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1980 to 1985
Table 12/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1986 to 1989
Table 13/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1990 to 1994
Table 14/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 1995 to 1999
Table 15/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 2000 to 2003
Table 16/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 2004 to 2006
Table 17/17	The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: 2007 to 2010

Note: Tables are broken according to the table capacity of Microsoft Word. Tables larger than 100kb tend to become unstable. Tables are paginated individually.

Organisation of history tables (1-17):

Works are listed chronologically by publication date. Where more than one work is listed for an author, the date is taken to be the first work listed. For ancient texts where publication dates are unknown, chronology is by estimated date according to current scholarship or, in the absence of such a date, from the author's life dates.

The tables provide an overview of the uses of the theatre metaphor, with a particular focus on how they relate to spectators. Analysis within these tables is provided in terms of what the metaphor was used to describe, what the metaphor offered to the user, what this allowed the user to express about the aspect of life being described, what kind of spectator position was adopted by the metaphor user and the focus of the metaphor in relation to the three categories noted in Chapter 1: doing, showing or watching.

The spectator that the metaphor constructs may be either explicit or implied, and can be external to the world, internal (within the world postulated by the metaphor) or externalized. An externalized spectator is one whose use of the metaphor suggests a detached position. This is typically the position taken by users of the metaphor. An internalized spectator is a self-conscious spectator – one who observes themselves as the 'actor'.

The author's purpose in using the metaphor was also assessed as follows:

- '+' the metaphor provided a positive description of the aspect of life under consideration
- '-' the metaphor provided a negative description of the aspect of life under consideration
- '+/-' the metaphor provided an ambivalent description of the aspect of life under consideration

Shading:

Title shading: shading indicates that theatre rather than drama has been used as the metaphor.

Author shading: the author has been identified as a political writer either because of long-standing association with the field of politics or because they have specified their position in relation to politics or, failing this information, because the work cited has appeared in a recognized political publication.

Note: authors who appear in both the theatre metaphor tables and the theatre theory tables (Appendix D) are highlighted in bold.

Referencing of table material: sources are acknowledged in endnotes to each table to avoid clutter. However, I wish to acknowledge a particular debt to Christian (1987) for material up to the Renaissance.

Table 1/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator to the Christian era

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Pre-Plato: ‘attribution of the topos (theatrum mundi) ... before the late C5thBCE is usually spurious’.¹ Weisinger argues that the theatrum mundi metaphor was not in Greek thought before Plato (1964: 63); Christian says it could not plausibly exist before theatre itself however, this could have predated Plato, since the first record of a theatrical event in Athens was 534BCE when a contest was established for the best tragedy.² Certainly, the relationship was perceived by many Greek writers after drama became well-established. Diogenes Laertes attributes a form of it involving the spectator to Pythagoras. The metaphor of life as theatre was ‘a common one in antiquity’, and did not seem to rely on contemporary attitudes towards the theatre itself. For example, whilst it was no disgrace for Greek citizens to appear on stage, Roman citizens who appeared on stage lost their citizenship. Roman culture had a disdain for anyone who allowed themselves to be used. Acting was seen as a form of use because of the need to please the audience.³ Note: In ancient optics theory, seeing was thought to be tactile. Either the object of scrutiny had a physical effect on the observer, or vice versa. A gaze could ‘penetrate’ to the extent that the Roman writer Achilles Tatius suggested that mutual gazing could ‘enable consummation of sex at a distance’.⁴ Seeing was therefore a form of action. One could be injured by what one saw because seeing was the pathway to the soul. Consequently, Leontius in Plato’s Republic ‘damned his eyes for wanting to sate themselves on the sight of dead bodies’.⁵ Seneca also claimed that ‘[t]here is nothing so injurious to good character as sitting idly at some spectacle, for then the vices creep in more easily’,⁶ and Augustine reported that his friend Alypius, when he opened his eyes at a gladiator show ‘was struck by a deeper blow in his soul than the gladiator in his body’.⁷ Sight ‘broadly sows a wondrous force, a fiery ray ... man both experiences this and inflicts many things through it’.⁸ Note: Wars are almost continuous throughout this period
SEEING AS A FORM OF ACTION EXTERNAL TO THE SELF and perhaps external to the world
	Pythagoras (c550-c500BCE)	Theoria (looking): Pythagoras is said to have claimed that the life of man resembled a festival, in which some competed, while others (‘the best’) were spectators. Nightingale cites scholarship indicating that the saying came from Heraclides of Pontus, Greek astronomer and member of Plato’s academy, who put it into Pythagoras’ mouth in order to provide such ancient credibility for Plato’s model of philosophical spectatorship, which he based on the traditional practice of civic theoria , in which special spectators were selected by the city to attend and witness particular festivals or religious events and report back to the city. ⁹ Nevertheless, the saying as attributed to Pythagoras influenced the neo-Platonics, especially Plotinus. ¹⁰ The aim was to argue that spectatorship was integral to human life, but some spectators (philosophers) were better than others: ‘passionless observance’ was an ideal to be cultivated in the Greek and Roman worlds, ¹¹ although most spectators were easily deluded.	Philosophical life	A seeing-place A relationship between actors and spectators	Detachment	Externalised: philosopher Watching (+/-)
Book of Job	Job	Job is thought to have lived sometime during or immediately	The human	An acting space	Fatalism	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
VIII	(c600-500BCE)	after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians: '[f]or we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow' (Job VIII: 9). Human life is ephemeral.	condition			Prophet Doing (-)
Fragments	Heraclitus of Ephesus (fl. C504BCE)	Heraclitus was 'the philosopher of flux' – all things change in a world which is a plaything of the gods (this metaphor is taken up by Plato in the Laws). Heraclitus' formulation of logos sets up the connection between man and the cosmos that future uses of the theatrum mundi attempt to explain. The Stoics, Plotinus and Philo all call logos 'the Director of man on the stage of life'. ¹² For Heraclitus, 'the concept of necessary logos implied that man must play the part assigned him in life; or, if he desired gnosis (that is, knowledge of divinity) ... he could choose the role of spectator.' ¹³ In general Heraclitus had 'an aristocratic disdain for the masses' who he thought lived their lives unaware of what was going on around them. ¹⁴ Although man must act, spectatorship as contemplation (theoria) could be chosen by those who wished to gain knowledge of divinity. Spectatorship (as philosophy) was a form of action – a part one could choose i.e. philosophy could be justified as a superior form of action. Man must as act as directed but spectatorship offered awareness as well.	The human condition	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator Teleology	Detachment Awareness, leading to knowledge Fatalism	Externalised: Logos ; the philosopher Doing/ Watching (+/-)
490-449BCE: Persian Wars
Trojan Women	Euripides (480-406BCE) Greek Tragedian	Fortune directs the play of life. Life is determined by Fortune – there is nothing man can do but play his part.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Acceptance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	External: Fortune Doing (+/-)
	Democritus (c460-c362BCE)	Man is both actor and spectator: 'The world's a stage, Life's a play, You come, you look, you go away.' ¹⁵ An alternative translation reads: 'The world is a stage, life is a journey; you go, you see, you depart'. ¹⁶ In this case, it need not be taken as a theatre metaphor. The aim was to point out that life was as	The human condition	A seeing place A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Acceptance	Internal Man Doing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		ephemeral as the theatre; the human condition involved both action and spectatorship: man is both actor and spectator of the play of Life on the stage of the world. ¹⁷
De Victu	Hippocrates (c460-c377BCE)	One of the first instances where the word hypokritike (the art of acting) takes on the meaning associated with the modern word hypocrisy : ‘the art of acting (hypokritike) knows how to deceive; they say one thing, but think another’. ¹⁸ This will come to have significance for future uses of the theatre metaphor concerned with how we can tell the difference between reality and illusion, a theme which particularly interested C18th thinkers. The aim was to warn of the human capacity for deception	The human capacity for deception	A constructed art	Duplicity	Internal: Theatre-goers Showing (-)
	Aristophanes (c448-c380BCE) Greek dramatist	Theatre is like life; life is like theatre. The Frogs (405): exhibits a high degree of ‘theatrical self-consciousness’. Fragmentary evidence indicates that comedy of the period was ‘replete with references to the world as a stage’. ¹⁹ The aim was fun, and to criticize Athenian life.	Social and political life	A seeing-place A relationship between actors and spectator	Self-consciousness; Amusement; critique	Internal: Man Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
431-404BCE : Peloponnesian Wars; during this period there was upheaval in Athens. A coup d’etat created a ‘people’s assembly’ in 411. Democracy was restored in 403. 439 : Plebeian revolt in Rome. 395-387 Corinthian War
History of the Peloponnesian War (c404)	Thucydides (c460-c404BCE)	Thucydides used Greek drama and mythology as an organizing principle to structure his history. ²⁰	Political events	A seeing-place A constructed art	Objectification Structure Coherence	Externalised: Historian Doing (+/-)
Laws (c357); Timaeus (c380); Philebus (after c367); Apology ; Symposium ; Critias ; Charmides ; Clitophon ; Republic (c380) ²¹	Plato (c427-347BCE) ²² Greek philosopher	The creator of the world is a demiourgos (artisan) (Timaeus 28). ²³ Life is a play; man is a puppet of the gods; theatre imitates life, which imitates Life: ‘not only on the stage, but on the greater stage of life, and was a mixture of tragedy and comedy’ (Philebus 50b). Man should imitate ‘the good’ not imitate an imitation; comedy by its very nature, imitates the worst in humans and therefore corrupts; to act is to be hypocritical. Humans are ‘puppets ... whose strings are manipulated by the gods’. But ‘All of us, then, men and women alike, must fall in with our roles and spend life in making our play as perfect as	Political life; Learning	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Detachment Objectification which allows Knowledge but also allows deception Fatalism An ethics of responsibility in the face of	External: the gods; Externalised: the philosopher Internal: other men Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		possible' (Laws 803c). Lawmakers compose 'the finest drama' (Laws 818b). Theatre should be used by the state to educate and improve morality (Republic 659c), not for the seeking of popularity, which makes judicial courts full of noise 'as though they were in a theatre' (Laws 876b) and attacks civil order. The 'skillful tragic dramatist should also be a comic poet' (Symposium 223d) since life felt like a blend of tragedy and comedy.²⁴ In Laws (659), Plato provided three criteria by which art (music, poetry and dance) could be judged: social and moral (no representation of evil or vice could be called beautiful); pleasure (beneficial) and true to life (good and consistent characterization; appropriateness of words and/or music to situation and character): 'let's imagine that each of us living being is a puppet made by gods, Whether we have been constructed to serve as their plaything, or for some serious reason, is something beyond our ken, but what we certainly do know is this: we have these emotions in us, which act like cords or strings and tug us about ... to make us perform actions that are opposed correspondingly ... the moral point of this fable, in which we appear as puppets' if we understand the excellent force exerted by law' (Laws 6454b). Plato embedded his concept within an understanding of philosophy modelled on civic theoria: philosophers were special kinds of spectators who contemplated the world in order to gain knowledge. This set them apart from other men, but also meant they were particularly suited to rule. Theoria is concerned with the vision of eternal verities. Plato's use of the metaphor served as an important model for Puritan usage.²⁵ (Plato was the first to use this model of spectatorship, although it was retrospectively attributed to Pythagoras by his pupil Heraclides).²⁶ His aim could be said to be pedagogic, to favour order (keeping man in his place) and to promote wonder as a source of learning (available to and through philosophers).			determinism

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Diogenes the Cynic ²⁷ (404-323BCE)	Diogenes Laertius was said to have thought of himself as ‘a tragic figure, pursued by the Furies’; ²⁸ he was described by Plato as ‘Socrates run mad’. ²⁹	Philosophical life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification leading to self-consciousness	Externalised: cynic Doing (-)
	Heraclides of Pontus (c388-c315BCE)	Heraclides was a member of Plato’s Academy, and subscribed to Plato’s model of civic theoria for the activity of philosophy. He said, but attributed to Pythagoras, that philosophers were like theoros who were sent to attend and observe festivals in order to argue that philosophical spectatorship was the ‘most liberal’ form of life. Cicero summarised his writings in Tusculan Disputations as: ‘The life of man resembles the festival [at Olympia] celebrated with the most magnificent games before a gathering collected from all of Greece. For at this festival some men trained their bodies and sought to win the glorious distinction of a crown, and others came to make a profit by buying and selling. But there was also a certain class, made up of the noblest men, who sought neither applause nor gain, but came for the sake of spectating and closely watched the event and how it was done’ in order to understand ‘the nature of things’. ³⁰	Philosophical life	A seeing-place	Detachment Understanding; Knowledge	Internal: ordinary spectators Externalised: The noblest men – philosophers Watching (+/-)
343-290BCE Samnite Wars; 334-323 Wars of Alexander the Great; 355BCE : Alexander the Great destroys Thebes
Nichomachean Ethics ; Poetics (c330BCE) Politics (c335-322BCE)	Aristotle (382-322BCE) Greek philosopher	Theatre imitates life but imitation ‘can represent things ... as they were or are or as they are said or thought to be or to have been, or as they ought to be’ (Poetics 1460 b.5-10), thus imitation can provide not just a copy but a re- or new fashioning; ³¹ there is a distinction between action and spectating: spectating (theoria) involves contemplation. Theoria in the Nichomachean Ethics forms the basis for moral action: ‘ Man the actor is dependent on man the spectator to delineate for him the moral basis for right action ’. ³² Christian argues that the discussion of moral action is an attempt to balance action and contemplation (looking) by arguing that contemplation is about producing practical wisdom (phronēsis) and can therefore be seen as a form	Moral life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Objectification allowing Moral guidance	Internal: Other men; Externalised: the philosopher Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		of action , although unlike Plato he does not link this specifically to civic life. Theoria : is the function of the moral man and forms the basis for moral actions. Aristotle also discusses rule in terms of role-play: ‘The tyrant should act or appear to act in the character of a king’ (Politics V, 1314a.35). Aristotle was ‘an observant theatregoer’ as well as a collector and reader of play texts. He collected the first great library of antiquity, which contained a large number of plays. He was also something of a dandy. According to Diogenes Laertius (Lives of the Philosophers), he curled his hair in an affected manner, spoke with a lisp and wore a great many rings. ³³
As suggested above by Aristotle, ethical life for Greek (and later Roman) citizens was a public life lived as an exemplar for others. As such it was subject to the critical ‘gaze’ of others, particularly one’s peers and one’s community: ‘the notion of the self as seen by others was thought to provide the “truest” idea of who one is’,³⁴ as well as the counter to one’s individual passions and desires. The mirror, a rare and expensive commodity, was seen as a means by which one might search for wisdom because it offered a form of objectification by which one could see oneself as others did and, if necessary, correct one’s behaviour. Theatre was also seen in this light. It offered a mirror to the society – not as a reflection of society but as a means by which the values of the society could be questioned and judged. Perhaps because of this, in Greek times, there was no disgrace in a citizen appearing on the stage as an actor.³⁵ By Roman times, there existed an ‘ideology of the gaze’ in which ‘to be the object of others’ sight was to be open to attack, yet to be publicly observed was proof of power’:³⁶ ‘the gaze that compelled the elite to exemplarity was felt to be everywhere: the gaze of the commoners upon the magistrates and the nobility; the gaze of the senators among themselves in the Curia or in the court; the gaze of noble ancestors upon generations of their progeny’.³⁷ All the institutions of the Roman republic were shaped by ‘the judging force of a collective gaze’, epitomised in the office of the censors, and being visible for the elite was a form of power: ‘A daily throng to lead you down to the Forum brings a great reputation and great authority’.³⁸ Elite Romans were reminded constantly that they were before an audience and must behave in an exemplary manner: ‘You will live as it were in a theater with the whole world as spectators, and if you err it will be impossible to escape notice even for the briefest time’.³⁹ The gaze was ‘a web of institutions and practices’ which involved everyone. Even in 4th and 5th century Greece, ‘the constraining presence of a viewer is often posited as the cause of moral behavior, even when the audience is mortal’.⁴⁰ Plato’s discussion of the Ring of Gyges, which allows its wearer to be invisible, epitomises this understanding. Glaucon argues, against Socrates, that there is no incentive to behave morally if one cannot be seen (Plato The Republic).
Letter to Herodotus; On Nature ⁴¹	Epicurus (c341-270BCE) Athenian philosopher	Epicurus’ epigram is included here because it is widely seen in the literature as a theatre metaphor. Careful reading however indicates that it is rather a theory of spectatorship and may well have a place in Theatre Theory. Epicurus believed that theatre (‘Shews’) is like life; it provides an exhibition of life which allows the wise man to understand how passion moves men. This allows him to remain undisturbed: ‘The Wise Man ... shall reap	Philosophical life	A seeing-place	Knowledge	Externalised: The Wise Man; Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		more Benefit, and take more Satisfaction in the public Shews, than other Men. He there observes the different Characters of the Spectators; he can discover by their looks the effect of the Passions that moves 'em, and amidst the Confusion that reigns in these places ... he has the Pleasure to find himself the only person undisturb'd, and in a State of Tranquillity.'⁴² He can achieve this because the gods, if they exist, are remote. '[W]e nothing have to hope and nothing fear' from them.⁴³ Nevertheless, one can aim to be an undisturbed spectator who passively contemplates the world: the 'principle of detached spectatorship' is an accomplishment.⁴⁴ This principle was fundamental to the later Stoics and Satirists. McGillivray argues that Epicurus' version of the metaphor was a reaction to Polybius' and aimed at producing 'imperturbability' in the face of Fortune. Epicurus' account of the world was given a detailed exposition by Lucretius (c94-c50BCE) in which form it was revived in C17th. It was connected with the theatrum mundi in C18th as a way of examining 'the gulf between the detached observer of the world and the mass of men who remained imaginatively ensnared by its public rituals',⁴⁵ a use which is evident in Addison's Mr Spectator of The Spectator journal.⁴⁶
HELLENISTIC PERIOD 323BCE-31BCE.⁴⁷ 323-322 Lamian Wars; 323-280 Diadochi Wars 338BCE: Greek city states lost their independence, coming under Macedonian rule. Greek comedy ceased to produce political and social satires and turned to domestic satire (Honderich 1995: 946). Thebes was destroyed by Alexander the Great. In 287, full equality between patricians and plebeians was granted in Rome. Actors and Roman citizens, however, were at opposite ends of the spectrum of respectability and rights. Actors were infames – effeminate, given to display. At issue was penetration – the ability of others to use one's body, either by looking or by physical or sexual assault (Bartsch 2006: 154-5). This view of actors, however, does not appear to be reflected in the metaphor. Philosophers were also viewed with suspicion. 274-200 Syrian Wars 267-261 Chremonidean Wars 265-263 Kalinga War 264-241BCE: first Punic Wars
On Temperance	Bion of Borysthenes (mid	Bion was a writer of Cynic polemical tracts known as diatribes . Fortune (Tyche) produces the play of life, and assigns each role randomly. (The comparison of man to an actor became 'a much-	The human condition	A constructed art	Fatalism Resignation in the face of	External: Fortune Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	C3rdBCE)	used cliché' for the Cynics. ⁴⁸			determinism	cynic Doing (+/-)
	Teles (mid C3rdBCE) cynic	One must act under conditions over which there is no control. Life is like a play: 'the good man [performs] well the beginning, middle, and end of life' just as the good actor does; one's parts are assigned randomly ⁴⁹	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment allowing Acceptance; Self-mastery; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	Externalised: cynic Doing (+/-)
	Ariston of Chios (c300-250BCE) Follower of Zeno, founder of Stoicism	One must act under conditions over which there is no control. Compared the wise man to a good actor 'who, if called upon to take the part of a Thersites or Agamemnon, will impersonate them both becomingly.' ⁵⁰ The aim is to promote a life of perfect indifference (apatheia) to everything which is neither vice nor virtue.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment allowing Apatheia (perfect indifference), which enables endurance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	Externalised: the Stoic Doing (+/-)
	Chrysippus (c280-207 BCE) Stoic	Life, like plays, has 'ludicrous jests' (such as evil deeds and evil men) which are a necessary part of the harmonious whole. ⁵¹ Chrysippus argued for the compatibility of responsibility and determinism. ⁵² The only position to take was to be detached since life was determined by outside forces: divine agency was a 'breath' (pneuma) penetrating all things. One must to act under conditions which make no sense.	The human condition-	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment which allowed Acceptance of fate; a sense of the whole	External: divine agency Externalised: The Stoic Doing (-)
Quoted in Cicero's De	Cato the Elder	Theatre is like life, and should serve the state. Life is like theatre, and each must play their part well to the end. Nature writes the	Social and Political life	A seeing-place An acting space	Fatalism Detachment	Internal: Other men;

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Senectute	(The Censor) (234-149BCE) Stoic	play, including the final act. Others are the spectators of one's life: the elderly sit at the back of the theatre but still derive some enjoyment from the spectacle. One should use one's station in to life to good influence; and act 'life's drama nobly to the end'. ⁵³ The human condition involves both action and spectatorship.		A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	which allowed Acceptance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	the elderly Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
The Prisoners; The Swaggering Soldier;	Plautus (c254-184BCE) Roman dramatist	Life is comedy (comic reversal); life is a comedy of manners; man is a plaything of the gods; life should not be taken seriously; masters and slaves share the same vices; comedy (which reverses hierarchy) has social utility by routing vice. ⁵⁴ One must act as directed by the gods.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment which allowed Amusement Social criticism	External: The gods Externalised: the critic Doing (-)
219-201: Second Punic Wars. 201-197: Second Macedonian War. 192: war between Sparta and Rome.
	Polybius (201-118BCE) historian	Fortune (Tyche) is the playwright: history is the record of Fortune's acts ⁵⁵	Historical events	A seeing-place	Objectification which allows contextualisation	Externalised: The historian Watching (+/-)
	Terence (c185-c159BCE) Roman dramatist	Life is theatre/theatre is life: Terence delighted in extending the world of the stage to include the spectators. Terence was largely known to the Renaissance through Donatus' commentary. His works were seen as exemplary and were performed as well as read in humanist schools, although they were 'frequently treated more as a fixed storehouse of ideas and even words than as a script for performance'. The educational program for St Paul's School designed by Erasmus was principally based on reading Terence. ⁵⁶	The human condition – man is both actor and spectator	A seeing-place An acting space	Perspective which allowed amusement participation	Internal: Others Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
149-146BCE: Third Punic War; 147BCE: Greece comes under Roman control 146BCE: Rome destroyed Corinth, enslaving survivors and ending Greek independence of Rome
THE APPEARANCE OF THE INTERNALISED SPECTATOR
De Finibus; De Senectute; Epistula Quintum	Cicero (Marcus Tullius) (106-43BCE)	Life is a drama; each person has an assigned role to play. Some roles require techniques such as those used in the theatre; one's behaviour will be judged by both the gods and other and must be such that it provides an example to others. One must choose	The human condition	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Strategies of performance;	External: The gods; Internal: other men

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Fratrem; De Officiis; Ad Brutus	Roman statesman, lawyer, orator and philosopher	one's available parts carefully as they construct the self. Cicero demonstrates in his work that the metaphor has become commonplace in Stoic philosophical writing, by virtue of its adherence to the principle of apatheia or perfect indifference first preached by Zeno (c300BCE). ⁵⁷ For Cicero, the self 'was composed in the process of composing a public reputation'. For this reason he took lessons in public presentation from the great Roman actor, Roscius. The techniques of acting helped him to 'retain a rational control over his performance'. The wise man, 'just like the player ... recognizes that he must carefully consider the roles he chooses to play on the world's stage' and choose those 'in which they are best able to accommodate their talents': ⁵⁸ 'Let each man know his own nature and show himself a keen judge of his good points and vices, lest actors seem to have more wisdom than we do. They choose, not the best plays, but the ones best suited to them ... We will therefore work in those areas ... to which we are best suited'. ⁵⁹ Both lawyers and actors 'had to move an audience by temporarily inhabiting a role, but while the actor merely imitated reality ... lawyers enacted a civic reality constituted in part by their very performances. This required more control'. ⁶⁰ Since Roman life was lived in public, and under the scrutiny of others, Cicero reminds Brutus after the death of his wife that '[y]ou must put yourself at the service of the people and the theater [scaenae], as it is said. For since the eyes not only of your army, but of all the citizens and almost of the entire world, are cast on you, it is not at all appropriate that he through whom we are all braver should himself seem weakened in mind'. ⁶¹ One should therefore play one's part well, especially the third act (tertius actus): suicide is an acceptable way 'to leave the theatre when the play no longer pleases'. ⁶²		A relationship between actors and spectator		Internalised: the aware self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
	Cato the Younger	Life is theatre; one must submit to the part in which God has cast one ⁶³	The human condition	An acting space	Fatalism Detachment	External: God Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	(95-46BCE)				which allowed Acceptance; Endurance
Stoics (early): Life is drama: each person has an assigned role to play which ought to be played as well as possible before the judgment of an audience of one's peers. Although optics theory continued to see seeing as a tactile process in which injury could be inflicted upon both observer and object of observation, the 'ideology of the gaze' which existed in Roman (elite) culture saw the elite Roman as 'the giver of images' or example rather than the object of others' interpretation. He was only vulnerable to the gaze of his peers, not to the gaze of slaves or lower classes. Philosophical writings continually stressed the differences between orators and citizens in their public persona and actors, who were generally considered on a par with (and were often) slaves. Actors were associated with leisure, not public work, performed the words of others rather than wrote their own, pretended to be someone else, wore costume, displayed themselves for the pleasure of others rather than as a demonstration of virtue, and were paid for their appearances.⁶⁴ Note that the use of persona did not imply deception, dissimulation or concealment; it meant propriety and decorum in the performance of one's civil or public office such that one's conduct provided an example for others. Ideally, for a Stoic, one's public persona and private self were consistent and recognizable, something which became problematic during the reign of emperors such as Caligula and Nero when survival as an elite Roman could depend on presenting a public face which hid one's true feelings.
De Rerum Natura	Lucretius (c95-c52BCE) Roman poet	Man is both actor and spectator, but spectatorship is best. 'The most detailed classical exposition of the atomist, hedonist and purportedly atheistic doctrines of Epicurus (341-271BCE)'. ⁶⁵ Life is a drama; the position of spectator is best : 'Sweet it is, when the surface of the great sea is ruffled by the turbulent winds, to gaze (spectare) from the land on the hard work of another'. ⁶⁶ Lucretius is continually cited as an authority in discussions on the position of the spectator and on the need for emotional distance in theories of rhetoric and theatre (see John Digby 1712, Abbé DuBos 1719, Edmund Burke 1790 for example). His comment forms the basis of the theme of 'shipwreck with spectator' analysed by Blumenberg, and is extensively used by a variety of theorists in C17th and C18th during debates over the role of spectators, theorists, theatre, the emotions, the passions, and any number of other concerns, but particularly, the value of detachment. Nevertheless danger has its uses: 'Look at a man in the midst of doubt and danger, and you will learn in his hour of adversity what he really is. It is then that the true utterances are wrung from the recesses of his breast. The	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space	Fatalism Detachment which allowed Tranquillity Truth	Externalised: The fortunate or enlightened man Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		mask is torn off: the reality remains'. ⁶⁷
90BCE: Civil war in Rome. 88BCE: uprisings in Athens against Roman rule 84BCE: Aristotle's works brought to Rome by Sulla
Epistle II	Horace (c68-8BCE) Roman poet, philosopher and drama critic	Life is determined, and lived under the scrutiny of others. Life is a comedy, a mimus vitae ; humans are 'wooden puppets'; the behaviour of the audience is more hilarious than the spectacle. The Gods and ancient philosophers (e.g. Democritas, the 'laughing philosopher') watch humans, who watch each other. The idea of the Laughing Philosopher as the spectator of the comedy of life continues as an unbroken line from Horace to Robert Burton. ⁶⁸ Horace was a 'discriminating theatre-goer of fastidious predilections, who found Plautus crude and overrated'. He is said to have 'detested the vulgar mob and deplored the poor taste of "unlearned and foolish spectators" who called for bears or boxers'. ⁶⁹	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space	Visibility Fatalism Detachment enabling Judgment Acceptance	External: The Gods; ancient philosophers; Internal: the mob; men in general Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
49BCE: Caesar starts a civil war to overthrow Pompey; becomes dictator of Rome in 45BCE.
De Opificio Mundi	Philo of Alexandria (c20BCE-c50CE) Jewish philosopher influenced by Plato	The world is a spectacle created by God for man: 'The Ruler of all things ...made ready before-hand ... a banquet and a most sacred' spectacle (theatron hierôtaton). ⁷⁰ (This is thus a modification of the 'Pythagorean' role of the spectator as philosopher, opening out the possibility of wisdom to all men as spectators). The Creator is revealed through His creation, the world (synthesis of Platonic and Jewish beliefs – an early sign of the emergence of neo-Platonism. ⁷¹	The purpose of man in relation to the world	A seeing-place A constructed art	Objectification enabling Wisdom; A knowledge of God	Internal: Man Externalised: philosopher Showing (+)
31BCE: End of the Roman Republic and the Hellenistic period.

¹ Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc.p.1.

² Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth: 58

³ Bartsch, Shadi. 2006. The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press: 219n94

⁴ Bartsch 2006: 4

⁵ Bartsch 2006: 162

⁶ Epistles 7.2, in Bartsch 2006: 161

⁷ Confessions 6.8 in Bartsch 2006: 161n112

⁸ Plutarch, Quaest. Conv. 5.7 in Bartsch 2006: 145

⁹ Nightingale, Andrea Wilson. 2004. Spectacles of Truth in Classical Greek Philosophy: Theoria in its Cultural Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 17-18

¹⁰ Christian 1987: 3. Little is actually known of Pythagoras' teachings. Diogenes Laertes (C3rd AD) attributes the emphasis on spectatorship to Pythagoras (Christian 1987; Honderich 1995). Iamblichus also attributes the saying to Pythagoras in his book Life of Pythagoras (Nightingale 2004: 17n38). Nightingale argues that the idea was retrospectively applied to Pythagoras by C4BCE thinkers who were trying to legitimate the idea of philosophy as a specific kind of activity.

¹¹ Hundert, E.J. 1992. 'Augustine and the Sources of the Divided Self'. Political Theory 20 (1) pp. 86-104: 88. This ideal was declared to be impossible to achieve by St Augustine, and in any case, the passions could lead to virtuous acts – it was not true that they always led to moral error, and reason could also be used for evil ends. What was morally crucial was not detachment but the ability to choose good over evil. It was pride, not passion which rendered reason incapable of choosing good (Hundert 1992: 89-93).

¹² Christian 1987: 3

¹³ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]: 158

¹⁴ Graham, Daniel 2006, 'Heraclitus', The Internet Encyclopedia of Philosophy, www.iep.utm.edu/h/heraclit.htm, accessed 21/07/2008.

¹⁵ Attributed to Democritus by Sir Edmund Chambers in a biography of Shakespeare published in 1930, but disputed by Christian, not least because it was unlikely that the word for stage (skênê or 'tent') would have had a theatrical meaning at the time. No stage as such (as a raised platform) existed until the late Hellenistic period. Aristotle uses the phrase epi skênês to mean roughly 'on the stage'. The poem has also been attributed to Democrates of Aphidnai (flor. C350-330BCE) (Christian 1987: 2; 208n3).

¹⁶ In Vickers, Brian. 1971. 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery'. Studies in the Literary Imagination 4 (1) pp. 189-226: 199

¹⁷ This paradox in itself would probably be enough to dispute the attribution to Democritus. According to Weisinger (1964: 63), it does not otherwise appear until the late Renaissance.

¹⁸ Christian 1987: 4

¹⁹ Christian 1987: 9

²⁰ Cornford, F.M., 1907, Thucydides Mythistoricus; cited in Denning, Greg. 1996. Performances. Carlton South, Victoria: Melbourne University Press: 17.

²¹ Most dates for Plato's works are contested.

²² Sidnell has 429-327BCE: Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press

²³ Plato, Timaeus, in Cooper, J.M. (ed), Plato: Complete Works, trans. Donald Zeyl, Indianapolis, Cambridge, Hackett Publishing Company, pp. 1224-1291. According to Curtius (1990/1948: 138) (see below), Timaeus was the only work of Plato's that the Middle Ages possessed.

²⁴ Plato Symposium, in Cooper, J.M. (ed) Plato: Complete Works, trans. A. Nehamas and P. Woodruff, Indianapolis, Cambridge, Hackett Publishing Company, pp. 457-505.

²⁵ Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press: 17

²⁶ Nightingale 2004: 17n17

²⁷ The term 'cynic' meant 'one who lives a dog's life: shamelessly and without any settled home' (Clark, Stephen 1995, 'Cynics' in Honderich The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, p.1661995: 174).

-
- ²⁸ Christian 1987: 13
- ²⁹ Clark, Stephen 1995: 173.
- ³⁰ Nightingale 2004: 17-18
- ³¹ Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI).: 398
- ³² Christian 1987: 7-9
- ³³ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books: 43.
- ³⁴ Bartsch 2006: 3
- ³⁵ Bartsch 2006: 23
- ³⁶ Parker, Holt. 1999. 'The Observed of All Observers: Spectacle, Applause, and Cultural Poetics in the Roman Theater Audience'. In The Art of Ancient Spectacle, edited by B. Bergmann and C. Kondoleon. New Haven, Conn: 167
- ³⁷ Bartsch 2006: 117
- ³⁸ Cicero, Commentariolum petitionis 34-37, in Bartsch 2006: 122
- ³⁹ Dio Cassius, Roman History 53.6.2. in Bartsch 2006: 123
- ⁴⁰ Bartsch 2006: 135-7
- ⁴¹ Preserved in Diogenes Laertius' Lives of the Eminent Philosophers. The most complete account of Epicurus' teachings is in Lucretius' De rerum natura (Gaskin 1995: 240 in Honderich.
- ⁴² Quoted from John Digby's Epicurus's Morals (1712) in Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 147.
- ⁴³ J.C.A. Gaskin 1995, 'Epicurus', in Honderich 1995: 240.
- ⁴⁴ McGillivray 2007: 159
- ⁴⁵ Hundert 1994: 147
- ⁴⁶ Paulson, Ronald. 1976. 'Life as Journey and as Theater: Two Eighteenth-Century Narrative Structures'. New Literary History 8 (1) pp. 43-58
- ⁴⁷ Generally refers to the principal philosophical movements of this period: Stoicism, Epicureanism and Scepticism, which included Roman as well as Greek scholarship, e.g. Seneca and Cicero, and some schools not associated with these three movements e.g. Theophrastus (Aristotelian).
- ⁴⁸ Curtius 1990/1948: 138
- ⁴⁹ Christian 1987: 13
- ⁵⁰ According to Diogenes Laertes, Lives of the Eminent Philosophers, VII, 160, cited in Christian 1987: 14. Note that in Greek drama, actors often had to be cued for their entrance, either because they did not know when they were to come in, or because where they were situated prevented them from following what was going on. Synesius of Cyrene (c373-c414) was critical of those who entered before their cue (q.v.).
- ⁵¹ Reported by Plutarch in De Communibus Notitiis 1065 D, cited in Christian 1987: 14
- ⁵² Honderich 1995: 134.
- ⁵³ Quoted by Cicero in De Senectute, cited in Christian 1987: 16 and Richards 1991: 24.

⁵⁴ Plautus and Plato thus represent opposite poles in the arguments over the value of comedy (whether it has social utility or whether it corrupts the state) which have continued down through the centuries to the present day (Richards 1991: 22).

⁵⁵ Christian 1987: 11

⁵⁶ West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 261; 283n36

⁵⁷ Christian 1987: 15

⁵⁸ Hundert 1992: 94

⁵⁹ De Officiis 1.136 in Bartsch 2006: 219

⁶⁰ Hundert 1992: 95-6

⁶¹ Ad. Brut 1.9.2. in Bartsch 2006: 123

⁶² De Finibus I,XV, 49, quoted by Christian 1987: 16.

⁶³ Christian 1987: 16

⁶⁴ Bartsch 2006: 159

⁶⁵ Hundert 1994: 17

⁶⁶ Christian 1987: 11; translation by Christian.

⁶⁷ De Rerum Natura III in Vickers 1971: 204

⁶⁸ Christian 1987: 24

⁶⁹ Gerould 2000: 68.

⁷⁰ Philo, trans/ed F.H. Colson & G.H. Whitaker, 10 vols., Loeb Classical Library, London 1929, I: 62-3, quoted in Christian 1987: 44. The word theatron is translated as 'display'. Christian points out that the word means 'either "theater" or "spectacle"' (Christian 1987: 44). I have substituted 'spectacle' to draw out the emphasis on the spectator in De Opificio Mundi.

⁷¹ Christian 1987: 44

Table 2/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: early Christian era

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The late Stoic version of the metaphor, that life is a play and that humans are directed by the divine, and endurance in the face of the judgment of others is required epitomised by Seneca, and is picked up by the Christians, and played out in a metaphorical ‘theatre’ shaped like the Roman amphitheatre.¹ Bartsch argues that Seneca marks a change in the understanding of the self (see below). 66-70: first Jewish-Roman War; 68: Roman Civil War
Ad Lucilium Epistulae Morales; De Providentia, On Tranquillity of Mind (63)	Seneca (4BCE-65CE) Roman Stoic, philosopher and dramatist	Life is lived under the scrutiny of others (and god). Seneca used the metaphor to argue that one must accept one’s part and play it well: to make of one’s life a spectaculum dignum in which one is consistent and therefore recognizable throughout all one’s life: ‘I must often use the following example, and this mime of human life is more effectively expressed by no other, this mime which assigns us the role we play badly. That fellow who strides pompously on the stage and says, with his nose in the air, “Look, I rule over Argos”, is a slave ... You can say the same about all those fops whom the litter suspends over the heads of men and over the crowds: all of their happiness is role-playing’.² Human happiness is a mask to cover our grief.³ Life is a play with a set number of acts determined by its Author. Human life is a farce (hic humanae vitae mimus) in which parts are assigned (Epistole LXXX).⁴ The life of a good man ‘is a spectacle worthy of the regard of god (deus) as he contemplates his works.’ ‘As it is with a play, so it is with life ... what matters is not how long the acting lasts, but how good it is. It is not important at what point you stop ... only make sure that you round it off with a good ending’.⁵ Bartsch argues that Seneca’s often conflicting accounts of life under the scrutiny of others reflect the increasing insecurity of elite Roman life under empire, especially during the reigns of Caligula and Nero. While he endorsed the Roman ideology of the elites as exemplars, subject only to the critical gaze of their peers, he also was aware of the potential for dissimulation in an ideology which used public visibility as a form of communal ethical control. In Seneca, we see the internalization of the	The human condition	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment which allowed Acceptance, Judgment Self-awareness; self-control; endurance; the learning of ethical behaviour the possibility of deception	External: God; Internal: others; one’s peers Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		judging spectator, not as an actual representative of the ethical community but as an idealized other. Seneca thus marks a change in the understanding of the self, taking a step towards the modern reflexive Cartesian individual. Seneca also recognized that while this self-assessing gaze was the way to wisdom, it also could ‘corrupt the behavior of the subject under observation’,⁶ a corruption exemplified in his play Medea in which Medea performs the same dialogic self-examinations endorsed by the Stoics as a way to self-knowledge and virtue, but instead of becoming a sage, becomes a monster. Medea illustrates the flaw in the Stoical form of self-examination in which the judgmental self is not grounded in the values of the individual’s community. Nevertheless, Seneca’s philosophical writings came to have a significant influence on Paul, John Chrysostom and Vives. What becomes clear in Seneca is that the foundation of Stoic virtue lies in ‘the observation of virtue in the other’ an observation which, in admiring, we come to see as ‘the conception of some great good’ to be emulated.⁷ However, since one’s public position required one to meet certain standards of civility and decorum, there was always the possibility of deception, for one’s public persona to be out of kilter with one’s private feelings. Being under the scrutiny of others could be dangerous: ‘For the continual observation of self tortures a man and he fears to be detected doing anything different from what he is accustomed; and we shall never be free from care if we think that we are being measured as often as we are looked at. For on the one hand many things happen which expose us against our will, and on the other, even if our great diligence succeeds, yet the life of those who live forever under a mask is neither pleasant nor secure (On Tranquillity 17.1.⁸ ‘It is a great achievement to play the part of just one man; no one can do it except the wise man; the rest of us take on too many different appearances. Now we seem worthy

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		and serious, now wasteful and silly; we change our mask suddenly and put on a contradictory one. Demand from yourself therefore that you play the same role to the end in which you first presented yourself; and if you can't be praised, at least make sure you can be recognized'. ⁹ In any case, force of habit can make what was initially a role part of the authentic person. Thus role-play for a Roman Stoic such as Seneca had several often contradictory possibilities: it could be a mark of self-control, an outward display of inner values, a form of dissimulation, a form of self-training and represent a desire to please (often to protect oneself or one's family). In the 'turbulent' and dangerous culture of the Roman empire, the line between self-control and self-betrayal, between ideal behaviour and necessary behaviour was very fine. Bartsch believes that Seneca took on as his project an attempt to establish a form of ethical selfhood which no longer relied on the judgment of one's peers.
1 Corinthians IV, 9.	Paul (d. c67) Leader of Christian Church	The Church is the 'true' theatre; God has made the apostles 'like men condemned to die in public as a spectacle for the whole world of angels and of mankind'. NB: here it is not the theatre but the Roman circus (and its association with an amphitheatre) which is invoked. This connotation of the word theatre was picked up and perpetuated by Isidore of Seville, and contributed to its negative connotations. Hannah Arendt argues that Paul 'discovered' 'the Will and its necessary Freedom'. Prior to Paul, freedom meant 'I can' in the sense of being able to because one was not restrained in some way. After Paul, freedom was associated with the will – free will meant one could do otherwise. This change was instigated because of a change in the perception of time from cyclical to rectilinear. Once you posit a beginning, as Judeo-Christianity does, time can no longer be cyclical. ¹⁰	Religious life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment which allowed Acceptance of martyrdom	External: Angels, Internal: mankind Showing (-)
Institutio	Quintilian	A good orator was like a gifted actor; he understood	The	An acting space	Strategies of	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Oratoria (93)	(c40-118) Roman rhetorician	'probabilities, impersonation, and ... the "appearance of truth" or verisimilia : 'there are many things which are true, but scarcely credible, just as there are many things which are plausible though false. It will therefore require just as much exertion on our part to make the judge believe what we say when it is true as it will when it is fictitious'. ¹¹	possibility of credibility	A constructed art	performance	: Judges; Internalised: actors; orators Showing (+/-)
115-117 Second Jewish/Roman War 132-135 Third Jewish War
Manual; Enchiridion	Epictetus (55-135CE)	Life is a play; men are assigned their roles by the Playwright. One must to choose to act well even though one's life was determined: 'Remember that you are an actor in a play, the character of which is determined by the Playwright ... For this is your business, to play admirably the rôle assigned you, but the selection of that rôle is Another's'. Christian considers this to be a 'classic' statement of the metaphor. ¹² This is the version explicitly taken up by Addison as Mr Spectator of The Spectator journal in C18th, and used to draw a distinction between everyday humanity and a 'Fraternity of Spectators' on earth who watched them. ¹³ It was also taken up at the same time by Fielding, who secularized the God position as 'the managers and directors of the theatre'. ¹⁴ By including a concern about appropriate timing, Epictetus suggests a greater degree of choice than previous Stoic writings: one must act appropriately at the right time, not 'out of season'. ¹⁵ The Manual was in print during the Renaissance as early as 1495. ¹⁶	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment allowing Acceptance and endurance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	External: The Playwright Doing (+/-)
Satyricon	Petronius (flor. 65) ¹⁷ Satirist/ comedy writer	Appearances can be deceptive; everyone acts a part. The world is a stage full of characters who are false friends; life is based on disguise, imposture and performance; the course of the world is determined by the follies of men and the mischief of Fortune. Only desire is fixed. Action in the world is the same as stage-acting'. ¹⁸ Petronius coined the phrase Totus mundus agit histrionen which came to be the motto of the Globe Theatre in London in 1599. ¹⁹ 'The troop is on the stage, the mime begins;	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Deception	Internal: Others Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		One is/Called father, one his son, a third the rich man:/But soon the page is closed upon their humorous parts,/The real face appears, the assumed has vanished'. ²⁰ (The connection between theatre and hypocrisy or deception)
Satires	Juvenal (c60-c140) Satirist	Life was a form of entertainment (Satires XIV) full of plots and machinations; Roman women were Clytemnestras and Tyndareuses, plotting the downfall of their men (Satire VI). ²¹	Social (gendered) life	An acting space A constructed art	Detachment, which allowed amusement, perspective	Externalised : the satirist Showing (-)
Meditations	Marcus Aurelius (121-180CE) Roman Emperor 161-180CE	Life is a play; men are assigned their roles by the Playwright; one must act one's part well even though the outcome is determined; fame is ephemeral; history repeats itself in new performances 'with the same scenery ... and different actors'. ²² 'You are not ejected from the city by any unjust judge or tyrant, but by the selfsame Nature which brought you into it; just as when an actor is dismissed by the manager who engaged him. 'But I have played no more than three of the five acts.' Just so: in your drama of life, three acts are all the play'. ²³ One must aim to play one's part well, and go 'well pleased and contented' when dismissed after enduring the 'tiresome' spectacle.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment which allows Acceptance of one's position in life and of the ephemerality of life; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	External: The Playwright Doing (-)
Seventh Dissertation	Maximus of Tyre (125-185) Philosopher and orator who combined the influence of Platonism with Stoicism	Man acts and in doing so generates his own life as best he can. Life is a drama; man is an actor in his own drama, not in a drama devised by gods or nature; nevertheless life itself is what is important, not one's age or habits, which are like 'the garb' of actors and only contribute 'to the dramatical performance'; The 'business of life' (political life) is 'drama to the philosopher'. The evils of life can be attributed to man's own nature, not to the gods or fate: 'Let them ... have a place in tragedies ... but suffer not such vanities to be admitted to the drama of life'. One must make the most of one's lot, see through appearances and 'the fortunes of those who recite... to the poem itself'. ²⁴ (Man is both actor and creator of his own drama).	The human condition; Political life:	An acting space A constructed art	Detachment allows the freedom to construct one's life without illusion	Externalised : The philosopher Internal: Other men Doing (-)
Historia	Lucian	One can act as directed or choose to be a spectator, take some	The human	A seeing-place	Fatalism	External: the

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Quomodo Conscribendi; Nigrinus; Pro Imago; Gallus	(c120-c200) ²⁵ Satirist	control over one's life and laugh at the spectacle of others being pushed around. Life is a play of folly, hypocrisy and flattery; the wise man (including the historian) adopts the pose of the Laughing Philosopher (Democritus or Diogenes) and laughs at the spectacle. Lucian compares rhetoricians and hypocritical philosophers to 'actors in tragedy': 'life is a despicable, if amusing, pageant of greed and lust. The wise man will ... imitate the gods by laughing heartily at the spectacle' since 'all action is suspect where everyone wears a mask'. ²⁶ Lucian was 'the principal transmitter' of the theatrum mundi to the Renaissance. His comparison 'accounts for almost all of the satirical uses' of the theatre metaphor in the Renaissance. ²⁷ In Historia Quomodo Conscribendi , the historian is compared to the tragedian: 'both write of events whose outcome they are unable to influence'. However, the historian is admitted to the ranks of wise spectators when he admits that writing history is a way of avoiding being 'pushed about like an extra spear-bearer in a comedy'. Historians and wise men can thus move from being watched to watching; this is a desirable position so that one could be 'untroubled by the ludicrous actions of others'. ²⁸	condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Detachment which allows control; Laughter at the antics of men, especially their hypocrisy; tranquillity; the possibility of history	gods Externalised : The wise man; Historians; dramatists Showing/ Watching (+/-)
Metamorphoses The Golden Ass ²⁹ De mundo	Apuleius of Madaura (123-175) African Roman writer	The life of man is a spectacle, either for Fortune and the God of Laughter, or for Isis. They laugh at the ridiculousness of man. Apuleius was influenced by Platonism, neo-Pythagoreanism and mystery religions. The problem was to act under the scrutiny of God/Fortune ³⁰	The human condition	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment: Life should not be taken too seriously;	External: Fortune; the God of Laughter; Isis Showing (-)
Funeral oration for Eteonius ³¹	Aelius Aristides (c129-189) Platonist, orator ³²	Life is a drama. One must aim to play one's part well, then leave when it is over. ³³ One must act under conditions one cannot control.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment Acceptance; readiness for death; an ethics of responsibility	Externalised : Orator Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
					in the face of determinism
Horatory Address to the Heathen	Clement of Alexandria (c150-c215)	The world is a theatre (amphitheatre) in which 'the Lord of Jerusalem' is the 'true fighter for the prize, who gains the crown of victory on the theater of the world'. ³⁴	Religious life	An acting space	Revelation	Internal: Men Doing (+/-)
212: 'Civic Romanus sum' – Roman citizenship given to all free-born subjects of the Empire
Roman History	Dio Cassius (c155 –c235) Roman consul and Historian	Life is lived under the scrutiny of others: 'You will live as it were in a theater with the whole world as spectators, and if you err it will be impossible to escape notice even for the briefest time' – advice given to Octavian to remind him that he lived in the public eye. ³⁵	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actors and spectator	Self-awareness Judgment – hence the need for self-mastery	Internal: the whole world watches and judges Doing (+/-)
On Spectacles (c198)	Tertullian (c160-c220) Church Father, theologist	Christianity is the 'true' spectacle; the play of life has no meaning at all; the true drama occurs on Judgment Day: 'How vast the spectacle that day, and how wide! ... And then there will be tragic actors to be heard [and] players to be seen ... in the fire [and] things of greater joy than circuses, theatres of any kind or any stadium' (On Spectacles XXX). ³⁶ Life had no value at all: we should have contempt for all worldliness (saeculi totius contemptus) aiming instead for the transcendence of earthly life. Tertullian attacked stage dramas as well as Roman spectacles as 'atrocious' and 'vile' (a view picked up by the Puritans) and proposed God's 'rival stage'. ³⁷	Religious life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Revelation Judgment as well as illusion	External: God Internal: Men Doing/ Showing (-)
268: Goths sack Athens, Sparta and Corinth
On Providence; Ennead	Plotinus (205-c269) Neo-Platonist philosopher	A reconciliation of personal freedom with divine direction by recognizing that the inner man remains constant in spite of outward trappings. Man is both actor and spectator whose appearance may not match his inner life and who must act under conditions which he cannot control. The world is a stage; life is a play; it is fleeting, insubstantial and vain. God is the demiourgos : the artisan creator. Both God and man are spectators of the play of life: men should consider themselves 'spectators' of all things, 'as if they were on the stages of theatres ... [only] the outside	The human condition–	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment Communion	External: God; Internal: man Doing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		shadow of man .. cries and moans and carries on ... on a stage which is the whole earth'. God assigns man's parts and 'each place is fitted to their characters' according to 'the rational principle of the universe' (logos). Man is an actor not just on the stage of the world but also beyond; at death he merely changes his costume 'like on the stage, when an actor who has been murdered changes his costume and comes on again in another character'. ³⁸ 'The soul, entering the drama of the Universe, making itself a part of the Play, bringing to its acting its personal excellence or defect, set in a definite place at the entry and accepting from the author its entire rôle – superimposed upon its own character and conduct – receives in the end its punishment and reward'. ³⁹ However, 'it is not the soul within but the outside shadow of man which cries and moans and carries on in every sort of way on a stage which is the whole earth where men have in many places set up their stages'. ⁴⁰ Logos directs and determines men's earthly lives; in contemplation of the play of life, man as spectator can find his way to union with the divine. Plotinus was also influenced by neo-Pythagoreanism and Stoicism and had an immense influence on the Florentine Platonists, Calvin, Vives, Donne and Raleigh.
Corpus Hermeticus	unknown - roughly contemporary with Plotinus; supposedly the sayings of Hermes Trismegistus	Man as magus or second demiourgos : man is the molder of his environment, the director of the play of life, just as God is the director of the kosmos ; 'the playwright's craft imitates God's'. The aim is to know oneself, and to know God by playing one's part: 'it is man's function to contemplate the work of God ... that he might view the universe with wondering awe and come to know its maker'. ⁴¹ Man sees God in His creation therefore man sees God in himself: 'Man is all things; man is everywhere'. ⁴² (This is seen as an honour, but during C16 th and C17 th is seen as a predicament, even a tragedy). ⁴³	The relation between man and God	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Revelation	Internal: Man Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
On the	Iamblichus	Iamblichus was a pupil of Porphyry. The spectacle of 'ugly	The value of	A relationship	Subjectification	Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Mysteries	of Chalcis (c250-325) Syrian Neoplatonist philosopher	things' in histrionic sacred rituals, like the spectacle of others' emotions in comedy and tragedy, leads us to modify our behaviour: 'when we behold the emotions of others, we repress our own, make them more moderate and are purified from them.' ⁴⁴ On the Mysteries was translated by Ficino in 1497. (Foreshadows Adam Smith's view on the role of the spectator and the importance of spectacle to human life) . It is not clear that this is a theatre metaphor or a description of the human response to emotional display wherever it occurs	spectacle to social life	between actors and spectator	which enables socialisation - the modification of our behaviour and self-mastery, which enables civil life	Men Internalised: the self Externalised : philosopher Watching (+)
Lives of the Eminent Philosophers	Diogenes Laertius early C3rd (neo-Pythagorean)	Men are both actors and spectators. Spectatorship leads to knowledge. Claimed Pythagoras said: 'Life ... is like a festival; just as some come to the festival to compete, some to ply their trade ... the best people come as spectators...'. Looking (theoria) was a means to understanding (gnosis). The purpose of the observer was contemplation. ⁴⁵	The human condition	A seeing place	Revelation leading to Knowledge	Externalised : The best people Watching (+)
The Church Fathers: the 'patristic', dualistic form of the metaphor: 'the world is a theater of fictions and ... heaven is the theater of truth'.⁴⁶ Despite his use of the metaphor, Augustine considered theatre was the cause of the fall of Rome, but '[i]n a universe where a person's actions are watched constantly by a divine audience, [the] theatrical metaphor provides a compelling code for expressing the relationship between human and divine'.⁴⁷ In general Christian uses of the metaphor saw death not as the final exit from the stage of life but as an unmasking.⁴⁸ 330: The seat of the Roman Empire moved to Constantinople. 340: Rome split into east and west.
Second Homily on Lazarus; Homily on the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews; Homily on John; Didactica et Paraenetica; Ad Populum Antiocheum; Four Discourses of	John Chrysostom (c347-407) Archbishop of Constantinople	Comparison between earthly and heavenly life; we live under the scrutiny of God who judges; death unmasks us all. The world is God's theatre or play: 'you enter the world as if you were entering a theatre'. Heaven is also a theatre: 'you also have a theatre (theatron) which is heaven ... transport yourself into the applause which comes hence, never will earthly things be able to hold you'. St John 'has heaven for his stage; for theatre, the world; for audience, all the angels, and also, as many men as are already 'angels' or even desire to become so' (Homily on John 1:5). 'The life of a good man struggling against adversity is a sight which delights heaven'. ⁴⁹ 'Life is at once a kind of fiction and a dream: for just as in the theatre, when the curtain comes	The relation between man and God	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Judgment – God sees through the trapping of performance; Acceptance of the limits of Christian life; Endurance in the hope of reward in the afterlife The possibility	External: God (who judges), the angels; Internal: good men; men in general Externalised : theologian Doing/ Showing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Chrysostom, on the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus		down, distinctions are destroyed and all illusions vanish into the shimmering light; so by the common reckoning which comes to each man everything is dissolved, and sinks into oblivion'.⁵⁰ Again, 'in the theatre, as evening closes in, and the spectators depart, those who come forth divested of their theatrical ornaments, who seemed to all to be kings and generals, now are seen to be whatever they are in reality; even so with respect to this life, when death comes, and the theatre is deserted, when all, having put off their masks of wealth or of poverty, depart hence, being judged only by their works, they appear, some really rich, some poor; some in honour, some in dishonour ... the rich man may often chance to be the poorest of all. For if you remove his mask and examine his conscience, and enter into his inner mind, you will find there great poverty as to virtue, and ascertain that he is the meanest of men'.⁵¹ Earthly life is a provocation to immorality and discontent. All will be unmasked at the end: 'when we come to the moment of death, having quit the theatre of life, all masks of wealth and poverty will be stripped away' (Second Homily). Consequently, 'when sitting in the theatre you see one of the players on the stage, having on the mask of a king, you do not think him happy ... because of his mask and his dress'.⁵² Chrysostom picks up Lucien's account of hypocrisy, but adds to it the Christian view of death.⁵³ Chrysostom, like most early Christians, was vehemently anti-theatre, largely because he associated theatre with the amphitheatres in which gladiatorial competitions and lion feedings as well as lewd performances took place. His writings reflect the 'keen' competition taking place between theatre and church at the time and the desire to show Christianity as a theatre which 'is more brilliant'.⁵⁴			of corruption	Watching (+/-)
Funeral eulogy (368)	Gregory of Nazianzenos	Life is like a play: 'worldly honours ... are like a stage set (skênê) quickly put up' and even more swiftly taken down. ⁵⁵	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment	Internal: Men

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	(329-360)				which allows Indifference to worldly honours	Showing (-)
Enarratio in Psalmum ⁵⁶ Epistle 73; The Confessions (397); City of God	Augustine (c350-430) Church Father; Bishop of Hippo Regius (now Algeria)	It is part of the human condition to be taken in by appearances; Religious life should be lived at the direction of and under the scrutiny of God. Augustine was very influenced by Stoic thought. Life is a comedy: '... the whole life of temptation in the human race is a farce (mimus)'. The theatre of the church uplifts; wanton theatre corrupts and destroys empires. It was part of Augustine's rejection of theatre that its conventions encouraged spectators 'to relieve themselves of moral responsibility' by allowing them to experience another's pain 'which [they] are not called upon to relieve'. ⁵⁷ In the first account of self-reflection in the Western tradition, Augustine also indicated that one could also view oneself as a 'theatre' as a way of coming to understand 'the paradox of a rational being acting in direct opposition to his conscious desires'. Theatre was therefore a teacher, a seeing place and a place for revealing the techniques of persuasion and manipulation. However, theatre was 'a corrupted public place in the Earthly City' of The City of God . Fallen men were actors who were attempting to conceal their real intentions (the gratification of their self-directed wills for pride). These intentions must be unmasked. In the theatre of the church however, God was the Director. He would sit in judgment and mete out just rewards in the true 'reality'. Meantime, it was a 'Christian duty' to unmask the hidden intentions of men. ⁵⁸	The human condition; religious life	A seeing-place	Detachment leading to self-awareness and the unmasking of what is hidden; Self-awareness	External: God Internal: Men; Internalised: the self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
	Palladas Fl. C4th Egyptian contemporary of Augustine	'All life is a stage and a game: either learn to play it, laying by seriousness, or bear its pains'. ⁵⁹	The human condition	An acting space	Fatalism Detachment which allows the ability to not take life too seriously	Externalised : the detached actor Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
De Providentia c396	Synesius of Cyrene, Bishop of Ptolemais (c373-c414),	Synesius was influenced by neo-Pythagoreanism and neo-Platonism. Life is a play: 'God and Fortune bestow upon us lives, as it were masks in the great drama of the universe ... we ... are actors of living drama' and we must act as directed. One must play one's part without complaint, at the right time; to wait 'in his place' for 'things' to be shown him. For this there would be just rewards in the true 'reality'. Therefore the wise man/spectator 'should hold his peace' until God gives him his cue. ⁶⁰	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment which allows Acceptance; An ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	External: God (the director) Externalised : The wise man Doing/ Watching (-)
476: Western Roman Empire falls to the Germans
Consolation of Philosophy (524)	Anuncius Manlius Severinus Boethius (c480-524) Roman scholar, philosopher and theologian; Platonist	Visibility is part of the human condition. Life is a public stage (in hanc vitae scaenam); a mingling of pagan antiquity and patristic or Christian versions and virtually the last known mention of the metaphor until the 12 th Century. Although Boethius' use of the metaphor has echoes in Latin poetry of the later Middle Ages, 'the comparison is rare'. ⁶¹ Greek philosophy might have been brought to Western Europe centuries earlier had Boethius' translations of Plato and Aristotle not been terminated by his execution. ⁶²	The human condition	An acting space A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment which allows Resignation	Externalised : Philosopher Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
532: Nika revolt destroys Constantinople. 539-562 and 572-591: war between Persia and the Byzantine Empire 622: Isidore (Bishop of Seville) (560-636) published his Originum sive etymologiarum libri (Etymologies) in which he distinguished between comedy and tragedy as two kinds of poetry or drama (carmen) declaimed before an audience, then divided comici into two classes: old (Plautus, Accius, Terence) and new (Horace, Persius, Juvenal). These divisions led to confusion as to what constituted drama,⁶³ a confusion apparent in John of Salisbury (Christian 1987: 235n2). Isidore also appears to have confused theatrum (theatre) with amphitheatrum (amphitheatre), claiming theatres were places where orgies were enacted, another confusion which continued into the C16th and C17th centuries and is still apparent in some understandings of theatre today.⁶⁴ 700: Arabs conquer Algiers

¹ Bernheimer, Richard. 1956. 'Theatrum Mundi'. The Art Bulletin 38 (4) pp. 225-247: 225

-
- ² Epistles 80.6-8 in Bartsch, Shadi. 2006. The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press: 225
- ³ Epistulae Morales in Vickers, Brian. 1971. 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery'. Studies in the Literary Imagination 4 (1) pp. 189-226: 203
- ⁴ Mimus were the lowest and most vulgar kind of drama, usually short and ribald, performed at country religious festival by both men and women and without masks (Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc: 214(I)n35).
- ⁵ Ad Lucilium in Vickers 1971: 195
- ⁶ Bartsch 2006: 209
- ⁷ Seneca, Epistle 120 in Bartsch 2006: 276
- ⁸ Also in Bartsch 2006: 210
- ⁹ Epistles 120.21-22 in Bartsch 2006: 211
- ¹⁰ Arendt, Hannah. 1978/1971. The Life of the Mind. San Diego, New York, London: A Harvest Book, Harcourt Brace and Company: 18-19
- ¹¹ Institutio Oratoria IV, 2.34, cited in Enders, Jody. 1992. Rhetoric and the Origins of Medieval Drama. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press: 51, 63n28.
- ¹² Christian 1987: 195
- ¹³ Paulson, Ronald. 1976. 'Life as Journey and as Theater: Two Eighteenth-Century Narrative Structures'. New Literary History 8 (1) pp. 43-58: 43
- ¹⁴ Fielding, Henry. 1962/1749. 'A Comparison Between the World and the Stage'. In The History of Tom Jones. London: Heron Books, pp. 252-255: 255
- ¹⁵ Epictetus 1926, Discourses, Trans/ed W.A. Oldfather, Loeb Classical Library, London, II: 496-7, quoted in Christian 1987: 20, and Richards 1991: 26 (see below n16).
- ¹⁶ Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press: 26
- ¹⁷ Curtius provides different (although tentative) dates: '79?-132?' (Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI): 702).
- ¹⁸ Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman: 8
- ¹⁹ The motto is generally translated as 'all the world's a stage'. Hundert however, translates it as 'All the world plays the actor', which seems closer to the Latin (see Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 145n61).
- ²⁰ Satyricon in Vickers 1971: 203
- ²¹ Christian 1987: 25
- ²² Meditations 10.27 in Richards 1991: 28
- ²³ Meditations XII. 37 in Vickers 1971: 196
- ²⁴ All quotations are from The Dissertations of Maximum of Tyre, trans. Thomas Taylor, 2 vols, London 1804, Vol II, pp. 38,127-128, 166; quoted in Christian 1987: 44-45.
- ²⁵ Curtius dates Lucian as 'ca. 120-180' (Curtius 1990: 604).
- ²⁶ Christian 1987: 34; this point is taken up by Chrysostom in his Second Homily on Lazarus: 'poverty and wealth are but the masks of our present life'.
- ²⁷ Christian 1987: xiii; (McGillivray 2007: 161
- ²⁸ Christian 1987: 27-34
- ²⁹ Christian (1987: 48) describes this work as a novel. It displays the same theatrical sense which is later exploited by Cervantes in Don Quixote, including the main character (Lucian) meeting again, in a parade to the goddess Isis, characters from earlier in the novel.

-
- ³⁰ Christian 1987: 46
- ³¹ Aelius Aristides 1958, Quae Supersunt Omnia, ed. Bruno Keil, 2 vol., Berlin, II: 215, quoted in Christian 1987: 45.
- ³² Aristides was to be particularly admired during the Renaissance for his elegant style (Christian 1987: 45)
- ³³ By now, this Stoic form of the metaphor 'is all very familiar', according to Christian (1987: 45), 'disappearing in rhetorical redundancy'.
- ³⁴ Cited in Curtius 1990/1948: 138.
- ³⁵ Dio Cassius, Roman History 53.6.2. in Bartsch 2006: 123
- ³⁶ Tertullian 1966, Apology and De Spectaculis, trans/ed T.R. Glover, Loeb Classical Library, Cambridge Mass., pp. 294-301; quoted in Christian 1987: 224(I)n65.
- ³⁷ Richards 1991: 30; 34
- ³⁸ Plotinus 1967, Enneads, trans/ed. A.H. Armstrong, 3 vol., Loeb Classical Library, Cambridge Mass., III: 90-91; quoted in Christian 1987: 52.
- ³⁹ Plotinus, Enneads III.2.15, trans. McKenna, quoted in Administration Review July/August pp. 697-709.
- Battenhouse, Roy. 1948. 'The Doctrine of Man in Calvin and in Renaissance Platonism'. Journal of the History of Ideas 9 (4) pp. 447-471: 465
- ⁴⁰ Plotinus Ennead III.2 in Vickers 1971: 198
- ⁴¹ Walter Scott 1924, 'Poimandres', Hermetica, 3 vols. Oxford, p. 150-151.
- ⁴² Walter Scott 1924, 'Asclepius', Hermetica, 3 vols. Oxford, p. 294-5.
- ⁴³ Christian 1987: 58-60
- ⁴⁴ Iamblichus 1911, Theurgia or the Egyptian Mysteries, trans. A. Wilder, London, pp. 57-8, quoted in Christian 1987: 55.
- ⁴⁵ Christian 1987: 2
- ⁴⁶ Christian 1987: 177.
- ⁴⁷ Richards 1991: 29-31
- ⁴⁸ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]: 161
- ⁴⁹ Quotes from The Use of Athletic Metaphors in the Biblical Homilies of St John Chrysostom, trans. J.A. Sawhill, Princeton 1927: 83; 95; in Christian 1987: 36.
- ⁵⁰ 'Contra Luxuriantes' in Ad Populum Antiocheum, Homilia LV in Vickers 1971: 202
- ⁵¹ Four Discourses of Chrysostom, on the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus in Vickers 1971: 204
- ⁵² 'Contra Luxuriantes', Vickers 1971: 205
- ⁵³ Christian 1987: 34
- ⁵⁴ Richards 1991: 32-3
- ⁵⁵ Christian 1987: 38
- ⁵⁶ Section 127 (Christian 1987: xvii)
- ⁵⁷ Augustine. 1961/397. The Confessions of Saint Augustine. Translated by R. S. Pine-Coffin. London: Penguin 3.2
- ⁵⁸ Hundert, E.J. 1992. 'Augustine and the Sources of the Divided Self'. Political Theory 20 (1) pp. 86-104: 87-95
- ⁵⁹ Quoted in Curtius 1990/1948: 138).
- ⁶⁰ Augustine Fitzgerald 1930, Essays and Hymns of Synesius of Cyrene, 2 vols. Oxford University Press, II, pp. 324-325; quoted in Christian 1987: 39, 50.
- ⁶¹ Curtius 1990/1948: 139

⁶² Paul Edwards 1995, 'God and the philosophers' in Honderich, Ted (ed) 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press: 317.

⁶³ Exact notions of what ancient drama had been like had been practically lost at this stage (Raby 1957 in Christian 1987: 235n2 see page 64)

⁶⁴ Christian 1987: 238:n8. In Labyrinths (1970), Borges has the Islamic scholar Averroes attempting to come up with a definition of theatre from a scrap of Aristotle's writings, to absurd ends. This story and Christian's discussion of Isidore of Seville's misunderstanding of theatre as amphitheatre serve as reminders to beware of seemingly familiar words in historical documents.

Table 3/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: Middle Ages to 1574

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
MIDDLE AGES: the age of ‘presence’: space was ‘full, impressionable and substantial’; repetition was considered efficacious; ‘the meaning of phenomena was present in the phenomena themselves’. Use of the terminology of theatre was widespread. In 1215, the Cistercian Aelred de Rielvaux complained that the church was being changed into a “theater”, so dramatized had the gestures of the priests become.¹ However, in general the metaphor of life as a dream dominated. During this time, the term theatrum had a number of meanings. One use meant ‘a place of assembly or of a market-place where merchandise was laid out’, while another meant ‘a complete exhibit of a certain kind of specimen’.² Thus the word appeared to retain something of its original meaning of a seeing place and it is possibly in this context that the theatrum mundi metaphor made a brief reappearance despite the absence of any actual theatre. From the twelfth century Scholastics tried to classify the arts. They distinguished seven ‘in symmetry with the seven traditional liberal arts’. Hugh of Saint Victor divided the mechanical arts into lanificium (supplying men with wearing apparel), armatura (supplying men with shelter and tools), agricultura and venatio (both supplying food), navigatio, medicina and theatrica. Armatura and theatrica were similar to what we now call ‘fine’ arts (architecture and the theatrical arts), however, theatrica for the Middle Ages meant the art of entertainment, ‘a peculiar medieval concept’.³
Carmina Cantabrid-giensa	unknown	A passing reference to the arrival of the Virgin on the scene (scena). ⁴	Personification	An acting space	Representation	Internal Showing (+/-)
Annales Lamberti	Lambert of Hersfeld (c1024-c1078) historian	The world is a stage; a life can be a sad tragedy (lugubrem tragediam) ⁵	The human condition	An acting space	Objectification allowing History to be written	Externalised: the historian Doing (+/-)
1066: Norman Conquest 1095: First Crusade 1096-1099 Crusades
Gemma animae: (c1100)	Honorius of Autun (d. c1151) Christian theologian, disciple of Amalarius	Life is like theatre: ‘It is known that those who recited tragedies in theatres presented the action ... by gestures ... In the same way our tragic author (i.e., the celebrant) represents by his gestures in the theater of the Church before the Christian people the struggle of Christ’ in order to make present agony and victory of Christ. ⁶	Religious life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of presentation	Internal: Christian people Externalised: theologian Doing/ Showing (+)
Policraticus (Statecraft): (1159) Entheticus	John of Salisbury (c1120-c1180)	First appearance of the phrase theatrum mundi in European literature. ⁷ Men act under scrutiny; they perform but are inclined to mistake their performance for reality; God sees all but leaves some freedom of choice to man; social and political life entails artifice. The Policraticus was ‘a discourse on “the frivolities of courtiers and the footprints of philosophers” much reprinted in	The human condition; social and political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and	Visibility Acceptance; humility; Judgment (God); The possibility	External: God, the angels, the sages; Internal: others

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		C16th and C17th centuries. An extended comparison of the world as a theatre and human life as a play (taken up from Petronius' metaphor) designed to expose the artificial boundaries placed on acceptable public behaviour.⁸ A blend of Stoic and Patristic forms of the metaphor: to endure like Job; to play one's part well in the hope of salvation; to become wise enough to be included amongst the spectator-sages, by refusing to 'corrupt the dignity of nature by donning the costume of the actor ... to take part in acts of vanity and madness,' or at least to not discredit oneself should the stage lights be turned on to one. Human history is the drama set in play by God, directed/stage managed by Fortune, with men as characters, and performed within the theatre of the world: 'How great is the scope of this theater? As great as that of the world itself. As long as man is clad in this mortal ... flesh, having once been admitted to this theater it is most difficult for him to be excluded'. Life is a play within this theatre, and as such, 'full of deceit', although it may end happily (comedia) or sadly (tragedia).⁹ From 'a snippet of Petronius, John builds the fully fledged theatrum mundi metaphor: the moral drama of the play of life, acted in the theatre of the world, watched and judged by a heavenly audience of virtuous sages together, ultimately, with God who watches over all':¹⁰ 'The different periods of time take on the character of shifts of scene' and 'Man's acts are observed by God and the angels, and he should "blush if on such a brilliantly lighted stage his movements be unseemly and he completely discredit himself by his farcical antics"'. Unfortunately, men become 'so absorbed' in 'their own comedy ... that they are unable to return to reality when occasion demands' – a concern shared by Plato.¹¹ Policraticus was widely circulated throughout the Middle Ages, and printed copies appeared in 1476, 1513, 1595, 1622, 1639, 1664 and 1677. It is considered to be one of the first extended medieval treatises on		spectator	of delusion	Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		political theory. John's phrase 'quod fere totus mundus iuxta Petronium exerceat histrionem' is considered by Christian to be a classic statement of the Patristic use of the metaphor.¹² It was later to become the motto of the Globe Theatre: Totus Mundus Agit Histrionem.¹³ Thus John's work was instrumental in bringing the metaphor into the Renaissance.¹⁴ John speaks highly of spectators compared with actors, although his expression of the position of spectators within the metaphor is confusing. Christian (and others) translates John's 'cum enim omnes exerceant histrionem aliquid esse necesse est spectatorem' as: 'since all are playing parts, there must be some spectators'. The phrase is more meaningful if rendered: 'together with all who are playing parts, there must be some spectators' - 'Let no one complain that his acting is marked by none, for he is acting in sight of God, of his angels, and a few sages who are themselves also spectators.'¹⁵ God is the Director whose aim is to demonstrate His glory however, men have some freedom of choice: 'Fortune seems to tease men while they inhabit the earth; God ... rules the world and knows ... but does not compel the outcome'.¹⁶
After this brief appearance, the metaphor seemed to disappear until the late C15th.¹⁷ Curtius points out that from the end of C11th until approximately 1230 northern France and England were 'more or less united politically and culturally'. French and English scholars moved freely across the Channel, with English scholars occupying important French positions. Students and teachers at major schools in both France and England spoke Latin and French, irrespective of their origin. One would imagine that the metaphor would have surfaced somewhere amidst all this scholarship if it still had some currency. Curtius claims that there were a group of writers around 1170, who called themselves 'the Moderns', who believed that a new age was dawning, and who showed signs of 'genuine creative thought', but their ideas disappeared with the 'triumph of philosophy' in the 13th century and the subsequent 'reform' of education which saw the study of the classics abolished in favour of formal logic, a lost opportunity which may have taken the metaphor down with it.¹⁸ In 1204 the Fourth Crusade captured Constantinople, giving the West access to Greek writings. In 1215, the Cistercian Aelred de Rielvaux complained that the church was being changed into a "theater", so dramatized had the gestures of the priests become. By 1264, the feast of Corpus Christi had been institutionalized to enact the new doctrine of transubstantiation (confirmed by the fourth Lateran council of 1215). This led to elaborate pageants which went outside the church. Egginton argues that this move outside the confines of the church building introduced new possibilities of staging.¹⁹ However, the theatrum mundi metaphor did not reappear in European literature for another 150 years, even though the word theatre first appeared in English in a Wycliffite Bible manuscript in 1382, defined as a 'commune biholdiynge place'.²⁰ When it did appear, it brought with it connotations of the Medieval metaphor life is a dream.²¹

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1241-2: Mongols invade Europe. 1302: Franco-Flemish War. 1337-1453 100 Years War 1347-1351: Black Death ravaged Europe. 1414: the works of Roman architect Marcus Vitruvius Pollio (c80/70-after c15BCE) were rediscovered. They were published in Rome in 1486 . His book De architectura provided, for the first time, ‘a (relatively) accurate description of ancient theatres’. ²² 1453: Constantinople fell to the Ottomans. 1454-1466: 13 Years War. 1455-1485 War of the Roses
	Nicholas of Cusa (aka Cusanus) (1401-1464)	Reworked Dionysus’ ideas, idealizing man as a microcosm of the created world, the copula mundi (the hinge between heaven and earth). ²³	The relationship between man and the world	An acting space	Objectification allowing a view of the whole	Internal: man Externalised: scholar Doing/ Showing (+) c1470: Lucien’s writings rediscovered. By 1550, at least 267 translations had appeared, including more than 60 in the original Greek. These had an enormous influence on satiric uses of the theatrum mundi metaphor during the C16th. Lucien’s works were condemned by the Inquisition, and officially banned by the Indices of Milan and Venice in 1554. Also during C14th, manuscripts containing more than 900 letters of which more than 800 were written by Cicero and nearly 100 by others to him were discovered. ²⁴
Works: Theologia Platonica (1473); Epistles: ‘Consolation in Obitu Filli’ (BkI); ‘There is no refuge ...’ (BkV). Translations: Corpus Hermeticum (1463); Plato (1468); Dionysius the Areopagite (1492) Plotinus (1492) Iamblichus	Marsilio Ficino (1433-1499) Italian scholar and translator, Christian Platonist	Men must try to act well under conditions they cannot control and in the face of imperfect knowledge. ‘All things in life are make-believe’. God is the ultimate artisan creator: ‘He sends down ... souls from on high as though they were actors let down into a play’ into roles assigned by ‘the very nature of the world’. ²⁵ Man’s task is to accept the authority of God over one’s life and to play one’s part readily without turning one’s life from a comedy into a tragedy: ‘Tragedies bewail the miserable lot of mortals.’ According to Christian, despite his reference to Plotinus, Ficino still demonstrates the simplistic approach to dramatic terminology which dominated the medieval tradition, considering tragedy to mean simply a sad tale, and comedy a happy, or possibly farcical one. While Ficino’s terminology recalls Plato’s description of human life in Laws VII 817b-d, where Plato saw civic life as the ‘truest tragedy’, meaning fair and good, ‘the noblest artistic endeavor’, Ficino interprets tragedy as ‘a wretched existence’, something to be quit as soon as possible in order to be returned to ‘the very essence of life itself’ (Consolatio in Obitu Filli). ²⁶ Ficino’s translations made all of Plato’s dialogues accessible to Western scholars for the first time.	The human condition; the relationship of man to God	An acting space	Fatalism Revelation acceptance of one’s position in life; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	External: God Externalised: scholar Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1497); Petronius		His work sets off a number of threads with regard to the theatrum mundi metaphor: the Areopagite (Nicholas of Cusa; Giordano Bruno); the Ficino/Cusana/ Hermetica (Pico della Mirandola; Juan Luis Vives); Ficino himself combines both Stoic and Patristic threads: ‘the life of man seems to be the truest tragedy’. Ficino argued that Platonism was compatible with Christianity and should be taught in philosophy. He compares artistic creativity with God’s creative work. ²⁷
Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486)	Pico della Mirandola (1463-1494) Italian Renaissance philosopher	Man is both actor and spectator. The world is a stage on which nothing is ‘more wonderful than man’; man’s role is flexible (secular), he is both spectator and actor: ‘We have set thee at the world’s center that thou mayest observe whatever is in the world [and] mayest fashion thyself in whatever shape thou shalt prefer’. ²⁸ For the first time in the metaphor’s history, man and God are considered equals and man has the freedom to create himself. Spectatorship is about both knowledge (gnosis) and practice (praxis): man observes the created universe in order to judge how he will act in it. ²⁹ (This version is an extension of the neo-Pythagorean role for the spectator, an innovation which lasts until 17 th Century) (Man is both spectator and actor). Both are on stage.	Man’s position in the world	An acting space	Strategies of (self) performance Knowledge	External: God Internal: Man Externalised: scholar Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
1494-1559: Italian Wars 16th Century: The Renaissance: ‘the age of the theatre’.³⁰ The theatrum mundi comparison ‘can be found in almost every genre in sixteenth and seventeenth century literature’, as well as in art and architecture. By 1642, when the Cambridge Platonist Henry More published his collection of sonnets entitled Psychodia Platonica the metaphor could even be considered ‘facile’, and by 1560, both theatre and play metaphors were abundant in both secular and religious forms. 1525-1650: Europe was ‘ablaze with burning men, women and children’ and it became common to think of the world as the ‘theater of God’s judgment’.³¹ Within a concern with martyrdom, the Stoic idea of dying well was revived. In 1531 Erasmus published the first complete works of Aristotle. At this point, according to Egginton, a secular version of the metaphor, relating to order, increasingly began to make its appearance. Egginton claims that it was an innovation of 16th Century and was intimately related to the device of a play within a play which made its ‘sudden’ appearance towards the end of the 16th century,³² however, Christian’s history indicates that the metaphor had been available in a secular form since at least Pico delle Mirandola and Vives, and its ‘theological’ underpinnings had often been downgraded to ‘Nature’ or ‘Fortune’ in the satirists and others such as Maximus, Diogenes Laertius and Lambert of Hersfeld. Also, Aristotle’s analysis of theatre and its value as a form of socialization could also have opened up a more secular view of the metaphor. Despite, or perhaps because of the active use of the theatre metaphor, ‘the turbulent years of the Reformation’ were obsessed with ‘the quintessential question of what was real, what was pretend,

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
and what was pretense' to the point where 'debates about the nature of the sacrament resembled debates about the nature of the theatre' (or vice versa).³³ Within art, architecture and design, there was also an obsession with trying to realize the theatrum mundi in some material way. Both artists and designers had noticed the affinity of shape between the Roman amphitheatre, which they took to be a theatre, and the Christian idea of heaven, with its hierarchical arrangement of the Blessed but struggled to find a way which retained the ethereality of the heavens and dealt with the deficiencies of human spectators. The most successful efforts occurred where there was an active Court society on which the metaphor could be modelled. The most driven figure in this respect, Giulio Camillo (c1500-1544), is now largely forgotten but his influence on the use of the theatrum mundi metaphor, as well as on both theatre architecture and theatre scenic design and effects was considerable, and still apparent in theatre design well into C18th. His theatrum mundi actually did exist as a wooden construction, built at the court of France under the patronage of Francis I. It was apparently large enough for someone to stand inside it, and climb its stairs. While Camillo's representation largely ignored the spectator, other materializations of the metaphor were so successful at incorporating the spectator that the spectators of the metaphoric representation became part of the metaphor itself, in what Bernheimer calls an 'aesthetic mutation of the spectator'. Spectators were placed in an amphitheatre-like structure on the stage in such a way that the stage completely mirrored the auditorium, thus completing (and perhaps collapsing) the metaphor, and in the process, obliterating the gap between spectator and stage: 'a union of the celestial, the theatrical and the architectural'. There were many partial realisations both indoors and out, especially with the introduction of the triumphal entries which became a feature of marriage ceremonies between reigning dynasties, but the whole conception of a realised theatrum mundi in the architectural form of the Roman amphitheatre but with the glory of the Christian heaven depended on the presence of an equally glorious court. The most successful overcame the problem of earthly spectators by firstly drawing attention to the gloriousness of the court as spectators, making them the focus of the show, and then incorporating them into the play itself. In 1597, Orazio Vecchi referred to the audience itself as 'the great theater of the world'. The play was set within this world, and the music had been composed for the audience, not the play. By 1637, the idea had become so common place that the designer Bernini used it as a 'scenic prank': He reproduced on the stage an exact mirror of the auditorium and its occupants, then had two characters enter as spectators, begin the draw both the real auditorium and the fictitious one, and fall into a discussion about which was which. The spectators agree to split up and each watch the performance to be put on in front of 'their' audience. A curtain is drawn across the centre of the arena formed between the two tiers of audience and identical performances appear to be carried out on either side of the curtain. When the curtain was finally removed, the real audience was astonished to find itself observing 'itself' (the fake audience) apparently outside the theatre, leaving in 'their carriages and horses [with] lights and torches'. The metaphor had 'a short fling in its own right' on the stage as part of the stage scenery, before neoclassicism removed its connection to heaven and reinstalled it as a place of passion and cruelty in the guise of a 'royal hall' or 'place of magnificence'. During the sixteenth century, the word theatre or theatrum also had a secondary sense, derived from the all-encompassing image of the amphitheatre as the complete treatment of a topic. Thus it could also mean a 'mere scholarly scheme'. It was used in this sense by Bacon when he referred to philosopher's systems as 'Idols of the Theatre' (see below). The literature of the time 'abounded' with treatises which included theatrum in their titles, from surveys of women's fashions 'to calligraphy to black magic', none of which claim to be more than a complete treatment of their topic.³⁴ The metaphor was also focused on human vanity and was coupled with a concern about deception, especially through gesture. Social theatricality led to anti-theatricality, as Puritans condemned the theatre because of its lack of accountability.³⁵
The Praise of Folly (1509)	Desiderius Erasmus (1469-1536) Dutch scholar and	Man must take life seriously even though we know it is illusion. Life is 'a kind of stage play', a 'continuous performance', a comedy. 'Everything is pretense' but anyone saying so is a dangerous 'spoilsport' who risks anarchy: 'To destroy the illusion, then, is to destroy the whole play' Anyone who wants to	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment, Strategies of performance an ethics of	External: the gods; Folly Externalised: satirist Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	philosopher (satirical use influenced by Lucian)	do this ‘deserved to be chased out of the theater with brickbats as a madman’. . ‘[V]arious actors, disguised by various costumes and masks, walk on and play each one his part, until the manager [choragus] waves them off the stage’, sometimes requiring them to return next time as a ‘flunkey in patched clothes’ rather than as a ‘king in scarlet’ ... ‘both on the stage and in real life there is the same make-up, the same disguise, there are the same everlasting lies!’ (Reappearance of the Laughing Philosopher: ‘a thousand Democrituses would not suffice for laughing [at the follies of men] ... there would be work, then for one more Democritus to laugh at the laughers’). ³⁶ Erasmus suggests illusion is necessary for the sake of order. The task is to maintain the illusion: to play one’s part well as if it was real, while recognizing that life is only a comedy, to ‘pretend’ that what is going on is real; to ‘affably and companionably be deceived’ so as not to spoil the show. The show was to be judged by the gods who appraise human performance, generally in order to mock humanity; Folly also sometimes took a seat ‘alongside the gods’ but could get bored: ‘You would never believe what sport and entertainment your mortal manikins provide daily for the gods.... What a theater [quod theatrum est illud]!’			responsibility in the face of determinism; Order Judgment Causality	Showing (-)
The Prince (1513)	Machiavelli (1469-1527) Italian statesman and political theorist	The possibility of rule under conditions of visibility. Machiavelli used the metaphor to highlight that politics was not a matter of principle, but about the appearance of power and the relationships between men. ³⁷ ‘The prince must recognize and exploit the fact that he is on stage’. ³⁸ The life of a ruler ought to be theatrical: ‘[t]rue piety is superfluous in a prince: it is enough if he assumes its semblance and outward show’. ³⁹ This is because ‘men in general judge by their eyes ... Everybody sees what you appear to be [while] few experience what you really are’. ⁴⁰ For Machiavelli, ‘stagecraft is inseparable from statecraft’. ⁴¹ The main task of ‘the prince’ was to win and retain public applause,	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility; Power needs to be seen to be effective: men judge by their eyes Detachment allows the prince to act expeditiously Strategies of	Internal: men in general Externalised: adviser; ruler Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		because that enabled him to obtain and keep power, ⁴² and ‘actually being ethical can be dangerous, for the prince might be forced by deeply held moral principles into politically inexpedient choices ... the fact that it is possible to appear good without actually being good is, for the ambitious ruler, of great political value’. ⁴³ Power must be theatrical to command obedience. Stagecraft is part of statecraft. Ruling involves distance both between rulers and men and between men and men.			performance
Utopia (1516); The History of Richard III (c1513-18); De Quatuor Nouissimis (1522)	Sir Thomas More (1478-1535) English lawyer, author and statesman	One must play parts assigned by others. The theatrical metaphor was ‘More’s favourite trope’, perhaps reflecting the ideology of ‘magnificence’ in play at Henry VIII’s court ⁴⁴ or, more likely, a sense of irony and perhaps in the end, futility. More believed that acting various roles within the play of state should be encouraged, although he saw political struggles as ‘Kynge’s games, as it were stage plays, and for the more part played upon scaffold’. ⁴⁵ Life is a series of plays in which one plays different roles. One must play each role to its end as best as one can but remember that it is only a role: ‘when thy play is done, thou shalt go forth as pore as’ a knave. ⁴⁶ God was the ultimate spectator. C.S. Lewis said of De Quator that it was ‘a piece of unrelieved gloom [which was almost a] libel upon life’. ⁴⁷ One should also not spoil the play by drawing attention to the actor behind the role: ‘And in a stage play all the people know right well, that he that playeth the sowdayne [sultan] is percase a sowter [shoemaker]. Yet if one should can so little good [be so ignorant] to show out of seasonne what acquaintance he hath with him, and calle him by his owne name whyle he standeth in his magestie, one of his tormenters might hap to breake his head, and worthy for marring of the play’. ⁴⁸ This suggests an early concern about theatricality or theatrical self-consciousness . West considers this arose because of the dissonance between theatre practice and the ‘ideology of theater’ to which humanists of the period	The human condition; political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Detachment; Acceptance; an ethics of responsibility for playing one’s part well, knowing it would be judged by God Judgment Possibly irony (West 1999).	External: God – the ultimate spectator Internal: observers Internalised: performers Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		subscribed in which theatre was to present a picture suspended in time for detached viewing rather than action unfolding through time and directed towards spectators for effect. ⁴⁹
1517: Luther instigates the Reformation, introducing a renewed interest in reflection and solitude which can be seen in the use of the metaphor by Calvin. Arditì also argues that ‘coincidental’ with the focus on individual salvation in Luther and Calvin was the rise of a literature ‘teaching Renaissance men and women how to behave’ in ways which also promoted individualism. He considers that this coincidence arose because of the shared ‘cultural paradigm’ generated by the metaphor (specifically in terms of role), as an explanation of the ‘experience of social atomism’, accounting for ‘a redefinition of the person’.⁵⁰
Fabula de Homine (Fable About Man) (1518) Satellitium (1524);⁵¹ De causis corruptiarum atrium (1531) (a volume of De Disciplinis libri XX (1531).	Juan Luis Vives (1492-1540) Spanish humanist and teacher; friend of Erasmus and Thomas More	Collapse of the theatre metaphor into the drama metaphor. Life was lived under the gaze of others both inside and outside the world. According to Christian, Fabula Homine was one of the most famous of all Renaissance texts which used the metaphor. It extended della Mirandola’s work, but reversed the usual role of man. Instead of being required to praise the gods, the gods came to praise and reward man for his performance, an idea which was ‘not altogether successful as philosophic literature’.⁵² Vives was ‘one of the most prolific thinkers within the northern humanist tradition’.⁵³ His theatrical view of life tied man to society: society was the only way man could achieve his ends. Taken up from Plotinus: the earth is a stage within the amphitheatrum of the universe; humans and animals are the actors. This enables humans to shine, especially when they prove capable of imitating the gods themselves. Acting is a disreputable art (artem infamen), but man’s imitation of the gods (especially Jupiter) allows him to join the gods as their ‘brother’.⁵⁴ Nevertheless, all life is good; it is ‘a comedy, or ... a sort of game’ and man is the hero.⁵⁵ (For the first time, man chooses his roles, and directs the play, a use of the metaphor which renders it incoherent, according to Christian: the actor is no longer subservient to the playwright or director, who nevertheless lingers.⁵⁶ The entire Fabula is ‘conceived and executed in theatrical terms’.⁵⁷ At the heart of this conception was Vives’ belief that man had the potential to ‘recover’ what had been lost at the Fall due to ‘a moment of insane ambition’.	The relationship of man to God	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Revelation; Communion - social interaction as a path to redemption; recovery of man’s connection with God through his social existence; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism; a space for learning	External: The gods; men who have lived well (the unmasked) Externalised: theorist/teacher Internal: the people who gather to watch Doing/ Showing/ Watching(+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		The world had been established by God as the stage on which this potential could be realised. Men needed to act well and plausibly imitate the gods so as to be invited to join them ‘unmasked’, thereby returning man in his essence ‘to the divinity from whence it came’.⁵⁸ This stage was essentially a social existence. Man could no longer make a connection with God on his own. He could only do this through society. By his interactions with others, in ways which demonstrated his capacity for perceiving both the future and the present, he could also demonstrate his affinity with the gods. (Man as actor has the potential to become a spectator with the gods). According to Fernández-Santamaria, this placed Vives in an external position equivalent to that of ‘the experienced drama coach privy to one fundamental fact unknown to the performer’, for he alone could reveal and explain ‘the nature of God’s plan for man’.⁵⁹ It could be seen as an early sign of the confusion between drama and theatre in which the spectator position is increasingly collapsed into the performance position. The spectators at this theatre were the Gods (Jupiter, Juno etc); the ‘unmasked’ man; the sage (Vives, ‘the experienced drama coach’). Actors also were spectators for each other. In De causus, Vives argued that education was one of the functions of theatre, even as he clearly stated the relationship of performer and spectator: ‘Poetry comes onto the stage, with the people gathered to watch, and there just as the painter displays a picture to the crowd to be seen, so the poet [displays] a kind of image of life ... thus the teacher of the people is both a painter and a poet’.⁶⁰ Vives condemned acting which drew attention to the actor rather than the character: ‘They act plays so as to seem to act ... which is an indecorum: for a play refers not to itself, but to what is done, or whatever deed is feigned, as a picture [refers] to a thing, not to itself’.⁶¹
	Martin Luther	The world is ‘God’s play’: history is a ‘puppet-play of God’s’ in	The human	An acting space	Revelation;	External: God

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	(1483-1546) German theologian; leader of the Protestant Reformation	which we see only God's 'masks' at work. God as Playwright determines the life of man and who will be saved. Salvation can only come through divine grace. One must act under conditions determined by external forces. ⁶²	condition	A constructed art	Acceptance; fatalism	Externalised: theologian Doing/ Showing(-)
The Book of the Courtier (1528)	Baldessare Castiglione (1478-1529) Italian courtier, diplomat and soldier	Political life requires artifice, which is disguised through skill. Courtiers should always have skills in a range of activities, but they should always behave with grace. There is one rule for courtiers which is 'most general ... and that is ... to cover art withall, and seeme whatsoever he doth and sayeth to do it wythout pain, and (as it were) not myndyng it'. Moreover, 'that may be said to be a very art that appeereth not to be art [as in] excellent Oratours, which among other their cares, enforced themselves to make every man beleve that they had no sight in letters, and dissemblinge their conning, made semblant their orations to be made very simply, and rather as nature and trueth lead them, then study and arte, the whiche if it had bene openly knowen, would have putte a doubte in the peoples minde for feare least he beguiled them' (Book I). ⁶³	Political (court) life	An acting space	Strategies of performance aimed at credibility	Internal: The Court Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536); Letter to Melancthon (1555); Commentaries (on Daniel, Job and Genesis)	John Calvin (1509-1564) French theologian and church reformer	Typically muddled metaphor. Religious life requires us to come to know God through the world and his place in it. The world as God's theatre was Calvin's favourite metaphor, drawn from Plotinus via the Florentine Platonists, and it 'has implications for man as actor as well as spectator'. The world is a theatre (spectaculum) 'erected for displaying the glory of God'; man is an actor in this theatre as well as a spectator, playing roles 'assigned and directed by the author'. This gives man 'a double labor of mind and body' because it requires 'both a discipline of the inner consciousness and a mastery of outer action and stage'. ⁶⁴ '...it becomes man seriously to employ his eyes in considering the works of God, since a place has been assigned to	Religious Life: the relation of man to God in the world;	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Revelation Acceptance; Humility, wonder; self-consciousness and self-discipline in man; wonder at the sight of God's glory Judgment	External: God and the Angels Internal: man Externalised: theologian Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		him in this most glorious theatre that he may be a spectator of them'. ⁶⁵ 'Every man should seriously apply himself to a consideration of the works of God, being placed in this very splendid theater to be a spectator of them'. ⁶⁶ In observing God's glory in the world man thereby sees God and comes to adore Him, even as God and the angels observe man and judge him. Yet Calvin was renowned for his pessimism regarding man, sharing the Neoplatonist's 'aristocratic scorn for the "unenlightened" average man as brutish'. ⁶⁷ (A typically muddled metaphor)
Image of Governauce (1541)	Sir Thomas Elyot (c1490-1546) English diplomat	The Image of Governauce was a treatise on the ideal management of the state which saw theatre as a space of education in which philosophical debates could take place: a 'space of exposition rather than production, where disputants display their cases "openly" apparently without the mimetic possibilities of dramatic recognition or reversal', much like Habermas' public sphere is meant to operate. There is some debate over whether this use is metaphorical. ⁶⁸	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility which allows learning	Externalised: teacher Internal: student Showing (+/-)
De dissectione partium corporis humnani (1545)	Charles Estienne (1504-1564) Paris-based professor of anatomy	Theatre was a place from which one watched (and learnt). Estienne described an ideal anatomy theatre based on the principles of Vitruvius. He believed that 'anatomy was comparable to any other public show'. ⁶⁹ The spectator learnt as he watched in an anatomy theatre as he did in any public show Estienne believed that the dissected human body was comparable to 'anything that is exhibited in a theatre in order to be viewed' [quicquid in theatro spectandum exhibetur]. ⁷⁰ The show was 'a great deal more beautiful and pleasing to the spectators if they are able to see it clearly, from equally good vantage points, and without getting in one another's way'. ⁷¹ The anatomy table 'should be arranged in front of the theatre , in the place where the ancients placed the stage' [Ante theatrum, quo in loco scenam antiqui constituebant, tabulam anatomicam ... constituere	Learning through looking	A seeing-place; A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility and therefore learning	Internal: Man Externalised: teacher Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		oportet]. ⁷²
Erasmus' Apophthegms 1548	Nicholas Udall (c1504-1556) English playwright and teacher	Udall translated Erasmus' Apophthegms and produced a Latin textbook which used the work of Terence. Life includes spectatorship, which is required for judgment. Weisinger claims Udall's work offers the earliest Renaissance reference of the metaphor in which the spectator is placed on to the stage of life, although see Vives (1518). ⁷³	Value of spectatorship	A seeing-place	Judgment	Internal: man Doing/ Watching (+/-)
Idea del teatro (1550)	Guilio Camillo (1480-1544) Italian scholar and inventor	In 1544, Camillo built a representation of the theatrum mundi metaphor as a way of producing 'a total picture of the universe'. ⁷⁴ It had the shape of a Roman amphitheatre, but was to be a 'symbolic tool' and a means of cognition and education. It had no living spectators for it was to be used preserve and develop the ancient art of memory along universal lines. It was a wooden structure large enough to allow an adult to stand in its centre, and to climb the stair to doorways which held libraries of manuscripts as well as paper hangings explaining the symbolism of each of the seven tiers. The influence of his idea can be seen in the enormous efforts to realise the metaphor, especially in theatre architecture and design, as well as the 'vast majority of books with theatrum in their title' which came out after Camillo's death. Although Camillo has long since been forgotten by theatre theorists and practitioners, remnant of the theatrum mundi can still be seen in the experimental uses of theatre spaces designed to incorporate spectators since the 1920's.	Spectatorship as a way of training the memory	A seeing-place; A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Knowledge	Internal: Man Showing (+)
Theatrum Mundi (1558) (published in English in 1574); ⁷⁵ Epistle Dedicatorie (1581)	Pierre Boaistuau (aka Pierre Launay) (1500-1566) French writer and translator	Man is an actor before God and others and a spectator of God's providence. The Theatrum Mundi was a listing of all the books in Boaistuau's extensive library. The treatise deals with the miseries and adversities that afflict man of man during his life. The world was a theatre of all miseries; whether one plays kings or 'men of base condition ... death commeth and maketh an end [of the] bloudie tragedy'. ⁷⁶ For the fun of casting scorn on the puny activities of men: 'then the Lord ... laugheth at their foolish	Man's relation to the world	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Objectification To enable understanding of the relationship between man and God; sceptical	External: the Lord; Internal: men Externalised: theorist Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		enterprises and vanities [making] vs tremble and quake for feare'. ⁷⁷ Nevertheless, the world was a spectacle of God's providence, made to encourage 'admiration and reuerence [for] the heade Authour and Creatour'. ⁷⁸ The full title of his book has been translated as The Theatre or rule of the World, wherein may be sene the running race and course of everye mans life, as touching miserie and felicitie and promised to reveal: 'The finall scope, the totall ende,/the wandring steps wherein/ Humanum genus seemes to tende,/his pagent to begin./Most like a Theatre, a game/or gamplace if we wil .../Now plaste aloft in Princely state/and straight brought downe as lowe'. ⁷⁹			acceptance; wonder and admiration; Detachment
c1558	Queen Elizabeth I (1533-1603)	A demonstration of the power of the monarch: 'We princes, I tell you, are set on stages, in the sight and view of all the world duly observed.' ⁸⁰	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space	Visibility which allows power to be demonstrated	Internal: subjects of the monarch Showing (+)
The Quene's Majestie's passage through the citie of London (1559); ⁸¹ The Noble Spanish Soldier (c1631)	Thomas Dekker (1572–1632) English poet and playwright	The city of London at the time of the coronation was 'a stage' - glorious coverings hid the ugliness within 'but let this King retire/Into his closet to put off his robes/He like a Player leaves his part off too:/Open his breast, and with a Sunne-beame search it/There's no such man; this King of gilded clay/Within is uglinesse, lust, treachery'. ⁸²	Social and Political life	A constructed art	Deception	Externalised: playwright/ critic Internal: subjects Showing (-)
1562-1598: Wars of Religion in France
The Complaint of Henry, Duke of Buckingham (1563)	Thomas Sackville (1536-1608) English statesman, poet and dramatist	One must act under conditions determined by external forces. Life is a play; God assigns our parts. We must play our parts well, however short they may be, and accept death as inevitable. ⁸³	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment Acceptance; an ethics of responsibility to play our part well	External Doing (-)
Theatrum vitae	Theodor	Theatrum vitae was a general encyclopedia. In it Zwinger applies	Intellectual	An acting space	Subjectification	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
humanae (1565)	Zwinger (1533-1588) Swiss scholar	the term actor to one who helps to bring forth knowledge, such as a researcher or ‘knowledgeable man’: ‘because researchers ... are those who bring forth onto the scene the words and deeds of others in a kind of rebirth’. ⁸⁴ West argues that this use of the term may not in fact be metaphorical because the terms actor and author were used interchangeably at the time for situation where scholars were re-presenting the work of another.	work			scholar Internal: reader Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Theatrum Mundi (published in English in 1574)	Pierre Boaistuau (aka Pierre Launay) (1500-1566)	The world is a theatre of all miseries; whether one plays kings or ‘men of base condition’, ‘death commeth and maketh an end’ of the ‘bloudie tragedy’ (Epistle Dedicatorie 1581). Nevertheless, the world is a spectacle of God’s providence, made to encourage ‘admiration and reuerence [for] the heade Authour and Creatour’.	Man’s relation to the world	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Objectification To enable understanding of the relationship between man and God; sceptical acceptance; wonder and admiration; Detachment	External: the Lord; Internal: men Externalised: theorist Showing

¹ Egginton argues that this was a fundamentally different way of experiencing space, one which was imbued with notions of mimesis as participation in the origin and a sense of ‘magic’ in which events were ‘not “accidental” or “random”’ but functioned according to a causal logic ‘determined by a specific agency of power’ such as God (Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press: 38-46). It was not a view of life which suggested the detachment required for a conception of life as theatre.

² Bernheimer, Richard. 1956. ‘Theatrum Mundi’. The Art Bulletin 38 (4) pp. 225-247: 34

³ Tatariewicz, W. 2003. ‘Ut pictura poesis’. In The Dictionary of the History of Ideas. Virginia: Electronic Text Center, University of Virginia Library p. 458-461

⁴ Cited in Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc: 234(II)n1

⁵ Christian 1987: 63

⁶ Egginton 2003: 48. Christian (1987), who does not mention Honorius, does however point out that what medieval scholars of this time knew of tragedy and comedy largely came from the Etymologies of Isidore of Seville. They were known to be ‘declaimed’ before an audience, but were thought of as narratives in verse, with either sad or happy endings, rather than as dramatisations (Christian 1987: 235(II)n2). Petronius, whom John of Salisbury cites, was largely unknown at the time, and even the use of the term theatrum would have been considered obscure (Christian 1987: 69).

⁷ Christian 1987: 67

⁸ Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 145

⁹ Policraticus 493d-494a; 491a-d in Christian 1987: 64-69, 238n8, 239n11. John's idea of what a theatre was appears to have been taken from Isidore's definition of theatre as amphitheatre and his definitions of tragedy and comedy, theatre and scene, although Christian says it seems that he did not have a clear idea about what a tragedy or a comedy was.

¹⁰ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]: 169

¹¹ Policraticus III.8 in Vickers, Brian. 1971. 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery'. Studies in the Literary Imagination 4 (1) pp. 189-226, p. 195-8

¹² Christian 1987: 195

¹³ Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI), 141: the phrase was slightly modified: 'exerceat' was changed to 'agit'. Theatrum mundi appears in Policraticus, III, ix, 494a.

¹⁴ McGillivray 2007: 161

¹⁵ Policraticus 493d-494a, quoted in Christian 1987: 67.

¹⁶ Christian 1987: 239n9

¹⁷ Christian attempts to explain both the sudden appearance of the metaphor in the work of John of Salisbury, after a gap of almost 700 years, and its subsequent disappearance for a further 300 years. She suggests John of Salisbury was attracted to the metaphor both as a way of demonstrating his classical learning, and as a way of articulating his belief in the hypocrisy and worthlessness of human life: 'he marshals all the traditions he knows to emphasize the misery of man as actor' (Christian 1987: 70). She also argues that the metaphor disappeared after John, because it was largely meaningless to medieval writers who had never seen a play performed in a theatre, and a much more meaningful, and apparently appropriate metaphor was available to them: the image of life as a dream – 'a metaphor which can be fairly said to dominate the Middle Ages' (Christian 1987: 71).

¹⁸ Curtius 1990/1948: 591-2

¹⁹ Egginton 2003: 41-3

²⁰ West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287: 247

²¹ Christian 1987: 71

²² McGillivray 2007: 166

²³ Christian 1987: 78

²⁴ Christian 1987: 145

²⁵ Ficino, Consolatio in Obitu Filii, translated by Christian 1987: 241(III)n2).

²⁶ Christian 1987: 76

²⁷ Christian 1987: 6

-
- ²⁸ ‘Medium te mundi posui ut circumspiceres inde commodius quidquid est in mondo’: Ernst Cassirer (ed) 1965, trans. E.L. Forbes, The Renaissance Philosophy of Man, Chicago, pp. 223-5; Latin text quoted and also translated by Christian 1987: 243(III)n11).
- ²⁹ Christian 1987: 198
- ³⁰ Foucault, Michel. 1994/1966. The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences. New York: Vintage Books: 131
- ³¹ Christian 1987: viii, 106-110
- ³² Egginton 2003: 76
- ³³ Enders, Jody. 1992. Rhetoric and the Origins of Medieval Drama. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press: 43
- ³⁴ Bernheimer 1956: 226-46. Where to draw the line on surveys of metaphor use becomes problematic in cases like this, especially as it is not altogether certain whether this use is metaphoric, or merely a development of the word’s original meaning of seeing place from which one could see a complete view of something.
- ³⁵ Agnew, J.C. 1988. Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theater in Anglo-American Thought, 1550-1750. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press
- ³⁶ Erasmus 1941, The Praise of Folly, trans. H.H. Hudson, New York, pp. 54-118, quoted in Christian 1987: pp. 147-149, by Evreinov, Nicolas. 1970/1927. The Theatre in Life. Translated by A. I. Nazaroff. New York: Benjamin Blom: 419 and in Dewey, Richard. 1969. 'The Theatrical Analogy Reconsidered'. The American Sociologist 4 pp. 307-311: 309. As can be gathered from the reappearance of the Laughing Philosopher, Erasmus was greatly influenced by the works of Lucian, of which he had produced thirty-six translations between 1503 and 1517 (Christian 1987: 145-8).
- ³⁷ Merleau-Ponty, Maurice. 1964. 'A Note on Machiavelli'. In Signs. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 211-223: 219
- ³⁸ Potolsky, Matthew. 2006. Mimesis. Edited by J. Drakakis, The New Critical Idiom. New York and London: Routledge: 78
- ³⁹ Machiavelli wrote a play which is still performed today, Mandragola (The Mandrake). It is reminiscent of Roman New Comedy and reflects the influence of the classical era on the Renaissance. A bawdy comedy, it tells the story of a gullible husband hoodwinked by his wife and her lover (Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill: 155).
- ⁴⁰ Machiavelli, Niccolò. 1981/1513. The Prince. Translated by G. Bull. Harmondsworth England: Penguin Books: 101
- ⁴¹ Ezrahi, Yaron. 1995. 'The Theatrics and Mechanics of Action: The Theater and the Machine as Political Metaphors'. Social Research 62 (2) pp. 299-323; Lyman, Stanford M, and Marvin B. Scott. 1975. The Drama of Social Reality. New York: Oxford University Press: 112
- ⁴² Lyman and Scott 1975: 112-3
- ⁴³ Potolsky 2006: 77
- ⁴⁴ McGillivray 2007: 184
- ⁴⁵ More History c1513-18: 81 in West 1999: 260
- ⁴⁶ More De Quatuor 1522, quoted in Christian 1987: 112
- ⁴⁷ Lewis, C.S. 1965, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Oxford 1965, pp. 176-177.
- ⁴⁸ More History c1513-18: 80-81; cited in West 1999: 260
- ⁴⁹ West 1999: 260
- ⁵⁰ Arditi, Jorge (George). 1994. 'Geertz, Kuhn and the Idea of a Cultural Paradigm'. British Journal of Sociology 45 (4) 597-617: 607-8
- ⁵¹ Written for Princess Mary Tudor, daughter of Henry VIII, to whom Vives was a tutor.
- ⁵² Christian 1987: 81, 85

-
- ⁵³ Fernández-Santamaria, J.S. 1998. The Theater of Man: J.L. Vives on Society. Vol. 88 Part 2, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society held at Philadelphia for Promoting Useful Knowledge. Philadelphia Pa: American Philosophical Society: vii
- ⁵⁴ The setting of the stage of the earth within an amphitheatre, and the reference to acting as a disreputable art show the influence of Isidore's definitions.
- ⁵⁵ Christian sees the optimism of Pico della Mirandola and Vives as a reaction against the medieval contemptus mundi, although Mirandola was later to repent of this 'exuberant reliance on the powers of man', becoming a monk and coming to profess a faith in God (Christian 1987: 86).
- ⁵⁶ If man is no longer 'a puppet, subservient to the will of the divine' (Christian 1987: 200), however that might be interpreted, what happens to 'the divine'?
- ⁵⁷ Fernández-Santamaria 1998: 1
- ⁵⁸ Christian 1987: 85
- ⁵⁹ Fernández-Santamaria 1998: 6-7
- ⁶⁰ Quoted in West, William 1999, 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe', in Masten, Jeffrey and Wall, Wendy (eds), Renaissance Drama New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, Evanston, Northwestern University Press, p. 280n6.
- ⁶¹ Vives De disciplinis 90-91, quoted by West 1999: 260.
- ⁶² Curtius 1990/1948: 140
- ⁶³ Castiglione 1997/1528, published electronically by Renaissance Editions 1997, University of Oregon, www.uoregon.edu/~rbear/courtier/courtier.html accessed 12th September 2007.
- ⁶⁴ Calvin, quoted in Battenhouse, Roy 1948, 'The Doctrine of Man in Calvin and in Renaissance Platonism', Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol 9, p. 460-5.
- ⁶⁵ Calvin Institutes I. vi.2 in Vickers 1971: 197
- ⁶⁶ Calvin, Institutes, quoted in Weisinger, Herbert. 1964. 'Theatrum Mundi: Illusion as Reality'. In The Agony and the Triumph: Papers on the Use and Abuse of Myth. Michigan: Michigan State University Press, pp. 58-704: 62.
- ⁶⁷ Battenhouse 1948: 462n78
- ⁶⁸ West 1999: 260
- ⁶⁹ Ferrari, Giovanna 1987, 'Public Anatomy Lessons and the Carnival: The Anatomy Theatre of Bologna', Past and Present 117; cited in McGillivray 2007: 200-201
- ⁷⁰ Estienne in Ferrari 1987: 85
- ⁷¹ Ferrari 1987: 85
- ⁷² Ferrari 1987; cited in McGillivray 2007: 200-201.
- ⁷³ Weisinger 1964
- ⁷⁴ Bernheimer 1956: 226-31. There is evidence that Camillo originally envisaged his scheme based on the human body, but changed it to a theatre some time before 1521.
- ⁷⁵ An example of the genre of history writing called 'divine history', which was very popular in C16th and C17th (Christian 1987: 97). Vickers gives the English publication date as 1566.
- ⁷⁶ Included in the second English edition published by John Alday (Christian 1987: 114)
- ⁷⁷ Epistle Dedicatorie 1581, quoted in Christian 1987: 115.
- ⁷⁸ Theatrum Mundi, 1574, tr. John Alday, Book IV, p. 218. Christian claims that Boaistuau's book 'holds a special place in the history of the metaphor' because it attempts, unsuccessfully, to combine both the patristic version (man is depraved) and the Hermetic/Plotinian view of the glorious spectacle (12987: 117).
- ⁷⁹ in Vickers 1971: 207

⁸⁰ Quoted in J.E. Neale 1958, Elizabeth I and her Parliament, New York, Vol. 2, p. 119; cited in Orgel 1975: 41.

⁸¹ Cited in Manley, Laurence 1995, 'Of Sites and Rites', in Smith, David L., Richard Strier, and David Bevington, eds. 1995. The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 35-54.

⁸² Dekker The Noble Spanish Soldier in Vickers 1971: 204.

⁸³ Christian 1987: 283

⁸⁴ Zwinger 1565: 186 quoted in West 1999: 265

Table 4/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: from the opening of Burbage's theatre in 1576 to C18th

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1576: Burbage opened either the first or second permanent theatre in Europe after Roman times (there are references to a theatre-like structure at the court at Ferrara c1550), and the first in England, restoring to the term theatre some of the 'sense of place' which it originally carried,¹ although see West who argues that Burbage's use of the word was actually metaphoric, taken from the use of the word for a large book containing knowledge in a visual form rather than from any knowledge of an architectural structure. According to West, an 'ideology of theater' developed in humanist literature which was at odds with actual theatre practice of the time.² If this is the case, then many of the entries in this table between the Middle Ages and the C19th when the remains of Greek theatres began to be uncovered, would not be metaphoric but literal. Nevertheless, the late C16th saw an 'extraordinary increase in the quality and quantity of theatrical activity ... and the concomitant emphasis within the plays on the meaning of playing and the validity of treating the world as a stage. Man as actor and the world as theatre'.³ Note: wars are almost continuous during this period in Europe. 1562-1598 Wars of Religion in France 1568-1648 Dutch Independence Wars (80 Years War); 1570-1595 25 Years War; 1571 Russo-Crimean War
The French Academie (1577; first English trans. 1586, published by Thomas Bowes)	Pierre de la Primaudaye (c.1545-?) French Huguenot, Christian Platonist	'The World ... is a Theatre, where the divine essence ... have their working by a wonderful vertue in every creature', especially man. ⁴ The task of man is to learn about God by observing the wonders in the world.	The relationship of man to the world and to God.	A seeing place	Revelation	Internal: Man is a spectator of God's work in the world Showing/Watching (+/-)
Epithalamie ... (1581)	Jean Dorat (Daurat) (1508-1588) French poet and scholar	Man is both actor and spectator. The world is an amphitheatre. ⁵ Life is scrutinised. Everyone is watching everyone else.	The human condition	A seeing place	Visibility; Self-awareness	Internal: Everyone Watching (-)
Playes Confuted in Five Actions (1582)	Stephen Gosson (1554-1623) English humanist and former actor turned Puritan	One of a number of diatribes against the theatre which used theatre metaphors: 'a close rhetorical relationship between the condemnation of the theater and theater itself'. ⁶	The dangers of theatre	A constructed art	Deception	Internal: Theatre-goers Externalised: critic Showing (-)
The Anatomie	Philip	'To "learne falsehood ... cosenage" and deception is to "learne to	The dangers	A constructed art	Deception;	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
of Abuses (1583)	Stubbes (c1555- c1610) English poet and pamphleteer	play the Hipocrit, to cogge, lye, and falsifie'. ⁷	of theatre		hypocrisy	critic Doing/ Showing (-)
1585-1604 Anglo-Spanish War 1589 Franco-Spanish War 1590-1595 Russo-Spanish War
Concerning the Trewnesse of the Christian Religion (English version 1587)	Philip Mornay (1549-1623) French Huguenot	God is the 'just playwright'; man is both actor, struggling to be virtuous, and spectator who sees wickedness and suffering but is comforted that God will ensure that justice prevails: 'the world is the theater of God's justice'. One must play one's part without complaint for God will tell 'when it is time to pay [our] hire'. ⁸	The human condition; man's relationship to God	A seeing place An acting space A relationship between actors and spectator Teleology	Visibility; Acceptance; endurance; trust in God; Fatalism Judgment	External: God Internal: man Externalised – theorist Doing/ Watching (+/-)
Universae Naturae Theatrum (1595)	Jean Bodin (c1529-1596) French political philosopher	A dialogue between a master, Mystagogus (Leader/Initiator into Mysteries), and a pupil, Theorus (Spectator), who has asked Mystagogus to 'educate me ... about everything' (quoted in West 1999: 255). Mystagogus agrees to Theorus' request because 'we do not come into this theatre of the world [mundi theatrum] for any other reason than that of contemplating ... the spectacle [speciem] of the universe and all the works of the highest founder of all things, and his individual workings'. For Bodin seeing was the path to knowing. The world was a theatre which 'intends for itself to be viewed' in order that its predictability and order be seen: 'in nature nothing is uncertain'. What is more, it is 'spread out ... just as in a theatre ... so that as if it were set before the eye for viewing, by the arrangement of all things the essence and faculty of each might more clearly be made out'. ⁹ Bodin was a fore-runner of Hobbes whose thinking was also influenced by his experience of civil war, inclining him to absolutism. ¹⁰	Intellectual life	A seeing-place A constructed art	Revelation;	Externalised: the observer of the world Showing/ Watching (+/-)
The Faerie Queen (1596)	Edmund Spenser	Spenser uses the theatre metaphor in his epic allegorical poem in order to bring scrutiny on the spectator : 'theater becomes for	The relationship	A seeing place A relationship	The dilemma of distance:	Internal: man Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	(c1552-1599) English poet and philosopher	Spenser both an object of commentary and a means of severe reflection on his own art' in a way which marks the move in actual theatre 'from education to entertainment'. The course of the poem highlights the dilemma of the spectator: whether to maintain distance in spite of the tragedy before him, or whether to leap into action, thereby losing perspective. Central characters do cross the line, and in doing so at times cause more destruction. Spenser's poem also mirrored the changing attitudes to theatre as it moved from pageant to spectacle to 'savage rebuke'. While recognizing that spectators could come to enjoy tragedy as a kind of sport, Spenser also revealed intervention in this decadent form of spectatorship as bringing its own violence. The poem is generally seen as an allegory of the rule of Queen Elizabeth, but according to Dolven, it also raises questions about the relationship between theatre and society and clearly depicts this relationship as an historical and social one, 'bound up with customs and institutions that support performance'. ¹¹	between the theatre and social life, between stage and spectator	between actors and spectator	distance prevents action but allows perspective	– poet Doing/ Watching (+/-)
Theatrum Vitae Humane (1596)	Jean-Jacques Boissard (1528-1602) French poet (wrote in Latin)	'The Life of Man is Like a Theater of All Miseries'. ¹² (Calvinistic view). Man must act out a tragedy watched by God, angels and sages. The title page has 'vignettes of a skeleton attacking an infant in its cradle with the arrow death, a skeleton at a feast and a skeleton digging a grave for an old man'. ¹³ The book is illustrated with emblems by the engraver Theodor de Bry (d.1598). The emblem for the title page of chapter one is the only example known to Christian which includes God (and His angels and a few sages) as spectators of the human tragedy as in Raphael's painting La Disputa del Sacramento . The arrangement follows John of Salisbury. ¹⁴	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility; Fatalism Endurance in the face of the inevitability of death	External: God, angels and a few sages Externalised – writer Showing (-)
Amfliparnasso (1597)	Orazio Vecchi (1550-1605) Italian	The prologue of Vecchi's play refers to his spectators as 'the great theater of the world'. His play had no need of a 'stage' for it was set within this world, and the music had been composed for the spectators, not the play. ¹⁵	The relationship of theatre to the world	A seeing place A relationship between actors and spectator	Subjectification	Internal: Everyone Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	composer and playwright
Della Historia (10 'Platonic dialogues')	Francesco Patrizzi (1529-1597) Italian Christian Platonist and cynic	Human history is a play performed before the gods; man is just an actor who deludes himself into thinking he can be like the gods (he has no free will). The gods have no interest in man other than as an actor taking part in some form of entertainment. Patrizzi was part of the 'Counter-Renaissance', a reaction against the efforts of the Scholastics to use dialectic and deduction to formulate universal laws about the workings of nature. Because of this the movement had some affinity with the radical empiricism of Kepler, Galileo and Descartes. However, also in reaction to the elevation of man in the 15 th century, it typically exhibited a profound pessimism regarding man and his ability to reach his potential. ¹⁶	The human condition	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator Teleology	Fatalism	External: the gods Externalised – critic Doing/Watching (-)
Essais (1580)	Michel de Montaigne (1533-1592) French essayist and philosopher	Life is lived under the scrutiny of others. Man is both actor and spectator. Life is a play, ended only by death. To be a spectator is to be thankful one has avoided catastrophe. In life the aim should be to play one's role, avoid calamity and to die well when the time comes so that a well-ordered soul can be attributed to an individual at the completion of 'the last act of his comedy'. ¹⁷ Politics is a public spectacle designed to mystify. (Stoic-patristic use of the metaphor)	The human condition	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility Fatalism Acceptance An ethics of endurance The possibility of deception	Internal: the fortunate individual; Externalised – critic Doing/Showing/Watching (-)
1589: Franco-Spanish War
Gesta Grayorum (1595); The Advancement of Learning (1605); New Organon (1620); The	Francis Bacon (1561-1626) English lawyer, politician and philosopher	Theatre is a 'seeing place'; it is about feigning, Bacon draws on Lucretius in 'On Truth', translating as follows: 'It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below; but no pleasure is comparable to standing on the vantage ground of Truth and to see the errors, and the wanderings, and tempests, in the vale below'. He combines this maxim with both a refusal of and a use of the theatre	Social, political and intellectual life	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Detachment which allows Critique; resignation; sociability; feigning	External: God and Angels; Internal: theatre-goers; Externalised – critic, philosopher Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
History of Henry VII (1622)		metaphor: Life is not theatre: ‘one should not stay long in the theatre’; nevertheless, ‘men must know, that in this theatre of man’s life it is reserved only for God and Angels to be lookers on’. ¹⁸ The New Organon (Book I) developed his concept of the Idols which had been introduced in The Advancement of Learning . These were groups of beliefs, conceptions, perceptions and understandings which hindered the achievement of a full and accurate understanding of nature. One of these was the Idols of the Theatre . Here theatre is used as a metaphor for the kind of deceptive ‘grand schemes of systems’ of thinking indulged in by certain branches of philosophy, and all of which were likely to lead the understanding astray. ¹⁹ ‘And in the plays of this philosophical theatre you may observe the same thing which is found in the theatre of the poets, that stories invented for the stage are more compact and elegant, and more as one would wish them to be, than true stories out of history’. ²⁰ Bacon has generally been considered anti-theatre, but Vickers’ extensive analysis of the use of the theatrical metaphor in his work indicates that ‘Bacon in the theatre was neither a stranger nor an enemy’. In fact, he had written some ‘dramas’ during the 1590s, and his mother had expressed a concern to his brother that Bacon was getting too involved in the theatre. Bacon used the metaphor extensively and in a variety of ways and, on the whole, non-pejoratively to deflate men, to argue that deceit and illusion is bound to be found out, and to point out that life ends, just like plays do. For Bacon, theatre was most generally a seeing place, ‘a scene of events’ and public action. Law, for instance is ‘a Stage’ where things are brought to light. ²¹ Theatre was about feigning, action, strategy and the reversal of fortune, hypocrisy, playacting, pretense and the lack of concern for consequences. It was also a social place which brought people together in such a way as to distract them from their differences: ‘all sociably together listening', ²² and provided a way of talking about the stages of public life, and he used it as a metaphor to indicate all of these aspects of life. ²³ He considered politicians to be hypocritical: 'nothing but a continual acting upon a stage'. ²⁴ He thought himself 'fitter to hold a book than play a part' on 'the stage of civil action'. ²⁵ In particular, the metaphor invoked the spectator – usually God, sometimes man (a vicarious spectator).

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
A Midsummer Night's Dream (1595); Hamlet (1600); All's Well that Ends Well (1602); Macbeth (1605); The Tempest (1611), ²⁶ King Lear ; As You Like It ; Henry VI ; Richard II ; Sonnet 23	William Shakespeare (1564-1616) English playwright and poet	Life is lived under the scrutiny of others. Man was both actor and spectator. Shakespeare was 'obsessed by the trope', using it with great skill to exploit the connections between theatre and life and the experience of living life under the scrutiny of others. ²⁷ Thinking of life as theatre allows multiple positions for both actors and spectators. It is amusing but also raises serious questions about the relationship between action and spectatorship. In saying 'All the world's a stage/And all the men and women merely players' (As You Like It II.vii). Shakespeare represents the apotheosis and locus classicus of the metaphor in the English-speaking world. His plays brought together and played out the different strands of the metaphor, giving it its most 'fearfully complex' development in Hamlet (Christian 1987: 164), but perhaps pushing it to its disintegration in Macbeth , when Life itself is made 'a poor player' in a tale 'told by an idiot, full of sound and fury/Signifying nothing'. ²⁸ and in the 'Hermetic' version in The Tempest in which Man (Prospero) and God were equals. For Shakespeare, as the macrocosm was to the microcosm, so the world was to theatre. Within the Globe theatre, as within the Globe of the world, actors played their parts: Totus mundus agit histrionem . ²⁹ In King Lear he wrote that 'When we are borne, we cry that we are come/To this great stage of fools' (IV.vi). In Coriolanus 'the Heavens do ope/The gods look down, and this unnatural scene/They laugh at' (V. iii), especially if 'As an unperfect actor on the stage/Who with his fear is put besides	The human condition; social and political life	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Objectivity; detachment; Subjectivity; revelation; amusement; critique	External: the gods Internal: man Externalised – cynic Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		his part' (Sonnet 23). Potolsky sees Hamlet as a sustained consideration of the subject of mimesis : a 'meditation on the theatrum mundi metaphor, and ... on its suggestion that the boundaries dividing theatre and everyday life, acting and politics are unstable' and in which 'all of the major characters play the role of audience members', suggesting that 'theatrical paradigms are at once inevitable and deeply problematic. In particular, as all the 'audiences' come to a sticky end, the play not only 'indicates that the lines between spectacle and spectators are always, and dangerously, in flux', but that each spectator brings presuppositions to the performance they are watching which affects their interpretation of what they see. The truth which any performance reveals 'concerns the moral status of the audience, not the subject of the drama', as much as it reveals the moral status of the director. As well, the only means of expression if all the world is a stage, is another performance. Hamlet 'also raises powerful questions about the nature of acting, emotion and social interaction'. ³⁰
Ecclesiastes or The Preacher (1597)	Henry Loic (c1533-1608) Christian Platonist	Men have no control over their position in life. Life is a play created by God, who assigns men their parts and takes pleasure in 'the work of His owne hand'. ³¹ We must play our assigned parts thinking of life in 'that other world'.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment which allows Acceptance; Deterministic	External: God (dramatist and judge) Doing (+/-)
Theatre of God's Judgements (1597)	Thomas Beard (d. 1632) Puritan	The world is God's theatre; God is a master of the spectacular, the master playwright and director; only God keeps us (and our political order) from 'plunging into the pit'. No-one is secure (a public view of the world as theatre) (Calvinistic; typical of Puritan rhetoric). Man is both actor and spectator in a life he cannot control. It lists 'in loving detail "the great and horrible punishments wherewith the Lord in his most righteous judgement hath scourged the world for sinne"' in order to instruct and warn of God's judgment. ³² The book had many editions and was	The relationship between man and God.	An acting space A constructed art	Revelation Judgment Moral lessons Fatalism	External: God Internal: Man Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		republished in 1648 after the execution of Charles I. ³³
Basilikon Doron (1599)	King James I (1566-1625)	Kings demonstrate their power theatrically in order to affect their subjects: 'A King is as one set on a stage, whose smallest actions and gestures, all the people gazingly doe behold'. ³⁴	Political life	An acting space A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility allowing wonder	Internal: the people Showing (+)
The Compendium of Tragicomic Poetry (1599)	Giambattista Guarini (1538-1612) Italian professor of rhetoric, politician, diplomat, dramatist and poet	'Ours is an age of appearances and one goes a-masquerading all the year'. Life involves playing different parts, assigned by others. When Alfonso II, for whom he acted as a politician and diplomat, commanded him to take up the position of court poet, Guarini again invoked the metaphor: 'I strove to transform myself into another man and, like a play actor, to reassume the characters, manners, and emotions of a past period. Mature in age, I forced myself to appear young; exchanged my melancholy for gaiety; affected loves I did not feel; turned my wisdom into folly, and, in a word, passed from philosopher to poet'. ³⁵	Social and political life	An acting space A constructed art	Self-awareness, which enables strategies of performance	Internal: Powerful others Externalised – the self Doing/ Showing (-)
17th Century: the Classical Era – 'the age of the catalogue'³⁶: 'the metaphor had come to be one of the most popular of all rhetorical commonplaces',³⁷ reaching its apogee in England where life, like theatre was considered a comedy of manners, and cultural life was based on social performance: '... our age/Is now at large a Bedlam on a Stage' (Richard James, 'commendatory poet').³⁸ The purpose of the metaphor was secular: to behave appropriately before others. On this depended social and perhaps even economic success: 'man in business is but a Theatrical person, and in a manner but personates himself'.³⁹ In C17th America, however (and largely in the absence of any actual theatre), the metaphor retained and developed its theological shape: life continued to be considered a tragedy, directed by Providence and requiring one to play one's part well before submitting to the transcendent spectator, God, for judgment. A 'literary revolution' occurred between C17th and C18th centuries, with an explosion in 'public forms of writing' such as 'pamphlets, handbills, and newspapers'.⁴⁰ By the second half of C17th, 'the sense of crisis due to information overload had reached such proportions that printing ... had to be defended against the charge of bringing on a new era of barbarity'.⁴¹ Rancière called this period 'the revolution of the children of the Book'.⁴² This produced a concern over the quality of judgment, especially as it was thought that such material could stir up instability and dissent in the masses.⁴³
The Diamond of Devotion (1602)	Abraham Fleming (1552-1607) English clergyman and writer	We are all equal at death: 'Heere we walke like plaieurs upon a stage ... as the course and order of the interlude requireth; euerie acte whereof being plaide, there is no more to doe, but open the gates and dismisse the assemblie ... for what other thing is the compasse of the world ... but an ample and large theatre, whereupon all things are appointed to plaie their pageants, which, when they have done, they die, and their glorie ceaseth'. ⁴⁴ Life is determined by external forces; death is the great leveller.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Perspective; Acceptance of one's lot; Resignation; acceptance of death Deterministic	External Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Influenced by Calvin.
Don Quixote (1605)	Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616) Spanish novelist and dramatist	We are all equal at death. Life is a play: At death, we are all equal. At this stage in Spain, the metaphor is a cliché, which Cervantes exploits with delight. Don Quixote reflects that plays do a ‘great service for the nation’ by ‘holding up a mirror to every step we take and allowing us to see a vivid image of the actions of human life; there is no comparison that indicates what we are and what we should be more clearly than plays and players ... [for] when the play is over [no matter what parts are played] all the actors are equal ... the same thing happens in the drama and business of this world ... when life is over ... all are equal in the grave’. ‘That’s a fine comparison’ says Sancho, ‘though not so new that I haven’t heard it many times before, like the one about chess’. ⁴⁵	The human condition	An acting space	Fatalism Perspective; Detachment Acceptance of one’s lot; Resignation Comparison	External Doing (+)
	Giordano Bruno (1548-1600) Italian philosopher	Man is a microcosm of the created world, the copula mundi . As in man so in the world: Man is the link between the world and heaven: in man we can see God. Bruno was accused of heresy in 1600 and burned by the Inquisition. ⁴⁶	The relationship between man, the world and heaven	An acting space	Revelation; Purposefulness	Internal: we see God in man Doing/ Showing (+)
1605: perspective settings were introduced into court theatre in England for a production in a make-shift theatre in Christ Church hall, Oxford, for the visit of the King. This necessitated the use of proscenium arches, often elaborately decorated specifically for the production, which separated the spectators, including the monarch who had previously been seated on the stage, from the actors. The monarch was seated at the focal point of the perspective, with his court arraigned behind and around him according to hierarchy and royal favour. It provided the monarch with a useful political tool. James I used it to insult the Venetian ambassadors by placing them further away from him than the Spanish. Popular theatre, such as at The Globe, did not use scenery or proscenia, maintaining a closer (and less complex) relationship with its audience.⁴⁷ According to Warnke, the theatre metaphor was enormously popular during the seventeenth century, ‘not only because of the availability of one particular source [John of Salisbury’s Policraticus] but also because the metaphor expresses with great cogency the concern with the illusory quality of experience which runs obsessively through the literature’ of the period, although not all examples embodied or developed it in any extended sense.⁴⁸
Meditations and Vows (1606 and 1621)	Joseph Hall (1574-1656) Protestant	The world is a theatre (a private view of the world as theatre): the good end happily and the evil end badly	Moral life	An acting space	Revelation Moral lessons	External Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Bishop
The Revenger's Tragedy (1607)	anonymous ⁴⁹	A complex elaboration of the theatrum mundi in a bloody tale of revenge which 'ultimately confuses life and stage'. ⁵⁰ Revenge is destructive	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Revelation Moral lessons	Internal Doing (-)
A Faire Quarrell	Thomas Middleton (1580-1627) Playwright	Human life is fleeting; death equalises. 'All have exits, and must all be stript in the tiring house, for none must carry anything out of the stock'. ⁵¹	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Perspective Futility of acquisition	Internal Doing (-)
Acting is Believing: a Tragicomedy in Three Acts (1607-1608)	Felix Lope de Vega (1562-1635) Spanish playwright, novelist, poet, priest, judge of the Inquisition and censor	Politics, especially revolution, is theatre. The political activities of ancient Rome can be described in theatrical terms: 'The actors of Roman politics ... pursued the lead role of emperor, performing for the Senate audience ... Most wished to become more than the lead actors and claimed ... that they were assistant directors'. 'In portraying the politicians of ancient Rome as performers and its entire political system as a drama, Vega attempts to increase our awareness of the theatricality of reality'. ⁵²	Political life (historical)	A seeing place (implied) An acting space	Objectification Strategic Purposefulness	Externalised - historian; Doing (-)
A True Relation of Virginia (1608); The Generall Historie of Virginia (1624)	Captain John Smith (1580-1631) (Founder of Jamestown colony)	The world is made up of theatres in which men act. History is theatre: 'all the World is but a Martiall Stage'. Smith calls himself a 'true actor', that is one who acts on the stage of the world in which actions are lent 'dignity', unlike in the playhouses, which he says there will be no use for in Virginia. Smith, like other early American non-conformists, is 'self-dramatizing'. On his departure, William Grent declared in an open letter to Smith: ' The worlds foure Quarters [are] like four Theaters to set thee forth '. ⁵³	Man as explorer of the world	An acting space	Visibility which allows glory	Internal: other men Externalised – the actor Doing/ Showing (+)
The Second Anniversary (1612); A Sermon	John Donne (1572-1631) English poet and	Theological: to know our part and play it well. Man acts under the scrutiny of God and others. Man is both actor and spectator but one ought to be an actor in public life. Donne uses the metaphor as an image of order. The world is the theatre in which	The human condition	A seeing-place	Revelation which allows knowledge of God;	External: God is the spectator and judge of our

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Preached at Pauls Cross to the Lords of the Council 24 Mar. 1616 (1616); Sermon XXIII (1640)	clergyman	we see God and on which God observes us: in private life only death brings release from our appointed role; in public life one should play one's part rather than be a spectator. Taken up from Plotinus: ⁵⁴ 'Hath God made this World his Theatre ... that man may represent God in his conversation; and wilt thou play no part? But think that thou only wast made to pass thy time merrily, and to be the only spectator upon this Theatre?'. ⁵⁵ In Sermon XXIII, 'The whole frame of the world is the theater, and every creature the stage, the medium, the glass in which we may see God'. ⁵⁶ NB: a distinction between actor and spectator within the theatre of the world in which Donne links the theatrum mundi with the Great Chain of Being metaphor. ⁵⁷			Fatalism acceptance of our role in life; an ethics of responsibility to play the role well; an obligation to act in public life so that God may be seen through us; a sense of order	private life; Internal: we are spectators of public life; we come to know God through the world Externalised – theologian Doing/ Showing /Watching (-)
An Apology for Actors (1612)	Thomas Heywood (1574-1625) English actor, poet and playwright	To play one's part well and to act under circumstances not of their choosing; to defend the theatre against charges that it was just a place of 'feigning': 'The world's a Theater, the earth a Stage/Which God, and nature doth with Actors fill... /all finde Exits when their parts are done'. ⁵⁸ 'If then the world a theater present,/As by the roundnesse it appears most fit/Built with Starre galleries of hye ascent,/In which Jehove does as spectator sit ...chiefe determiner to applaud the best'. ⁵⁹ Heywood's Apology also defended the theatre as a mark of a flourishing and civilised culture, one of the amenities which any great city should offer. ⁶⁰ He defended it on the grounds that theatre itself represented life, so that 'He that denyes then Theaters should be/He may as well deny a world to me'. ⁶¹ For Heywood, 'the stage simultaneously feigns and teaches'. ⁶²	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Fatalism Visibility which allows subjectification but also judgment	External: God- who sees through feigning: 'Jehove doth as spectator sit/And chiefe determiner to applaud the best/ And ... doomes the rest', ⁶³ Doing/ Watching (+)
History of the World (1614); 'On the Life of Man'.	Sir Walter Raleigh (1552-1618) English	Men must act under circumstances which they cannot control; death levels all - Calvinistic use of the metaphor. The world is a 'stage-play', of which God is both cause and spectator. 'We are all (in effect) become Comoedians in Religion; and while we act	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Fatalism Resignation; Endurance	External: God: 'Heaven the Iudicious sharpe

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	courtier, writer, poet and spy	in gesture and voice, divine vertues, in all the course of our lives, we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play'. ⁶⁴ Death 'in the end of the Play, takes from all' and our graves are 'like drawne curtaynes when the play is done'. ⁶⁵ 'Heaven the Iudicious sharpe spectator is, That sits and markes still who doth act amisse'. ⁶⁶ 'For seeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty Princes of the World ... Why should other men, who are but as the least Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other accompt to be made of this ridiculous World, than to resolve. That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the less. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike ... [and] Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one'. ⁶⁷			(almost despair); to play one's part as required, knowing death is inevitable. Fatalism Judgment	spectator is/That sits and markes still who doth act amisse'. ⁶⁸ Externalised – historian Doing/ Watching (-)
Albumazar, a comedy (1615).	Thomas Tomkis (1572-1656) Welsh composer	Nothing is original. Each takes from those before him: 'This Poet is that Poet's plagiary And he a third's, till they end all in Homer, And Homer filch't all from an Aegyptian Preestesse. The World's a Theater of theft'. ⁶⁹	Creative life	A constructed art	Perspective: nothing is original	Externalised – the poet Doing (-)
1618-1648 30 Years War
An Adresse: by the author	George Daniel (1616-1657) Poet	'The World's a tottering Stage; and Mankind All Is but one Antike Individuall; ... This Mockshow, this Coloss, this Maisterpeice of Nature, (as wee call it, when wee please Our partial frailities) is that brutish Thing, Degenerate, Foolish, giddy, wavering ...'. ⁷⁰	Man's position in the world	An acting space	Fatalism Perspective which allows Man's futility to be seen	Externalised: poet Doing (-)
The City of the Sun; Poesie	Tommaso Campanella (1568-1639) Dominican monk/	The world is a theatre; man is an actor playing a part 'before the supreme council'; at death, God reveals who has played their part well. 'Therefore ... have patience and await the outcome of the comedy' (Sonnet 14: 'Men are the Sport of God and the Angels'). ⁷¹ Our politics are an imitation of the 'universal	The human condition Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Visibility enabling judgment; acceptance	External: God - 'the supreme council' and 'just and impartial

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Christian Platonist	comedy’, but they often ‘imitate falsely’, bringing evil upon man (Sonnet 15: ‘That Men Follow Chance More Than Reason in Political Rule and Rarely Imitate Nature’). ⁷² Men must act under imperfect knowledge. Campanella was part of the Counter-Renaissance.				judge’; the Angels Externalised – critic Doing (-)
The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621)	Robert Burton (1577-1640) English scholar and clergyman	Satiric use influenced by Lucian: all the world’s a stage; the world is mad and melancholy and men are all fools, to be laughed at by sages. One should strive to be an Ideal Observer - one who is a theatre unto himself. Burton translated the motto of the Globe Theatre ‘ totus mundus agit histrionem ’ as ‘the whole world plays the fool’ ⁷³ and a remedy needed to be found before the world turned ‘upside downwards’. (Internalisation of the spectator)	The human condition	An acting space	Detachment To laugh at man’s antics; self-awareness	External: the Laughing Philosopher Internalised - the Ideal Observer Doing (-)
Characters	John Webster (1580-1625) English dramatist	Man must act under conditions they cannot control. Life is like theatre except that ‘the real director – if there is one – cannot be known’ and consequently no-one has any control over events, even over their own life. Definition of a ‘player’: ‘All men have been of his occupation; and indeed, what he doth feignedly, that do others essentially: this day one plays a monarch, the next a private person. Here one acts a tyrant, on the morrow an exile’. ⁷⁴	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Detachment Fatalism	Externalised – dramatist Doing (-)
The Roman Actor (1626)	Philip Massinger (1583-1640) English playwright and translator	Man was both actor and spectator under conditions in which reality and illusion overlapped. Theatre was an art of imitation which could generate illusions which blurred the boundaries between life and theatre. The play explored the limits of what can be considered theatrical. In the play ‘a professional actor is dragged into an amorous and deadly theatricalization of actual life. A theatre in which all passions are pretended and no actors die is juxtaposed with an “actuality” in which real passions and real death are “staged”’. The play examines the consequences ‘of the inability to perceive, and the refusal to acknowledge, the differences between theatrical imitation and theatricalised actuality’, something which is even more of a concern in today’s media saturated world. The main role is devised so that it	The human condition	A constructed art	Subjectification the possibility of delusion	Internal: Men Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		becomes impossible for the spectators to differentiate between when the actor is acting a role and when he is acting a role acting a role (a constant concern for Pirandello), even though the difference is 'a matter of life and death'. [Sidnell says the play appeared at a time when Thomas Heywood was cheerfully arguing that all of life was theatrical – his Apology for Actors , featuring the theatrum mundi appeared in 1612]. ⁷⁵
The Purple Island (1633)	Phineas Fletcher (1582-1650) English poet	Life was not in man's control. All that could be done was to play one's part as allocated: 'How like's the world unto a tragic stage! where ev'ry changing scene the actors change'. ⁷⁶ Man must act under conditions which could not be controlled.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment allowing Acceptance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism	Externalised – poet Doing (-)
Histrion-Matrix (1633)	William Prynne (1600-1669) Puritan pamphleteer; English political figure	Theological: to show the glory of God. The world is God's theatre: 'we are made a theatre or spectacle'. ⁷⁷ (One of a number of diatribes against the theatre which utilized theatre metaphors)	Man's relation to God	An acting space A relationship between actors and spectator	Revelation Judgment; Wonder/Awe	External: God, the All-Seeing Eye ; Angels; Internal: humans observe God in the theatre of the world Showing (-)
Coelum Britannicum (1634)	Thomas Carew (1598-1639) English poet, diplomat, courtier and critic	Secular: to demonstrate power. Carew was a diplomat, courtier, poet, soldier and one of the first literary critics. Politics is theatre; theatre is politics. ⁷⁸	Political life	A constructed art	Visibility allowing the demonstration of power	Internal: the Court; the people Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
)
Coelum Britannicum (1634)	Charles I (1600-1649) (Inigo Jones and Thomas Carew)	Representation involves theatricality. Charles used theatre as a visual representation of the position of the monarch as he saw it: the King appeared as Atlas, the link between earth and heaven, 'insulated against the attitudes of the governed'. Coelum was 'the greatest theatrical expression of the Caroline aristocracy'. ⁷⁹	Political life:	A seeing-place A constructed art	Visibility allowing the demonstration of power; Awe	Internal: The King's subjects Externalised – the King as actor Showing (+)
Auto Sacramentale, El Gran Teatro de Mundo (1637)	Pedro Calderón (1600-1681) Spanish playwright	Life is not in man's control as he acts in the world under the scrutiny of God. 'I am El Autor, and in a moment You [El Mondo] will be the theatre. The actor is man. ... Since I have devised this play, That my greatness may be shown, I here seated on my throne, Where it is eternal day, Will my company survey. Mortals, who your entrance due By a tomb your exit make, Pains in all your acting take, Your great Author watches you.' ⁸⁰	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Revelation Fatalism Acceptance An ethics of endurance in the face of determinacy	External: the 'great Author' and Judge Internal: the world (El Mondo); Externalised – playwright Doing/ Watching (+)
The Excellency of the Gospel above the Law (1639)	Richard Sibbes (1577-1635) English Puritan theologian	Theological: 'The whole world is a theater of the glory of God' ⁸¹	Religious Life: relationship of man to God	An acting space	Revelation	Internal: man (observing God) Showing (+/-)
1639 War begins in England 1640 War in Spain and Portugal 1641-1650 Irish Confederation Wars
Timber, or Discoveries	Ben Jonson (1573-1637)	Politics is theatre; theatre is politics because we are inclined to lose ourselves in our roles: 'Our whole life is like a Play '. We 'so	Social and Political life	An acting space	Subjectivity Visibility	Internal: the Court; the

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1640)	English dramatist	insist on playing others that we cannot return to our own selves'; ⁸² 'I have considered our whole life is like a play: wherein every man forgetful of himself is in travail with expression of another ... though the most be players, some must be spectators'. ⁸³ Men forget themselves when they must engage in communication with others. Aim: Secular: to preserve the illusion of power and thus maintain order; to lampoon the threats to order (e.g. the Puritans)			allowing the manifestation of power; Critique	people; every play must have some spectators Doing (+/-)
El politico (The Politician) (1640); El discreto (The Man of Discretion) (1646); El criticón (The Critic) (1651-7)	Baltasar Gracián (1601-1658) Spanish writer, moralist and literary theorist	Reality is finally revealed in the after-life. The second chapter of El criticón is entitled El gran teatro del universo (the great theatre of the universe): Nature is the stage of life. ⁸⁴ Gracián believed that civilization corrupted man (thereby anticipating Rousseau) because of the confusion it creates between appearance and reality.	The human condition	An acting space	Visibility leading to Delusion	Internal: man Doing (-)
1642-1646: English Civil War
De Cive (1642) Leviathan (1651) De Homine (1658)	Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) English political philosopher	All persons act on life's stage; representatives are like actors: they receive their authority from others (the author). 'A Person, is he whose words or actions are considered, either as his own, or as representing the words or actions of an other man, or of any other thing to whom they are attributed, whether Truly or by Fiction . When they are considered as his owne, then is he called a Naturall Person : And when they are considered as representing the words and actions of an other, then is he a Feigned or Artificiall person '. ⁸⁵ Both disguise reality with 'appropriately stylized poses, gestures and attitudes'. ⁸⁶ 'The word Person is latine ... as Persona in latine signifies the disguise , or outward appearance of a man, counterfeited on the Stage; and sometimes more particularly that part of it, which disguiseth the face, as a Mask or Visard: And from the Stage, hath been translated to any	Social and Political life; political events	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Objectification enabling Knowledge; understanding of motivation; the attainment of peace and the avoidance of war; the achievement and maintenance of order	Externalised: theorist; one in exile Internalised: Humans are the source of all knowledge: 'whosoever Looketh into himself ... shall thereby read and know what

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Representer of speech and action, as well in Tribunalls, as Theaters. So that a Person, is the same that an Actor is, both on the Stage and in common Conversation; and to Personate, is to Act, or Represent himselfe, or an other'. Representation is like theatrical impersonation: the public persona of a representative is different from their private self, a 'legal fiction' which allows the delegation of authority. Such fictions are necessary 'for the preservation of a peaceful order':⁸⁷ 'Of Persons Artificiall, some have their words and actions Owned by those whom they represent. And then the Person is the Actor; and he that owneth his words and actions, is the AUTHOR: In which case the Actor acteth by Authority'. Covenants (such as the social contract) are 'performed', and such performances are held accountable to the 'Power set over them both'. With regard to the covenant with the sovereign, the people are the author of the play; the representative is the actor. The covenant is made between the people (not between the people and the Sovereign). The people agree with each other to have a particular kind of government, and having agreed, appoint a particular kind of Sovereign to whom they cede power over everything except their right to life. This power is required because most men have only 'multiplying glasses" which magnify their grievances and lead to conflict as they try to maintain their position in life. Those in power require 'prospective glasses' to see 'a farre off' into the future.⁸⁸ According to Panagia, Hobbes' use of the theatre metaphor was part of a shift into aesthetics in order to articulate a theory of political representation. Representation, for Hobbes, was a device drawn from aesthetics by which opinion could be translated into knowledge. The representative, through discrimination, provides a focus for the gaze of the audience so that they become constituted as an audience, thereby unifying them despite their 'multitude of opinions and beliefs'. The audience, in turn, uses				are the thoughts of all other men upon like occasion' (Leviathan).⁹¹ Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		discrimination to judge the performance of the representative: ‘the point of the social contract is to orchestrate a multitude into some recognizable whole, but this whole is neither passive ... nor does it merely require citizens to surrender their right of participation ... the persona ficta that is the sovereign – by the very fact of its visibility as an object of representation – is under constant public scrutiny and is persistently subject to “the censure of a multitude”’. The sovereign is thus ‘an object that appears and circulates in public’ and ‘is subject to a spectator’s delicate discrimination’. This discrimination comes about because the ‘restless’ spectator constantly shift perspective, thus seeing the sovereign different each time. The problem for the sovereign is to maintain the attention of the spectator, so that the unity of an audience can be created. The moment spectators change their perspective, the representation is destroyed. A ‘successful political actor’ must therefore also exercise discrimination in order to find ways to distinguish himself from others. He does this through comparison with others. Discrimination, ‘the ability to perceive differences’ becomes ‘the critical faculty for political thinking’. ⁸⁹ According to Panagia, the theatre metaphor is central to Hobbes’ conception of politics. He recognized that a political order ‘was a sensitive system of communication dependent upon a system of verbal signs, actions and gestures bearing generally accepted meaning’ ⁹⁰ shared between representative and audience. Representation is like acting on the stage. A representative is not the ‘author’ of his words and deeds. To understand this is to enable obedience to the office (persona) rather than the individual. This allows continuity, which produces stability and peace.
Religio Medici (1642-3)	Thomas Browne (1605-1682)	Theological. Men must act under conditions they cannot know and which seem unreal. Privately, the world is a dream or a ‘mockshow’; publicly there is a larger production leading to ‘the	The human condition	A constructed art	Fatalism Detachment Resignation	External: God is the audience of

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	English author	show of last things', a Judgment Day 'that shall include and comprehend all that went before it, wherein, as in the last scene, all the Actors must enter, to compleat and make up the Catastrophe of this great piece' ⁹² - a 'marriage of Christianity and Renaissance Platonism'. ⁹³				our private life; God is the Director of the 'show of last things' Doing/ Showing (-)
Psychodia Platonica (1642)	Henry More (1614-1687) English philosopher	Man is both actor and spectator which makes the world a theatre (a 'facile' use of the metaphor, according to Christian). ⁹⁴	The human condition	A seeing-place	Visibility	Internal: man Showing (+/-)
1642-1660: Theatres in England were closed, but a 'metaphoric theater' continued to be played out 'in the religious and political arena'. ⁹⁵ Moralists such as La Rochefoucauld, Bayle and Nicole drew on the metaphor to 'unmask worldly ambition and pretense' at the French court and draw attention back to the judgment of a higher power. Mandeville, on the other hand, used the metaphor 'to highlight the distance between genuine knowledge and mere appearance in the minds of social actors themselves'. ⁹⁶
Mercurius Pragmaticus (1647-57);	Marchamont Needham (1620-1678) English journalist, publisher and pamphleteer	In 1648-9, 'traitorous tragedians are upon their exit and poor King Charles at the brink of the pit'. ⁹⁷	Political events	An acting space	Subjectification leading to sympathy	Externalised – journalist Doing (-)
1648 Second English Civil War 1649-1651 Third English Civil War 1648-1660 Northern European Wars, war between English and Dutch and England and Spain 1649: Charles I executed. The Solicitor-General, John Cook, termed the King's trial 'the most comprehensive, impartial and glorious piece of justice that was ever acted and executed upon the theatre of England'. It was not unusual at the time to consider executions as theatre. The Marquis of Huntley urged the audience for his execution to 'stoop to a scaffold, as if it were a theatre of honour in this world'. The Leveller soldier Robert Lockyer, executed by firing squad for mutiny on 29 April 1648, had declared that he was 'willing to act his part on that dismal and bloody stage'. ⁹⁸
Eikonoklastes (1649); The First Defense (1651); Second Defense of the People of	John Milton (1608-1674) English poet and dramatist	Appearances are deceptive, just as actors on the stage deceive, so can men, especially if they want people to think well of them without desert (hypocrisy). Eikonoklastes was an attack on King Charles' book Eikon Basilike , which had been published after the execution and threatened to raise sympathy for the King. Milton was commissioned by the Commonwealth's Solicitor-General to	Political events	A constructed art	Strategies of performance leading to delusion	Internal: citizens of the new Commonwealth Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
England against the Infamous Libel ... (1654);		write a response in order to prevent the King being turned into a martyr. In it, Milton accused the king of ‘ill-acted regality’ and ‘stagework’, ⁹⁹ of making his life (and death) theatre. In the Defenses , Milton argued that ‘[A] tyrant is no real king; he is but a player-king’ and ‘as is the way of foolish poets or stage players [the worst of men] hanker after applause even when the play is over.’ ‘Who when about to finish the drama of life (vitae fabulam) ... would not act in the same way? And willingly lay aside, or at least pretend so to do ... his hatreds as if now making his exit from the stage ... that he may leave behind him ... a feeling of compassion? ... Charles dissembled’, ¹⁰⁰ turning himself into an image (eikon) in order to turn himself into an idol. ¹⁰¹ (Milton also uses the metaphor religiously (The Passion , 1619) as well as polemically and satirically). However, only one edition of Milton’s work was published compared with 35 London editions of Eikon Basilike . ¹⁰²				– critic Doing/ Showing (-)
The Subject’s Sorrow: Or, Lamentations Upon the Death of Brittaines Iosiah King Charles (1649)	Robert Brown (unknown) Royalist	Theatre is the stage on which tragedies are performed. The death of the king was a tragedy which would continue to haunt spectators. The king’s execution was ‘the first act of that tragicall woe which is to be presented upon the Theater of this Kingdome , likely to continue longer then the now living Spectators’. ¹⁰³	Political events	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Perspective allowing prediction	Internal: spectators of the execution Doing/ Watching (+/-)
Horatian Ode	Andrew Marvell (1621-1678) English poet	The Monarchy is Theatre: ‘That thence the Royal Actor born The Tragick Scaffold might adorn; While round the armed Bands Did clap their bloody hands’ (Horatian Ode)	Political events	An acting space	Subjectification allowing sympathy	Internal: the people; Externalised – reporter Doing (+/-)
Maxims (1660)	Francois de La Roche-foucauld (1613-1680)	La Rochefoucauld set the habits of the court ‘within a conceptual environment of histrionic falsity, of deceitfulness and covert exhibitionism, in which masks must always be worn’. Players ‘end by disguising ourselves from ourselves’ [and] ‘a wise man	Political life	An acting space	Consequences of visibility	Externalised - the wise man Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	French essayist and moralist	thinks it more advantageous not to join the battle than to win'. ¹⁰⁴
Preface to The Rival Ladies (1664); An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668); Defense of An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668)	John Dryden (1631-1700) English poet, dramatist and theorist; Poet Laureate (1668)	Dryden was responsible for the movement of many common terms, such as character , into theatre language. In the Essay he defines a play as 'a just and lively Image of Humane Nature, representing its Passions and Humours, and the Changes of Fortune to which it is subject; for the Delight and Instruction of Mankind'. ¹⁰⁵ Although theatre was generally taken to be a place – a 'real place ... or piece of ground on which the Play is acted', ¹⁰⁶ in 1668 Dryden began to apply the term to plays, writing, production and the stage. ¹⁰⁷ Thus Dryden began a conflation between drama, theatre, stagecraft and performance which continues to the present day, and one which makes the use of the theatre metaphor both so easy (since it can cover so many aspects of life) and so problematic. ¹⁰⁸	Cultural life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification for Analysis and critique	External (the theatre): literary analyst Doing (+/-)
1665: Plague in England. 1666: Great Fire of London
'Essais de morale' in Traité de la comédie (1667)	Pierre Nicole (1625-1695) French theologian	Nicole used theatrical conventions as metaphors through which to 'depict the duplicities governing social exchange amongst an unregenerate elite' (as well as likening men's behaviour to 'dancers at a masked ball who hold one another by the hand affectionately without recognizing one another, and part a moment later, never to see each other again' and to participation in a game). Theatrical entertainments themselves promote the passions which lead us to behave theatrically (dupliciously) and prevent us from establishing a stable, authentic and responsible self. ¹⁰⁹	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Duplicity	Externalised – moral critic Doing/ Showing (-)
Pensées (1670)	Blaise Pascal (1623-1662) French philosopher	'The last act is bloody, however fine the rest of the play. They throw earth over your head and it is finished forever'. Death comes to everyone. ¹¹⁰	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art	Detachment; Resignation Futility Fatalism	Externalised – philosopher Doing (-)
1670's America: Harvard students read Sophocles, Euripides and Aristophanes. Educated Americans like Increase Mather had Plautus, Seneca, Petronius and Sophocles in their

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
libraries, along with the plays of Dryden and Jonson. Plays were read as literature in the absence of theatre. Attempts were made to introduce theatre in New England between 1685 and 1714 but largely failed: ‘the All-Seeing Eye of God shall be Theatre enough’, Cotton Mather wrote in his Diary . ¹¹¹ 1672-1678 Franco-Dutch War; 1675-1677 wars in France
Nouvelles Lettres sur l’histoire du Calvinisme (1684-87)	Pierre Bayle (1647-1746) French philosopher	Life was determined by external forces. Man was forced to act under conditions they could not control for God’s amusement. For Bayle, ‘the image par excellence of a world characterized by passionate human striving without end was a “spectacle of marionettes” which most charitably could be seen as a diversion for the Creator’. ¹¹²	The human condition	A constructed art	Perspective Fatalism reductionism	External: God Externalised – philosopher Doing (-)
‘Advice to Sufferers’ (1684)	John Bunyan (1628-1688) English Christian writer	The world is a theatre for God: man ‘is set ... upon a stage, as in a theatre, to play a part for God in the world ... God himself looks on ... he laugheth, as being pleased to see a good behaviour attending the trial of the innocent’. ¹¹³ Man must play his part well	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Perspective reductionism; An ethics of responsibility to perform well Fatalism	External: God Doing/ Watching (+/-)
Magnalia Christi Americana (c1685)	Cotton Mather (1663-1729) Prominent American Puritan clergyman	New England is the stage and its citizens actors; life is a performance; political events are spectacles for God and for the people. Sincerity is the key difference between actual theatre and life as theatre. Mather was one of many American Puritans who were ‘obsessed with life played out in the agonistic arena of strenuous faith’, and exhibited a theatrical conception of the self. Mather’s writings were widely circulated both in the colonies and in Europe. ¹¹⁴	Political and religious life in America	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Visibility enabling Judgment by spectators	External: God, the ‘All-Seeing Eye’; the rest of the world Internal: the people of America Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
Theatrum virorum eruditione clarorum (1688)	Paulus Freher (1611-1682) Nuremberg physician	Men must act under the scrutiny of others. Man is an actor on the world stage. The presentation of the self is theatrical. (Used by Mather as a model for his writing). The book was a vast work of biography with bibliography documenting the lives and work of some three thousand ‘men distinguished for erudition’ in medicine. ¹¹⁵	The human condition	An acting space	Visibility producing self-awareness; strategies of performance	Internal: other men Internalised: the self Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1688: Britain's 'Glorious Revolution'
The Falsehood of Human Virtue (1691)	Jacques Esprit (1611-1678) French moralist	Man is deceptive. The court is a stage where affectation 'acts her masterpieces'. ¹¹⁶	Political (court) life	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Affectation; deception	Internal: others Externalised – critic Showing (-)
English translation of Petronius' Satyricon (1694)	Thomas Barnaby Translator	A well known translation of Petronius' 65AD work. The world is a stage full of characters who are false friends; life is based on disguise, imposture and performance; the course of the world is determined by the follies of men and the mischief of Fortune. Only desire is fixed. Action in the world is the same as stage-acting'. Petronius coined the phrase Totus mundus agit histrionem which came to be the motto of the Globe Theatre in London in 1599. 'The troop is on the stage, the mime begins; One is/Called father, one his son, a third the rich man:/But soon the page is closed upon their humorous parts,/The real face appears, the assumed has vanished'.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actors and spectator	Deception;	Internal: Others
More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700)	Robert Calef (1648-1719) Boston cloth merchant	Calef was critical of the effect of the use of the theatre metaphor on the Salem Witch Trials: 'if a covenanted enterprise is to have rights to figure an event as tragedy for the purpose of elevation, it must be careful it does not stoop to follies to earn the name'. ¹¹⁷	Legal proceedings	A constructed art	Self-aggrandisement leading to Delusion Foolishness	Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (-)

¹ Orgel, Stephen. 1975. The Illusion of Power: Political Theater in the English Renaissance. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press: 2

² West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287: 247

³ Kiernan, Alvin 1975, The Revels History of Drama in English, (eds) Clifford Leech and T.W. Craik, Vol III, 1576-1613, London, p. 240; quoted in Hasler, Jorg. 1979. 'The Serpent's Tongue': Shakespeare and the Actor'. English Studies 60 (4) 389-401.

⁴ In Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc. 104.

-
- ⁵ Christian (1987: 285) claims that the confusion between a theatre and an amphitheatre was common during the Renaissance
- ⁶ Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press: 76
- ⁷ Vickers, Brian. 1971. 'Bacon's Use of Theatrical Imagery'. Studies in the Literary Imagination 4 (1) pp. 189-226: 201
- ⁸ Philip Mornay 1587, Concerning the Trewnesse of the Christian Religion, London, pp. 172-3, quoted at length in Christian 1987: 101-2.
- ⁹ Bodin 1595: 10;129 quoted in West 1999: 256-7
- ¹⁰ Audi, R. (ed) 1996, The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 77
- ¹¹ Dolven, Jeff. 1999. 'Spenser and the Troubled Theaters'. English Literary Renaissance 29 (2) pp. 179-200: 179-200.
- ¹² Title of Chapter 1 of Boissard's book (Christian 1987: 121).
- ¹³ Vickers 1971: 207
- ¹⁴ Christian 1987: 123
- ¹⁵ Bernheimer, Richard. 1956. 'Theatrum Mundi'. The Art Bulletin 38 (4) pp. 225-247: 241
- ¹⁶ Christian 1987: 89-90
- ¹⁷ Essays 19 'That to philosophize is to learn to die' and 20 'That our happiness must not be judged until after our death', quoted in Christian 1987: 110-111. Essay 14: 'Que Le Goût des Biens et des Maux Dépend en Bonne Partie de l'Opinion que Nous en Avons' in Montaigne 1985, Essais, Claude Faisant (ed), Paris, Bordas, pp. 26-31. Montaigne uses the term 'rôle' in this essay to refer to one's part in life.
- ¹⁸ Bacon The Advancement of Learning quoted in Christian 1987: 287. Bacon's comment about not staying long in the theatre was in fact a joke, a segue from one topic to the next in his Advancement of Learning (Vickers 1971: 189).
- ¹⁹ This was a common use of the word in the early Renaissance, and arguably, was not metaphoric but derived from the meaning of the word theatre: seeing place
- ²⁰ Bacon Novum Organum in Vickers 1971: 213
- ²¹ Vickers 1971: 218-226
- ²² Bacon Advancement of Learning in Vickers 1971: 216
- ²³ Vickers 1971: 224-5
- ²⁴ Bacon Gesta Grayorum in Vickers 1971: 192
- ²⁵ in Vickers 1971: 213
- ²⁶ Although The Tempest was first published in 1623, it was performed before the king in 1611.
- ²⁷ Warnke, Frank 1972, 'The World as Theatre', Versions of the Baroque: European Literature in the Seventeenth Century, New Haven and London, Yale University Press, pp. 66-89, p. 70.
- ²⁸ Weisinger claims that this conception of the theatrum mundi was 'unique for its time', but has since come to influence modernity as we know it, and is a 'symptom of sophisticated disillusionment' (Weisinger, Herbert. 1964. 'Theatrum Mundi: Illusion as Reality'. In The Agony and the Triumph: Papers on the Use and Abuse of Myth. Michigan: Michigan State University Press, pp. 58-70: 63).
- ²⁹ Curtius argues that the motto came from John of Salisbury's Policraticus, a new edition of which had been published in 1595, four years before the Globe Theatre opened (Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI). 140-141). The design of the Globe theatre has long been conjectured to have been the shape of an amphitheatre because of this reference to a globe. However, this view has come under question (see Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd). Jensen (1970) has located references within Marston's Antonio and Mellida which played at the Globe, which indicate that the theatre was not named after its shape, but after the image of Atlas holding up the globe of the earth which was painted on the theatre's sign (Jensen, Ejner J. 1970. 'A New Allusion to the Sign of the Globe Theater'. Shakespeare Quarterly 21 (1) pp. 95-97). Warnke 1972 translates the phrase as 'All the world plays the actor' (Warnke, Frank. 1972. 'The World as Theatre'. In Versions of the Baroque: European Literature in the Seventeenth Century. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, pp. 66-89: 66). Richard Burton translates it as 'the whole world plays the fool' (Anatomy of Melancholy cited in Warnke 1972: 68).

³⁰ Potolsky, Matthew. 2006. Mimesis. Edited by J. Drakakis, The New Critical Idiom. New York and London: Routledge: 78-81

³¹ In Christian 1987: 105.

³² in Vickers 1971: 207

³³ Maguire, Nancy Klein. 1989. 'The Theatrical Mask/Masque of Politics: The Case of Charles I'. Journal of British Studies 28 (January) pp. 1-22: 4. The book is a compendium of all the scourges and dreadful punishments which afflicted mankind. These kinds of works were very popular at the time. Christian claims that they may have been a kind of C16th pornography, given the number of graphic tales of sexual crimes (Christian 1987: 253(IV) n19.)

³⁴ James I 1918, Political Works of James I, ed. C.H. McIlwain, Cambridge Mass., p. 43; quoted in Orgel 1975: 41; also cited in Postlewait 2003: 110, although Postlewait points out that the word scaffold was used rather than stage. He suggests this gives the saying 'a rather different meaning' (Postlewait, Thomas. 2003. 'Theatricality and antitheatricality in renaissance London'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 90-126: 125n18), although scaffold had been used to refer to a theatre or stage since at least 1589 (Oxford English Dictionary 1933, Volume XI: T-U, Oxford, Oxford and the Clarendon Press). Scaffold did not necessarily carry the sinister meanings we now attribute to it.

³⁵ Quoted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books: 128.

³⁶ Foucault, Michel. 1994/1966. The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences. New York: Vintage Books: 131

³⁷ Christian 1987: viii

³⁸ Quoted by Richards 1991: 97.

³⁹ John Hall, quoted in Agnew, J.C. 1988, Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theater in Anglo-American Thought, 1550-1750, Cambridge University Press, p. 97.

⁴⁰ Panagia, Davide. 2003. 'Delicate Discriminations: Thomas Hobbes's Science of Politics'. Polity 36 (1) pp. 91-114: 93

⁴¹ Blair, Ann 2000, 'Practices of Bookish Natural Philosophy: Methods of Annotating and Indexing Books', Books and the Sciences in History, New York, Cambridge University Press, p. 2.

⁴² Rancière, Jacques 1994, The Names of History, Minneapolis, The University of Minnesota Press, p. 30.

⁴³ Panagia 2003: 93

⁴⁴ In Christian 1987: 284.

⁴⁵ Cervantes, Miguel de. 2003/1605. Don Quixote. Translated by E. Grossman. New York: ecco/HarperCollinsPublisher: 527

⁴⁶ Christian 1987

⁴⁷ Orgel 1975: 5-14

⁴⁸ Warnke 1972: 67-82

⁴⁹ Generally considered to be either Thomas Middleton or Cyril Tourneur.

⁵⁰ Pearce, Howard D. 1980. 'A Phenomenological Approach to the Theatrum Mundi Metaphor'. PMLA 95 (1) pp. 42-57: 48

-
- ⁵¹ In Vickers 1971: 203
- ⁵² Rarick, Jennifer. 1999. 'Revolution as Theatre'. In Fresh Writing. <http://www.nd.edu/~frswrite/snite/1999/Rarick.shtml> accessed 28 May 2007. Rarick argues that the use of the theatre metaphor is particularly prevalent at times of political upheaval. Her three examples, Vega, Buchner and Muller, all wrote at times when revolution or political upheaval was occurring.
- ⁵³ Richards 1991: 11, 87-101
- ⁵⁴ Battenhouse, Roy. 1948. 'The Doctrine of Man in Calvin and in Renaissance Platonism'. Journal of the History of Ideas 9 (4) pp. 447-471: 465
- ⁵⁵ Donne Sermons 1 in Vickers 1971: 197
- ⁵⁶ Quoted in Warnke 1972: 68
- ⁵⁷ Christian 1987: 287
- ⁵⁸ In Christian 1987: 284-5.
- ⁵⁹ In Vickers 1971: 196, 199
- ⁶⁰ Yates 1969: 163
- ⁶¹ Quoted in Hawkins, Harriet Bloker. 1966. "'All the World's a Stage": Some Illustrations of the Theatrum Mundi'. Shakespeare Quarterly 17 (2) pp. 174-178: 175.
- ⁶² Hawkins 1966: 175
- ⁶³ Quoted in Richards 1991: 80; also quoted at length in Yates 1969: 165.
- ⁶⁴ Raleigh History of the World in Vickers 1971: 201
- ⁶⁵ Raleigh, History of the World, quoted in Christian 1987: 118.
- ⁶⁶ Raleigh 'On the Life of Man' II. 5-6 in Vickers 1971: 196
- ⁶⁷ Raleigh History of the World in Vickers 1971: 210
- ⁶⁸ The Poems of Sir Walter Raleigh, ed. Agnes Latham, Cambridge Mass., 1962, pp. 51-2, quoted in Christian 1987: 119.
- ⁶⁹ Quoted in Denning, Greg. 1996. Performances. Carlton South, Victoria: Melbourne University Press: 105.
- ⁷⁰ In Christian 1987: 293-4
- ⁷¹ Campanella, 1939, Poesie, ed. Giovanni Gentile, Florence, pp. 37-38; trans. by Anthony Vincent for Christian 1987: 246(III)n34.
- ⁷² Campanella Poesie, pp. 37-38; trans. by Anthony Vincent for Christian 1987: 246(III)n35.
- ⁷³ In Warnke 1972: 67
- ⁷⁴ Webster Characters in Vickers 1971: 205
- ⁷⁵ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press: 12
- ⁷⁶ Christian 1987
- ⁷⁷ Christian 1987
- ⁷⁸ Christian 1987
- ⁷⁹ Orgel 1975: 83-7
- ⁸⁰ In Christian 1987: 171
- ⁸¹ Christian 1987

-
- ⁸² Collinson, Patrick. 1995. 'Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair: The Theatre constructs Puritanism'. In The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, edited by D. L. Smith, R. Strier and D. Bevington. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 157-169: 169
- ⁸³ Quoted in Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman: 1
- ⁸⁴ Warnke 1972: 67
- ⁸⁵ Thomas Hobbes 168/1651, 'Of Man', Leviathan, ed. C.B. Macpherson, Harmondsworth, Penguin, pp. 212-218.
- ⁸⁶ Hundert, E.J., and Paul Nelles. 1989. 'Liberty and Theatrical Space in Montesquieu's Political Theory: the Poetics of Public Life in the Persian Letters'. Political Theory 17 (2) pp. 223-246: 224
- ⁸⁷ Ezrahi, Yaron. 1995. 'The Theatrics and Mechanics of Action: The Theater and the Machine as Political Metaphors'. Social Research 62 (2) pp. 299-323
- ⁸⁸ Hobbes 168/1651: 277. Hobbes was part of the 'Mersenne circle' which included Descartes and Gassendi during the time he was writing Leviathan. The group experimented with optics and perspectivism, which Hobbes called 'looking awry' (Panagia 2003).
- ⁸⁹ Panagia 2003: 102-112
- ⁹⁰ Wolin, Sheldon. 1961. Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought. London: George Allen and Unwin: 258
- ⁹¹ Hobbes, 168/1651, Leviathan, Cambridge University Press, p. 10; quoted in Barber 1978: 80 and in Panagia 2003: 93.
- ⁹² Quoted in Warnke 1972: 68
- ⁹³ Christian 1987: 107
- ⁹⁴ Christian 1987: 106
- ⁹⁵ Richards 1991: 84
- ⁹⁶ Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 146-7
- ⁹⁷ Quoted in Hirst, Derek. 1995. 'John Milton's Eikonoklastes: The Drama of Justice'. In The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, edited by D. L. Smith, R. Strier and D. Bevington. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 245-259: 247. Additional material on Needham from Wikipedia, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marchamont_Needham accessed 2 July 2007.
- ⁹⁸ Hirst 1995: 249
- ⁹⁹ Hirst 1995: 257
- ¹⁰⁰ In Christian 1987: 292.
- ¹⁰¹ Mitchell, W.J.T. 1986. Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press: 7
- ¹⁰² Maguire 1989: 22
- ¹⁰³ Brown 1649 in Maguire 1989: 2
- ¹⁰⁴ La Rochefoucauld 1660, Maxims 119 and 549, quoted in Hundert 1994: 143.
- ¹⁰⁵ Dryden 1656-79, Works, 19 vols., Vol 17, p. 15; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press: 114.
- ¹⁰⁶ Dryden 1656-79, Works, 19 vols, Vol 9, p. 171; in Carlson 1984: 114-5.
- ¹⁰⁷ Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers: 1131

¹⁰⁸ Critics of role theory such as Bradbury and Hollis (see below 1972) point out that the use of the metaphor is generally partial, and when pushed, generally leads to ‘conflicting answers’. (Bradbury, M., B. Heading, and M. Hollis. 1972. 'The Man and The Mask: A Discussion of Role Theory'. In Role, edited by J. A. Jackson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 48).

¹⁰⁹ Hundert 1994: 143

¹¹⁰ Pascal Pensées No. 165 in Vickers 1971: 203

¹¹¹ Richards 1991: 119-123

¹¹² Hundert 1994: 143

¹¹³ The Whole Works of John Bunyan, ed. George Offer, London 1862, II, 720, quoted in Christian 1987: 251(IV)n8.

¹¹⁴ Mather was very well-read. He was familiar with Cato, quoted John of Salisbury and had written a critique of Machiavelli (Richards 1991: 148)..

¹¹⁵ Siraisi, Nancy 2007, History, Medicine, and the Traditions of Renaissance Learning, University of Michigan Press, p. 109.

¹¹⁶ Esprit 1691, p. 40; quoted in Hundert 1994: 143n57.

¹¹⁷ In Richards 1991: 147

Table 5/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: from 1701 to 1776

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
C18th: ‘The theatrum mundi became a conceptually enabling device ... with which philosophical radicals could examine the gulf between the detached observer of the world and the mass of men who remained imaginatively ensnared by its public rituals’. Whether by coincidence or design, at a time when it was commonplace to use the theatre metaphor in talking about the observation of public behaviour, there was also a profusion of manuals of decorum produced.¹ Green argues that in its attempts to recreate democracy the period upheld the idea of the divine gaze even as it challenged the idea of a God who spoke to man. This was epitomised by the figure of the eye in the sky which appeared in so many representations of the French Revolution. Although the Christian religion was to be replaced by a religion of the republic, all still occurred under an elevated gaze. Thomas Jefferson referred to it as ‘the great “superintending power”’.² The theatre metaphor was a favourite metaphor for revolutionary America. Note: war are almost continuous in Europe throughout this period: Sweden/Russia 1700-1706; Spain 1701-1714; France/England 1702-1711; England/Spain 1718-1731; France/Spain 1719; France/Holy Roman Empire 1733; France/England 1744, 1756-1763
Epicurus’ Morals (1712)	John Digby (1580-1653) 1 st Earl of Bristol, English diplomat & royalist	‘The Wise Man shall reap more Benefit, and take more Satisfaction in the public Shews, than other Men. He there observes the different Characters of the Spectators; he can discover by their looks the effect of the Passions that moves ‘em, and amidst the Confusion that reigns in these places ... he has the Pleasure to find himself the only person undisturb’d, and in a State of Tranquillity’. ³ (Digby thus also evokes Lucretius’s metaphor of shipwreck and spectator). Theatre provides distance.	Political life	A seeing-place	Detachment allowing Observation: tranquillity.	Internal: ordinary spectators Externalised: the wise man Watching (+/-)
THE PROBLEMATIZATION OF SPECTATORSHIP: the problem of affecting what one is looking at
Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711)	Anthony Ashley Cooper, Third Earl of Shaftesbury , (1671-1713) English philosopher	The distinction between ‘the natural’ and the artificial or second-hand (‘theatrical’) in order to reduce self-consciousness in the spectator (reader). The beginning of the problematization of spectatorship that absorbed Diderot some fifty years later. Shaftesbury saw a strong connection between taste and morality ⁴ and warned that although the world is a stage ‘[t]he good painter must ... take care that his Action be not theatrical, or at second hand; but original and drawn from Nature herself’. ⁵ Shaftesbury recommended the use of dialogue as a form of writing because it annihilated both author and reader, and thus avoided the theatrical: ‘the author is annihilated, and the reader, being no way applied to, stands for nobody. The self-interested parties both vanish at once. The scene presents itself as by chance and undesigned’. ⁶ Expresses the desire to be able to behold without	The problem of spectatorship	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification To be able to discern something as it exists in itself	Internal: the Public; spectators, readers; other men Externalised: author, artist Doing/ Watching (-) affecting what is being beheld or being affected by the production of what is beheld.

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Spectator; Cato (1713)	Joseph Addison (1672-1719) English reviewer, critic, essayist and poet; (in association with Richard Steele (1672-1729) English reviewer, critic and playwright	Theatre as spectacle. Addison explicitly takes up Epictetus' version of the theatre metaphor: the world is a theatre, 'where everyone has a part allotted to him' (Spectator No 219). The 'Great Duty which lies upon a Man is to act his Part in Perfection ... If it be an improper one, the Fault is not in us, but in him who has cast our several Parts, and is the great Disposer of the Drama' (No. 237). Addison approves of the metaphor because it 'is wonderfully proper to incline us to be satisfied with the Post in which Providence has placed us'. He reminds us that Epictetus began life as a slave. The metaphor reminds us that we don't know how the drama of life will end, that we will be rewarded according to how well we play our part, and that there may be other parts for us to play in some future life. According to Paulson, Addison marks the point where the metaphor life is a journey begins to be 'augmented and radically altered' by the life is theatre metaphor, a move which privileges the position of the spectator. ⁷ Addison used the metaphor as a basis for his 'Fraternity of spectators' a public he hoped to constitute through his journal. These 'impartial spectators' (Spectator No 274) were to become able to 'consider all the different pursuits and Employment of Men, and ... will find half the Actions tend to nothing else but Disguise and Imposture; and all that is done which proceeds not from a Man's very self is the Action of a Player' (Spectator No. 370). ⁸ Steele believed that only the 'player' was genuine because he at least admitted to be acting: 'The player acts the world, the world the player; Whom still that world unjustly disesteems, Though he alone professes what he seems'. ⁹ The fraternity was made up of 'every one that considers the World as Theatre, and desires to form a right Judgment of those who are actors on it' (No 10). Seeing is more important	The value of spectatorship	A seeing-place; An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification enabling Judgment - spectators judge what they see; the best spectators are 'impartial' i.e. are not affected by what they see; To see life as aesthetic; Acceptance – an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism Deception	External: the Great Disposer of the Drama (the Great Spectator); Externalised: the readers of The Spectator who make up a 'Fraternity of Spectators', all of whom consider the world as a Theatre to show the workings of Providence'; Internal: spectators who 'recognized' themselves Doing/ Watching (+/-) than what is said for Mr Spectator, who claims ‘a man’s speech is much more easily disguised than his Countenance’, and that he has observed ‘an Eyebrow call a Man Scoundrel’ (No 86), while the ‘Cast of [a man’s] Eye’ can reveal ‘an Envious Man’ (No 19). Cato also drew on the metaphor. The book was very popular: 6 editions in its first year; widely read in America where it politicised theatre; Washington had it performed, while others quoted from it liberally, although in Britain it was seen as an anti-revolutionary text.

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Mischiefs that Ought Justly to be Apprehended from a Whig-Government (1714); The Fable of the Bees: Or, Private Vices, Publick Benefits (1723, 1728); An Enquiry into the Causes of the Frequent Executions at Tyburn (1725); An Enquiry into the Origins of Honour, and the Usefulness of Christianity in War (1732);	Bernard Mandeville (c1670-1733) Dutch doctor and moral philosopher (lived in Britain from 1691)	Hypocrisy produced civility. Life is [should be] theatre, a play, a game (revival of Epicureanism). Like his contemporary, Fielding, Mandeville also saw hypocrisy as a defining feature of human conduct, but saw it as a sign of civilization, the device by which strangers in a commercial society could live together without violence: ‘In all Civil Societies Men are taught insensibly to be Hypocrites from their Cradle ... it is impossible we could be sociable Creatures without Hypocrisy’, ¹⁰ since the modern commercial society was merely ‘an aggregation of purely self-interested individuals competitively bound to one another by greed, vanity and imagination’. ¹¹ In The Mischiefs he had a fictional opponent of the Whigs accuse them of being ‘admirably qualified for Poetry and the Stage’, ¹² an accusation when he then defended. Moral activity was ‘an arena’ in which the moral actor ‘participated in a communal drama’ whose purpose was ‘the socialization of the race’. Behaviour in public was ‘a species of performance designed to win approval’. ¹³ Social transactions are histrionic, a ‘Comedy of Manners’. ¹⁴ Mandeville subsumed the moral codes governing public behaviour under headings such as ‘ceremonies’ and ‘customs’, thus placing the practices of polite society within a theatrical context which could be observed and commented on by a detached spectator: ‘it is a great Pleasure, when I look on the Affairs of human Life, to behold into what	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Spectatorship is essential to and a condition of civility and social life; hypocrisy is socially useful because it allows social interaction Self-awareness	Externalised: detached and sceptical observer of the world (who observes other spectators and recognizes their actions as a ‘performance’) Internal: ‘the indulgent and partial spectator’: the mass of men who crave approval and

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
A Letter to Dion (1732)		various and often strangely opposite Forms the hope of Gain and thoughts of Lucre shape Men, according to the different Employments they are of, and Stations they are in. How gay and merry does every Face appear at a well-ordered Ball, and what a solemn Sadness is observ'd at the Masquerade of a Funeral! [and] those who have never minded the Conversation of a spruce Mercer, and a young Lady his Customer ... have neglected a Scene of Life that is very Entertaining ... [One should] examine these People separately, as to their Inside and the different Motives they act from'. ¹⁵ Mandeville, like others, had noticed that the 'enlarged public' which attended the London theatres (the most successful public entertainments of C18th) 'provided a microcosm ... of a new and frightening social world ... in which people who had arisen from obscurity ... could pretend to polite habits' and distinctions, so that one could no longer trust the old social conventions, although Mandeville, unlike other critics, 'enthusiastically' celebrated 'theatrical relations as inherent attributes of political and economic life' in advanced societies. Theatricality was a way of managing men: 'Popes ... by a Strategem of the Church ... have made great Men the chief Actors in ... childish Farces', while the educated 'conform to all Ceremonies that are fashionable [and] make a Shew outwardly of what is not felt within, and counterfeit what is not real'. ¹⁶ Under modern conditions in commercial societies 'public life was of necessity theatrical'. ¹⁷ Theatrical relations were the way in which this kind of society regulated itself, a claim which demanded a dramatically different perspective on the conventions of civil life, and provoked great anxiety amongst his contemporaries, many of whom (Fielding, Hume, Smith) challenged his views, but in doing so, had to confront the argument that character was a social artefact, 'a construct existing only in an intersubjective space of the demands of others, and within which a person's public				thereby take a self-conscious relationship towards their public behaviour Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		identity was of necessity devised, for Mandeville recognized that individuals cannot see the social significance of their actions because they are unable to see that ‘the Good of the Whole is not consistent with the Good of every Individual’. ¹⁸ Hypocrisy is functional because it renders envy positive by allowing it to be expressed as emulation; it is from rules of polite sociability that people acquire their notions of virtue (i.e. the paradox of standard views of virtue is that standards have first to be set before performances can be measured, a view opposed by Shaftesbury but also recognized by Voltaire). ¹⁹ Secular: ‘to highlight the distance between genuine knowledge and mere appearance in the minds of social actors themselves’. ²⁰ In commercial society, two distinct sets of criteria are required in order to evaluate the propriety of an action: 1. the effect on the individual and 2. the consequence for society. They are not necessarily the same. (Mandeville also hints at a task which is later taken up by Kenneth Burke: the value of the theatre in coming to understand motivation).
‘The metaphor continues to flourish throughout the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries’.²¹ Richards designates C18th urban life in Britain as Britain’s theatrical age because of its obsession with appearance, the use of masks and openly histrionic behaviour.²² The novelist Henry Fielding claimed to not be able to tell the difference between public life in London and actual theatre: ‘when transactions behind curtains are mentioned, St James’s is more likely to occur to our thoughts than Drury-lane’.²³ The metaphor, while common to the point of cliché, is ‘lively’ in its application, attachable to any observed behaviour. This period also marks a change in ‘audience’, especially for written material. Readers (considered to be audiences of social dramas represented in print form) were no longer elite consumers but ‘literate, middling inhabitants of a post-chivalric culture ... self-conscious observers’ who inhabited a variety of roles at any time.²⁴ Fielding explicitly addresses his readers as if they were spectators.
Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et sur peinture (1719) (English translation 1748)	Abbé Jean Du Bos (1670-1742) French author	Lucretius’ words were again cited ‘in support of an argument placing the audience of theatrical entertainments at a safe imaginative remove from the performance enacted before it’. Like Shaftesbury, DuBos argued that an enlightened ‘public’ could ‘properly assess the value of a spectacle because its sentiments’ were ‘refined by education and experience to form a kind of sixth sense, le sentiment .’ Spectators were thus ‘enabled to form disinterested judgments (sans intérêt), particularly about	The value of spectatorship	A seeing-place	Objectification enabling Judgment; tranquillity	Externalised: the enlightened observer Internal: most were easily deluded by their

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		those powerfully moving expressions of emotion which, on the stage as in society, could not effectively conveyed in words'. ²⁵				emotions Watching (-)
An Appeal to Common Sense: Or, Some Considerations Ofer'd to Restore Publick Credit ... (1720)	Sir Erasmus Phillips (1700-1743) Member of House of Commons	Articulated a common concern of the time: 'Greatness is so theatrical, and the actors change so often that really I was at a loss where to fix'. ²⁶	The problem of spectatorship	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance allowing delusion	Internal: the people observing 'Greatness' Watching (-)
Persian Letters (1721) Considerations on the Romans (1734); The Spirit of the Laws (1748)	Baron de la Brède et de Montesquieu (1689-1755) French political philosopher	Civility (regulations for behaving appropriately in public) secures Liberty: 'the power to do what one ought to will' in public. ²⁷ Civility is secured by visibility. Spectatorship is essential to social life – it underpins civility. Theatre was public visibility. Politics is theatre: 'an untheatrical politics ... violates natural law and is a condition of despotism A theatricalized politics is a necessary prerequisite of liberty'. ²⁸ Visibility is the key to civility and therefore to freedom, which is the ability to appear in public without fear or restriction. Visibility also underpins despotism when it denies or restricts the ability of others to see or be seen. (An essential role for spectatorship, of the self and others, expressed as 'honor' or public virtue. Spectatorship of one's self and others is an exercise of power which can lead to despotism or freedom). Montesquieu's general insight, which Martin calls a 'political sociology', is that particular patterns of culture 'are both consistent with and derived from fundamental characteristics of society as a whole'. ²⁹ Since 'social structures are held together by a corresponding system of value and beliefs that individuals have internalised, ³⁰ cultural institutions such as the law or the arts, which arise not from nature but from the	The value of spectatorship	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Which allowed self-presentation and civility and ensured security	Internal: others Internalized: one's self To look wherever one pleases and to be seen by others requires rules of civility which require one to 'watch' oneself as well. This is what makes life seem theatrical. Showing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		‘social organism itself’, can be used as ‘observable indicators’ of these otherwise invisible systems of values and beliefs: ‘[t]he more people communicate with each other the more easily they change their manners, because each becomes to a greater degree a spectacle to the other’. ³¹				Watching (+)
Scienza nuova (1725)	Giovanni Battista Vico (1668-1744) Italian Philosopher	Theatre imitates life; we can know life through theatre (because it is our own creation). Theatre was therefore the path to knowledge: to know ‘the true’ (verum) through ‘the made’ (factum). ³² Vico attempted to recapture the experience of the pre-Platonic Greeks in which spectators were mimetically involved ‘in the immediately present bodily selves of actors who enacted figures of timeless myth’ i.e. theatre was mimetic bodily involvement. ³³ For Vico, image-making was essential to learning. ³⁴	Learning through looking	A seeing-place An acting space	Revelation	Internal: spectators of theatre Externalised: analyst; historian Doing/ Watching (+/-)
An Inquiry into the Original of Our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue in Two Treatises: I. Concerning Beauty, Order, Harmony, Design; II. Concerning Moral Good and Evil (1726) ³⁵	Francis Hutcheson (1694-1746) Irish moral and utilitarian political philosopher	The world was God’s way of showing Himself to men. Therefore spectatorship was a means of observing Goodness and Beauty both in the world itself and in men’s relationships with others: ‘since the divine Goodness ... has constituted our Sense of Beauty as it is at present [so that we can observe ‘Uniformity, Proportion and Similitude thro all the Part of Nature’] the same Goodness might determine the Great Architect to adorn this vast Theatre in a manner agreeable to the Spectators, and that part which is expos’d to the Observation of Men, so as to be pleasant to them; especially if we suppose that he design’d to discover himself to them as Wise and Good, as well as Powerful: for thus he has given them greater Evidences ... than they can possibly have for the Reason, Counsel, and Good-will of their fellow-Creatures’. ³⁶ Our eyes were for seeing just as our ears were for hearing. There were two kinds of ‘signs’ for spectators to observe: ‘one in which the person who causes the appearance is never imagined to make any profession, or to have any intention of communicating his sentiments to others. The spectator according to his own sagacity	The value of the observation of beauty and power	A seeing-place	Revelation allowing Pleasure: Judgment	Internal: spectators Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		concludes from the appearances some fact or other, without imagining that the person who occasioned these appearances did it with a view to give him any information. The other use of signs is of such a nature that it plainly contains this profession, or gives the observer just ground to conclude that such signs were made designedly to intimate something to him, which the same use of the signs seems to reveal'.³⁷ It was for this reason that we could discern from a person's 'countenance' their disposition: 'As we observ'd above of Misery, or Distress appearing in Countenances; so it is certain, almost all habitual Dispositions of Mind, form the countenance in such a manner, as to give some Indications of them to the Spectator. Our violent Passions are obvious at first view in the Countenance; so that sometimes no Art can conceal them: and smaller degrees of them give some less obvious Turns to the Face, which an accurate Eye will observe. Now when the natural Air of a Face approaches to that which any Passion would form it unto, we make a conjecture from this concerning the leading Disposition of the Person's Mind'.³⁸ Hutcheson believed that perceiving an action as virtuous was to be pleased by it because we saw it as benefiting human beings. In this way we developed 'our moral approval or disapproval'. The utilitarian principle of the greatest happiness for the greatest number as the standard of moral goodness is first found in his work. Hutcheson also advocated 'the sovereignty of the people, and the right of rebellion against political authority that fails to aim at their happiness' rather than at their security as in Hobbes.³⁹ According to Hundert, as with Smith, Hutcheson was writing in response to and as a direct critique of Mandeville's The Fables of the Bees.⁴⁰ In particular, Hutcheson objected to the negative portrayal of man in The Fables, claiming rather that men had an innate tendency towards morality. This position was, in turn, attacked by Hutcheson's one-time student,

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		David Hume. Hutcheson drew a direct link between the ‘Moral Sense’ and aesthetic ‘ Internal Sense’: ‘taste and morality are psychologically dependent on each other ... they augment each other’s growth and delicacy, and ... decline in the one necessarily precipitates decline in the other’. ⁴¹
Verses on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America (written 1726; published 1752)	Bishop George Berkeley (1685-1753) Irish idealist	The world is a theatre; history is a cosmic drama (being played out in America where Berkeley attempted to set up a missionary post in Bermuda): ‘Westward the course of empire takes its way; The four first Acts already past, A fifth shall close the Drama with the day. Time's noblest offspring is the last.’ ⁴² The only reality was what we perceived. Berkeley denied the existence of matter as a way of refuting Locke’s mechanistic view of the world. Nevertheless he perceived possibilities in the development of America, where he hoped to set up a theological college.	The expansion of empire in America	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Objectification The possibility of history	External: God; Externalised: historians Doing (+/-)
A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729)	William Law (1686-1761) English cleric & theologian	Law complained that ‘fictions of reason [and] fictions of behaviour’ were the ‘leading characteristics of contemporary society’. ⁴³ One should aim to live a ‘true’ life rather than a fictitious one	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Delusion	Externalised: critic Doing (-)
A Chronological History of New England (1736)	Thomas Prince (1687-1758) American clergyman & scholar	The world is a theatre: ‘The united Continents of Asia, Africa and Europe, have been the only Stage of History from the CREATION to the YC1492. We are now to turn our Eyes to the West, and see a NEW WORLD appearing in the Atlantick Ocean to the great Surprize and Entertainment of the other’. ⁴⁴	History as a spectacle played out before our eyes	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Revelation Surprise and entertainment; the possibility of history	Internal: the old world Externalised: historian Showing/ Watching (+)
A Treatise of Human Nature (1739); An Enquiry Concerning the	David Hume (1711-1776) Scottish philosopher	Hume reacted to Mandeville. Although he endorsed the practical and political implications of a socially constructed view of virtue, he felt Mandeville’s argument was flawed. Social life is made possible by ‘Sympathetic movement’: spectators sympathise with others based on what they see, which is how society forms and	Social life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility; Knowledge and self-awareness Sympathy for others	External: the ‘Beholder’; Internal: each other Internalized:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Principles of Morals (1751);		functions; civility and sociability depend on spectatorship. Theatre is useful because it allows us to see that human feeling works according to sympathy. Sympathy is what ensures society. The ‘individual’s limited sympathy for the welfare of others could be furthered and fully accounted for in terms of an essentially self-interested beholder’s responses to the postures and demands of his fellows’ (a view which is similar to Montesquieu).⁴⁵ Therefore, spectatorship is essential to civility and sociability. It has a mirroring effect: ‘the pleasure which a rich man receives from his possessions being thrown upon the beholder, causes a pleasure and an esteem, which sentiments again, being perceived and sympathized with, increase the pleasure of the possessor [which then becomes] a new foundation for pleasure and esteem in the beholder’.⁴⁶ Hume also saw the mind as ‘a kind of theatre where several perceptions successively make their appearance, pass, re-pass, glide away, and mingle in an infinite variety of postures and situations’.⁴⁷ ‘Nothing is more free than the imagination of man; and though it cannot exceed that original stock of ideas furnished by the Internal and External senses, it has unlimited powers of mixing, compounding, separating, and dividing these ideas, in all the varieties of fiction and vision. It can feign a train of events, with all the appearance of reality, ascribe to them a particular time and place, conceive them as existent, and paint them out to itself with every circumstance that belongs to any historical fact, which it believes with the greatest certainty. Wherein, therefore, consists the difference between such a fiction and belief?’⁴⁸ Hume in general ‘identified all moral feeling with a kind of “humanity” or “sympathy”’.⁴⁹ He also considered that ‘we are placed in this world, as in a great theatre, where the true springs and causes of every event are entirely concealed from us; nor have we either sufficient wisdom to foresee, or power to prevent those ills with			The power of the imagination	the self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		which we are continually threatened'. ⁵⁰ Griswold suggests this contributed to Adam Smith's idea of the 'invisible hand'. ⁵¹
Pasquin (1730's); The Tragedy of Tragedies (1730's); Joseph Andrews (1742); 'A Comparison Between the World and the Stage' in Tom Jones (1749); 'An Essay on the Knowledge and of the Characters of Men'; The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon (c1754)	Henry Fielding (1707-1754) English dramatist and novelist	Fielding understood social action as theatrical. Society requires men to act with artifice, to perform, which makes it difficult to discern the true person. We need education to learn to decode affectation, to expose deceit. Theatre helps develop discernment. The metaphor was a device which allowed moral judgments to be made, a way by which 'good men ... might know their fellows'. ⁵² The world is like a stage; life is like theatre, even in the theatre itself. ⁵³ As in theatre, people establish 'public identities' so that 'persons know us in one place and not in another and not tomorrow' (Joseph Andrews II, 13) and 'it is often the same person who represents the villain and the hero' (Tom Jones VII, 1). ⁵⁴ The aim of the comic prose epic (devised by Fielding) is to demonstrate that the actions of men are performances to meet unwritten social protocols, so that spectators (readers) could learn to separate the form of an action from its ethical import, thus allowing proper judgement by now 'impartial spectators'. ⁵⁵ He drew on Le Brun and Shaftesbury for this purpose – to encourage spectators to recognize 'the man performing behind the mask' by paying attention to 'the actions of men' ('An Essay'). Fielding used the device of the play within a play in both his plays and his novels in order to encourage this psychological distancing in his spectators/readers. He calls the narrator of Joseph Andrews a director who 'imitate[s] the wise conductors of the stage'. ⁵⁶ He breaks into the narrative of Tom Jones to compare 'the World and the Stage' (Bk VII, Ch. 1). Most of the characters in the novel, as well as the readers, 'fall into the category of audience', ⁵⁷ and Fielding lists a number of spectator positions (see below). Fielding considered hypocrisy a defining feature of human conduct, something he wanted to demonstrate by taking the position of impartial spectator, ⁵⁸ however he did not celebrate	Social life	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Detachment leading to impartiality; Judgment; to be able to distinguish between the act and the person .	Internal: spectators (readers): a variety of positions are available Externalised: the author Internalised: the self-aware self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		this insight as Mandeville did. His ‘avowed purpose was to reveal the person behind the public mask’.⁵⁹ He wrote Tom Jones in particular as a response to Mandeville’s The Fable: the theatre metaphor here was a device for exposing deceit and hypocrisy, rather than a necessary device for social interaction. He called Mandeville and La Rochefoucauld’s ideas ‘that modern doctrine’ which declared ‘that there were no such things as virtue or goodness really existing in human nature, and ... deduced our best actions from pride’ and which amounted to no more than ‘the searching, rummaging, and examining into a nasty place; indeed ... into the nastiest of all places, A BAD MIND’.⁶⁰ Fielding was committed to the view that ‘truly moral acts could only be performed by genuinely virtuous actors’ and that there were such actors whom Nature would eventually reveal to ‘an accurate observer’. The ‘morally worthy’ also could remain ‘impartial spectators of their own social drama’, although Fielding has Mr Allworthy in Tom Jones remain morally worthy but singularly obtuse throughout the book. Nevertheless, Fielding ‘accepted the fully theatricized public domain’,⁶¹ even providing his characters with appropriate theatrical analogues, and defined a variety of spectatorial positions in Tom Jones: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> -those in the ‘upper gallery’ (vociferous and reproachful) -next level down (mostly women; quietly reproachful) -the pit: divided (as usual): some condemn the person; some condemn the act, not the person; young critics trying to make a name for themselves -the boxes: polite but distracted: some condemn the man while others wait to see what their betters think -behind the scenes: author (privileged spectator but not responsible for casting); managers and directors (allocate the parts); the ‘man of candour and of true understanding’; Reason, the ‘patentee’ (although he is idle and seldom exerts himself).

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Spectators thus fall into: the credulous; those who can't tell the difference between Garrick and Hamlet and attribute all human action to divine providence; those who constantly misinterpret events; the intelligent few who understand the ironies and sometimes contribute to the construction of the take and the privileged few 'admitted behind the scenes'. ⁶²
Burns claims that a version of the metaphor as 'the world itself as a place where people, like actors, play parts, in an action which is felt obscurely to be designed by 'social forces' or the natural drives of individual men' was commonplace from this time on, and is still apparent now, although it has lost 'much of its moral and cosmic significance' and is now focused on 'the self-consciousness of the actor'.⁶³ 1740-48: War of Austrian Secession – said to have had an impact on Montesquieu. 1755: The Lisbon earthquake precipitates a general discussion between Voltaire and others in relation to Divine Justice
SOCIAL LIFE IS PERCEIVED AS A SERIES OF ROLES; THE FURTHER INTERNALIZATION OF THE SPECTATOR
Excursus XXXV; Conversations on The Natural Son (1757); Discours sur la poésie dramatique: essay accompanying the play Le pere de famille (1758); The Paradox of Acting (1773-8)	Denis Diderot (1713-1784) French editor/writer, critic, playwright; compiler of Encyclopédie (1751-1780)	Social life consists of roles; man watches himself perform, from which he learns about his social role. Life is a play. ⁶⁴ '[S]ociety offers many more [poses] than ... art can imitate'. ⁶⁵ He claimed that '[i]t is really bizarre the variety of roles I play in this world', ⁶⁶ and argued that 'new social roles are coming into being every day [and] there is possibly nothing we know less about that social functions, and nothing that should interest us more'. ⁶⁷ Theatre was a way of learning about or exploring social life. As an actor, one should 'have in himself an unmoved and disinterested onlooker'. ⁶⁸ 'One is one's self by nature; one becomes some one else by imitation'. ⁶⁹ Diderot had an early fascination for plays and hoped to write them himself. However, by the time he was thirty he had stopped attending the theatre regularly. He claimed to have been to the theatre no more than ten times between 1743 and 1758, finding the French theatre grown 'deadly' and 'quiet as churches'. He drew on the other arts, especially painting, for the development of a new genre of domestic drama, and based his The Paradox of Acting (1773-8) not on the actual stage performances of Garrick, but on 'exercises and virtuoso stunts in a drawing room'. ⁷⁰	Social life	A seeing-place	Objectification allowing the exploration of social life; Self-knowledge, leading to self-command	Internalized: the self (Diderot appeared to be extremely self-conscious) Internal: detached observer Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Letter to M. D'Alembert (1758); Considerations sur le gouvernement de Bologne	Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778) French playwright and philosopher	Theatre as illusion, deception. Theatre is damaging to order, virtue, sincerity and the 'general will', which should be generated naturally rather than artificially. The theatre itself should not be allowed in a republic since it corrupts, however, the theatricality of political life encourages habits of obedience, so there should be 'many public festivals ... in the open air, under the sky'. '[A] civil polity, a bonded people, are themselves a play' (Letter). There should not be any division between performers and spectators. Everyone should be both spectator and performer. 'When we are purely spectators' (i.e. not theatre audiences) 'we immediately take the side of justice' whereas as theatre audiences 'we prefer the evil that is useful to us to the good that makes us love' (Letter). Rousseau believed that 'the greatest virtue' was to be oneself while 'the greatest vice to be any other', ironic considering his treatment of his children and subsequent writing of Emile . ⁷¹ This was the essence of his letter to the people of Geneva. 'The natural was how we used to be before theatricality made us what we are', civilised and artificial. ⁷² According to Barber, Rousseau 'spent his life confronting the human condition by confronting himself [in] self-examination'. He argued that we were not the source of all knowledge but were fragmented, splintered and alienated from the world and from nature: ⁷³ 'We go through life, struggling and hesitating and die before we have found peace' (Emile). Rousseau was a 'playwright, amateur actor, and passionate theatre lover' who supported himself throughout most of his life by music: as copyist, composer, performer, critic, theorist and singing teacher. He produced an idea for a new system of musical notation based on numbers, which was rejected by the French Academy. His advocacy of the spontaneous melodies of popular Italian opera buffa over the artful harmony of the official, state-sponsored French opera 'helped start a culture war between the supporters of Italian and	The dangers of theatre:	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance allowing Deception Pacification Acceptance of evil	Internal: citizens are spectators for themselves. Internalised: the self-conscious individual Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		French opera. Musicians at the Paris Opera burned him in effigy and rescinded his free pass. In 1752, he wrote a lyric pastoral drama called Le Devin du village which ‘changed the course of French music’ and opened the way for the music of Gluck and Mozart. ⁷⁴
A Voyage Round the World Performed by Order of his Most Christian Majesty in the Years 1766, 1768, and 1769 (1769)	Louis-Antoine de Bougainville Explorer	On 5 th April 1768, when de Bougainville saw Tahiti he described it as ‘elevated like an amphitheatre [which] offered us the most enchanting spectacle’. ⁷⁵ The world appeared before the explorer as a spectacle.	The relationship of man to the world	A seeing-place	Visibility allowing objectification Appropriation of new lands and scenes for oneself	Externalised: traveller Watching (+)
Della Moneta (1770); Correspondence with Madame d’Epinay (selections published 1818).	Abbé Galiani (1728-1787) Economist, intellectual, wit.	Life is theatre; men are actors, we should make the most of life; spectators observed effects in the world; speculation about causes led him astray. Life is ‘a dance ... and the paltry distinctions of the world ... are ... simply the various fashion of the clothes we wear’. ⁷⁶ ‘He was the nicest little harlequin that Italy has produced but upon the shoulders of this harlequin was the head of a Machiavelli’, a person who saw the ridiculous side of things and always had a good story to tell. ⁷⁷ Nietzsche found him ‘the profoundest, most clear-sighted, and perhaps also filthiest man of his century ... [a case where] by a freak of nature genius is tied to some indiscreet billygoat and ape’. ⁷⁸ Galiani was a renowned wit and man of letters, a frequenter of the theatre as well as the salons in both Paris and Naples, and a sometime friend of Voltaire and Diderot. His experience of the theatre would have been very broad, incorporating both classical and popular forms and theory. Plays were often performed at salons, before receptive but critical audiences, and all aspects of theatre and	Social and political life	A seeing-place An acting space	Objectification Detachment Amusement The illusion of foresight The possibility of knowledge	External: God (a ‘grand old rogue’); Internal: Man, who is ‘made to observe effects, without being able to divine their causes’ Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+) aesthetics were discussed. He described Rousseau's Confessions as 'morbid pages in which Rousseau attempted to 'deceive the world concerning his character'. ⁷⁹ His economic treatise Della Moneta declared that the common measure of all value was man, and that all the misfortunes of man, including war, could be attributed to 'foresight' – man's tendency to speculate and consequently overestimate about the future. ⁸⁰ When challenged by Voltaire regarding the ethical position of a spectator who watched horrors unmoved for 'scientific' knowledge, Galiani excused such spectatorship on the basis of the theatre. 'Scientific' spectators who were seeking knowledge approach the world like spectators in a theatre. The distance and security that this provides were the condition of knowledge.

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
THE INTERNALIZATION OF THE SPECTATOR AS MORAL GUIDE
The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759)	Adam Smith (1723-1790) Scottish economist and philosopher	Spectatorship is the source of moral conduct; it allows us to imagine the feelings of others. Through sympathy we internalize these imagined feelings as a form of socialisation. This process 'places us in a theatrical relation to others'. ⁸¹ We develop our conscience 'as members of an audience, training ourselves to meet the expectations of this audience, of which we are a part'. ⁸² The link between imagination and sympathy is critical to social and moral life – theatre enables this linkage. A secular view of the metaphor, although Smith's 'impartial spectator' sometimes seems like a redescription of God since it is omniscient and disinterested, which is why its judgment can be trusted. Smith is directly opposed to Mandeville, and wrote The Theory as a refutation. ⁸³ It is also not altogether certain that theatre is a metaphor, rather than a resource to be used in the way Kenneth Burke wishes to use drama i.e. theatre generates community feeling by playing on the sympathy of its spectators. Therefore sympathy may also be the key to social solidarity outside theatre. Nevertheless, life is theatrical in that spectators must imagine	The value of spectatorship; moral life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification leading to self-awareness, self-mastery and sympathy for others, which mitigates selfishness Judgment (of ourselves and others)	Internal: spectators Externalised: the impartial spectator Internalized: self-consciousness - we consider what spectators might be seeing and adjust our own conduct accordingly Doing/ Showing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		themselves ‘actors’ in what they see or read in order to feel sympathy; likewise they see themselves as spectacles for the imaginations of others; the ability or inability of others then to sympathise forces them to judge their own conduct; ‘social life necessarily resembles a masquerade’ (Theory VII.2.4.10), a mirror (the only mirror in which we can view our character): ‘We begin ... to examine our own passions and conduct, and to consider how these must appear to [others] ... We suppose ourselves the spectators to our own behaviour, and endeavour to imagine what effect it would, in this light, produce upon us. This is the only looking-glass by which we can, in some measure, with the eyes of other people, scrutinize the propriety of our own conduct’ (Theory III.1.5). But theatre is like life: ‘a public’s attitude toward great men ... is mirrored in audience’s reactions to tragedies’.⁸⁴ In Smith the metaphor seems to be shifting its ground. The self has a dramatic character, and self-deception is productive, but it is sympathy which is the key to stable, moral principles because it mitigates selfishness, that and the ability to differentiate between desiring praise and being praiseworthy. While social life is theatrical, it was not theatre, and men preferred to be praised for being worthy rather than merely appearing to be so (Theory III.2.7-8).⁸⁵ The way spectators react in the theatre is explained by their sympathetic reactions to others in life. The theatrical structure of sympathy is acted out between people and between a divided self. The purpose is judgement: we judge others as a spectator while at the same time finding others as spectators judging us: we apply this awareness of the gaze of others to our own conduct and judge it ‘as we imagine an impartial spectator would’ (Theory III.1.5). Bate argues that The Theory was recognized at the time as having ‘elaborated and, in a sense, crystallized’ as a critical tenet, the fundamental link between the imagination and sympathy, a connection which was				Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		to take on the position of a 'doctrine' in aesthetics. ⁸⁶
Rambler (c1750)	Samuel Johnson (1709-1784) English lexicographer & critic	The distinction between fiction and reality. Johnson was fond of theatre metaphors when describing others: he described the Scottish theorist of sympathy, John Gilbert Cooper, as 'the Punchinello of literature'. ⁸⁷ However, he declared that 'Nobody imagines that he [the player] is the character he represents. They say 'See Garrick how he looks tonight! See how he'll clutch the dagger! That is the buzz of the theater'. ⁸⁸	Social and cultural life	An acting space	Visibility Appreciation of skill	Internal: spectator Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (+)
'Curiosity' (1751); Candide (1759)	Voltaire (Francois-Marie Arouet) (1694-1778) French writer	Humans were curious, just like animals. They could be considered 'audiences' for the world, including the tragedies which befall it. Curiosity turned the world into a theatre but needed an ethics to prevent it from cruelty. ⁸⁹	The relationship between man and the world	A seeing-place	Visibility enabling objectification To learn. To enable curiosity to be satisfied	Externalised: man as observer of the world Watching (-)
Diary and Autobiography (1765); Letter (regarding Independence Day) (1811)	John Adams (1735-1826) American Puritan; 2 nd President of America	To describe the position of America in the world; the presentation of political events. America is the theatre for the world, designed by Providence for the display of 'Virtue, Liberty, Happiness and Glory'; 'The Declaration of Independence I always considered as a theatrical show ... Jefferson ran away with all the stage effect ... and all the glory of it' (Letter) ⁹⁰	Political life	An acting space	Revelation Glory Knowledge (and hence admiration) Strategies of performance	External: God; Externalised: the rest of the world Doing/ Showing (-)
1773: Boston Tea Party. 1775-1783: American Revolution: post-Revolution America saw an outpouring of triumphalist speeches, poetry and sermons declaring America as a glorious new theatre. ⁹¹ 1776: American Declaration of Independence
The Columbiad (The Vision of Columbus (1787) The Conspiracy of Kings (1792)	Joel Barlow (1754-1812) American poet, diplomat & politician; supporter of	The Columbiad was a 'patriotic poem' modeled on Homer's The Iliad which aimed to 'sooth and satisfy the desponding mind of Columbus' whom he thought had been ill-treated by his contemporaries, whereas Cortez had been feted even though Peru in particular had been 'a broad theatre' for his crimes against the American peoples. The 'business of war' was part of 'the scenery' for the poem, which aimed 'to encourage and strengthen	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Revelation Knowledge Glory	Internal: American citizens External: other countries; Eternal Truth

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	French Revolution	... a sense of the importance of republican institutions; as being the great foundation of public and private happiness, the necessary aliment of future and permanent ameliorations in the conditions of human nature' (Preface).⁹² The Conspiracy of Kings was an attack on Edmund Burke's view of the French Revolution (which Barlow supported): ETERNAL Truth, thy trump undaunted lend, People and priests and courts and kings, attend; While, borne on western gales from that far shore Where Justice reigns, and tyrants tread no more, Th' unwonted voice, that no dissuasion awes, That fears no frown, and seeks no blind applause, Shall tell the bliss that Freedom sheds abroad, The rights of nature and the gift of God.⁹³				Doing/ Watching (-)

¹ Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 147, 210

² Green, Jeffrey Edward. 2010. The Eyes of the People: Democracy in an Age of Spectatorship. New York: Oxford University Press: 9-10

³ Digby, Epicurus's Moral, p. 52; quoted in Hundert 1994: 147.

⁴ Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164: 146

⁵ Shaftesbury Characteristics cited in Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005; Fried, Michael. 1980. Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot. Berkeley: California University Press: 208n132

⁶ Shaftesbury 'Advice to an Author' in Characteristics; quoted in Fried 1980: 219n132

⁷ Paulson, Ronald. 1976. 'Life as Journey and as Theater: Two Eighteenth-Century Narrative Structures'. New Literary History 8 (1) pp. 43-58: 43

⁸ Mandeville saw this as 'self-serving nonsense', and example of the 'Practical Part of Dissimulation' (II, 77), and set out to expose it (Hundert 1994: 149) because he believed that '[m]embers of the expanding beau monde who constituted the elite of commercial ... societies could never ... strictly adhere to the codes of polite intercourse promoted by Addison, Steele and Shaftesbury, while at the same time remaining independent and undeluded moral agents (Hundert 1994: 149).

⁹ The use of the word 'actor' to denote a theatrical player was only just coming into vogue (Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman: 10).

-
- ¹⁰ Mandeville, The Fable, I, pp. 348-9; all quotes and remarks are from Hundert 1994: 141-203.
- ¹¹ Hundert 1994: 152
- ¹² Mandeville, The Mischiefs pp. 1-2; quoted in Hundert 1994: 152.
- ¹³ Hundert 1994: 141-2
- ¹⁴ Mandeville, The Fable, I, p. 79; quoted in Hundert 1994: 143.
- ¹⁵ Mandeville, The Fable, I, pp. 349-350; quoted in Hundert 1994: 148.
- ¹⁶ Mandeville, Honour, pp. 107, 149, 162, 189; quoted in Hundert 1994: 151.
- ¹⁷ Hundert 1994: 152
- ¹⁸ Mandeville, A Letter, p. 49, in Hundert 1994: 179.
- ¹⁹ Mandeville's views about the public value of private vices was supported by contemporary economists such as Sir Dudley North (Discourses on Trade 1690) and John Pollexfen (A Discourse on Trade, Coyne, and Paper Credit 1697), who also argued that acquisition was driven by the desire for esteem and self-respect from the 'greatest Gallants to the meanest Cook-Maids' (Pollexfen 1697: 99 in Hundert 1994: 181). Rousseau abhorred this view of society. Mandeville sank into obscurity with the onslaught of the Industrial Revolution and its combination of enormous wealth with grinding poverty, but has since been resurrected in the study of economics. Robert Merton considers The Fable as 'a forerunner of modern sociology' and the first articulation of the doctrine of unintended consequences. He has also now been given credit for coining the idea of homo economicus. Hayek called him 'a master-mind [who] asked the right questions' (Hundert 1994: 248-9).
- ²⁰ Hundert 1994: 147
- ²¹ Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc: 194
- ²² Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press: 177
- ²³ Fielding, Henry. 1962/1749. 'A Comparison Between the World and the Stage'. In The History of Tom Jones. London: Heron Books, pp. 252-255: 252
- ²⁴ Hundert 1994: 159
- ²⁵ Hundert 1994: 148-9
- ²⁶ Phillips An Appeal to Common Sense 1720: 4, in Hundert 1994: 175
- ²⁷ Beyer, Charles 1996, 'Montesquieu' in Audi, R. (ed) 1996, The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press: 506.
- ²⁸ Hundert, E.J., and Paul Nelles. 1989. 'Liberty and Theatrical Space in Montesquieu's Political Theory: the Poetics of Public Life in the Persian Letters'. Political Theory 17 (2) pp. 223-246: 226
- ²⁹ Martin, Peter J. 1995. Sounds and Society: Themes in the Sociology of Music. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press: 75-77
- ³⁰ Turner, J.H., and L. Beeghley. 1981. The Emergancy of Sociological Theory. Homewood: Dorsey Press: 313
- ³¹ Montesquieu 1989, The Spirit of the Laws, trans. A.M. Cohen, B.C. Miller and H.S. Stone, Cambridge University Press, VII.I; quoted in Hundert 1994: 150.
- ³² Richard Bellamy 1995, 'Giambattista Vico', in Honderich, Ted (ed) 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press: 899.
- ³³ Wilshire, Bruce. 1982. Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press: 36
- ³⁴ Fleckenstein, Kristie. 2007. 'Testifying: Seeing and Saying in World Making'. In Ways of Seeing, Ways of Speaking: The Integration of Rhetoric and Vision in Constructing the Real, edited by K. Fleckenstein, S. Hum and L. Calendrillo. West Lafayette, Indiana: Parlor Press, pp. 3-30: 3
- ³⁵ Part I was republished as An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations on the Moral Sense (1742); also available from Liberty Fund, <http://oll.libertyfund.org/> under Hutcheson.

-
- ³⁶ Hutcheson, Frances. 2007/1747. Philosophiae moralis institutio compendiaria with a Short Introduction to Moral Philosophy Edited by L. Turco. Indianapolis: Liberty Fund http://oll.libertyfund.org/index.php?option=com_staticxt&staticfile=show.php%3Ftitle=2059&layout=html: III. Also cited in Marshall 1986: 168 but as coming from An Inquiry Concerning Beauty, Order, Harmony, Design, (1725) (Marshall, David. 1986. The Figure of Theater: Shaftesbury, Defoe, Adam Smith and George Eliot. New York: Columbia University Press).
- ³⁷ Hutcheson 2007/1747: 1
- ³⁸ Hutcheson 2002/1726: III, <http://oll.libertyfund.org> accessed 13/07/11.
- ³⁹ Blackburn, Simon. 1994. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press: 181-2
- ⁴⁰ Hundert 1994: 79-80
- ⁴¹ Bate 1945: 146
- ⁴² Berkeley, George 1901, The Works of George Berkeley, D.D., Formerly Bishop of Cloyne, Including his Posthumous Works, Vol IV: Miscellaneous Works 1707-50, Oxford, At the Clarendon Press, p. 365-6.
- ⁴³ Hundert 1994: 210
- ⁴⁴ In Richards 1991: 185
- ⁴⁵ Hundert 1994: 173-181
- ⁴⁶ Hume, Treatise I.iv.7; quoted in Hundert 1994: 171.
- ⁴⁷ Hume Treatise I.iv.6; quoted in Hundert 1994: 173; also quoted in Burns 1972: 11.
- ⁴⁸ Hume An Enquiry quoted in Marshall 1986: 71
- ⁴⁹ Bate 1945: 146
- ⁵⁰ Hume, David 1957/1779, The Natural History of Religion, H.E. Root (ed), Stanford, Stanford University Press, p. 28; cited in Griswold Jr., Charles. 1999. Adam Smith and the Virtues of the Enlightenment. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 67n51.
- ⁵¹ Griswold 1999: 67n51
- ⁵² Hundert 1994: 157-167
- ⁵³ Fielding's satiric dramas, Pasquin and The Tragedy of Tragedies featured the 'play within a play' and other devices to remind the audience it was in the theatre (Hundert 1994: 166).
- ⁵⁴ Paulson says that Tom Jones is Fielding's 'most complete manifestation of the theatrical metaphor', and is written with spectators both inside scenes and outside (readers and author) (Paulson 1976: 52).
- ⁵⁵ Hundert 1994: 161
- ⁵⁶ Hundert 1994: 166n139
- ⁵⁷ Paulson 1976: 52
- ⁵⁸ Hundert 1994: 170
- ⁵⁹ Hundert 1994: 162
- ⁶⁰ Fielding Tom Jones VI.I 1962/1749: 203; capitalization in the original. Fielding's disreputable characters Thwackum and Square in Tom Jones express Mandeville's views, and he summarises The Fable in Joseph Andrews (Hundert 1994: 154). Nevertheless, Fielding's 'diagnosis of contemporary social ills ... was virtually identical to Mandeville's (Hundert 1994: 155).

⁶¹ Hundert 1994: 156-167

⁶² Paulson 1976: 53)

⁶³ Burns 1972: 11

⁶⁴ Curtius complains that most books on Diderot do not provide a comprehensive picture of his work. They not only divide it up into various categories (philosophy, story-telling, dramatist, letter-writer, art critic), but tend to treat these categories as sequential, providing a misleading picture of his interests and output (Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI): 573).

⁶⁵ Rameau's Nephew; cited by Hundert 1994: 168. Diderot was referring to Noverre, a celebrated dancing master of the time. Dancing masters were considered by Mandeville and Fielding as ideal for the representations of deceit (Hundert 1994: 168n148.)

⁶⁶ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 189.

⁶⁷ Diderot 1757, in Gerould 2000: 197.

⁶⁸ Diderot 1883/1773-8, The Paradox of Acting, trans. Walter Herries Pollock, London, Chatto and Windus; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 198-201; p. 198.

⁶⁹ Diderot 1883/1773-8; in Gerould 2000: 201.

⁷⁰ Gerould 2000: 190

⁷¹ Gerould 2000: 203

⁷² Denning 1996: 114

⁷³ Barber, Benjamin R. 1978. 'Rousseau and the Paradoxes of the Dramatic Imagination'. Daedalus 107 (3) pp. 79-92: 80

⁷⁴ Gerould 2000: 202-3. Rousseau emphasized melodrama, the accompaniment of verse or narrative with music, as an appropriate kind of theatre. The idea was well known before the French Revolution but has since died out, appearing in the occasional recitatives in operas such as Beethoven's Fidelio (Honigsheim 1973: 226).

⁷⁵ Balme 2005

⁷⁶ Howland, Edward. 1873. 'The Abbe Galiani'. The Atlantic Monthly 31 (185) pp. 302-306, Cornell University Library, <http://cdl.library.cornell.edu> accessed 31/9/2006: 306

⁷⁷ Said by Marmontel, according to Madame D'Epinay; quoted by Amelia Mason 2005, 'Ultra-Philosophical Salons – Madame D'Epinay', The Women of the French Salons, World Wide School, www.worldwideschool.org, accessed 22 August 2005.

⁷⁸ Nietzsche 2005, Beyond Good and Evil, 26, http://www.publicappeal.org/library/nietzsche/Nietzsche_beyond_good_and_evil/bge_Ch2_the_free_spirit.htm, accessed 22/8/2005.

⁷⁹ Howland, Edward 1873, 'Abbé Galiani (1728-1787)', in The Atlantic Monthly Vol 31, pp. 302-306, reproduced in Cornell University's Making of America.

⁸⁰ R.L. Schweller 1992, 'Domestic and Preventive War: Are Democracies More Pacific', World Politics Vol 44(2), pp. 235-269. See also Richardson 2002, 'Civil-Military Relations in the Republic of China: A Conceptual Approach', Studies in Democratization Vol 1.

⁸¹ Marshall 1986: 174

⁸² Hundert 1994: 221

⁸³ Hundert 1994: 173

⁸⁴ Marshall 1986: 187

⁸⁵ This distinction suggests that Smith thought of theatre in terms of performativity, rather than in terms of deception (as Mandeville did).

⁸⁶ Bate 1945: 148

⁸⁷ Bate 1945: 148

⁸⁸ Boswell's Life of Johnson 1904, George Birkbeck Hill (ed), New York, V, p. 52; quoted in Stern, Charlotte. 1979. 'Actors, Characters, and Spectators in Tamayo's Un drama nuevo'. Theatre Journal 31 (1) pp. 70-77: 76.

⁸⁹ Voltaire 'Curiosity' 1751; E.R. DuMont, The Online Library of Liberty, http://oll.libertyfund.org/Texts/Voltaire_0265/Works accessed 2 July, 2005

⁹⁰ In Richards 1991: 285-7

⁹¹ Richards 1991: 285-7

⁹² Barlow, The Columbiad <http://www.gutenberg.org/dirs/etext05/8clmb10h.htm> accessed 23/9/2010

⁹³ Barlow 1972 accessed via DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska 23/9/2010 <http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1048&context=etas>

Table 6/17: The theatre metaphor in relation to the spectator: from 1776-1900

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Wars are almost continuous throughout this period.
A Sermon, Preached in the County of Botetourt (1781)	James Madison (1751-1836) American President (4 th)	‘For lo! America has become the theatre whereon the providence of God is now manifested’. ¹	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space	Revelation	Externalised: the world Internal: Americans Showing (+/-)
Letter to the Comte de Maurepas (1781)	Marquis de Lafayette (1757-1834) French General	Lafayette aided America during the Revolution. ‘The play is over ... the fifth act has just ended. I was a bit uneasy during the first acts, but my heart keenly enjoyed the last one’. ²	Political life	An acting space	Perspective	Internal: participant Doing (+/-)
Address to his army before its disbandment (1783); Circular Letter (1783)	George Washington (1732-1799) American soldier and president	Life was a performance before spectators in which one should aim for consistency; one should play one’s part well to the end; America’s special position in the world was to be under scrutiny. Life is a drama, played out in the theatre of the world (Stoic version of the metaphor): ‘Nothing now remains but for the Actors of this mighty scene to preserve a perfect unvarying consistency of character through the very last act, to close the drama with applause; and to retire from the military theatre with the same approbation of angels and men which have crowned all their former actions’. Americans were ‘from this period to be considered as actors on a most conspicuous theatre ... designed by Providence for the display of human greatness and felicity’. ³	Social and political life:	A seeing-place An acting space	Revelation allowing glory and the observation of progress; endurance; an ethics of responsibility in the face of determinism Judgment. Self-awareness	External: angels Externalised: other countries, especially Europe Internal: the self-conscious individual Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Ideas for the Philosophy of the History of Mankind (1784-91)	Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744-1803) German	History is a drama devised by God in which human will interferes. Events in life, such as the French Revolution, are dramas ‘in God’s book, the great world history’, being played out before earthly spectators who are expected to learn from them but who are always in danger of being hurled into the drama. Yet,	Historical events:	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and	Perspective To learn from events; to separate the event from the	Externalised: the philosopher; the historian Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Letters for the Advancement of Humanity (1792)	philosopher, theologian, poet and literary critic	'[w]hat an achievement of reason it is when the spectator looks at the individuals in history, with "profound pity for [their] untold miseries", and sees their downfall as the work not only of nature but also of the human will'. ⁴		spectator	observer, actors from spectators The possibility of history Sympathy Self-awareness	Watching (+/-)
Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789)	Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832) English Utilitarian Philosopher and Legislator	Spectatorship as a form of power. Bentham transposed the theatrical principle of the Baroque stage which took as its organizing principle the shape of a pyramid in which the position of the king was the base from which what could be seen was derived, and applied it to the architectural disciplinary power of the Panopticon, a prison in which inmates were 'actors before an unseen spectator'. ⁵	Political life	A seeing-place A relationship between actors and spectators	Objectification enabling self-awareness and therefore self-discipline; strategies of direction	Externalised: the base from which all vision was derived Internalised: the consequence of scrutiny Doing/ Watching (+/-)
1789-1793: French Revolution. A high point for the theatre metaphor, which was used extensively by the revolutionaries, as well as by spectators outside France, of which there seemed to be an inordinate number, 'present in every intellectual circle in Europe'.⁶ According to von Rosador, the use of stage imagery is typical in periods of high self-consciousness, as revolutionary periods tend to be.⁷ 1793: Reign of Terror. In England, the Revolution was widely seen as a consequences of a plot (instigated by Voltaire and Frederick the Great and involving Diderot and D'Alembert) against Christianity, which was thought to be the foundation of civil government: 'the French Revolution was the result of a triangular conspiracy, anti-Christian, anti-monarchical, and anti-social, tending in the end to the universal overthrow of the existing social order'. By 1797, it was 'a familiar explanation of the genesis of the Revolution', one which was enthusiastically promulgated at Sunday sermons, and one in which 'Voltaire was the chief and led the way'.⁸ Voltaire's work had 'unchristianed the French nation, and produced all the horrors of their revolution'.⁹ There was also a strong interest in the 'art' of dying at the time, one which believed that the manner of one's death was a consequence of the manner of one's life. Voltaire's apparently horrendous death seemed appropriate: 'Voltaire died as such monsters always die'.¹⁰ His death was considered instructive. This view of death accords with the Stoic conception of the theatre metaphor in which dying was also a role one was expected to perform well, a view which can be found in Burke. A theatrical view of life (and death) allowed many lessons to be drawn.
THE DEMOCRATIC SPECTATOR
Critique of Judgment (1790)	Immanuel Kant (1724-1804)	Only spectators saw the whole clearly, and were at risk of boredom even if the actors weren't; men acted as if they had free will but were guided by an invisible hand towards progress The	Historical events	A seeing-place	Objectification Judgment The possibility	Externalised: philosopher as observer;

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	German philosopher	Critique was essentially about the difficulties in making aesthetic judgments, but Kant applied his ideas to form a judgment of the French Revolution – not from what he saw of those involved but from what other spectators, those who, like him, ‘had not “the least intention of assisting” in the events’ said about what they saw. ¹¹ He judged that the revolution was ‘a phenomenon in human history ... not to be forgotten’. Nevertheless, the spectacle ‘may perhaps be moving for a while, but the curtain must eventually descend. For in the long run, it becomes a farce. And even if the actors do not tire of it – for they are fools – the spectator does, for any single act will be enough for him if he can reasonably conclude from it that the never-ending play will be of eternal sameness’. ¹² According to Arendt, Kant also believed in something not unlike Adam Smith’s invisible hand , for he believed that ‘human affairs are guided by the “ruse of nature,” which leads the human species, behind the backs of acting men, into a perpetual progress’, which, as Arendt says, pretty well makes all actors fools, or they may as well be. ¹³			of historical description	historians, observers Doing/ Watching (-)
Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790)	Edmund Burke (1729-1797) English politician, writer and critic	The dangers of the metaphor: when framed as theatre, political events could take on the character of theatre for participants, which had consequences for the control of political and social behaviour. Politics as theatre had no limits. Seeing politics as theatre externalised the observer, allowing the distancing power of immunity usually associated with watching tragedy to come into operation in politics. Although the actual use of theatre metaphor by Burke in Reflections is quite limited, Melvin considers that Burke, who also had a theory of aesthetics (The Sublime and the Beautiful), used theatre expressions to attack the French Revolution, and the Jacobins in particular, on two fronts. He took seriously their claim that the revolution was theatre, and challenged their understanding of theatre, which he saw as a demonstration of the worst of neo-classicism. He then used the	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Irresponsibility leading to excess; Detachment Immunity from consequences	Externalised: the critic as observer (the political commentator as critic); Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		distinctions between artificial theatre and natural theatre in order to draw out the difference between theatre and a politics which might use theatrical means to ‘remind his readers of the difference between being and appearance, nature and art, fact and fiction’,¹⁴ which he believed the revolutionaries had conflated, leading inevitably to violence and excess. The differences are ultimately based on the ends to which these means are put: the creation of politics as ‘art’ or the role of politics in ensuring ‘social tranquillity’. This was part of a more general challenge to the Rousseau idea of the noble savage who was seen to epitomise ‘true’ humanity. On the contrary, Burke argued that what was most human about us was artifice or manners, the conventions men had developed to ensure a peaceful life: ‘Unaccommodated man’ is like the ‘wild man’ ... the achievement of a high civilization is the creation of a symbolic clothing of conventions and institutions. Burke’s ‘decent drapery of life’ ... humanizes and dignifies man’.¹⁵ Although on the surface, Burke appears then to use theatre metaphor as a metaphor, his approach is much more complex than the simple invocation used by many others. It is not so much that he saw politics as theatre but that he took seriously the claim by the Jacobins that politics is theatre, and examined this claim for its likely consequences.¹⁶ What he discovered leads him to predict the collapse of the Revolution into violence and terror, and its subsequent failure. He considered the Jacobins had turned themselves into ‘actors and tragi-comedians’ because they believed their view of revolution as theatre. This left only the position of audience for observers of the unfolding tragedy: ‘the proper state of mind for observers of the French Revolution is that appropriate to watching a tragedy’,¹⁷ in which distance offered immunity, and thus allowed one to feel that familiar but peculiar response to tragedy in the theatre: the combination of fear and pleasure. Nevertheless,

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Burke rejects Lucretius' idea that immunity is the source of the delight we feel when we see others in distress, either in real life or in the theatre, although he acknowledges that immunity may be a condition of sympathy since it is difficult to focus on others if our own life is in danger. 'It is a certain' that one must be 'out of any imminent hazard' before one can 'take a delight in the sufferings of others' but this does not mean that this immunity is the cause of any delight. Rather, sympathy is functional. It is how society is possible. Hence it must have some delight attached to it, or we would not exercise it. Our delight in the sufferings of others comes about because we are sympathetic, and find relief from the pain that brings by, in real life, attempting to relieve the distress of others or, in the theatre, by recognizing the imitation. ¹⁸ He claims that we would still 'feel for others, while we suffer ourselves ... we see with pity even distresses which we would accept in the place of our own.' ¹⁹ Hindson and Gray however claim that Burke sees life in general, and politics in particular through the prism of theatre, and that this accounts for the seeming inconsistencies in his political theory, as well as his at times histrionic comments. ²⁰ Burke certainly saw writing as a performance . He states this many times.
The Rights of Man (1791-2)	Thomas Paine (1737-1809) British-born journalist, pamphleteer, inventor and radical	One of the founders of American independence. Considered Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution not history but a constructed tragedy: 'I cannot consider Mr Burke's book in scarcely any other light than a dramatic performance; and he must, I think, have considered it in the same light himself, by the poetical liberties he has taken of omitting some facts, distorting others, and making the whole machinery bend to produce a stage effect'. ²¹ Nevertheless, Paine employed the theatre as a metaphor himself, often in much the same way as Burke: state and aristocracy were a 'puppet-show'; 'mixed' governments (composed of elements of monarchy and representation) were	Political life	A constructed art	Visibility which enabled critique as well as delusion	Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		‘pantomimes’ of representative government, using ‘changes of scene and character’ to look as if they were representative; hereditary succession was ‘a burlesque’, in which ‘any child or idiot’ could be king. Representative government was ‘visible’ government. It ‘presents itself on the open theater of the world in a fair and manly manner. Whatever are its excellencies or its defects, they are visible to all’. Theatre is used to both belittle things which Paine rejected (be they forms of government or books), and to distinguish a quality of publicness or visibility . (Paine appears to have misunderstood what Burke was trying to do, reading his work as a metaphorical use of theatre rather than a critique of the use of the metaphor)
Comment on the first Fête de la Fédération (July 14, 1790); Comment July 7, 1792.	Jean-Paul Marat (1744-1793) French revolutionary	The duplicity of the revolutionary government under Mirabeau which turned the revolution into theatre and citizens into spectators. To show how the revolution had descended into theatre, reducing citizens to “les badaux” who just come to ‘gape at the tricks of their elected representatives. The festival is only a ‘false image of public felicity’. ²² By 1792, the entire revolution was ‘a mask’: ‘Cast a glance on the theater of the State. The decoration alone has changed, but the same actors remain, the same masks, the same intrigues, the same tricks: still a despot surrounded by his lackey, still the vexatious and oppressive ministers ... Today the principal actors are behind the curtain; it is there that they plot at their ease with those who play the parts before our eyes. Most of the latter have already disappeared, new actors have come forth to play the same roles’. ²³	Political events	A constructed art	Duplicity	Internal: deluded citizens Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (-)
‘On the King’s Flight’ (1791); ‘Prospectus for “Le Défenseur de la Constitution”’	Maximilien Robespierre (1758-1794) French revolutionary	The problem and the power of spectatorship to judge the public behaviour of those involved in public office, and draw the public’s attention to those who ‘wear masks’ and do not act with integrity, or for ‘reason and truth’. ²⁴ ‘Everyone wears the same mask of patriotism’, even the enemy. ²⁵ Revolution was theatre [or possibly a theatre] because it took place under the eyes of the	Political events; the value and problem of spectatorship	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility, which enables surveillance and judgment and produces self-awareness	Internal: the Citizen as spectator and judge Internalised: the self-

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1792); 'For the Defense of the Committee of Public Safety' (1793)		people. ²⁶ Robespierre saw himself as having originally been an actor in this theatre, but he had since 'left the theatre to sit among the spectators' so as to 'better judge the stage and the actors'. He considered his role as such a spectator 'to analyze the public conduct of the personalities who play the principle roles'. ²⁷ The Committee of Public Safety was essentially about surveillance. It 'casts its gaze' on the treacherous (including foreign agents) and on the good. It does this secretly. Its job was to 'unmask the conduct' of traitors. ²⁸ 'Robespierre knew that "the eyes of Europe" were fixed on "the theater of our revolution", and he acted accordingly': ²⁹ 'The Constitution must insure that the legislature reside ... and deliberate under the eyes of the greatest number of citizens possible'. ³⁰ 'The eye of vigilance' was a primary symbol of the revolution, appearing in posters, pamphlets and other revolutionary literature.				conscious actor Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
1798: Revolution in Ireland. 1803-1815: Napoleonic Wars
De l'Allemagne (1810)	Anne-Louise Germaine Necker, Mme de Staël (1766-1817) French political dissident, theatrical theorist, performer, playwright and theatre owner	Humans perform in a huge, on-going drama over which they have little control. Mme de Staël was a French political dissident, playwright, theatre owner and producer, performer, and prominent member of the literary and political 'cult' of Rousseau. ³¹ 'Everything is tragic in the events by which nations are interested; and this immense drama, which the human race has for these six thousand years past been performing, would furnish innumerable subjects for the theatre'. ³² Her book was an argument against the rigidity of neoclassical rules in French theatre as part of a more general protest against the suppression of intellectual freedom in France under Napoleon which proposed 'a new Europe of independent cultural and political entities'. ³³	Social and political life	An acting space	Fatalism Detachment Coherence Critique The possibility of history Endurance	Externalised: critic; playwright Internal: performer Doing (+)
Die Welt als	Arthur	Life, like theatre, is a place of action in which people wait their	The human	A seeing-place An	Subjectification	Internalized:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Wills und Vorstellung (1816); 'Of Women' (1851)	Schopenhauer (1788-1860) German philosopher	turn to go on then do so without considering the consequences. To explain how something as inferior to man as woman can convince a man to support her for his entire life. In Schopenhauer, the spectator becomes interiorized: 'in his withdrawal into reflection man resembles "an actor who has played his part in one scene, and who takes his place among the audience until it is time for him to go on the stage again, and quietly looks on at whatever may happen, even though it be the preparation for his own death, but afterwards again goes on the stage and acts and suffers as he must"''. ³⁴ 'In the girl, nature has had in view what could in theatrical terms be called a stage effect. it has provided her with super abundant beauty and charm for a few years at the expense of the whole remainder of her life, so that during these years she may so capture the imagination of a man that he is carried away into undertaking to support her honorably ... for the rest of her life, a step he would hardly seem to take for purely rational considerations'. ³⁵ According to Blumenberg, Schopenhauer marks the end of the separation between actor and spectator as separate persons: both exist within each man, the former associated with action and the latter with reason. In observing others in peril, we remember and reflect on our own experiences and count our blessings. Like Voltaire, Schopenhauer suggests this is the source of both happiness and 'all genuine wickedness'. ³⁶	condition	acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Self-awareness Detachment Illusion	the spectator is within, representing reason against action and passion Doing/ Watching (-)
1815-1821: although the Battle of Waterloo (1815) brought comparative stability to Europe, there were serious concerns in Britain over the possibility of revolution as a result of economic collapse, depression and severe unemployment. The 'Peterloo' massacre in which troops fired on a protesting crowd occurred in 1819. The period featured outspoken leaders, threats and counter-threats as well as fiercely contested attempts to legislate for change in the face of equally fierce support of the 'free' market. ³⁷ 1820-1823 Spanish Civil War 1821-1831 Greek War of Independence 1830: a second revolution in France; 1830 Revolution in which Belgium seceded from the Netherlands.
Lectures on the Philosophy of World History (1830)	Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel	The unfolding of history, in particular in the history of freedom; to understand world history as 'a rational process'. World history is a theatre and so is nature (although one of 'secondary importance'). ³⁸ Life is a spectacle of misery; man's downfall is	History	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and	Objectification Detachment The possibility of history	Externalised: philosopher/historian - a disinterested

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	(1770-1831) German philosopher	the work of both nature and human will', ³⁹ which the spectator observes in retrospect. A spectator is 'a wholly disinterested person, at leisure to entertain such thoughts and ethical judgments as it likes'. ⁴⁰ The philosopher of history witnesses 'a vast spectacle of events and actions, of infinitely varied constellations of nations, states, and individuals, in restless succession ... we see elements of ourselves in everything, so that our sympathies constantly oscillate from one side to the other.' ⁴¹ Although the spectator looks at individuals in history, with "profound pity for [their] untold miseries", ⁴² they can 'grow weary of particulars' in this 'theatre of world history' and ask themselves 'to what end they all contribute'. ⁴³ However, to discern the direction of history, the spectator must watch the dialectic unfold not impose it upon the world. ⁴⁴ 'Providence reveals itself ... in world history'. This is what concerns the philosopher of history. ⁴⁵ Although Hegel did not tie his conclusion to theatre, as Edmund Burke does, he too saw the French Revolution in terms of the way 'absolute freedom' (Burke's idea of theatre having no limits) was connected to terror. This is most clearly discussed in 'Absolute Freedom and Terror', in the Phenomenology , pp. 355-363. Absolute freedom is abstract freedom, which means it can be read as 'I see all things as existing for my benefit', i.e. a 'refusal of limitation and determination' which results in 'only negative action ... the fury of destruction'. ⁴⁶ Hegel nevertheless called the Revolution a 'glorious mental dawn' because, for the first time, the principle of freedom was laid down as a universal principle (Hegel was an 'inveterate theatre-goer and a connoisseur of acting', who particularly enjoyed the plays of Molière. ⁴⁷		spectator	Revelation Understanding Pity Disinterest Functionalist Fatalism	and intelligent observer Showing/Watching (+)
Danton's Death (1835)	Georg Büchner (1813-1837)	Men are powerless to change anything; Life is determined by chance. Revolution is theatre. Danton's Death is a pseudo-historical drama centring around one of the radical leaders of the	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art	Futility of human action Fatalism	External: The Goddess of Chance

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	German revolutionary activist and playwright	French Revolution, Georges Danton. Büchner saw the French Revolution as a typical drama in which power changes hands, but nothing is really accomplished. He believed that life was also like this: 'we are merely actors having no real control over our destinies'. ⁴⁸ Life was a play. The Goddess of Chance (Fortuna) determines how it will work out. We just enter, perform and then quit the stage as required: 'As long as they can walk offstage nimbly and can make nice gestures and hear the audience clap as they exit. That's very proper and suits us well – we're always on stage, even if we're finally stabbed to death in earnest (Danton's Death 11.1)... We are puppets, our strings are pulled by unknown forces, ourselves are nothing, nothing!' (11.5). ⁴⁹				Externalised: dramatist Doing (-)
'How the taste for physical gratifications is united in America to love of freedom and attention to public affairs' Democracy in America (Chapter XIV) (1835); Recollections (1893)	Alexis de Tocqueville (1805-1859) French political and social theorist	The dangers inherent in political (democratic) life. 'When the bulk of the community are engrossed by private concerns, the smallest parties need not despair of getting the upper hand in public affairs. At such times it is not rare to see on the great stage of the world, as we see in our theatres, a multitude represented by a few players , who alone speak in the name of an absent or inattentive crowd: they alone are in action, while all others are stationary; they regulate everything by their own caprice; they change the laws and tyrannize at will over the manners of the country; and then men wonder to see into how small a number of weak and worthless hands a great people may fall'. ⁵⁰ Distinction between action and inattention . Democracy requires the attention of the spectator. Tocqueville wrote in his Recollections of the 1848 Revolution: 'The whole time I had the feeling that we had staged a play about the French Revolution, rather than that we were continuing it ... Though I foresaw the terrible end to the piece well enough, I could not take the actors very seriously; the whole thing seemed a vile tragedy played by a provincial troupe'. ⁵¹	Political life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance, detachment of spectators allowing the possibility of tyranny by the few; The possibility of deception	Externalised: critic whose task it is task is to warn the inattentive crowd that power can be taken from them and put into the hands of the few who act. Internal: the crowd (which is inattentive) Doing/ Watching (-)
The French	Thomas	The denial of sympathy produces distance in the critic, which	Historical	A seeing-place	Objectification	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Revolution (1837); 'The Diamond Necklace' (1837); Past and Present (1843); Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches (1845)	Carlyle (1795-1882) British historian	allows judgment – but this also produces a sense of theatricality Carlyle invented the word 'theatricality' to explain circumstances arising during the French Revolution. ⁵² There is some debate about what he meant by this. Davis sees it as connected to sympathy. However, it seems to be connected to the act of seeing i.e. theatre in its widest sense. However, Carlyle was an inveterate user of theatre as a metaphor. He divided the narrative in the 'Diamond Necklace' into 'scenes and "behind the scenes" interludes' and cast himself as stage manager cuing effects and the entry of characters. He invoked the theatre metaphor to bring out the duplicity of characters. In Oliver Cromwell's Letters , he 'added stage directions ("Oliver's voice somewhat rising") and audience reactions ("Hear, hear!") to the text of Cromwell's speeches'. Past and Present utilized a number of performance effects, including tableaux vivants. ⁵³	events	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility: to bring history to life for his readers; Detachment: Disinterest The denial of sympathy which allows events to be described.	unsympathetic critic; Internal: audience member Internalized: writer as stage manager Showing/ Watching (+)
1840's: audiences in Cuban theatre are prohibited 'from calling out any actor or actress, or for repetition of any piece, under penalties of fifteen days in prison'. Whitman felt this was a breach of an audience's 'inalienable rights' to actively participate in a performance. Such participation encouraged the best in the performer. ⁵⁴ 1848-1866: Italian Independence Wars 1848: Hungarian Revolt
Journal (1840); A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (1849)	Henry Thoreau (1817-1862) American Writer	'We are continually acting a part in a more interesting drama than any written'; ⁵⁵ 'The world is a fit theatre today in which any part may be acted'. ⁵⁶	Social life	An acting space	Perspective allowing freedom	Internal: we are all on the stage of the world Externalised: writer Doing (-)
'The Philosophy of Composition' (1846)	Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849) American writer and critic	The craft of writing and the process of composition were like that of an actor or stage manager and their equipment, 'made up of wheels and pinions [and] tackle for scene-shifting'. Poe structured his novels in scenes or acts. ⁵⁷	Intellectual life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Internal: the writer composing his work Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1847: Swiss civil war 1848: Revolutions in Paris, Milan, Naples, Venice, Rome, Berlin, Vienna, Prague, Budapest, Tipperary, Brazil and Sicily: ‘the year of revolution’. Potato famine in Ireland. 1850’s: amateur theatricals became ‘a vogue’ in American middle-class homes, and manuals such as Tony Denier’s Amateur’s Handbook and Guide to Home or Drawing-Room Theatricals (1866) and O.A. Roorbach’s Practical Guide to Amateur Theatricals (1881) began to appear to help turn the family into ‘the primary theater of private life’. ⁵⁸
Histoire de la Révolution française (1847)	Jules Michelet (1798-1874) French historian	Michelet used the theatre metaphor ‘to depict the relation between revolutionary orators and the crowds to whom they spoke.’ ⁵⁹ ‘I have seen that these brilliant, powerful speakers, who gave voice to the thinking of the masses, are wrongly considered to be the only actors. They responded to impulse much more than they imparted it. The leading actor was the people. In order to rediscover it and to restore it to its role, I have had to cut down to size the ambitious marionettes whose strings it pulled, and who were believed to show the secret workings of history’. ⁶⁰ In other words, power and influence moved between ‘the people’ and its leaders. ‘What is theatre? [It is] the abdication of the actual person, and his interests, in favour of a more advantageous role’. ⁶¹	Historical events	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Perspective The relationship between actors and spectators	Externalised: historian Doing/ Watching (+/-)
The Roll Call of the Last Victims (1850) ⁶²	Charles-Louis Muller (1815-1892) Artist	Theatre was a microcosm of the world. A painting depicting the last days in the French Conciergerie. It is structured as ‘a microcosm’ of the theatricality of the revolution, of politics as theatre, within a world as theatre. Its action is dramatic, and it contains within the play of the roll call, references to a morbid ‘rehearsal’ enacted by royalist prisoners (the ‘straw-bottomed chair’) to help them face death nobly. ⁶³	Social and political life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised: artist; Internal: viewers of the painting Doing/ Showing (+/-)
White-Jacket, or The World in a Man-of-War (1850)	Herman Melville (1819-1891) American writer	‘[I]f ever there was a continual theatre in the world, playing by night and day, and without intervals between the acts, a man-of-war is that theatre, and her planks are the boards indeed’. ⁶⁴	Life in a confined space	An acting space	Action	Internal: writer Externalised: readers Doing (-)
Comment	Dion	Boucicault described New York on his arrival as ‘not a city. It	Social and	A constructed art	Strategies of	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Boucicault (c1820-1890) French Dramatist	was a theatre. It was a huge fair. Bunting of all nationalities and of no nationality was flaunting over the streets'. ⁶⁵	political life		presentation	visitor Showing (+/-)
The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte 1852	Karl Marx (1818-1883) German political philosopher	Politics uses stagecraft for persuasion and impression management. Life is theatre; politics is theatre. '[A]ll great, world-historical facts and personages occur ... twice ... the first time as tragedy, the second as farce'. Louis Bonaparte was a 'caricature' of his uncle. When men make their history they borrow the costumes of the past. The February Revolution was a 'drama' on 'the political stage'. ⁶⁶ According to Jessop, Marx also explores the use of language and the 'effectivity of political action on the political stage' in terms of the theatre metaphor. Politics, for Marx, was theatrical both metaphorically and because of the self-consciousness of political actors 'as they sought to persuade and impress their audience by adopting character masks and robes from the historical past and/or from a dramatic repertoire': ⁶⁷ 'they anxiously conjure up the spirits of the past to their service and borrow from them names, battle slogans and costumes in order to present the new scene of world history in this time-honoured disguise and this borrowed language'. All revolutionaries did this: Luther, Cromwell, the 1789 Revolution. ⁶⁸	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance; strategies of presentation	Internal: followers; the 'fairly competent observer' (598); Externalised: theorists Internalised: self-conscious actors Doing (-)
1854-5: Crimean War. 1857: Indian mutiny. 1861-1865 American Civil War 1865 Uprising in Poland. 1864 Danish/German War 1866 Austro/Prussian War
The English Constitution (1867)	Walter Bagehot (1826-1877) English businessman, essayist and journalist	Spectacle plays a part in the maintenance of order. Theatre is valuable to the 'dignified' part of politics; it is evident in rituals, ceremonies and festivals; it has a 'psychological' effect which enables the 'educated ten thousand' to govern the masses by integrating them into a social unity. ⁶⁹ 'The elements which excite the most easy reverence will be the theatrical elements – those which appeal to the senses, which claim to be the embodiments of the greatest human ideas, which boast in some cases of far	Political life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation leading to social cohesion and acceptance of rule	Externalised: simple people who need to be integrated into the political order; Internal: the more than human origin ... that which is brilliant to the eye'. ⁷⁰				superior spectator who can see this Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'Memoranda'; various writings (1855-1891-2); Leaves of Grass ; 'Election Day, November 1884'; Democratic Vistas	Walt Whitman (1819-1892) American poet, critic and writer	Whitman used theatre as a metaphor extensively throughout his writings. Politics, like theatre, occurs in a public place of social interaction in which performers and spectators achieve a sense of collectivity. Towards the end of his life he imagined himself 'as an actor making his way to the flies, or exit door of "earth's stage" and nostalgically recall[ed] his life "out in the brilliancy of the footlights"'. He enjoyed being a spectator of 'the show' of life, and, even in the theatre, 'always scann'd an audience as rigidly as a play'. ⁷¹ He saw theatre as a metaphor for American democratic life, a way of overcoming the tension between individualism and collectivity: 'If I should need to name, O Western World, your powerfulest scene and show I'd name ... America's choosing day'. ⁷² Unfortunately this conception of democracy was based on the exclusion of much of the population – not just women but also the more refined, for it was based on the popular theatre of the 1830's (at the Bowery) where the audience was almost exclusively male. The interaction he sought was the 'electric force and muscle' generated 'from perhaps 2000 full-sinew'd men'. ⁷³ In theatre as in political life there was tension between 'critical detachment, the responsibility of the individual to make political and moral judgements, and a desire for complete, almost ecstatic, immersion in experience'. ⁷⁴ and 'what is more dramatic than the spectacle we have seen repeated, and doubtless long shall see – the popular judgement taking the successful candidates on trial in the offices and standing off, as it were, and observing them and their doings for a while, and always giving, finally, the fit, exactly due reward'. ⁷⁵ The key to such an involvement was sympathy : 'A man is only interested in	Politic life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility; a focusing device enabling social integration, which enables the overcoming of the tension between individualism and collectivity; Judgment	Externalised: critic Internal: absorbed spectators who judge the performers Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		anything when he identifies himself with it'. Sympathy was 'the proper mode of audience response' in both theatre and politics because it 'called out' the best in the performer. Whitman was active in the Democratic Party during the 1840's and was elected to the position of secretary of the General Committee of Queens County for two years.
Culture and Anarchy (1869)	Matthew Arnold (1822-1888) English poet and Cultural critic; inspector of schools	Society is where the drama of human perfection unrolls, aided by culture, which provides perspective. Arnold wished to 'recommend culture as the great help' towards human perfection, towards the development of 'all sides of our humanity; and ... all parts of our society' within 'the framework of society, that [sacred] theatre on which this august drama has to unroll itself'. ⁷⁶ Culture 'directs our attention to the natural current there is in human affairs, and its continual working, and will not let us rivet our faith upon any one man, and his doings. It makes us see, not only his good side, but also how much in him was of necessity limited and transient'. ⁷⁷ Arnold was concerned with the possibility of anarchy. He believed culture provided that means of maintaining order and propelling human progress.	Social life	A seeing-place A constructed art	Perspective	Internal: ordinary citizen Externalised: educator Doing (+)
A Fragment on MacIntosh (1870)	James Mill (1773-1836) Scottish Utilitarian philosopher	Men deluded themselves and others regarding the importance of human life. Mill took Mandeville's side against an attack by MacIntosh. In recognizing the primary object of The Fable to rouse men, he also drew on the theatre metaphor: 'to expose the mummery of the world and the affectations of those who laid traps for praise by singing eulogies on the dignity of human nature'. ⁷⁸	Social and political life	A constructed art	Deception Persuasion A false sense of man's place in the world	Internal: deluded masses Externalised: critic Doing/ Showing (-)
1870-1871: Franco-Prussian War
'The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music' (1872);	Friedrich Nietzsche (1844-1900) German	Life was senseless and purposeless; cultural activity such as drama disguises this. Life was play (and therefore senseless). The creation of drama (and the externalisation of the spectator) helps overcome this and allows us to experience catharsis. 'The world,	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and	Objectification Role-models Self-awareness (which is	Externalised: spectator; philosopher Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Beyond Good and Evil (1886); The Gay Science (1887).	romantic philosopher	ungoverned by purpose, was eternal, senseless play'. However, the spectator could not be within the play. The spectator as a concept only exists in a position of externality, as a 'separate' concept. The whole point of drama, to overcome the gap between man and man, is lost if the spectator is part of the drama, as is the cathartic effect which arises as a result of the overcoming of this gap. ⁷⁹ To enter into the drama as the creation of universalised vision overcomes the separation between player and spectator, thereby destroying the spectator as well as the purpose of drama. In any case, masks were essential to civil life: 'Every profound spirit needs a mask'. ⁸⁰ Nietzsche also used the metaphor in a less profound sense in The Gay Science : 'the care to make a living still compels almost all male Europeans to adopt a particular role, their so-called occupation ... almost all ... confound themselves with their role; they become the victims of their own "good performance" ... whenever a human being begins to discover how he is playing a role and how he can be an actor, he becomes an actor'. Individuals sometimes mistook their 'roles' for reality, taken in by how well they performed them. They then become self-conscious and reflexive i.e. actors. This, however, is a bad thing because it means men have lost faith in the value of man, and, as actors, are incapable of making plans for the distant future: 'to that end he must be solid , first of all, a 'stone' – and above all not an actor!'. ⁸¹ Despite his normal affirmation of actors and artists, Nietzsche seemed to see such "good performances" as a kind of 'reactive nihilism'. ⁸²		spectator	disabling because it prevents forward planning)	theatre-goers; Internalised: deluded actors who mistook their roles for themselves locking them into an eternal present Doing/ Watching (+/-)
1871: Paris Commune
Celebrated Speeches of Chatham, Burke and Erskine ... (1880) ⁸³	Members of the Philadelphia Bar	Politics is 'a conspicuous theatre' in which oratory is 'aiming at noble ends and laboring for immortality'. Celebrated speeches should therefore be performed with some sense of their occasion rather than just read as literature.	Political life	An acting space	Strategies of performance	Externalised: readers of historical political speeches

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
						Doing (+)
Introduction to the Social Sciences (1883)	Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911) German philosopher, psychologist, aesthetician and literary critic	How meaning can be established and understanding of others be achieved in the face of the opaqueness of mental states and activity. We understand the meaning of a human expression through the technique or methodology of verstehen . This involves a ‘re-living’ of the mental states of others by inferring by analogy and on the basis of our own experiences (a kind of empathy). Expressions can be located in an objective framework of human meaning ‘to which context, language, and cultural climate all contribute’. By this means, expressions, although never completely or finally fixed, can be objects of study which can provide insight into the meaning of acts to the agents who perform them. ⁸⁴ Dilthey’s work foreshadowed the sociology of art and music, developing ideas on the social study of music in The Musical Understanding (1927). He argues that ‘the real understanding of a particular nation’s life’ did not lie in concepts such as ‘spirit’ or ‘soul’ but in the analysis of its ‘rhetoric, logic, aesthetics, ethics, jurisprudence, political theory and music’. ⁸⁵ Hence, his work represents ‘the first thoroughgoing and sophisticated confrontation of history with positivism and natural science’. ⁸⁶	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Rehearsal Subjectification Cultural products for investigation; Affect, and therefore empathy, which provides us with clues to the mental states of others	Internal: spectators Externalised: ‘impartial’ or ‘scientific’ observer Doing (+)
The Golden Bough (1890)	James G. Frazer (1854-1941) Anthropologist	Drama is valuable to social integration: ‘men must have sacred drama if social integration is to be preserved’ (Baxandall 1969: 58), hence religion is functional.	Social life	An acting space	Social integration	Externalised: anthropologist Doing (+)
The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891); ‘The Soul of Man Under Socialism’	Oscar Wilde (1854-1900) English writer, playwright, poet and	We live in a world of surfaces in full view of others. The self is constructed through one’s performances, through artifice. ‘It is only shallow people who do not judge by appearances. The true mystery of the world is the visible, not the invisible’ (Wilde c1965/1891: 158-9). Life, according to Wilde, was ‘a world of surfaces, rather than depths; one lives in the performance of the	The human condition	A constructed art	Visibility: Strategies of performance Civility: self-awareness; Knowledge of	Internal: one lives in a world of appearance; therefore one is always

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1891)	essayist	moment, and life is the set of one's performances, a stage one can never quit' and one's first duty is 'to be as artificial as possible' (Jervis 1998: 16). '[T]he only thing that one really knows about human life is that it changes ... Truth is entirely and absolutely a matter of style'. ⁸⁷			others	both spectator and performer Doing/ Showing (+)
'Life and Letters' (1895) ⁸⁸	William Dean Howells (1837-1920) American novelist and essayist	Reading a book is like going to the theatre (perhaps better): 'The novelist sets up his stage here or there, and then plays the whole piece through before the reader, taking the part now of one character and now of another in the dramatic moments, and now of the chorus in the narrative and comment ... and the audience of the portable theatre enjoys privileges impossible in the stationary theatre. The witness of the dramatic action of the novel may go away and return when he likes ... he can retrace his steps in it for verification of his impressions, or advance with it to the end at such a pace as he pleases'. ⁸⁹	Cultural life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction leading to Pleasure Control	Internal: reader Watching (+/-)

¹ Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press.: x

² Lafayette 1981, Lafayette in the Age of the American Revolution: Selected Letters and Papers, 1776-1790, S.J. Idzerda et al (eds), Vol 4., April 1, 1781-Dec 23, 1781, Ithaca, NY, Cornell University Press, p. 422; in Richards 1991: 262.

³ MacKinnon 2005; also quoted in Richards 1991: 262.

⁴ In Blumenberg, Hans. 1997/1979. Shipwreck with Spectator: Paradigm of a Metaphor for Existence. Translated by S. Rendall. Cambridge Mass. and London: The MIT Press.: 46-53

⁵ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70.p. 58

⁶ Arendt, Hannah. 1978/1971. The Life of the Mind. San Diego, New York, London: A Harvest Book, Harcourt Brace and Company: 97

⁷ von Rosador, Kurt Tetzeli. 1988. 'Metaphorical Representations of the French Revolution in Victorian Fiction'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 43 (1) pp. 1-23.p. 2

⁸ Schilling, Bernard. 1943. 'The English Case Against Voltaire: 1789-1800'. Journal of the History of Ideas 4 (2) pp. 193-216.pp. 200-213

⁹ William Jones 1800, 'Not to Voltaire Dissected', in The Scholar Armed, Second Edition, London, I.I, p. 286; quoted in Schilling 1943: 213.

¹⁰ Schilling 1943: 214

¹¹ Arendt 1971: 95

¹² Cited in Arendt 1971: 95

-
- ¹³ Arendt 1971: 95-6
- ¹⁴ Melvin, Peter. 1975. 'Burke on Theatricality and Revolution'. Journal of the History of Ideas 36 (3) pp. 447-468.p. 448
- ¹⁵ Fussell, Paul. 1965. The Rhetorical World of Augustan Humanism: Ethics and Imagery from Swift to Burke. Oxford: Clarendon Press.p. 232
- ¹⁶ Although see Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury.
- ¹⁷ Boulton, James T. 1963. The Language of Politics in the Age of Wilkes and Burke. London and Toronto: Routledge and Kegan Paul.p. 143-44
- ¹⁸ Burke, Edmund. 1808. 'Reflections on the French Revolution'. In The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, Volume V. London: Printed for F.C. and J. Rivington.p. 123-146
- ¹⁹ Burke, Edmund. 1808/1757. 'A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, with An Introductory Discourse concerning Taste, and several other additions'. In The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke. London: Law and Gilbert, for F.C. & J. Rivington, pp. 81-322.
- ²⁰ Hindson and Gray 1988
- ²¹ Paine, Thomas. 1961/1791-2. 'The Rights of Man'. In Reflections on the Revolution in France and The Rights of Man: Edmund Burke and Thomas Paine. Garden City, New York: Dolphin Books, Doubleday and Company, pp. 267-515.p. 296-418
- ²² Butwin, Joseph. 1975. 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi'. Research Studies 43 (3) pp. 141-152.p. 148
- ²³ Marat 1792 in Butwin 1975: 148
- ²⁴ Robespierre, Maximilien. 2004/1792. 'Prospectus for "Le Défenseur de la Constitution"'. Creative Commons (Attribute and Share Alike) marxists.org <http://www.marxists.org/history/france/revolution/robespierre/1792/defence.htm> accessed 28 May 2007.
- ²⁵ Robespierre, Maximilien. 2004/1791. 'On the King's Flight; Speech given at the Jacobin Club, June 22, 1791'. Creative Commons (Attribute and Share Alike) marxists.org <http://www.marxists.org/history/france/revolution/robespierre> accessed 28 May 2007 (trans: M.Abidor).
- ²⁶ This is a period when theatre was still primarily considered to be a place, although it had also begun to take on the connotations of the activities which were undertaken in that place.
- ²⁷ Robespierre 2004/1792
- ²⁸ Robespierre, Maximilien. 1988/1793. 'For the Defense of the Committee of Public Safety'. In Discours et rapports à la Convention. Paris: Union Générale d'Éditions; republished by Creative Commons (Attribute and Share Alike) marxists.org 2004, <http://www.marxists.org/history/france/revolution/robespierre> accessed 28/5/2007.
- ²⁹ Butwin 1975: 151
- ³⁰ Robespierre at the opening of the Salle de Spectacles at Tuileries in 1793 in Butwin 1975: 144
- ³¹ McNeil, Gordon H. 1945. 'The Cult of Rousseau and the French Revolution'. Journal of the History of Ideas 6 (2) pp. 197-212.
- ³² Mme de Staël 1871/1810, 'Of the Dramatic Art' in Germany, translation anonymous, NY, Hurd and Houghton; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.pp. 265-267, p. 267.
- ³³ Gerould 2000: 263
- ³⁴ Schopenhauer 1816 in Blumenberg 1997: 64
- ³⁵ Schopenhauer 1970, Essays and Aphorisms, R.J. Hollingdale (trans.), London, Penguin Books, pp. 80-88, p. 81.
- ³⁶ Blumenberg 1997: 61
- ³⁷ Honderich, Ted, ed. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.p. 951
- ³⁸ Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. 1975/1830. Lectures on the Philosophy of World History. Translated by H. B. Nisbet. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p. 27-38

-
- ³⁹ Blumenberg 1997: 53
- ⁴⁰ Hegel 1920/1835, The Philosophy of Fine Art, Vol IV, trans. F.P.B. Osmaston, London, G. Bell and Sons; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 316-326, p. 316.
- ⁴¹ Hegel World History 1975/1830: 31-2
- ⁴² Blumenberg 1997: 53
- ⁴³ Hegel World History 1975/1830: 33-7
- ⁴⁴ Forbes 1975: xiii. The dialectic was a means of achieving insight and understanding (Forbes, Duncan. 1975. 'Introduction'. In Hegel: Lectures on the Philosophy of World History: Cambridge University Press, pp. vii-xxxv.p. xxx).
- ⁴⁵ Hegel World History 1975/1830: 37.
- ⁴⁶ Hegel, Phenomenology p. 589 in Mason, Andrew. 1998. 'Hegel on the French Revolution and the Modern State'. In PHIL254: Philosophical Problems of Modernity. Sydney: Macquarie University.
- ⁴⁷ Gerould 2000: 314-5.
- ⁴⁸ Rarick, Jennifer. 1999. 'Revolution as Theatre'. In Fresh Writing. <http://www.nd.edu/~frswrite/snite/1999/Rarick.shtml> accessed 28 May 2007.
- ⁴⁹ Buchner 1988, Danton's Death, trans. Henry Schmidt, New York, Continuum Publishing Company; quoted in Rarick 1999.
- ⁵⁰ de Tocqueville, Alexis. 1945/1835-40. Democracy in America. New York: Knopf.pp. 148-151
- ⁵¹ Tocqueville Recollections 1970/1893: 53 in Mount, Ferdinand. 1972. The Theatre of Politics. 5 Winsley St., London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson.p. 4
- ⁵² Davis, Tracy C. 2003. 'Theatricality and civil society'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 127-155.p. 127
- ⁵³ Schoch, Richard W. 1999. "'We Do Nothing but Enact History": Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 54 (1) pp. 27-52.pp. 32-37
- ⁵⁴ Whitman in Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press.p. 83
- ⁵⁵ Thoreau A Week in Ackerman 1999; frontispiece
- ⁵⁶ Thoreau Journal in Ackerman 1999: xv
- ⁵⁷ Ackerman 1999: 39
- ⁵⁸ Michelle Perrot (ed) 1990, A History of Private Life IV: From the Fires of Revolution to the Great War, trans. A. Goldhammer, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, p. 97; cited in Ackerman 1999: 155-6.
- ⁵⁹ Maslan, Susan. 2005. Revolutionary Acts: Theatre, Democracy, and the French Revolution. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press.p.75
- ⁶⁰ Michelet Histoire 1847 in Maslan 2005: 75
- ⁶¹ Michelet Histoire 1847 in Hallward, Peter. 2006. 'Staging Equality'. New Left Review 37 (January-February).
- ⁶² The painting is on display at the Museum of the French Revolution, Vizille. Nine other versions of the painting exist. One is held in the Snite Museum of Art, Notre Dame University, IN, USA, five others are held elsewhere in the United States, and three in France.
- ⁶³ Rarick 1999
- ⁶⁴ Melville White Jacket 1850, in Ackerman 1999: 93
- ⁶⁵ In Ackerman 1999: xiv

-
- ⁶⁶ Marx, Karl. 1978/1852. 'The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte'. In The Marx-Engels Reader, edited by R. C. Tucker. New York and London: W.W. Norton & Company, 594-617.
- ⁶⁷ Jessop, Bob. 2003. The Political Scene and the Politics of Representation: Periodizing Class Struggle and the State in The Eighteenth Brumaire Department of Sociology, Lancaster University, www.comp.lancs.ac.uk/sociology/papers/Jessop-Political-Scene.pdf, 2002 [cited December 2003].
- ⁶⁸ Marx 1978/1852: 595-6
- ⁶⁹ Shils, Edward, and Michael Young. 1976. 'The Meaning of the Coronation'. In Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 302-315.p. 302-309
- ⁷⁰ Bagehot, Walter. 1872/1867. The English Constitution. 65 Cornhill, London: Henry S. King and Co.p. 8
- ⁷¹ Ackerman 1999: 42-83
- ⁷² Whitman, Walt. 2008/1884. 'Election Day, November, 1884'. In Leaves of Grass, edited by E. Folsom and K. Price. www.whitmanarchive.org/published/LG/1891/poems/329 accessed 29/05/2008: The Walt Whitman Archive.
- ⁷³ Whitman November Boughs in Ackerman 1999: 82
- ⁷⁴ Ackerman 1999: 84
- ⁷⁵ Whitman Democratic Vistas; also quoted in Ackerman 1999: 82-3
- ⁷⁶ Arnold 1869: xi; 157-158; in Williams, Raymond. 1958. Culture and Society, 1780-1950. London: Chatto and Windus.pp.115, 124.
- ⁷⁷ Arnold 1869: 28; 157-158; in Williams 1958, 129.
- ⁷⁸ James Mill 1870, A Fragment on MacIntosh, pp. 59-60; quoted in Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p. 242.
- ⁷⁹ Nietzsche 1872, 'The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music', in Ecce Homo and The Birth of Tragedy, trans. Clifton P. Fadiman, N.Y., The Modern Library, 1927; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 339-350.
- ⁸⁰ Nietzsche, Friedrich. 1966/1886. Beyond Good and Evil: Vintage.p. 51
- ⁸¹ Nietzsche, Friedrich. 1974/1887. The Gay Science. Translated by W. Kaufmann. New York: Vintage Books.p. 302-3
- ⁸² McKenzie, Jon. 2001. Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance. London, New York: Routledge.p. 258
- ⁸³ The full title of the book is: Celebrated Speeches of Chatham, Burke, and Erskine, to which is added the argument of Mr Mackintosh in the case of Peltier, selected by a member of the Philadelphia Bar, published in Claxton by Remson and Hoffelfinger. It is reproduced in electronic form by the Making of Modern Law project, Philadelphia. Quote is from the Preface, p. vi.
- ⁸⁴ Blackburn, Simon. 1994. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.p.106
- ⁸⁵ Etzkorn, K. Peter. 1973. 'Introduction'. In Music and Society: the Later Writings of Paul Honigsheim, edited by K. P. Etzkorn. New York and London: John Wiley and Sons.p. 3-5
- ⁸⁶ Hughes, H. Stewart. 1958. Consciousness and Society: The Reorientation of European Social Thought, 1890-1930, New York: Random House, Vintage Books.p. 194
- ⁸⁷ Wilde, 1891, 'The Soul of Man Under Socialism', first published in the Pall Mall Gazette; quoted in Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.p.16.
- ⁸⁸ Published in Harper's Weekly 39, 11 May 1895; quoted in Ackerman 1999: 224n8.
- ⁸⁹ Howells 1895: 436 in Ackerman 1999: 10

Table 7/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator: 1901-1939

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
C20th: Life becomes performative and as a result, the metaphor takes on a more positive hue. Although the idea of humans playing roles persists, it changes its focus and takes on a new meaning, especially in America. Where role from the Renaissance to the C19th century generally had the sense of character, a conception with moral roots, in C20th it came to mean the performance of the self (as a role-player). Thus the emphasis shifted from a focus on behaviour to an ‘affirmation of the individual’ qua individual self. This shift was much more noticeable in America, where there arose a proliferation of popular self-help and etiquette books. In Europe, especially in France, there was a move from character to estrangement. The individual was seen as cast by fate into a particular role (rather than performing any number and variety of chosen roles), that of the ‘existentially alienated being’. Both forms of the metaphor depend, however, on detachment: ‘To be able to conceive of ourselves as moving from stage to stage, as existing not just within a play but outside of it, and therefore being able to enact different, often incommensurable scripts, we simultaneously need to hold an idea of existential detachment, a situational ethics, a middle-range definition of the social structure, and an ultimately relativistic perception of the world’.¹ Otherwise, being an ‘actor’ means to be a character who exists irretrievably within the play.² Note: After the 1920s the metaphor was increasingly taken up by the social sciences as a means of describing social life. The use of the theatre metaphor with its offshoots of dramaturgy, impression management and role theory, has since become so commonplace that an exhaustive review of its use is hardly possible. Dramaturgy in particular since the 1970s, ‘has become a most ubiquitous form of scholarship’.³ A search of just two politics databases (Academic Search Premier and Project Muse) on 20th August 2007 produced 1968 articles using ‘impression management’, 1,110 articles which combined ‘dramaturgy’ and ‘politics’, 5039 articles drawing on Erving Goffman and 1969 drawing on Kenneth Burke. A search of Google on ‘dramaturgical perspective’ produced 10,100 articles, and a search on ‘impression management’ produced 26,000. Brisset and Edgley’s ‘sourcebook’ for dramaturgy containing ‘A Comprehensive List’ of material which provided ‘a statement of the dramaturgical point of view’, entailed criticism of the perspective and/or utilized the perspective in a research setting, had 395 entries of which at least 130 were empirical studies.⁴ Hence the approach taken from the 1920s on combines the location of specific theorists who apply the metaphor in ways which could be considered to have political implications, with a form of serendipity or ‘found’ material. What is tabulated is what has come to hand in the course of the study, through the media, and through everyday sources. This approach serves to demonstrate the widespread use and broad application of the metaphor, especially in its formulation as Role Theory. Increasingly as the limits of this study are approached (early 2000s) the metaphor is associated with the mass media. To modern observers, politics appears to become more and more theatrical and performative because modern politics is so clearly and so generally mediated.
THE RISE OF THE PERFORMATIVE SELF
The Interpretation of Dreams (1900); Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (1905); ‘Psychopathic Characters on	Sigmund Freud (1856-1939) Austrian neurologist and psychologist	Freud used theatre as a metaphor for the unconscious, especially drawing on dramatic characters (e.g. Oedipus), to illustrate his theories in order to explain the human psyche and account for what he saw as disturbances in human behaviour. He could be said to represent precisely what the anti-realists were afraid of: the pushing of realism in theatre so far that it collapses into actual reality: Oedipus, for instance, ceases to exist as a character and instead becomes every man. The transition from stage to metaphor to reality is almost seamless, in effect destroying both theatre and reality through the positing of another reality (an	Psychic life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification which allows psychic dualism subjectification explicability self-control	Externalised: analyst Internalised: the egoistic self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
the Stage' (c1905); Beyond the Pleasure Principle (1920); 'On the History of the Psychoanalytic Movement'.		inner reality) for both. For Freud, drama provided a safe means of 'opening up sources of pleasure or enjoyment in our emotional life'. Direct enjoyment comes from identification with the hero, an identification which is free from all political, social, or sexual concerns. There is also an indirect masochistic satisfaction when this figure is defeated, without pain or risk to ourselves: 'Suffering of every kind is thus the subject-matter of drama'.⁵ The audience is 'compensated for its sympathy by the psychological satisfactions of psychical stimulation (provided the suffering is mental rather than physical). The suffering arises from 'an event involving conflict' which includes 'an effort of the will together with resistance'. Freud's view of drama, its history and its psychological effects, fed into his general theory of the psyche, and consequently psychological dramas such as Hamlet, were said to consist of a conflict between a conscious impulse and a repressed, unrecognized one, which could not be brought out into the open because only neurotic spectators would derive pleasure from it. However, in dreams '[n]o matter what impulses from the normally inhibited Ucs [unconscious] may prance upon the stage, we need feel no concern; they remain harmless, since they are unable to set in motion the motor apparatus by which alone they might modify the external world'.⁶ In seeking to describe the differences between Adlerian theory on the ego and his own, Freud remarks that Adler 'entirely overlooks the fact that upon countless occasions the ego merely makes a virtue out of necessity ... e.g. when it accepts anxiety as a means of securing something. The ego here plays the ludicrous role of the clown in the circus, who, by his gestures, tries to convince the audience that every change in the circus ring happens as a result of his orders. But only the youngest in the audience are taken in'.⁷ Theatricality, for Freud, lies in the 'attempt to create the appearance of being in control'.⁸ 'There is

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		for Freud a theatre of the mind, where ‘scenes’ are staged and observed, screens are erected and images flow through them, enactment occurs, and acting out may lead to a form of catharsis’ ⁹ or a modification of behaviour in front of others.
The Dramatic Actor and Reality (c1902); ‘The Ruin’ (1911)	Georg Simmel (1858-1918) German sociologist	Life is like theatre in some respects: understanding the art of the dramatic actor helps us to understand the organic nature of individual life: ‘each individual’s reality contains in itself a condensation of life, which determines its essence and includes in its development all those living realizations which surround it in organic interdependence’. ¹⁰ Architecture can also be seen in terms of theatre, an attempt to impose on nature. This can be seen in the ‘cosmic tragedy’ of a ruin which can be seen ‘as nature’s revenge for the spirit having violated it by making a form in its own image’. ¹¹ Thinking of life as theatre then helps us to conceive of a life as an organic whole. This enables us to place man in the world.	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification which allows a holistic view connections to be seen Determinism	Externalised: theorist Doing (+)
‘The Theatre of One Will’ (1908)	Fyodor Sologub (1863-1927) Russian symbolist poet ¹²	Sologub saw theatre as a means ‘to satisfy the human desire for deliverance from the “tight fetters of tedious and meagre life”’. It was a place of escape. To experience this, however, spectators had to submit to the will of the artist: ‘The drama is the work of a single conception’. The actor must become a marionette, ‘a transparent expression of the poet’s vision’, in which the spectator becomes inspired to participate ‘as a choric participant’ and through ‘the rhythmic frenzy of body and soul, plunging into the tragic element of music’. ¹³ Spectacle should be changed to be more mysterious and ritualistic. Drama would involve the author sitting and reading every word of the play, including stage directions, while the actors did exactly what the author said and no more – this ‘baring of the device’ would reveal the level of ‘unfreedom’ in people’s lives: ¹⁴ ‘as a poet, I create drama in order to recreate the world according to My new design. Just as My will alone rules in the world at large, so in the little circle of	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification which allows an experience of freedom through communion	Externalised: Director Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		the theatrical spectacle only one will should rule – the will of the poet’. This was the same as occurred in life: ‘Every common business is done according to the thought and plan of one [person]. Every parliament listens to the orator and does not make an ecumenical din, ecumenicizing in a merry ecumenical uproar ... And therefore the crowd - the spectators – can be joined to the tragedy by no other means than by extinguishing in themselves their old and trivial words. Only passively. The one who executes the action is always alone ’. It is by this means, by recognizing his aloneness and realising that the one who acts is always alone that a chance multitude is transformed mysteriously into a necessary unity . It reminds [us], that every individual existence on earth is only a means for Me - a means to exhaust in the infinity of the experiences of this place the countless multitude of My – and only My – possibilities, the sum total of which creates laws, but which itself moves freely’. ¹⁵ Such a theatre would then move beyond representation through to an actual experience of human alienation and powerlessness and finally to a sense of communion because the focus of the multitude is on the one who acts. Sologub, like Evreinov, recognized that ‘a desire for power and subjection lay at the heart of the artistic project as well as of politics’ but his ‘theater of one will’ would be a compensation for unfreedom and individual helplessness. ¹⁶
‘Illustrators, Actors and Translators’ (1908); Right You Are If You Think You Are (1916); ‘Theatre and	Luigi Pirandello (1867-1936) Italian playwright, founder of Teatro d’Arte (1925-1928)	Pirandello believed that all life was role-playing. There was no way out. The human condition was to ‘not merely live ... but also to see yourself living’. That was the agony of life: that there was no escape from play-acting. It was the human condition to ‘not merely live ... but also to see yourself living’. ¹⁷ There is no underlying truth. Playacting is the reality of human life. We are all role-players; we all watch ourselves and each other to see if our expectations have been met, to see if some-one cares enough	The human condition	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification which allows psychic dualism self-consciousness intersubjectivity an ethics of care for others	Internal: everyone watches everyone else Internalised: we watch ourselves as we play our

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Literature' (1918); 'The New Theatre and The Old' (1922); Each In His Own Way (1924)		or to show that we care. The dramatist is 'just a man who makes a work of art out of constructs which all of us put together inartistically'. ¹⁸ Role-playing, however, was not false or hypocritical. It was an ethics: it was right and 'most human' to take on the roles 'those one loves wishes one to play'. To refuse was a kind of 'false pride'. In fact, our roles provide us with comfort and stability in an uncertain world, but 'we cannot be them, we can only "enact" them' even though we sometimes confuse drama with life because of their likeness. Man was an actor and life was 'the game of role-playing'. ¹⁹ He called his plays 'naked masks'. ²⁰ 'In the theatre, a work of art is no longer the work of an author ... but an act of life realized on stage from one moment to the next'. ²¹ Pirandello's invocation of the metaphor was orthodox, drawing on the common sense understanding of theatre as a conventional place in which well-made plays involving identifiable roles were performed before spectators. This did not mean that his own plays were orthodox. On the contrary, they were complex workings out of the vexed nature of roles, our obligations to play them and the consequences of our success or failure to do so. They placed spectators on stage and actors in the audience and generally attempted to break up the theatrical frame.				roles Externalised: the dramatist who makes an art out of role-play Doing/ Showing (+/-)
1911 Russo-Persian War; 1911-12 Italy/Turkey War; 1912 First Balkan War 1913 Second Balkan War
'The Social Self' (1913) Mind, Self and Society from the Standpoint of Social Behaviorism (1927; 1962/1934)	George Herbert Mead (1863-1931) American Sociologist	Role Theory. Humans are self-conscious; they examine each other. Extended use of role in order to explore how human interaction occurs: self-conscious humans examine each other in terms of the diverse social roles they occupy, which enables them to bring themselves into alignment with their social group. This is because human consciousness is self-consciousness : 'Anything of which a human being is conscious is something which he is indicating to himself' including the actions of others. In 'indicating to themselves', humans construct 'objects' for	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification which allows psychic dualism and strategies of performance which facilitate social interaction	Internal: humans Internalised: self-conscious humans Externalised: theorist Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		themselves which they interpret as they go along. There is no conscious action which does not involve 'taking account of different things and interpreting their significance for ... prospective action'. It is 'a moving communicative process'. Human social behaviour arises from the way humans interpret and handle their constructed objects as they construct their conscious action and align it to the actions of others. Symbolic interaction thus provides an explanation of how human societies come to be 'composed of individuals who have selves'.²² Individuals develop these through role-play: 'in a game where a number of individuals are involved, then the child taking one role must be ready to take the role of everyone else... He must know what everyone else is going to do in order to carry out his own play. He has to take all of these roles. They do not all have to be present in consciousness at the same time, but at some moments he has to have three or four individuals present in his own attitude ... there is a set of responses of such others so organized that the attitude of one calls out the appropriate attitudes of the other.'²³ Mead considered the question 'What is involved in the self being an object? The first answer may be that an object involves a subject. Stated in other words, that a "me" is inconceivable without an "I"'.²⁴ The self comes to know itself by 'standing over with' or imagining the responses of others (an idea which comes from Adam Smith): 'The self which consciously stands over against other selves thus becomes an object, an other to himself, through the very fact that he hears himself talk, and replies'.²⁵ The reflexivity allows the self to change in response to new situations. Children use this strategy 'dramatically' – they see their 'other' in the guise of a parent for instance. Maturity allows this to become more abstract, although we still need some device to make concrete this other. Mead believed that in earlier times, 'the drama was a more effective but				Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		equally social mechanism of self-consciousness’ but now the novel was used. Nevertheless the ‘need of filling out the bare spokesman of abstract thought’ remains. ²⁶
Winds of Doctrine (1913); Soliloquies in England and Later Soliloquies (1922); Realms of Being (1937)	George Santayana (1863-1952) Spanish-American philosopher	Humans must perform theatrically in order to make their lives meaningful in the face of an ‘undramatic’ world. Against the pragmatists (such as Dewey), Santayana argued that humans were ‘condemned to live dramatically in a world that is not dramatic’ (Realms of Being). Realistic social life ‘outruns harmony’ therefore imaginative ways of living are necessary to well-being. Humans express themselves theatricality using ‘masks’ which ‘let people experience a solidarity with one another’. ²⁷ Masks are necessary to social life. Humanity cannot be divested of such imaginative conventions – they are what allow humans to live with panache . They help make life significant and enable humans to overcome their awareness that ‘existence is utterly contingent’ and that ‘intelligence [is an] experimental act’ (Winds of Doctrine). Humans therefore ‘perform in theatrical ways’ (Soliloquies). Watching each other perform generates solidarity . We recognize we are all in it together, even philosophers who pretend otherwise, however the ‘seriously playful performer’ is able to take a detached position momentarily.	The human condition	An acting space	Strategies of performance which enable social solidarity	Externalised: philosopher Internal: watching each other perform generates solidarity Doing/ Watching (+/-)
1914-1918: World War I. 1917: Revolution in Russia. 1918 Finnish Civil War 1919: Treaty of Versailles
The Russian Revolution (1917)	Leon (Lev) Trotsky (1879-1940) Bolshevik revolutionary and Marxist theorist	According to Baxandall, Trotsky was ‘the dramaturgical dynamo of the 1905 Revolution’, having produced ‘a strategic scenario’ outlining the steps to be taken: ‘Tear the workers away from the machines ... lead them through the factory gate ... direct them to neighbouring factories ... proclaim a stoppage ... carry new masses into the street’. ²⁸ His book on the 1917 Revolution was ‘a virtual promptbook of radical dramaturgy’: ²⁹ ‘the scripts for the roles of Romanov and Capet were prescribed by the general development of the historic drama; only the nuances of	Political life	A constructed art	Strategic action	Externalised: strategist Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		interpretation fell to the lot of the actors'. ³⁰ Revolutions could be stage managed like a drama. Theatre offered strategies of leadership.
Instructions of Summer 1917	Vladimir Lenin (1870-1924) Russian Marxist revolutionary	These instructions urged that insurrection 'must be treated as an art'. Lenin also believed that revolutions were the 'festivals of the oppressed'. ³¹	Revolution	An acting space A constructed art	Strategic action	Externalised: strategist Doing (+)
Prologue to Les mamelles de Tirésias (1917)	Guillaume Apollinaire (1880-1918) Polish/Italian Surrealist playwright	Theatre was a place of display 'to bring forth life itself in all its truth' but to do this the dramatist must avoid realism: 'His universe is his stage Within it he is the creating god Directing at his will'. ³²	The creative process	A seeing-place A constructed art	Revelation	Externalised: the playwright/director Showing (+)
Letter to Austen Chamberlain 26 May (1919) ³³	John Maynard Keynes (1883-1946) Philosopher and economic theorist	'How can you expect me to assist at this tragic farce any longer, seeking to lay the foundation, as a Frenchman puts it, 'd'une guerre juste et durable''. ³⁴ Keynes was representing the British government at treaty negotiations between France and Germany which he saw as hopeless. The metaphor indicates that he saw theatre as a place of experimentation with wild and impractical ideas which could have negative consequences.	Political life	An acting space	Irresponsibility	Externalised: critic Doing (-)
THE RISE OF IMPRESSION MANAGEMENT – an emphasis on Showing
Book of Etiquette (1922)	Lilliam Eichler (1902-?) Manners	Role Theory. A book of correct social behaviour which Arditì interprets under Role Theory: 'in behaviour a person should assume the form of a multiplicity of different people'. ³⁵ Social life involves the performance of different activities. Humans perform various activities in their lives. Etiquette helps them to know and do what is expected. This was 'the most popular etiquette book of the day'. ³⁶	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised: teacher Doing (+)
Etiquette: in Society, in	Emily Post (1873-1960)	Role Theory. How to Behave was a satire on modern social life. Life was a series of plays in which individuals performed aspects	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Internal Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Business, in Politics, and at Home (1922); How to Behave – Though a Debutante (1928)	American writer on etiquette	of personality. For a young girl to ‘attract a new beau, and ... keep the old ones in the stag line’ as well as ‘how to develop “IT”’, ³⁷ she needed to become ‘a different persona, each time enacting a different kind of play’. ³⁸ ‘To liken a charming young girl in the prettiest of frocks to a spider is not very courteous; and yet the role of spider is what she is forced by the exigencies of ballroom etiquette to play. She must catch a fly, meaning a trousered companion, so as not to be left in placarded disgrace’. ³⁹ A young man was said to be "devoted" to this young girl or that, but as a matter of fact each was acting a role, he of an admirer and she of a siren, and each was actually an utter stranger to the other. ⁴⁰			which allow purposeful social interaction Functionalism	educator Doing (+)
Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft 5 (Economy and Society) (1922)	Max Weber (1864-1920) German sociologist and philosopher	Actions have meaning in the eyes of agents. We can come to understand this meaning ‘from within’ (verstehen) through empathy. We then impute motives. Motives are social . They are ‘a complex of meaning, which appears to the actor himself or to the observer to be an adequate ground for his conduct’. ⁴¹ According to Garcia, Weber frequently drew his metaphors from the dramatic work of Goethe, especially his Iphigenia . Consequently, an underlying metaphor in much of his work. ⁴² while not the theatre metaphor per se , is drawn from theatre. The metaphor is that life is a tragic battle between good and evil, positive and negative forces. This metaphor is played out in almost all his work on religion and on politics.	Social and political life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification which allows empathy and the imputation of motives to others based on an understanding of our own motives	Internal: observers Watching (+)
Masterful Personality (1923)	Orison Swett Marden (1850-1924) American Motivational writer	Impression Management. Social life involves performance. Swett resolutely advocated ‘the usefulness of impression management’. ⁴³ Humans perform their personalities. Therefore impression management training could be useful in business and everyday life. Marden was associated with the New Thought Movement, a motivational program founded on positive thinking. He founded Success Magazine. ⁴⁴ Arditi considers that Marden and others such as Eichler, Carnegie and Emily Post mark the	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance	Internal: men are both actors and spectators for each other Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		beginning of a peculiarly American ‘cult of personality’ in which ‘the person becomes, literally, the performer’. ⁴⁵ ‘[W]e cannot afford to make a bad impression’. Efforts to manage the impression one makes ‘fixes the stage for victory’ and helps one ‘play a little worthier part in life’. ⁴⁶
The Philosophy of William James (1925)	William James (1842-1910) American philosopher and psychologist	Social performance is self creation. A person ‘has as many social selves as there are individuals who recognize him and carry an image of him in their mind’. ⁴⁷ We construct ourselves through performance the way an actor constructs a character: we are who others recognize us to be; we acknowledge others’ recognition.	The construction of the self	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance	Internal Doing (+)
1926: General Strike in Great Britain
‘Behind Our Masks’ (1926) ⁴⁸	Robert Park (1864-1944) American sociologist	‘It is probably no mere historical accident that the word person ... is a mask. It is ... a recognition of the fact that everyone is always and everywhere, more or less consciously, playing a rôle’. ⁴⁹ We all wear masks, which we come to think of as real: we come to see ourselves as who others recognize us to be. Park was a member of the Chicago School. He introduced Simmel into American sociology.	The construction of the self	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance which allow subjectification through recognition	Internal Doing/ Showing (+/-)
The Theater in Life (1927)	Nicolay Evreinov (1879-1953) Performer, historian, philosopher, psychologist, government official, teacher	Social and political life: we are both actors and spectators. We support each other through strategies of theatricality. ‘Everything is under the sign of the theater’ and ‘life is a continuous theatrical performance’. Even plants and animals ‘obey in their everyday behaviour the purely theatrical principle of ‘pretending to be different from that which one really is’ when a cat stalks a mouse or a plant or insect camouflages itself to fit into its environment. ‘Every time we approach a mirror, pose for a photograph or daydream ... we play actor and spectator at once’. ⁵⁰ It is part of the ‘will to see things differently’, the desire for transformation or change. ‘We should ... stage-manage our lives, recognize the joy and power of seeing this life as theatrical	Social and political life	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Intersubjectivity which allows security and a sense of control	Internal Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		expression and of assuming new roles to extend the range of our experience and our interaction with our fellow beings.⁵¹ Life is transformed into theatre by the gaze of the spectator. Confusion between the theatrical and the real is ‘psychologically therapeutic’.⁵² There is theatre or there is nothing: ‘If there are no certainties, no God, in the post-Nietzschean world, then we ought to be consciously, deliberately elaborating our illusions, creating theater in life, rather than leaving man naked in the name of murderous truth ... no matter how grim life is, one must look for and appreciate good theater because that’s all there is, and the abyss must be faced with laughter that derives from a recognition of absurdity because there is no other response’.⁵³ According to Lyman and Scott, Evreinov is said to have coined the term theatrocracy, or rule by theatre (although see Weber 2004 who takes the term from Plato). Evreinov’s treatise ‘contains the foundations for a new political sociology’.⁵⁴ The essence of government was theatre: ‘Examine any ... branch of human activity and you ... will see that kings, statesmen, politicians, warriors, bankers, business men, priests, doctors, all pay daily tributes to theatricality, all comply with the principles ruling on the stage’.⁵⁵ ‘The main thing for us is not to be ourselves. This is the theatrical imperative of our souls’.⁵⁶ Evreinov ‘pushes to the limits Aristotle’s claim that imitation is natural ... an inherent biological drive towards transformation and differentiation. All life ... is a ‘never ending show’.⁵⁷ Actor and spectator are complicit in this (as they are in Goffman): ‘There exists at the moment of theatrical perception a sort of silent agreement, a sort of tacitus consensus, between the spectator and the player whereby the former undertakes to assume a certain attitude, and not other, toward the ‘make believe’ of acting, while the latter undertakes to live up to this assumed attitude as best he can’.⁵⁸ It is naturalness which demands the most as a

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		performance because it demands ‘the unquestioning participation of both parties: the actor earnestly performs familiar conventions, and the audience agrees not to recognize their conventionality’ under the guidance of ‘an invisible ‘stage manager’ who directs the course of public life and ensures its smooth operation’. ⁵⁹ Openly rejecting these social conventions simply replaces them with another set of theatrical conventions. Theatre allows one to see things differently. To see things differently allows control - the spectator turns life into theatre which allows the ‘stage-management’ of life.
The Australian Constitution, Its Interpretation and Amendment , (1928).	William Arthur Holman (1871-1934) Politician	Nations are theatres in which a nation’s ‘spirit’ is displayed: ‘our immediate duty is by setting our own house in order, to maintain intact the last, and possibly, the greatest, theatre in which the law-abiding Anglo-Saxon spirit is to display itself’. ⁶⁰	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Display	Externalised: other nations Showing (+/-)
1929: Economic depression hits the west
The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, acting and Stagecraft (1929; 1930)	Sheldon Cheney (1886-1980) American supporter of ‘new stagecraft’; theatre critic and historian	Cheney uses the theatre metaphor to describe the conflicts over theory in the arts and theatre. Theorists ‘fighting each other: it’s a show in itself’. The dispute over form , for instance, he calls ‘the Professors’ Comedy’: ‘there has been a little comedy going on ever since Clive Bell took the centre of the stage to spread his thought about significant form’. ⁶¹	Intellectual life	An acting space	Objectification which allows perspective and critique	Externalised: critic Doing (-)
Counter-Statement (1931); A Grammar of Motives (1945); A Rhetoric of	Kenneth Burke (1897-1993) Literary and music theorist,	Dramatism. Rhetorician, analyst or theorist of attributed human motivation: ‘[w]hat is involved, when we say what people are doing and why they are doing it?’ ⁶⁴ We are ‘reading’ actions in ways which can be reduced to five principles , which Burke names with terms from drama (act, scene, agent, agency, purpose), since human action, like dramatic action, is symbolic or	Human motivation	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Objectification through framing which allows the imputation of motive	Externalised: theorist/analyst Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Motives (1950); Permanence and Change: An Anatomy of Purpose (1954); ‘On Human Behavior Considered “Dramatistically”’ (1954);⁶² ‘Literature as Equipment for Living’ (1957);⁶³ Language as Symbolic Action: Essays on Life, Literature, and Method (1966); ‘Dramatism’ (1968); Dramatism and Development (1972); The Philosophy of Literary Forms: Studies in Symbolic Action (1973)	critic, rhetorician and philosopher	rhetorical. Dramatism is often lumped in with Goffman under the dramaturgical perspective and read as the use of the theatre metaphor although Burke insists his use of drama (not theatre) is not metaphorical but literal:⁶⁵ ‘Human conduct, being in the realm of action and end ... is most directly discussible in dramatistic terms. Dramatistic terms are those that begin in theories of action rather than in theories of knowledge’.⁶⁶ Nevertheless, its focus was literature, specifically the literature of the theatre. Dramatism is ‘a method of analysis which asserts the reality of symbolic action as the defining activity of the human’. Mangham and Overington call it ‘a formal model with which to explore both action and explanation for action’,⁶⁷ yet this seems to lose some of the sense Burke meant and more or less relegates it to metaphor. Essentially, dramatism is a ‘context-dependent theory of interpretation’,⁶⁸ and therefore can be analysed as an artefact in order to disclose motive. We do this by looking for the inter-relationships between five principle questions or elements of the pentad (act, agent, agency, scene, purpose). Motive is a linguistic product of the tension between these elements.⁶⁹ Drama can be used literally as a form of analysis ‘[s]ince ‘symbolic action really is a kind of action empirically observable’, just like drama.’⁷⁰ There exists ‘a continuity between acting on the stage and in the world’ because ‘we live in symbols as well as by them’.⁷¹ Drama operates as a form of persuasion (rhetoric). Part of the requirements for this persuasion is that there should be consistency between the elements of the pentad. This consistency is constructed in drama, making it a kind of ‘ideal type’ against which we can measure the inconsistencies of real life situations, thereby teasing out a means of interpreting motivated action in life. For Burke, then, life was not theatre, as some of his adherents claim, but drama could help us understand life. (Burke insists his use of drama is not metaphoric; it relates to the

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		original meaning of drân , meaning ‘to do’: dramatism is a theory of action. It is dramatistic because, like drama, it has its roots in man’s aptitude for ‘symbolic action’ i.e. action which is empirically observable in the way drama is.
Music in London 1890-1894 (1932) ⁷²	George Bernard Shaw (1856-1950) English dramatist, director and drama critic (a ‘super spectator’) ⁷³	Shaw believed that one constructed a public persona through theatricality: ‘I have never pretended that G.B.S. was real: I have over and over again taken him to pieces before the audience to shew the trick of him’. ⁷⁴ ‘During the course of a long career, Shaw himself became the primary spectacle’.	⁷⁵ The construction of the self	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Internal Showing (+)
The Magnificent Comedy: Some Aspects of Public and Private Life in Paris from the Fall of Robespierre to the Coming of Bonaparte July 1794 to November 1799 (1932)	Meade Minnigerodé (1887-1967) American writer and historian	Historical events which seem to be enormously significant can be seen in retrospect to be less significant: ‘The history of the fall of Robespierre is not long: some scoundrels destroyed some scoundrels’ (Minnigerodé 1932: frontispiece). ⁷⁶ The whole thing played out like a comedy, complete with role reversals. Those who tried to play the heroic parts found themselves reduced to tragic fools at the end. The metaphor encapsulates a short period of history when life seemed to be upended as often occurred in comedy.	Political life	A constructed art	Perspective which allows reductionism	Externalised: historian Doing (-)
1933: Hitler takes power in Germany
Art as Experience (1934)	John Dewey (1859-1952) American	Human life is historical in nature: ‘Life is no uniform uninterrupted march or flow. It is a thing of histories, each with its own plot, its own inception and movement towards its close,	Human life	A constructed art	Structure	Externalised: historian Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	educationalist	each having its own particular movement ⁷⁷ which comes to completion.
Anschauungsformen in der deutschen Dichtung es 18. Jahrhunderts (1934)	August Langen German researcher of perception & visual culture Perception	‘Perception and imaginary activity take place on a small inner stage where the head itself acts as a magic lantern ... which allows only the perception of a reduced and highly framed visual field’ and produces ‘a chain of images’ which file past in the mind. ⁷⁸ The mind acts as a stage to aid perception.	Human Perception	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Focus, which allows perception	Internal Internalised Doing/ Watching (+)
The Study of Man (1936)	Ralph Linton (1893-1953) American Anthropology	Role Theory. Social interaction is enabled by people meeting expectations. The reciprocity in human life can be explained in terms of role: ‘It is obvious ... the more perfectly the members of any society are adjusted to their statuses and rôles the more smoothly the society will function.’ ⁷⁹	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance allow co-operation and are therefore functional	Externalised: anthropologist Doing (+)
How to Win Friends and Influence People (1936)	Dale Carnegie (1888-1955) American motivational writer	Role Theory. Arditi considers the book an ‘overt manual on role-playing’ as a means of achieving success, ⁸⁰ although Carnegie doesn’t appear to use the term. Nevertheless, self-awareness of oneself as a performer is a crucial part of the recipe for success. Carnegie advises that every night he would go through his engagement diary for the day and consider ‘in what way could I have improved my performance’. ⁸¹	Social interaction	A constructed art	Reflexivity Strategies of performance	Externalised: educator; actor Internal: other people Doing (+/-)
The Structure of Social Action (1937); The Social System (1951)	Talcott Parsons (1902-1979) Influential American Sociologist	Performance; Role Theory. The generation of functional social structures occurs because humans perform according to expectations The idea of role is a useful building block to explain the functionality of social structures. Humans perform roles which are functional. Parsons’ use of the term ‘actor’ is problematic since he does not draw on other theatrical terminology. Nevertheless, Carlson argues that his use of actor and the sense of action as performance which permeates his work indicates a metaphorical use which has been highly influential on	Social interaction	A constructed art	Strategies of performance which are functional	Externalised: theorist Internal: others Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		subsequent theorists of social action and behaviour. ⁸²
1938: Hitler annexes Austria. 1936-1939: civil war in Spain. 1939-1945: World War II, ended with the atomic bombing of Japan.

¹ Ardit, Jorge (George). 1994. 'Geertz, Kuhn and the Idea of a Cultural Paradigm'. British Journal of Sociology 45 (4) 597-617.p. 605-6

² Bradbury, M., B. Heading, and M. Hollis. 1972. 'The Man and The Mask: A Discussion of Role Theory'. In Role, edited by J. A. Jackson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p. 46

³ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter.p. 1

⁴ Brissett and Edgley 1990: 433-451

⁵ Freud 1953-74, The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works, trans. James Strachey et al, Vol. 7, pp. 305-307; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.p. 335.

⁶ Freud 1900 in McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008].p. 166n17

⁷ Freud 'History of the Psychoanalytic Movement' in Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.p. 252

⁸ Weber 2004: 254; emphasis added

⁹ Goldhill, Simon, and Robin Osborne, eds. 1999. Performance-culture and Athenian Democracy. Cambridge UK; New York: Cambridge University Press.p.14

¹⁰ Simmel, Georg. 1976/1912. 'The Dramatic Actor and Reality'. In Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 57-61.

¹¹ Simmel, Georg 1965, 'The Ruin', in Kurt H. Wolff (ed), Essays on Sociology, Philosophy and Aesthetics, New York, Harper and Row, pp. 259-266; quoted at length in Brown, Richard H. 1977. A Poetic for Sociology: Toward a logic of discovery for the human sciences. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p.112.

¹² Schiller considered these theorists 'sentimental poets, vainly attempting to create a naïve consciousness', through a view of such abstraction that it could never have had mass appeal (Carlson 1984: 315).

¹³ Sologub 1977/1908, 'The Theatre of One Will', trans. Daniel Gerould, Drama Review Vol. 21(4), pp. 91-94.

¹⁴ Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371.p. 367

¹⁵ Sologub 'One Will' 1977/1908

¹⁶ Moeller-Sally 1998: 368-9

¹⁷ Bentley, Eric. 1986/1946. The Pirandello Commentaries. Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press.p.17

¹⁸ Bentley 1986: xii

¹⁹ Pirandello 1908: 39-42 quoted in Bentley 1986: 98.

²⁰ Bentley 1986: 7

²¹ Pirandello 1908; quoted in Bentley 1986: 98.

-
- ²² Blumer, Herbert. 1962. 'Society as Symbolic Interaction'. In Human Behaviour and Social Processes: an interactionist approach, edited by A. Rose. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, pp. 179-192.p. 181-5
- ²³ Mead, George Herbert. 1962/1934. Mind, Self and Society from the Standpoint of Social Behaviorism. Edited by C. W. Morris. Chicago Ill: University of Chicago Press.p.151
- ²⁴ Mead, George Herbert 1913, 'The Social Self' 1913. First published in Journal of Philosophy, Psychology, and Scientific Methods, 10, 374-380; available online from Classics in the History of Psychology, An internet educational resource developed by Christopher D. Green York University, Toronto, Ontario, <http://psychclassics.yorku.ca/Mead/socialself.htm> accessed 23/9/201.
- ²⁵ Mead 1913: 377
- ²⁶ Mead 1913: 377
- ²⁷ Levinson, Henry 1993, 'Santayana and Making Claims on the Spiritual Truth about Matters of Fact', Canada, University of Waterloo, http://www.math.uwaterloo.ca/~kerrlaws/Santayana/Bulletin/s1_94.htm, accessed 7/06/2007.
- ²⁸ Trotsky 1905 in Baxandall, Lee. 1969. 'Spectacles and Scenarios: A Dramaturgy of Radical Activity'. The Drama Review: TDR 13 (4) pp. 52-71.pp. 69: 63, 66
- ²⁹ Baxandall 1969: 66
- ³⁰ Trotsky Russian Revolution 1917 in Baxandall 1969: 66
- ³¹ In Baxandall 1969: 66
- ³² Carlson 1984: 344)
- ³³ Published in Harrod, Roy 1951, John Maynard Keynes, Macmillan, p. 251; quoted in Gilbert, Martin 1964, Britain and Germany between the Wars, Longman, p. 7.
- ³⁴ Keynes 1919 in Gilbert, Martin. 1964. Britain and Germany between the Wars. Longman House Burnt Mill: Longman.p. 7
- ³⁵ Arditì 1994: 606
- ³⁶ Arditì 1994: 606
- ³⁷ Post How to Behave 1928: 2
- ³⁸ Arditì 1994: 606
- ³⁹ Post, Emily. 1922. 'The Ordeal by Ballroom'. In Etiquette. New York: Funk and Wagnells, <http://www.gutenberg.org/files/14314/14314.txt>.
- ⁴⁰ Post, Emily 1922, 'Engagements' in Etiquette, New York, Funk and Wagnells, <http://www.gutenberg.org/files/14314/14314.txt>
- ⁴¹ Mills, C. Wright. 1967/1940. 'Situated Actions and Vocabularies of Motive'. In Power, Politics and People: the Collected Essays of C. Wright Mills, edited by I. Horowitz. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 439-452.p. 443
- ⁴² Garcia 1995 in Honderich, Ted, ed. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- ⁴³ Arditì 1994: 606
- ⁴⁴ En.Wikipedia.org/wiki/Orison_Swett_Marden accessed 17/08/2008.
- ⁴⁵ Arditì 1994: 606
- ⁴⁶ Marden, Orison Swett 1923, Masterful Personality, USA, Thomas Y. Crowell Co. pp. 68, 248, 182.
- ⁴⁷ James 1925: 128; quoted in Carlson, Marvin. 2004. Performance: A critical introduction. 2nd ed. New York and London: Routledge.p. 41.
- ⁴⁸ In Survey Graphic Vol 56; reprinted in Park, Robert 1950, Race and Culture Glencoe Ill, Free Press.
- ⁴⁹ Park 1950: 249-50, quoted in Carlson 2004: 41.

-
- ⁵⁰ Potolsky, Matthew. 2006. Mimesis. Edited by J. Drakakis, The New Critical Idiom. New York and London: Routledge.p. 88
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 326
- ⁵² Eaton, Katherine. 1991. 'Review: The Theatrical Instinct: Nikolai Evreinov and the Russian Theatre of the early Twentieth Century, by Sharon Marie Carnicke'. Slavic Review 50 (3) p. 731.
- ⁵³ Collins, Christopher. 1973. Life as Theatre: Five Modern Plays by Nikolai Evreinov. Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis.pp. xxvii-xxviii
- ⁵⁴ Lyman, Stanford M, and Marvin B. Scott. 1975. The Drama of Social Reality. New York: Oxford University Press.p. 111
- ⁵⁵ Evreinov, Nicolas. 1970/1927. The Theatre in Life. Translated by A. I. Nazarovff. New York: Benjamin Blom.
- ⁵⁶ Quoted in Potolsky 2006: 88
- ⁵⁷ Potolsky 2006: 88
- ⁵⁸ Evreinov 1970, The Theatre in Life, trans. A.I. Nazarovff, New York, Benjamin Blom; quoted in Potolsky 2006: 89.
- ⁵⁹ Potolsky 2006: 88
- ⁶⁰ W.A.Holman 1928, The Australian Constitution, Its Interpretation and Amendment, Sydney, p. 83, cited in Loveday 1983: 20.
- ⁶¹ Cheney, Sheldon. 1930. The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft. 2nd ed. London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co.pp.470-4
- ⁶² Printed as an appendix in Permanence and Change: An Anatomy of Purpose, 3rd ed., Berkeley and L.A., University of California Press, 1984, pp. 274-294.
- ⁶³ In Burke 1957, The Philosophy of Literary Forms, New York, Random House.
- ⁶⁴ Burke, Kenneth. 1962. A Grammar of Motives and A Rhetoric of Motives. Cleveland and New York: The World Publishing Company.p. xvii
- ⁶⁵ Burke, Kenneth. 1976/1968. 'Dramatism'. In Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hasting House Publishers, pp. 7-17.p. 11
- ⁶⁶ Burke, Kenneth. 1984/1954. Permanence and Change: An Anatomy of Purpose. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.p.274
- ⁶⁷ Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons.p.71
- ⁶⁸ Bygrave, Stephen. 1993. Kenneth Burke: Rhetoric and Ideology. London and New York: Routledge.p. 37
- ⁶⁹ Foss, Sonja K., Karen A. Foss, and Robert Trapp. 1985. Contemporary Perspectives on Rhetoric. 3rd ed. Prospect Heights, Illinois: Waveland Press, Inc.pp. 200-201.
- Dramaturgy's view of motivation, as outlined in Brissett and Edgley (1990) seems to be different to Burke's, although they attribute it to both him and to C.W. Mills. What Brissett and Edgley consider motivations are more like 'after the fact rationalizations' (Navasky, Victor S. 1990. 'The Reasons Considered' (excerpt from Naming Names 1980)). In Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook, edited by D. Brisset and C. Edgley. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, pp. 251-259.) or explanations by the actors in response to questions from analysts rather than motives which are attributed to people's actions (and words) by others, asking what basically amount to the five questions which have traditionally been used to describe an action from as early as Aristotle (Burke 1976/1968: 9): what (act), how (agency), when and where (scene), why (purpose) and who (agent) of what they see or read i.e. it is about what is 'empirically observable' (Burke, Kenneth 1931 Counter-Statement, University of California Press p.219).
- ⁷⁰ Burke 1931: 219
- ⁷¹ Bygrave 1993: 37
- ⁷² Published in 1978 as The Great Composers: Reviews and Bombardments.
- ⁷³ Gerould 2000: 428.
- ⁷⁴ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 427.
- ⁷⁵ Gerould 2000: 428

⁷⁶ Minnigerodé, Meade. 1932. The Magnificent Comedy: Some Aspects of Public and Private Life in Paris from the Fall of Robespierre to the Coming of Bonaparte July 1794 to November 1799. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode.

⁷⁷ Quoted in Denning, Greg. 1996. Performances. Carlton South, Victoria: Melbourne University Press.p.105.

⁷⁸ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70.p. 55

⁷⁹ Linton, R 1936 The Study of Man: An Introduction New York : D. Appleton-Century, c1936: 114-5. For a critique of Linton see Connell, R.W. 1979. 'The Concept of Role and What to Do With It'. ANZJS 15 (3) pp. 7-17.

⁸⁰ Arditi 1994: 606

⁸¹ Carnegie, Dale. 1999/1936. How to Win Friends and Influence People (1936). Australia: HarperCollins Publishers: xxvi

⁸² Carlson 2004: 43-4

Table 8/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator: 1940-1969

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'Situated Actions and Vocabularies of Motive' (1940)	C. Wright Mills (1916-1962) American sociologist	We interpret our own and others' motives from the way they act because of shared 'vocabularies' which constitute roles. The outline of 'an analytic model for the explanation of motives ... based on a sociological theory of language and a sociological psychology'. Motives are social . Theatre as motivated action: 'Human actors do vocalize and impute motives to themselves and to others'. Motives 'are the terms with which interpretation of conduct by social actors proceeds'. They form 'vocabularies' when institutionalized, and are generally imputed before the actor realizes them himself. The verbalization of motives is a form of action, not an expression of something hidden or ulterior (as suggested by Freud), however, they can become internalised: '[t]he long acting out of a role, with its appropriate motives, will often induce a man to become what at first he merely sought to appear'. Vocabularies of motive guide one's actions in the world because they underpin how one sees the world, however, 'motives vary in content and character with historical epochs and societal structures. Motives are social: 'a motive tends to be one which is to the actor and to the other members of a situation an unquestioned answer to questions concerning social and lingual conduct' . ¹ Mills said that he was 'indebted' to Kenneth Burke for 'leads'. He was also indebted to Weber.	Social interaction	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility; Purposefulness Social interaction Self-awareness Strategies of performance	Externalised: theorist Internal: we watch each other perform and attribute motivation accordingly Internalised: we become aware of our own motivations by comparing our conduct with others Doing (+/-)
Journal entry December 6, 1940	Bertold Brecht (1898-1956) German writer, director and activist	Theatre as role-play. Brecht's ideas were similar to those of revolutionary Russia and essentially collapse theatre into life, as well as theatre into politics. Brecht's theatre's main function was to reveal social reality, a reaction to what he called 'culinary theatre' in which people's emotions were 'seduced into a tacit identification with the leading characters [and] where the critical faculty was lulled to sleep'. ² He hoped his plays would start the audience talking and wanting to change social reality. Brecht required his actors to not try to be the character but to show the	Political Life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Distance which produces detachment (alienation), which in turn allows judgment and critical response. This enables	Externalised: playwright; alienated spectators Internal: pacified theatre-goers Doing/ Showing:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		character to the audience: ‘He is not Lear, Harpagon, or the good soldier Schweik – he is ‘showing’ them [the characters] to an audience’. ³ Brecht carried out research during the 1940s on what he called ‘everyday theater’: ‘I have already done some work on the application of theatrical techniques to politics in fascism, but in addition to this the kind of everyday theater that individuals indulge in when no one is watching should be studied, secret “role-playing” [with the aim of] making the art of theater profane and secular and stripping it of religious elements’. ⁴			spectators to overcome passivity	(+/-)
Being and Nothingness (1943)	Jean-Paul Sartre (1905-1980) French existentialist writer, dramatist, activist and philosopher	It is part of the human condition to be visible to others; visibility makes us self-conscious and unable to act authentically. We see others as objects, as ‘puppets’ in order to maintain our world for ourselves. We also act parts in ‘bad faith’ because some of our existence requires us to be something for others which we do not see as being part of our authentic self. Others cast us into positions in which we must ‘act’ rather than be ourselves. All social life involves the scrutiny of others: our visibility to others is nauseating; it robs us of ‘our’ world and leads us to act inauthentically. ⁵	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Self-awareness Causality Strategies of presentation	Internal: everyone is a spectator to everyone else Internalised: the self-conscious self Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
The Human Group (1945)	George Homans (1910-1989) American sociologist.	Homans uses a variety of metaphors to describe and explain human group behaviour, including theatrical terms such as actor, role and scene. Homans was the American founder of behavioural sociology and the exchange theory. ⁶	Social interaction	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of performance Conflict management	Externalised: analyst Doing: (+/-)
1945: end of World War II with the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. 1946: the Iron Curtain descends between east and west. First meeting of the United Nations 1947: Indian independence
Psychodrama (1946)	Jacob Levy Moreno (1889-1974) Psychiatrist and psycho-	Performance. Carlson considers Moreno ‘the father of psychodrama’ – the application of theatrical techniques in psychoanalysis, generally with the aim of producing catharsis. Moreno argued that ‘roles do not emerge from the self ... the self emerges from roles’. ⁷ Theatre techniques can help resolve	Psychological life	A constructed art	Self-awareness Strategies of presentation	Externalised: analyst Internalised: the self-aware self

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	sociologist	difficult situations for individuals and free spontaneity. Patients are encouraged to play out conflictual the roles in their lives as a means of coming to understand their relationships before an audience (which may be larger than the therapist). 'We're in interaction with other people from the moment of birth on. Obviously that influences us. But let's face it: words can lie. Look at TV. Look at the politicians. They are lying through their teeth. And we're supposed to believe that? So, there's a more primordial level, beneath the level of speech, and that's the level of the act and the interact. And that's why he [Moreno] picked drama. But not the legitimate drama, but a new form of drama: improvisational drama. Which is the way we live in life'. ⁸				Doing: (+/-)
The Pirandello Commentaries (1946)	Eric Bentley (1916-English theatre critic, scholar and playwright	Role-Theory. Dramatization structures our lives. 'Life is dramatic ... in the details of role-playing, of drama building ... all human beings dramatize all the time. It seems to be the only way to reach out, to try to grasp, to visualize oneself and others, to recapitulate the past, to plan the future'. 'All living, all life, is improvisation'. ⁹	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art	Visibility enabling understanding; Structure; Causality	Externalised: critic and scholar Doing: (+/-)
1950-1953: Korean War. 1950-1954: McCarthy campaign against communists in America
The Lonely Crowd (1950)	David Riesman (1909-2002) Sociology	Humans must live within structures generated by others and need justifications for what they do - these limit the possibility of play and therefore autonomy. 'The Play's the Thing'. Riesman plays with the use of the word 'play' in both its theatrical and ludic senses. Humans live their lives within structures generated by others, some of which they cannot hope to change. This provides two possible paths for the individual – to become 'inner-directed' (only interested in one's own feelings and thoughts) or to become 'other-directed'. Although the other-directed individual tends to undervalue themselves and the interest of their own feelings and aspirations in their efforts to adjust themselves to others, Riesman believes there is more hope for autonomy in being 'other-directed' because this path at least	The human condition	A constructed art	Objectification Structured Strategies of direction Structured Deterministic	Externalised: analyst Internal: the other-directed person Internalised: the inner directed individual; the self-judging other-directed individual

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		offers more opportunities for the development of the resources of character, although these can be ‘exhausted by his social organization’, the structures into which he must fit as an ‘other-directed’ individual and which impose on him cultural definitions of what is to be valued in his life. A way to overcome this is to see play not as a ‘residual sphere’ but as a sphere in which there remains ‘still some room ... for the would-be autonomous man to reclaim his individual character from the pervasive demands of his social character’. This would however require not just a rethinking of play in relation to work but of the privileging of ‘activity’ over spectatorship and skill (craftsmanship) over ‘amateur competence’ such that ‘any leisure that looks easy is suspect’. Most importantly, the other-directed individual needs to understand that ‘they lose their social freedom and their individual autonomy in seeking to become like each other’ within the coercive structures of a society which does not value play. ¹⁰				Doing: (-)
The Nomos of the Earth in the International Law of the Jus Publicum Europaeum (1950)	Carl Schmitt (1888-1985) Political philosophy	Uses theatre to describe the arena on which war takes place: ‘the theatre of war’. This use of theatre is so widespread as to perhaps no longer be considered metaphoric, except that Schmitt is expressly trying to problematize ‘the where’ or geographical location of politics and law. ¹¹ This draws on the conception of theatre as a place of action (in Dryden’s appropriation of the word to mean ‘stage’) and can be considered metaphoric. If nomos is a ‘fence word’, ¹² then ‘theatre’ is the enclosed space on which the action of war takes place. War has a spatial aspect - it occurs on a particular space of ground however air-power has changed the nature of this spatial conception.	Political life	An acting space	Spatial structuring	Externalised: philosopher Internal: politics and law Doing: (+/-)
‘La révolution Brechtienne’ (1955); ‘Mère Courage aveugle’	Roland Barthes (1915-1980) French literary and	Barthes argued that Brecht posed a challenge to ‘our habits, our tastes, our reflexes, the very ‘laws’ of the theatre which we live’ by his use of distance to prevent empathy. ¹³ This technique allowed objectification so that significance could be seen. Being aware of significance allowed the recognition of signs and	Cultural life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility allowing semiotic analysis Focus Perspective	Externalised: critic, analyst Showing: (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1955); ‘Les maladies du costume de théâtre’ (1955); ‘Les tâches de la critique Brechtienne’ (1956); Sur Racine (1960); ‘Littérature et signification’ (1963); ‘Baudelaire’s Theater’ (1964); ‘Diderot, Brecht, Eisenstein’ (1986)	cultural critic, semiologist	symbols and enabled semiotic analysis and an understanding of how theatre manipulated spectatorship to see some things and not others. Barthes also used ‘theatricality as a metaphor to describe certain textual devices used by Baudelaire’ and therefore privilege a particular [Platonic] view of performance. Although Barthes seemed to suggest that theatricality was the corporeal presentation of a text (the way the thing it itself was presented) and thereby originated in the text, theatricality only reached its full potential when it was imagined as performance in the reader’s mind. ¹⁴ According to McGillivray, this suggests Barthes had an anti-theatrical prejudice towards the text, preferring his own imagined presentation rather than actual theatrical performance. Analyses of literature, theatre and cinema which explicated the semiotic nature of representation and the position of the spectator indicate that ‘things are always seen from somewhere ’. ¹⁵ This somewhere could be within the theatre of the mind.			Strategies of presentation Purposefulness
‘A Theory of Play and Fantasy’ (1955) ¹⁶	Gregory Bateson (1904-1980) British-American Anthropology and psychologist	Play and performance share a confusion between what is real and what is illusion; framing helps us tell the difference. Uses the idea of ‘frame’ to explore whether a performance is play or the real thing’. Bateson claimed he based his idea on Epimenides’ Paradox (596BCE): ‘All Cretans are liars ... One of their own poets has said so’. ¹⁷ Bateson’s conception of frame formed the basis of Goffman’s work on frame analysis, in particular the problem of an accomplished performance being seen as reality rather than performance.	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and direction The possibility of delusion	Externalised: analyst Doing: (+/-)
	Sean O’Casey (1880-1964) Irish	Life requires us to play a number of roles, some of which we are unprepared for: ‘One man in his time plays many parts – some of them grossly under rehearsed’. ¹⁸	The human condition:	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised: playwright; judge Doing:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	dramatist					(+/-)
1956: Russia suppresses Hungarian revolt 1956-57 Suez War
'Sociologie du théâtre' (1956)	Georges Gurvith (1894-1965) Russian-born French sociologist	Theatre is a part of society and therefore a phenomenon which can be analysed sociologically. The article is a summary of the proceedings of a 1955 conference on the relationship between theatre and sociology. Carlson considers it 'a remarkably prescient article' which anticipates the work of Goffman and Turner. ¹⁹ The ' profound affinities of the theatre with society ' open up possibilities of sociological investigation in both directions: the examination of 'theatricality' in society, and of social organization in theatre. ²⁰ Gurvitch calls attention to the theatrical element in all social ceremonies, even in 'a simple reception or a gathering of friends'. ²¹ Moreover, 'each individual plays several social roles', those of class, profession, political orientation etc. As for the theatre, it is composed of a set group of performers, portraying a social action, encased in another social dynamic made up of performance and public. In relation to theatre as an entity in itself , Gurvitch suggests six possibilities for sociological research in theatre: 1. the public (particularly its degrees of diversity and cohesion), 2. the relationship between the play and its style, its interpretation, and its particular social setting; 3. the internal organization of the acting profession, and its relationship to other professions and to society as a whole; ²² 4. the relationship between the content of plays and their society; 5. the changes in the interpretation of this content and the relationship of these changes to changing social configurations; 6. the social functions of theatre itself in different societies. He then considers theatre as an instrument of social experimentation. Anticipating the experimentation of 'guerilla theatres' and directors such as Boal (1974), Pörtner and Schechner (1966), he proposes 'theatrical representations	Social organization	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Structures Purposeful Strategies of presentation	Externalised: analyst Doing: (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		camouflaged in real life, without the members of the group suspecting what is happening' or representations designed 'to stimulate collective actions, freeing the public from precise and structured social cadres and inciting them to participate in the play of the actors and to extend it into real life'. ²³ [This suggestion indicates a elision between theatre as a practice and the representations which theatre creates, undermining the usefulness of Gurvith's endeavour: is it to investigate a particular activity of life which warrants sociological investigation or a tool by which life can be manipulated as if it were theatre? This is a problem which besets dramaturgical analyses because it requires theatre to be both a part of social life and apart from social life].
Role Theory: Expectations, Identities, and Behaviors (1956)	Bruce Biddle Social Psychology	Role Theory. Theatre is a derivative of life: roles in theatre are derived from and are less complex than those in life. (This suggests Biddle was not using the term metaphorically: rather he saw role as a concept appropriated by theatre). Despite 'many answers' and 'confusions' about what a role actually is, Biddle considered that theorists who used the term probably had 'some central idea in mind' or they would not have chosen the same term'. It 'seems to communicate a core meaning without obvious pain'. He defines this meaning as centring 'upon behaviors that are characteristic of persons in a context' and believes that this is how the terms are generally taken. Roles 'occur in everyday life ... and are of concern to those who perform them and others'. Roles are also 'portrayed in novels and in the theater' but '[d]ramatic portrayals are a mere shadow of the complexity of real-life role phenomena'. The 'realm' of the role concept includes behaviour which is socially and structurally determined, behaviour which is modelled and behaviours which are constrained. Roles are behavioural, performed by persons, normally limited by context, are characteristic of a set of persons and a context. They need not be 'socially significant'. ²⁴	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Structured Purposeful Strategies of performance Causality	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1957: Russia wins the space race, launching the first Sputnik.
Schism and Continuity (1957); Dramas, Fields and Metaphors: Symbolic Action in Human Society (1974); From Ritual to Theatre (1982); Liminality and the Performative Genre (1984); The Anthropology of Performance (1988)	Victor Turner (1920-1983) Anthropology	Social life: was performative, something which could be seen during eruptions of ‘social dramas’ which followed a process from eruption to resolution. ‘Social interaction is dramatic ’. ²⁵ It proceeds according to the ‘world-views’ or paradigmatic understandings of the actors, and involves conflicts over which paradigm is to prevail. The ‘processual structure of social action’ as it occurs under a number of different ‘world-views’ becomes evident under the metaphor. ²⁶ Thinking of such conflicts as ‘social dramas’ allows the ‘phased process’ of the contestation to be represented for analysis. Turner proposes that such ‘social dramas’ followed four steps: a breach of regular norm-governed social relations, the subsequent crisis caused by the breach, redressive action and finally either reintegration or recognition of an irreparable schism. ²⁷ Unlike Schechner, he did not think that traditional (stage) drama, which he saw as derivative, echoed this pattern. Rather it exaggerated one phase, the third, the ritualized action of redress. It did this in order to express experience to other members of the culture or society for their observation and reflection. This occurred in areas of liminality , ‘where normally fixed conditions were open to flux and change’ and reorganization was possible. In a modern society, consensus was not likely to be reached in order to resolve crises, and theatre provided the opportunity to consider a multitude of possible models and interpretive meanings for events through an ‘open-ended liminoid playfulness’ ²⁸ which, nevertheless might also ‘strengthen the hands of political leaders for controlling the lives of their subjects’, ²⁹ something which we needed to be wary of. Turner specifically defended both the use of metaphors in general, despite their ‘perils’, and the use of drama for his theory of action, although he insisted that ‘social drama’ was not a theatre metaphor. ³⁰ Metaphors should be regarded ‘as a species of	Social life	An acting space	Objectification Provocation of thought New perspectives Structure Strategies of performance Conflict management Causality Functionality	Externalised: observer, analyst; anthropol- ogist Doing: (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		liminal monster whose combination of familiar and unfamiliar features or unfamiliar combinations of familiar features provokes us into thought [and] provides us with new perspectives'. ³¹ Like a monster, the theatre metaphor seems to take over analyses of Turner's work, which is widely considered to be a use of the theatre metaphor. ³² It is perhaps this tendency which made Bharucha so critical of Turner, and other anthropologists' use of the idea of 'performing ethnography', which he saw as 'testaments to the naivety – and desperation – underlying the ritual anthropologist's desire to “get inside the skins” of members of other cultures'. ³³
'The role set: Problems in sociological theory' (1957) ³⁴	R.K. Merton (1910- Social psychology)	Role Theory. An attempt to develop a comprehensive paradigm for role analysis. Merton argued that 'each social position is associated with an array of role-specific forms of behavior that together comprise a 'role set''. ³⁵	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification Causality Strategies of presentation Structure	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+/-)
The Theory of Social Structure (1957)	S.F. Nadel (1903-1956) Anthropology	Role Theory. Social being: involves both action according to expectations and spectatorship; we perform under the gaze of others. A seminal theoretical discussion of role theory. ³⁶ Posited the idea of individuals both acting and/or spectating according to their various roles, but one role will tend to incorporate other 'contingent' roles. For example 'we can visualize a situation where a 'father' is always the head of the household, the 'teacher' of his children, the 'manager' of a labour team, a 'councillor' or 'elder' of the community, an 'officiant' in rituals, and one of the 'onlookers' in dance or sports [while a child is an active participant, but] [s]ince in such combinations it is ... the contingent condition (being a father ...) which determines the assumption of all the concomitant roles, the description of a man as a 'father' ... will in fact amount to describing almost his complete social being'. ³⁷	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification Functionalism Causality	Externalised: social scientist Internal: spectators may also be internal to the 'drama' in the same way that some characters in a play will be onlookers for others. Doing: (+/-)
Explorations in	N. Gross,	Role Theory. Social life involves negotiation since social	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Role Analysis: Studies of the School Superintendency Role (1958)	W.S. Mason and A.W. McEarchern Social Science	expectations about the different functions a person must fulfil can conflict. Influential early use of Role Theory which drew on Merton (1957). Introduced the idea of 'role conflict'. People have to negotiate conflicting expectations, which leads to strain or role conflict. ³⁸			Functionalist Conflict management Strategies of performance	social scientist Doing: (+/-)
The Human Condition (1958); On Revolution (1973); The Life of the Mind (unfinished) (1971)	Hannah Arendt (1906-1975) Political Philosophy	Arendt is widely believed to have used the theatre metaphor but this is debatable. This record is included with some misgivings. We live in a world of appearances: involves both action and spectatorship: we act under the scrutiny of others; we witness and judge the actions of actors The performing arts were the most apt analogy for political action 'because their meaning, actuality or "truth" is inseparable from the activity of presentation'. ³⁹ In particular, the hypocrite is 'a crucial actor on the modern revolutionary stage'. ⁴⁰ 'He pretends to be the assumed role, and when he enters the game of society it is without any play-acting whatsoever'. What makes the hypocrite so dangerous 'was that he instinctively could help himself to every 'mask' in the political theatre'. ⁴¹ For Arendt, action involves taking initiative. Not everyone can or does act at the same time. Arendt's position is essentially incoherent, since she wishes to maintain a spectator position, but only 'on the stage' i.e. the only spectator position lies within the play: the actor is playing the part of the spectator. Since she wants to draw a distinction between action and passivity (or the withdrawal for thinking), this seems a paradoxical position because it is both active (acting spectatorship) and passive at the same time, thus the passivity of the actor-spectator is only an apparent passivity: 'Living things make their appearance like actors on a stage set for them ... To appear always means to seem to others, and this seeming varies according to the standpoint of the spectators. [E]very appearing thing acquires ... a kind of disguise that may ... hide	Social and political life	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Witnessing Judgment The possibility of deception Visibility	Internal: citizen-actors Externalised: theorist Doing/ Showing/ Watching: (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		or disfigure it'. [To treat the world only as it 'seems to me'] would cause no great problem if we were [only] mere spectators ... thrown into the world to look after it ... and be entertained by it ... However, we are of the world and not merely in it ... While we come from nowhere, we arrive well equipped to deal with whatever appears to us and to take part in the play of the world'. ⁴²
Homo Sociologicus (1958; 1973)	Ralf Dahrendorf (1929- Sociologist)	Role Theory. The functionality of social structures, which are imbued with power and therefore constrain social activity. The idea of role is a useful building block to explain the functionality of social structures. Dahrendorf believes that 'Shakespeare's metaphor ["All the world's a stage"] has become the central principle of the science of society'. ⁴³ Argued that 'the mainstream of role theory overemphasised both consensus and internalization' and that 'role expectations have to be seen in relation to the distribution of power'. ⁴⁴	Social life	A constructed art	Functionalism; Causality Structure Strategies of performance Conflict management	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+)
The Myth of Sisyphus (1959)	Albert Camus (1913-1960) French existentialist dramatist and author	Man inhabits past and future in the way an actor inhabits a stage setting: life is essentially meaningless. Man is in 'irredeemable exile' because he is deprived of memories 'of a lost homeland' as well as of the 'hope of a promised land'. He is thus 'divorced' from past and future: 'this divorce between man and his life, the actor and his setting, truly constitutes the feeling of Absurdity'. ⁴⁵	The human condition	An acting space	Visibility Strategies of performance Alienation	Externalised: existential philosopher Doing: (+/-)
The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life (1959); Asylums (1961); Encounters (1961); Behavior in	Erving Goffman (1922-1982) Sociologist	We are both performers for ourselves and others and spectators and judges of ourselves and others: 'we spend most of our time not engaged in giving information but in giving shows'. ⁴⁶ Explanation of the difference between social and private behaviour and how social behaviour is adjusted according to who is watching, allowing strategies of performance; This makes social life 'dubious' and often ludicrous. '[T]he Godfather of Dramaturgy ', a resolute spectator who 'arguably effected more changes [in the world of institutions] than all of the	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification Self-awareness Strategies of performance and presentation The possibility of deception The possibility	Externalised: theorist (participant observer) Internal: we live our lives under the scrutiny of others which

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Public Places (1963); Frame Analysis (1974)		political lobbying in the world could have done'.⁴⁷ Goffman has been 'more influential than any single figure on contemporary work in the dramaturgical analysis of social action'.⁴⁸ Explicit use of theatre (not drama) as a metaphor to describe human behaviour as self-aware.⁴⁹ Society is 'a stage on which we enter to play our parts'.⁵⁰ We are actors in public 'in the sense of being personae'. We have a 'social self' which is accomplished by attempts to manage the impression we give to onlookers. Bickering over what Goffman 'said, meant, accomplished, or failed to accomplish' has been 'interminable',⁵¹ although Goffman explicitly says his use is metaphoric: '[a]ll the world is not a stage – certainly the theater isn't entirely ... you need to find places for cars to park and coats to be checked, and these had better be real places [with] real insurance against theft ... Social life is dubious enough and ludicrous enough without having to wish it further into unreality'. Social life could be made to seem theatrical by isolating a 'strip of experience' and treating it as a discrete event.⁵² It only becomes actual theatre by a process of 'keying' whereby it is framed in such a way as to give it a different meaning.⁵³ Rather, we 'animate' our roles according to the patterns and models we find in everyday life to suit our purposes. How we play a role does not provide 'some privileged access to the biological innards of the speaker, for they are properly to be attributed to a figure animated, not the animator'.⁵⁴ Although Goffman has been routinely associated with the concept of Impression Management (IM), his self is a more complex and less duplicitous one than the self which appears in IM: 'Goffman's actor puts on a variety of faces in various settings and before particular audiences in an effort to comport him- or herself to the exigencies of the social gathering and to uphold the definition of the situation. IM's social actor, on the other hand, has a hidden agenda as he or she goes about the			of behaving well	is why we come to treat it as theatrical Internalized: we watch ourselves to ensure we behave appropriately Doing/ Showing/ Watching: (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		business of presenting the self; there is always a concerted effort to keep a private reality from surfacing during any particular public presentation ... many researchers ... tend to make the mistake of lumping together Goffman's work and that of IM'. Goffman is concerned with decorum rather than manipulation: 'although all deceptive presentations are staged, not all staged presentations are deceptive or geared toward obfuscation or distortion'. ⁵⁵
Political Science: A Philosophical Analysis (1960)	Vernon Van Dyke Political Science	Dramaturgy: Political life involves both action and spectatorship, although we may not always know which is which. 'The world can be considered a theater in which political dramas are played – dramas that began in the ... past and that will ... extend into an indefinite and uncertain future. People cannot avoid entering one or more political theaters, and cannot avoid doing it long after the play has begun. The choice, if they have any, is between taking a place in the audience or striving to secure a role on the stage'. Although Van Dyke goes on to discuss why life is not theatre, including that we may not know whether we are spectator or actor, he nevertheless continues to use the metaphor in relation to the study of politics: 'the political scientist enters the political theater as an interested member of the audience and as a student of the play' in order to 'orient himself to the play' so that he can come to 'orient others in the audience' as well as perhaps 'advise and train' the actors. The process of orientation involves asking and answering questions. The aim is to provide an orientation which will 'most adequately guide actual and aspiring actors most wisely and effectively and perhaps affect one or more of the forthcoming scenes in a desirable way'. ⁵⁶ (What Van Dyke describes himself doing is similar to what Boal tries to 'seduce' spectators to do – become spect-actors. His aim, though is didactic and directorial, not participatory).	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Strategies of direction	Externalised: political scientist and educator; critical spectators Internal: deluded spectators Doing/ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1961: Berlin Wall built dividing East and West Germany
Atomic Theory and the Description of Nature (1961)	Niels Bohr Physicist	We are both actors and spectators whose presence is affective. 'We are both onlookers and actors in the great drama of existence'. ⁵⁷ Objectification is impossible: objects under observation are affected by the observer's presence. We must therefore rethink the relationship between subject and object because there is no impenetrable barrier between spectator and object.	The relationship of humans to the world	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification Causality	Internal: theorist Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
'Dramaturgy' (1961) ⁵⁸	Victor A. Thompson Management Studies	Dramaturgy: we are both performers for ourselves and others and spectators and judges of ourselves and others. Thompson introduced the work of Goffman into management studies. ⁵⁹	The human condition	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Strategies of presentation Conflict management Causality	Externalised: social scientist Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
Transactional Analysis in Psychotherapy (1961); Games People Play (1964);	Eric Berne Psycho-therapy	Performance?: Social life is a kind of game which involves repetitive behaviour along patterned lines: 'the bulk of the time in serious social life is taken up with playing games' ⁶⁰ which involve the playing of roles and the following of scripts. Performances are recurrent, although a single performance might last a lifetime. ⁶¹	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of performance Convention Structured Repetitive Self-awareness	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+)
'Society as Symbolic Interaction' (1962)	Herbert Blumer (1900-1987) American sociologist	Role Theory: Social interaction takes the form of role occupation. 'Human society is to be seen as consisting of acting people, and the life of the society is to be seen as consisting of their actions'. Individuals (and 'acting units' such as collectivities or organizations) align their actions with the actions of others in their society by seeing and interpreting the actions of others as 'roles': 'There is no empirically observable activity in a human society that does not spring from some acting unit'. Acting always occurs within a 'situation'. Structure arises through the	Social interaction	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Self-awareness Strategies of performance Structure Causality	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		common understandings developed through past interaction. The 'organization of human society is the framework inside of which social action takes place' but it does not determine action. Actions are always interpretative although they may accept previously constructed meanings rather than labour to construct new ones. 'The process has to be seen from the standpoint of the acting unit'. Human society is 'composed of individuals who have selves' who occupy roles. Analysis of human behaviour occurs by 'catch[ing] the process of interpretation through which [humans] construct their actions'. This involves taking 'the role of the acting unit whose behaviour' is being studied i.e. participant observation. ⁶²
1962: Cuban missile crisis; USA enters Vietnam
'Role-taking: Process versus conformity' (1962) ⁶³	R. Turner Social Science	Role Theory. Social life is constructed creatively drawing on both existing structures and improvisation. Took the arguments of symbolic interactionists into Role Theory to argue that role-taking was a creative activity, that 'role-takers were also 'role-makers' and used 'improvisory behavior' as they 'tentatively interpret and reinterpret each other's actions in the situations that they encounter' ⁶⁴ , creating their roles from both this interpretation and from the raw materials provided during socialization.	Social life	An acting space	Subjectification Strategies of performance Causality Functionalism	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+)
Behind Many Masks: Impression Management in a Himalayan Village (1962)	Gerald Berryman Anthropology	Impression Management: visibility requires appearances to be managed; uses a dramaturgical perspective in his exploration of Himalayan life. ⁶⁵	The human condition	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised: analyst; anthropologist Doing/ Showing: (+/-)
'Life as Theatre: Some Notes on One	Sheldon Messinger, Harold	Dramaturgy: We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others. Dramaturgy is 'a perspective on the world and the self within it ... that renders life a kind of "theater" in which a	The human condition	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space	Visibility Strategies of performance and	Externalised: social scientist

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Dramaturgic Approach to Social Reality' (1962) ⁶⁶	Sampson, Robert Towne Sociology	"show" is "staged." Someone viewing self and world from within this perspective will be said to be "on." Messinger and his colleagues are critical of this idea of the social actor being 'on' to an observer. It does not accord with how people seem to consider everyday life. People do not, in general 'experience life as theater' for a variety of reasons. ⁶⁷		A constructed art	presentation Causality Structure The possibility of delusion	Doing: (-)
1963: American President John F. Kennedy assassinated; Civil Rights campaigns begin in USA.
Communication and Social Order (1962); Symbols in Society (1968)	H.D. Duncan Sociology	Dramatism. Social action is expressed and communicated symbolically. A development and sociological reworking of the ideas of Kenneth Burke. The social drama of action is 'expressed through forms like play, games, festivals, parties, ceremonies, etc.'. ⁶⁸ Society develops from 'forms of sociation ... the data of sociation exist in the various kinds of symbolic expressions men use to enact their social roles in communication with one another'. ⁶⁹	Social life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Structure Causality Expressive Purposefulness	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+/-)
Symbolic Leaders: Public Dramas and Public Men (1964)	Orrin E. Klapp American Sociologist	Dramaturgy; Role Theory. Political life involves both action and spectatorship but is directed by spectators. Drama is a 'dimension' of public life. Roles 'are "thrust upon"' individuals in 'transitory' dramas which are like 'a grade-C movie'. The dramatic is a dimension of all social life in every society, but it has moved from 'tradition and local events ... to that range of things conventionally called news, entertainment, and reading, which are presented before shifting, transitory, and boundless audiences'. The 'peculiar laws' of dramatic encounters in real life could benefit from a consideration of the laws which apply to drama in the theatre. The application of a dramaturgical perspective shows 'how public drama works as a force within our society', explains the fate of public figures, demonstrates that we generally do not take audiences as seriously as we need to, and provides an alternative to structural descriptions of society which cannot account for how things can change, often rapidly. In particular, it reveals that we live in an 'audience-directed	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction and presentation Structure Causality The possibility of deception	Externalised: social scientist Internal: 'the whole world is a potential audience', ⁷¹ Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		society'. To explain leadership, especially charismatic leadership and to analyse the peculiar characteristics of encounters which can be termed 'dramatic'; to provide a viable alternative to structuralist/ functionalist explanations of society; to argue for a less constricting view of spectators and a recognition of their role in public life. To 'show how public drama works as a force' within society and determines the fate of symbolic leadership, to explain how leadership works. ⁷⁰
Histoire des spectacles (1965)	Jean Duvignaud French historian	History can be constructed for effect. During the French Revolution '[h]istory itself becomes a dramatic representation given like the fête , under the eye of the nation'. ⁷²	History	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and presentation Backward causation	Externalised: historian Doing: (+/-)
Theory and Research in the Communicative Arts (1965); Discussion and Group Methods: theory and Practice (1975); Communication Theory (1980); Interpersonal Communication in the Modern	Ernest Bormann Communication Theory and Research	Rhetorical communication presents reality dramatically, which conveys meaning, motive and emotion. Bormann proposed a 'dramatistic communication theory' which could be used to analyse rhetorical communication. Each piece of communication presented a rhetorical vision , a symbolic drama which contained characters, scene setting, a plotline and a 'sanctioning agent' (whatever was used to justify the recommended action such as God or Providence or racial superiority etc). 'Meaning, emotion and motive' were contained in this vision, and 'people caught up in the vision will act it out as their sense or understanding of social reality dictates'. The theory thus had both explanatory and predictive powers. ⁷³	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Expressive	Externalised: social scientist Doing/ Showing: (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Organization (1982); Force of Fantasy: Restoring the American Dream (1985)
Understanding Media: The Extensions of Man (1965); From Cliché to Archetype (1970)	Marshall McLuhan (1911-1980) Canadian educator, philosopher, media and communication theorist	The effects of media technology on human life, which is performed publicly. 'All the world's a stage' has become 'more than a metaphor' in the space age: 'the young now accept the public space of the earth as role-playing areas'. ⁷⁴	Technology	An acting space	Visibility Subjectification Strategies of performance Structure	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (+/-)
'Aesthetics of Revolution: The Marxist Melodrama' (1965)	W. Sypher Politics	Social and political life according to the theories of Marx and Darwin becomes melodrama, 'a theatre of tension between abstractions'. ⁷⁵	Political and intellectual life	An acting space A constructed art	Conflict management Strategies of presentation	Externalised: social scientist Doing: (-)
'An Interview with John Cage' (1965)	John Cage (1912-1992) American Avant-garde composer, author and critic	The relationship between art and everyday life: art draws attention to the theatre in life: 'Theatre takes place all the time wherever one is, and art simply facilitates persuading one this is the case'. ⁷⁶	Cultural life	An acting space	Visibility Strategies of performance Subjectification Self-awareness	Externalised: artist, critic Doing: (+)
Two Essays on Analytical Psychology (1966)	Carl Jung (1875-1961) Swiss psychiatrist	Visibility leads people to adopt personas to manage what they show: '[T]he persona is a complicated system of relations between individual consciousness and society, fittingly enough a kind of mask, designed on the one hand to make a definite	Psychological life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised: social scientist Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	and psychoanalyst	impression upon others, and, on the other, to conceal the true nature of the individual'. ⁷⁷		between actor and spectator		Showing (-)
Explanation and Human Action (1966)	A.R. Louch Sociology	Dramaturgy. We act under the scrutiny of others A sociological study which uses a dramaturgical perspective. ⁷⁸	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of performance Causality Purposefulness	Externalised: social scientist Doing (+/-)
'Politics as a Dramatic Form' (1966); ⁷⁹ 'The Dramaturgy of Politics' (1969) ⁸⁰	Richard Merelman Political communication	Dramaturgy. Politics uses dramatic elements for effect and can therefore be analysed as if it was theatre. Politics is dramatic; it uses dramatic devices such as personification, identification, catharsis, suspense, symbolism, role-reversal and unmasking, as well as manufactures climaxes, for 'impression management', especially over issues of 'style' or politics. Dramas can be analysed to create ideal types against which the real world can be assessed. Sociology should also study successful examples of drama in order to explicate how drama deals with particular situations of interest to sociology e.g. small group interaction and audience response. ⁸¹ Politics and theatre share elements such as impression management, life and death consequences, and conflict, especially interpersonal conflict. Both are mediated: theatre through production and politics through the mass media	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Conflict management Affective behaviour	Externalised: social scientist Internal: citizens (who can be duped) Doing/ Showing (+/-)
1967: Arab-Israeli Six Day War
'On Telling People' (1967)	John Griffiths Political theory	'We read the newspapers, we listen to and look at political commentators, we hear ministerial statements, and we are conscious of the existence of another world, the other side of the moon. So we become cynical to the point of switching off radio and television during general election broadcasts because, simply, we do not believe what is being said. The evasions, the half-truths, the falsities shine through the words and we are angered because we are treated like children. So politicians are laughed at and remain powerful. Can all this play acting really be	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Distance Alienation Strategies of presentation Possibility of delusion Inconsequential	Internal: disenchanted citizens Doing/ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		necessary for the management of 50,000,000 people?' ⁸²
Symbolic Crusade: Status Politics and the American Temperance Movement (1967); The Culture of Public Problems: Drink-Driving and the Symbolic Order (1981)	Joseph Gusfield Political Symbolology	Dramatism. Politics is like drama in the way it uses symbols, which can be used to deflect threat. 'One of the classic discussions of the difference between instrumental and symbolic politics [which] allows us to see political action as both rational and non-instrumental'. ⁸³ Gusfield's study of the American temperance movement 'provided a basis for later development of dramaturgical thinking about political processes'. ⁸⁴ Political rituals, according to Gusfield, function as 'secular prayers' which 'sharpen up the pointless and blunt the too sharply pointed'. The rituals 'involve two types of dramatic symbolism: gestures of cohesion [such as coronations, inaugurations, "fire-side" chats] and gestures of differentiation [e.g. negative campaigning]. Power, in this case, arises from the negotiation of symbols or images'. ⁸⁵	Social and political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification Conflict management Strategies of presentation Affective behaviour Repetition	Externalised: social scientist Internal: groups under threat Showing: (+/-)
Episodes of the Revolutionary War (1967)	Che Guevara (1928-1967) Revolutionary	Radical political life: was dramatic because it was conflictual. The new society in Cuba under Fidel Castro was a 'strange and moving drama'. Guevara saw situations in terms of 'protagonists in the drama'. ⁸⁶	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Conflict management Subjectification-Stock parts	Internal: radical activist as actor Doing: (+/-)
1968: Soviets suppress 'Prague Spring'; Students riot in Paris and elsewhere.
La Revolution Introuvable (1968) ⁸⁷	Raymond Aron (1905-1983) French philosopher	Radical political life was dramatic because it involved role-play. Aron called the riots in France a 'psycho-drama': ⁸⁸ 'I do not use the term 'psychodrama' without modification. But nevertheless, we have all been acting a part during this period. I took on the role of de Tocqueville; this has its ridiculous side, but others were playing Saint-Just, Robespierre or Lenin, which all in all was even more ridiculous'. ⁸⁹	Political life	A constructed art	Subjectification Stock parts	Internal: radical activist as role-player Doing: (-)
'The acquisition of social structure:	Aaron V. Cicourel Social	Role Theory. How meaningful social structure arises: through an assumption that perspectives were shared. Influenced by phenomenology and ethnomethodology, Cicourel asked how	Social life	A constructed art	Social interaction Coherence	Externalised: social scientist

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Towards a developmental sociology of language and meaning' (1968); 'Interpretive procedures and normative rules in the negotiation of status and role' (1972) ⁹⁰	Sciences	role-taking was possible. He argued that 'the taking and making of roles rests on a set of cognitive processes through which actors give meaning to the world and so sustain a 'sense of social structure''. Role-taking required cognitive skills in order to engage in role-taking, and ability 'to infer and impute meaning to situations'. To do this, role-players had to make assumptions about 'a reciprocity of perspectives' between themselves and others. ⁹¹			Purposefulness Meaningfulness Reciprocity	Doing: (+/-)
'Role Theory' (1968) ⁹²	T. Sarbin and V Allen Behaviour therapists	Role Theory: Social behaviour can be modified through practice. Since the actor rehearses to produce a successful performance, the metaphor of rehearsal can be used to modify behaviour and the development of social skills. ⁹³	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance Subjectification Self-awareness	Externalised: therapists Doing: (+/-)
'Spectacles and Scenarios: A Dramaturgy of Radical Activity' (1969) ⁹⁴	Lee Baxandall Politics	Dramaturgy: (a theatrical understanding rather than a sociological understanding of dramaturgy). Political life has always included the elements of theatre in its exercise and maintenance of power: 'the art of making dramas and placing them properly on the stage' (the world stage). Politics has always been theatre. Most radicals have had a 'dramaturgical consciousness' (Marx, Engels, Trotsky, Che Guevara). Lenin believed that revolutions were the 'festivals of the oppressed'. 'Social dramaticism' has always belonged to the elites in society. A 'lucid theatricality' has always been 'essential to maintaining the consensus' and to maintain 'the reputation' of power as well as its actuality. Hence 'the state has uncounted stages, plot-lines, and "routines"', but dramaturgy has consciously been taken up by radical action now. ⁹⁵	Political life	A constructed art	Structured Strategies of presentation, performance and direction Purposefulness Functionalist	Externalised: theorist; political actors Internal: the masses Doing: (-)
'The Theatrical	Richard	Dramaturgy: Life does involve playacting, but is more than the	The human	A seeing-place	Reductionism	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Analogy Reconsidered' (1969)	Dewey Sociology	theatre analogy is able to account for. '[T]he dramaturgical model requires much less distortion to make it fit the human condition' because theatre is a cultural product. It provided a language with which to describe the 'play-acting in everyday life', but it has been overused to the point where its terms are no longer unambiguous or are taken literally. Life involves playacting, but '[t]he theater is not the equivalent of society'. In fact, 'our willingness to "make do" with "role" or "role behavior" has been instrumental in our failure to invent an appropriate designation' for the playacting which occurs in life. Analogies are both selective and reductionist and may confuse or obfuscate rather than explain. ⁹⁶	condition	(which is problematic) A constructed art	Simplification Strategies of performance	social scientists who use theatre as a metaphor for life Internal: social scientist/critic who recognizes it as inadequate Doing (-)
'Art and Objecthood' (1969); ⁹⁷ Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot (1980)	Michael Fried Art History	Theatricality in painting was a negative trait, opposed to authenticity. It was apparent in 'turned out poses' where the subject appeared to be aware of the onlooker. ⁹⁸ Spectatorship was a site of power since it could require artists and performers to pretend their work was not being observed in order to have it accepted as 'authentic'. This position was epitomised by Diderot who insisted on the right to be able to observe while at the same time not allowing the object of his gaze to show that it was affected by his spectatorship. This produced artworks in which self-awareness was disguised, enabling the spectator to indulge in attributing any meaning he liked without fear of contradiction. Changes in artistic representation reveal spectatorship as a site of power.	Cultural lie	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation	Externalised: art historian Showing/ Watching: (+/-)

¹ Mills, C. Wright. 1967/1940. 'Situated Actions and Vocabularies of Motive'. In Power, Politics and People: the Collected Essays of C. Wright Mills, edited by I. Horowitz. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 439-452.

² Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269.p. 265

³ In Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.p. 355

-
- ⁴ Brecht journal entry 6th December 1940, quoted in Fiebach, Joachim. 2002. 'Theatricality: From Oral Traditions to Televised "Realities"'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2 and 3) pp. 17-32.p. 32
- ⁵ Sartre, Jean-Paul. 1995/1943. Being and Nothingness: An Essay on Phenomenological Ontology. London: Routledge.p. 254
- ⁶ Brown, Richard H. 1977. A Poetic for Sociology: Toward a logic of discovery for the human sciences. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p.116; Wikipedia, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/George_Homans accessed 17/08/2008.
- ⁷ Carlson, Marvin. 2004. Performance: A critical introduction. 2nd ed. New York and London: Routledge.pp. 41-2
- ⁸ Zerka Moreno 2004 in Yalom, Victor 2004, 'An Interview with Zerka Moreno', Psychotherapy.com, <http://www.psychotherapy.net/interview/zerka-moreno#section-psychodrama-explained> accessed 23/9/2010
- ⁹ Bentley, Eric. 1986/1946. The Pirandello Commentaries. Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press.pp.xii, 23
- ¹⁰ Riesman, David 1961/1950, The Lonely Crowd: A Study of the Changing American Character New Haven and London, Yale University Press, pp. 260-307
- ¹¹ Dean, Mitchell. 2006. 'A Political Mythology of World Order: Carl Schmitt's Nomos'. Theory, Culture and Society 23 (5) pp. 1-22.p.6
- ¹² Schmitt 1950: 75 in Dean.
- ¹³ Barthes 1972, Critical Essays, trans. Richard Howard, Evanston Ill., p. 38; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.p. 413.
- ¹⁴ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008].p. 11
- ¹⁵ Barthes, Roland. 1986. 'Diderot, Brecht, Eisenstein'. In The Responsibility of Forms: Critical Essays on Music, Art, and Representation: Basil Blackwell, pp. 89-97.p. 96
- ¹⁶ In Psychiatric Research Reports, II, 1955, pp. 39-51; reprinted in Bateson 1972, Steps to an Ecology of Mind, San Francisco, Chandler; cited in Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).
- ¹⁷ Boje et al 2003
- ¹⁸ Quoted in Biddle 1956, Role Theory, Expectations, Identities, and Behaviors, New York, Academic Press, p. 55. See Table.
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 431
- ²⁰ Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 197; in Carlson 1984: 431.
- ²¹ Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 202-4; in Carlson 1984: 431.
- ²² Going by Schlossman (2002), not much activity seems to have occurred in this area. (Schlossman, David A. 2002. Actors and Activists: Politics, Performance, and Exchange Among Social Worlds. New York and London: Routledge.)
- ²³ Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 2028-9; in Carlson 1984: 432.
- ²⁴ Biddle, Bruce. 1956. Role Theory: Expectations, Identities, and Behaviors. New York: Academic Press.pp.55-60
- ²⁵ Turner, Victor. 1974. Dramas, Fields and Metaphors: Symbolic Action in Human Society. Edited by V. Turner, Symbol, Myth, and Ritual Series. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.p.32
- ²⁶ Turner 1974: 13
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 484
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 484-5

-
- ²⁹ Kachel, A. T. 2001. 'Book Review: From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play (Victor Turner); Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor (Bruce Wilshire)'. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion (2001) pp. 386-387.p. 386
- ³⁰ Turner, Victor. 1988. 'The Anthropology of Performance'. In The Anthropology of Performance. New York: PAJ Publications, 72-98.
- ³¹ Turner 1974: 31
- ³² See MacAloon, John J. 1984. 'Introduction: Cultural Performances, Culture Theory'. In Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, edited by J. J. MacAloon. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1-15. and Schechner, Richard. 1988. 'Victor Turner's Last Adventure'. In The Anthropology of Performance. Victor Turner, New York: PAJ Publications.
- ³³ Turner 1979: 81 in Bharucha, Rustom 2000, The Politics of Cultural Practice: Thinking Through Theatre in an Age of Globalisation, London, The Athlone Press, p.166n4
- ³⁴ In British Journal of Sociology Vol 8, pp. 106-120; cited in Scott, J. 2001. 'Status and Role: Structural Aspects'. In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences: Elsevier Science <http://www.sciencedirect.com.simsrad.net.ocs.mq.edu.au> accessed 20/10.2004.
- ³⁵ Scott 2001
- ³⁶ Arditi, Jorge (George). 1987. 'Role as a Cultural Concept'. Theory and Society 16 (4) 565-591.p. 587n17
- ³⁷ Nadel, 1957, The Theory of Social Structure Carlton, Melbourne University Press, p. 66
- ³⁸ Scott 2001
- ³⁹ Villa, Dana. c1996. Arendt and Heidegger: the Fate of the Political. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press.p. 53
- ⁴⁰ Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.p.44
- ⁴¹ Arendt, Hannah. 1973. On Revolution: Penguin.pp. 103, 107-8
- ⁴² Arendt, Hannah. 1978/1971. The Life of the Mind. San Diego, New York, London: A Harvest Book, Harcourt Brace and Company.pp.21-22
- ⁴³ Dahrendorf, Ralf. 1973/1958. Homo Sociologicus. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.p. 12
- ⁴⁴ Scott 2001
- ⁴⁵ Camus in Schmitt, Natalie Crohn. 1990. Actors and Onlookers: Theater and Twentieth-Century Scientific Views of Nature. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.p.1
- ⁴⁶ Goffman, Erving. 1974. Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience. New York: Harper and Row.p.508
- ⁴⁷ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter.pp.1, 40
- ⁴⁸ Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons.p. 75
- ⁴⁹ This is despite claims by Mangham and Overington that Goffman had an understanding of theatre which 'does not appear to be informed by actual contact with plays and players' (1987: 201n5).
- ⁵⁰ Bradbury, M., B. Heading, and M. Hollis. 1972. 'The Man and The Mask: A Discussion of Role Theory'. In Role, edited by J. A. Jackson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.p. 44
- ⁵¹ Brissett and Edgley 1990: 1
- ⁵² Goffman 1974: 1-2, 10
- ⁵³ Carlson 2004: 46. The idea of 'keying' is taken up by Richard Schechner in his concept of 'restored behaviour' which is behaviour which is not only repeated, but is deliberately marked out or framed as performance.
- ⁵⁴ Goffman 1974: 547

-
- ⁵⁵ Chriss, James. 1995. 'Habermas, Goffman, and Communicative Action: Implications for Professional Practice'. American Sociological Review 60 (4) pp. 545-565.
- ⁵⁶ Van Dyke, Vernon. 1960. Political Science: A Philosophical Analysis. Stanford, California: Stanford University Press.p.14
- ⁵⁷ Cited in Schmitt 1990: 1
- ⁵⁸ Chapter 7 in his book Modern Organization, in 1961 by Knopf (New York).
- ⁵⁹ Gardner, William L. III. 1992. 'Lessons in Organizational Dramaturgy: The Art of Impression Management'. Organizational Dynamics (Summer 1992) pp. 33-46.p.34
- ⁶⁰ Berne, Eric. 1976. 'Human Destiny'. In Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 89-101.p. 61
- ⁶¹ Carlson 2004: 43
- ⁶² Blumer, Herbert. 1962. 'Society as Symbolic Interaction'. In Human Behaviour and Social Processes: an interactionist approach, edited by A. Rose. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, pp. 179-192.pp.186-9
- ⁶³ In A. Rose (ed) 1962, Human Behavior and Social Processes, London, Routledge and Kegan Paul; cited in Scott 2001.
- ⁶⁴ Scott 2001
- ⁶⁵ Brown 1977: 257n39
- ⁶⁶ Messinger et al 1962, 'Life as Theatre: Some Notes on One Dramaturgic Approach to Social Reality', Sociometry Vol 25(1), pp. 98-110.
- ⁶⁷ Messinger et al 1962: 98-110
- ⁶⁸ Mangham and Overington 1987: 72
- ⁶⁹ Duncan 1962: xvii in Mangham and Overington 1987: 72
- ⁷⁰ Klapp, Orin. 1964. Symbolic Leaders: Public Dramas and Public Men. Chicago: Aldine.pp.55-57, 250-263. Klapp claims that Goffman's account (and that of others who use a dramaturgical perspective) remains within a structuralist account of theatre. This is not Klapp's aim, however, his account suffers from the shift which seems to plague many dramaturgical accounts of social and public life, beginning with the use of drama as a perspective, but sliding into drama as an actual description. Lindholm calls this process 'Taking for granted what one wishes to prove' (1998:247). Theorists get seduced by the metaphor. Klapp, unlike many others, does salvage his account largely because his idea of 'drama' seems to owe more to the original Greek meaning of the term (to do) than to ideas about the theatre. Public drama, then, is about public action, action which occurs, always, before an audience. In this, Klapp comes close to Edmund Burke's way of viewing public life, although his perception of where the limits are is quite different. Both raise the question of whether or not their use of drama (and derivative terms) is actually metaphor.
- ⁷¹ Klapp 1964: 255
- ⁷² Duvignaud 1965: 247 in Butwin, Joseph. 1975. 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi'. Research Studies 43 (3) pp. 141-152.p. 150
- ⁷³ Cragan, John F., and Donald C. Shields. 1981. Applied Communication Research: A Dramatistic Approach. Prospect Heights, Illinois: Waveland Press, Inc.p. 3
- ⁷⁴ McLuhan From Cliche 1970: 9ff; quoted in Stern 1979, 'Actors, Characters, and Spectators in Tamayo's Un drama nuevo', Theatre Journal Vol 31(1), p. 75.
- ⁷⁵ Sypher Aesthetics 1965: 262, in R. Corrigan (ed), Tragedy: Vision and Form, New York University Press, 1965.
- ⁷⁶ John Cage, cited in Gilman, Richard 1969, The Confusion of Realms, New York, Vantage Books.
- ⁷⁷ Jung Two Essays 1966: 305; quoted in Bartsch, Shadi. 2006. The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.p.223
- ⁷⁸ Brown 1977: 257n39
- ⁷⁹ Presented to the American Political Science Association Meeting, 6th – 10th September, 1966.

-
- ⁸⁰ Initially In Sociological Quarterly Vol X, pp. 216-241; subsequently reprinted in Combs, James E., and Michael W. Mansfield, eds. 1976. Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society. Edited by G. H. Gordon, Humanistic Studies in the Communication Arts. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers. pp. 285-301.
- ⁸¹ Merelman, Richard M. 1976/1969. 'The Dramaturgy of Politics'. In Drama in Life: The uses of Communication in Society, edited by J. E. Combs and M. W. Mansfield. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, pp. 285-301. p. 299
- ⁸² Griffiths 1967: 23, in Bernard Crick (ed), Essays on Reform, Oxford University Press, p. 23
- ⁸³ Mangham and Overington 1987: 75
- ⁸⁴ Brissett and Edgley 1990: 350
- ⁸⁵ Gusfield, Joseph. 1963. 'A Dramatistic Theory of Status Politics'. In Symbolic Crusade: Status Politics and the American Temperance Movement. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 166-188. p. 170
- ⁸⁶ Baxandall, Lee. 1969. 'Spectacles and Scenarios: A Dramaturgy of Radical Activity'. The Drama Review: TDR 13 (4) pp. 52-71. p. 71
- ⁸⁷ Translated in Encounter, December 1968; discussed in Mount, Ferdinand. 1972. The Theatre of Politics. 5 Winsley St., London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson. p.4.
- ⁸⁸ Mount 1972: 4
- ⁸⁹ Aron 1968 in Mount 1972: 4
- ⁹⁰ Published respectively in A.V. Cicourel (ed) 1968, 1973 Cognitive Sociology, UK, Penguin, Harmondsworth and A.V. Cicourel (1972), 1973 Cognitive Sociology, UK, Penguin, Harmondsworth; cited in Scott 2001.
- ⁹¹ Scott 2001
- ⁹² In G. Lindzey and E. Aronson (eds) 1968, The Handbook of Social Psychology, Reading Mass., Addison-Wesley, pp. 488-567.
- ⁹³ Carlson 2004: 42-3
- ⁹⁴ In The Drama Review: TDR, Vol 13(4) 1969, pp. 52-71. Note that Baxandall's idea of dramaturgy seems to come from theatre rather than from Goffman and Burke.
- ⁹⁵ Baxandall 1969: 53-5, 66
- ⁹⁶ Dewey, Richard. 1969. 'The Theatrical Analogy Reconsidered'. The American Sociologist 4 pp. 307-311. pp. 308-10
- ⁹⁷ In Gregory Battock (ed) 1969, Minimal Art, New York, Dutton.
- ⁹⁸ Quinn, Michael. 1995. 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 106-114.

Table 9/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator: 1970-1974

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1970s: dramaturgy comes to the fore, becoming by the 1990s ‘the most ubiquitous form of scholarship’¹ despite early criticism from a variety of directions. For example, in 1969, Richard Dewey argued that the analogy was reductive, and interfered with the ability to find ways of talking about everyday human playacting. In 1970 Aaron Cicourel argued that the metaphor was ‘defective in explaining how actors are capable of imitation and innovation with little or no prior rehearsal, just as a child is capable of producing grammatically correct utterances that he has never heard and is capable of understanding utterances that have never been heard before’.² Even Goffman moved away from the approach, preferring instead the metaphor of framing in his later work. Wars in Africa, Asia and the Middle East
A Sociology of the Absurd (1970); The Drama of Social Reality (1975)	Stanford Lyman and Marvin Scott Social Psychology	Dramatism. An explanation of the way theatre can be used to elucidate the world: ‘the methodological approach that best enables us to understand how the practical accomplishments of politics come to pass.’³ An attempt to extent and elaborate the dramaturgical perspective used by Kenneth Burke through a ‘sociological criticism’ of the literature of drama,⁴ a task which requires them as social scientists to ‘behave ... like an audience at a drama’. In behaving like an audience, they discover that ‘[s]ocial reality ... is realized theatrically ... reality is a drama, life is theatre, and the social world is inherently dramatic’.⁵ Dramatic texts, especially those of Shakespeare, provide ‘a formal prism through which the human condition may be refracted in all its manifold experiences and existences’.⁶ A Sociology of the Absurd (1970) ‘starts with the assumption that the world is without essential meaning’.⁷ Their studies of dramatic texts reveal a concern to ‘support the ‘real’ character of life as a dramatic communication’.⁸ Taking up Evreinov’s term theatrocracy (rule by theatre), they claim that legitimacy of power is constructed dramatically.⁹ Individuals create forms of resistance or escape dramatically, using myths and symbols such as ‘the social bandit’. According to Brown, their ‘stage’ is peopled by a combination of actors and individuals who seem to have accidentally strayed into the theatre and found themselves on stage before spectators which expect something of them because of where they are.¹⁰ A muddle of dramatism (drama can	The social world	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification strategies of power to be seen Causality	Externalised: social scientists and theorists (theoria) whose task it was ‘to see the world’ and reveal its hidden truths. Internal: deluded citizens/ subject of political power Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		reveal life), dramaturgy (life can be seen as theatre), Evreinov (life is theatre) and Machiavelli (political life must attend to appearances using theatrical techniques). This muddle is exemplified in their statement that ‘the methodological approach that best enables us to understand how the practical accomplishments of politics come to pass is found in dramaturgy, a derivative of performance theory’, a term they introduce for the first time in Chapter 5 (n1) to indicate that their perspective ‘involves both ontological and heuristic features associated with the notion of drama’.¹¹ Although they claim here that dramaturgy is derived from performance theory, there is no mention of this in their exposition of Goffman other than to say that ‘Goffman’s dramaturgy focuses on social reality as a theatre of performances available for study by social scientists and ... the social actors themselves’.¹² Nevertheless, they go on to say that political sociology is a ‘subdiscipline’ of performance theory concerned with clarifying ‘the interconnection between statecraft and stagecraft’ and ‘the study of political dramas’. These are defined as ‘the variety of performances that obtain or seek to obtain power and the equally varied performances undertaken to demonstrate dominance and maintain imperative coordination’ by formal government institutions as well as ‘non-governmental arenas of power and authority’ such as ‘factories, bureaus, churches, schools and military organizations’, and less formal sites of power and authority such as ‘families, friendship groups, gangs, cliques, and clubs’. All of these constitute ‘theatres of politics for the sociologist’ because ‘[a]ll these arenas of life constitute the domain of teatrocracy – the paradigm domain for the theoria who study theatre-in-life’. Political sociology is concerned with the way power is ‘translated into authority’. Authority ‘is a particular and complex form of impression management, designed ... to legitimate the right of the few to

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		rule over and decide the fate of the many' through the use of myth . Myths are 'efficacious social constructions [which take the form of] basic and essential dramas'. There are six basic myths which provide moral justification for authority to rule: wisdom and knowledge, divide sanction, courage and heroism, consent and majority rule, tradition and custom and inevitable historical forces. Each requires some form of demonstration . Wisdom and knowledge must be indicated; the 'inner call' must be given outer expression, heroism must be performed, consent requires the staging of election contests, tradition must appear 'in the mantle of acknowledged custom' and historical forces must be demonstrated. Resistance too requires 'management of expression' and impression. 'All ... are plays'. ¹³
Comment in The New York Times May 3, 1970	Donald Fread Playwright	Political institutions also stage performances, such as "The Gulf of Tonkin" and "The Black Panther Will Get you if You Don't Watch Out" ... "Why Don't They Take a Bath?" [and] "The Body Count" ... 'a wonderful comedy of the absurd'. ¹⁴	Political life:	A constructed art	Strategies of performance, direction and presentation Purposefulness	Externalised: playwright Internal: citizens Doing (-)
Do It! Scenarios of the Revolution (1970)	Jerry Rubin (1938-1994) American social activist; co-founder of the Yippies	'Life is theater and we are the guerrillas attacking the shrines of authority ... the street is the stage'. ¹⁵	Political life	An acting space	Strategic action	Internal: activist Doing (+)
'Creating Political Reality' (1970)	Henry Kariel Political Science	Prevailing political realities are 'the great hit plays ... put on by corporate boards, university administrations, welfare bureaucracies, National Guard units, peace research centres, or other institutions for crisis management' against which we must strive to 'create new possibilities'. ¹⁶	Political life	A seeing place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction	Externalised: theorist, critic Internal: managed citizens Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
‘Theatrum Philosophicum’ (1970); ‘The Art of Telling the Truth’ (1983) ¹⁷	Michel Foucault French Sociologist/ Philosopher	Thinking as a staged confrontation between philosopher (spectator) and stupidity (being in all its multiplicity and difference. ‘Theatrum Philosophicum’ is a review essay on Deleuze’s Difference and Repetition (1968) and The Logic of Sense (1969). In it, Foucault argues that Deleuze has demonstrated a new form of philosophy, ‘philosophy not as thought but as theater – a theater of mime with multiple, fugitive, and instantaneous scenes in which blind gestures signal to each other’. ¹⁸ In such an ‘acategorical’ philosophy, the historical figures of Western philosophy reappear as a gesture or ‘an impressive mustache’ in a later philosopher. In breaking up categorical thought, Foucault considers that Deleuze has made thought ‘again possible’. Foucault’s 1983 essay argues that revolutions (such as the French Revolution) are dramas. They provide ‘a spectacle’ which, according to Kant, is ‘welcomed all around by spectators’ who do not take part in it, but who observe it, attend it and get ‘carried away by it’ as an indication ‘of the moral disposition in mankind’ – the disposition towards reform which is a mark of enlightenment. ¹⁹ Philosophy is not a confrontation with error, but with stupidity. It only thinks it is confronting error because it has created categories by which it controls difference. Only within categories can one think mistakenly. This, in itself, is a restriction on thinking (as well as difference). Foucault is questioning what Kant means by ‘enlightenment’ – a self-consciousness about the present	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance. Self-awareness Visibility	Externalised: spectators who get carried away with enthusiasm at the sight of revolution; theorist/ spectators who observe these others (and sometimes the revolutions as well) and develop categories by which to contain the world Internalised: self-disciplined individual Doing/ Showing (+/-)
1971: America withdraws from Vietnam
‘From Print to Rehearsal: A	Charles Sandifer	Readers Theatre allowed audiences to hear what we would now call a ‘concert’ version of a significant literary work which was	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied)	Strategies of presentation	Externalised: scholar;

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Study of Principles for Adapting Literature to Readers Theatre' (1971)	Literature and Oral Interpretation	not originally intended for a theatre production. Scholars in this area (mostly American) selected, adapted and staged (in varying degrees) this literature to aid interpretation of the literature. Readers Theatre was a 'Theatre of the Mind'. The idea of Readers Theatre is itself a theatre metaphor. Sandifer also considers his attempt to identify the principles used in these productions a form of 'rehearsal'. ²⁰		A constructed art		reader Doing (+)
'Trial by Drama' (1971)	Richard Harbinger Lawyer	'[A]n adversary trial is a dramatic thing put to legal use'. ²¹ If one looks at a trial as a play, one can identify the components of a play: the crime (a play within a play), plot, protagonists. ²²	Legal conventions	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation	Externalised: practitioner of law Doing (+/-)
'Profile of Roel van Duyn' (1971) ²³	Roel van Duyn Inventor of the Dutch Gnomes/ Pixies; city councillor	Political life entailed taking roles. On being elected to the Amsterdam city council, van Duyn said of political life that 'After all it was a theatre. Everyone had a fixed role, all decisions were taken in advance; there was no real debate; and nobody listened to anybody else. So I decided to do consciously what the others did unconsciously. I acted a part – my own little role'.	Political life	A constructed art	Subjectification Strategies of presentation and performance	Internal: political participant Doing (-)
The Theatre of Politics (1972)	Ferdinand Mount Political Theory	Political life involves a relationship with spectators as well as temporal and spatial structuring. Theatre provides a model for democratic politics which takes account of its need to satisfy its spectators. The spectators of politics must be wooed by political actors, and judge political action. Politics should be considered literally as theatre . The value of thinking about politics as theatre lies in the way theatre interacts with society. Politics as theatre is the only paradigm of politics which properly recognizes that its relationship with its spectators lies in satisfying those spectators: 'if the theatrical element is central and ubiquitous, then a major role ... must be conceded to the actual opinions of the public'. ²⁴ Mount also uses theatre as an organizing principle for his book, which is divided into Prologue, Acts, Finale and Epilogue. Politics is [like] theatre because politicians, like actors, play dual	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility, Judgment The possibility of dissembling Strategies of presentation and performance Interaction	Externalised: political theorist; Internal: citizens Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		roles; they must use a common language and reflect their society in recognizable ways. Politics uses artifice, is performed before spectators who must be 'wooded' and who judge it. Politics is a mediated activity, and politicians and actors share the reputation for falsity and dissembling (which is based on a misunderstanding of what their tasks are). Both politics and theatre utilize rhetoric, and both politicians and actors must master the art of self-projection.
'The Man and the Mask: a Discussion of Role Theory' (1972)	M. Bradbury, B. Heading and M. Hollis Sociology/ Theatre	Role Theory. Human behaviour can be predictable because it is based on social norms. Theatre [as] an analogy ... has inspired the development of role analysis'. 'Role' is 'a core concept for the sociologist', one which underpins the discipline of sociology. It is about 'a special brand of predictable behaviour ... 'role' is a subset of all expected behaviour', of social norms. It is useful for the analysis of both social conflict and social consensus because it 'represents a link between individual personality and social structure ... the individual actor as role-player performs on the stage of the broader society'. Because individuals are role-players 'their behaviour is neither idiosyncratic nor random'. ²⁵ 'The social actor ... resembles the stage actor' because he is 'programmed': He operates with a script written for him ... emitting cues which elicit responses from other actors'. Human regularities result from 'impersonation'. Roles are interactive, and 'in all their interaction the sociologist thinks he can detect the social play being enacted' because certain aspects of this interaction is 'patterned'. ²⁶ In the course of this discussion, both Bradbury and Hollis suggest that Heading pushes the metaphor too far, or is very selective about what aspects of theatre are to be applicable. Bradbury in fact accuses Heading of 'misusing the metaphor': 'Where a role is a mask, you are making it a face as well ... a slightly disturbing imperialism'. Hollis argues that 'it is no use appealing to the metaphor of the theatre to explain in what	Social behaviour	A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of performance and presentation Causality Convention	Externalised: social theorist Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		sense a man is the sum of the roles which he plays. For the metaphor ... gives ... conflicting answers'
'Deep Play: Notes on the Balinese Cockfight' (1972); Negara: The Theatrical State in Nineteenth Century Bali (1980); 'Blurred Genres: The Figuration of Social Thought' (1980)	Clifford Geertz (1926-2006) Anthropology	Social life can be read as a cultural text in the way that we understand and experience theatre, not for what happens (a history lesson) but for what might happen if life could be as freely shaped as art. Negara was an examination of the royal families in pre-colonial Bali. It offered a diffused view of political authority which challenged western power-centred views. Nevertheless, Geertz warned against too close an identification of theatre processes with sociological or anthropological phenomena, claiming it had an homogenising effect. He recommended a synthesis between Turner's pattern and the work of theorists of symbolic action such as Kenneth Burke, Frye and Langer, who focus on the rhetoric of drama: what it says. This would provide a richer model for both anthropological study and theatre theory, ²⁷ one which would focus on 'connecting action to its sense rather than behavior to its determinants' by treating cultural forms as texts, imaginative works which need to be 'penetrated' rather than dissected, to find out what 'something' they are saying (or bringing into focus) of something – a telling 'that tells us less what happens than the kind of thing that would happen if, as is not the case, life were art and could be as freely shaped'. ²⁸ For Geertz, 'societies, like lives, contain their own interpretations. One has only to learn how to gain access to them'. This is one of the major tasks of modern sociology and has produced a 'blurring' of genre boundaries as analysts try to draw on culture for possible approaches. The theatre analogy contains two distinct and opposing threads which have complicated this task. Geertz tries to bring these threads together in Negara .	Social life	A constructed art	Freedom from consequences Strategies of presentation Meaningfulness Purposefulness	Externalised: social scientist; anthropologist Showing/ Watching (+/-)
Theatricality: A Study of	Elizabeth Burns	Theatricality: Social life, like theatre, operates under conventions of performance. Burns argues that the theatre	Social life:	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Detachment	Externalised: sociologist;

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life (1972)	Sociologist	metaphor ‘was most widely used in literature during the 16 th century and early 17 th century, at a time of intense public living when royal and civic ceremonial was constantly visible in the towns’, and that after a period during which life was characterise by a withdrawal into privacy, theatricality is now being rediscovered ‘as a mode of acting out ordinary life’ to such an extent that the theatrical quality of life is now largely taken for granted. She nevertheless argues that this is a one-sided view of life, experienced by those ‘who feel themselves on the margin of events either because they have adopted the role of spectator, or because, though present, they have not yet been offered a part, or have not learnt [their part] sufficiently well to enable them to join the actors’. Theatricality here is both a choice, and/or an exercise of power against others. Some choose to be spectators; others have spectatorship imposed upon them. ²⁹		A relationship between actor and spectator	Convention	marginalised members of society Internal: those who choose to be spectators rather than actors Showing (+/-)
‘A Symbolic Interactionist Analysis of Politics’ (1972); ‘The Presidency and Impression Management’ (1979) ³⁰	Peter Hall Critical Sociology	Dramaturgy. Political life involves stagecraft and impression management. Impression management is a form of power. Politics ‘is a kind of theatre [which involves] enforced political stagings and image-management of capitalist society [through which] powerful elites sustain both their power and its institutions by projecting political and cultural images upon the masses, and by generating the illusion that society is in reality of the people, by the people, and for the people’. ³¹ A ‘fiercely anticapitalist ... dramaturgy, which maintains the unexamined assumption that politics is theatrical’ of Lyman and Scott. Impression Management. The concept of political impression management can be ‘extremely useful in analyzing, explaining and understanding activities of the presidency’. Impression management ‘means that control over the conduct of others for one’s own interest is achieved by influencing the definition of the situation in which all are involved’. Impression management is thus concerned ‘not only with what is said but what appears’.	Political life:	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and direction The possibility of deception Functionalism	Externalised: analyst Internal: the manipulated and deluded spectator/ Citizen Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Political impression management involved two ‘processes of power’: the control of the flow of information; and the mobilization of symbolic support. It is useful to power in representative democracies in which political power is expected to be transparent, but in which most people are distant from most political events. The media is the medium through which impression management works. It ‘willingly’ gets ‘caught up in portraying politics as presidential drama’, although it has divergent as well as shared interests with politics. Current uses of impression management in politics are ‘designed to induce acquiescence ... from a desired, generally passive, audience. Impression management is a form of power, one which is ‘relatively easy and cheap’, could be used ‘to inform, to inspire, to motivate’ but is normally used ‘to pacify, deflect, confuse and seduce’. It is ‘a form of power used by the powerful’ but often ‘in lieu of positive action and ultimate ends’. ³²
Melodrama (1973)	James Leslie Smith Drama theory	Most people don’t really know what a melodrama is. The first melodrama was Rousseau’s Pygmalion (1770) in which the action rather than the words were accompanied by music. The new genre was very successful and much admired but by the 1780s had virtually been swallowed up by pantomime. Melodramas can be trashy but need not be. They remain popular because ‘[W]e see most of the serious conflicts and crises of our everyday lives in melodramatic rather than tragic terms’. In melodrama things are not complicated either ‘we win or lose’. ³³	Perception of everyday life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Revelation Allowing understanding	Externalised: theorist Internal: everyone Doing (+/-)
The Dramas of Politics (1973); The Dramas of Political Life (1980)	J. Rosenau Political Science	Political life is patterned and performative. The stable patterns of politics are dramatic. Rosenau identifies these dramatic characteristics and provides ‘performance criteria’ for analysing them in a highly systematic way. ³⁴	Political life:	A constructed art	Strategies of performance and presentation	Externalised: theorist Doing (+/-)
Instructions to staff (1973)	Reuven Frank Director of	‘Every news story should, without any sacrifice of probity or responsibility, display the attributes of fiction, of drama’. ³⁵ ‘Raw	Intellectual life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised: reporter

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	NBC	happenings' have to be organized in order to give them meaning. ³⁶				Doing (+)
'Barry Goldwater: A Chat' (1973)	Gore Vidal Novelist, essayist, dramatist	Politicians must be actors. '[P]olitics is improvisation. To the artful dodger rather than the true believer does the prize'. The politicians 'must have that instinctive sense of occasion'. ³⁷ His perspective 'comes as close to that of a modern Machiavelli as a democracy is likely to produce'. ³⁸	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised: observer Doing (-)
Handeln und Zuschauen (1973)	Uri Rapp Sociologist	Social interrelations involve both action and spectatorship: this applies to all social life including theatre. Considers theatre both as a social situation and as the embodiment of social interrelations. The keys to drama are 'action and observation'. These take place both inside and outside the theatre in 'role-playing, arrangement of situation, presentation, observation of self and others' etc. The unity of social man in 'an open-ended aggregate of played, playable, fantastical, and anticipated roles'. Human society 'created the theatre as a model, a copy in which society's own signification could be symbolized'. ³⁹	Social and cultural life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and presentation allowing signification Revelatory	Internal: we are both actors and spectators in all aspects of social life including theatre, which epitomises this relationship Doing (+)
'Football: A Sociological Eulogy' (1973)	S. Edgell & D. Jary Sociology	Spectators experience football as intensely as theatre audiences or congregations. 'Football expands from a private inter-group game to become ... a kind of theatre or surrogate religion. A team's supporters become members of communities of shared experience, values, and above all, shared emotionalism'. ⁴⁰	Social life (sport)	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Focusing enabling inter-subjectivity	Externalised: analysts Doing (+/-)
'Self-monitoring of expressive behavior' (1974); 'Impression management' (1977); 'Self-	M. Snyder Social psychology	Dramaturgy; Impression Management. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others. A psychological application of dramaturgy which delineates and investigates the impact of dramaturgical awareness on human behaviour. ⁴²	Social behaviour:	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification which enables self-monitoring Self-awareness	Externalised: analyst Internalised: the reflexive self Doing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
monitoring processes' (1979); Public Appearances, Private Realities (1987). ⁴¹
Popular images of politics: a taxonomy (1974); 'The drama, illusion and reality of political images' (1976)	Dan Nimmo Political communication	Dramaturgy; Impression Management. Political life occurs under the gaze of spectators and other actors and involves norms of performance and impression management. Politics is as much public drama and play as minded, adaptive behaviour. ' Politics is dramatic action , and the images through which we play our roles, like the drama itself, are sometimes authentic and sometimes illusory'. ⁴³ The individual is 'a performer who manages the impressions people have of him by playing various roles. Moreover ... all of us are members of the cast. We are 'on-stage'; i.e. through motivated role performances we present images for spectators to observe, interpret and respond to. Our performances take place in particular settings, and we use several media and props to convey the impressions appropriate to our roles ... the key elements of any performance are the act (or acts), actor, motive, role, scene, and vehicle for addressing an audience'. ⁴⁴	Political life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of performance and presentation Self-awareness The possibility of deception Impression-management Functionalism	Externalised: analyst Internal: others Doing (-)
Bradstow: A study of status, class and power in a small Australian town (1974)	R.A. Wild Sociologist	Social life entails norms of behaviour; we are judged on how we meet those norms by others, particularly those of a lower status. '[T]he gentry do not play to a local audience. They act their roles in the drawing rooms and lawns of private mansions The bosses ... play to a wide audience ... They lay claim and receive deference from the lower groups for their performances' ... The extent of the role sets and role audiences ...'. Although Wild's study draws on Weber's concept of status, this so easily, and almost unnoticeably, combines with Goffman's dramaturgy as to illustrate Mangham and Overington's point that many social	Social life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Judgment	Externalised: researcher/analyst Internal: people of lower status than the actor Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		science studies are implicitly dramaturgical – not least because of the ascription of character-types, such as ‘The Grange-ites’, ‘the bosses’, ‘the Bowling Club clique’ and ‘the R.S.L. club crowd’, and the set time period (1967-1970). ⁴⁵
A Framework for Representing Knowledge (1974); The Society of Mind (1988)	Marvin Minsky Perception	The concept of ‘frame’ helps to explain changed understandings of perception. Both optic and textual frames create a theatre of memory. An individual selects from memory a structure (frame) which provides information about what should happen, what will happen next and what to do if things go wrong. Perception developed. As infants, we operate according to a Ptolomeian schema: the world is structured according to our field of perception and revolves around us. As adults, we come to operate according to a Copernican schema: we have a space-centred perception in which we understand that the world does not end at the boundaries of our perception: there is a space behind the door which relates to other spaces. ⁴⁶ Minsky suggests that frames are not just textual or language devices but are also optic devices. According to Bartels, he does not succeed in articulating this, and subsequent theory about frames tends to be based on textual and linguistic devices.	Perception:	A seeing place	Strategies of presentation	Internal Internalised: a way of accessing the resources of memory Watching (+/-)
‘News Theatre’ (1974). ⁴⁷	Robert Brustein Drama critic	Political life is performative. Drew attention to the theatrical nature of politics.	Political life:	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of performance	Externalised: critic Doing (+/-)

¹ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, p.1

² Aaron Cicourel 1970, ‘Basic and Normative Rules in the Negotiation of Status and Role’, in Hans Peter Dreitzel (ed), Recent Sociology, No 2, NY, MacMillan, p. 28.

³ Lyman, Stanford M, and Marvin B. Scott. 1975. The Drama of Social Reality. New York: Oxford University Press: 169n1

⁴ Lyman and Scott 1975: 65n7

⁵ Lyman and Scott 1975: 3

⁶ Lyman and Scott 1975: 159

⁷ Lyman and Scott 1975: 166n1

-
- ⁸ Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons: 75
- ⁹ Lyman and Scott 1975: 111
- ¹⁰ Brown, Richard H. 1977. A Poetic for Sociology: Toward a logic of discovery for the human sciences. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 158
- ¹¹ Lyman and Scott 1975: 169n1
- ¹² Lyman and Scott 1975: 106-111
- ¹³ Lyman and Scott 1975: 114-28
- ¹⁴ Quoted in Kariel, Henry S. 1970. 'Creating Political Reality'. The American Political Science Review 64 (4) pp. 1088-1098, p 1094-5.
- ¹⁵ Rubin 1970 Do It! Scenarios of the Revolution, Simon and Schuster: 250
- ¹⁶ Kariel 1970: 1094; published in The American Political Science Review Vol 64(4), pp. 1088-1098.
- ¹⁷ Initially the first lecture at the Collège de France in 1983; In 1984 in Magazine littéraire 207, May, pp. 35-39; reprinted in Foucault, Michel 1988, Politics, Philosophy, Culture: Interviews and Other Writings 1977-1984, Lawrence Kritzman (ed), New York, Routledge.
- ¹⁸ Foucault, Michel. 2008/1970. "Theatrum Philosophicum". Generation-online www.generation-online.org/p/fpoucault5.htm accessed 17 January 2008
- ¹⁹ Foucault 1988/1983: 92-3 (see n17)
- ²⁰ Sandifer 1971 'From Print to Rehearsal: A Study of Principles for Adapting Literature to Readers Theatre', The Speech Teacher Vol 20(2): 115-120, p.18.
- ²¹ Harbinger 1971 'Trial by Drama', Judicature 55(3): 122-129, p. 122.
- ²² Winner, Lucy. 2005. 'Democratic Acts: Theatre of Public Trials'. Theatre Topics 15 (2):149-169, p. 151
- ²³ Published in The Observer, 16 May, 1971; cited in Mount, Ferdinand. 1972. The Theatre of Politics. 5 Winsley St., London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, p 5.
- ²⁴ Mount 1972: 9
- ²⁵ This seems a circular argument: thinking of human behaviour as if it were role-playing reveals some human behaviour to be predictable; at the same time, it is because humans are role-players that we can see that a lot of their behaviour is predictable.
- ²⁶ Bradbury, M., B. Heading, and M. Hollis. 1972. 'The Man and The Mask: A Discussion of Role Theory'. In Role, edited by J. A. Jackson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp 42-8).
- ²⁷ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press p. 485
- ²⁸ Geertz, Clifford. 1980. 'Blurred Genres: The Refiguration of Social Thought'. The American Scholar 49: 165-179, pp. 174-201. 'Deep Play' was originally In Daedalus Vol 101(1), 1972. It has been republished many times, in a wide variety of material. The 2000 reprint appears in L. Crothers and C. Lockhart (eds), Culture and Politics: A Reader, New York, St Martin's Press, pp. 175-205
- ²⁹ Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman, pp. 94, 11.
- ³⁰ Hall, Peter 1972, 'A Symbolic Interactionist Analysis of Politics' Sociological Inquiry 42(3-4): 35-75; 1979, 'The Presidency and Impression Management' Studies in Symbolic Interaction 2: 283-305, Reprinted in Life as Theater, D. Brissett and C. Edgley 1990.
- ³¹ Borreca, Art. 1993. 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View'. The Drama Review 37 (2): 56-79, p. 62
- ³² Hall, Peter 1990/1979: 366-376.
- ³³ Smith, James Leslie 1973, Melodrama London : Methuen ; New York : distributed in the U.S.A. by Harper & Row, Barnes & Noble Import Division, pp. 1-10
- ³⁴ Borreca 1993: 61
- ³⁵ Quoted in Epstein, Edward 1973, News from Nowhere, New York, Random House, p. 241; cited by Gamson 1985: 618, 622n41.

-
- ³⁶ Gamson, William A. 1985. 'Goffman's Legacy to Political Sociology'. Theory and Society 14 (5). 605-622, p. 618
- ³⁷ In Vidal, Homage to Daniel Shays: Collected Essays, 1952-1972, New York, Random House; cited in Lyman and Scott 1975: 123.
- ³⁸ Lyman and Scott 1975: 123
- ³⁹ Rapp 1973, Handeln und Zuschauen, Zurich, p. 168; in Carlson 1984: 483.
- ⁴⁰ Edgell and Jary 1973, 'Football: A Sociological Eulogy' in Smith, M., Parker, S. and Smith, C. (eds) 1973, Leisure and Society in Britain, London, Allen Lane p. 221
- ⁴¹ Publication details: 1974: in Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, Vol 30(4), pp. 526-537; 1977: in Social Psychology ed. L.S. Wrightsman, Monterey CA, Brooks/Cole; 1979: in Advances in Experimental Social Psychology Vol 12, ed. L. Berkowitz, New York, Academic; 1987: New York, Freeman.
- ⁴² Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ⁴³ Nimmo, Dan D. 1974. Popular Images of Politics: A Taxonomy. Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, Inc. P. 155.
- ⁴⁴ Nimmo, Dan 1976, 'The drama, illusion and reality of political images' in Combs, James E., and Michael W. Mansfield, eds. 1976. Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society. Edited by G. H. Gordon, Humanistic Studies in the Communication Arts. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers, p. 259.
- ⁴⁵ Wild, R.A. 1974. Bradstow: A study of status, class and power in a small Australian town. Sydney: Angus and Robertson, p. 11, 36, 68.
- ⁴⁶ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163: 45-70, pp 50-54
- ⁴⁷ In The New York Times Magazine 16 June, Vol 7(36); cited in Borreca 1993: 74n11.

Table 10/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator: 1975-1979

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Wars in the Pacific, Middle East, South America and Africa
Drama in a Dramatised Society (1975)	Raymond Williams (1921-1988) British Marxist cultural theorist and literary critic	Human life borrows from theatre to describe its dramatic sense. Theatre and the way we see and come to know share the same conventions, although it is less clear in life whether we are participants or spectators. Life has been dramatized; politics has been dramatized. Dramatic conventions are ‘profoundly worked and reworked in our actual living relationships ... They are our ways of seeing and knowing’: ‘Our present society ... is sufficiently dramatic in one obvious sense. Actions of a kind and scale that attract dramatic comparisons are being played out in ways that leave us continually uncertain whether we are spectators or participants. The specific vocabulary of the dramatic mode – drama itself, and then tragedy, scenario, situation, actors, performances, roles, images – is continually and conventionally appropriated for these immense actions’. ¹ Drama is no longer a separate or occasional activity. It has come to form a ‘structure of feeling’ in everyday life. ² The ‘slice of life ... is now a voluntary, habitual, internal rhythm; the flow of action and acting, of representation and performance, raised to a new convention, that of a basic need’. ³ It is designed to meet our desire for ‘coherency, clarity and comprehension’. ⁴	Human life	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Meaningfulness Order Coherence Clarity Conflict management Purposefulness Strategies of presentation, direction and performance	Externalised: theorist Internal: we ‘see and know’ through the conventions of drama Doing (+/-)
‘The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi ’ (1975)	Joseph Butwin Historian	Political life involves both actors and spectators. The theatrum mundi has been such a favourite of historians that Butwin suggests that the events of the Revolution seem to have taken place ‘on one vast stage’: ‘Republican representation was profoundly and consciously theatrical in its conduct and in its principles’. ⁵ The revolution was ‘a stage in which heroic actions were performed “ sous les yeux ” of the people.’ ⁶ Butwin uses the word theatrical in the sense of the Greek ‘viewing place’ – he distinguishes between theatre in terms of watching, and drama. ‘The official events of the revolution ... all claimed an audience’:	Political life (historical):	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility allowing objectivity Strategies action Purposefulness Meaningfulness	Externalised: historian/ theorist Internal: participatory Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		publicity and spectatorship instead of secrecy was the aim. A new theatre (the Théâtre de l'Egalité) was constructed out of the Théâtre Français in which all signs of inequality in the audience were abolished. 'The new theater was made to equal the new society; attendance and performance both meant participation in the republic'. This form of the theatrum mundi was marked by the 'zeal for participation', a zeal which was to disappear with the appearance of Napoleon. ⁷
On Human Conduct (1975)	Michael Oakeshott Political Philosophy	Practices of conduct are thoughtful, rehearsed and drawn on as needed. There cannot be a 'thoughtless practice'. For Oakeshott, a practice 'is an instrument to be played upon'. ⁸ It therefore encompasses 'the understanding of a performer'. The practices of social and political life are to be understood by the theorist, not directed. To attempt to direct practices would be to be an ideologist, and 'unwelcome theoretician' rather than a theorist. [Freedden argues that Oakeshott's philosophy is deeply conservative because he 'could not entertain the possibility that some practices are discovered by the observer, and that agents may be unaware of them'. ⁹ He also appears to think that one can observe life without affecting it in some way.	Human behaviour:	A seeing place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance	Externalised: welcome theorist (any attempt radically to change the world rather than merely try to understand it is futile) (Freedden 2000: 313). Doing (+/-)
The Political Sociology of the English Language: An African Perspective (1975)	Ali A. Mazrui Language Studies	Politics is a public exercise of manipulation of conflict before spectators. Politics and drama share conflict : '[g]reat drama [like politics] manipulates the emotions of the audience, sometimes in a highly partisan way'. Both politics and drama also share dialogue . Politics uses it as 'the mechanism by which compromises are sought and the limits of accommodation are defined'. The presence of spectators is also critical to both: 'politics and drama are ... fundamentally public exercises': 'the drama has no meaning except in relation to an audience'. ¹⁰	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Conflict management Strategies of presentation	Internal: analyst; spectators Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
Drama in Life:	James Combs	Dramaturgy/Dramatism: political life is dramatic and uses the	Political life	An acting space	Objectification	Externalised:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Uses of Communication in Society (1976); Dimensions of Political Drama (1980)	& Michael Mansfield Political communication	techniques of theatre to achieve its ends; therefore it can be analysed using theatre: ‘art imitates life [and] life imitates art’:¹¹ the ‘dramaturgical perspective’. An attempt to extent and elaborate the dramaturgical perspective used by Goffman. In his 1980 book, Combs analyses the ‘specifically political connotations’ of the metaphor: ‘It is the general thesis of this book that it does ... make sense [to think of life as drama]’, and on the basis of this belief, the book specifies ‘in what ways and what areas life is dramatic, and then to apply that general concept to the ways and areas of politics which are dramatic’. Combs thus takes it as given that life is dramatic and dramatic in a theatrical sense, based on Kenneth Burke’s claim that life is dramatic.¹² Hence ‘this book is about the form and the content of political drama’ [because] ‘politics is dramatic’ and looking at it this way is useful. The aim is not to produce an overarching theory or a replacement model but simply another conceptual framework/theory to be used with others which attempts to see politics in a ‘new and exciting way’. Combs believes that ‘politics cannot be completely understood unless its dramatic dimensions are delineated.’ To this end, Combs wants the reader to don ‘the dramatic “pair of glasses” so they can say ‘I see it. I really see it.’ He also sees his book as ‘no less a dramatic production than a play or a political drama’.¹³ Things theatre and politics have in common: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> * they both occur in a public setting [does all politics occur in a public setting?] * they both use staging techniques for effect – [again does politics do this all the time – no] * some politics appears to develop like a thriller with dramatic turns and surprises [they have ‘dramatic development’] *some politics events are very grave and so seem dramatic * politics can have a ‘symbolic effect’ 		A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	which reveals strategies of performance and social interaction in political life Causality Functionalism	scholars who ‘scrutinize’ political life for sign of dramaturgy Internal: citizens Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		‘Drama enters political reality as a staged communication by a political actor, in the dramatic development attributed to or inherent in a political situation, or in reified reconstruction’. There are three types of theatre appropriate to politics: ‘the theater of heroism [tragedy], the theater of realism [melodrama] and the theater of the absurd [comedy]’ – all are about theatre as ‘an “imitation of life” [attempting] to interpret life’s meaning – dramatizing man’s attempt to come to grips with himself and the world’. For example, thinking of politics as tragedy ‘permits us to cope better with historical tragedy’. Thinking of politics as realism is optimistic: ‘the enactment of rational and democratic planning, designed to preserve good order and realize good projects’ while ‘a comic perspective on politics permits us to make light of the drama endlessly unfolding before us ... and teaches us not to take politics ... too seriously If we see ourselves as part of a grand comedy, we can enter the political stage with wit and grace, make the best of a bad show, and exit laughing. After all, it may be that the joke’s on us’.¹⁴ Combs’ view seems to offer the most extreme and perhaps the worst of dramatism: it is implicitly teleological, there is an implicit ‘God’ lurking in the wings.
‘A category system for dramaturgical analysis’ (1976); ‘A dramaturgical analysis of street demonstration: Washington DC 1971 and Cape	A. Paul Hare Social Psychology	Dramaturgy. ‘Perhaps the most eclectic characterization of dramaturgy that is currently available ... its application of dramaturgical principles to conflict resolution and collective behavior extends the perspective in ways that are both surprising and illuminating’,¹⁶ and which extend and elaborate the dramaturgical perspective of Goffman.	Social interaction and conflict resolution	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification: providing a way of understanding collective behaviour, in particular during conflict	Externalised: analyst Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Town, 1976' (1980); Social Interaction as Drama: Applications from Conflict Resolution (1985); Dramaturgical Analysis of Social Interaction (1986). ¹⁵
'Aligning Actions' as motivations' (1976).	R. Stokes and J.P. Hewitt	Dramatism/Dramaturgy. The gap between action and expectation is overcome through 'alignment' – we are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others and this enables aligning actions. Language is used to 'bridge the gap between what has happened and what was anticipated'. Through 'aligning actions', individuals align themselves with joint conduct and 'restore fractures in the link between action and expectations, conduct and culture'. ¹⁷ (However, analysis of such actions can only be undertaken retrospectively).	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of presentation Functionalism	Externalised: analysts Internal: individual actor/spectators Doing (+/-)
Synagogue Life (1976)	S.C. Heilman Social Sciences	Dramaturgy. An account of how Orthodox Jews, ' as social beings , act in their congregation'. ¹⁸ Mangham and Overington cite this study as an exemplary dramaturgical study, although we would now perhaps call its methodology ethnography or participant observation.	Religious life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification which allows an account of a specific form of 'social being'.	Externalised: participant observer Doing (+/-)
The Melodramatic Imagination (1976)	P. Brooks Historian	Political life was an 'incessant struggle against enemies', which makes it seem melodramatic. The French Revolution was a melodrama, an 'incessant struggle against enemies, without and within, branded as villains, suborners of morality, who must be confronted and expunged'. Modern politics remains	Political life	A constructed art	Objectification Simplification Reductionism	Externalised: theorist Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		melodramatic: 'the modern political leader is obliged to point continuous battle with an enemy'. ¹⁹
Criticism and Ideology (1976)	Terry Eagleton Marxist Literary Critic	Eagleton uses theatre to explain 'a history that is concerned outside, or logically prior to, ideology'. For Eagleton, 'the literary text ... produces ideology ... in a way analogous to the operations of dramatic production on dramatic text'. This reveals 'its relations to history'. ²⁰	Cultural life	A constructed art	Objectification Providing perspective Causality	Externalised: analyst Doing (+/-)
'Drama and the African World-View' (1976) ²¹	Wole Soyinka (1934- Nigerian social activist, artist and performer	Human life is expressed through art, which reveals the workings of power in 'arenas' such as theatre. This is why art is feared by despots. Art, for Soyinka, 'will try to contain and control power', which makes it feared by despots. Soyinka's use of art has led to censorship, imprisonment and exile. According to Soyinka, theatre, from its roots in ritual drama, is about the demarcation of space, and it is 'necessary always to look for the essence of the play among [its] roofs and spaces', not in a printed text. Theatre is an arena 'in which man has attempted to come to terms with the spatial phenomenon of his being'. Initially this spatial vision was as 'a symbolic arena for metaphysical contests'. It was a medium of totality, which enveloped both performers and spectator, which contributed 'spiritual strength' to the performers. Modern theatre has, however, 'become steadily contracted into purely physical acting areas on a stage'. It is no longer 'a paradigm for the cosmic human condition' in which anxiety for the welfare of the performer was also an anxiety for the welfare of the community. Now, spectators still feel anxiety for performers , but it is an anxiety which is based on purely technical performance issues: 'has he forgotten his line? ... will she make that upper register?' However, theatre remains singular in its simultaneity – its ability to forge 'a single human experience' in its spectator. At its very roots, remains an 'affirmation of the communal self'. ²² Soyinka sees intercultural performance as a 'survival strategy' for theatre. ²³	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance Inter-subjectivity Communion	Externalised: playwright Doing/Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Fall of Public Man (1977)	Richard Sennett (1943- Social Sciences)	Social life is performed under the scrutiny of others. In modern times, we also have to act under conditions of extreme self-consciousness. This encourages us to abandon public life, however, public life is feasible through the use of artifice which enables civility, thereby encouraging sociability Divides the theatrum mundi into a ‘classic tradition’ and a modern version. The classic tradition ‘equated society with theater, everyday action with acting’, thus couching social life ‘in aesthetic terms’. All men were artists ‘because all men can act’. The idea that social relations could be ‘aesthetic’ lay in the common origins of society and the theatre of ‘the childhood experience of play’.²⁴ Play prepares us for aesthetic activity or ‘playacting’ by teaching us ‘to treat conventions of behaviour as believable’. Conventions are defined by Sennett as ‘rules for behaviour at a distance from the immediate desires of the self’, and they underpinned the form of interaction he calls civility: ‘Wearing a mask is the essence of civility. Masks permit pure sociability, detached from the circumstances of power, malaise, and private feeling of those who wear them’. Sennett believes this sense of the metaphor has been lost, along with notions of civility. Society now concerns itself with motivation, leading to a cult of personality. People no longer behave; they perform themselves. Those who do this better than others become celebrities, whose personal lives become the focus of attention rather than their actions. He argues that we need to recapture this sense of play in order to recapture the broad possibilities of sociability and social action and to avoid the narrow and narcissistic exclusivity which has resulted from an ideology of intimacy which allows us to burden all our social relationships with how we ‘feel’ about our activities’.²⁵ Sennett believes the relationship between ‘stage and street’ in cities is one which changes over time. It can be studied in order to elucidate	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation which enable civility	Externalised: theorist Internal: others – we are required to act under the gaze of others; Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		changing beliefs about ‘the body in public’, changes about what it is considered appropriate to ‘show’ in public. Stage and street parallel each other because they share the problem of visibility : how to be believable in public. Because the spectators for stage and street are likely to be continuous, the same solution must be used for both: ‘What is impossible in the city is impossible in the theater’. ²⁶ As a consequence, the need to be believable produces a common ‘public geography’ and common signification. Gran says ‘Sennett is astute in using the theater as an example of the breakdown of the public sphere’ because the changes in the theatre are ‘clear and concrete’. ²⁷ Spectators were moved off the stage by Diderot (and others) in order to allow the production autonomy and to prevent spectators from breaking the illusion created through their comments and behaviour. Once spectators were off the stage, actors would no longer need to pander to them. With the advent of controllable lighting and a dimmed auditorium, the separation of spectators from the performance became complete and led to a change in spectator behaviour from ‘being socially active to passively contemplative’ allowing them ‘to enjoy the theater as dramatic art’ rather than ‘as social performance’. A similar move occurred in painting and sculpture, which was to be allowed to be autonomous and passively contemplated. Spectators in general became pacified [although we are talking about a narrow view of both art and theatre here. As usually, there is a disregard of popular forms of theatre and art].
Essays on Performance Theory (1977); Between Anthropology and Theatre	Richard Schechner (1934- American theorist, director and	Dramaturgy; performance. Social life involves performance, which is ‘restored’ or deliberately reiterated behaviour; theatre is a part of everyday social life. Schechner explores ‘the relationship between performing arts and anthropology’. ²⁹ According to Lyman and Scott, Schechner, as ‘a director, actor, playwright, and theorist’ is ‘an embodiment of the concept of the	Social life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Strategies of performance	Externalised: analyst; theatre practitioner Internal: we are both

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1985); 'What is Performance Studies Anyway?' (1998) ²⁸	educator, founder of The Performance Group (1968-1980)	theoria '. ³⁰ Riggins suggests that his attempts in his work to break the performance frame 'might suggest a different notion of the self than the one which prevails at present in dramaturgical analysis', however, the forcing of spectators to recognize actors as 'real people' working for a living' by having them sell tickets and refreshments and socialize with spectators may not lead, as Riggins hopes, to the perception of 'a second level of self, an 'inner self' which is more private and stable' in dramaturgical theory. ³¹ On the contrary, it might make 'role-playing' seem even more deliberate and controlled. Carlson considers that '[n]o theatre theorist has been more instrumental in developing modern performance theory', ³² although States, having pushed Schechner's definition of performance as 'restore behaviour' to its limits, decided that Schechner's use of performance is metaphorical. ³³ According to Schechner, 'Any event, action, item, or behavior may be examined "as" performance', and this offers certain advantages: 'one can consider things as provisional, in-process, existing and changing over time, in rehearsal, as it were'. The performative 'engages performance in places and situations not traditionally marked as "performing arts", from dress-up to certain kinds of writing or speaking'. Both performance and performativity deal with the actuality of appearance. ³⁴				actors and spectators although theatre encourages us to separate the two Doing (+)
Police Work (1977); 'Producing drama: Symbolic communication and the police' (1982) ³⁵ 'Dramaturgy,	P.K. Manning Social Sciences	Dramaturgy. Political life is mediated and uses spectacle in order to achieve its ends '[D]rama suffuses modern life'. It is also 'the dominant metaphor of our time'. It is therefore 'appropriate' to utilize a dramaturgical framework 'emphasizing audience, performance, and theatrical aspects of everyday life' as a means of examining changes 'in the relationships among media politics, and interpersonal relations', especially as '[p]olitics is shaped by the mass media and by the dramatic engaging visual spectacles it presents': 'dramaturgical social theory both reflects society and is	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification which allows analysis and judgment Causal relationships	Externalised: social analyst Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
politics and the axial media event' (1996); 'Theorizing policing: The drama and myth of crime control in the NYPD' (2001)		a means to analyse it'. ³⁶ Manning's 2001 article puts this claim into practice in analysing 'the decline in the official crime rate in New York City in 1996' as well as the roles of various figures involved in this. ³⁷ Police Work is an attempt to extend and elaborate the dramaturgical perspective. ³⁸
'The Dramaturgical Society: A Macro-Analytic Approach to Dramaturgical Analysis' (1977); Critical Dimensions in Dramaturgical Analysis (1984); The Drama of Social Life: Essays in Post-Modern Social Psychology (1990)	T.R. Young and Garth Massey (1977); T.R. Young and John Welsh (1984); T.R. Young (1990) Social Psychology	Dramaturgy. Capitalist societies are performative; dramatic life is about praxis – a way of overcoming alienation. Politics 'is a kind of theatre [which involves] enforced political stagings and image-management of capitalist society [through which] powerful elites sustain both their power and its institutions by projecting political and cultural images upon the masses, and by generating the illusion that society is in reality of the people, by the people, and for the people'. ³⁹ The dramaturgical society 'is one in which the interaction between an atomized mass of people and the major institutions and largest organizations is deliberately managed, masked by the profuse generations of images of service, quality, or agency, and the projection of these upon the population for whose benefit these organizations and institutions are ostensibly acting'. ⁴⁰ Capitalist societies 'realize their values dramatically'. ⁴¹ Young's 1990 book draws on three main bodies of theory in order to offer a more critical dramaturgy: 'consensus-oriented theory', associated with symbolic interaction and focused on role-play with the aim of sharing perspectives; the manipulation theory of Goffman, also associated with role-play, but in which interaction is aimed at manipulation rather than sharing ('sociology of fraud'; ⁴² and critical or radical dramaturgy, such as that associated with the Frankfurt school in which the aim is unmasking in order to	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: allowing understanding The possibility of deception Instrumentalism Causal relationships Instrumentalism	Externalised: analyst Internal: deluded citizens Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		emancipate – an aim which Young endorses in this book. ⁴³ Young includes a critical dramaturgical analysis of Watergate. According to Klapp the book advances ‘the theory of symbolic interaction’ by the distinctions it makes, although it brings under the umbrella of dramaturgy theorists who may reject the claim. In particular, Young argues that concepts associated with the Frankfurt school, Marcuse, Habermas, Lukács and Gramsci such as ‘false consciousness, ideology, alienation, mystification, false needs, masking and unmasking’ etc are a form of critical dramaturgical analysis. ⁴⁴ A ‘fiercely anticapitalist ... dramaturgy, which maintains the unexamined assumption that politics is theatrical’ of Lyman and Scott.
The Performers: Politics as Theatre (1978)	Norman Shrapnel (1912-2004) Journalist	Political life is performative. Shrapnel saw Parliament as theatre. He ‘summoned up the scene laid out before him in a manner both meticulous and full of feeling’. ⁴⁵	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space	Objectification: Strategies of performance & presentation	Externalised: observer/ reporter Doing (+)
‘Theatrum politicum: The genealogy of capital – police and the state of prosperity’ (1978)	Pasquale Pasquino Sociology	Political life is presented through discourses which become naturalised so that alternatives are obscured. The theatrum politicum (theatre of politics) is the stage on which discourses (‘dramas’) about social regulation are staged and become naturalised. One such discourse is the ‘genealogy’ of capital and its role in society. Another is the ‘grand pièce de résistance ... the combat of good and evil which goes under the name of the conflict between society and the state’, a drama which is often revived. Such discourses often have different voices ‘behind its scenery’ which perpetuate the discourses so we take them as always existing. However, discourses are contested. In the C17th, the drama of state and society was completely different. In the discourse of ‘police’, government was just one facet of society, devoted to the health of the population. ‘The object of police is everything that has to do with maintaining and augmenting the happiness of its citizens, omnium et singulorum ’ according to	Political life	A seeing place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of presentation	Externalised: sociologist/ historian Doing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Georg Olbrecht, 'a high official of the city of Strasburg' in 1608 ⁴⁶
Orientalism (1978)	Edward Said (1935-2003) Palestinian writer and political activist	'The idea of representation is a theatrical one: the Orient is the stage on which the whole East is confined. On this stage will appear figures whose role it is to represent the larger whole from which they emanate. The Orient seems to be, not an unlimited extension beyond the familiar European world, but rather a closed field, a theatrical stage affixed to Europe'. ⁴⁷ Said draws attention to and challenges the West's constructed conception of the East as 'Orient' which 'reduces and defines it, rendering it observable'. ⁴⁸	Global relationships	A seeing place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification which allows appropriation	Externalised: analyst Watching (-)
'Propaganda with Design: Environmental Dramaturgy in the Political Rally' (1978)	James M. Mayo Political theory	Dramaturgy. Spatial structuring can promote political ideology: '[S]tage design' is important for political ideology. '[T]he stage set for propaganda can involve architectural planning', as seen in the Third Reich. 'Propaganda with design is an integral part of the promotion of political ideology'. ⁴⁹	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of direction/design	Externalised: analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
"Answers" by Squat Theatre' (1978)	Members of Squat Theatre	'Theatre wears the mask of life and life wears the mask of theatre'. It shows 'what might be shown' and is therefore used by 'professional hope-raisers' (artists and politicians). Theatre 'shows'; it does not 'gossip' when it engages in 'hope-raising'. ⁵⁰	Political and cultural life	A seeing-place A constructed art	Freedom from consequences which allows speculative work	Internal: theatre practitioners; audiences Showing (+)
1979-1989: war in Afghanistan between Russia and the Mujaheddin
The Poverty of Political Culture (1979)	Jacques Donzelot Political sociology	Theorists produce concepts which allow them to take a privileged position towards life. Donzelot uses theatrical metaphors to critique the theory on Political Culture. Political Culture theory has difficulties theorising the role of the spectator. Far from explaining anything, political culture 'stages' reality using stereotypes (active citizens, apathetic citizens) and creates plot lines with cause and effect relationships which start off with a finished picture and proceed to demonstrate how it comes about. It mythologises the state as 'an ill-natured object, a legitimate	Intellectual life	A constructed art	Objectification Detachment Which allows speculative thinking Causality	Externalised: critical theorist; observer of others Internal: (deluded) spectators who mistake

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		target, the natural enemy of man and of society' which necessarily requires active democratic citizens to keep it under control. Hence the very idea of a spectator (other than the unacknowledged position of spectator taken by the theorists themselves) is problematic because it seems to be necessarily passive and accepting. ⁵¹				these concepts for reality Doing (-)
Social Being: A Theory for Social Psychology (1979)	Rom Harré Philosophy	Dramaturgy. Social life entails behaving according to norms and social expectations. A 'systematic development and application of the dramaturgical model incorporating scene analysis, action analysis and actor analysis'. ⁵² Harré proposed the episode as the basic unit of analysis, in order to get around the problem of 'experimental 'paradigms' becoming the actual specification of the object of research efforts'. ⁵³ Episodes, treated according to a dramaturgical model, allowed 'role distance' from which to monitor and analyse conduct.	Psychological life	A constructed art	Objectification which allows analysis Strategies of performance Convention	Externalised: analyst Doing/ Watching (+/-)

¹ Williams, Raymond. 1991/1975. 'Drama in a Dramatized Society'. In Writing in Society: Verso.pp.13-18

² Eldridge, Lizzie. 1997. 'Drama in a Dramaturgical Society'. In Raymond Williams Now: Knowledge, Limits and the Future, edited by J. Wallace, R. Jones and S. Nield. Houndmills, Basingstoke; New York: Macmillan; St Martin's Press, pp. 71-88.p. 71

³ Williams 1991/1975: 7

⁴ Eldridge 1997: 71

⁵ Butwin, Joseph. 1975. 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi'. Research Studies 43 (3) pp. 141-152.p. 141-3

⁶ Jay, Martin. 1993. Downcast Eyes: the Denigration of Vision in Twentieth Century French Thought. Berkeley: University of California Press.

⁷ Butwin 1975: 144-151

⁸ Oakeshott, Michael 1975, On Human Conduct, Oxford, Clarendon Press, 89, 91

⁹ Freeden, Michael. 2000. 'Practising Ideology and Ideological Practices'. Political Studies 48 pp. 302-322. 313-4.

¹⁰ Mazrui, Ali A. 1975. The Political Sociology of the English Language: An African Perspective. The Hague, Paris: Mouton and Co. 170-7

¹¹ Combs, James E., and Michael W. Mansfield, eds. 1976. Drama in Life: The Uses of Communication in Society. Edited by G. H. Gordon, Humanistic Studies in the Communication Arts. New York: Communication Arts Books, Hastings House Publishers..xv

¹² Combs, James E. 1980. Dimensions of Political Drama: Goodyear. 196

¹³ Combs 1980: 1-17

-
- ¹⁴ Combs 1980: 195-199
- ¹⁵ With Blumenberg, Hans. 1997/1979. Shipwreck with Spectator: Paradigm of a Metaphor for Existence. Translated by S. Rendall. Cambridge Mass. and London: The MIT Press.
- ¹⁶ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter. xii
- ¹⁷ Heilman 1976 cited in Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons.
- ¹⁸ Ibid.
- ¹⁹ Brooks, P. 1976 The Melodramatic Imagination : Balzac, Henry James, melodrama, and the mode of excess, New Haven : Yale University Press, p. 203-4
- ²⁰ Eagleton 1976 in Quinn, Michael. 2006. 'Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 301-316. 302
- ²¹ In Soyinka, 1976, Myth, Literature and the African World, Cambridge University Press; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.pp. 477-482.
- ²² Soyinka 1976, in Gerould 2000: 478-480.
- ²³ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 200.
- ²⁴ Sennett, Richard. 1977. 'The End of Public Culture'. In The Fall of Public Man. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 266.
- ²⁵ Sennett 1977: 263
- ²⁶ Sennett, Richard. 1978. The Fall of Public Man. New York: Vintage Books.37-9
- ²⁷ Gran, Anne-Britt. 2002. 'The Fall of Theatricality in the Age of Modernity'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 251-264.
- ²⁸ Schechner, Richard 1998, 'What is Performance Studies Anyway?' in The Ends of Performance (ed. Peggy Phelan and Jill Lane); reprinted in Krasner 2008: 517-521.
- ²⁹ Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ³⁰ Lyman, Stanford M, and Marvin B. Scott. 1975. The Drama of Social Reality. New York: Oxford University Press.170n7
- ³¹ Riggins, Stephen Harold. 1993. 'Life as a metaphor: Current issues in dramaturgical analysis'. Semiotica 95 (1/2) pp. 153-165.158-9
- ³² Carlson, Marvin. 2004. Performance: A critical introduction. 2nd ed. New York and London: Routledge.17
- ³³ States, Bert O. 1996. 'Performance as Metaphor'. Theatre Journal 48 (1) pp. 1-26. 26
- ³⁴ Schechner, Richard 1998: 521
- ³⁵ Manning, P.K. 1982, 'Producing drama: Symbolic communication and the police', Symbolic Interaction Vol 5(2), 1982, pp. 223-241.
- ³⁶ Manning, P.K. 1996 'Dramaturgy, politics and the axial media event', Sociological Quarterly, Vol 37(2), 1996, pp. 261-278, 261.
- ³⁷ Manning, P.K. 2001, 'Theorizing policing: The drama and myth of crime control in the NYPD', Theoretical Criminology, Vol 5(3), 2001, pp. 315-344, 315.
- ³⁸ Brissett and Edgley 1990: 1.
- ³⁹ Borreca, Art. 1993. 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View'. The Drama Review 37 (2) pp. 56-79. 62
- ⁴⁰ Quoted in Borreca 1993: 62.
- ⁴¹ Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ⁴² Young, T.R. 1990. The Drama of Social Life: Essays in Post-Modern Social Psychology. New Brunswick, N.J.,: Transaction.55
- ⁴³ Young 1990: 13-14

-
- ⁴⁴ Klapp, Orin. 1990. 'Book Review: The Drama of Social Life: Essays in Post-Modern Social Psychology by T.R. Young, 1990.' Contemporary Sociology 20 (4) pp. 630-632.
- ⁴⁵ David McKie, 2004, 'Obituary: Norman Shrapnel', The Independent, London, 13 February, 2004; http://findarticles.com/p/articles/mi_qn4158/is_20040213/ai_n12771257/print accessed 16 August 2007.
- ⁴⁶ Pasquino, Pasquale. 1991/1978. 'Theatrum politicum: The genealogy of capital - police and the state of prosperity'. In The Foucault Effect: Studies in Governmentality, edited by G. Burchell, C. Gordon and P. Miller. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 105-118. Originally In Journal of Architectural Education Vol 32(2), pp. 24-27; reprinted in Brissett and Edgley 1990: 353-363.
- ⁴⁷ Said, Edward. 1993. Culture and Imperialism. London: Chatto and Windue Ltd. 63
- ⁴⁸ Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.
- ⁴⁹ Mayo, James M. Jr. 1990. 'Propaganda with Design: Environmental Dramaturgy in the Political Rally'. In Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook, edited by D. Brissett and C. Edgley. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, pp. 353-363. 361
- ⁵⁰ Squat Theatre 1978, "'Answers" by Squat Theatre', The Drama Review/TDR Vol 22(3) 1978, pp. 3-10.
- ⁵¹ Donzelot, Jacques. 1979. 'The poverty of political culture'. Ideology and Consciousness 5 73-86.
- ⁵² Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ⁵³ Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons.78

Table 11/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator – 1980-1985

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1980: Solidarity emerges in Poland as a dissident union: continual agitation and strikes eventually see the collapse of communism in Europe in 1989, marked by the fall of the Berlin Wall.
‘Dramaturgical theory and criticism: The state of the art (or science)’ (1980)	Bruce Gronbeck Social psychology	Dramaturgy. Social life occurs under the scrutiny of others. An attempt to extend and elaborate on the dramaturgical perspective used by Goffman: we are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads us to shape our conduct according to the expectations of others. ¹	Social life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility leading to strategies of performance	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
Rehearsals for change: politics and culture in Australia (1980)	Dennis Altman Political science	‘Utopian thinking’ entails a kind of thought-experiment in which likely consequences can be assessed A discussion of the prospects for social and political change in Australia, towards ‘the development of a participatory socialism’. ² Altman sees a place for ‘utopian thinking’ in which possible strategies for change can be ‘rehearsed’. He has a negative view of political spectatorship which suggests that he either does not take his use of the metaphor seriously and/or has failed to consider its implications. (Altman was a drama critic for a metropolitan newspaper during 1978. That plus the frequent references to plays in the book indicate an interest in theatre which probably accounts for the easy but undeveloped use of the metaphor. It appears to have been used only for the title).	Social and political life	A constructed art	Freedom from consequences which allows possibilities to be explored	Externalised : theorist Internal: pacified and deluded citizens who need to be activated Doing (+)
The Pulse of Politics (1980)	J.D. Barber Political Science	Political life involves structured time and patterned behaviour, which makes it predictable. Argues that the evolution of media technology has created and reinforced a fundamental pattern in American electoral politics. Presidential elections operate in a 12-year cycle. Each cycle evokes ‘a predictable drama’ of conflict, conscience or conciliation. Media plays a central role in the staging of these political dramas. ³	Political life	A constructed art	Objectification Causality which allows prediction	Externalised : theorist Internal: deluded citizens Doing/ Showing (+/-)
‘Dramas of	Robert	Dramatism/Dramaturgy. Social life occurs under the scrutiny	Social life	An acting space	Meanfulness	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
structure, theory and performance in Northern Sri Lanka' (1981); ⁴ 'Dramas, metaphors and structures' (1982); The Karmic Theater: Self, Society, and Astrology in Jaffna (1982); Signifying Acts (1985)	Perinbanayagam Social Philosophy	of others. 'When one talks of the drama of social life one is not engaged in a simple-minded comparison of human relations to what is going on at the theater, but saying something about act, communication and meaning as the fundamental medium of human existence since the evolutionary emergence of symbolicity'. ⁵ Although Mangham and Overington claim Perinbanayagam endorsed Kenneth Burke's dramatisitic view of the literal rather than the metaphorical use of drama, Signifying Acts is described as an analysis and elaboration of dramaturgical thought which places it 'into the nexus of social and philosophical thought'. ⁶		A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Causality Functionalism	: theorist, analyst; anthropologist Internal: we are all both spectators and actors Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Applied Communication Research: A Dramatistic Approach (1981)	John Cragan and Donald Shields Communication theory	Dramatism Application of the theatre metaphor to rhetorical communication in rhetorical texts, small group communication, political and organizational communication and marketing, based on the work of Ernest Bormann (q.v.1965) which enables understanding and predictability and the demonstration and explanation of the connection between rhetorical communication and behaviour without resort to psychology. The process combines qualitative and quantitative approaches to communication to explain motivation and predict likely outcomes. Each unit of analysis (designated a fantasy theme) is seen as a 'complete scenario or dramatisitic statement' containing dramatis personae , plotline , scene and sanctioning agent (justification e.g. God, Providence, Destiny etc). '[M]eaning, emotion, and motive are not in the skulls and viscera of people but are in their rhetoric thereby providing a direct link between communication phenomena and behavior'. ⁷ Meaning, emotion	Social interaction	A constructed art	Objectification which reveals strategies of presentation Functionalism Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		and motive are revealed in fantasy themes . The approach can be seen in the work of Combs and Mansfield and Nimmo. ⁸ Although still evident in the work of symbolic interactionists, it seems to have largely been displaced by Discourse Analysis and a renewed interest in ideology.
After Virtue (1981)	Alasdair MacIntyre Political philosophy	Describes the limited potential for action of officials constrained by their positions MacIntyre describes contemporary types such as bureaucratic managers as central figures 'in the social drama of the present age': traditions of theatre like Japanese Noh in which stock characters determine 'the possibilities of plot and action'. ⁹	Social and political life	A constructed art	Objectification which allows structural restraints to be seen	Externalised : theorist/analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
Impression Management Theory and Social Psychological Research (1981)	J.T. Tedeschi Social Psychology	Dramaturgy; Impression Management. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads to a concern with appearance. A psychological application of dramaturgy which delineates and investigates the impact of dramaturgical awareness on human behavior. ¹⁰	Social life:	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility which leads to self-awareness, strategies of presentation Subjectification	Externalised : analyst Internal: others Internalised: self-conscious individual Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Political Rhetoric' (1981)	Lloyd Bitzer Rhetoric	Rhetoric's 'principal stage' was politics. ¹¹	Social interaction (rhetoric)	An acting space	Strategies of performance and direction Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: political subjects Doing (+/-)
'Political Languages' (1981)	Doris A. Graber Political Communic-	Political language is a 'craft' which aims at producing 'verbal images': 'Images ... rather than reality ... turn the wheels of the political world'. Nevertheless this is couched in oratory, which Graber divides into statesman oratory, charismatic rhetoric and	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Strategies of presentation Personification	Externalised : theorist; media Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	ation	demagogic rhetoric . She considers the first to be rare. Political language is now a combination of the latter two: 'Attempts to persuade through logical reasoning have given way to attempts to manipulate audiences through psychological tactics'. As if to demonstrate this, Graber draws on the image of the theatre: 'In the age of television, the acting ability of the orator has become even more important than verbal skills. The drama of politics now is performed on a stage that millions can view simultaneously and instantaneously. This emphasis on visual information has restored nonverbal symbols to a primacy previously enjoyed only in the preliterate age of human history... messages are judged heavily, and often predominantly by non-verbal symbols expressed through body language, facial expressions and voice quality, and through the general images of capability and trustworthiness that speakers are able to convey ... The attempts to create favourable images make for a good deal of posturing'. She clearly has not paid attention to Hobbes' image of Leviathan. This is because despite this rhetoric she is still locked into language: 'Audiences tune out [because of] the surfeit of public dialogue of all kinds ... Through the mass media, audiences are swamped with information, most of it touted as important ...[Consequently] Much of the political dialogue remains unheard ... the importance of political messages hinges on the willingness of general and special audiences to listen ... if the audience does not listen, words have as little force as the breath that utters them'. ¹² The article highlights Reddy's conduit metaphor and its problems.				media audiences Doing/ Showing (+/-)
The Forger's Art: Forgery and the Philosophy of Art (1983)	Denis Dutton Art history	Forgeries were a performance which misrepresented; they, like theatrical performances, aimed to deceive. ¹³	Cultural life	A constructed art	Strategies of deception	Externalised : historian, analyst Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Role Playing and Identity: the Limits of Theatre as Metaphor (1982)	Bruce Wilshire (1932- Sociologist	Role Theory: Life is imitative and therefore performative and norm-driven: we watch others perform as they watch us. A ‘phenomenological account of the theater-like character of social life’, ¹⁴ and a critique of Role Theory. Theatre is ‘an essential and central metaphor for life’, ¹⁵ but it is not the same as life. Applications of the metaphor to life are frequently ‘astonishingly crude’ and ‘chop from sight fundamental questions’. ¹⁶ Wilshire’s theory of identity argues that theatre provides a way to explore the definition of the self by demonstrating examples of ‘mimetic fusion with others, disruptions from them, and attendant transformation of personality’. ¹⁷ Nevertheless, theatre and life are different. A condition of identity in real life is an inescapable ethical responsibility for one’s roles and actions. To ignore this condition (as he believes Goffman does) ‘blurs fundamental distinctions between off and onstage’. ¹⁸ Nevertheless, we watch others perform their roles, as they watch us; imitation is a fundamental human approach to life, one which theatre raises to an art form in such a way that we can see in theatre ‘rehearsals’ for life. However, life, unlike theatre, entails responsibility for the roles one takes in the course of building one’s identity.	Social life	A seeing place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility, Mimesis Strategies of performance Subjectification	Externalised : theorist Internal: others; the self Doing (+/-)
‘Performance and Rehearsal: Social Order and Organizational Life’ (1982); ‘The theatrical perspective in organizational analysis’ (1982); ¹⁹ Organizations	Ian Mangham ²⁰ and Michael Overington Theatre practitioners; organization theorists, sociologists	Dramaturgy. We are self-aware as actors which leads us to shape our conduct in order to influence how we affect others. Social life and social order can be seen as theatre because it is based in both action and self-awareness. Self-awareness has to do with how one carries out certain actions [i.e. it is not about what one is signifying]. Social order can be seen ‘as an alternation between performing and rehearsing in which social actors may be treated as “possessed” by their roles’. ²¹ Everyday life is theatrical because it is ‘the performance of a ritual process’. Actual theatre is possible because ‘human consciousness is fundamentally a theatrical one’. ²² The theatre metaphor is appropriate for the study of social life because ‘the conditions for human self-	Social interaction	A seeing-place A constructed art	Objectification: Self-awareness Strategies of performance Creativity	Externalised : theorist, analyst Internal: (likely to be deluded) Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
as Theatre (1987)		awareness are precisely the formal conditions for dramatic performance'. ²³ In fact, 'the theatre is doubly resourceful for students of social action', because it both 'shows how life can be treated as staged' and it 'shows how social realities can be read through particular ways of staging'. ²⁴ Although Mangham and Overington say they draw on the work of Kenneth Burke, they insist that 'Drama, for us, is a metaphor ... that allows a specific, detailed conceptual address of social action', not a 'literal model'. ²⁵ [An elision of drama with theatre]. They have a normative purpose to their analysis: 'This model fosters the kind of approach to organizations, and to human action [that offers] a way of acting which frees [people] from the absurd belief that our world is made by forces over which we humans exercise no control'. On the contrary, humans 'write the plays ... characterize the parts and ... sit in the audience'. The dramaturgical perspective 'allows us a part as moral actors to do what we can to work for life and against death, to give the world high comedy and not great tragedy'. ²⁶ Nevertheless, their model for this is Hamlet . They also argue that 'a dramaturgical approach makes it impossible to employ 'stock' types of persons and characters (the familiar variables of gender, ethnicity, age, occupational status and the like) without accounting for their creation in some social process'. ²⁷ However, their book indicates that the approach does not prevent this. It merely shifts the variables to some other area (e.g. scene). The theatre metaphor, as they say, has 'organizing power'. ²⁸
'The staging of emotion: A dramaturgical analysis' (1982); 'The war game:	Louis Zurcher Social Psychology	Dramaturgy. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves which leads us to manage our emotions for effect Application of dramaturgical principles to the study of emotion; the use of dramaturgy to analyse the 'staging' of emotions in organizational settings. ²⁹	Social life	A constructed art	Visibility leading to strategies of performance and presentation	Externalised : analyst Internal: we are conscious of the effect we

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Organizational scripting and the expression of emotion' (1985)						have on others Internalised: self-aware individual Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Theaters of the Ego (1982)	Joyce McDougall Psychological Analyst	The psyche attempts to deal with conflict and struggle in the same way that theatre does and therefore can be analysed as theatre. 'I is a character, an "actor" on the world scene who, in private, in his internal reality, attends a more intimate theater whose repertoire is secret. Unknown to him, scenarios are organized, farcical scenes and tragic scenes in search of a place of representation and of action. The director, of course, is the I itself, but the face of the characters, the plot as well as its dénouement, are veiled to him; he does not even know those who are pushing him toward the drama. No warning is given to him that the action is going to begin and that somewhere, in a place of his psyche, a character is moving about ... and wants to enter the stage ... And yet it is there, in this interior universe, that the greater part of what is to become his life will be decided'. ³⁰ Psychic activity is theatrical because it involves conflict and struggle. ³¹ Theatricality for McDougall lies in the 'invention and imagination' required by the controlling subject, the I, in its efforts to compose all these unseen and unknowable elements. ³² [McDougall bases this analogy of the human psyche on an analysis of Hamlet , King Lear and Richard III , yet the caveats she places on knowledge of what is going on could not be further from theatre. Directors are never in such a position of ignorance].	Psychological life	A constructed art	Visibility Conflict management Causality	Externalised : analyst Internalized: I as Director Doing (+/-)
'Fascinating Fascism' (1982)	Susan Sontag	Sadomasochism entails the use of theatre techniques and can therefore be analysed as theatre. Sadomasochism is a form of	Social interaction	A constructed art	Visibility strategies of	Externalised : analyst/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		theatre: 'To be involved in sadomasochism is to take part in a sexual theater, a staging of sexuality. Regulars ... are expert costumers and choreographers as well as performers, in a drama that is all the more exciting because it is forbidden to ordinary people'. Sontag argues that fascism is a form of sadomasochism because its art 'glorifies surrender ... exalts mindlessness [and] glamorizes death'. ³³			performance and direction Causality Manipulation	philosopher Doing/ Showing (-)
'Mathematics and philosophy: What Thales saw ...' (1982); 'Gnomen: The beginnings of geometry in Greece' (1989).	Michel Serres Philosopher of science	Geometry allows us to place ourselves outside the world as a spectator. Man triumphed over history through the move from mathematics to geometry. Once geometry is used to place man outside reality and beyond history, modernity begins: 'Modernity begins when this real world space is taken as scene and this scene, controlled by a director, turns inside out – like the finger of a glove ... and plunges into the utopia of a knowing, inner, intimate subject'. ³⁴ To question our organizing categories, including that of the 'ideal space' outside reality. ³⁵	Geometry	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectators	Detachment enabling objectification	Externalised : philosopher; modern man Watching (-)
The Managed Heart (1983)	Arlie Hochschild Social Sciences	Dramaturgy. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads us to shape our emotional life to match the requirements of our life. An attempt 'to deal with emotions and emotion work' using a dramaturgical perspective which draws on Goffman and Stanislavsky. Flight attendants 'learn to feel, and to say they feel,' that passengers are their personal guests. One of the few dramaturgical studies which focuses on feelings. ³⁶	Social life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility Strategies of performance for effect Inter-subjectivity	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
This Stage-Play World: Texts and Contexts, 1580-1625 (1983)	Julia Briggs (1943-2007) English literary scholar and writer	Descriptions of the world are historically based. An account of Renaissance culture in which Briggs describes the social conditions which produced writers of the stature of Sidney, Donne, Spenser, Marlowe, Jonson, Webster and Nashe and Bacon. The title is taken from Sir Walter Raleigh. ³⁷	History	An acting space	Objectification: Retrospectivity Causality	Externalised : historian Doing (+/-)
Introduction à la poésie orale (1983)	Paul Zumthor	Oral narration is a performance which uses theatrical techniques. The performance of narrations in oral cultures is 'theatre'. ³⁸	Social interaction	A constructed art	Strategies of performance	Externalised : historian Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Thread of Life (1983); Painting as an Art (1987)	Richard Wollheim Art theorist	Theatricality The mind works collaboratively, as in theatre. Wollheim uses theatre as an analogy for his theory of the imagination and his theory of the spectator. 'Imaginative sympathy and iconic coherence are constructed through a submerged, interiorized theatricality'. Theatre provides a way of describing how our thoughts structure 'iconic mental states' which arise 'out of a collaboration ... between the internal dramatist, an internal actor, and an internal audience'. Here 'theatricality is being used to figure a theatre of the mind that is in turn made to explain a somewhat more material psychoanalytically conceived theatre of the world'. ³⁹	Psychological Life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Collaboration Interaction	Externalised : analyst; Internalised Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
Ordinary Vices (1984)	Judith Shklar Political theory	Deception and hypocrisy are functional. A re-evaluation of politics as theatrical; hypocrisy is 'one of the few vices that bolsters liberal democracy'. ⁴⁰	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance which enable social interaction	Externalised : theorist Internal: humans in society Doing/ Showing (+)
Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution (1984)	Lynn Hunt History	Historical events use, and therefore can be analysed through literary and theatrical genres. Uses theatrical genres to analyse the French Revolution, drawing on the genre theory of Northrop Frye. After 1792 and until 1793, the rhetoric followed the plot of a romance, but finally, from 1794, it followed 'tragedy'. The changes were propelled by an obsession with conspiracy, the 'central organizing principle of French revolutionary rhetoric'. It was this obsession with conspiracy which instigated the theatre metaphor, as 'revolutionaries talked incessantly about unmasking ... at every political level from the beginning of the Revolution' in ways which were quite different from those of the ancien régime . ⁴¹	History	A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of presentation Reductionism Causality The possibility of deception	Externalised : historian Doing (+/-)
'Nuclear Theatre'	Bonnie Marranca	Politics is performative because it involves a relationship with spectators. To provoke awareness of the theatrical nature of	Political life	A constructed art A relationship	Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : drama

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1984); 'Performance World, Performance Culture' (1987)	Performer and writer	politics. ⁴²		between actors and spectators	performance	critic Internal: deluded citizens Doing (+)
'Scripts in Organizational Behavior' (1984)	Dennis Gioia and Peter Poole Management theory	Dramaturgy. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads us to shape our conduct according prescriptive expectations which work as a kind script The concept of 'script' provides 'a framework for understanding the cognitive dynamics underlying many organizational behaviors and actions' that accounts for both knowledge and performance behaviour and allows analysts 'effectively' describe, analyse and understand behaviour. ⁴³	Social life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation and direction Causality	Externalised : social scientist Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Introduction: Cultural Performance, Culture Theory' (1984)	John J. MacAloon Anthropology	Dramatism/Dramaturgy: Cultural performance is a form of reflexive behaviour presented to spectators. MacAloon gives a potted history of the rise of the use of performance as an approach in anthropology in which he gives as its antecedents, Turner, Goffman, and Kenneth Burke. Although Turner has insisted that his use of 'drama' to describe social crises was not a theatre metaphor, MacAloon is convinced it is, largely because he himself sees performance as a theatre metaphor. Cultural performances fall into a variety of genres . Spectacle, for instance, is a genre of performance. Performance is a form of social cultural action which falls somewhere between behaviour and action and which is reflexive. The performer makes himself into an object for himself and his spectators. ⁴⁴	Cultural performance	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility leading to Strategies of performance	Externalised : social scientist Internal: spectators for performances Doing (+/-)
Language and Politics (1984)	Michael Shapiro Political Theory	Shapiro uses theatre as a readily available and long-standing metaphor politics based on a general understanding of life as constructed . Once you think of life as constructed, it is easy to think of it as a play – and therefore aspects of life such as politics will also be part of the play, although the position of the observer	Political Life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Strategies of direction and presentation Structured	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		should be problematized. ⁴⁵
'Dramaturgy and Political Mystification: Political Life in the United States' (1985)	John F. Welsh Critical Sociology	Dramaturgy. Political life uses spectacle as a technology of power; impressions can be false; impression management creates fraudulent images which pacify. Politics 'is a kind of theatre [which involves] enforced political stagings and image-management of capitalist society [through which] powerful elites sustain both their power and its institutions by projecting political and cultural images upon the masses, and by generating the illusion that society is in reality of the people, by the people, and for the people':⁴⁶ 'the dramaturgical technology of the American state is geared toward conveying the impression and appearance of democracy, equity, accountability and participation'.⁴⁷ Such 'false politics' are essential to the capitalist state.⁴⁸ A 'fiercely anticapitalist ... dramaturgy, which maintains the unexamined assumption that politics is theatrical' of Lyman and Scott. Critical Dramaturgy. Authority 'is a form of impression management' which mystifies 'the social relations of class and power'. It allows the United States political system 'to present itself as possessing structures of full participation and authentic democracy, while it excludes many categories of people from participating in the social construction of political and economic reality'. Dramaturgical analysis thus indicates that 'the United State's political system's claim of democracy and full participation is not matched by the actuality of its performance'. Instead, it creates 'false politics' in a number of areas: capitalism, political debate, representation and personality, bureaucratic self-criticism and patriotism, and it does this to an unprecedentedly sophisticated degree 'through the manipulation of symbolic management', turning politics into a mere 'spectator sport'.⁴⁹	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility Strategies of performance and presentation. The possibility of deception. Causality	Externalised : critical analyst Internal: deluded citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public	Neil Postman Cultural theorist	The media turns life (and politics) into theatre so that appearances and images dominate: 'Style' not argument decides voter support. ⁵⁰ Life is made show business by the media: 'Our	Social and political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and	Mediation Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : theorist; Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Discourse in the Age of Show Business (1985; 1987)		politics, religion, news, athletics, education and commerce have been transformed into congenial adjuncts of show business'.⁵¹ Politics has become show business. Postman quotes U.S. President Ronald Reagan, 'Politics is just like show business'. This was problematic: when ... a people become an audience and their public business a vaudeville act, then the nation finds itself at risk'. The metaphor of Show Business allows Postman to define the modern age and contrast it with the previous age of analytical discourse, which he calls 'the Age of Exposition'. Postman's view is that when public life degenerates, cultural life is endangered. Reasoned discourse has been replaced by entertainment which is 'a form of baby talk'.⁵² This has been particularly driven by television, which reduces even the most serious of subjects to just one more sit-com or drama.⁵³ Television is not just a medium, it is a metaphor for a whole society. It is also the way that society knows – it is America's epistemology. It determines how Americans think.⁵⁴ Richards says that whilst he agrees with Postman that television poses special problems 'for sustaining sophisticated analytical discourse', Postman ignores the history of political discourse in America, which has always been made 'in the context of entertainment'.⁵⁵ Postman confuses pervasiveness with decline. McKee places Postman into the camp of Modernity along with Habermas for his pessimistic view of modern public life.⁵⁶		spectators	presentation	politician performer; passive spectator Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
Noise: The Political Economy of Music (1985)	Jacques Attali Economist, historian and cultural critic	The involvement of art and political economy is about the imposition of order. Theatre is a representation, 'a model'. Representation involves exchange, 'one element representing all the others'. Therefore, the 'political economy of the nineteenth century could only be theater'. Politics is a process of exchange, preferably harmonious; representation necessarily externalises spectators as it creates commodities. The aim is to achieve harmony. Indeed, the different voting procedures are based on the	Political and cultural life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Strategies of direction and presentation Harmonisation Causality	Externalised : theorist; spectators Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		idea of harmony of combinations. ⁵⁷
‘Toward a New Political Narrative’ (1985); Constructing the Political Spectacle (1988)	Murray Edelman Political Symbolology	Politics, like theatre, is staged and uses devices for effect, and can therefore be analysed as theatre. According to Edelman, politics is like theatre (art) in that it uses devices to ‘stage’ effects in order to elicit responses. Edelman starts off with the metaphor: politics is (like) theatre; but succumbs to the temptation to move from metaphor to myth: politics is the art of using devices to stage effects to elicit certain responses. In ‘Toward a new political narrative’, Edelman and Bennett argue that political narratives are the way the powerful justify their positions and the non-powerful rationalise theirs. Since such narratives can be manipulated or distorted, they argue for a ‘new political narrative’ which focuses on ‘contradictions and narrative dilemmas within the same story’ so that they can be clearly seen by the ‘citizen-spectator audience’ of the ‘long-running political dramas that lurch from one crisis to another’. ⁵⁸	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility Strategies of presentation and direction Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: deluded and manipulated citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
The Self and Social Life (1985)	B.R. Schlenker Social Psychology	Dramaturgy; Impression Management. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads us to shape our conduct according to the expectations of others. A psychological application of dramaturgy which delineates and investigates the impact of dramaturgical awareness on human behaviour. ⁵⁹	Social behaviour:	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility and therefore self-awareness Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : analyst Internalized: self-conscious individuals Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Durov’s Pig: Clowns, Politics, and Theatre (1985); ‘Politics as Theatre; or, How I Too Lost	Joel Schechter Drama critic and political activist	Politics is performed and can therefore be analysed as theatre. Schechter was a drama critic who applied what Borreca calls ‘practical political dramaturgy ’ to politics as a form of performance. ⁶⁰ Schechter ran as a political candidate, staging ‘political dramas’ based on the campaigns in an attempt to provoke awareness of the theatrical nature of politics. ⁶¹	Political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility Strategies of performance	Externalised : drama critic Internal: political candidate Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
the Election in 1988' (1989); 'Reagan in Bohemia' (1989).						Showing (-)
'Electronic Ceremonies: Television Performs a Royal Wedding' (1985)	Daniel Dayan & Elihu Katz Media Studies	To describe the relationship between a televised ceremony and the spectators of that ceremony. Televised ceremonies are like performances: they position their spectators in particular ways and give them 'roles' to play: '[w]hat there is to see is very clearly exhibited: spectacle implies a distinction between the roles of performers and audience. Performers are set apart and audiences asked to respond cognitively and emotionally in predefined categories of approval, disapproval, arousal or passivity. Audience interaction with the performance may enhance it, but it is not meant nor allowed to become part of its definition'. ⁶² It is hard to see how spectators could do otherwise, since they are likely to be in their homes, which suggests that the elision of theatre spectators and/or ritual participants with television spectators can be misleading. How could they affect the performance? And how would anyone know if they did or didn't 'interact' with the performance?	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectators	Visibility and mediation which allows strategies of performance and direction Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)

¹ Gronbeck, Bruce 1980, 'Dramaturgical theory and criticism: The state of the art (or science)', Western Journal of Speech Communication Vol 44, 1980, pp. 315-330.

² Altman, Dennis. 1980. Rehearsals for change: politics and culture in Australia. Melbourne, Vic.: Fontana/Collins. 190

³ Nimmo, Dan D., and Keith R. Sanders. 1981. 'Introduction'. In Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders. Beverly Hills, London: Sage Publications, 11-36. 24-5

⁴ In Anthropological Quarterly Vol 45(1), 1981, pp. 36-43.

⁵ Perinbanayagam, Robert 1982, 'Dramas, metaphors and structures', Symbolic Interaction Vol 5(2), 1982, pp. 259-276.

⁶ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter. xii

⁷ Shields, Donald C. 1981. 'A Dramatistic Approach to Applied Communication Research: Theory, Methods and Applications'. In Applied Communication Research: A Dramatistic Approach, edited by J. F. Cragan and D. C. Shields. Prospect Heights, Illinois: Waveland Press, Inc., pp. 5-13. 7-8.

-
- ⁸ Combs and Mansfield 1976; 1980 and Nimmo 1974; 1976
- ⁹ MacIntyre, Alasdair. 1981. After Virtue: Duckworth. 26
- ¹⁰ Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ¹¹ Bitzer, Lloyd F. 1981. 'Political Rhetoric'. In The Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders. Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, pp. 225-248. 226
- ¹² Graber, D. 1981, 'Political Languages' in The Handbook of Political Communication, edited by D. D. Nimmo and K. R. Sanders. Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, pp. 195-223. 199-221
- ¹³ Quinn, Michael. 1995. 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 106-114.
- ¹⁴ Kachel, A. T. 2001. 'Book Review: From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play (Victor Turner); Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor (Bruce Wilshire)'. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion (2001) pp. 386-387. 386
- ¹⁵ Wilshire, Bruce. 1982. Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 243
- ¹⁶ Wilshire 1982: xvi
- ¹⁷ Wilshire 1982: 228-232
- ¹⁸ Wilshire 1982: 280
- ¹⁹ Overington, M.A. and Mangham L.L. 1982, 'The theatrical perspective in organizational analysis' Symbolic Interaction, Vol 5(2), pp. 173-185.
- ²⁰ See also T. Clark and I. Mangham 2004.
- ²¹ Mangham and Overington 1982 'Performance and Rehearsal: Social Order and Organizational Life' Symbolic Interaction Vol 5(2), pp. 205-222, 205; also cited in Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe 2003.
- ²² Mangham, Iain L., and Michael A. Overington. 1987. Organizations as Theatre: A Social Psychology of Dramatic Appearances. Chichester: John Wiley and Sons. 44-50
- ²³ Mangham and Overington 1987: 5-6
- ²⁴ Mangham and Overington 1987: 52
- ²⁵ Mangham and Overington 1987: 4
- ²⁶ Mangham and Overington 1987: 26
- ²⁷ Mangham and Overington 1987: 80
- ²⁸ Mangham and Overington 1987: 55
- ²⁹ Zurcher, Louis 1982, 'The staging of emotion: A dramaturgical analysis' Symbolic Interaction Vol 5, pp. 1-22; Zurcher 1985 'The war game: Organizational scripting and the expression of emotion', Symbolic Interaction Vol 8(2), pp. 191-206.
- ³⁰ McDougall 1982: 9-10 cited in Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press. 251
- ³¹ Weber 2004: 252
- ³² Weber 2004: 254
- ³³ Sontag, Susan 1982, 'Fascinating Fascism', A Susan Sontag Reader, Penguin 324-5; cited in Jervis 1999: 175-6.
- ³⁴ In J.V. Harari and D.R. Bell (eds) 1982, Hermes: Literature, Science, Philosophy, Baltimore MD, Johns Hopkins University Press and M. Serres (ed) 1995, A History of Scientific Thought, Oxford, Blackwell, 80 respectively; discussed at length in Brown 2005.
- ³⁵ Brown, Steven D. 2005. 'The Theatre of Measurement: Michel Serres'. The Sociological Review 53 (s1) pp. 215-227. 225-6.

-
- ³⁶ Mangham and Overington 1987: 79
- ³⁷ Briggs, Julia 1983, This Stage-Play World: Texts and Contexts, 1580-1625, Oxford, Oxford University Press.
- ³⁸ Cited in Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1995. 'Introduction: theatricality: a key concept in theatre and cultural studies'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 85-90.
- ³⁹ Quinn 1995
- ⁴⁰ Shklar, Judith. 1984. Ordinary Vices: Belknap Press.248
- ⁴¹ Hunt, Lynn. 1984. Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.34-41
- ⁴² Marranca, Bonnie 1984, 'Nuclear Theatre' Theatrewritings, 147-52, New York, PAJ Publications; Marranca 1987, 'Performance World, Performance Culture', Performing Arts Journal 10(3), pp. 21-29.
- ⁴³ Gioia, Dennis and Poole, Peter 1984, 'Scripts in Organizational Behavior', The Academy of Management Review, Vol 9(3), Jul, 449-459: 449
- ⁴⁴ MacAloon, John J. 1984. 'Introduction: Cultural Performances, Culture Theory'. In Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, edited by J. J. MacAloon. Philadelphia: Institute for the Study of Human Issues, 1-15.
- ⁴⁵ Shapiro, Michael, ed. 1984. Language and Politics. Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- ⁴⁶ Borreca 1993: 62
- ⁴⁷ Welsh, John F. 1985, 'Dramaturgy and Political Mystification: Political Life in the United States', Mid-American Review of Sociology Vol 10, pp. 3-28: 21; excerpt reprinted in Brissett and Edgley 1990: 399-410; quoted in Borreca 1993: 62.
- ⁴⁸ Borreca 1993: 63
- ⁴⁹ Welsh 1990/1985: 399-410
- ⁵⁰ Postman, Neil. 1987. Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business. 2nd ed. London: Methuen. 100
- ⁵¹ Postman 1987: 4
- ⁵² Postman, Neil. 1985. Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business. New York: Penguin. 5-6
- ⁵³ Postman 1985: 87
- ⁵⁴ Postman 1985: 15-16
- ⁵⁵ Richards, Jeffrey H. 1991. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage 1607-1789. Durham and London: Duke University Press.2
- ⁵⁶ McKee, Alan. 2005. The Public Sphere: An Introduction. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 205
- ⁵⁷ Attali, Jacques. 1985. Noise: The Political Economy of Music. Translated by B. Massumi. Vol. 16, Theory and History of Literature. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 57-64
- ⁵⁸ Bennet, Lance and Edelman, Murray 1985, 'Toward a New Political Narrative', Journal of Communication 35(4), pp. 156-171: 157; Edelman, Murray. 1988. Constructing the Political Spectacle. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- ⁵⁹ Brissett and Edgley 1990: xii
- ⁶⁰ Borreca 1993: 74n11
- ⁶¹ Schechter, Joel 1989, 'Politics as Theatre; or, How I Too Lost the Election in 1988' New York, Theatre Communications Group; TDR 33(3), pp. 154-165; Schechter 1989, 'Reagan in Bohemia', American Theatre 6(7).
- ⁶² Dayan and Katz 1985, 'Electronic Ceremonies: Television Performs a Royal Wedding', Blonsky, Marshall (ed) 1985, In Signs, Baltimore, The Johns Hopkins University Press, pp. 16-32, 16-17; discussed in Bennett 1997: 56.

Table 12/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator – 1986-1989

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Sporadic critique of the metaphor continues to appear from a number of disciplines, but as the table indicates, generally goes unheeded (see Blau (theatre), Bartky (Gender Studies) and Dasgupta (Political activism) in this table). Wars in Middle East, Africa, South America and the Balkans
‘Writing for the Stage’ (1986); ‘Politics and Theatre’ (1996a); ‘Acceptance of an Honorary Degree from the Academy of Performing Arts, Prague’ (1996b)	Václav Havel (1936- Spectator, playwright, dramaturg, politician (President of the Czech Republic)	The world (and the state) is experienced as a structured environment; political life is mediated: everyone becomes both actor and spectator. Theatre in the service of the state; theatre against the state. Havel used the metaphor in relation to his victimization by the state. He saw the State Security agents who arrested him as ‘characters in a play’. ¹ For Havel, the world was experienced as a ‘structured environment’ which contained ‘a beginning, middle, and end’. Theatre was ‘an expression of our desire for a concise way of grasping this dramatic element’. It was an expression of our self-awareness. Drama is ‘an inherent aspect of the world as seen by human beings and thus ... a fundamental tool of human communication’. Politics should be like theatre: it ‘knows it matters what comes first and what follows ... acknowledges that all things have a proper sequence and order, ... realizes that citizens Know perfectly well whether political actions have a direction, a structure, a logic in time and space, or whether they lack these qualities and are merely haphazard responses to circumstances’. However, ‘the drama of politics demands not an audience but a world of players’ because ‘it makes continuous demands on us all, as dramatists, actors and audience’. ² All politicians, ‘including those who sneer at theatre as something superfluous ... unwittingly become actors, dramatists, directors, or entertainers’ in a world of mediated politics. ³	Political life:	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation and direction Structure	Externalised : playwright, active spectator Internal: victim Internalised: we are spectators to and of ourselves Doing/ Showing (+)
‘Aristotle on Specular Regimes: The Theater of	James Porter Philology; Political Philosophy	There is a necessary connection between politics and ethics; theory is a ‘technique of seeing’ which requires a guiding ethic to ensure that it considers the implications of what it leaves out. Discourse is theatre; it clarifies by obscuring some aspects in	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship	Visibility Strategies of presentation. The possibility	Externalised : ‘speculator’ (philosopher

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Philosophical Discourse’ (1986)		favour of others. Porter subjects Aristotle’s writings on politics to a careful analysis based on the metaphor theory is seeing , a metaphor he feels justified in using because of the number of times Aristotle uses words which derive from thea . This analysis reveals an extended use of the theatre metaphor by Aristotle which connects his political philosophy with his ethics. This shows up especially in his treatment of tyranny. Politics as theatre means we cannot tell the difference between a tyrant and a king. Since the theatricality of power means that we cannot tell the difference between legitimate or benign authority and tyranny, politics is therefore in need of an ethics in order to overcome the ‘troubling synthesis’ of knowledge, technique and perception. ⁴ Porter discovers through his analysis that discourse itself is theatre, since the clarity apparently achieved in discourse is an illusion produced by a simultaneous shadowing of other aspects of the phenomenon under scrutiny, just as theatre illuminates some aspects of life by disregarding or hiding others.		between actor and spectator	of deception and delusion Irresponsibility	/ theorist) Internal: deluded users of theory Showing (-)
‘Early Processes of Institutionalization: The Dramaturgy of Exchange in Inter-organizational Relations’ (1986)	R.R. Ritti and J.H. Silver Organization theory	Dramaturgy. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others which leads us to shape interactions according to the expectations of others. Organizations use dramaturgy in the inter-organizational relations. ⁵	Organization	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and direction	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
The Transformational Leader (1986)	N.M. Tichy and M.A. Devanna Leadership Studies	Dramaturgy: Leadership requires the ability to transform organizational life in the face of the unknown. The writers use the metaphor of a three-act play in their description of the pattern they perceive in the transformational leaders they studied: ‘Being a leader today involves one in a drama whose outcomes are	Organization	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance, direction and presentation	Externalised : analyst; successful leaders Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		largely unknown. Leaders have to improvise on available plots and scripts and, in many cases, rewrite the script as the drama unfolds. Leadership means being a playwright, a lead actor, a stage director, a drama critic and a director all in one'. ⁶
Portrait and Story: Dramaturg-ical Approaches to the Study of Persons (1986); The Meaning of Grief, a Dramaturg-ical Approach to Understanding Emotion (1987)	Larry Cochran Social Psychology	Dramaturgy. We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others An 'explication of life as narrative flow [which] develops a unique contribution to the dramaturgical literature utilizing the concepts of portrait and story', ⁷ extending and elaborating the perspective of Goffman.	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility which allows objectification Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : analyst Internal: others Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology (1986)	W.J.T. Mitchell Art theory	Images are historical in nature and are affected by inventions which change the way we see. Images are 'something like an actor on the historical stage, a presence of character endowed with legendary status'. ⁸ Revolutions in thinking lead to inventions which 'set the stage' for future discourses and battles. For example, the invention of 'artificial perspective' in 1435 set the stage for the belief that we could accurately represent what we 'really' see (Mitchell 1986: 9, 37). Knowledge is always historical. There 'is no vision without purpose', no such thing as 'an innocent eye' . ⁹	Cultural life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Perspective enabling contextualisation	Internal: theorist Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Breakfast at Spiro's: Dramaturgy and dominance' (1987).	M. Rosen Organization Studies	Dramaturgy: Power is organized and directed using techniques and strategies. Therefore dramaturgy can be used to study the operation of power. ¹⁰	Organization	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Strategies of performance Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
The Image: A	Daniel	Dramaturgy: Historical events are theatricalised by the media. A	History	A constructed art	Objectification	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Guide to Pseudo-Events in America (1987)	Boorstin History	construction of the paradigm to account ‘for the dramatizing or theatricalizing effects of the media in a technological society’. ¹¹		A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Causality	: historian Internal: deluded citizens Showing (-)
‘Role as a cultural concept’ (1987); ‘Geertz, Kuhn and the idea of a cultural paradigm’ (1994)	George (Jorge) Ardit Sociology	Role Theory Theorists use concepts to explain the human condition; these concepts can appear the same but vary historically and geographically. The idea of ‘role-taking’ is not just a ‘fruitful tool’ for social research; roles can be seen as ‘elements of the social structure’. ¹² It is, however, a cultural construct, one which has been more dominant in American than in European sociology (which has tended to favour the idea of alienation). Geertz’ conception is different again: the self is a dramatis personae rather than the occupier of a variety of roles. Ardit argues that the Renaissance use of the idea of character has (mistakenly) been taken to be a theatrical metaphor. ¹³	Intellectual life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Perspective allowing contextualisation Strategies of presentation Causality	Internal: social theorist Doing (+/-)
The Eye of Prey (1987)	Herbert Blau (1926- American playwright, director and scholar of performance theory	Theoretical concepts are representations pressed into service for ideological reasons but come to be reified by their users so that they fail to understand the power implicit in representations and their consequences. Theatre reveals the unavoidability of representation because it reveals the intractable facticity of the body. In reifying Representation, both theatre and theory fails to deal with the questions of power raised by actual representations. ‘If all the world does approach being a stage, I’d rather wear some masks than others and choose the moments when I put them on’, but this is never an issue in postmodern applications of the theatre metaphor because it is never the player who gets to choose either the masks or the circumstances in which it will be used, but the theorist. Postmodern theory ‘displaces the militancy’ of their dreams of leftist radical activism ‘into theory, making for an unseemly melodrama in the language of the discourse’ while at the same time ignoring the ‘material	Intellectual life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Embodiment The possibility of (self) deception Reification	Externalised : theorists who are indifferent to fact and ignore power Internal: theatre practitioner and theorist Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		conditions' which achieving an affiliation with the 'revolutionary proletariat' would involve and the 'ends to which the oppressed feel obliged to go to liberate themselves'. Theory may be a 'masque', but however necessary, it is not necessarily more honourable than any other representation, particularly when it tries to deny the existence of representation by reducing everything to mere appearance. '[O]ur institutional analyses need to register this: what is imaginable and may be approachable in art, in paint, light, sound, words, conceptual events, or film is, at some unnegotiable sticking point not doable with the human body; or doable at the most execrable human cost'. Life is not theatre, and representations are a reality which both must come to terms with no matter how much either might wish it away. ¹⁴
Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics (1988)	Paul Hindson and Tim Gray	Historical events can be seen in retrospect to build to and reach a climax which time resolves one way or another, and to involve particular persons who act in significant ways. Hindson and Gray draw on Bernard Beckerman's The Dynamics of Drama to discuss Edmund Burke in relation to politics. For Beckerman, dramatic action is 'a kind of ebb and flow'. The 'whole art of drama relies on this sense of movement and rhythm which makes timing of crucial importance. In Beckerman's eyes, the development of the play depends on certain hinges which he calls cruxes '. These are comparable to the crises of politics and represent a gap between the intention of political actions and the results of such actions. It is this gap which Burke exploits when he discusses the French Revolution, and which confirms his insistence on a conservative approach to political life, an approach which does not over-reach itself and is less likely to have unintended consequences: 'part' is 'the main purpose of the dramatic metaphor'. ¹⁵	Historical political life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Distance Perspective Causality Strategies of performance Signification	Externalised : historical analysis Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Foucault, Femininity, and	Sandra Lee Bartky	Gender and power: power placed women under the gaze of men, which requires them to modify their appearance and conduct to	(Gendered) social life	A seeing-place (implied and	The possibility of delusion	Internal: theorist/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
the Modernization of Patriarchal Power' (1988)	Gender Studies	meet male expectations. A critique of patriarchal society especially in relation to 'a panoptical male connoisseur'. Bartky criticised the use of the theatre metaphor as a way of describing the way women 'perform' their gender. 'The analogy to theater breaks down' because in theatre, 'the actor ... depends on his audience but is in no way inferior to it; he is not demeaned by his dependency'. All women are required to participate in 'femininity as spectacle' and are judged despite 'gross imbalances in the social power of the sexes'. ¹⁶		critiqued) A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and direction Subjectification	critic Internalised: women in a patriarchal society Externalised : theorists who mistakenly use theatre as a metaphor Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
'The Theatricals of Politics' (1988).	Gautam Dasgupta Drama critic and political activist	Politics does involve performance and can appear theatrical but not in the same way as in the theatre because political performances have consequences in real life for which the performers are responsible. To raise awareness of the theatrical nature of politics. Politics has become theatre since Reagan became president and began to treat the office as a 'role', thus collapsing the socio-political and the aesthetic. This has relieved politicians of responsibility for the action of their 'role'. This has been allowed to occur because of a fundamental misunderstanding of the idea of theatricality , which is to do with mimicry (mimesis) not artifice: '[t]o confuse elements of theatricality as they appertain to the human condition with the formal elements that constitute theatre is dangerous. It can lead to disastrous consequences'. Reagan marginalised and reconstituted the presidency as a role which was to be judged in theatre terms, according to 'mere representation'. Even political campaigns are	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance Abrogation of responsibility Manipulation of spectators The possibility of delusion	Externalised : theorists who mistakenly use theatre as a metaphor for politics; actors who wish to avoid the consequences of their actions Internal: critical

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		now presented as mini-dramas with endless intertextuality. This collapse of desire into theatre makes us all into mere consumers. Life may be theatrical but it is not theatre. Theatre is an art or craft with its own history, techniques and skills, as is politics. Both theatre and politics suffer when one is collapsed into the other. ¹⁷				spectators; deluded, pacified citizens Doing (-)
'Metaphors for Public Opinion in Literature' (1988)	Kurt W. Back Public Opinion	Public opinion can be seen 'as a chorus' or 'voices from the gods'. It forms the backdrop to political and social life which may or may not be heeded. ¹⁸	Political and social life	A seeing-place (implied) A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification which allows contextualisation	Externalised : theorist Watching (+/-)
'The Pull of the Policy Audience' (1988)	Austin Sarat & Susan Silbey Public Policy/Law	Research on policy possibilities is made with particular recipients in mind, which limits alternative views The 'policy audience' pulls research into a limited and limiting arena which has a silencing effect. 'Those doing such work [policy research] should be more explicit about the political commitments that inform their work'. ¹⁹	Governance	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility A relationship between actor and spectator Strategies of presentation	Externalised : theorist Internal: recipients of research Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
Mind Children (1988)	Hans Moravec Perception/ Cognition	New technologies created virtual spaces for learning and perhaps future human existence. Using computer technology, teaching can take place in virtual space – 'a little theater for students' in which the student can meet and learn directly from Newton. Moravec believed that a series of catastrophes would lead to humans becoming 'purely cerebral', storing themselves in computers 'as a mental clone in a virtual computer theater [of memory]'. ²⁰	Education:	A seeing-place	Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: students Internalised: future human beings Doing (+/-)
Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theater in	J.C. Agnew	Social change brings crises and conflicts which need to be resolved. In retrospect these can be seen to involve particular strategies. Theatre provides 'a language and imagery that helped	History	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship	Objectification: Strategies of performance	Externalised : theorist Showing

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Anglo-American Thought, 1550-1750 (1988)		make sense of the world of commodities and market relationships', ²¹ and negotiate the 'crisis of representation' brought about by rapid social change and the emergence of the market. ²² The theatre of the period demonstrated 'how precarious social identity was, how vulnerable to unexpected disruptions and disclosures it was, and therefore how deeply theatrical it was'. ²³ Markets shared with theatre the problem of how to make oneself appear believable before strangers. ²⁴		between actor and spectator		(+/-)
Theater des Schreckens: Gerichtspraxis und Strafrituale unter frühen Neuzeit (1988)	Richard van Dulmen	Justice is ritualised in ways which affect its culture. Judicial practice and rituals of punishment in the early modern period created a 'Theatre of Terror' culture. ²⁵	Judicial practices	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and direction	Externalised : theorist Internal: affected citizens Showing (-)
Rembrandt's Enterprise: The Studio and the Market (1988)	Svetlana Alpers Art history	Theatricality: Art involves the imaginative construction and organization of affective images which reveal the imagination of the artist. Rembrandt's work exhibits theatricality (theatrical imagination) in its construction and organization of images and in the sympathy which he is able to express for his subjects. Theatre is 'a crucial tool for the imagination and understanding of others' experience'. ²⁶ Offering an historical and contextualised analysis of Rembrandt's work in terms of its imaginative structure	Creative life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst, historian Showing (+/-)
'Metaphorical Representations of the French Revolution in Victorian Fiction' (1988)	Kurt Tetzeli von Rosador History	Historical events are described metaphorically by both actors and observers. Each metaphor expresses a particular aspect of the event. The French Revolution was an 'historical drama'. It was represented in Victorian fiction through three main metaphors: as a revival of classical antiquity, as Nature and as theatre: 'stage-imagery is an adequate vehicle' for the expression of revolutionary self-consciousness – something revolutionaries normally do not lack and can be seen in the speeches and writings of Robespierre and Sieyès who envisioned 'a multitude of théâtres nationaux for the education and edification of the	History	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of performance and presentation	Externalised : historian Internal: revolutionary actor; citizens Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		people'. ²⁷
1989: collapse of the Soviet regime Student uprising in Beijing. Rumanian Revolution; USA invades Panama
Language and Power (1989)	Norman Fairclough Critical Language Studies	Language is used in ways which are selective and may be imbued with power. Discourse, is composed of both visible and hidden elements. An argument for the value of Critical Language Study in relation to other forms of language study (linguistics, sociolinguistics, pragmatics etc.). Language 'connects with the social through being the primary domain of ideology and through being both a site of and a stake in struggles for power. Language is centrally involved in power'. ²⁸ Fairclough uses the theatre metaphor to distinguish the different kinds of 'conversations' associated with different types of discourse. 'For instance, conversation has no "on-stage" role in legal proceedings, but it may have a significant "off-stage" role [whereas] in education, conversation may have approved roles not only before/after [i.e. "off-stage"] but also as a form of activity embedded within the discourse of the lesson'. ²⁹ All discourses are designed with an audience in mind. ³⁰	Intellectual life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance and direction	Externalised : language analyst Internal: deluded audiences Showing (-)
The Body and the French Revolution (1989)	D. Outram History	(In retrospect), historical events can be seen as structured, affective, and involving purposeful actors who engaged in strategies which constructed the event as it occurred. In the French Revolution, 'political figures were actors in a theatre, not only playing to an audience, but actually creating that audience through the existence of their drama ... Role-playing was the essence of the struggle for political authority'. ³¹	Political history	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification revealing strategies of direction, presentation and performance	Externalised : historian/ Theorist Internal: spectators of political events Doing/ Showing (-)
Managing as a Performing Art: New Ideas for a World of Chaotic Change	Peter Vaill Management Theory	Effective management requires a consciousness of how particular actions will fit into intended overall outcomes. Uses cultural theory to model organizational theory. Theatre offers a way to manage 'interconnectedness of quality, process, and form' ³² because it has the ability to 'combine different elements into a	Organizations	A constructed art	Objectification: Holism Strategies of presentation, direction and	Externalised : organization al theorist; effective

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1989)		dynamic “rounded performance of the whole” without losing particularities: ‘if you think of action taking as a performing art there is no danger that you will confuse proficiency in a component with proficiency in the rounded performance as a whole. Furthermore, you will be pushed to consider what the ‘rounded performance as a whole’ in fact is’. ³³ Theatre utilizes a ‘holistic model of management’. ³⁴			performance	managers Doing (+/-)
‘On Looking and Reading: Word and Image, Visual Poetics and Comparative Arts’ (1989); Reading Rembrandt: Beyond the Word-Image Opposition (1991); ‘Semiotics and Art History’ (1991) ³⁵	Mieke Bal Art theory	All art is created to be seen. ‘The theater itself is the non-autonomous art par excellence. For most of us, a performance without an audience is more obviously unthinkable than a text without readers or a painting without a beholder; yet the case of performance makes the case for the other two. Theatrical painting draws attention to that extreme position of the theater and, by implication, claims the same status for painting ... Theatricality ... becomes a metaphor for my pursuit of non-oppositional relations between verblity and visuality’. ³⁶ Bal’s view of theatre is very limited, though: her ‘idealized theatricality is theorized almost entirely in terms of ... ideas of the theatre based mostly on a normatively conceived proscenium arch ... stage’. ³⁷	Creative life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility The relationship between artist and public	Externalised : analyst/theorist Internal: the targets of art, whether as readers or as spectators Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)
‘Theatre Audiences and the Reading of Performance’ (1989) ³⁸	Marvin Carlson Theatre scholar	Spectatorship in theatre is participatory. Carlson discusses spectators in relation to ‘role’. As audiences, spectators have a ‘role’ to play in the theatre. This role can be thought of as ‘readers’, as in reception theory, although reception theory has limitations in understanding what spectators for live theatre are doing, particularly when they reject a performance. ³⁹	Cultural life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Intersubjectivity	Externalised : theatre scholar Internal: Spectators as ‘actors’ Doing (+/-)
‘The Theatrical	Nancy Klein	Political life involves strategies of representation which	Political life	A constructed art	Distance:	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Mask/Masque of Politics: The Case of Charles I' (1989)	Maguire History	encourage the acceptance of historical events. Politics appropriated theatre through the theatre metaphor to distance itself and also come to terms with the execution of the king: many Englishmen responded to the execution as theater, more specifically, the dramatic genre of tragedy'. ⁴⁰			The abrogation of responsibility The management of emotion Retrospectivity Strategies of presentation	: historian Internal: spectators of historical events Doing/ Showing (-)
Mass and Elite in Democratic Athens: Rhetoric, Ideology, and the Power of the People (1989)	Josiah Ober Historian	Political and cultural life involves strategies of integration. Athens during its democratic period was a 'performance culture'. Elites 'participated in a drama in which they were required to play the roles of common men and to voice their solidarity with egalitarian ideals'. ⁴¹ Participation in Athenian dramatic festivals helped to educate the citizenry to accept these 'dramatic fictions'.	Political and cultural life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Meaningfulness Perspective Strategies of direction Purposefulness	Externalised : historian Doing (+/-)
The Audience as Actor and Character: The Modern Theater of Beckett, Brecht, Genet, Ionesco, Pinter, Stoppard and Williams (1989)	Sidney Homan American actor and director	We are all actors and spectators for ourselves and others which necessarily requires us to attend to the way we appear and express ourselves to others. The human need to express oneself in public generates the consciousness of patterned behaviour which can come to seem like a role. 'Neither actor nor audience can resist the stage, for the very notion of theater is ingrained in us, is part of our human make-up. We cannot avoid the need to play roles, the self-fashioning by which we consciously mold and adjust whatever basic personality has been handed us at birth. Yet such acting, our need to be on the stage of the polis ... only subjects us to the existential complexities and ... terrors of an audience ... we are caught between our comfort of our inner self, and our human, communicative need to express that self before others'. ⁴²	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Self-awareness Strategies of presentation Convention	Externalised : theatre director Internal: everyone for everyone else – we find it terrifying so we resort to stock parts Doing/ Watching (+/-)

-
- ¹ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 483)
- ² Havel, Vaclav. 1996a. 'Politics and Theatre'. Project Syndicate www.project-syndicate.org accessed 23/05/2006.
- ³ Havel, Vaclav. 1996b. 'Acceptance of an Honorary Degree from the Academy of Performing Arts'. Prague: Prague Castle http://old.hrad.cz/president/Havel/speeches/index_uk.html accessed 4th October 2007.
- ⁴ Porter, James I. 1986. 'Aristotle on Specular Regimes: The Theater of Philosophical Discourse'. Pacific Coast Philology 21 (1/2) 20-24.
- ⁵ Ritti, R.R. and J.H. Silver 1986 'Early Processes of Institutionalization: The Dramaturgy of Exchange in Inter-organizational Relations', Administrative Science Quarterly, 1986, pp. 25-42.
- ⁶ Tichy, N.M., and M.A. Devanna. 1986. The Transformational Leader. New York: John Wiley and Sons.17.
- ⁷ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter. xii
- ⁸ Mitchell, W.J.T. 1986. Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.9
- ⁹ Mitchell 1986: 38
- ¹⁰ Rosen, M. 1987, 'Breakfast at Spiro's: Dramaturgy and dominance', Journal of Management 11, pp. 31-48; cited in Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).
- ¹¹ Borreca, Art. 1993. 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View'. The Drama Review 37 (2) pp. 56-79. 57
- ¹² Arditi, Jorge (George). 1987. 'Role as a Cultural Concept'. Theory and Society 16 (4) 565-591. 565; Arditi, Jorge (George). 1994. 'Geertz, Kuhn and the Idea of a Cultural Paradigm'. British Journal of Sociology 45 (4) 597-617.
- ¹³ Dryden provides the first recorded use of the term character to mean a person in a play or book, in 1664 (Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers.160).
- ¹⁴ Blau, Herbert. 1987. The Eye of Prey: Subversions of the Postmodern. Edited by K. Woodward. Vol. 9, Theories in Contemporary Culture. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.190-205
- ¹⁵ Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury. 96-135
- ¹⁶ Bartky, Sandra. 2002. 'Sympathy and Solidarity'. In 'Sympathy and Solidarity' and Other Essays. Lanham, Boulder, NY, Oxford: Rowman and Littlefield Publishers Inc., pp. 70-86.25.
- ¹⁷ Dasgupta, Gautam. 1988. 'The Theatricals of Politics'. Performing Arts Journal 11 (2) pp. 77-83.79-80; also cited in Borreca 1993: 74n11.
- ¹⁸ Back, Kurt 1988, 'Metaphors for Public Opinion in Literature', Public Opinion Quarterly 52(3), pp. 278-288.
- ¹⁹ Sarat , Austin and Sibley, Susan 1988, 'The Pull of the Policy Audience', Law and Policy Vol 10(2&3), pp. 97-142. 98
- ²⁰ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70. 68
- ²¹ Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.20
- ²² Agnew, J.C. 1988. Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theater in Anglo-American Thought, 1550-1750. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.60
- ²³ Agnew 1988: 112-3
- ²⁴ Jervis 1998: 20
- ²⁵ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1995. 'Introduction: theatricality: a key concept in theatre and cultural studies'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 85-90.
- ²⁶ Quinn, Michael 1995, 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History', Theatre Research International 20(2), pp. 106-114.

-
- ²⁷ von Rosador, Kurt Tetzeli. 1988. 'Metaphorical Representations of the French Revolution in Victorian Fiction'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 43 (1) pp. 1-23.1-2
- ²⁸ Fairclough, Norman. 1989. Language and Power. Edited by C. N. Candlin, Language in Social Life Series. London and New York: Longman. 14-15
- ²⁹ Fairclough 1989: 30
- ³⁰ Fairclough 1989: 49
- ³¹ Outram, D. 1989. The Body and the French Revolution: Yale University Press.79-80, 100
- ³² McKenzie, Jon. 2001. Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance. London, New York: Routledge. 85
- ³³ Vaill, Peter B. 1989. Managing as a Performing Art: New Ideas for a World of Chaotic Change. San Francisco CA: Jossey-Bass Publishers. 116
- ³⁴ McKenzie 2001: 85
- ³⁵ Bal, M. 1989, 'On Looking and Reading: Word and Image, Visual Poetics and Comparative Arts', Semiotica 1989; Bal 1991, 'Semiotics and Art History', The Art Bulletin 23(1) 1991, pp. 174-208 (with Bryson).
- ³⁶ Bal 1989: 25-6 in Quinn 1995
- ³⁷ Quinn 1995
- ³⁸ Carlson, M. 1989, 'Theatre Audiences and the Reading of Performance', in Postlewait, T. and B. McConachie (eds) 1989, Interpreting the Theatrical Past: Essays in the Historiography of Performance, University of Iowa Press.
- ³⁹ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.xiv
- ⁴⁰ Maguire, Nancy Klein. 1989. 'The Theatrical Mask/Masque of Politics: The Case of Charles I'. Journal of British Studies 28 (January) pp. 1-22.2
- ⁴¹ Ober, Josiah. 1989. Mass and Elite in Democratic Athens: Rhetoric, Ideology, and the Power of the People. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press.190-1.
- ⁴² Homan, Sidney. 1989. The Audience as Actor and Character: The Modern Theater of Beckett, Brecht, Genet, Ionesco, Pinter, Stoppard and Williams. Lewisburg; London and Toronto: Bucknell University Press; Associated University Presses, Holman, W.A. 1928. The Australian Constitution, Its Interpretation and Amendment. Sydney.149

Table 13/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator –1990-1994

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Portrayals of Revolution (1990)	N. Parker History	Revolutions involve strategies of integration and active participation. Revolutionary ‘dramas’ construct citizenship as a role. Citizens, as spectators of the drama could “perform” their role as members of the new public’. ¹ They were like audiences which were given a ‘role’ to play in the play	Political history	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Retrospectivity Causality Strategies of direction	Externalised : historian/ theorist Doing (+/-)
SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS IN THEORY – THE REFLEXIVE THEORIST
Behind the Myth: Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Revolution (1990)	Andrew Gowers and Tony Walker Political theory	Historians and analysts use metaphors to structure their accounts, which can mislead. The theatre metaphor is an organizing principle for the book, which has a prologue (‘All the world’s a stage’) and an epilogue (‘The grand illusionist’) as well as many comparisons of Arafat with Houdini and ‘conjurers’. A reviewer felt that this strategy risked creating another myth about Arafat rather than illuminating existing ones. ²	Political history	A constructed art	Subjectification Strategies of performance	Externalised : biographers Internal: readers who may be misled Doing/ Showing (-)
‘Impression Management: A literature review and two-component model’ (1990)	M.R. Leary and R.M. Kowalski Sociology	Impression Management/Dramaturgy : drawing on Goffman, IM is ‘the process by which individuals attempt to control the impressions others form of them’ as if they were actors. ³	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) A relationship between actors and spectators	Strategies of performance	Externalised : analyst Showing (+/-)
Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook (1990)	Dennis Brissett and Charles Edgley Social Psychology	Dramaturgy . We are both actors and spectators of ourselves and each other which influences the way we interact. A collection of material relating to the use of the dramaturgical perspective, organized according to ‘five substantive issues’ in social psychology: social relationships as drama, the emergence of the self as drama (‘The Dramaturgical Self’), motivation, organizations as drama, and politics as drama. The ‘dramaturgical perspective’ is defined as ‘to propound ... a few dramaturgical definitions’, a definition they agree is tautological, but which is aimed at avoiding the considerable contestation over the term	The human condition	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Causality	Externalised : analyst Internal: we are all spectators for each other Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		(basically by rendering it meaningless). They believe that ‘the dramaturgical insight emerges most forcefully in the face-to-face encounters between human beings’ and that therefore its ‘continuing salience’ resides in its ability to describe human interaction. The dramaturgical perspective thus sees human life as interactive, social, relational and ‘fully situational’. Selves and societies are created ‘in the doings’ of human beings. Dramaturgy is defined as ‘the study of how human beings accomplish meaning in their lives’, ⁴ a way of ‘connecting action to its sense’. ⁵
Private Theatricals: The Lives of the Victorians (1990)	Nina Auerbach History	Theatricality: Appearances can be deceptive, which can lead to a concern for integrity. The Victorians ‘had nothing left to believe in but their lives’, but ‘lives could be dangerously like masks’. This accounts for the way ‘reverend Victorians shunned theatricality’. It was ‘the ultimate, deceitful mobility’ connoting ‘not only lies but a fluidity of character that decomposes the uniform integrity of the self’. ⁶	Social life	A constructed art	Objectification allowing retrospectivity The possibility of deception. Strategies of performance Causality	Externalised : historian Internal: others Internalised: the self-conscious individual Doing (-)
“All the world’s a stage ...”; Art and pageantry in the Renaissance and Baroque (1990)	Barbara Wisch & Susan Scott Munshower (eds) History	(In retrospect) political life can be seen using spectacle and strategies of performance. A series of essays on the use of triumphalism and the colossal in political and social life in Europe during the C16th. ⁷	Political history	A constructed art	Objectification: Retrospectivity Strategies of performance and presentation Causality	Externalised : historians Showing (+/-)
‘Virtual Reality for Collective Cognitive Processing’ (1990)	Derrick de Kerckhove Cognitive Processing	Humans in the western world place themselves outside the world as a way of seeing their world, leading to a sense of exclusion: ‘[I]n the theatre, we look into a comprehensive world from which we are personally excluded. We are outside looking in (which, by the way, is the standard response of the Western man to reality’. ⁸	Psychological life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification, Distance Alienation	Externalised : a culturally specific technique for learning which has a

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
						cost Watching (-)
The Logic of Practice (1990)	Pierre Bourdieu Sociology	Theories of social life arise and are practiced in particular contexts which make them seem natural; they can only be understood as theories outside those contexts. Practices evoke a 'special kind of theorizing' which utilizes 'economical' models which hide 'the impossibility of mastering the logic of practice'. ⁹ For Bourdieu 'theory ... is a spectacle, which can only be understood from a viewpoint away from the stage on which the action is played out'. ¹⁰ Practices are 'pre-logical' and should be understood 'not to be the implementation of plans' but occur within a 'habitus' or 'system of dispositions' which are historically and socially situated. According to Bourdieu, 'much human practice is automatic and impersonal', ¹¹ for 'the habitus makes questions of intentionality superfluous'. ¹²	Intellectual life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Structured	Externalised : theorist Watching (+/-)
Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception (1990, 1997)	Susan Bennett English Studies	Role Theory Audiences and productions interact within a particular historical, social and political context. Audiences have a role to play. They arrive at the theatre 'well-disposed' to accept this role, which is carried out within two frames, an outer frame which 'contains all those cultural elements which create an inform the theatrical event' and an inner frame which 'contains the dramatic production ion a particular playing space ... It is the interactive relations between audience and stage, spectator and spectator which constitute production and reception, and which cause the inner and outer frames to converge for the creation of a particular experience'. ¹³ The audience, as 'productive and emancipated' spectators, also 'occupies centre-stage' throughout her book. ¹⁴ Bennett's implicit use of the theatre metaphor not only affects her ability to come to grips with her topic, it affects her ability to discern differences between phenomena. For example, she describes Dayan and Katz's description of viewers	Cultural life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance Inter-subjectivity Spectatorship as participatory and therefore active	Externalised : academic Internal: audiences Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		of a televised Royal Wedding as a typically ‘accurate, if skeletal, model of the immediate reception process for a certain type of theatre’, ¹⁵ but Dayan and Katz were neither describing a ‘certain type of theatre’, or the reception process for theatre. They were describing a televised spectacle. ¹⁶ Bennett is so deeply embedded in her frame, she begins to see theatre everywhere.
1991: War against Iraq
Modernity and Ambivalence (1991) The Individualized Society (2001)	Zygmunt Bauman Sociology	Modern social life is organized by experts, which reduces people to consumers focused on quantity as a measure of their lives. To draw attention to what is lost in the dependence on expertise - a resurfacing of the ancient use of the spectator as somehow safely external to the scene, and able to warn of impending danger – most explicitly stated by Lucretius c95BCE and tracked by Blumenberg through history. Drawing on Marx, and in reference to his exposition of the self-perpetuating role of the expert in modern life, Bauman sees the rise of the ‘shopping mall’ as a form of expertise (in social control) in which ‘Enlightenment drama’ has been restaged as grotesque farce: ‘Wonders of harmony and perfection are now offered as entertainment – for family Sunday outings and enjoyment. No one thinks they are real. Most agree, though, that they are better than real. And everybody knows that reality will never be like they are’. ¹⁷ Actors who enter this theatre do so as a variety of spectators: 1. happy technophiles 2. anxious technophiles 3. hopeful technophobes 4. desperate technophobes. Bauman’s central concern seems to be the amount of social control expertise can exercise on the unwary ‘actor’. For example, the game of Trivial Pursuit is ‘a vivid, emotionally reassuring rehearsal of the irrelevance of the semantic aspect of information [since we have experts to attend to that] and an entertaining method of self-training in the use of quantity as the sole measure of quality of both knowledge and its owners’. ¹⁸	Social life under conditions of uncertainty	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Distance Strategies of direction and presentation Causality	Externalised : theorists; critics ‘Depending on their own degree of optimism, anxiety or despair, observers ... focus their descriptions and diagnoses on [different aspects] of the expertly designed future’. ²⁰ Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Individualism comes at a price: ‘rational’ lives are now mediated through others, who promise to reduce its complexities and ambivalences. Bauman suggests that politicians promote concerns about public safety as a distraction from other collective problems such as unemployment and the environment, but none of the responses we make to our existential insecurity and temporality is predetermined: ‘they are merely plausible scenarios, and ... the choice between them and the way they are staged depends each time not only on the actors who play the leading characters but also on the crowds of anonymous extras and stagehands. As to these extras and stagehands, neither ... can be relied upon for the unambiguous selection of lines’.¹⁹ We are on our own.
‘The Dramatic Basis of Role Theory’ (1991)	Robert J. Landy Drama therapist	Role Theory. The ‘principle of impersonation’ lies at the bottom of the use of role as a model in drama therapy because the unconscious mind operates theatrically, and is aimed at the assertion of power over the self (our own or others’). ‘Theatre is a significant ... model that informs role theory as applied to dramatic forms of healing’. The unconscious is ‘an introjected dramatis personae ... a home for personal, social and archetypal roles’. In theatre, the ‘role is an anchor’ for the actor, as well as ‘a rocket, propelled into the heavens’; similarly, as a model in drama therapy, clients are both anchored in the everyday as well as able to conceive of their roles in life in new ways. Drama therapists also take on roles: ‘dispatcher, helper, donor, and trickster’. Drama therapists work ‘not only through role, but also in role’. All role-taking, both in and out of theatre, is about the assertion of power. In drama therapy it is about the assertion of power over one’s self. The aim of the drama therapist should be ‘to become the consummate repertory player, a juggler of roles, a one-person masquerade’. As distanced observer, the therapist functions as critic or ‘impartial judge’. The client, on the other	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Strategies of direction Judgment Causality Subjectification	Externalised : therapist as ‘distanced observer’ or ‘audience’; theorist; ‘client’ and therapist Internalised: the self-conscious individual Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		hand, may enter drama therapy ‘as a novice actor, a burned-out performer, hopelessly type-cast, or a bit player in search ... of a leading role’ or even as ‘simply an empty shell’ needing to learn ‘the basic skills of impersonation and play’. Role ‘as type’ allows the personal and particular to be linked with the ‘universal and global’ and vice versa. ‘In either case the goal is to find one form in the other.’ ²¹
‘Role as Resource in the Hollywood Film Industry’ (1991)	Wayne E. Baker and Robert R. Faulkner Sociology	Role Theory. Norms of behaviour are resources which enable the individual to access rewards. A role is a resource, ‘a means to claim, bargain for, and gain membership and acceptance in the social community’ and a means of ‘access to social, cultural, and material capital’. ²²	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Strategies of performance Convention Causality	Externalised : analysts Doing (+)
All That Hollywood Allows: Re-Reading Gender in 1950s Melodrama (1991)	Jackie Byers Film analysis	We construct our moral identities from everyday cultural resources. Melodrama is ‘the modern mode for constructing moral identity ... drawing its material from the everyday’. ²³	Modern life	A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of presentation Subjectification Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: the individual seeking to construct their identity Showing (+/-)
Computers as Theatre (1991)	Brenda Laurel Computer Technology/ Artificial Intelligence	Computer technology generates virtual spaces in which strategies of integration can be used to generate a composite image. Laurel proposed that the Aristotelian unities provided ‘a model for word-processing and virtual reality’. ²⁴ Theatre resolved the problems of mental interfacing, including the possibilities of autonomous communication because theatre also operated with fuzzy logic , creating a ‘virtual arena’ in which the treatment of data can become a ‘theater of data’. Dramatic interface design reinvents the sacred space of Greek drama. ²⁵	Technology	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of direction Causality Purposefulness Mimesis	Externalised : computer systems analysis Doing (+)
Political Speak: the Bemused	Paul Lyncham	Politics involves cynical organized strategies of impression management under conditions of more or less intense and	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification, Distance	Externalised : cynic -

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Voter's Guide to insults, promises, leadership coups, media grabs, port-barrelling and old-fashioned double speak (1991)	Political correspondent journalist	partisan scrutiny. Politics is a theatre which has several 'sideshows'. Voters are 'bemused', 'apathetic and cynical ... and increasingly hysterical' as well as '[Lyneham doesn't explain how voters can be all these rather contradictory things at once]. The media watches for opportunities to burst the bubbles floated by politicians, especially enactments of 'spontaneity'. Politics is full of stagecraft such as the 'impromptu' shopping centre 'walkie' with bodyguards, minders, journos and six camera crews' which leaves 'startled shoppers, like rabbits in a spotlight ... paralysed with terror'. Politicians, outside election campaigns, engage in 'dramatic conflict' which makes them feel busy and allows them to ignore real issues. Politics requires the same willing suspension of disbelief as theatre, especially when politicians who see themselves as 'Chosen Ones' (potential leaders) enact modesty. And politics, like theatre' abides by the principle that 'the show must go on' – even after factional infighting has left 'blood on the floor'. ²⁶ [The book is an exercise in smart-alecky cynicism which can only contribute to voter cynicism and risks cutting off its nose to spite its face]. Lyneham makes his living as an observer of politics; his observations are tinged with insider knowledge despite his positioning of himself as external to what he is seeing and spokesman for the 'bemused voter'.		A relationship between actor and spectator	which allows Judgment Critique Cynicism Bemusement Strategies of performance	Internal: bemused or deluded voter Doing/ Showing/ Watching (-)
'Leaders, managers, entrepreneurs on and off the organization' (1991); ²⁷ Narrating the organization: Dramas of	B. Czarniawska-Joerges Organization studies	Dramatism: Organizational life involves motivated action. Uses Kenneth Burke's dramatism to analysis organizational life. Organizations are 'theatres of action'. ²⁸	Organization	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of presentation, direction, performance Purposefulness	Externalised : analyst Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Institutional Identity (1997)
Staging the Gaze (1991)	Barbara Freedman Psycho-analytic studies of theatre	The Gaze: Theory: uses the theatre metaphor because of theatre's acknowledged relationship with spectators, but this is to set up particular spectator positions. Observation is always perspectival. Freedman, who also uses the metaphor in her title, argues that postmodernism 'utilizes the metaphor of theatre for the same reason that modern psychoanalysis has used it ... because it denies "the possibility of an objective observer, a static object, or a stable process of viewing." Both postmodernism and psychoanalysis "employ theatrical devices to subvert the observer's stable position, and so result in a continuous play of partial viewpoints – none of them stable, secure, or complete". ²⁹ What does this mean? Theatre does have observers who could be taken to be objective in that they are separated from the performance, the entirety of a performance may well be a static object although there is movement within it, and the process of viewing is stable in that it is confined to a particular space and is directed by both convention and performance. Does Freedman want the possibility of an objective observer etc? And whose gaze is she talking about?	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Perspective Strategies of presentation Visibility	Externalised : analyst Watching (+/-)
'Dramaturgy and Social Movements – the Social Construction and Communication of Power' (1992)	R.D. Benford and S.A. Hunt Sociology	Dramaturgy. Social movements used techniques of communication to challenge or sustain power relations. Uses dramaturgy to demonstrate 'how social movements are dramas routinely concerned with challenging or sustaining interpretations of power relations'. Techniques of communication used by social movements are analysed as 'scripting, staging, performing and interpreting'. How well these strategies are used affects outcomes. Dramaturgy 'illuminate[s] how social movements collectively construct and communicate power'. ³⁰	Social and political life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance and direction	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
'Acting out democracy:	Joseph W. Esherick and	Dramaturgy: political protest involves strategic action. A study of the 1989 Beijing student movement. ³²	Political life	An acting space	Objectification Strategies of	Externalised : analyst

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
political theatre in modern China' (1992) ³¹	Jeffrey Wasserstrom Political science				performance and direction Purposefulness Causality	Doing (+/-)
'The Drama of Nursing' (1992)	C.A. Holmes Nursing	Dramaturgy. The activity of nursing can be realised aesthetically as a form of self-expression, reconceptualising nursing as a liberating and 'powerful form of self-expression'. ³³ To articulate nursing as a form of aesthetic praxis: nursing is 'a form of dramatic performance'. However, unlike in Goffman's dramaturgy, 'which stresses the artifice of social relations and suggests a cynical view of human interactions', performance may be seen as 'self-realising and emancipatory' as a form of 'aesthetic praxis' aimed at self-expression.	Social interaction	An acting space	Objectification Revealing strategies of performance Purposefulness Artifice	Externalised : theorist Doing (+)
'Drugs and Deception – Undercover Infiltration and Dramaturgical Theory' (1992)	B.A. Jacobs Social Science	Dramaturgy. A 'new reading' of dramaturgical theory called 'interaction as infiltration' which attempts to describe the relationship between structural and qualitative aspects of 'role performances' by undercover agents who are required to deceive. Social life may require deception in order to achieve worthwhile aims. Norms of behaviour help agents to do this. ³⁴	Social interaction	A constructed art	Deception	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
'Self-Presentation Through Appearance – A Manipulative VS a Dramaturgical Approach' (1992)	E. Tseelon Sociology	We live under the gaze of others which requires strategies of self-presentation. ' Impression management ' approaches to self-presentation through appearance consider self-presentation to be a form of insincerity, whereas ' a dramaturgical interactionist ' approach 'regards dramatization as the control of the style of performance, and as irrelevant to issues of sincerity' (Tseelon 1992: 501). ³⁵	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Lessons in Organizational Dramaturgy:	William L. Gardner Management	Dramaturgy; Impression Management: Organizational life occurs under the gaze of others and requires attention to appearances. '[P]eople are frequently judged by their "covers"'	Organization	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Art of Impression Management' (1992)	and Organization Behaviour	and 'skillful players in today's organizational dramas take great care in defining and playing their roles, because they realize the importance of their performance. Key performance elements (actor, audience, stage, script, performance, reviews) can be used both to analyse organizational behaviour and to train and motivate organizational workers. ³⁶		A relationship between actor and spectator	Purposefulness Causality	Showing (+/-)
'Augustine and the Sources of the Divided Self' (1992)	E.J. Hundert Political theory	Theatricality: Self-reflection requires distance which is enabled by dividing the self into actor and spectator. Hundert draws on the metaphor to describe Augustine's self-reflection – one of the first accounts of self-reflection in the Western tradition of political theory. ³⁷ Theatricality thus is invoked both by Augustine and by Hundert in discussing Augustine.	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied)	Distance which allows self-awareness	Externalised : theorist/ historian Internalised: the self-reflective individual Watching (+/-)
Mr Bligh's Bad Language: Passion, Power and Theatre on the Bounty (1992); 'The Theatricality of History Making and the Paradoxes of Acting' (1993); ³⁸ Performances (1996)	Greg Denning Historian/ Anthropology	The writing of history requires spatial and temporal ordering as well as strategies of presentation to bring it alive to readers. One acts one's life under the gaze of both oneself and others, including God. There are spectators for everything one does, including the writing of history in which the historian is also a spectator of other lives. Theatre is both a place (space) and an organizing principle for Denning. Writing is a performance. History writing is the creation of a performative narrative: 'We need to perform our texts. We need to perform in our texts'. ³⁹ Theatre is a space in which events occur, or books are read, or things are observed. Denning's use of the metaphor is pervasive and applied unsystematically. There are theatres of power, theatres of living, ⁴⁰ 'history's theatre'. ⁴¹ 'Everyday life' is theatre; ⁴² one's soul is a theatre. ⁴³ In essence he is pointing to the observed nature of life, including the life of writing history. All performances are duties completed before an audience. His use of the word performance suggests that he sees the term as a	History	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Self-awareness Strategies of presentation, performance and direction Risky	Externalised : God, readers, natives, other nations (Imperialism is as much about performing for the eyes of other nations as it is about performing for the colonised). Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		theatrical term. His book is also organized as a performance script: prologue, soliloquy, prelude, postlude. 'Theatricality is deep in every cultural action'. ⁴⁴ Any performance 'produces performance consciousness' in which 'every action is subject to some reflection'. ⁴⁵ Nations perform for others, just as individual humans do. However, 'one can never be sure of producing the effects one wants'. ⁴⁶ Audiences are 'roguish' in their interpretations. An extended argument for the writing of history in a way which avoids conventions and restrictive formalities which, at heart is a description of extreme and critical self-consciousness: life under the gaze of both oneself and others, including God. Denning's use of the metaphor is almost glib.				everyone around Internalised: the self-conscious individual Doing/ Showing (+)
Comment (1992)	Hans Sahl	Translating plays requires one to visualise words and gestures: 'Translating is staging a play in another language'. ⁴⁷ One must visually create the gestures which are likely to accompany words in order to provide an accurate translation.	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of performance	Externalised : translator Doing/ Showing (+)
'Audiences for Filef Theatre Group's L'Albero della rose/The Tree of Roses and Storie in cantiere/Stories in Construction (1992)	Maria Shevstova Sociology	People have the capacity to act as well as watch on their own behalf. Shevstova argues that participatory or community theatre can allow audiences to demonstrate that 'they are not mere spectators either of their own lives or of stage performances. They assert their will to act upon their collective existence and, in doing so, show they are protagonists of their society'. ⁴⁸ – it seems a very long-winded way of saying that people have the capacity to act as well as watch on their own behalf, although how exactly one can be a 'mere spectator' of one's own life is not clear!	Cultural life	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Subjectification Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Watching (+)
Fictions of Collective Life (1993)	David Chaney Sociology Cultural and communicati	Public life involves strategies of appearance and display which can be analysed using key terms from theatre. Chaney uses a form of dramatism in which the key terms of analysis are 'stage, perspective, audience, address and frame'. The relations between these terms are used 'to describe or characterise interactional	Public life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Subjectification	Externalised : analyst Internalised: the self-aware

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	on studies	forms' such as spectacles, ceremonies, rituals, play and those used by individuals in the personal interactions. Theatre is 'a changing type of place or social space' which makes it ideal as a template 'for the social language of urban-industrial society'. In particular, modern life is 'pictorial'. 'We can use the relations of dramatic performance to talk about ourselves'. ⁴⁹				individual or society Showing (+/-)
The Drama of Leadership (1993)	Robert J. Starratt Leadership Studies	Dramaturgy. Social life is drama because it is interactive, because we create it and we can conform or recreate and because it is 'dramatic' i.e. 'it contains the drama of establishing, shaping, defending and altering our very identities'. Humans also 'embody their words and gestures' with theatricality. Starratt calls the dramaturgical perspective a 'breakthrough in the literature' on leadership. Leaders are 'active players in a drama of human survival and fulfilment in a world threatened by irrationality and uncertainty'. ⁵⁰ 'The leader ... [plays] the part of director, coach, script writer, player and critic in the developmental dynamic of institutional life' (back cover). Starratt proposes to use the dramaturgical approach for teaching new leaders. He sees himself as 'a kind of 'dramatist of change' [as he] seeks to understand the global transformations without being mesmerized by them'. ⁵¹	Social life	A constructed art	Strategies of direction and performance Causality Purposefulness	Externalised : analyst/ educator Doing (+)
'OR enactment: the theatrical metaphor as an analytical framework' (1993)	Jim Bryant Organization Studies	Organizational life requires strategies by which motivated action can be interpreted. Theatre as a metaphor 'for representing what goes on in organizational life' is useful in studying interventions because it provides 'a framework for interpreting the actions and utterances' of people assigned roles. However, for the idea to be successful, 'operational researchers need to consider setting, dress, staging and dialogue for the scenes they encounter'. ⁵²	Organization	A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of direction, performance and presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : researcher/ analyst Doing (+/-)
'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View' (1993)	Art Borreca Theatre Studies	Dramaturgy. Politics is dramatic because it is representational particularly now that it is mediatised. An overview or 'stocktake' of political dramaturgy from its 'beginnings' in Burke and Goffman. Borreca provides a history of the use of the approach, showing an increasingly sophisticated understanding of the	Political life	A constructed art	Objectification: Retrospectivity Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : analyst/ theorist Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		paradigm, and an increasing willingness by some theorists to fill it out. Still, he believed it needed 'a theoretical base' (probably symbolic interactionism), an interpretation of modern image culture, an interpretation of drama and theatre and some inquiry into the nature of theatre as an art in itself. ⁵³ It also had to get over the problem of 'getting lost in its categories', a problem which beset most analysts using the approach (including Combs, Mansfield and Nimmo). Borreca believed that 'drama was latent in politics' because of representation. Media made this more apparent. He did not hesitate to use the metaphor himself: 'the Gulf War was plotted and performed with an awareness of the media stage. It was perhaps history's most fully staged Theatre of War'. ⁵⁴			The possibility of delusion
'The box of digital images: the world as computer theater' (1993)	Klaus Bartels Artificial Intelligence research	Strategies of perception enable perceivers to situate themselves outside reality (even virtual reality). Bartels' article considers the proposition by Laurels (1991) that computers can be considered as theatres. He provides an historical overview of perception and its relationship to memory and the possibility of virtual reality, suggesting that this idea is a reinvention of the old 'camera obscura' way of viewing the world, with the observer external to reality (virtual or otherwise). ⁵⁵	Perception	A seeing-place	Distance, which enables observation	Externalised : theorist Showing (+/-)
Theatre and Everyday Life: An Ethics of Performance (1993)	Alan Read English theorist of the ethics of performance	Social constructionism: social construction through performance: an application of the insights of de Certeau and social constructionism. Theatre 'is worthwhile because it is antagonistic to official views of reality'. ⁵⁶ It is through performance that we can challenge 'social and cultural "givens"'. ⁵⁷ Individuals construct themselves as they act in the world, which means they can challenge existing norms	Social life	An acting space	Strategies of performance Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Internal: deluded masses Doing (+/-)
The Optical Unconscious (1993)	Rosaline Krauss Art theory	Art can provide insight into the workings of the unconscious. Works of art 'are conceived as symptoms of a play that is ... performed in the unconscious mind'. ⁵⁸	Psychological life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : analyst Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1994-6: First Chechen War
‘From role-playing to role-using: understanding role as resource’ (1994)	Peter Callero Social Psychology	Role Theory. Norms of behaviour in social life mediate between structure and agency. Implicit use of the metaphor through the use of ‘role’, defined as a ‘cultural object’, in order to conceptualize the relationship between structure and agency. ⁵⁹	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of direction, presentation and performance Convention Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : researcher Doing (+/-)
‘The Dramaturgy of the Tabloid: Climax and Novelty in a Theory of Condensed Forms’ (1994)	John Osburn Theatre Studies	Dramaturgy. Condensed forms of information and communication require strategies of structuring for effect. Uses dramaturgy in a theatrical sense rather than in the sense used by Goffman and Burke. Dramaturgy relates to the putting on of a play and everything that goes with it. Nevertheless, Osburn argues that ‘dramatic structure’, defined as ‘the resolution of an action through the mechanism of the climax’ can be and is being applied to any number of areas outside the theatre e.g. computer coding, instrumental music composition, the production of news, especially in tabloid form. He analyses the tabloid (condensed) form and finds that it works by creating and resolving dramatic structure ‘in a single instant’ so that a headline can be ‘experienced as a moment of drama’. ⁶⁰ However, this ‘truncated’ experience has had the paradoxical effect of reducing the dramatic structure and effect of actual events.	Cultural life	A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
Edmund Burke: Modernity, Politics, and Aesthetics (1994)	Stephen K. White Political Science	Historical figures can be understood through the metaphors they employ. In outlining aspects of Burke’s arguments, White declares ‘One might phrase these points in the metaphor of theater’. White’s justification for viewing Burke’s work through this metaphor was that Burke himself was a theatre critic who ‘had shown himself to be very concerned with the influence of theater on public sentiment and morals’, and had apparently considered the activity of governing as ‘an ongoing	Political history	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification: Retrospectivity Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : theorist Showing (+/-) performance'. Based on this, White goes on to describe Burke's thinking about the relationship between Britain and America in theatrical terms: 'When he assaults the actions of the government towards America in this period, he is in effect once again a theater critic, ... berating the star actor for misconstruing its role'. ⁶¹ White also believed that Burke's implacable opposition to the French Revolution could be dated from the receipt of a letter from a family friend, Madame Parisot, detailing the 'Great Fear' being experienced early in 1789, an experience later to be seen in the treatment of Marie Antoinette, a situation he describes as striking Burke in theatrical terms: 'the provincial theater's performance was the original; the Parisian one merely a repeat, however more lavish the production'. ⁶² [White's framing of Burke's thought in this way is somewhat problematic, for although Burke did use theatre metaphors, and may well have understood the world itself as a theatre, his actual use of the terminology is not extensive. Perhaps a more important metaphor for Burke was that of the besieged constitution as aged parent, since it directly referred to his belief that the sublime in politics was produced by a combination of awe and affection].

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus

¹ Parker, N. 1990. Portrayals of Revolution: Harvester. 50

² Lalor, Paul. 1991. 'Book Review: Behind the Myth: Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Revolution'. International Affairs (Royal Institute of International Affairs 1944-) 67 (4) pp. 827-828. 827

³ Leary, M.R., and R.M. Kowalski. 1990. 'Impression Management: A literature review and two-component model'. Psychological Bulletin 107 (1) pp. 34-47. 34)

⁴ Brissett, Dennis, and Charles Edgley, eds. 1990. Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook. 2nd ed. New York: Aldine de Gruyter. 1-18.

⁵ Geertz, Clifford. 1980a. Negara : the theatre state in nineteenth-century Bali. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, Geertz, Clifford. 1980b. 'Blurred Genres: The Refiguration of Social Thought'. The American Scholar 49 165-179. 34. (Although Brissett and Edgley draw on Geertz to define dramaturgy, it is not at all clear that they mean the same thing. Brissett and Edgley generally draw on the work of Goffman for their perspective, whilst Geertz draws on Kenneth Burke (i.e. dramatism not dramaturgy).

⁶ Auerbach, Nina. 1990. Private Theatricals: The Lives of the Victorians. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 3-4

-
- ⁷ Wisch, Barbara and Scott Munshower, Susan (eds) 1990, “All the world’s a stage ...”; Art and pageantry in the Renaissance and Baroque, Papers in Art History, Pennsylvania, The Pennsylvania State University.
- ⁸ Kerckhove, Derrick de 1990, ‘Virtual Reality for Collective Cognitive Processing’, Hattinger et al, (eds) 1990, Ars Electronica 1990: Band II: Virtuelle Welten, Linz, pp. 171-185, 172; quoted in Bartels 1993: 48-9.
- ⁹ Freedden, Michael. 2000. 'Practising Ideology and Ideological Practices'. Political Studies 48 pp. 302-322.309
- ¹⁰ Bourdieu, Pierre. 1990. 'Structures, Habitus, Practices'. In The Logic of Practice. Cambridge: Polity Press, pp. 52-65. Bourdieu, Pierre. 1990. The Logic of Practice. Cambridge: Polity Press, 11-2, 14; cited in Freedden 2000
- ¹¹ Freedden 2000: 309-311
- ¹² Bourdieu 1990: 58, 62; cited in Freedden 2000.
- ¹³ Bennett, Susan. 1990. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 1st ed. London and New York: Routledge.149.
- ¹⁴ Bennett 1990: 2
- ¹⁵ Bennett 1997: 87
- ¹⁶ Dayan, Daniel, and Elihu Katz. 1985. 'Electronic Ceremonies: Television Performs a Royal Wedding'. In In Signs, edited by M. Blonsky. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, pp. 16-32.
- ¹⁷ Bauman, Zygmunt. 1991. Modernity and Ambivalence. Cambridge: Polity.227
- ¹⁸ Bauman 1991: 228
- ¹⁹ Bauman, Zygmunt. 2001 The Individualized Society. Cambridge: Polity Press, Bauman, Zygmunt. 2001. 'Critique – privatized and disarmed '. In The Individualized Society. Cambridge: Polity Press, pp. 99-109.54
- ²⁰ Bauman 1991: 227-8
- ²¹ Landy, Robert J. 1991. 'The Dramatic Basis of Role Theory'. The Arts in Psychotherapy 18 pp. 29-41.
- ²² Baker, Wayne and Faulkner, Robert 1991, 'Roles as Resource in the Hollywood Film Industry', The American Journal of Sociology, Vol 97(2), pp. 279-309. 279
- ²³ Byers 1991: 11 in Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.33.
- ²⁴ Osburn, John. 1994. 'The Dramaturgy of the Tabloid: Climax and Novelty in a Theory of Condensed Forms'. Theatre Journal 46 pp. 507-522. 507
- ²⁵ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70. 46-7
- ²⁶ Lyneham, Paul 1991, Political Speak: the Bemused Voter’s Guide to insults, promises, leadership coups, media grabs, pork-barrelling and old-fashioned double speak, Crows Nest, ABC Books
- ²⁷ Written with R. Wolff and In Organization Studies Vol 12, pp. 529-547.
- ²⁸ Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).
- ²⁹ Freedman, Barbara. 1991. Staging the Gaze: Postmodernism, Psychoanalysis and Shakespearean Comedy. Ithaca NY. 74, cited in Carlson, Marvin. 2004. Performance: A critical introduction. 2nd ed. New York and London: Routledge.153
- ³⁰ Benford, R.D. and Hunt, S.A. 1992, ‘Dramaturgy and Social Movements – the Social Construction and Communication of Power’, Sociological Inquiry, Vol 62(1), pp. 36-55.36
- ³¹ In Jeffrey N. Wasserstrom and Elizabeth Perry (eds) 1992, Popular Protest and Political Culture in Modern China, Boulder, Westview Press; cited in Ku 2004: 648.

-
- ³² Ku, Agnes S. 2004. 'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power, Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations'. The China Quarterly pp. 647-664.648
- ³³ Holmes, C.A. 1992, 'The Drama of Nursing', Journal of Advanced Nursing, Vol 17(8), pp. 941-950:941
- ³⁴ Jacobs, B.A. 1992, 'Drugs and Deception – Undercover Infiltration and Dramaturgical Theory', Human Relations, Vol 45(12), 1992, pp. 1293-1310.
- ³⁵ Tseelon, E. 1992, 'Self-Presentation Through Appearance – A Manipulative VS a Dramaturgical Approach', Symbolic Interaction, Vol 15(4), 1992, pp. 501-513. 501
- ³⁶ Gardner, William L. III. 1992. 'Lessons in Organizational Dramaturgy: The Art of Impression Management'. Organizational Dynamics (Summer 1992) pp. 33-46.33-4.
- ³⁷ Hundert, E.J. 1992. 'Augustine and the Sources of the Divided Self'. Political Theory 20 (1) pp. 86-104.87.
- ³⁸ Denning, G. 1993, 'The Theatricality of History Making and the Paradoxes of Acting', Cultural Anthropology, Vol 8(1), pp. 73-95.
- ³⁹ Denning, Greg. 1996. Performances. Carlton South, Victoria: Melbourne University Press.116. Denning finds the reason for this conception of writing in his Jesuit education, which required students to engage in debate with and over texts, so that thinking itself became performative.
- ⁴⁰ Denning 1996: 118
- ⁴¹ Denning 1996: vii
- ⁴² Denning 1996: xv
- ⁴³ Denning 1996: 12
- ⁴⁴ Denning 1996: 109
- ⁴⁵ Denning 1996: xvi, 27
- ⁴⁶ Denning 1996: 102
- ⁴⁷ Godard, Barbara. 2000. 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context'. Modern Drama 43 (Fall) pp. 327-358. 327
- ⁴⁸ Shevstova, Maria. 1992. 'Audiences for Filef Theatre Group's L'Albero delle rose/The Tree of Roses and Storie in cantiere/Stories in Construction'. Australian Drama Studies 20 pp. 93-118. 117.
- ⁴⁹ Chaney, David. 1993. Fictions of Collective Life: Public drama in late modern culture. London and New York: Routledge.2-7.
- ⁵⁰ Starratt, Robert J. 1993. The Drama of Leadership. London and Washington DC: The Falmer Press.125-130.
- ⁵¹ Starratt 1993: viii
- ⁵² Bryant, Jim. 1993. 'OR enactment: the theatrical metaphor as an analytic framework'. Journal of the Operational Research Society 44 (6) pp. 551-562.551.
- ⁵³ Borreca, Art. 1993. 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View'. The Drama Review 37 (2) pp. 56-79. 64.
- ⁵⁴ Borreca 1993: 68
- ⁵⁵ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70.
- ⁵⁶ Read, A. 1993. The Theatre and Everyday Life. London: Routledge.1
- ⁵⁷ Carlson 2004: 45
- ⁵⁸ Quinn, Michael. 1995. 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 106-114.
- ⁵⁹ Callero, P. 1994, 'From role-playing to role-using: understanding role as resource', In Social Psychology Quarterly, Vol 57(3), pp. 228-244.
- ⁶⁰ Osburn, John. 1994. 'The Dramaturgy of the Tabloid: Climax and Novelty in a Theory of Condensed Forms'. Theatre Journal 46 pp. 507-522. In Theatre Journal Vol 46, 1994, pp. 507-522.507

⁶¹ White, Stephen. 1994. Edmund Burke: Modernity, Politics, and Aesthetics. Edited by M. Schoolman. Vol. 5, Modernity and Political Thought. Thousand Oaks, London, New Delhi: Sage Publications. 47-8

⁶² White 1994: 66

Table 14/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator –1995-1999

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
RISE OF PERFORMANCE AS A THEATRE METAPHOR
‘The Theatrics and Mechanics of Action: the Theater and the Machine as Political Metaphors’ (1995)	Yaron Ezrahi Social Sciences	Behaviour can be seen in terms of theatre: as both voluntaristic and determined. Ezrahi uses the metaphor to tease out the connections between the theatre and the machine as political metaphors. He finds that, in combination, as he believes they are in contemporary discourse, they allow the social sciences to argue the paradoxical position that human behaviour is both voluntaristic and determined. They can do this because both allow the amoralization of human behaviour by detaching it from the individual’s private morality. This detachment is an historical process which can be traced through the work of theorists who have invoked either metaphor in order to respond to the concerns and anxieties of their age and, in turn, provoked a response from later theorists. This is how concerns about an individual’s morals gradually became a concern about group behaviour, then a concern about individual behaviour, and now a concern about ‘the boundaries of the real and the fictitious’ in human behaviour, as part of a general post-modern concern about those boundaries. Thus, the theatre metaphor has returned ‘to center stage’ in recent times, inflected with the machine metaphor, to ‘reflect novel notions of the relations between voluntarism and determinism in the understanding of human behavior and social and political realities’. ¹	Political Theory	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Conflict Deterministic Purposeful	Externalised : analyst Watching (+/-)
‘Political theatre and student organizations in the 1989 Chinese movement: a multivariate	Douglas J. Guthrie Political science	Dramaturgy: the strategies of political dissidence can be viewed as staged conflict – a study of the 1989 Beijing student movement. ³	Political Life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification: Retrospectivity Conflict management Strategic action Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
analysis of Tiananmen' (1995) ²					Purposefulness
'Philosophy and Theatre: An Essay on Catharsis and Contemplation' (1995)	Aldo Tassi Philosophy of Theatre	Philosophy allows us to 'see' how things come to be. Philosophy 'is an activity that seeks to transport us to the place where boundaries are established so that we may "see" how things come to be. Like the theatrical stage, the theatre of the mind is a place for seeing, and it is philosophy's task to bring it to light and allow us to see what usually remains obscure or hidden in our perceptual dealings with things. Both philosophy and theatre, then, originally arose as activities to take us beyond the empirical level to involve us in the pursuit of truth as an unconcealment process'. ⁴ [Somehow, then the philosopher is writer, director, stage-manager, actor and spectator!]. [A reconstruction of Plato's theory of spectatorship, which was based on the metaphor of theoria].	Intellectual life	A seeing-place	Objectification: to reveal strategies of performance and presentation	Externalised : philosophical analysis Watching (+)
'The story of rehearsal never ends' (1995)	Joanne Tompkins Political identity	The construction of national identity is a continual process. Tompkins sees the metaphor as useful in regard to the re-negotiation of national identity. Identity, even for nations, can be constructed through 'a continuous rehearsal'. ⁵ Identity construction engages nations as well as individuals and can be seen as a continuous process	Political life:	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Subjectification	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'John Milton's Eikonoklastes : The Drama of Justice' (1995)	Derek Hirst Social history	Literary analysis: the metaphors used by writers indicate how they see historical events. Use of theatre metaphor to argue that Milton saw the death of Charles I as theatre: '[c]ivil war had all but cleared the stage ... the leading character is the king [in the] drama of justice', revealing the dramatic sense which affected the period (1576-1649). ⁶	Intellectual life	An acting space	Objectification: Retrospectivity Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : historian Showing (+/-)
'The Dissemination of the King' (1995)	Marshall Grossman Social history	Uses the theatre metaphor in relation to the execution of Charles I: 'with the act of regicide ... the discourse of republicanism, is thrust decisively onto the stage of London's political theatre'. Kingship is reduced 'by acting it out in the theatre of the real'. ⁷	Social and Political history	An acting space	Objectification Retrospectivity Strategic action Purposefulness	Externalised : historian Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
					Causality
Fin de Siècle Social Theory (1995); The Meanings of Social Life (2003); “Globalization” as Collective Representation: The New Dream of a Cosmopolitan Civil Sphere’ (2005)	Jeffrey Alexander Social theory	Dramaturgy: Theatre provides technical terms which allow scholars to analyse social life to draw out and explain the ideological implications of social theorising; to ‘reveal to men and women the myths that think them so that they can make new myths’ (with the help of prophets and priests). ⁸ Alexander uses ‘dramaturgical terms’, by which he means terms such as genre (‘heroic’, ‘romantic’ etc) to divide and explain the dominant theoretical narratives about modernity which prevailed in America from 1950’s to the present. The postmodern is a ‘comic frame’: ‘the actors – protagonists and antagonists – are on the same moral level, and the audience, rather than being normatively or emotionally involved, can sit back and be amused.’ This position is epitomised by Baudrillard, ‘the master of satire and ridicule’ for whom ‘the entire Western world becomes Disneyland at large’. More, ‘[p]ostmodernism is the play within the play, a historical drama designed to convince its audiences that drama is dead and that history no longer exists’. All that was left was a nostalgia for the past. Now, however, we have the ‘melodrama of social good triumphing’ in the ‘drama of democracy’ and the return of the heroic. The rise of Solidarity and Gorbachev, Mandela and Havel were long running mass ‘public dramas’ which ‘produced cathartic reactions in its audience and sparked a renewed discourse of ‘civil society’. ⁹ Alexander repeats these metaphors in his 2003 book. Here the Holocaust is described as a ‘trauma drama’ that the ‘audience’ returns to time and time again, which gives the event a mythical status. Alexander claims that we recognize the Holocaust as ‘a tragic, devastating event in human history’ largely because it has been ‘dramatized – as a tragedy’. ¹⁰ His efforts to argue for the inclusion of narrative analysis of events (as texts) as part of sociological theory, however, tend to obscure the object of	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Detachment Objectivity Visibility: Retrospectivity Strategies of presentation and direction Causality Judgment	Externalised : social theorist (prophet and priest) Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		analysis: ‘Events are not inherently traumatic. Trauma is a socially mediated attribution ... It is the meanings that provide the sense of shockiness and fear, not the events in themselves’. ¹¹ This application of theatrical genres allows the theorist as spectator to position himself at some distance to human suffering – perhaps with the gods, since Alexander sees intellectuals as ‘prophets and priests’ who ‘divide the world into the sacred and profane and weave stories about the relationship in between’. ¹² He continues to use theatre as a trope, perhaps without thinking, in later work on cosmopolitanism: ‘The dream of cosmopolitan peace has not died. The forceful hope for creating a global civil sphere remains. It is embodied in the collective representation of globalization, which has organizational integuments and political and economic effects. There is a global stage in which local events are evaluated, not only nationally or ethnically, but according to the standards of the civil sphere. Before this stage sits an idealized audience of world citizens. Sometimes the performances projected to this audience are initiated by avowedly global actors. More often, they reflect local scripts national actors, which are projected on the world stage and evaluated according to the principles of cosmopolitan peace and by the discourse and interactions of civil life.’ ¹³
Performativity and Performance (1995)	Andrew Parker & Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick Literary Theorists	Performance/Performativity: Theory can get ‘pushed ... onto center stage’ when particular concepts (such as performativity) become popular. ¹⁴	Intellectual life	An acting space	Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : theorist, reviewer Doing (+/-)
‘Parliament, Democracy and Political Identity in	James Warden Political Science	Political spaces are structured for effect. Politics, ‘mediated by television, becomes an opera without a musical score’ a ‘spectacle and drama played out on the vast and expensive marble, glass and stainless steel set’ of the Australian Parliament	Political life:	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Watching

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Australia' (1995)		House for 'the citizens who come for a look'. ¹⁵				(-)
On the Shores of Politics (1995); Disagreement: politics and philosophy (1999); 'The Emancipated Spectator' (2004); Hatred of Democracy (2006); The Emancipated Spectator (2008); Dissensus: On Politics and Aesthetics (2010)	Jacques Rancière French philosopher	Democratic political life uses strategies to manage equality, which it sees as disruptive. Politics is a matter of 'performing or playing, in the theatrical sense of the word, the gap between a place where the demos exists and a place where it does not ... Politics consists in playing or acting out this relationship, which means first setting it up as theatre, inventing the argument, in the double logical and dramatic sense of the term, connecting the unconnected'. ¹⁶ Politics occurs in the gap which becomes a space of appearance or 'stage' on which the inscriptions of rights or rule are 'put to the test'. ¹⁷ Politics is the process of 'playing' this out. It is always going to be conflictual because it challenges the 'sensible' boundaries of rule and rights. It is not a challenge from the 'other' but a challenge from within the universe which has conferred rights and boundaries but does not recognize them e.g. the exclusion of women from the 'universal franchise'. The sheer fact of the challenge indicates that women do in fact have these rights which they are being denied. Rancière's connection of politics and aesthetics then places aesthetics as the field in which this challenge can be made as well – hence the theatre metaphor. Art because of its nature of challenging, provides a space or field on which the process of politics can be 'played out' by political subjects who are being denied the rights they are taking upon themselves to demonstrate.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of direction and presentation Conflict management Structure	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Politics, media, and modern democracy: introduction' (1996) ¹⁸	P. Mancini and D. Swanson Political communication	Mass media turns politics into show-business. Modernity has created a need for a symbolic form of political communication. This has produced a focus on individual politicians, a trend accentuated by the conventions of the mass media so that '[p]oliticians become stars, politics becomes a series of spectacles and the citizens become spectators' of advertising. ¹⁹	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : theorists; citizens of mediated politics Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'The promise of liberalism and the performance of freedom' (1996)	Vikki Bell Political Sociology	Performance: different theorists produce different conceptions of the same phenomenon; sometimes comparisons using a third concept can bring out the similarities. Uses performance both as a form of action and as a theatrical metaphor (along with 'rehearsing' and 'centre stage') in a discussion of the compatibilities and incompatibilities of Foucault's and Arendt's conceptions of freedom. Bell 'rehearses' arguments, and places ideas 'centre stage'. However, 'the American Declaration of Independence is a performative utterance' because '[t]he new regime's authority arose from the performative "we hold"', ²⁰ Language is performative; action too is performance, but in a theatrical sense, because it is spatial. Some consider this spatiality to be absent from Foucault's conception of freedom, but Bell considers it to be present in the sense of a work of art invokes spatiality through an implied spectator	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Strategies of presentation Retrospectivity Causality	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (1996) 'Political Communication in Media Society: Does Democracy Still Enjoy an Epistemic Dimension? The Impact of Normative	Jurgen Habermas Philosophy; Political Sociology	Habermas uses actor extensively in Between Facts and Norms . For the most part it does not seem to be a metaphor, but then he refers to 'the players in the arena' owing their political influence 'to the approval of those in the gallery', ²¹ suggesting it might be a combined drama/theatre metaphor. In his 2006 article on the relationship between the public sphere and the media and its impact on public opinions he argues that: 'There are two types of actors without whom no political public sphere could be put to work: professionals of the media system – especially journalists ... and politicians ... We can distinguish five more types among the actors who make their appearance on the virtual stage of an established public sphere: (a) lobbyists ... (b) advocates ... (c) experts ... (d) moral entrepreneurs ... (e) intellectuals . These mobilize and pool relevant issues and required information, putting together a plurality of considered public opinions for the wider civil society to consider. Thus public opinions 'are jointly constructed by political elites and diffuse audiences from the	Social and Political life	An acting space A relationship between actors and spectators	Communication Purposefulness Interaction	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Theory on Empirical Research' (2006)		perceived differences between published opinions and the statistical records of polled opinions ... The influence of public opinions [thus] spreads in opposite directions, turning both toward a government busy carefully watching it and backward toward the reflecting audiences from where it first originated'. This gives the public sphere its 'reflexive character' and its active character. ²²
'Lights, Camera, Democracy! On the conventions of a make-believe republic' (1996)	Lewis H. Lapham Journalist	Political life uses both visible and invisible strategies of organisation. The United States has two governments, the permanent 'off-stage' one (a secular oligarchy devoted to overseeing the production of wealth) and a provisional one which 'oversees the production of pageants' and organizes the 'theatrics' of politics. The 'America is a Democracy Festival' at which the president is elected 'is the most solemn of the festivals staged by the provisional government'. 'Stumbling performances' by the actors prompt questions about American competence. These 'voices of mourning' are also part of the ritual. Although these mourning voices come from amongst people who are well served by the permanent government and have no particular interest in which party wins provisional government, they were concerned about the quality of performance of what they saw as 'a morality play'. ²³	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Detachment Retrospectivity Backward causation Strategies of presentation, direction and performance The possibility of deception	Internal: cynical citizen Doing/ Showing (-)
'The theater of emblems: rhetoric and the Jesuit stage' (1996)	Bruna Filippi History	Imagery: can be used to tell a story or impart knowledge. The Jesuits used emblems in public ceremonies during C17th. These 'constituted a form of theatre' because they provided a self-contained visual story. ²⁴	Intellectual life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : historian Internal: generators and users of visual aids Showing (+/-)
'Early regulatory	William Bealing,	Dramaturgy. Organizations utilise dramaturgy to legitimate themselves and their authority. In this case, the SEC developed	Organization	A constructed art	Strategies of direction and	Externalised : analysts

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
actions by the SEC: An institutional theory perspective on the dramaturgy of political exchanges' (1996)	Mark Dirsmith and Timothy Fogarty Organization theory	'a dramaturgy of exchange relations with its external constituents' which incorporated forms of language, 'acquiescence and compromise strategies' and 'a ritualistic pattern of interacting with regulatees', and which formed an essential first step in establishing the organization's legitimacy and authority. ²⁵			presentation Purposefulness	Showing (+/-)
Jamming: The Art and Discipline of Business Creativity (1996)	John Kao Jazz musician and organization theorist	Performance: management involves creativity and performance. 'Management is a performing art ... the best managers have a bit of the ham in them. Or they should, if they want to build creative organizations'. ²⁶ Kao has an 'optimistic' view of organizational performance which could also be considered remote: could be 'hiring and firing thousands and thousands of people' ²⁷ from his 'high-end personal computer' on his kitchen table. ²⁸	Organizations	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of direction, presentation and performance Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: musician Doing (+)
Interview with Diane Vaughan (1996) ²⁹	Larry Wear Solid Rocket Motor Manager, Marshall Space Flight Center, Alabama	Organizational life involves conflict, which outsiders enjoy watching. The Flight Readiness Review procedure for space flights is 'a great drama ... There are people who ... actually come in to watch ... human life is involved ... But also the image of the Center is at stake ... It is a high, important, dramatic situation'. This produces self-consciousness and a pressure to perform or else, which can lead to decisions which have fatal consequences. ³⁰ Presenters must try to persuade within an adversarial context with conflicting aims, before onlookers which produces performance anxiety and leads to acquiescence instead of critique.	Organizations	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space	Visibility Self-awareness Strategies of performance and presentation Subjectification	Externalised : analyst Internal: presenters Internalised: Doing (-)
'Psycho-analysis and the theatrical: analysing performance'	Elizabeth Wright Psycho-analysis	Cultural life can be analysed using the methods of psychoanalysis because the mind and theatre share the characteristic of being 'disreal spaces' ³¹ in which representations can be tried. Psychoanalysis has always 'paid attention to' theatre, especially to the similarities between them. 'Theatricality' is 'the operative	Cultural life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Freedom from consequences Structure	Externalised : psycho-analytically aware analyst

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(1996)		factor both in the consulting room and on the stage'. However, post-Freudian psychoanalysis 'challenges any simple notion of mimesis, whether applied to the conscious or the unconscious'. Instead, 'postmodern performance theatre explores the world as theatrically constructed rather than the theatre as mirror of the world': the world is theatre because it is constructed. Postmodernism has 'betray[ed] the theatrical nature of reality: the subject is theatrical through and through'. Freud saw the mind as a metaphoric theatre, and believed that spectators at actual theatre received catharsis and consolation in the 'surreptitious' observing representations of the aspects of themselves they were required to repress. However, postmodern performance no longer sees theatre as a form of consolation for the spectator. Rather 'the basic structure of postmodern performance' since Brecht and Artaud, involves 'subversively implicating the audience with what is happening on stage and vice versa', for a variety of purposes: recognition of death (Lacoue-Labarthe), awakening of the self (Pina Bausch), confrontation (Müller; Wilson). 'The post-Freudian theatre, in the wake of Lacan, reveals theatricality as a necessary element in the construction of the subject. Its effect is to make the subject (artist and spectator) experience the gap between the body as a discursive construct and its felt embodiment in experience, between the representation and the real, and to expose it to continual risk of re-definition'.³² On the basis of this, Wright analyses the work of a number of 'postmodern' artists, seeing in it the same refusal of grand narratives that postmodernism rejects. However, this account of the historical development of psychoanalysis applied to the theatre slides inexorably from Freud's account of what it means to be a spectator to an almost complete focus on the artist and what s/he produces, as Wright unproblematically adopts the position of the psychoanalytically aware Spectator/Therapist. The			Retrospectivity	Internal: the subject Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		affinity between psychoanalysis and theatre, on which she bases her assessment that ‘the subject is theatrical through and through’ is also problematic, given that Freud’s account of the way the mind worked was largely based on the theatre metaphor. ³³ Is this theatre theory, or a metaphorical use of theatre? Still, her point that theatre was once conceived of as a form of consolation, but now refuses the offer this consolation points to a shift in the aims and intentions of artists and productions, albeit still leaving spectators unproblematically on the receiving end.
Celebrity and Power: Fame in Contemporary Culture (1997)	P.D. Marshall Political sociology	Politics involves a relationship between political actor and the people in which the actor must embody those he represents. ‘[I]n politics, a leader must somehow embody the sentiments of the party, the people, and the state. In the realm of entertainment, a celebrity must somehow embody the sentiments of an audience’. ³⁴ Celebrity politicians are a combination which ‘fills out’ political rationality ‘to include the affective relationships as well as the instrumental ones’. ³⁵ The extension of political rationality to include affective aspects as well as instrumental aspects.	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation and performance Affective behaviour Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: citizens Showing (+/-)
The Principles of Representative Government (1997)	Bernard Manin Political Theory	Political life under mediated conditions resembles theatre. Manin argues that there are three forms of representative democracy: parliamentary democracy, party democracy and ‘audience’ democracy. Each share the same four principles of representative government: the election of representatives at regular interval; the partial independence of representatives; freedom of public opinions and the making of decisions after trial by ‘haggling’ ³⁶ but these principles are worked out differently in each case, indicating a change in the relationship between each representative and his constituency, but also a change in the way the execution of representative democracy relates to the electorate. Audience democracy involves a ‘personalization of power’ ³⁷ which has come about because of a number of factors:	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility A relationship between actor and spectator Strategies of presentation	Externalised : theorist Internal: electors Internalised: political actors Showing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		the decline of parties; electoral strategies based on the construction of 'vague images, prominently featuring the personality of the leaders; the rise of a political 'class'/career politician; the increasing dominance of media specialists, polling experts and journalists; the acquisition of political power because of a politician's media talents rather than their resemblance to their constituents; a widening gap between government and society, representatives and represented. Under audience democracy, voting is either 'acclamation' or 'declamation' – a retrospective vote on the performance of candidates. In this climate 'a candidate ... must not only define himself, but also his adversaries. He not only presents himself, he presents a difference'. This accounts for the rise of 'attack' ads which aim to show adversaries in a bad light. Images are pitted against each other, like in a play. Manin does not see this as a bad thing, just a change in the way representative democracy works. Electors vote for images which are not tightly linked to parties. Rather, they exercise a kind of willing suspension of disbelief as they do in theatre at the beginning of a show: 'contemporary voters ... grant their representatives a measure of discretion in relation to platforms', which leaves representatives with some room to move once elected. This brings audience democracy back to earlier forms of parliamentary democracy in which voters elected elites except that this elitism is based on presentation rather than landed aristocracy. In whichever form representative democracy takes, 'the search for political information is costly',³⁸ which is why electors are quick to pick up new forms of information short-cutting. Audience democracy is 'the rule of the media expert'.³⁹ It recognizes 'the growing role of personalities at the expense of platforms' as the informational short-cut elector/viewers take
Theatre Culture in America,	Rosemarie Bank	Nations use cultural means to express and experiment with aspects of their identity. Analysing historical cultural forms can	History	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Meaningfulness	Externalised : historian

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
1825-1860 (1997)	History	give and insight into the contests over national identity and aims. Americans ‘staged’ their culture during the period before the Civil War. These performances were deceptive as well as authentic, and occurred in ‘contested and contradictory terrains’. People in a culture ‘stage themselves and perform multiple roles’. The stage of formal theatre is ‘a door through which images, forms and ideology pass both ways’. ⁴⁰ ‘Theatre culture displays historical spaces of production, consumption, change and appropriation, but also insists upon class as a performance, ideology as a creation, and the ‘authentic’ as the most compelling deception of all’. ⁴¹ [Ackerman believes this kind of usage deflects attention from what theatrical art actually is]. Seeing culture as theatrical means understanding that cultural performances (representations) exhibit aspects of theatrical performance – being simultaneously both deceptive and authentic		A relationship	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality Retrospectivity	Internal: sometimes deluded citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
‘Staging the Gaze: Early Christian Apocalypses and Narrative Self-Representation’ (1997)	Harry Maier History	The Gaze: Spectatorship can be used as a form of control by embedding it in narratives of catastrophe. Early Christianity picked up the gaze from Roman culture: ‘actors under God’s eye whose deepest thoughts and most secret activities are visible to the divine spectator or surveillant ... Both formal apocalypses and literature that draws upon apocalyptic themes more generally stage a divine gaze in a textual theater in which audiences encounter themselves stripped and dressed to play various roles and thus to embrace the ideals of the apocalypticist’. ⁴²	Religious and Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Self-awareness Strategies of direction, presentation and performance Judgment Causality	External: God Internalised: Christians Watching (+/-)
The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: A European Perspective (1997)	Erika Fischer-Lichte German critic, scholar, theatre historian and	The Gaze: Political and social life occurs under the gaze of others: we are both actors and spectators of ourselves and others; this allows power to use strategies of direction and display which place people in particular positions and drive them to act in particular ways. These can be analysed using the elements of theatre A collection of essays about the theatre which slides effortlessly between theatre theory and the use of the theatre metaphor, so that, although Fischer-Lichte says that one of the	Political and social life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification Strategies of direction, presentation and performance	Externalised : Analyst Internal: we live in a theatricalised society Doing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	performance analyst (semiotic)	major concerns of contemporary theatre is how to distinguish theatre from both life and other forms of performance, she herself sees life as theatre: ‘Shopping has become a theatrical experience, allowing the consumer to move as a kind of performer through different scenarios devised by clever marketing strategies ... the simple act of buying is put on display and represented. Political events, too, are experienced exclusively [?] as symbolic stagings [causing] a loss of reality ... Reality is increasingly experienced as a performance, as a kind of theatre production’. Contemporary Western society is ‘a culture of theatricalizations’ i.e. it ‘puts itself on display on stage’, by which she means that it is a public culture, one that exhibits itself in public (i.e. she confuses publicity with theatricality, as Maslan suggests). ⁴³ We should therefore use theatre as a model: ‘it would seem appropriate to describe the experience of reality according to a model provided by theatre – that is, a situation in which a performer displays and represent her/himself, another, or something to the gaze of another, in a specifically arranged place and at a particular time, is experienced as reality (theatre). In this sense, reality always appears as theatrical reality’, ⁴⁴ which is hardly surprising, given the circularity of the argument. This is not, however, a revival of the theatrum mundi of ‘the Baroque’ in which the controlling force and Gaze was God. In the modern theatrical reality ‘The spectator of the moment will be a performer the next. The gaze directed at the Other is returned by the Other. There are no stable positions, no nonreturnable gazes anymore’. ⁴⁵ ‘The concept of theatricalization of everyday life, however, applies to processes of staging reality by individuals and different social groups, as well as processes by which they put themselves onstage. Only that which is made to appear in/by the production and which is perceived by others is regarded as an element of the production as well as the repertoire of techniques				Showing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		and practices employed in order to allow it to appear'. ⁴⁶ All ideas about the oppositions between being and appearance, truth and illusion, authenticity/pretence etc can be then ditched in favour of 'the simulacrum as experience' [and all without a mention of Baudrillard!] and 'cultural performance'. What will be left will be the opportunity 'to communicate directly in public and to act as a member of a community'. ⁴⁷ Unfortunately, Fischer-Lichte does not develop this idea. Instead, she retreats to theatre (performance art) as if it were the topic of her discussion. Now, performance art has demonstrated [and perhaps forced us to recognize] that the watched looks back.
'Drama in a Dramaturgical Society' (1997)	Lizzie Eldridge Scottish academic of Drama and Theatre Arts	Dramaturgy : contemporary society and social interaction involves conflict which gives it a dramatic character. Eldridge argues for a replacement of the term 'dramatised' used by Raymond Williams with 'dramaturgical' in order to convey the increasingly dramatic character of contemporary society as an on-going process, followed by an explicit comparison between theatre and life so that we can learn to rehearse action from theatre. The 'analysis of everyday, social forms of interaction' and exploration of the relationship between theatre and life. ⁴⁸ [Eldridge subscribes to the spectator/participant dichotomy. Action is only possible as a participant, who is not a spectator].	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Conflict management	Externalised : analyst Internal: actors striving to improve their skills Doing (+)
'Citizenship in Australia: An Indigenous Perspective' (1997)	Michael Dodson Indigenous Rights	Citizenship provides access to political life; this access can be restricted: 'Citizenship provided a ticket of entry into the political system. Unfortunately it was a concession ticket which only gave us entry to the back stalls at some of the shows'. ⁴⁹	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness Meaningfulness	Externalised : critic Internal: those excluded from action Watching (-)
'Performing Politics: A	John Brooks Lawton III	Performativity : Since politics has become performative (theatrical), we should analyse it as theatre. Seeing politics as	Political life	A seeing-place (implied)	Objectification: Retrospectivity	Externalised : analyst

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Theatre-based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions' (1998)	Theatre Studies	theatre reveals 'treasure-troves of meaning' in relation to the operation of power. Becoming performative has not rendered politics meaningless. Analysing it as theatre demonstrates the enormous effort which goes into producing meaning. In particular, political conventions operate like theatre: both occur before an audience; both are about signification; both involve conventions which help designate what it is. Conventions are designed to prevent audience self-reflection – theatrical techniques are used in the interests of power. ⁵⁰		An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance and presentation Causality Meaningfulness Functionalism	Internal: hapless citizens rendered passive by display Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Metaphors of consciousness and attention in the brain' (1998)	Bernard J. Baars Cognitive science	Consciousness is difficult to explain. Theorists use metaphors to help them. One is that consciousness can be conceived of as a seeing place. The metaphor provides a heuristic description of 'a topic that has no clear precedent'. Consciousness has traditionally been seen as 'a 'bright spot' cast by a spotlight on the stage of a dark theater that represents the integration of multiple sensory inputs into a single conscious experience, followed by its dissemination to a vast unconscious audience'. ⁵¹ Here, the theatre is used in an architectural sense, as a 'seeing place'.	Psychological life	A seeing-place	Visibility Detachment Structure	Externalised : scientist Watching (+/-)
1998: USA bombs Iraq
'The Role-Based Performance Scale: Validity Analysis of a Theory-Based Measure' (1998)	Theresa Welbourne et al Management study	Role Theory: employee productivity can be measured by seeing positions as roles to be performed. The metaphor is used implicitly to devise a theoretical measure of employee productivity by conceptualising it in terms of a performed role. The authors apply this 'Role-Based Performance Scale' to employees in a number of companies to test its validity, finding it 'demonstrates diagnostic properties that make it useful for practitioners as well as researchers'. ⁵²	Management studies	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Strategies of performance and direction Stock parts Causality Functionalism	Externalised : social scientist Internal: employer Doing/ Watching (+)
Rationality and Power: Democracy in Practice (1998)	Bent Flyvbjerg Politics	Impression Management. Politics occurs under the scrutiny of observers and therefore involves a concern with appearance and impression management which 'reveal[s] the dynamic relationship between rationality and power'. Politics as 'an endless drama', an 'endless play'. ⁵³ The relationship between	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and	Objectification Revelatory Strategies of direction, presentation	Externalised : social scientist Doing/ Showing/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		rationality and rationalization is the same as the relationship between 'frontstage' and 'backstage' (Flyvbjerg draws on the work of Goffman). What appears to be rationality is actually rationalization. ⁵⁴		spectator	Purposefulness Causality	Watching (+/-)
'Creating the 'right' impression: Towards a dramaturgy of management consultancy' (1998);	T. Clark ⁵⁵ and G. Salaman Management Studies	Impression management; Dramaturgy. Management consultancy involves generating persuasive images for client/spectators. Uses dramaturgical approach associated with Goffman to examine the activities of management consultants. Impression management is a core feature of management consultancy work, which makes the metaphor an appropriate one for analytical purposes: 'management consultants are viewed as systems of persuasion creating compelling images which persuade clients of their quality and worth'. ⁵⁶	Organizations	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst; management consultants Internal: clients Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Learning the Pragmatics of 'Successful' Impression Management in Cross-Cultural Interviews' (1998; 2010)	Grahame Bilbow and Sylvester Yeung Social Interaction	Impression Management: new research indicates that IM consists of both 'conscious and unconscious activity', not just the strategic forms of action described by Goffman, i.e. it is 'not just 'people's conscious and "frontstage" attempts to manage impressions of themselves through the use of 'props' and strategies'. ⁵⁷ Understanding this can help understand the differences between cultures in managing situations such as cross-cultural interviews for employment and explain why the 'wrong' impression can occur.	Working life	A seeing place (implied) A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst Showing (+/-)
Consuming people: From political economy to theaters of consumption (1998)	F.A. Firat and N. Dholakia Postmodern organization theory	Strategies for managing economic life draw on metaphors which frame activity in consequential ways. Based on the work of Debord, tracks changes in the way the economy is seen. ⁵⁸	Organizations	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification: Strategies of presentation Possibility of delusion	Externalised : analyst Internal: consumer Doing (-)
'The charismatic relationship: A	William Gardner and Bruce Avolio	Dramaturgy: Leadership can be charismatic. As such it has an impact on observers; therefore it involves impression management. Charismatic leadership is dramaturgical. It is a	Organizations	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : analysts Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
dramaturgical perspective' (1998).	Organization Studies	form of 'impression management' (from Goffman) – an 'enacted theatricality' using 'acts of framing, scripting, staging and performing '. ⁵⁹				followers Doing/ Showing (+/-)
Exploring the Modern (1998); Transgressing the Modern (1999)	John Jervis Cultural Studies	Life and theatre share many of the conventions by which we come to understand experience; social life which is inauthentic can be considered theatrical. Both books are studies in 'applied cultural theory' and an effort to understand 'the sociocultural dimensions and dynamic of modernity' with a particular concern for the self, modern ideas of identity, and the transgression of identity. ⁶⁰ For Jervis, civility itself is a form of theatricality which can be traced from C17th: 'to be human is necessarily to be 'unnatural''. ⁶¹ Modern everyday life has 'a theatrical dimension ... in which role-play is incorporated as a strategy of selfhood'. ⁶² It is 'a melodrama'. ⁶³ 'Becoming a self could be said to involve a 'rehearsal' of identity, a taking-on and casting-off of roles ... the self is both actor, and audience or spectator; actor and spectator' are 'part of the structure of self-identity'. In 'a world of selves, imagination takes on the form of theatricality, and theatricality becomes the very texture of social life', while in the theatre, 'society ... rehearses its ever-changing identity'. Theatricality 'is the process whereby the self can become a fluid, changing, yet continuous creation'. ⁶⁴ Jervis dates this phenomenon from the C17th. Popular political life, especially during revolution, is also theatre, in fact 'popular politics can only exist through a fusion of life and theatre'. ⁶⁵ Theatricality is taken by Jervis to be a theatre metaphor virtually synonymous with 'theatrical' and which constitutes a struggle for man over authenticity. It is crucially involved in our relations with the other, both within ourselves and from other cultures: 'The participant-observer is a central actor in the drama of the Orient' for the west: famous 'observers' such as Lawrence of Arabia, Richard Burton and Edward Lane	Cultural life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification: Strategies of presentation and performance Purposefulness Causality The possibility of deception.	Externalised : theorist, analyst Internal: we are both actors and spectators in the modern world Internalised: the reflexive self engaged in self-creation Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		all ‘disguised’ themselves as the other in their interactions with other cultures⁶⁶. Jervis also uses the theatre metaphor as an explanatory device, such that it is sometimes difficult to tell where his account ends and his reporting begins: e.g., in discussing the turn against theatricality and towards biography in the Victorian era he says ‘the language of melodrama spread on to the public stage’. Since he had just made a distinction between working-class and ‘respectable’ audiences, it is not clear at first that he is referring to public life in general rather than the theatre. He does usefully point out that ‘if all the world’s a stage, it is not always so in the same way’. The spectator in particular changes from God (Mediaeval to Renaissance) to Monarch (Renaissance to C18th) to ‘each other’ (C18th to the present). By C18th, theatricality ‘had come to serve as a bridge that linked the theatre and the street’ and public life was ‘theatrical in its very essence’. As a result the distinctions which occur in theatre (script/performance; stage/audience, actor/role) become ‘troublesome’ for society as well. The consequences of the failure to maintain these distinctions became apparent in the French Revolution when the people took literally the demand that they be writers, actors and spectators simultaneously. Life since around 1809 can be considered melodramatic. ‘Using the theatrical analogy, we can say the self is both actor, and audience or spectator, actor and spectator become part of the structure of self-identity in the modern age’. Politics, however, maintains the distinctions of the theatre because it has found that ‘keeping the applauding audience firmly separate from the actors on the political stage effectively traps the audience in a passive role, mere admirers of a political spectacle they cannot influence’.⁶⁷
‘Theatre as a site of passage: Some	Kirsten Hastrup Anthropology	Theatrical acting can be seen in anthropological terms (and vice versa). Uses theatre metaphors in her discussion of acting from an anthropological point of view. She ‘stages’ her argument, and	Cultural life	An acting space A constructed art	Objectification (‘methodol- ogical	Externalised : anthropol- ogical

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
reflections on the magic of acting' (1998)	Actor	at the end closes the 'Curtain'. She argues that although theatre is used as a metaphor by anthropologists, it is generally ignored as a cultural phenomenon per se . Her article is an attempt to consider acting as part of an anthropological interest in theatre itself. It could be considered then that her use of theatre as a metaphor is meant ironically, a way of combining 'methodological philistinism' and subjectivity. ⁶⁸			philistinism') Strategies of performance Purposefulness	analysis Internal: Hastrup is a 'player' herself Doing (+)
Great Theatre: The American Congress in the 1990's (1998)	Herbert Weisberg & Samuel Patterson (eds) Social Sciences	Modern political life occurs under the gaze of spectators 'Congress is a great stage, and its members play their roles under the spotlight of a skeptical public, an acerbic media, and a plethora of interest parties. Using the theater metaphor to characterize the actions of Congress and to help make the institution more understandable, congressional life and behavior is dissected and placed in the broader context of changes to Congress in the 1990's'. ⁶⁹	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification: Strategic action Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Internal: sceptical public, acerbic media, interested parties Doing/ Showing (+)
'Framing the Wars in the Gulf and in Bosnia: The Rhetorical Definitions of the Western Power Leaders in Action' (1998)	Riika Kuusisto Political Science	Framing: Political actors frame their activities in ways which are consequential; when actions are framed as theatre, they can involve an abrogation of responsibility for the consequences. Wars 'are fought not only with arms, but also with words'. Metaphoric framing determined the kind of action taken in both the Gulf and Bosnia. Despite similar desperate needs for help, only the Gulf received action under the metaphor of sport and the 'fairy-tale of the just war'. The situation in Bosnia was framed in terms of Greek tragedy, in which the unfolding of horror was inevitable and could not be prevented: '[b]y metaphorically transferring the tragic theatre scene to Bosnia, the Western leaders sought to reassure their slightly anxious publics that yes, it was perfectly all right to sit back and watch the Bosnian actors play out their cruel and shocking parts. Leaping on to the stage in	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategic action Freedom from consequences Backward causation	Externalised : analyst; audience Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		order to prevent the sacrifice of the innocent would only mess up the whole performance and ruin everybody's evening ... the Bosnian arena was, after all, a traditional stage for grim acts and ... the Bosnians were extremely talented tragic performers with long experience'. Kuusisto urges us to 'critically deconstruct all persuasive explanations'. Different ways of framing situations lead to (justify) different forms of action and response. ⁷⁰
'Debatable Performances: Restaging Contentious Feminisms' (1998)	Amanda Anderson Social Philosophy	Performance: connections between different theorists can be artificially constructed by the way they are placed in texts. Debates between theorists can be staged and 'restaged' (as is the case in the book reviewed by Anderson which pits Judith Butler against Seyla Benhabib once more), not necessarily to the benefits of the contestants. However such restagings offer others (such as Anderson herself) the opportunity to reconsider the work of such theorists in relation to each other. Anderson considers that the theories of Butler and Benhabib need not be considered as opposed to each other. The politics of identity is 'a limiting rubric' which can be extended by the inclusion of communicative action. ⁷¹	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist Doing (+)
Audiences: A Sociological Theory of Performance and Imagination (1998)	Nicholas Abercrombie & Brian Longhurst Sociology	Performance: the mass media structures different kinds of spectator groups which can be analysed according to the level of interaction that is allowed. Audiences which are widespread, receive the media under conditions of 'low' ceremony and practice 'civil inattention' towards it, but use the images imaginatively as part of their everyday life. Life is increasingly performed because it is increasingly mediatized; being in an audience is now a mundane, everyday experience. This means that audiences (of all kinds) can be researched through a Spectacle/Performance paradigm rather than a Behavioural or 'Incorporation/Resistance' or Critical Theory paradigm (that associated with Stuart Hall). Since we are all always an audience member, identity is now the key issue for us.	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Distance Objectification Strategies of presentation Subjectification Backwards causation	Externalised : researcher/ Analyst Internal: self-aware media consumer Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		Levels of audience are determined by the degree of distance between performer and audience: 'simple' audiences feature a greater distance than 'diffused' audiences. Distance turns participants into performers. [The problematic nature of this collapse of social convention into performance is indicated by their comment on funerals]: at a funeral, the distance accorded immediate family members as a recognition of their 'greater degree of loss' 'makes members of the family into performers', ⁷² a use of the metaphor which is largely incoherent in relation to audiences as performers. The book is basically an extended argument for the use of performance as a metaphor for mediated life, to enable audience researchers to access what they call a 'diffuse' audience – an audience which is skilled at using and incorporating into their lives the images generated by the media, making them a different kind of audience than the simple or mass, which could be investigated using the methods of behavioural science or critical theory. This is thought to be a new or 'modern' audience, one which sees the world as spectacle, and sees its own reflection in that world.
'Post colonial return to sender' (1998)	Ian McLean Australian Art Historian	Social and political life involves a politics of identity in which repression retains rather than obliterates the other. McLean uses theatre to describe the way Aboriginality appears in the representations of whites when they appropriate Aboriginal people, artefacts etc to represent Australia – even white Australia. An example is the appearance of Bungaree in a painting by Augustus Earle reproduced in a poster advertising an exhibition at the Museum of Sydney: 'There he is again, waving to us on the flyer' parodying 'colonial ritual'. The repression of the other thus does not erase the other but reproduces them as other for the purposes of self-representation. The politics of identity requires this survival of the appropriated other in order to function. Repression therefore always leaves a trace. ⁷³	Social and political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Subjectification Appropriation	Externalised : art historian Internal: the subject attempting to generate an identity Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'Rethinking the Public Sphere: A Contribution to the Critique of Actually Existing Democracy' (1999). ⁷⁴	Nancy Fraser Sociology	Political debate occurs in a public space. Habermas' concept of the public sphere 'designates a theater in modern societies in which political participation is enacted through the medium of talk ... a theater for debating and deliberating'. ⁷⁵	Social and political life	An acting space	Structure Strategies of performance Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Internal: passive disengaged citizens Doing (+)
'Revolution as Theatre' (1999)	Jennifer Rarick Writer	People use metaphors to describe political events: the theatre metaphor is particularly used to describe period of upheaval such as revolutions because of the dramatic nature of the event. 'Who among us has not felt at one point or another that their life was all an act, that they were just fulfilling a role?'. The 'drama of our lives is a recurring theme' by which we question the reality of our world, and thereby reveal that we find our existence problematic: 'Perhaps because it is so difficult for us to determine our purpose in life ... [i]f we think of ourselves as actors under one all-powerful Director, we may think of our lives as assigned roles [and] we may find purpose in our roles because of His [the Director's] standards for evaluation and in turn understand the reason for our existence'. ⁷⁶ Rarick points out that the metaphor is particularly prevalent at times of political upheaval, such as revolution.	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Subjectification Meaningfulness Self-awareness Causality	Internalised: the metaphor is an expression of our ability to observe ourselves acting and therefore question our reality; it is an attempt to externalise this self-consciousness Doing (+)
'The Production of a Founding Event: The Case of Pauline Hanson's Maiden	Sean Scalmer Political Science/ Political Sociology	The media turns political life into theatre and encourages the use of theatrical 'gimmicks'. The mass media has encouraged the 'development of increasingly novel, theatrical protest forms'. The media itself engages in the production of 'manufactured events' which it then reports on as 'newsworthy'. This leads to an 'unstable, mediated political environment' in which opinion	Political life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Parliamentary Speech' (1999); Dissent Events: Protest, The Media and the Political Gimmick in Australia (2002)		rather than consent is manufactured. ⁷⁷ Since the 1960's in Australia, collective action has increasingly included 'political gimmicks' such as 'publicity stunts, demonstrations and audacious displays' and an emphasis on theatre and spectacle in order to attract media attention. 'Australians now spoke the language of theatrical political performance in a fluent, flexible manner'. ⁷⁸
'Images of Women in Western Australian Politics: The Suffragist, Edith Cowan and Carmen Lawrence' (1999)	Joan Eveline and Michael Booth Politics/ Women's Research	Political life occurs in public and therefore involves the management of appearance; female political figures also have to contend with the male gaze. Women do appear on 'the parliamentary stage'. ⁷⁹ However, they do so under circumstances which are designed to maintain the (male) status quo. These include framing, scapegoating and trial by media, especially in political cartooning.	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Objectification: Strategies of direction, presentation and performance Causality Purposefulness Strategic action	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Internal: male politicians Doing/ Showing (-)
'Identity-presentation in youth cultures and scene-creation in Internet' (1999)	W. Vogelgesang Sociology	Dramaturgy. Role play is a form of experimentation. Juveniles use dramaturgical techniques to negotiate and experiment with differentiation, self-presentation and group affiliation. They use the Internet for 'a fictional exploration of different identities'. ⁸⁰	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Freedom from consequences	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (+)
The Experience Economy: Work is Theater and Every Business a Stage (1999)	B.J. Pine and J.H. Gilmour Organization Studies	Dramatism: draws on the work of Kenneth Burke to argue that organizations are theatre. Organizational life involves strategies of presentation and interpretation. ⁸¹	Organization	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
The Portable Theater:	Alan Ackerman	Public witnessing turns social life into theatre. Novels were known as 'portable theaters' in C19th: 'dramas one can	Social life	A seeing-place (implied)	Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : historian

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage (1999)	History/ Literature	personally carry around'. Theatrical metaphors were prevalent in C19th literature and expressed concerns about public and private experience. Although Ackerman differentiates his study from studies which embed their findings within an overall dramaturgical approach (such as Banks 1997), he nevertheless uses the metaphor as a way of describing C19th American life ⁸² and entitles his chapters according to the metaphor e.g. Chapter 1 is 'Setting The Stage: Representing Nineteenth-Century American Theater'. ⁸³ The metaphor is even used visually: the chapter titles are boxed as if they were a theatre poster.		A constructed art	presentation Purposefulness Causality	Doing (+)
Performance culture and Athenian democracy (1999)	Simon Goldhill & Robin Osborne Ancient History and Greek Literature	Performance: : to locate connections between four aspects of Athenian culture usually treated separately Uses the concept of performance , derived from contemporary performance studies (Schechner, Blau, Parker and Sedgwick) as an heuristic device to study the interconnections between four central ideas in Athenian culture: agōn (contest), epideixis (display), schēma (form and/or appearance) and theoria (spectatorship). All can be considered as elements of performance. 'Performance' is an appropriate concept to use in relation to Athenian culture because: 1) Athens was a 'festival' culture – it had more festivals than any other Greek city; 2) these festivals usually involved processions which were 'performances of the ideological articulation of community links and divisions; 3) most festivals involved competition and 4) provided a privileged site for 'artistic' performances in which citizens performed, such as dramas and choral competitions; 5) theatre metaphors were readily taken up into other performative activities, such as oratory and law; 6) Athens 'was a city of images': its architecture was 'performative'. (Note that although Goldhill and Osborne mention the audience in their Introduction, their justifications for using performance as an analytical category are based on the 'doing' of performances: watching is almost completely forgotten. Also, like many who use the	History	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality Appropriation	Externalised : historian Internal: Athenian citizens Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		metaphor, looking through the lens of theatre tends to mean they see theatre everywhere). ⁸⁴
'The Rhetoric of Anti-rhetoric in Athenian Democracy' (1999)	John Hesk History	To highlight the performative nature of politics in a democracy because it occurs under the gaze of citizens. This makes the management of appearance crucial and raises the possibility of deception. Hesk uses the theatre metaphor to set up a discussion of the rhetorical strategies which have been used in both contemporary politics and Athenian politics to disparage the use of rhetorical strategies. He believes that in both cases, these moves reflect an anxiety about deception in democracies. Citizens in democracies, it seems, need to be able to recognize when they are being deceived, especially as appearances (on which most judgments are likely to be made) can be deceptive: 'There is no stamp of men's intention on their faces'. ⁸⁵ Hesk argues that we should be grateful to those who identify rhetorical strategies such as 'spin' because they subject them to surveillance for us.	History	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation The possibility of deception	Externalised : theorist Internal: democratic citizens; the media Showing (-)
'A dress rehearsal for a presidential campaign: FDR's embodied "run" for the 1928 governorship' (1999)	Amos Kiewe Politics	Political achievement requires preparation and the management of impressions. Roosevelt had to show that he was physically fit for political office after contracting polio. The article analyses his efforts to do this in his run for governorship, and concludes that this gubernatorial campaign acted as a 'dress rehearsal' for Roosevelt's later run for the presidency. ⁸⁶	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relation between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Internal: citizens Doing/ Showing (+/-)

¹ Ezrahi, Yaron. 1995. 'The Theatrics and Mechanics of Action: The Theater and the Machine as Political Metaphors'. Social Research 62 (2) pp. 299-323.

-
- ² Guthrie, Douglas J. 1995, 'Political theatre and student organizations in the 1989 Chinese movement: a multivariate analysis of Tiananmen', Sociological Forum Vol 10(3) 1995, pp. 419-454; cited in Ku, Agnes S. 2004. 'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power, Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations'. The China Quarterly pp. 647-664. 648.
- ³ Ku 2004: 648
- ⁴ Tassi 1995: 472, cited in Krasner, David, and David Saltz. 2006. 'Introduction'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 1-15.3
- ⁵ Tompkins, Joanne. 1995. 'The story of rehearsal never ends'. Canadian Literature (144) pp. 142-162.142
- ⁶ Hirst, Derek. 1995. 'John Milton's Eikonoklastes: The Drama of Justice'. In The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, edited by D. L. Smith, R. Strier and D. Bevington. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 245-259. 245-7
- ⁷ Grossman, Marshall 1995, 'The Dissemination of the King', in Smith, David L., Richard Strier, and David Bevington, eds. 1995. The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 261.
- ⁸ Alexander, Jeffrey. 2003. The Meanings of Social Life: A Cultural Sociology. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.4
- ⁹ Alexander, Jeffrey. 1995. 'Modern, Anti, Post, and Neo: How Intellectuals Have Coded, Narrated, and Explained the 'New World of Our Time''. In Fin de Siècle Social Theory, edited by J. Alexander. London: Verso, pp. 6-48.15-35
- ¹⁰ Alexander 2003: 55
- ¹¹ Alexander 2003: 91
- ¹² Alexander 2003: 193
- ¹³ Alexander, Jeffrey 2005, "'Globalization" as Collective Representation: The New Dream of a Cosmopolitan Civil Sphere', International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society, Vol. 19, No. 1/2, The New Sociological Imagination II (Dec., 2005), pp. 81-90.88
- ¹⁴ Parker, Andrew, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick. 1995. 'Introduction'. In Performativity and Performance, edited by A. Parker and E. K. Sedgwick. New York: Routledge, pp. 1-18. 1
- ¹⁵ Warden, James. 1995. 'Parliament, Democracy and Political Identity'. In Constitutions, Rights and Democracy: Past, Present and Future. Papers on Parliament No 25, June, Parliament House Canberra: Department of the Senate, pp. 47-62.48.
- ¹⁶ Rancière, Jacques. 1999/1995. Disagreement: Politics and Philosophy. Translated by J. Rose. Minnesota, London: University of Minnesota Press.88
- ¹⁷ Rancière, Jacques. 2010. Dissensus: On Politics and Aesthetics. Translated by S. Corcoran. Edited by S. Corcoran. London/New York: Continuum.71
- ¹⁸ Mancini, Paolo, and David L. Swanson. 1996. 'Politics, Media, and Modern Democracy: Introduction'. In Politics, Media, and Modern Democracy : an international study of innovations in electoral campaigning and their consequences, edited by P. Mancini and D. L. Swanson. Westport, Conn: Praeger.
- ¹⁹ Street, John. 2004. 'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation'. BJPIR 6 pp. 435-452. 441. Street challenges the negative view of Mancini and Swanson by arguing that neither celebrity involvement in politics nor the 'marketing' of politics using visual forms of representation are new, and may be an inevitable, perhaps even normal part of politics. Modern celebrity politics is merely using modern tools of communication (Street 2004: 440-441).
- ²⁰ Bell, Vikki. 1996. 'The promise of liberalism and the performance of freedom'. In Foucault and political reason: Liberalism, neo-liberalism and rationalities of government, edited by A. Barry, T. Osborne and N. Rose. London: UCL Press, pp. 81-97.85-90.
- ²¹ Habermas, Jurgen. 1996. Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by W. Rehg. London: Polity Press.382

-
- ²² Habermas, Jurgen. 2006. 'Political communication in media society: Does democracy still enjoy an epistemic dimension? The impact of normative theory on empirical research'. Communication Theory 16 pp. 411-426.416-8.
- ²³ Lapham, Lewis 1996, 'Lights, Camera, Democracy! On the Conventions of a Make-Believe Republic', Harper's Magazine, August 1996, Vol 293(1755), pp. 33-39; accessed through EBSCOhost on 17/7/2006.
- ²⁴ Filippi, Bruna 1996, 'The theatre of emblems and the Jesuit stage', Diogenes, Fall 1996, No. 175, pp. 67-85.67
- ²⁵ Bealing, William E. Jr., Mark W. Dirmsmith, and Timothy Fogarty. 1996. 'Early regulatory actions by the SEC: An institutional theory perspective on the dramaturgy of political exchanges'. Accounting, Organizations and Society 21 (4) pp. 317-338.317. SEC stands for the American Securities and Exchange Commission. Although this article uses a dramaturgical approach, it does not draw directly on any dramaturgical literature. This is a feature of the use of the metaphor in the social sciences. The metaphor is so prevalent as to be seen as being self-explanatory.
- ²⁶ Kao, John. 1996. Jamming: The Art and Discipline of Business Creativity. New York: HarperBusiness.96
- ²⁷ McKenzie, Jon. 2001. Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance. London, New York: Routledge.88
- ²⁸ Kao 1996: 132
- ²⁹ In Vaughan, Diane 1996, The Challenger Launch Decision: Risky Technology, Culture, and Deviance at NASA, Chicago IL., The University of Chicago Press, p. 219-220; cited in McKenzie 2001.
- ³⁰ McKenzie 2001: 148
- ³¹ J.F. Lyotard 1989, 'Beyond representation' in A. Benjamin (Ed), The Lyotard Reader, Oxford, Basil Blackwell, pp. 155-168, p. 156.
- ³² Wright, Elizabeth. 1996. 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 175-199.177-189
- ³³ Wright 1996: 189
- ³⁴ Marshall, P. David. 1997. Celebrity and Power: Fame in Contemporary Culture. London: University of Minnesota Press.203
- ³⁵ Street 2004: 446
- ³⁶ Manin, Bernard. 1997. The Principles of Representative Government. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.197-9
- ³⁷ Manin 1997: 219
- ³⁸ Manin 1997: 221-8
- ³⁹ Manin 1997: 202
- ⁴⁰ Filewood, Alan. 2002. 'National Theatre and Imagined Authenticities'. In Performing Canada: The Nation Enacted in the Imagined Theatre. Kamloops: University College of the Cariboo <http://www.canadianshakespeares.ca/multimedia/pdf/imagined-authenticities.pdf> accessed 24/07/2005.
- ⁴¹ Banks 1997: 8 in Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press. xv
- ⁴² Maier, H. 1997, 'Staging the Gaze ...', Harvard Theological Review 90, pp. 131-154. 132-3; cited in Bartsch, Shadi. 2006. The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.135
- ⁴³ Maslan, Susan. 2005. Revolutionary Acts: Theatre, Democracy, and the French Revolution. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press.
- ⁴⁴ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.218
- ⁴⁵ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 231

-
- ⁴⁶ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 219
- ⁴⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 232
- ⁴⁸ Eldridge, Lizzie. 1997. 'Drama in a Dramaturgical Society'. In Raymond Williams Now: Knowledge, Limits and the Future, edited by J. Wallace, R. Jones and S. Nield. Houndmills, Basingstoke; New York: Macmillan; St Martin's Press, pp. 71-88.79.
- ⁴⁹ Dodson, Michael. 1997. 'Citizenship in Australia: An Indigenous Perspective'. Alternative Law Journal 22 (2) pp. 57-59.57.
- ⁵⁰ Lawton 1998, 'Performing Politics', available from www.sanestorm.com/performing_politics.pdf accessed 14th September 2007.1-28
- ⁵¹ Baars, Bernard J. 1998. 'Metaphors of consciousness and attention in the brain'. Trends in Neurosciences (TINS) 21 (2) pp. 58-62.58. This is but one example of the use of the metaphor to do with conceptions of consciousness, a use which Baars says extends 'from Pavlov [1849-1936] to Crick' [1916-2004]: 'nearly all current hypotheses about consciousness and selective attention can be viewed as variants of this fundamental idea' (Baars 1998: 58). That Baars calls this use 'traditional' should perhaps alert us to a way of viewing theatre which has implication for more general ideas about activity and passivity. In this form of the metaphor, theatre is simply an integratory mechanism in some dark or shadowy way. A spotlight or focus is required to make anything out in this darkness. Consciousness apparently directs the spotlight, which places it outside the stage, and of course, the audience is purely and passively, even unconsciously, receptive (if that is possible). This is a conception of theatre which flies in the face of theatre theory, even when it makes disparaging comments on popular entertainment. It completely denies any relationship between performer and audience. If this is how consciousness is seen (somewhat like God in earlier uses of the metaphor) then it is little wonder that spectators can be considered passive, even apathetic.
- ⁵² Welbourne, Theresa, Diane Johnson, and Amir Erez. 1998. 'The Role-Based Performance Scale: Validity Analysis of a Theory-Based Measure'. The Academy of Management Journal 41 (5) pp. 540-555. In The Academy of Management Journal, Vol 41(5), 1998, pp. 540-555.540.
- ⁵³ Flyvbjerg, Bent. 1998. Rationality and Power: Democracy in Practice. Translated by S. Sampson. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.1
- ⁵⁴ Flyvbjerg 1998: 98; 228
- ⁵⁵ See also T. Clark and I. Mangham 2004.
- ⁵⁶ Clark, T. And Salaman, G. 1998, 'Creating the 'right' impression: Towards a dramaturgy of management consultancy', Services Industries Journal, Vol 18(1), Jan. 1998.
- ⁵⁷ Bilbow, Grahame, and Sylvester Yeung. 2010/1998. 'Learning the Pragmatics of 'Successful' Impression Management in Cross-Cultural Interviews'. Pragmatics 8 (3) pp. 405-417, <http://www.elanguage.net/journals/index.php/pragmatics/article/viewArticle/272.406>.
- ⁵⁸ Firat, F.A. and Dholakia, N. 1998, Consuming people: From political economy to theatres of consumption, London, Routledge
- ⁵⁹ Gardner, William and Avolio, Bruce 1998, 'The charismatic relationship: A dramaturgical perspective', Academy of Management Review, Vol 23, pp. 32-58; cited in Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe 2003.
- ⁶⁰ Jervis, John. 1999. Transgressing the Modern: Explorations in the Western Experience of Otherness. Oxford and Massachusetts: Blackwell.2-3
- ⁶¹ Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.16
- ⁶² Jervis 1999: 2
- ⁶³ Jervis 1998: 33
- ⁶⁴ Jervis 1998: 21-27
- ⁶⁵ Jervis 1998: 61
- ⁶⁶ Jervis 1999: 74
- ⁶⁷ Jervis 1998: 18-25

-
- ⁶⁸ Hastrup, Kirsten. 1998. 'Theatre as a site of passage: Some reflections on the magic of acting'. In Ritual, Performance, Media, edited by F. Hughes-Freeland. NY and London: Routledge, pp. 29-45.29-30
- ⁶⁹ Abstract provided by alibris, www.alibris.com accessed 25/4/2008/
- ⁷⁰ Kuusisto, Riikka. 1998. 'Framing the Wars in the Gulf and in Bosnia: The Rhetorical Definitions of the Western Power Leaders in Action'. Journal of Peace Research 35 (5) 603-620. In the Journal of Peace Research, Vol 35(5), pp. 603-620.
- ⁷¹ Anderson, Amanda. 1998. 'Debatable Performances: Restaging Contentious Feminisms'. Social Text 54 (Spring) pp. 1-24. In Social Text 54 (Spring), pp. 1-24.3-4
- ⁷² Abercrombie, Nicholas, and Brian Longhurst. 1998. Audiences: A Sociological Theory of Performance and Imagination. London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications.45
- ⁷³ McLean, Ian 1998, 'Post colonial return to sender', Australian Humanities Review May 1998, <http://www.lib.latrobe.edu.au/AHR>. Based on an essay delivered as the Hancock lecture at the University of Sydney on 11.11.1998 as part of the annual conference of the Australian Academy of Humanities.
- ⁷⁴ In Habermas and the Public Sphere, edited by C. Calhoun, Cambridge Mass.: The MIT Press, pp.109-142.
- ⁷⁵ Fraser, Nancy. 1999. 'Rethinking the Public Sphere: A Contribution to the Critique of Actually Existing Democracy'. In Habermas and the Public Sphere, edited by C. Calhoun. Cambridge Mass.: The MIT Press, 109-142.111
- ⁷⁶ Rarick, Jennifer. 1999. 'Revolution as Theatre'. In Fresh Writing. <http://www.nd.edu/~frswrite/snite/1999/Rarick.shtml> accessed 28 May 2007.
- ⁷⁷ Scalmer, Sean. 1999. 'The Production of a Founding Event: The Case of Pauline Hanson's Maiden Parliamentary Speech'. Theory and Event 3 (2). Also available on http://muse.jhu.edu/journals/theory_and_event/v003/3.2scalmer.html accessed 26th May, 2004.
- ⁷⁸ Scalmer, Sean. 2002. Dissent Events: Protest, the media and the political gimmick in Australia. Sydney: University of New South Wales Press.28
- ⁷⁹ Eveline, Joan and Booth, Michael 1999, 'Images of Women in Western Australian Politics: The Suffragist, Edith Cowan and Carmen Lawrence' Paper delivered to Women's Worlds 99: 7th International Congress of Women's Research, Tromso, Norway, June 22, 1999, available from The Centre for Western Australian History, <http://www.cwah.uwa.edu.au>, accessed May 2004.7
- ⁸⁰ Vogelgesang, W. 1999, 'Identity-presentation in youth cultures and scene-creation in Internet', Berliner Journal fur Soziologie, Vol 9(1), pp. 65ff.65
- ⁸¹ Pine, B. And Gilmour, J. 1999, The Experience Economy: Work is Theater and Every Business a Stage, Harvard Business Press.
- ⁸² Ackerman 1999: xvi
- ⁸³ Ackerman 1999: 1
- ⁸⁴ Goldhill, Simon, and Robin Osborne, eds. 1999. Performance-culture and Athenian Democracy. Cambridge UK; New York: Cambridge University Press.
- ⁸⁵ (Hyperides, Fragment 226, in Hesk, John. 1999. 'The Rhetoric of Anti-rhetoric in Athenian Oratory'. In Performance Culture and Athenian Democracy edited by S. Goldhill and R. Osborne. UK, New York: Cambridge University Press, pp. 201-230.229
- ⁸⁶ Kiewe, Amos. 1999. 'A dress rehearsal for a presidential campaign: FDR's embodied "run" for the 1928 governorship'. The Southern Communication Journal 64 (2) 155.ff.

Table 15/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator –2000-2003

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Wars: Middle East, Africa, Central America, Indian continent
‘Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/ Quebec Context’ (2000)	Barbara Godard Translator	Translation is a kind of performance because it has to take account of gestures (signs) as well as words. A translator must draw on the categories of performance and performativity in order to fully translate stage plays. ¹	Intellectual life	A seeing place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of performance Signification	Externalised : translator Doing (+/-)
‘Global media events and the positioning of presence’ (2000)	David Rowe Media Studies	The media structures what it shows for spectators. Media events are ‘scripted’ in ways designed to create (or substitute for) the experience of in-person attendance. Thinking of this process as theatre allows us to consider ‘the dialectics of remote and proximate experience of global media events’. ²	Social and political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Structure Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Internal: deluded media spectator Doing (-)
‘State-society relations and the discourses and activities of the 1989 Beijing student movement’ (2000) ³	Dingxin Zhao Political Science	Dramaturgy: political activism uses goal-oriented strategies aimed at generating conflict. A study of the 1989 Beijing student movement. ⁴	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategic action Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
‘The sporting gamble: Media sport, drama and politics’ (2000)	Cathy Greenfield and Peter Williams Media studies	The media structures sporting events in ways which are ideological and discriminatory. Mediated sport is ‘configured as drama’ which enacts ‘gender, ‘race’ and national politics’. ⁵	Sporting life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Internal: media;

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
						manipulated spectators Doing (-)
'The social construction of the "dying role" and the hospice drama' (2000)	Debra Parker-Oliver Social Science	Role Theory. Social interaction is organized in ways which position people in particular ways and in relation to others. Use of Role theory as well as the theatre metaphor more generally: 'the hospice community directs [the transition from the "sick role" to the "dying role"] for the dying and significant others'. Dying constitutes a transition from one role to another in the drama of a life, which alters the relationship of the dying to those around them. ⁶	Social interaction	A constructed art	Structure Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : scientist/ theorist Doing (+)
'Wooden performances in courts owe more to theatre than the law' (2000)	John Schauble Journalist	Ritualisation turns law into theatre and pre-determines outcomes. The 'studied manner of modern Chinese justice owe[s] more to the theatre than the law ... though the performances are wooden and uninspiring'. Consequently the Chinese legal system 'enjoys little trust and even less understanding among the general population'. ⁷	Judicial systems	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Structure Strategies of presentation and direction Purposefulness Causality Determinism	Externalised : journalist Internal: Chinese citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
2001: War in Afghanistan involving United Nations forces, including American and Australian troops
2001: terrorist attack on the World Trade Centre in the United States, known as '9/11'. The attack launched the so-called 'War on Terror', largely directed at the Middle East.
'The Paradox of Hegemony: America's Ambiguous Relationship with the United Nations' (2001)	Bruce Cronin International Relations	Role Theory: Nations strive to act in the world in ways which can conflict and result in 'strain'. America suffers from 'role strain' because it is torn between its role as a 'hegemon' and its role as a 'great power'. ⁸	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategic action Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist Doing (-)
'Dramatizing and organizing: acting and being' (2001)	C. Oswick, T. Keenoy and D. Grant Management Studies	Dramaturgy. Application of dramaturgy to the management of organizational change. Organizations undertake change in purposeful and goal-oriented ways. ⁹	Organizations	A constructed art	Strategies of direction Purposefulness Conflict management	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'A dramaturgical analysis of charismatic leader discourse' (2001).	Arlene Harvey Organization Studies	Dramaturgy/Impression Management: charismatic leadership can be analysed dramaturgically because it uses theatrical techniques to achieve its ends. ¹⁰	Organization	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of performance Purposefulness Strategic action Causality	Externalised : analysts Doing (+/-)
'The Scripted Organization: Dramaturgy from Burke to Baudrillard' (2001).	D. Kärreman Organization Studies	Dramaturgy: organizations are purposeful and goal-oriented and employ strategies to achieve their ends. The development of dramaturgy in relation to organization studies to incorporate the work of Baudrillard in relation to simulation. Kärreman argues that Baudrillard is 'the successor to Goffman and Burke's dramaturgical perspectives'. ¹¹ Baudrillard's idea of simulacra provides for the 'various ways scripting occurs in organizations'. ¹² Bartels refutes this conception: it is a misunderstanding. For Baudrillard, theatre belonged to imitation , which was the first order of simulacrum. Simulacra belong to the third order: they do not imitate reality, they actually produce it. ¹³	Organisation	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategic action Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
'Bending the rules of "professional" display: Emotional improvisation in caregiver performances' (2001).	J.M. Morgan and K.J. Krone Organization Studies	Dramaturgy: improvisation and dramatisation can be used to manipulate situations emotionally. Leaders in caregiver positions improvise and dramatise in situations involving emotions in order to set up or play down the conventions of professional conduct. ¹⁴	Organization	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and direction Purposefulness Subjectification Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
Global Theatres and Capitalism (2001); Theatres of Capitalism	D.M. Boje; D.M. Boje and G.A. Rosile; Boje, J.T. Luhman	Dramaturgy: the collapse of a major organization is a spectacle which can be analysed using theatre. Organizational life can be seen as both being like theatre and as theatre because both incorporate spectacle (and therefore a relationship with externalised spectators) as well as a variety of goal-oriented and	Organization	A constructed art	Strategic action Strategies of presentation and direction Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Internal: those

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(2002); Enron in Theatre (2002); Enron Dialogs (2002); Metatheatre: Theory and Method (2002); The Metatheatre Intervention Manual (2002); A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor (2003); Leadership Theatre Event (2005)	and A.L. Conliffe Organization Studies	purposeful strategies some of which may be aimed at conflict within the organization. Boje and his associates seem to go overboard in their application of the theatre metaphor to multinational organisations, producing an extensive ‘glossary’ of the terms they use which features many capital letters and large, bold print, to bring out, at least visually, the ‘Meta’ nature of their analyses. As firms establish markets around the world, their theatrics play on the global stage (Diffuse Spectacles). The Metatheatre or ‘global drama’ of a multinational corporation includes ‘public image, the faciality, and starring characters’. Leadership is theatre. Effective leaders ‘do stage craft’. Executives are directors who line up characters (both human and non-human) in antenarratives . ¹⁵ A Megaspectacle occurs when a firm ‘enacts a theatric performance that collapses into Scandal’. (One such Megaspectacle was the Enron collapse). In a more considered article, Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe argue that dramaturgy (Goffman) and dramatism (Burke) can be placed into a dialectic in order to open a space of liquidity in which, through an insertion of the dialectic spectacle (Debord) and carnival (Bahktin/Boal), opportunities for empowering spectators can be created. In other words, ‘experiments in emancipatory carnival-like theatre’ can be drawn on to break up the ‘theatre as technology’ increasingly being used within organizations. Although they say that this technology is being used by workers and activists as well as ‘managers, owners, customers, consultants’, it turns life into theatre in a way which ‘equate material accumulation with happiness while ignoring the three billion people living on less than a dollar a day and the exhaustion of finite planet resources’. Carnival is the means by which such oppression is resisted. When opposed to spectacle, carnival creates chaos in which spectators turn into participants (‘spect-actors’) through a process of awakening of critical			Causality	outside the organization ; Consultants Doing/ Showing (-) consciousness and subsequent self-empowerment instigated by the seduction of Invisible Theatre. The use of the term seduction renders this account of empowerment somewhat paradoxical. And in any case, for all the article's arguments for empowerment of spectatorship, the spectatorship of most interest is the analysis of organizational power through this 'dialectic' made up of a somewhat tortured fit between Goffman/Aristotle (who 'keep us aware of the limits of the theatre metaphor'), Kenneth Burke (who 'lets us see how scripted and dramatic our lives are on a daily basis), and Debord and Boal (who invite us to change the spectacle of daily living) i.e. we can approach the study of organizational life from the point of view that theatre is 'both life and metaphor'. ¹⁶ Stephen Riggins, in his review of Dennis Brissett and Charles Edgley's 1990 edition of Life as Theater: A Dramaturgical Sourcebook (New York, Aldine de Gruyter) calls for a more nuanced view of dramaturgy based on (and perhaps generated by) theorists who either work in the theatre or have a very good understanding of it, however, Boje et al's work indicates that theatre practitioners may not be the best advocates or developers of the dramaturgical perspective because of their knowledge of the complexities of the art. If anything, it seems to lead to even more confusion, since theatre practitioners seem much more likely to want to collapse the metaphor. In any case, a theatre which attempts 'to seduce' spectators into becoming actors is still acting on spectators!

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance (2001)	Jon McKenzie Cultural/ Media Theory	Performance is the contemporary 'onto-historical formation of power and knowledge, replacing discipline'. ¹⁷ Now it is 'perform - or else' in relation to many arenas of life, including the workplace. The pressure to perform generates dramatic situations which are full of conflict, leading people to see their situation in terms of theatre. Consequently, it is now necessary 'to rehearse a general theory of performance'. ¹⁸ Any one attempt to develop a	Social, political, organization and intellectual life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Doing (-) theory is engaging in a kind of ‘rehearsal’. The concept of performance has become endemic, which has made life seem more conflictual.

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Theatre and State in Twentieth-Century Ireland: Cultivating the People (2001)	Lionel Pilkington Irish Theatre Studies	Theatricality: Political life which is framed as theatre generates particular kinds of consequences: ‘It was Ireland’s regular recourse to a kind of theatricality’ that kept the ‘acute cultural and political problem’ of militancy alive. ¹⁹ Many political events were routinely described in theatrical terms – as stage plays or Greek tragedies.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Affective conduct Causality	Externalised : analyst Internal: spectators with a desire to perpetuate conflict Showing (-)
“‘Resilience’ in Organizational Actors and Rearticulating ‘Voice’” (2001)	Margaret Vickers & Alexander Kouzmin Organization Studies	Impression management. The need to manage impressions can place individuals within an organization into situations they cannot manage. Actors may not have the resilience that New Public Management assumes since they may be required to present a particular face for the organization. In particular, new Public Management ignores how organization management affects ‘actors’. ²⁰	Organization	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction Self-awareness Subjectification Causality	Internal: theorist/critic; those outside the organization Internalised: workers made self-conscious by the requirements of the organization Watching (-)
‘Rehearsing Democracy: Advocacy, Public Intellectuals, and Civic	Jill Dolan American performer, director, educator and feminist	Theatre as a cultural activity provides a vehicle for civic engagement, and a place where social change can be ‘rehearsed’. Dolan believes that just the act of going to the theatre indicates a ‘hopeful openness to the diverse possibilities of democracy’. It is this hopefulness that she wants to build on through her work as educator, producing students who are not only trained in thea	Cultural and political life	A constructed art	Strategic action Purposefulness Freedom from consequences Strategies of presentation	Internal: theatre practitioner and educator; political

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Engagement in Theatre and Performance Studies' (2001)		theatre arts but are also engaged with public issues through their art as advocates for the arts and education, as public intellectuals and through civic engagement, particularly in relation to inclusion. Rather than be pessimistic about the power of performance to engage 'directly and urgently in public debate' and to affect social change, a pessimism which is understandable given the misunderstandings about the complexity and history of theatre and its study, Dolan argues that 'theatre and performance in academic departments' ought not be seen as simply providing the technical means by which other departments can engage in debates of their own, but 'are ideal places to rehearse for participatory democracy' along the lines advocated by Boal. '[E]verything in the public sphere should concern us'. ²¹ [Typically, though, Dolan sees this engagement through theatre as being of a transgressive nature. Her model is the performance art of Holly Hughes].				activist Doing (+)
'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality' (2002)	Janelle Reinelt American theatre theorist	Texts are structured for clarity and impact. Theoretical concepts can be personified and placed into conflict with each other in order to illuminate. Reinelt sets out her investigation into the links between performativity and theatricality like a play. 'Scene One' is a discussion of 'performance'; 'Scene Two' a discussion of 'performative' and 'Scene Three' a discussion of 'performativity'. These three concepts now set the scene (mises en Scène) for a confrontation with theatricality . The purpose of the confrontation is to investigate where political activism/theatre might lie given theatre's inability to escape representation - in the idea of performance, in the idea of theatricality, or some combination of the two. Reinelt uses Derrida's and Butler's idea of language failure (the gap between iteration and 'incommensurable reiteration') to suggest that performance offers theatre the opening in which lies the possibility of transgression. ²²	Political and intellectual life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Conflict management for effect Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Doing/ Showing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Captive Audience: Media, Masculinity and Power in Prison (2002)	Yvonne Jewkes Criminology	Impression management (see Goffman) is a process of managing roles. Social interaction occurs under the gaze of others and therefore requires impressions to be managed; media can help provide strategies to do this. Television in particular helps prisoners negotiate impression management within prisons. As an audience, prisoners use television in a variety of ways which help them manage the identities they require to survive incarceration. 'Meso and micro processes and pleasures associated with consuming media originate from both the form and content'. ²³	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Purposefulness Subjectification	Externalised : theorist Internal: the incarcerated Internalised: self-aware individuals seeking to manage social interaction Doing/ Watching (+)
Media Democracy: How the Media Colonise Politics (2002)	T. Meyer Media Studies	Role Theory. The mass media structures political actors and their activities in ways which are intended to be meaningful for spectators. Politicians are 'cast' by 'the logic of the mass media' in roles which embody 'qualities, forces, tendencies, virtues, programs or powers that carry powerful resonance in a country's political culture and mythology'. Politics involves an 'artistry of entertainment'. ²⁴	Political life:	A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Meaningfulness	Externalised : theorist; citizen/ spectator Doing (-)
Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution (2002)	Paul Friedland History	Theatricality: Revolutionary politics engages in strategies designed to produce particular effects on spectators. Politics in the French Revolution was both dramatic and theatrical. 'Theatricality ... describes the conscious staging of an event for the purposes of producing a particular effect, the intentional grafting of theatrical elements onto "real" life. The speeches of Mirabeau, for example, or the festivals of the Terror are theatrical in the sense that they are carefully scripted, choreographed, and performed, leaving little to spontaneity'. ²⁵	History	A constructed art	Strategies of direction, presentation and performance Affective action Purposefulness Meaningfulness Retrospectivity Causality	Externalised : historian Internal: citizens Doing (-)
'The Political Scene and the	Bob Jessop Sociology	Performativity: Politics occurs before spectators, who it must woo for support. This generates strategies designed to do this. A	Political life	A constructed art A relation between	Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : theorist

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Politics of Representation: Periodizing Class Struggle and the State in The Eighteenth Brumaire ' (2002)		consideration of Marx's The Eighteenth Brumaire which itself uses theatre metaphors, and describes Marx's use of language as 'performative', and politics as taking place on a 'political stage on which leading political forces appeal for support from multiple audiences', creating problems 'for political choreography'. ²⁶		actor and spectator	presentation and performance Purposefulness	Doing (-)
'Spectacular metaphors: from theatre to cinema' (2002)	Thomaz Wood Jr. Organization Studies	Dramatism/Dramaturgy. Organizations must consider how they are seen by others; they undertake strategies designed to manage the impression they make. ' The theatre metaphor constitutes an attractive system of ideas for studying organizational phenomena '. Apart from the sense that life is like theatre, 'as an analytical approach, the theatre metaphor can provide tools for exploring social encounters, and can distinguish form, content, structure, significance and grammar. Such tools help to systemize the study of ... events and to place the observer in a different relation to the subject of the study '. Although some might see this as one of the flaws of the metaphor, Wood embraces it enthusiastically, despite it being 'millenarian'. Nevertheless, in the society of spectacle, as described by Debord, he wants to argue for the metaphor to be extended into a 'cinema metaphor'. Although the cinema metaphor would incorporate all the elements of the theatre metaphor, it would add additional elements to do with the way cinema creates mise-en-scene rather than merely scene , and take account of the editing process in the management of meaning'. ²⁷	Organization	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Watching (+/-)
'Bodies of Protest: performing citizenship at the 2000	Brett Neilson Media/ Cultural Studies	International sporting events provide opportunities to display changing attitudes before national and international spectators. New forms of citizenship are developing, especially in 'global' cities such as Sydney which mark a turn from rights based conceptions of citizenship to participatory or performative	Political and social life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: national and international

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Olympic Games' (2002)		notions staged before international media. Such citizenship was apparent during the Sydney Olympics particularly in the compromises Indigenous groups made with police and councils to combine protest with the avoidance of negative publicity. 'Sydney emerged as a site in which the transnational performance of citizenship was able to take place despite the most incessant celebration of national sports culture'. ²⁸ This was an example of a new kind of 'urban' expressive politics centred around citizenship as a performance directed at both national and transnational media.				spectators Doing/ Watching (+/-)
'National Theatre and Imagined Authenticities' (2002)	Alan Filewood Nationalism	Performance: Both theatre and politics are social formations in the real world. They are both 'structuring structures' which organize both practices and the perception of practices. Nationhood is enacted through theatre and vice versa: in the theatre 'performing bodies frequently play as metonyms of the national body'. The formal theatre 'at any given point encloses only that part of theatre culture that is understood as "art" in the imaginary of the moment'. ²⁹	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Structure Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : theorist Showing (+/-)
'Helping Hands: A Study of Altruistic Behavior' (2002)	Elizabeth Monk-Turner et al Sociologist	Role Theory. The idea of roles enables experimentation which tests traditional views of gendered behaviour. Patterned behaviour can be experimented with to challenge power. ³⁰	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategic action Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Freedom from consequences Causality	Externalised : theorist Doing (+/-)
'Advocating for a Social Roles Curriculum Framework at the Secondary School Level' (2002)	Wayne James and Carol Mullen Education	Role Theory: 'students need to be prepared for the various new social roles they will fill as adults, and ... secondary school curricula should be rethought along these lines'. Adulthood requires individuals to conform to norms and expectations of behaviour relating to their activities. Education should prepare them for this through role-play. ³¹	Education and socialisation	An acting space	Strategies of presentation and performance Subjectification Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Mobilising the Audience (2002)	Mark Balnaves, Tom O'Regan & Jason Sternberg Opinion polling	Increasingly, groups of people who are either watching something or to be the focus of surveillance and/or research are considered to be audiences. Telstra, for example, surveys what it sees as its 'target audience' for the introduction of digital television; newspapers survey 'target audiences' amongst potential readers; museums research 'target audiences' to find ways to increase museum visitation. 'We are watching someone watching. We are measuring him, arraying him, inspecting him. To be an audience is to watch and be watched.' ³² It is also apparently to consent to be watched, although it is unclear whether demographic surveys make this clear to the targets of their research, and it also appears to mean to be passive under scrutiny. People are gathered together as specified groups of people who are to be the recipient of some service, and then treated as spectators, while being observed by unseen spectators.	Social and political life	A seeing-place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Surveillance Manipulation Strategic action	Externalised : theorists; 'audiences' Internal: researchers, surveyors Watching (+/-)
'Strategy as Improvisational Theatre' (2002)	R.M. Kanter Management Studies	Organizational life can be innovative like improvisational theatre; or laggard, like traditional theatre. Kanter distinguishes between 'pace-setter' and 'laggard' companies, using theatre as a model to locate the differences between innovative and non-innovative companies in relation to Internet uptake. Pace-setters behave according to an 'improvisational model' of theatre which 'throws out the script, brings in the audience, and trusts the actors to be unpredictable – that is, to innovate. [This] shifts attention from the dynamics among members of a project team to the way in which an organization as a whole can become and arena for staging experiments that can transform the overall strategy'. ³³ Laggards, on the other hand, operate according to a 'traditional' model of theatre: the play is pre-written; roles are allocated and rehearsed in a predictable process. ³⁴	Organisation	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Objectification Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
2003: Iraq War begins. The United States and its allies attack Iraq and depose its leader.
2003: Georgia's Rose Revolution: peaceful overthrow of the government (came under threat from Russia in 2008)
"Thinking the	Stanley Smits	Role Theory. The idea of roles as a concept enables analysis of	Organization	A constructed art	Retrospectivity	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Unthinkable” – Leadership’s Role in Creating Behavioral Readiness for Crisis Management’ (2003)	& Nivee Ezzat Ally Organisation theorists	crisis management effectiveness. Leaders during a crisis engage in strategies designed to change people’s behaviour so that they can act more effectively under stress. ³⁵			Strategic action Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	: theorist Internal: others in the organization Doing (+/-)
‘Social Concepts and Judgments: A Semantic Differential Analysis of the Concepts Feminist, Man and Woman’ (2003)	David Pierce, R.A. Sydie, Rainer Stratkotter and C. Krull Social Psychology	Role theory. Social life sets up norms and expectations of patterned behaviour. Gender can be considered in terms of role which can then be explored in terms of semantics. ³⁶	Social life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Structure Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : scientist/ Theorist Internal: presumably the male gaze Internalised: the self-conscious woman Doing (-)
‘Jurisdictional disputes over professional work: the institutionalization of the global knowledge expert’ (2003)	M. Covaleski, M.W. Dirsmith and L. Rittenberg Organization Theory	Dramaturgy. Institutions involve conflict management. Exchange relations between public accounting firms are seen as dramaturgical (based on the evidence of conflict in these exchanges). This allows an analysis of how ‘competing factions seek to re-institutionalize societal expectations of proper professional behavior to legitimate a transformation of jurisdictions’. ³⁷	Organization	A constructed art	Strategic action Conflict management Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : analysts Doing (+/-)
‘Are men universally	David Schmitt	Role Theory. Use of Role theory to consider gender differences in specific behaviour across cultures. Social life sets up norms	Social life	A seeing-place (implied)	Objectification: Strategies of	Externalised : scientist/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
more dismissing than women? Gender differences in romantic attachment across cultural regions' (2003)	Social Psychology	and expectations of patterned behaviour. ³⁸		An acting space A constructed art	presentation Purposefulness Causality Retrospectivity	theorist Doing (-)
'Governing Incorporates the Press and Vice versa: The President's Secret Flight to Baghdad' (2003)	Jay Rosen Journalism	Politics occurs before spectators and is therefore concerned with image which puts it into a complicit relationship with the media. Politics is theatre; smart politics is also theatre because mass politics necessarily involves publicity and the use of symbols. We have known this since 1919. Publicity means that power is limited , surely a desirable thing. Yet the typical media response to political publicity and symbolic events is either an infantile negative (mere theatre) or positive (clever theatre). Both ignore the part the media plays in publicity, including its complicity. The media is an essential player, one which is involved in constructing publicity and political theatre, yet it pretends to be a critical spectator. We need a 'grown-up language' to talk about this complicity, one which recognizes that images have a reality as well. ³⁹	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Manipulation Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality	Externalised : theorist Internal: deluded consumers of political images; supposedly critical media Doing/ Showing (-)
'The Democrats have made the right call' (2003)	Sid Spindler Politician	Political life is increasingly mediated which means politicians have to engage in strategies designed to attract media attention if they wish to affect citizen/spectators. Good political work and achievement goes unacknowledged unless there is some kind of theatrical angle. Political parties have to realise that 'politics is theatre, at least in part ... if you want to cut through to the electorate'. Media events have to be created in order to attract media and therefore, electorate attention. ⁴⁰	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification: Strategies of presentation Manipulation Purposefulness Possibility of deception	Externalised : the media Internal: politician; citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
'The innocence	Tim Wallace	Political activists can be manipulated to meet a different agenda.	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
of student protesters – they can't see their puppet strings' (2003)	Politics	A 'Books not bombs' rally of school students in March 2003 had a welcome innocence and, although exuberant, was largely peaceful. However, groups which were not interested in either peace or innocence were amongst the crowd and were attempting to sign the students up to more radical (adult) left-wing protest which at heart was not peaceful – epitomised by the wearing of Che Guavara t-shirts and the promotion of ill-informed histories. Wallace is concerned that these militant (adult) groups were trying to turn participants in a 'civic' demonstration into militants. ⁴¹			direction and presentation Manipulation Deterministic Causality	: journalist Doing (-)
Media and the Restyling of Politics (2003)	John Corner & Dick Pels Political Communication	Politics communicates using strategies designed to be affective. The 'baser' dimension of political communication 'admits affect, body language, "looks", dress code, and other stage props of political performance'. ⁴² This is a legitimate area of political communication.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and performance Affective action Manipulation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : media and communication theorist Doing/ Showing (-)
'The Spectacle of Detention: Theatre, Poetry and Imagery in the Contest over Identity, Security and Responsibility in Contemporary Australia' (2003)	Prem Kumar Rajaram Politics	Performance: Both power and resistance can use spectacle as a strategy; this necessarily sets up a relationship between political actors and spectators. Rajaram proposes to use theatrical performance as a metaphor for a discussion of the way spectacle is used by both the Australian state and refugees in order to express their views. The theatre, however, is all on the side of the state: 'The performance of refugee identity creates a spectacle, a theatre of cruelty, inanity, absurdity and violence designed for the consumption of a public [the electorate] identified and cohered by the spectacle itself'. However, this tactic clearly doesn't work for the state because two can play at the same game, and refugees too engage in a similar theatre to counter the state's assertions. Rajaram also uses the theatre metaphor in his writing: his first sub-heading is 'Setting the stage'. However, the metaphor is not really suitable and he drops it after page 9. By the end of the	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of direction and presentation Strategic action Purposefulness Meaningfulness Causality Structure Possibility of deception Conflict management	Externalised : political theorist Internal; the public Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		article, there is no mention of theatre or performance. The article in fact is strong enough without the metaphor, as he realised. Theatre is a distancing device, but so too is spectacle and surveillance, and Rajaram makes the important point that regimes which choose to use surveillance as a form of control must reduce what they are to control to an image. This reduction is not an act of theatre but ‘an act or offshoot of surveillance and the desire to control within strategies of surveillance’. ⁴³ If anything, what he describes is a battle over spectatorship in which the watched respond by challenging the watcher using their bodies. Performance then is not about theatre but about assertion .
‘Refugee theatre: absurd and ugly’ (2003)	Editorial The Sydney Morning Herald 7 th November	Political posturing can reflect badly on a government. Australia’s treatment of refugees is theatrical and dramatic ‘posturing’ and is not only unjustified but it is ugly. These ‘theatricals’ should be brought to an end. ⁴⁴	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Judgment	Internal: journalist Showing (-)
The Audience and the Playwright: How to get the most out of live theatre (2003)	Mayo Simon American playwright	Role Theory: to demonstrate how the playwright creates an audience from a group of disparate people, and what that audience can expect. Audiences have a role to play. This role is constructed by the playwright. If he does his job well, audiences get to play detective, make commitments to characters, anticipate what will and/or should happen, fear or hope for those consequences, expect certain things and either get them or be satisfied with the playwright’s substitutions. In this way, an audience is created by the playwright during the course of the play, from the disparate and eclectic spectators who turn up for the show. The playwright can do this because of certain shared capacities (memory, anticipation, the desire to understand) as well as shared beliefs and customs. ⁴⁵	Cultural life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Subjectification Purposefulness	Internal: practicing playwright; theatre-goers Doing/ Watching (+)
‘Theater of the Absurd’ (2003)	George Wehrfritz & B.J. Lee	The metaphor is used to express a concern for the consequences of ‘too much democracy’: ‘South Korean politics can be a theater of the absurd’ in that its democratic system allows for sudden	Political life	A constructed art	Visibility Objectivity Critique	Externalised : political journalists

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Political Journalists	changes in political alignment where lawmakers switch sides 'like nobody's business'. ⁴⁶ Sudden changes in political alignments are difficult to comprehend and suggest a relationship between political actors and citizens which is too dynamic for stability.				for American media Doing (-)

¹ Godard, Barbara. 2000. 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context'. Modern Drama 43 (Fall) pp. 327-358.

² Rowe, David 2000, 'Global Media Events and the Positioning of Presence', Media International Australia incorporating Culture and Policy, 97: 11-21.

³ Zhao, Dingxin 2000, 'State-society relations and the discourses and activities of the 1989 Beijing student movement', American Journal of Sociology Vol 105(6) 2000, pp. 1592-1632; cited in Ku, Agnes S. 2004. 'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power, Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations'. The China Quarterly pp. 647-664. 648.

⁴ Ku 2004: 648

⁵ Greenfield, Cathy, and Peter Williams. 2000. 'The sporting gamble: Media sport, drama and politics'. MIA (Media International Australia) 97.

⁶ Parker-Oliver, Debra. 2000. 'The social construction of the "dying role" and the hospice drama'. Omega – The Journal of Death and Dying 40 (4).493

⁷ Schauble, John. 2000. 'Wooden performances in courts owe more to theatre than the law'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 14th October 2000.

⁸ Cronin, Bruce. 2001. 'The Paradox of Hegemony: America's Ambiguous Relationship with the United Nations'. European Journal of International Relations 7 (1) pp. 103-131.103

⁹ Oswick et al 2001, 'Dramatizing and organizing: acting and being', Journal of Organisational Change Management, 14 (3): 214-218

¹⁰ Harvey, Arlene. 2001. 'A dramaturgical analysis of charismatic leader discourse'. Journal of Organizational Change Management 14 (3) pp. 253-265. Cited in Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe 2003.

¹¹ Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2)

¹² Kärreman, D. 2001, 'The Scripted Organization ...', R. Westwood and S. Linstead (eds) 2001, The Language of Organization, London, Sage Publications; 90; cited in Boje et al 2003.

¹³ Bartels, Klaus. 1993. 'The Box of Digital Images: The World as Computer Theater'. Diogenes 163 pp. 45-70.48

¹⁴ Boje et al 2003

¹⁵ Boje, David M. 2001. 'Leadership Theater Event': http://cbae.nmsu.edu/~dboje/388/leadership_theatre_event.htm accessed 24 July 2005.

¹⁶ Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe 2003

¹⁷ McKenzie, Jon. 2001. Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance. London, New York: Routledge.142, 194

¹⁸ McKenzie 2001: 4

¹⁹ Pilkington, Lionel. 2001. Theatre and State in Twentieth-Century Ireland: Cultivating the People. London: Routledge.86

²⁰ Vickers, Margaret, and Alexander Kouzmin. 2001. 'Resilience' in Organizational Actors and Rearticulating 'Voice'. Public Management Review 3 (1) pp. 95-119.

-
- ²¹ Dolan, Jill. 2001. 'Rehearsing Democracy: Advocacy, Public Intellectuals, and Civic Engagement in Theatre and Performance Studies'. Theatre Topics 11 (1) pp. 1-17.1-2
- ²² Reinelt, Janelle. 2002. 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 201-215.213
- ²³ Jewkes, Yvonne. 2002. Captive Audience: Media, Masculinity and Power in Prison. Devon: Willan Publishing.187
- ²⁴ Meyer, T. 2002. Media Democracy: How the Media Colonise Politics. Cambridge: Polity.32-3
- ²⁵ Friedland, Paul. 2002. Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press.301n4
- ²⁶ Jessop, Bob. 2003. The Political Scene and the Politics of Representation: Periodizing Class Struggle and the State in The Eighteenth Brumaire Department of Sociology, Lancaster University, www.comp.lancs.ac.uk/sociology/papers/Jessop-Political-Scene.pdf, 2002 [cited December 2003].
- ²⁷ Wood, Thomaz, Jr., 2002. 'Spectacular metaphors: from theatre to cinema'. Journal of Organizational Change Management 15 (1) pp. 11-20.11-18
- ²⁸ Neilson, Brett. 2002. 'Bodies of Protest: performing citizenship at the 2000 Olympic Games'. Continuum: Journal of Media and Cultural Studies 16 (1) pp. 13-25.24
- ²⁹ Filewood, Alan. 2002. 'National Theatre and Imagined Authenticities'. In Performing Canada: The Nation Enacted in the Imagines Theatre. Kamloops: University College of the Cariboo <http://www.canadianshakespeares.ca/multimedia/pdf/imagined-authenticities.pdf> accessed 24/07/2005.
- ³⁰ Monk-Turner, E. et al 2002, 'Helping Hands: A Study of Altruistic Behavior', Gender Issues, Vol 20 (4), 2002.
- ³¹ James, Wayne, and Carol Mullen. 2002. 'Advocating for a Social Roles Curriculum Framework at the Secondary School Level'. Educational Studies 28 (2) pp. 193-208.193
- ³² Balnaves, Mark, and Tom O'Regan. 2002. 'Introduction'. In Mobilising the Audience, edited by M. Balnaves, T. O'Regan and J. Sternberg. St Lucia: University of Queensland Press, pp. 1-9.9
- ³³ Kanter, R.M. 2002, 'Strategy as Improvisational Theatre', MIT Sloan Management Review 43(2), pp. 76-81, 76
- ³⁴ Crozier, Michael 2004, 'Theatres of innovation: Political communication and contemporary public policy', p. 14. Refereed paper presented to the Australasian Political Studies Association Conference, University of Adelaide, 29 September-1 October 2004.
- ³⁵ Smits, S. And Ally, N.E. 2003, "'Thinking the Unthinkable" – Leadership's Role in Creating Behavioral Readiness for Crisis Management', Competitiveness Review, Vol 13(1), 2003, pp. 1-24.
- ³⁶ Pierce, David, R.A. Sydie, Rainer Stratkotter, and C. Kroll. 2003. 'Social Concepts and Judgments: A Semantic Differential Analysis of the Concepts Feminist, Man and Woman'. Psychology of Women Quarterly 27 (4) pp. 338-347.
- ³⁷ Covalski, M., Dirsmith, M. And Rittenberg, L. 2003, 'Jurisdictional disputes over professional work: the institutionalization of the global knowledge expert', Accounting Organizations and Society, Vol 28(4), 2003, pp. 323-355. 323
- ³⁸ Schmitt, David. 2003. 'Are men universally more dismissing than women? Gender differences in romantic attachment across sixty-two cultural regions'. Personal Relationships 10 (3) pp. 307-332.
- ³⁹ Rosen, Jay. 2003. 'Governing Incorporates the Press and Vice Versa: The President's Secret Flight to Baghdad'. In PressThink http://journalism.nyu.edu/pubzone/weblogs/pressthink/2003/12/03/bush_trip.html accessed 23/05/2006.
- ⁴⁰ Spindler, Sid 2003, 'The Democrats have made the right call', The Age, 12th December 2003; available on <http://www.theage.com.au/articles/2003/12/12/1071125654390.html> accessed 26/04/2006.
- ⁴¹ Wallace, Tim. 2003. 'The innocence of student protesters - they can't see their puppet strings'. On Line Opinion March 31 www.onlineopinion.com.au accessed March 2003.
- ⁴² Corner, John and Pels, Dick (eds) 2003, Media and the Restyling of Politics, Sage.3

⁴³ Rajaram, Prem Kumar. 2003. 'The Spectacle of Detention: Theatre, Poetry and Imagery in the Contest over Identity, Security and Responsibility in Contemporary Australia'. Asia Research Institute Working Paper Series No 7 (August) www.ari.nus.edu.sg.6.

⁴⁴ Editorial. 2003. 'Refugee theatre: absurd and ugly'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 7 November.

⁴⁵ Simon, Mayo. 2003. The Audience and the Playwright: How to get the most out of live theatre. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.

⁴⁶ Wehrfritz & Lee 2003: 57

Table 16/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator: 2004-2006

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
2004: Ukraine's Orange Revolution: another overthrow of power with little violence Although dramaturgy and role theory seem to lose some of their pull from this period on, it is not because they are seen as misleading. Rather their explanatory power becomes absorbed into the concepts of theatricality and, particularly, performance and its derivative performativity as attention to the impact of the media and its technologies grows. In 1989, Blau complained about 'the bewildering plenitude of performance' which saw theatre everywhere. The 'valorization of play in the postmodern' has led us to take 'with considerable seriousness the theatrical notion that all the space of the world is a stage. All this does is 'thin theatre out, so that it has had to learn again how to be theatre, in the right proportions with performance'. What we lose is any possibility of performance being exemplary partly because we have lost the ability to discriminate between what is performance and what is not.¹ This table generally does not include literature on performance per se unless it is specifically tied to theatre metaphorically (for example through its link with dramaturgy), partly because of what Blau complains about – the sheer abundance of material using performance, in any number of ways often with nothing to do with theatre.²
'Imagining the fan community' (2004)	Liesbet van Zoonen	'[F]an communities and political constituencies bear crucial similarities' which allows celebrities to represent their fans politically. ³	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Convention Subjectification	Externalised : theorist; Internal: citizen/ Spectator Doing (+)
'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation (2004)	John Street Politics and Media	Performance: Political actors must pay attention to appearance and engage in strategies of representation to do this, which gives representation an aesthetic quality: 'A politician engages in a performance ... that involves demeanour and posture, voice and appearance. Political representation is thus close to the 'realm of show business'. It is 'an art', one which 'draws on the skills and resources which define mass-mediated popular culture'. '[T]he process of discrimination must acknowledge the aesthetic character of the representative relationship, in which notions of 'authenticity' or 'credibility', style and attractiveness, are legitimate terms'. The '[a]doption of the trappings of popular celebrity is not a trivial gesture ... but instead lies at the heart of the notion of political representation'. ⁴	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist; Internal: citizens Doing (+)
'Honeymoons and Joint	Maximilian Szinovacz	Role Theory. Use of Role theory: Social life involves patterned behaviour according to norms and expectations which are	Social life	A constructed art A relationship	Strategic action Strategies of	Externalised : scientist/

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Lunches: Effects of Retirement and Spouse's Employment on Depressive Symptoms' (2004)	and Adam Davey Social psychology	interactive and historical in nature and therefore must be renegotiated through life. Humans inhabit roles. When these roles disappear or are relinquished, other roles have to change. This can produce depression in those who do not wish to relinquish their existing roles to accommodate a new one taken up by those around them. ⁵		between actor and spectator	presentation Holism Coherence Intersubjectivity Causality	theorist Doing (+/-)
'Sex Differences in Technical Communication: A Perspective from Social Role Theory' (2004) ⁶	Isabelle Thompson Social Communication	Role Theory: Social life involves patterned behaviour according to norms and expectations which can generate stereotyping. '[S]ex differences are enculturated through experiences associated with social positions [roles] in the family and the workplace' in the same way that theatre can stereotype characters. ⁷ This can explain why males and females approach technical communication differently. [The excerpt quoted uses 'position' as a synonym for 'role', suggesting that the concept of role might not be necessary for the explanation of the behaviour observed. A conceptualisation of position might do just as well].	Social life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Convention Determinism Causality Intersubjectivity	Externalised : scientist/ theorist Doing (+/-)
'Role Enhancement or Role Strain?' (2004)	Philip Rozario, James Hinterlong and Nancy Morrow-Howell Gerontology	Role Theory. Social life involves patterned behaviour according to norms and expectations which can both positive and negative effects. Humans occupy roles which can have either positive or negative effects. '[P]roductive roles may have a positive effect on older caregivers'. ⁸	Social life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : scientist/ theorist Doing (+/-)
'From dramaturgy to theatre as technology: the case of corporate	T. Clark and I. Mangham Management Studies	Impression Management. Organizations use strategies of 'deflection' to draw attention to certain aspects of their activities while hiding others. In the case of 'corporate theatre', theatre is no longer seen as 'a resource, an ontology or a metaphor but as a technology '. ⁹ Corporate theatre involves 'the deployment by an organization of dramatists, actors, directors, set designers,	Organization	A constructed art	Objectification: to describe strategies of presentation aimed at deception	Externalised : analyst Internal: spectators of the organization

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
theatre' (2004)		lighting specialists and musicians to put on performances in front of audiences' in order to 'promote the views of a particular group within an organization' and 'contain reflection'. (Clark and Mangham seem to see this as something new, but historical accounts of monarchy indicate that theatre has always been seen as a technology of 'anaesthetizing audience reaction' by powerful organizations keen to deflect criticism or dissent).				Doing/ Showing (-)
Metaphorical World Politics (2004)	Francis A. Beer & Christ'l De Landtsheer Rhetoric and Politics	Dramaturgy/Dramatism: Both political life and theory engages in signifying activities which position their spectators in particular ways and for particular ends. A book about the use of metaphors by politics which itself uses the theatre metaphor, and a mistaken view of Kenneth Burke's dramatism as dramaturgy . Politics occurs 'on the world stage'. Metaphors 'are critical components of the way we speak and hear, write and read about politics'. ¹⁰ Dramatistic metaphors are aimed at an audience, while scientific metaphors are aimed at naming and definition. ¹¹ New metaphors are recognized because of their novelty. Old metaphors become 'easy to swallow without chewing' – and become part of ideology. Metaphors taken from drama 'offer a significant way of understanding politics'. ¹² 'Working journalists' derive their 'who, what, where, when, why and how' from the dramatistic metaphor [which may be news to journalists!]. ¹³ The dramatistic metaphor is about what is visible, in order to makes guesses about what is not. Metaphors 'characterize political actors'. Audiences 'actively participate in constructing political discourse ... the audience is incorporated into the chosen metaphor'. ¹⁴ Metaphors reassure audiences, suggest issues are simple (comforting), redescribe situations for different effect and introduce ambiguity as a way of reducing stress. ¹⁵	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness Causality Signification Affective action	Externalised : analyst Internal: spectators of politics Doing/ Showing/ Watching (+)
'The Revolution on	Michael E. McClellan	Historical documents can indicate changes in the way activities in the past were viewed. For example, changes in the program for a	History	A seeing-place (implied)	Strategies of presentation	Externalised : the

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Stage: Opera and Politics in France 1789-1800' (2004); 'Staging the Revolution' (2005)	Political History	production at the Théâtre Feydeau reflect structural changes at the theatre, which in turn reflect changes in attitudes towards audiences. ¹⁶ Historical documents (such as those from the French Revolution) also reveal that 'individuals felt themselves to be actors in the great events of the day' while those events constitute 'a grand historical spectacle' for us. ¹⁷		A constructed art	Purposefulness Causality	historian; later generations Internal: targets of documents Showing (+)
'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power, Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations' (2004)	Agnes S. Ku Political Science	Dramaturgy: Politics uses strategies such as pre-planning scripts to try and control events, and therefore can be analysed as a form of theatre. Use of dramaturgy to 'delineate the negotiated space of civil autonomy in post-hand-over Hong Kong'. The Government faced with a campaign of civil disobedience 'made a series of political and performative acts to re-script the drama'. Dramaturgy is defined as 'a distinctive understanding of political action as staged and performative practices, which engage meaning with the public through scripting, role-enactment and other, accompanying symbolic expressions'. ¹⁸ Ku uses dramaturgy as a model for analysis, as a metaphor, and as a description: both the state and the protest movement are said to use dramaturgy – one to upset and the other to restore civil order. Her account is problematic in this respect, for it collapses observation, description and analysis.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness Causality Conflict management	Externalised : analyst Doing (+/-)
'Playing a part: the impact of youth theatre on young people's personal and social development' (2004)	Jenny Hughes & Karen Wilson Theatre studies	Role Theory; Performativity: engaging in patterned behaviour in experimental environments has positive effects on participants Participation in 'youth theatre' – activities which draw on theatre (role play and performativity) – contributes positively to young people's personal and social development. ¹⁹	Social interaction	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and performance Freedom from consequences Causality	Externalised : theorist Doing (+)
'No claptrap –	Catharine	Competencies are displayed in public and in competition.	Social and	A seeing-place	Visibility	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
the truth about cappucino courses' (2004)	Lumby Cultural/ Media Studies	Australians 'compete on the global stage'. For this they need an education which encourages them to think critically, '[d]o some real research first. And put reason ahead of emotion'. ²⁰	political life	(implied) An acting space A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	: comment- ator Doing (+/-)
'Heaven forbid we let reality into politics' (2004)	Kath Kenny Journalist	Political life is aimed at order. To argue for the injection of 'a bit of colour and an element of surprise' to enliven established politics and news reporting. A comment on a segment on a popular television programme called 'Vote for Me' in which viewers vote to 'choose a candidate to stand as an Independent for the federal upper house'. Politicians and journalists were against the show because both like 'a predictable script'. ²¹	Political life	A constructed art	Strategic action Predictability Backward causation Conflict management Convention	Externalised : journalist Doing/ Watching (+)
'Desperate for some great stories' (2004)	Sophie Masson Australian writer	Fads come and go; each sets up the conditions for the next one. Publishing goes through 'fads'. With a 'loss of faith' in literary fiction 'the stage was set for a new scene', the rise of non-fiction and biography as offering something 'authentic'. ²²	Cultural and intellectual life	An acting space A constructed art	Structure Strategies of presentation	Internal: writer of fiction Doing (+/-)
'Theatres of innovation: Political communication and contemporary public policy' (2004)	Michael Crozier Political Science	Argues for the use of the theatre metaphor as a way of exploring innovation in public policy making, drawing on Kanter (2001; 2002). Policy-making has moved beyond the technical-rational expertise model and now must take into account a performative and symbolic dimension. Kanter's use of theatre as a model indicates that theatre can be a useful way of dealing with this: 'The new mode of communicative expertise trades in a form of knowledge production that is simultaneously strategic and symbolic'. ²³	Public governance	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance	External: analyst Doing (+)
'After the struggle, time to sing' (2005)	Stephanie Bunbury Arts journalist	A nation's politics comes under international scrutiny and therefore involves strategies of impression-management. Countries act on 'the world stage'. They can be banned from this stage if they practice particular kinds of politics (e.g. apartheid). (In a reversal of the metaphor, performers can be 'ambassadors' for their countries). ²⁴	Political life	An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation and performance Convention Purposefulness Judgment	Externalised : comment- ator Doing/ Showing (+/-)
The Media and Political	P. Eric Louw Political	Political communication uses strategies to reach and affect citizens and to manage impressions. Politics is a 'communicative	Political life	A seeing-place (implied)	Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : comment-

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Process (2005)	communication	art'; it has become 'show business' in which celebrity politicians must be good actors. The political world is a kind of theatre. There are five 'sets' of players , four on stage or out front (politicians, the spin industry , media workers, their audiences) and one 'back-stage': policy makers. The three on-stage sets produce a 'smoke-and-mirrors show' for their spectators, while the policy-makers, under cover of the show, do what they like. Although spectators are both plural and players in this conception, Louw does not devote any attention to them. They are in fact not players, but passive and susceptible recipients chained to their seats like the prisoners in Plato's cave parable. They do not seem to do anything but observe a constant parade of flickering images (the construction of which Louw wants journalists to take more responsibility) with which they are apparently perfectly happy, albeit deluded. Politicians are the stars (political insiders); aided and abetted by the stage crew or minor roles (' informed spectators'). Both pull the wool over the spectators' eyes in a show of 'impression-management'. Louw's aim is exposition and critique: to enlighten others regarding the constructed nature of what is taken to be reality by both audiences and players. In particular, to encourage 'skeptical thinking' in one group within one set of players : journalists; more generally, to encourage sceptical thinking and the recognition of the constructed nature of media reporting. ²⁵		An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	presentation Purposefulness Possibility of deception Structure Strategic action Manipulation	ator Externalised : theorist who somehow is not susceptible to the show Internal: informed spectators; deluded citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
'Abortion politics are not for the faint-hearted' (2005)	John Warhurst Political theorist/ activist	Impression Management: Political life occurs under scrutiny and therefore allows strategies to manage impressions, Parliament is theatre; conscience votes allow MP's 'to play to a constituency' to create the impression that they are doing something. ²⁶	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation Possibility of deception Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist/ comment- ator Internal: deluded constituents Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'Learning Political Theory by Role Playing' (2005)	Andrew Schaap Political education	Role Theory. Political life involves understandings of patterned behaviour which can be learnt in ways which help contextualise them. Role playing can promote a 'deep-holistic' approach to learning, including learning about politics. ²⁷	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Stock parts Purposefulness Holism Causality	Externalised : teacher Internal: students watching each other perform roles Doing (+)
'Performing Transcendence in Politics: Sovereignty, Deviance, and the Void of Meaning' (2005)	Bernhard Giesen Political Theory	Performance: Political life involves a concern with impression-management. Public figures perform their authority; this is the origin of their charisma. Different kinds of leaders are 'staged' in different ways: '[t]he democratic leader is staged as the ideal commoner purged of all vices and passions, with small loveable handicaps, not too smart and certainly not flamboyant'. ²⁸ Sovereignty is a concept designed to transcend death/mortality. This transcendence must be staged to be effective.	Political life	An acting space A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation and performance Strategic action Purposefulness	Externalised : theorist Internal: deluded citizens/faithful Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific' (2005)	Christopher Balme History; anthropology	Theatricality: Theatre metaphors are used by both participants and historians of historical events and can operate as a mode of power. Balme uses theatre metaphors to describe the encounters between Europeans and Tahitians in C18th, partly because Bougainville himself used theatrical metaphors, and partly because he sees descriptions of scenes theatrically. Balme wants to argue that theatricality is more than a mere metaphor as contemporary uses in sociology, cultural anthropology and media studies seem to have it, it is a mode of perception. Things described as theatrical are not in themselves theatrical 'but rather are rendered such by a combination of aesthetic conventions and discursive practices' intersecting theatre as an institution and art form (Balme 2005). This construction of theatricality was a fundamental part of the turn to the visual in Europe in the C18th	History	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Objectification Appropriation	Externalised : theorist; explorer/coloniser Watching (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		when the idea of theatrical encompassed at least three modes: metaphorical (phenomena were theatrical because of their ‘extreme concentration and focus’, like drama); perceptual (the privileging of the visual) and normative (theatricality was ‘a moral and/or epistemological problem’ because of the possibility of deception and duplicity. Theatricality was thought to be ‘second-hand’ perception. Following Denning, Balme sees the beach as ‘a theatrical place’ in Pacific history, however none of the material he quotes from either Bougainville’s or Cook’s voyages use theatrical terms, although there may be evidence of composition. Nevertheless, he argues that theatricality ‘designates a particularly Western style of thought’ which sees the other (women, Asia, the colonized world) as a ‘closed field’ which ‘reduces and defines it, rendering it observable’. Theatricality is therefore a mode of power which acts as a ‘form of containment and circumscription, ‘the essential perceptual prerequisites for power and control’. ²⁹ Accounts of the voyages combined all three modes of theatrical perception which were a feature of C18th.
“‘The Greatest Show on Earth’: Political Spectacle, Spectacular Politics, and the American Pacific’ (2005)	Margaret Werry Theatre Studies	Political life uses spectacle as a ‘machine of circulation’ for ideological positions. Theatre as a metaphor is appropriative. It ‘imaginatively encloses geographical space, surveys and determines the movements, the qualities, the value, the very fates of its inhabitants’ in ways which make it useful to imperial and military operations. However, analyses of this appropriation come to overlook the theatre itself as a site of symbolic experience and therefore cannot account for the circulation of such experiences. Theatre as an art form acts globally as ‘a machine of circulation’. This is most apparent in political spectacles which use theatre techniques to produce symbolic representations precisely for this circulation. ³⁰	Political life	A constructed art	Visibility Strategic action Strategies of presentation Appropriation Signification	Externalised : analyst Internal: manipulated but not necessarily deluded spectators of political spectacle Watching (-)
‘Setting the	M.A. Hajer	Dramaturgy. Policy making involves strategy. There is a	Political life	A constructed art	Strategic action	Externalised

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Stage: A Dramaturgy of Policy Deliberation' (2005); 'Performing Authority: Discursive Politics After the Assassination of Theo Van Gogh'(2008) ³¹	Public Policy Analysis	'performative dimension' in participation in policy making. Policy deliberation occurs in a setting which affects 'what is said, what can be said, and what can be said with influence'. ³² A dramaturgical perspective which views these settings as 'staged' can highlight these effects. Dramaturgical analysis reveals 'how' something is said, and the setting in which it is said. Aim: to 'open[] up the possibility of much more sensitive and subtle, and hence potentially much more effective, ways of dealing with the tensions inherent in governing fragmented societies'. ³³			Strategies of performance Purposefulness Causality	: analyst Doing (+/-)
'The Theatre of Measurement' (2005)	Steven Brown Sociology	Theorists place themselves outside the phenomena they wish to describe. A consideration of the work of Michel Serres to sociology which uses the theatre metaphor to describe Serres approach to science: to 'read culture 'scientifically' and read science 'culturally', ³⁴ in a way which draws attention to the way man has come to place himself 'outside the scene'. Brown aims to encompass the range of Serres' work and give some sense of its value: 'Serres offers ... an exemplary model for how to think across borderlines'. ³⁵	Intellectual life	A seeing-place (implied) A relationship between actor and spectator	Objectification Detachment Appropriation	Externalised : theorist/ analyst Watching (+)
'1851-1877: November 1857: Constructing a Senate Theater' (2005)	U.S. Senate Political debate	Political life politics occurs in public spaces structured for seeing. The U.S. Senate chamber was originally designed using theatre principles, and, until 1866, was also used for theatrical performances. Since then descriptions of the proceedings in the chamber as 'high drama, low comedy, soaring oratory, play-acting , and staged colloquies' have been metaphorical. ³⁶	Political life	A seeing-place An acting space A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Structure Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : historians Internal: citizens Doing/ Showing (-)
'Acting presidential – The dramaturgy of Bush versus	Robert E. Brown Political Commun-	Dramaturgy/Dramatism: Political communication is widely perceived 'as a theatrical and symbolic domain', and therefore is ideally suited to analysis using 'the dramaturgical (or in Kenneth Burke's term, dramatistic) perspective on the self and society'. ³⁸	Political life	A seeing-place	Visibility Strategies of presentation and performance	Externalised : analyst Internal: citizens

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Kerry' (2005) ³⁷	ication	[Brown collapses the two together]. 'The metaphors of theatre, stage, acting, and audience offer political communication theorists a useful way of assessing the behavior of political candidates and their partisan loyalists and voting constituencies. Dramaturgy views the social world as a theatre where actors play multiple roles to create and express their identity and construct a self'. ³⁹ Communication under dramaturgy becomes 'purposeful and strategic' and requires 'competency' in impression creation and management. A presidential campaign can be seen to subject candidates to the kind of scrutiny of performance engaged in by theatre spectators. As a consequences, they play roles: 'resident Bush and Senator Kerry played a variety of parts on a number of stages, vying for the affection and votes of their audiences. Both candidates sought to construct their identities as credibly "presidential"'. The dramaturgical perspective reveals 'the contradiction of appearance by reality' and 'social life as risky business'. ⁴⁰			Stock parts Purposefulness Risky	Internalised: political candidate Showing (+/-)
'Democratic Acts: Theatre of Public Trials' (2005)	Lucy Winner Theatre and Performance Education	Dramaturgy: Participant-observation is like being an actor in a play because it requires distance as well as involvement; democratic politics requires action. Thinking of social institutions and practices as theatre can allow them to be studied and their function in society to be analysed. Dramaturgy also offers participant-observers a language in which to describe what they are seeing/participating in. Democracy is performative – this is what is meant when citizens are urged to be active; democracy can be performed anywhere in multiple ways, including acting as a juror at a trial. What this reveals is that [the metaphor] allows an activity to be framed so that the different layers of spectators can be distinguished. ⁴¹ [A problematic discussion which confuses performance and theatre and empathy and sympathy and in the end uses theatrical language because she is a theatrical practitioner].	Political life	A constructed art	Distance, Objectification Strategies of performance Strategic action Purposefulness	Externalised : analyst Internal: participant/ observer Doing (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
'Power play hurts the nation's health' (2006)	Scott Davies Political adviser; company executive	Political debates are structured for dramatic effect. They are theatre; they set up villains and heroes. ⁴²	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Affective action Manipulation Reductionism Purposefulness	Externalised : critic Internal: interested spectator; deluded masses Doing/ Showing (-)
'Colourful characters take centre stage' (2006)	Richard Zachariah Journalist	Judicial inquiries encourage participants to engage in strategies of impression management The metaphor is used to describe how theatricality was being used for deception; 'theatre at the track' prevented the inquiry from establishing the truth. Inquiries into racing irregularities are 'pure theatre'. The Chief Steward was 'the leading star' who 'might as well be Marcel Marceau'. ⁴³	Judicial processes	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Possibility of deception	Externalised : observer Showing (-)
'Backstage at the Crisis' (2006)	Richard Wolffe Journalist	Politics, like theatre is a complex of strategies, some of which are unseen. 'Bush places a secure call to Jordan's King Abdullah II as Rice and Hadley listen in' (article includes photograph of this event). International relations is a strategic process which requires hidden planning. The players in international relations engage in complex strategies and planning 'behind the scenes'. ⁴⁴	Political life	An acting space A constructed art	Strategic action, Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : critic Internal: those engaged in international politics Doing (+/-)
'The war is over: now to proceed on our terms' (2006)	Paul Sheehan Journalist and commentator	Politics is a strategic process which may or may not be successful. 'Yet while the Bush Administration may have stuck to bin Laden's script, his primary audience, the Muslim world, has not'. ⁴⁵ International relations is a strategic process in which some elements co-operate and others do not.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of direction and presentation Retrospective causation Risky	Externalised : observer Doing (+/-)
'Hatred of Bush misses broader point about this	Michael Gawenda Journalist	Politics uses spectacle for effect; the way strategists frame this can determine how they tackle the problem it entails. The September 11 attacks on the World Trade Centre in America had	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : observer Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
war of ideas' (2006)		been described by an observer 'as a piece of theatrical terrorism'. Terrorism could be seen as theatre, aimed at spectacle for effect. Describing terrorism as theatre should produce different strategies for tackling it than if it is described as an act of war. ⁴⁶		A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategic action Affective action	targets of the spectacle Showing (+)
'Power plays: obfuscating on thin ice' (2006)	H. Cunningham Small Business	Parochialism by unions can destroy the businesses which employ them: 'Don't workers realise that we are on a world stage now and our workers have outpriced themselves?' Workers need to be positioned in relation to the operating conditions of businesses. ⁴⁷	Organization	An acting space	Visibility Strategies of performance Perspective	Internal: owner commenting on workers Doing (+/-)
'Rights of Non-humans? Electronic Agents and Animals as New Actors in Politics and Law' (2006)	Gunther Teubner Law	Personification can apply to other aspects of life as a strategy of identification: 'Personification of non-humans is best understood as a strategy of dealing with the uncertainty about the identity of the other ... Personifying other non-humans is a social reality today and a political necessity for the future. The admission of actors does not take place ... into one and only one collective. Rather, the properties of new actors differ according to the multiplicity of different sites of the political ecology'. ⁴⁸	Political and legal life	A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Stock parts Genre	Externalised : theorist Internal: humans Doing (+)
'Towards a General Theory of Political Representation' (2006)	Andrew Rehfeld Political analysis	Political representation entails a relationship with spectators and is affected by the nature of particular groups of spectators. Rehfeld questions the validity of traditional conceptions of political representation, which are generally tied to democracy. Global politics, in particular, features 'nondemocratic "representatives" [who] increasingly act on the global stage' as representatives of their nondemocratic states or organizations. Instead of theorising representation in terms of democracy, we should think of it in terms of 'a relevant audience accepting a person as such'. Democratic 'audiences' will produce democratically selected representatives. Non-democratic 'audiences' will produce non-democratically selected representatives. This is because 'political representation, per se , is not a democratic phenomenon at all'. ⁴⁹	Political Theory	A seeing-place (implied) An acting space A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation	Externalised : theorist Internal: those who are being represented Doing/ Showing (+)
'Election	Andrew	Politics engages in conscious signification during election	Political life	A seeing-place	Visibility	Internal:

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
imagery matters' (2006)	Parker Public Relations	campaigning. Politics 'is theatre'. Increasingly, during election campaigns, 'visual images matter more than modern campaigning' – the right tie, the right backdrop, the symmetrically placed flags. ⁵⁰		(implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation	campaign manager; constituents Showing (-)
'Transformative Approaches to Social Organization Project – Notes and Commentary' (2006)	Union of International Associations Social Organization	Organizational life involves the metaphoric framing of situations to assist negotiation as well as strategies to prepare for and manage encounters. The theatre metaphor entails specific kinds of strategies. This project looks at the use of metaphors in the development of creative solutions to social organization. One such metaphor is the theatre metaphor. Conferences are or ought to be 'scripted' and often rehearsed. The media uses dramatic principles to present 'policy dramatics'. And we use dramatic principles to assess the performance of policy makers. Representatives are 'cast' to as to represent particular views or because they can engage in 'improvisation'. UIA also argues that Western culture has forgotten 'the art of dancing' as a way of negotiation. ⁵¹	Organization	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : analysts, theorists Doing (-)
Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance and Philosophy (2006)	David Krasner American theatre theorist and teacher & David Saltz American philosopher of theatre	Philosophy, like theatre is a place of unconcealment. A collection of essays attempting to bridge the disciplines of theatre and philosophy, based on 'the critical link [of] the act of seeing. Observing events, actions, responses, gestures, and behaviors, along with hearing sounds, voices, tones, and rhythms, brings us closer to understanding the realities that underlie surface appearances'. Both theatre and philosophy are 'inexorably joined by an "unconcealment process"'. The aim of the book is to 'provoke an active exchange of ideas about theater and philosophy' similar to a Platonic dialogue. ⁵² The focus, however, is almost entirely on performance studies, and theatricality is assumed to be a simple grammatical extension of theatrical and linked to theatre , despite the recognition of the roots of both theatre and theory in thea : i.e. the spectatorship of the theorist is not called into question. The book is generally underpinned by	Intellectual life	A seeing-place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Revelatory	Externalised : philosophical analysis Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		the binary appearance/reality, and operates on the assumption that there is a reality which is behind appearances and which it is the job of both theatre and philosophy to bring out.
'Staging Equality' (2006)	Peter Hallward	Political theory: to point out the connections Rancière makes between politics and theatre. A discussion of Rancière's conception of equality as disorder. For Rancière, 'Politics is a masquerade without foundation, the performance of an anti-nature'. ⁵³ Hallward believes such a politics, based on the idea of improvisational theatre, and which denies questions of organization and decision and downplays knowledge, 'risks confinement to the 'unsubstantial kingdom of the imagination''. ⁵⁴	Intellectual life	An acting space	The possibility of deception	Externalised : philosophical analysis Doing (-)
'Review' (2006)	Howard Brick	Historical conditions set up future possibilities: 'The expansion of consumer culture and the primacy of individual choice that reputedly marked the course of life in the United States after 1945 ... set the stage for new concepts of personal freedom'. ⁵⁵	History	An acting space	Convention Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : reviewer/ Historian Doing (+/-)
'Politics as theatre: an alternative view of the rationalities of power' (2006)	David Apter Pragmatic Phenomenology	Politics and theatre share 'tropes and mechanisms, plot, script, performance, staging, and rules for making visible the tensed relationships of roles' but success for political theatre will crucially depend on 'converting the audience into the play itself'. Then 'all life is on stage and all politics display – the drama becoming meaning- full ' although to whom is a puzzle if everyone is on stage. There are two basic kinds of 'political theatre': 'from above and represented by the state' and 'from below in oppositional social and political movements'. Both can have a variety of different goals but all 'politics as theatre ... takes the form of dramatic personas engaging in gladiatorial conflicts, the chief actors ... serving as surrogates for the political entities they represent ... Or they may stand for violent and subterranean acts ... most political theatre consists of high jousting with more than an occasional murder in the cathedral. Whatever its ingredients ... political theatre is performance and its general objects are more or less the same, the taking, keeping,	Politics	A performance space	Strategies of staging Manipulation	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		and exercise of political power ... Politics as theatre is a free-standing element in the creation of political power'. Apter considered the revolution in Iran to be 'pure theatre' in the way it set up 'cleavages' between 'insiders' and 'outsiders, the pure against the pariahs'. He saw Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush as 'sideshow barkers' and leaders who hung on to power as 'Learean tragedy'. Any kind of space can be made to serve; political theatre can be like any of the theatre genres but 'a good deal of political theatre is comedy'. ⁵⁶

¹ Blau, Herbert. 1989. 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play'. In By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, edited by R. Schechner and W. Appel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272.265-271.

² Performance and performativity are discussed at length in Chapter  of this thesis.

³ Van Zoonen, Liesbet. 2004. 'Imagining the Fan Democracy'. European Journal of Communication 19 (1) pp. 39-52.49

⁴ Street, John. 2004. 'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation'. BJPIR 6 pp. 435-452.446-9

⁵ Szinovacz, Maximilian and Davey, Adam 2004, 'Honeymoons and Joint Lunches: Effects of Retirement and Spouse's Employment on Depressive Symptoms', Journals of Gerontology Series B: Psychological Sciences and Social Sciences, Vol 59B (5), 2004, p. 233ff.

⁶ In Journal of Technical Writing and Communication, Vol 34(3), pp. 217-233.

⁷ Thompson, Isabelle. 2004. 'Sex Differences and Technical Communication: A Perspective from Social Role Theory'. Journal of Technical Writing and Communication 34 (3) pp. 217-233.217

⁸ Rozario, Philip, James Hunterlong, and Nancy Marrow-Howell. 2004. 'Role Enhancement or Role Strain'. Research on Aging 26 (4) pp. 413-429.413

⁹ Clark, T. And Mangham, I. 2004, 'From dramaturgy to theatre as technology: the case of corporate theatre', Journal of Management Studies, Vol 41(1), 2004, pp. 37-59.37

¹⁰ Beer, Francis A., and Christ'l De Landtsheer, eds. 2004. Metaphorical World Politics. East Lansing, Michigan: Michigan State University Press. ix

¹¹ Beer and De Landtsheer 2004: 8

¹² Beer and De Landtsheer 2004: 13-16

¹³ Beer and De Landtsheer 2004: 45n56

¹⁴ Beer and De Landtsheer 2004:22-4

¹⁵ Beer and De Landtsheer 2004: 29

¹⁶ McClellan, Michael E. 2004. 'The Revolution on Stage: Opera and Politics in France, 1789-1800'. Harold White Fellowship Paper: National Library of Australia <http://www.nla.gov.au/grants/haroldwhite/papers/mcclellan.html> accessed 29 May 2007.

-
- ¹⁷ McClellan, Michael E. 2005. 'Staging the Revolution: Traces of Theatrical Culture in French Revolutionary Pamphlets'. NLA News, May 2005 National Library of Australia <http://www.nla.gov.au/pub/nlanews/2005/may05/article4.htm>; accessed 28 May 2007. McClellan also discusses the changing views of spectators in this article.
- ¹⁸ Ku, Agnes S. 2004. 'Negotiating the Space of Civil Autonomy in Hong Kong: Power, Discourses and Dramaturgical Representations'. The China Quarterly pp. 647-664.647-8
- ¹⁹ Hughes, Jenny and Wilson, Karen 2004, 'Playing a part: the impact of youth theatre on young people's personal and social development', Research in Drama Education, Vol 9(1) 2004, pp. 57-73.
- ²⁰ Lumby, Catharine. 2004. 'No claptrap - the truth about cappuccino courses'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 5 February 2004, p. 11.
- ²¹ Kenny, Kath. Ibid. 'Heaven forbid we let reality into politics'.
- ²² Masson, Sophie 2004, 'Desperate for some great stories', Sydney Morning Herald 26 July, 2004, p. 11.
- ²³ Crozier, Michael 2004, 'Theatres of innovation: Political communication and contemporary public policy', p. 14. Refereed paper presented to the Australasian Political Studies Association Conference, University of Adelaide, 29 September-1 October 2004.
- ²⁴ Bunbury, Stephanie 2005, 'After the struggle, time to sing', The Sydney Morning Herald 6-7 August, 2005, pp. 34-5.34
- ²⁵ Louw, P. Eric. 2005. The Media and Political Process. London, Thousand Oaks, New Delhi: Sage Publications.182
- ²⁶ Warhurst, John. 2005. 'Abortion politics are not for the faint-hearted'. Canberra Times, 25th November.
- ²⁷ Schaap, Andrew 2005, 'Learning Political Theory by Role Playing', Politics, Vol 25(1) 2005, pp. 46-52.
- ²⁸ Giesen, Bernhard. 2005. 'Performing Transcendence in Politics: Sovereignty, Deviance, and the Void of Meaning'. Sociological Theory 23 (3) pp. 275-285. 275-278
- ²⁹ Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.
- ³⁰ Werry, Margaret. 2005. "'The Greatest Show on Earth": Political Spectacle, Spectacular Politics, and the American Pacific'. Theatre Journal 57 (3) pp. 355-382.
- ³¹ Published respectively in Administration and Society, Vol 36(6), 2005, pp. 624-647 and, with Justus Uttermark, in Public Administration 86(1), pp. 5-19.
- ³² Hajer, Maarten. 2005. 'Setting the Stage: A Dramaturgy of Policy Deliberation'. Administration and Society 36 (6) pp. 624-647.624
- ³³ Hajer, Maarten, and Justus Uttermark. 2008. 'Performing Authority: Discursive Politics After the Assassination of Theo Van Gogh'. Public Administration 86 (1) pp. 5-19.6, 18.
- ³⁴ Brown, Steven D. 2005a. 'The Theatre of Measurement: Michel Serres'. The Sociological Review 53 (s1) pp. 215-227.217
- ³⁵ Brown 2005: 226
- ³⁶ Senate, U.S. Historical Minute Essay 1851-1877: November 1857: Constructing a Senate Theater U.S. Senate www.senate.gov/artandhistory, 2005 [cited 12/06/2005]. Available from http://www.senate.gov/artandhistory/minute/Constructing_A_Senate_Theater.htm.
- ³⁷ Published in American Behavioral Scientist 49(1), pp. 78-91.
- ³⁸ Brown, Robert. 2005b. 'Acting presidential – The dramaturgy of Bush versus Kerry'. American Behavioral Scientist 49 (1) pp. 78-91.78
- ³⁹ Brown 2005: 79
- ⁴⁰ Brown 2005: 81-3
- ⁴¹ Winner, Lucy. 2005. 'Democratic Acts: Theatre of Public Trials'. Theatre Topics 15 (2) pp. 149-169.
- ⁴² Davies, Scott 2006, 'Power play hurts the nation's health', The Australian 5th January 2006.
- ⁴³ Zachariah, Richard. 2006. 'Colourful characters take centre stage; Theatre at the Track'. The Sunday Telegraph July 2, pp. 47-48.

-
- ⁴⁴ Wolfe, Richard 2006, 'Backstage at the Crisis', 'Newsweek', The Bulletin, 1 August, 2006, pp. 38-40.
- ⁴⁵ Sheehan, Paul. 2006. 'The war is over: now to proceed on our terms'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 11th September, p.11,.
- ⁴⁶ Gawenda, Michael. Ibid. 'Hatred of Bush misses broader point about this war of ideas'. 11th September, p. 11.
- ⁴⁷ Cunningham, H. 2009, 'Power plays: obfuscating on thin ice', Letter to the Editor, The Bulletin Vol 124 (6529), 18 July, 2006, p. 7.
- ⁴⁸ Teubner, Gunther. 2006. 'Rights of Non-humans? Electronic Agents and Animals as New Actors in Politics and Law'. Journal of Law and Society 33 (4) pp. 497ff.
- ⁴⁹ Rehfeld, Andrew. 2006. 'Towards a General Theory of Political Representation'. The Journal of Politics 68 (1) pp. 1-21.1
- ⁵⁰ Parker, Andrew 2006, 'Election imagery matters', New Matilda, Tuesday 28 September 2004, accessed 23/05/2006.
- ⁵¹ Union of International Associations (UIA). 1994. 'Governance Through Metaphor Project'. In Encyclopedia of World Problems and Human Potential. Brussels: Union of International Associations (UIA) <http://www.uia.org/metaphor/metacom.php> accessed May 2006.
- ⁵² Krasner, David, and David Saltz. 2006. 'Introduction'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 1-15.3
- ⁵³ Hallward, Peter. 2006. 'Staging Equality'. New Left Review 37 (January-February).
- ⁵⁴ Hallward 2006 quoting Schiller On the Aesthetic Education of Man
- ⁵⁵ Brick 2006: 518. A review of the book The Theater is in the Street: Politics and Public Performance in Sixties America by Bradford Martin 2004, Amherst, University of Massachusetts Press; in American Historical Review April 2006, pp. 518-519.
- ⁵⁶ Apter, David. 2006. 'Politics as theatre: an alternative view of the rationalities of power'. In Social Performance: Symbolic Action, Cultural Pragmatics and Ritual, edited by J. C. Alexander, B. Giesen and J. Mast. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 218-256.222-4

Table 17/17: The theatre metaphor and its relationship to the spectator –2007-2010

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
Wars: at June 2009, 29 wars were going on in South America, the Middle East, Central Asia, the Pacific region and Africa.
‘Politics: Learning from his opponent’ (2007)	David Burchell Journalist	Political actors project particular kinds of personas. Politicians perform in different kinds of dramas, which raises the possibility of being able to analyse and predict the outcome of political struggle. Latham, in his attempt to ‘reshape the times by sheer force of political will’ was like ‘some kind of Greek hero’ and was felled by the gods in ‘the best Homeric fashion’. Rudd ‘is performing in a completely different human drama’, one in which he is less the heroic figure than the ‘shrewd and patient ... observer’. ¹	Political life	A constructed art	Genre Strategies of presentation Purposefulness Backwards causation Stock parts Reductionism Risky	Externalised : comment-ator Doing (-)
‘David Marr and Anthony Gunn’ (2007)	David Marr Journalist	Marr uses the metaphor to plead for a civilised form of politics in which we ‘start playing the ball and not the person’. Politics is becoming like theatre, with ‘staged brawls’ in which people are ‘being slammed for their characters, for their motive, for their links, for their antecedents but not for what they’re actually saying [when it is] much more use ... to look at the arguments and what’s actually being said’. Marr went on to point out in relation to the public’s lack of interest in politics that ‘we all know what we do with bad theatre. We don’t go’. ² Politics engages in strategies which are designed to generate conflict or deflect attention. When these become particularly banal, the public loses interest in politics.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Conflict management Strategic action Manipulation	Externalised : comment-ator Internal: bored citizens Doing (-)
‘Terrorism as a Strategy’ (2007)	Lawrence Freedman Political Policy	Strategies against enemies are based on ‘assessments of the target’s character’. ³ This is seen in simplistic terms, like a character in a play. It paints both sides into a corner in which the only exit is through the dramatic narrative which has been invoked. Strategic narratives directed towards enemies are simplistic and polarising, reducing the range of actions which can be taken.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Strategic action Reductionism Simplification Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Showing (-)
‘It’s just a stage’ (2007)	Linda Lorenza	The metaphor is used as a strategy to assist students preparing for examination. The Higher School Certificate examination is just	Educational life	A seeing-place (implied)	Self-awareness Strategies of	Externalised : adviser

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	Australian drama educator	like a performance on stage. Examiners are the audience. ⁴		An acting place	performance	Internal: examiners Internalised: reflexive student Doing (+/-)
'A retail opera sung in castrato' (2007)	Stuart Washington Economic journalism	Business take-over deals are as melodramatic as an Italian opera. Private equity takeover bids have been 'castrated' by a sudden loss of funds. These 'castrati' have left the stage, leaving an aggressive [i.e. not castrated] corporate takeover bid by Wesfarmers as the only remaining performer in a process which seems to have had all the melodrama of an Italian opera. ⁵ Washington draws attention to the precarious foundations of private equity take-over bids, their vulnerability to loss of funds, and the subsequent dramatic 'rushing for the exits'. ⁶	Economic life	An acting place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Genre Strategies of performance Simplification Histrionic	Externalised : journalist Doing (-)
'The rhetoric of public diplomacy and propaganda wars: A view from self-presentation theory' (2007)	Ben D. Mor Political Science/ International Relations	Impression Management. Diplomacy is concerned with image and impression management, and this can be theorised using dramaturgical theory: '[P]ublic diplomacy is a form of self-presentation' and the use of techniques of 'impression management' or strategies of appearance would help to find a better way of theorizing public diplomacy in relation to propaganda. ⁷	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation Causality	Externalised : theorist/analyst Doing (+/-)
'Lunch with Les Murray' (2007)	Les Murray Australian poet	Death is a performance. Serious, almost fatal illness can be a preparation: 'I've had my rehearsal, I know how to die now'. ⁸ The functionalist expression of a stoic, fatalistic view of life in which painful events are seen as a preparation for death.	The human condition	An acting place A constructed art	Strategies of performance Purposefulness Practiced	Internal: individual Doing (+)
'Blowback the sequel: harder, faster' (2007)	Waleed Aly Lecturer in Global Terrorism	Politics engages in goal-oriented strategies but cannot control the outcome (unlike theatre). Afghanistan was supposed to have been 'a theatre of Western political success' but had laid the ground for future terrorism by providing a training group for militants. ⁹	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art A relationship	Strategic action Risky	Externalised : academic observer, theorist Showing (-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
				between actor and spectator
'Mayors play theatre of the absurd' (2007)	Dave Stewart Publishing	World-wide, city mayors seem to be engaged in 'a bizarrely deep strain of political comedy ... the bigger the city, the odder the mayor'. They presented 'surreal performances' which were like a 'political monkey show'. Stewart speculates that this may be because 'our jaded tastes' require such behaviour to attract our attention. On the other hand, it may be an indication that 'who is the mayor doesn't matter much'. ¹⁰	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art	Strategies of presentation	Externalised : comment-ator Internal: city inhabitants Doing (-)
'Principles abandoned for the sake of power – please explain' (2007)	Andrew Russell (Letter to the Editor)	Modern electoral politics involves strategies by hidden actors designed to impose a win at all costs agenda on political actors in the public eye. It was a theatre in which 'corrupt machinations' went on 'behind the scenes'. Currently, this theatre appeared to have an agenda of 'forcing otherwise honourable people into making statements that go against their basic principles' for electoral advantage. ¹¹	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and direction Possibility of deception Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : observer, Internal: concerned citizen Doing (-)
'Taste of democracy in the course of village life' (2007)	John Garnaut Journalist	Democratic political campaigning involves a relationship between politician and public which can be to the public's advantage: 'Rural Chinese are now familiar with the public theatre of election campaigns' since Peng Zhen, 'one of the "eight immortals" of the Chinese revolution' insisted on the setting up and extension of "grassroots democracy" in selected Chinese villages. ¹² These villages showed significant improvements to their quality of life compared to villages which did not have democratic elections.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation	Externalised : journalist/observer Doing (+)
'Insider out' (2007) ¹³	Guy Pearce Ministerial Adviser and Lobbyist	Impressions of unity in political life are the result of strenuous strategic efforts which are generally hidden from the public eye: 'I had so many backstage passes to the farce [of the Prime Minister 'rolling' his cabinet over the Kyoto protocol and climate change]... I got into a position to understand the policy a whole lot better than 99% of Liberal party members'. ¹⁴ To recount events during which the Prime Minister shaped greenhouse	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Duplicity Manipulation Direction by unseen forces	Externalised : adviser/lobbyist and writer (Internal: 'backstage' worker)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		policy often against his own party. 'Pearse says he was driven to write [his book] High and Dry because of his concern for the environment'. ¹⁵				Watching (-)
Essay (2007)	Mark Latham (Former Australian Labor Party leader)	Politics engages in the manufacture of crises for electoral advantage and the achievement of power. The modern Labor Party was now only concerned about self-preservation, and participated in manufacturing crises for political gain: 'We have reached the zenith of policy convergence in Australian public life. Everything else is just play-acting, a bit of media melodrama to keep the public entertained. Australia is having a Seinfeld election, a show about nothing'. Modern politics was about pretence aimed at achieving and maintaining political power. ¹⁶	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of direction and presentation Purposefulness Manipulative Deceptive Reductionist	Externalised : [disaffected] observer Internal: the public Doing (-)
'The machine in the shadows' (2007)	Paul Sheehan Journalist	Politics involves the manipulation of appearance for electoral advantage. There is 'a great deal of play-acting' in politics however, there still remains 'a deep schism' between the Government and the Opposition. The extent of this schism is being disguised by the Labor left by 'an iron discipline, and a patient silence'. ¹⁷ Modern politics is about pretence nevertheless there are real difference between left and right.	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and direction Manipulation Possibility of deception Pretence	Externalised : journalist Doing (-)
'Lost in translation' (2007)	Richard Woolcott Australian Diplomat	Political life occurs under scrutiny and mistakes can be costly: 'On the world stage, an innocent linguistic faux pas can turn a courteous politician into a court jester'. ¹⁸	Political life	A seeing place An acting place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Risky	Internal: diplomat commenting on the business of diplomacy Doing (-)
'Jedi Master Costello to coach mystery successor' (2007)	Phillip Coorey Political Commentator	Political life involves strategies for the support and management of leadership in order to achieve power. The Coalition election campaign launch will 'star' John Howard and Peter Costello. Costello 'will do the warm-up act'. Costello will, like Howard, 'tutor his replacement' [as yet unnamed]. Consequently, '[t]he team you see on the stage today is not the team that will be there	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art	Strategic action Strategies of presentation and direction Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : comment-ator; Internal: deluded masses

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		in three years'. ¹⁹				Doing (-)
'Performance testing: dissection of a consumerist experiment' (2007)	Alexandre Mallard Social scientist	Performance: the market is a manipulated setting; aware consumerists are 'actors' who reveal this manipulation to other consumers. Consumerist groups (actors) carry out performance testing of items based on actual use - and thereby provide an alternative form of consumerism which leads to a disengagement from the market (through the separation of choice from purchase and a recognition of the device of the ' mis-en-scene ' used by producers to encourage purchase) with the possibility of a re-engagement with politics through the activities of these organizations. ²⁰	Economic life	An acting place A constructed art	Strategic action Manipulation	Externalised : theorist/ comment- ator; aware consumers Internal: deluded consumer Doing/ Showing (+/-)
'Talking the talk' (2007) ²¹	John Lehmann Editor of The Bulletin	Political behaviour at public events can provide insight into divisions and conflict within a party. During the APEC summit, 'the Labor leader jumped onto the world stage to show off his Mandarin skills Instead of allowing the PM to use the APEC forum as a stage to showcase his leadership, some MPs gave in to panic' and raised the leadership issue again. ²² Politicians' responses at major events are revealing.	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategic action Strategies of presentation and direction Purposefulness Risky	Externalised : journalist Doing (+/-)
'The Last Hurrah' (2007); 'Turnbull in a china shop' (2009)	Paul Daley National Affairs Editor, The Bulletin	Political behaviour at public events can provide insight into divisions and conflict within a government: 'John Howard saw APEC as his moment of glory on the international stage'. ²³ Politicians use major events to highlight their success. Unfortunately, it can backfire. Party political life is dynamic and struggles over leadership can appear inexplicable. Commenting on the state of the Opposition, Daley claimed that '[t]hose who cringed as Alexander Downer's leadership self-immolated in a blaze of undergraduate comedy ... must have done a double-take at the Wodehouse farce that has engulfed Malcolm Turnbull's Liberals' especially with Peter Costello 'waiting in the wings'. ²⁴	Political life	An acting place A relationship between actor and spectator A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation and direction Strategic action Risky	Externalised : journalist Internal: disaffected citizens/ political actors Doing / Watching (+/-)
'Inside the machine'	Chris Hammer	Political actors prepare in advance for electoral contests. Electoral strategies take the form of a 'script': 'The major parties	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation and	Externalised : journalist

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
(2007) ²⁵	Political Correspondent	have had their election strategies locked in for months. When the PM pulls the trigger, it will be just a matter of sticking to the script'. Political parties prepare for elections and try to pre-determine events and control what politicians say.			direction Manipulative Predictable	Internal: deluded democratic citizens who think they can influence events Doing (-)
'Performing Governance: A Partnership Board Dramaturgy' (2007)	Tim Freeman and Edward Peck Public Policy	Dramaturgy: policy actors engages in strategies of performance and appearance in order to achieve their ends. ²⁶	Public life	A seeing-place A constructed art Strategies of appearance	Visibility Strategies of performance	Externalised : analyst Doing/Showing (+/-)
Judgment After Arendt (2007)	Max Deutscher Philosopher	The thinking self is pluralistic: thinking involves an imaginary split into actor and spectator so that the thinking person can be a being for others in the mind as they are in everyday life where we are both actors and spectators of ourselves and each other. According to Arendt, thinking is like having a conversation with the self in the mind. It is this 'inner imaginary theatre of discourse with oneself as with another interlocutor' which is 'a chief source of the tendency towards dualistic theories of mind and body'. ²⁷ In this sense the thinking mind mirrors the conditions of life in the 'world of appearances' in which one is always a 'being for others'. Thinking therefore also involves 'a plurality'. The mind 'maps' onto itself the conditions of existence in the world. 'I keep myself company' when I think'. ²⁸ It is this trick of duality which makes solitude, rather than loneliness, possible. ²⁹ 'Consciousness is a plurality, modelled on social conversation'. ³⁰ It is this plurality which prevents obsession, compulsiveness and fanaticism. Without it, there is no 'I' to keep	Intellectual life	A seeing-place An acting place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of performance Intersubjectivity	Externalised : analyst Doing/Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		an eye on me. Attempts to 'integrate' the self are mistaken. Plurality is a condition of human life, both their inner life and their external life.
Exit Right: The Unravelling of John Howard (2007)	Judith Brett Political theorist	'The Liberal leadership question had become a public spectacle somewhere between a Greek tragedy and a soap opera, played out in almost daily instalments on the 7.30 Report , Sky News and Lateline '. When Howard announced that he would retire after the next election, pollster Rod Cameron 'described it as "the worst performance from John Howard" he had ever seen. "People understand body language. It's as if he had to be dragged kicking and screaming into it." And then there was the stumbling, awkward syntax. Howard's speech is characteristically direct. On sensitive issues it is well rehearsed' but not on this occasion. ³¹ Brett sees this as further evidence that Howard's defeat was inevitable.	Political life	A seeing-place An acting place A constructed art	Visibility Genre Strategies of presentation Risky	Externalised : analyst Doing/ Showing (-)
'Life is Drama' (2008) ³²	Foxtel (Media)	Mediation allows individual lives to be constructed in dramatic terms and for other spectators. An interactive show on Foxtel's Hallmark channel. The show 'recounts six real life viewer's stories about courage and the extraordinary power of the human spirit'. Viewers with the appropriate technology can participate in a competition to choose the 'best' (most favoured) story. ³³	Social life	A seeing-place An acting place A relationship between actor and spectator	Visibility Strategies of presentation Affective action Intersubjectivity	Externalised : programmers; Internal: television viewers Showing/ Watching (+)
'Life is Drama' (2008)	Mindi Brinzo Keith Vanoskey Tommy Przybyla Bill Lechner Scott Drabek (band)	The production of music is a structured, refining process. 'Life is Drama' is a five person band committed to 'music that is powerfully refined, but not overly produced' (Life is Drama 2008). Their first CD, Symbols of Life , could be bought through their internet home page. ³⁴	Cultural life	A constructed art	Strategies of performance Purposefulness	Internal: songwriters and performers Doing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
‘Seeing Only the Prejudices of Others’ (2008)	Martin Leet Australian political commentator	Political debate is practiced and repeated and leaves nothing to chance. A critique of a form of criticism which does not engage with alternative views, but presents an overview ‘from [the] heights’. ‘Public debate is mostly routine and predictable. The protagonists rehearse well-developed positions and seem to be talking as much to themselves as to one another’. ³⁵	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Predictable	Externalised : critic Doing (-)
‘Blogging PhD Candidature: Revealing the Pedagogy’ (2008)	Mary-Helen Ward & Sandra West Education	Online teaching requires changes to models of teaching. Teachers in face to face teaching hold centre stage. However, online learning requires the teacher to ‘move from their position as the ‘sage on the stage’ to the ‘guide on the side’’. ³⁶	Educational life	An acting place A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Internal: teachers/ Academics Doing/ Watching (-)
‘New voices rework an old script’ (2008)	Joel Gibson Journalist	Historical documents are open to re-working like a play script brings new insights to old problems A report on The Brooklyn Project in which a group of young Australians were brought together at the same site 117 years after the first working group on federation met, to develop a new constitution for Australia. The group included people from Aboriginal as well as Muslim and other non-Christian backgrounds, and proposed a radical alternative constitution which called for Australia to become a republic and to develop a bill of rights, as well as a treaty with indigenous Australian. ³⁷ (Gibson 2008).	History	A constructed art	Strategic action Strategies of presentation Purposefulness	Externalised : reporter Doing (+)
‘Gotta love the guy – even caught in traffic eccentric Rees is looking terrific’ (2008)	David Dale Australian journalist	Political life requires political actors to consider their impact on spectators: ‘machine’ like men are unlikely to succeed in politics because they are not interesting to the public. Politics is theatre (soap opera and sometimes vaudeville) and politicians are or should be entertainers, which is why we value eccentricity in a politician: ‘If we are honest, we elect politicians to entertain us. Canberra and Macquarie Street are soap operas, sometimes overlapping with crime thrillers and screwball comedies’. ³⁸	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) An acting place A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	Strategies of performance Genre Reductionism Affective action	Externalised : journalist Internal: bemused citizen Doing/ Watching (-)
The Necessity of Theater (2008)	Paul Woodruff	We live under the gaze of others. Watching can be the basis of an ethics of care for others and ourselves. We can learn to watch	The human condition	A seeing-place An acting place	Visibility Subjectivity	Externalised :

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
	American philosopher and playwright	well by attending to theatre. There, professionals help us to learn to make things worth watching as well as to watch well by creating characters that we can care for. In caring for distant characters we come to some self-knowledge. Objectification in order to impart an ethics of care for others based on spectatorship. Subjectification- to come to know oneself through observing others and applying this technique to observing oneself. In that way care for ourselves is tied up with care for others, enabling a sense of community to develop, which in turn enables us to hold politics accountable. The key is witnessing. Witnessing is what binds us together. A defence of the ‘art’ of theatre as an art of watching and being watched, which Woodruff bases in an ethics of caring for others: ‘A good watcher knows how to care’.³⁹ Although presented as a theory of theatre, it is more a philosophy which draws on theatre to illustrate its claim that watching and being watched involve an ethics of care which is made up of four virtues: reverence, compassion, courage and justice: ‘Good watchers respond virtuously to whatever it is they watch’.⁴⁰ Watching is basically about ‘paying attention to’. Theatre is necessary to humans psychologically, socially, ethically and politically for this reason. It is psychologically necessary because we all need the attention of others to thrive. It is socially necessary because attention to others helps build social cohesion. It is ethically necessary because caring for others is a virtue, and may spur us to action on behalf of others (good watching entails knowing when to act and when not to). Finally it is politically necessary because it ensures accountability. Consequently, ‘Theater is a large part of our experience of real life ... human beings apply the art of theatre in every corner of their lives’⁴¹ because witnessing is an essential component of communal life. Watching is functional, but can be painful to those being watched. Good watching involves an ethics of care as		A relationship between actor and spectator	Intersubjectivity Strategies of performance Purposefulness	philosopher; theatre professionals Internal: everyone Doing/ Watching (+)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		well as acknowledging that both sides of a conflict can be right and that the path forward requires dialogue and compromise, something which political opponents forget, instead blaming voters for being fickle: ‘The wisdom of dialogue is part of the wisdom of democracy. In the theatre of politics, as in the theatre of Antigone and Creon, we are invited to take sides ... this is fine, as long as partisanship does not block dialogue and lead to violence’ – theatre shows us the consequences of this.⁴² We need to apply what we learn from theatre to politics to improve both the performance and the watching of politics. Theatre is necessary to our lives as humans and, according to Woodruff, since it ‘aims at something that is truly rewarding’ – making human action worth watching – if we don’t find theatre ‘beneficial’ we need to change our lives so that we do, or find a form of theatre which can be seen that way.⁴³ The onus is with the spectator to make themselves better watchers, for instance by making themselves better informed about the aims of the particular kind of theatre. The style of the book is patronising, addressed to a collective ‘we’ whenever ‘we’ do what he considers to be theatre, but to ‘you’ whenever we do something which he considers is not – such as go to the cinema – and when he is prescribing what he considers to be good practice. Good practice seems to be conservative and elitist. Typically, his understanding of theatre does not include popular or mass theatre such as ‘musical productions that ape film in their use of sound, montage, and illusion’ to which only ‘tourists ... flock to’.⁴⁴ But at the same time, he wants to argue that theatre is a very broad ‘cultural practice’ which encompasses Greek tragedy and American college football, ‘[w]eddings, funerals ... street dancing, church services’ because all are ‘powerful creators for community’. In other words, the point of the art of watching as a mechanism for developing care for others is to generate and

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		maintain a sense of community. Theatre is fundamental to achieving this. Theatre is basically anything where watching together is involved – except musical productions and film or TV: ‘Theater is immediate, its actions are present to participants and audience ... in the theatre you are part of a community of watchers, while in a cinema you are alone’.⁴⁵ It is apparently not possible to be part of a ‘community of watchers’ when watching a mediated spectacle – even if we think we are. Experiences such as gathering together in a bar to watch a sporting contest on television are ‘anomalies’ – not real theatre. Nevertheless, ‘[t]heater is the art by which human beings make or find human action worth watching, in a measured time and place’, usually by coming to care for the characters that are portrayed.⁴⁶ In this way we rehearse an ethics of care for others so that we can learn to practice this better way of watching in our everyday lives. The conditions for achieving this end fall on both performers and spectators: ‘[t]he art of theatre makes a pair of demands on us – for performers to present action to their audience, and for the audience to understand the behaviour that they see as arising from choice’.⁴⁷ Theatre thus described operates on a principle of human agency: characters/roles are assumed to choose their actions. These actions lead to consequences which are measured out and played out within the time period allocated – after which we all go home. Theatre is thus any finite activity in which the event portrayed is measured out in advance in order to maintain audience attention by ‘characters’ either real or imaginary. It is a specific form of theatre, one which involves humans as agents: ‘Theater is the art by which human beings make and find human action worth watching, in a measured time and place’, together.⁴⁸ Not so much that life is theatre but that theatre is an essential part of life, applicable to situations where watching others is involved. ‘Theater frames people and their actions in order to make them

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		more watchable ... Practice in framing human action as watchable helps us cultivate humaneness' and encourages us to act appropriately. ⁴⁹ It comes naturally to us to want to be watched but we have to learn to be good watchers, yet the key to community is good watching (a reversal of Plato, Aristotle and Abbé du Bos, who saw watching as natural and the basis of our learning). For Woodruff, both watching and being watched are arts because both can be done well or badly – which begs the question of why he called his book The Necessity of Theater when it is essentially about the art of watching.
'Sociology's Rediscovery of the Environment: Setting the Stage' (2009)	William Freudenburg Sociologist	The podium for a lecture is like a stage. An introductory speaker 'sets the stage' for the main speaker by outlining his accomplishments and interests and then 'exit[s] the stage as quietly and gracefully' as possible. ⁵⁰	Intellectual life	An acting place A constructed art	Strategies of presentation	Internal: other intellectuals Doing (+/-)
'Only joking' (2009)	Norman Abjorensen Political education; writer	Political life can involve reversals so that a party can seem to be acting against its long-standing ideology. Politics 'generates jokes' however current politics is 'topsy turvy'. Not only are jokes made about parliamentarians, but a Labor government is trying to save capitalism in the face of Liberal party objections: '[t]he stand-off between Kevin Rudd and Malcolm Turnbull has the vital element of farce: the juxtaposition of the incongruous'. ⁵¹	Political life	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Risky	Externalised : academic Doing (-)
'The Democratic Soup: Mixed Meanings of Political Representation in Governance Networks' (2009) ⁵²	Carolyn M. Hendriks Public Policy	Dramaturgy: Case studies of Dutch energy reforms show that 'representation is staged, performed and articulated' dramatically (Hendriks 2009: 689)	Political life	An acting space A seeing place	Strategic action Strategies of presentation	Externalised : analyst Doing/Showing (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
The Eyes of the People: Democracy in an Age of Spectatorship (2010)	Jeffrey Green Political Theorist	Most citizens in mass, mediated democracies experience political life as spectators; Spectatorship can be used as a principle of democratic government by using spectatorship as a power to require politicians to appear at the behest of spectators rather than at times of their own choosing. Objectification to remedy a short-coming of democratic theory and to reverse the power relations in such a way that the concept of popular power exercised by 'the People' can be realised under modern conditions of mediated politics. 'Democratic theorists, insofar as they are committed to the political lives of ordinary people [as they must be under the principle of equality] are not free to choose their protagonists, but must be guided in their selection by the nature of political experience available to everyday citizens ... being-ruled ... is too prevalent and permanent a form of citizenship in modern mass democracy for it to go unheeded within the dominant paradigms of democratic theory'. ⁵³ It is time to bring the citizen-being-ruled to centre stage as the central protagonist in democratic theory in order to redress the imbalance in normative democratic theory which privileges the citizen actor, in the face of the actuality that most citizens experience politics through their 'eyes'. This is not to argue that spectatorship is preferable to action. It is simply to recognize reality. It also isn't a lot to worry about since these spectators watch politics 'in solitude, in silence and ... seated'. They are in fact an audience for political performers. Green however wants to impose a 'principle of candor' on the performers so that they are obliged to perform at the behest of spectators rather than control the conditions of their own publicity. The audience then resembles that of a gladiatorial contest in which performers are summoned to 'appear on the public stage', ⁵⁴ wherever and whenever 'the People' choose, and can be dismissed for a poor performance. The kinds of institutional practices which allow the People to do this include	Political life	A seeing-place (implied) A relationship between actors and spectators	Visibility Strategies of performance Risky	Externalised : theorist Internal: citizens Doing/ Watching (+/-)

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		‘the press conference, the leadership debate, the public inquiry, and the British practice of question time’. ⁵⁵ Green however, backs away from the implications of this idea – this power of the People is a ‘negative’ ideal, one that can’t actually be realised because ‘the People’ don’t actually control these mechanisms. The important thing is that leaders do not control them either. A third source of power is used to generate the performance to be judged. Green nevertheless assumes that ‘the People’ pre-exist the performance in some way, which theatre theory brings into question. He also considers them ‘key actors in the play’. ⁵⁶ As in most uses of the metaphor, Green does not question his own position which allows him to observe all this.
‘All the world’s a stage ... and we are all merely downloaders’ (2010)	Rachel Olding Journalist	YouTube makes both actors and spectators of us all. Discusses the impact of YouTube, which ‘turns five this month’. YouTube allows users to ‘broadcast yourself’. It is the third most visited website after Google and Facebook. However, along with the ‘junk’ that makes up most of the material posted and parodies, YouTube has also become a political tool, used by politicians to connect with their constituents as well as by political dissidents seeking reform. The medium has been responsible for rallying reformists against election violence in Iran, and for capturing political racism. Virtually anything can be a topic for YouTube, and virtually anything can be seen on YouTube – hence the title of the article. ⁵⁷	Social and political life	An acting place	Strategies of presentation and performance Possibility of deception	Externalised : journalist Internal: users of media technology Doing (+)
‘Toward a Theory of Emotive Performance: With Lessons from How Politicians Do Anger’ (2010)	Kwai Hang No & Jeffrey Kidder Sociology	Dramaturgy + Performativity: the expression of emotion during social interaction is not necessarily a lack of control but may be an integral part of effective communication which is rational in nature. An extension of Goffman’s conception of the performed self away from the constraints of Role Theory in order to argue that emotion can be seen as both reflexive and communicative, and can therefore be incorporated into the performance of the self. This means emotion can be studied as a	Social interaction	A constructed art	Strategies of presentation Affective action Purposefulness Causality	Externalised : analyst Internal: media; media-watchers Internalised: the

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
		sociological phenomenon. Their case study of two political interviews in which politicians responded to questions with anger which they both directed and explained as they directed it reveals that emotions such as anger can either be instigated or at least harnessed as a resource in struggles over power in social interaction. This suggests that ‘distinctions between “emotional” and “rational” or “instrumental” and “expressive” have mistakenly displaced the wholeness of social interactions ... Emotive performances ... are reflexive acts that entail at once the expression of emotion and the justification of that expression’ to others within cultural bounds. ⁵⁸				performative and reflexive self Doing/ Showing (+/-)
‘Exit, Stage Right’ (2010)	Peter Brent Political Communication	Politicians sometimes need to help to manage their image. Politicians have often turned to acting training to help them manage public exposure, especially interviews. Some politicians have become strong actors in their particular ‘forte’. Opposition leader Tony Abbott recently declined acting training. Brent is in two minds about whether that was a good call. He needs some assistance in self-control. ⁵⁹	Political Life	An acting place A constructed art	Visibility Strategies of presentation Risky	Externalised : critic Internal: citizens Internalised: politician Doing/ Showing (+/-)
‘From operating theatre to political theatre’ (2010) ⁶⁰	Graeme Orr Politics	Political life involves negotiations in which individuals can be provoked into taking stances resembling protagonists in a drama. The federal system of government in Australia creates problems for the implementation of federal government policy because the agreement of the states is required. Not all states agreed to the Rudd government’s health plan. Although precedences existed to deal with this situation, conflict over the policy was reduced to a ‘politics of posturing’ in which two ‘he-man’ politicians engaged in a theatrical and ‘anti-political’ stoush for the moral high ground. ⁶¹	Political life	An acting place A constructed art	Strategic action Strategies of direction and presentation Manipulative Possibility of deception Conflict management Risky	Externalised : political commentator Internal: ‘grumpy’ electorate; other states Doing/ Showing (-)
‘Ashes to Ashes and the Theatre	Keith Sutherland	Politics has become increasingly mediated, with candidate image being manufactured for television consumption by passive	Political life	A seeing place (implied)	Visibility Strategies of	Externalised : political

Date And Title	Author	How The Metaphor Is Used	To Describe	What The Metaphor Offers	Which allows or expresses	Spectator & Focus
of Democracy' (2010)	Politics	'audiences'. 'We can no longer know who or what we're voting for. Politics and media conspire to deliver fictional candidates'. ⁶² Sutherland argues that we are currently in the grip of a form of representative democracy called 'audience democracy' ⁶³ in which voters are being asked to vote on the basis of candidate image which favours those with acting ability (Bill Clinton, Tony Blair) and the wherewithal to afford media consultants to help manufacture a suitable image: 'in the age of parliamentary democracy you knew who you were voting for; in the age of party democracy you knew what you were voting for; but in the age of postmodern 'audience' democracy you only find out after the final curtain has fallen ... Such are the perils of the age of audience democracy'. ⁶⁴		A constructed art A relationship between actor and spectator	presentation The possibility of deception	commentator Internal: voters as 'audience' Showing/ Watching (-)

¹ Burchell, David. 2007. 'Politics: Learning from his opponents'. Australian Policy Online 01.03.2007 www.apo.org.au.

² Fidler, Richard. 2007. 'David Marr and Anthony Gunn: a conversation'. In The Conversation Hour. Sydney: Australian Broadcasting Commission <http://www.abc.net/au/queensland/conversations/stories/s1950274.htm?sydney> 13th June.

³ Freedman, Lawrence. 2007. 'Terrorism as a Strategy'. Government and Opposition 42 (3) pp. 314-339. 324

⁴ Lorenza, Linda 2007, 'It's just a stage', 'The Official HSC Study Guide June 2007', The Sydney Morning Herald, 18 June 2007, p. 36.

⁵ Clearly, a good understanding of theatre is not necessary for the use of the metaphor. Washington does not seem to understand the term 'castrato' in relation to opera.

⁶ Washington, Stuart 2007, 'A retail opera sung in castrato', The Sydney Morning Herald Monday July 2, 2007, pp. 17-18.

⁷ Mor, Ben D. 2007, 'The rhetoric of public diplomacy and propaganda wars: A view from self-presentation theory', European Journal of Political Research, Vol 46 (5), pp. 661-683.661

⁸ Murray, Les 2007, 'Lunch with Les Murray' Interview with Juanita Phillips, The Bulletin 6 March 2007, pp. 32-34.32

⁹ Aly, Waleed. 2007. 'Blowback the sequel: harder, faster'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 15th October, p. 13.

¹⁰ Stewart, Dave 2007, 'Mayors play theatre of the absurd', The Sydney Morning Herald 15th October, 2007, p. 13.

¹¹ Russell, Andrew 2007, 'Principles abandoned for the sake of power – please explain', The Sydney Morning Herald 15th October, 2007, p. 13.

¹² Garnaut, John 2007, 'Taste of democracy in the course of village life', The Sydney Morning Herald 29th October 2007, p. 22.

¹³ An interview with journalist Chris Hammer in The Bulletin, July 10, 2007, pp. 14-15. It is disturbing to note that this comment by Pearse is rendered 'I had a backstage pass to the farce. I understood the policy a lot better than Liberal party members' as a sub-heading on page 14 of the article. Why not use the actual comment?

¹⁴ Hammer, Chris. 2007. 'Inside the machine'. The Bulletin, 9 October, pp. 18-20.

-
- ¹⁵ Hammer 2007: 14
- ¹⁶ Latham, Mark. 2007. 'Essay'. The Australian Financial Review, 9 November
- ¹⁷ Sheehan 2007, 'The machine in the shadows', The Sydney Morning Herald 12th November, 2007. p. 11.
- ¹⁸ Woolcott, Richard 2007, 'Lost in Translation', The Bulletin 4th September, 2007, pp. 29-32.
- ¹⁹ Coorey 2007, 'Jedi Master Costello to coach mystery successor', The Sydney Morning Herald 12th November 2007, p. 11.
- ²⁰ Mallard, Alexandre. 2007. 'Performance testing: dissection of a consumerist experiment'. The Sociological Review 2007 pp. 152-172.
- ²¹ In The Bulletin, 18 September 2007.
- ²² Lehmann, John. 2007. 'Talking the talk'. The Bulletin, September 18.
- ²³ Daley, Paul 2007, 'The Last Hurrah', The Bulletin, 18 September 2007, pp. 18-20.
- ²⁴ Daley, Paul. 2009. 'Turnbull in a china shop'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 22 February, p. 41.
- ²⁵ Hammer 2007: 18
- ²⁶ Freeman, Tim, and Edward Peck. 2007. 'Performing Governance: A Partnership Board Dramaturgy'. Public Administration 85 (4) pp. 907-929.
- ²⁷ Deutscher, Max. 2007. Judgment After Arendt. Aldershot and Burlington: Ashgate.23
- ²⁸ Deutscher 2007: 23
- ²⁹ Deutscher 2007: 45
- ³⁰ Deutscher 2007: 57
- ³¹ Brett, Judith. 2007. 'Exit Right: The Unravelling of John Howard'. Quarterly Essay 28 pp. 1-96.28-9
- ³² Programme listed in the Foxtel Entertainment Guide 12 January 2008.
- ³³ 'Foxtel Gets Active in the New Year', www.foxtel.com.au/236_6641.htm accessed 15/01/2008.
- ³⁴ Life is Drama 2008, www.lifeisdrama.com/. Website accessed 15/01/2008.
- ³⁵ Leet, Martin. 2008. 'Seeing Only the Prejudices of Others'. The Brisbane Line 01 May 2008 www.brisinst.org.au/issue-details.php?article_id=205 accessed 14/05/2008.
- ³⁶ Ward, Mary-Helen and West, Sandra 2008, 'Blogging PhD Candidature: Revealing the Pedagogy', International Journal of Emerging Technologies and Society Vol 6 (1), pp. 60-71.
- ³⁷ Gibson, Joel 2008, 'New Voices rework and Old Script', The Sydney Morning Herald 7th April.
- ³⁸ Dale, David. 2008. 'Gotta love the guy - even caught in traffic eccentric Rees is looking triffic'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 27 October, p. 13.
- ³⁹ Woodruff, Paul. 2008. The Necessity of Theater: The Art of Watching and Being Watched. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.143
- ⁴⁰ Woodruff 2008: 204
- ⁴¹ Woodruff 2008: x
- ⁴² Woodruff 2008: 225
- ⁴³ Woodruff 2008: 225
- ⁴⁴ Woodruff 2008: 17
- ⁴⁵ Woodruff 2008: 11-17
- ⁴⁶ Woodruff 2008: 18, 22
- ⁴⁷ Woodruff 2008: 72

-
- ⁴⁸ Woodruff 2008: 18
- ⁴⁹ Woodruff 2008: 21
- ⁵⁰ Freudenburg, W. 2009, 'Sociology's Rediscovery of the Environment: Setting the Stage', Sociological Inquiry 79(4) 2009, pp. 505-508, 505
- ⁵¹ Abjorensen, Norman 2009, 'Only joking', Inside Story 12 February 2009, <http://inside.org.au/only-joking/print/> accessed 27/02/2009.
- ⁵² Published in Governance: An International Journal of Policy, Administration, and Institutions Vol 22 (4) October 2009 pp. 689-715.
- ⁵³ Green, Jeffrey Edward. 2010. The Eyes of the People: Democracy in an Age of Spectatorship. New York: Oxford University Press. 48
- ⁵⁴ Green 2010: 129
- ⁵⁵ Green 2010: 130
- ⁵⁶ Green 2010: 138
- ⁵⁷ Olding, Rachel 2010, 'All the world's a stage ... and we are all merely downloaders', The Sydney Morning Herald 29-30 May 2010, p. 13.
- ⁵⁸ Ng, Kwai Hang, and Jeffrey Kidder. 2010. 'Toward a Theory of Emotive Performance: With Lessons from How Politicians Do Anger'. Sociological Theory 28 (2) pp. 193-214.
- ⁵⁹ Brent, Peter. 2010. 'Exit, stage right'. Inside Story, <http://inside.org.au/exit-stage-right> accessed 15 April 2010.
- ⁶⁰ Inside Story 22 April 2010, <http://inside.org.au/from-operating-theatre-to-political-theatre> accessed 23/04/2010
- ⁶¹ Orr, Graeme. 2010. 'From operating theatre to political theatre'. Inside Story 22 April, <http://inside.org.au/from-operating-theatre-to-political-theatre> accessed 23/04/2010.
- ⁶² Sutherland, Keith. 2010. 'Ashes to Ashes and the Theatre of Democracy'. openDemocracy 4th May 2010. <http://www.opendemocracy.net/ourkingdom/keith-sutherland/ashes-to-ashes-and-theatre-of-democracy>, accessed 25/04/2010.
- ⁶³ See Manin, Bernard. 1997. The Principles of Representative Government. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- ⁶⁴ Sutherland 2010

Appendix D: Theories of Theatre (CD files)

Tables 1–51: Historical Tables

Table 1/51	Theories of Theatre c400BCE–1CE
Table 2/51	Theories of Theatre 1CE–1200
Table 3/51	Theories of Theatre 1201–1500
Table 4/51	Theories of Theatre 1501–1549
Table 5/51	Theories of Theatre 1550–1580
Table 6/51	Theories of Theatre 1581–1600
Table 7/51	Theories of Theatre 1601–1630
Table 8/51	Theories of Theatre 1631–1650
Table 9/51	Theories of Theatre 1651–1690
Table 10/51	Theories of Theatre 1691–1730
Table 11/51	Theories of Theatre 1731–1750
Table 12/51	Theories of Theatre 1751–1760
Table 13/51	Theories of Theatre 1761–1780
Table 14/51	Theories of Theatre 1781–1800
Table 15/51	Theories of Theatre 1801–1824
Table 16/51	Theories of Theatre 1825–1835
Table 17/51	Theories of Theatre 1836–1860
Table 18/51	Theories of Theatre 1861–1880
Table 19/51	Theories of Theatre 1881–1891
Table 20/51	Theories of Theatre 1892–1900
Table 21/51	Theories of Theatre 1901–1904
Table 22/51	Theories of Theatre 1905–1910

Table 23/51	Theories of Theatre 1911-1917
Table 24/51	Theories of Theatre 1918-1920
Table 25/51	Theories of Theatre 1921-1924(a)
Table 26/51	Theories of Theatre 1924(b)-1926(a)
Table 27/51	Theories of Theatre 1926(b)-1927
Table 28/51	Theories of Theatre 1928-1937
Table 29/51	Theories of Theatre 1938-1940
Table 30/51	Theories of Theatre 1941-1945
Table 31/51	Theories of Theatre 1946-1950
Table 32/51	Theories of Theatre 1951-1954
Table 33/51	Theories of Theatre 1955-1959
Table 34/51	Theories of Theatre 1960-1962
Table 35/51	Theories of Theatre 1963-1964
Table 36/51	Theories of Theatre 1965
Table 37/51	Theories of Theatre 1966-1967
Table 38/51	Theories of Theatre 1968-1970
Table 39/51	Theories of Theatre 1971-1972
Table 40/51	Theories of Theatre 1973-1974
Table 41/51	Theories of Theatre 1975-1977
Table 42/51	Theories of Theatre 1978-1981(a)
Table 43/51	Theories of Theatre 1981(b)-1985
Table 44/51	Theories of Theatre 1986-1989
Table 45/51	Theories of Theatre 1990-1992
Table 46/51	Theories of Theatre 1993-1996
Table 47/51	Theories of Theatre 1997-2000
Table 48/51	Theories of Theatre 2001-2002

Table 49/51	Theories of Theatre 2003-2004
Table 50/51	Theories of Theatre 2005-2006(a)
Table 51/51	Theories of Theatre 2006(b)-2008

Note: Tables are broken according to the table capacity of Microsoft Word. Tables larger than 100kb tend to become unstable.

Organisation of historical tables

Works are listed chronologically by publication date. Where more than one work is listed for an author, the date is taken to be the first work listed. For ancient texts where publication dates are unknown, chronology is by estimated date according to current scholarship or, in the absence of such a date, from the author's life dates.

The tables provide an overview of the available works in relation to theatre, an assessment of how the author defined theatre based on this overview, what the author saw as the purpose of theatre and an analysis of their author in relation to the three categories noted in Chapter 1: doing, showing or watching. Material is drawn from the five major anthologies mentioned in Chapter 1 and below, as well as a range of other primary and secondary sources. The tables could therefore be said to constitute a literature review of the field.

The 'purpose of the theorist' was assessed according to Brandt's divisions of prescriptive (according to rules); analysis (descriptive of existing practices) or polemic (theory that was against some aspect of current theatre practice or prevailing theory).

The author's 'view of theatre' was assessed as follows:

- Positive:- the author saw theatre as a positive contribution to life in terms of entertainment and amusement
- Positive/Functional:- the author saw theatre as a positive contribution to life both because of its educational capacity and its capacity to entertain
- Functional:- the author saw theatre as a positive contribution to life because of its educational capacity
- Aesthetic:- the author saw theatre as valuable in itself – its existence required no additional justification
- Negative:- the author was anti-theatre

'Essential Theorist': Gerould (2000) nominates a number of theorists in these tables as essential to the development of theatre theory. They are indicated as such in the table.

Theorists whose names appear in bold print also appear in the Theatre Metaphor tables (Appendix C).

Use of anthologies

As discussed in Chapter 1, anthologies were used in order to manage the enormous amount of material. Each anthology had different criteria for selection, although their selections were similar.

1. Carlson in general took theatre to include drama but not what has now become known as performance in its widest sense, and sought out ‘writings in which the theoretical element is paramount’ and has some ‘independence’ in order to allow him to ‘trace the development ... of the idea of what theatre is, has been, should be’ (Carlson 1984: 9-11).
2. Sidnell’s selections were chosen ‘for their intrinsic theoretical interest’ and their provision of ‘closely reasoned and detailed theoretical arguments’ (1991: 3), as well as how best they articulated the recurrent issues that Sidnell had identified (what does it mean to represent or imitate something dramatically; how are written texts related to live performances; how and why are spectators affected, and in what way; how should other arts combine in the theatre; is the actor an artist, a ‘primary creator’ (Sidnell 1991: 2; Abdoh 2008/1992: 485), an interpreter or an ‘artistic medium’ for another artist (playwright or director); what distinguishes a genre and how is it to be used) - and sometimes, apparently, because they were Italian (there seemed to be no other reason for including very short pieces by Ingegneri, Giacomini and Metastasio).
3. Gerould’s theorists were considered ‘essential’ as representatives of the interconnections between cultures and between theatre and its political and social contexts who had ‘shaped the ongoing theoretical debate about the nature and function of theatre’. His selection had the inestimable virtue of including non-European/Western theorists, undermining the usual assumption that theatre was a specifically western phenomenon (Gerould 2000: 11).
4. Krasner appeared to select writers according to how best they demonstrated his two ‘streams’ of theatre theory, one emanating from Hegel and the other from Nietzsche (Krasner 2008).
5. Brandt’s selection (for the period 1850-1990) was ‘themed’ (General Theory; Varieties of Realism; Anti-Naturalism; Political Theatre and Semiotic) and ‘modest’ in scope, including some essential theorists who ‘could not’ be omitted and some ‘less well-known but nevertheless significant items’ (Brandt 1998: xvii) – and about drama i.e. text-based theatre.

A further discussion of dramatic theory by Crane (1967), which was considered as an adjunct to these anthologies, was based on a division of dramatic criticism into Platonic (drama served a function beyond itself as an art form) and Aristotelian (drama was an art form in itself). Crane’s aim was to show how each of these divisions constrained subsequent scholarship. Fortier’s (2002) selections of texts were based on a structuralist approach to theatre and were used to supplement the main anthologies, as were the more historically oriented works of Wilson and Goldfarb (2004) and Brockett and Ball (2004).

Where primary material has been read, a broad understanding of theory has been taken, allowing often quite brief comments about theatre to be included. This is particularly the case with regard to practitioners of contemporary theatre who have yet to commit their ideas to substantial theoretical exposition. Even a throwaway comment in an interview, such as that by actor-director Sean Penn (2005), can reveal theoretical underpinnings.

Referencing of table material

Sources are acknowledged in endnotes to each table to avoid clutter. A year given in brackets after a name in the tables refers to where to locate that theorist in the tables.

I wish to particularly acknowledge Carlson's monumental study Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present (1984) that formed the foundation of this research.

Table 1/51 Theories of Theatre c400BCE to 1CE

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
A history of theories of theatre would be very short were it not to include theories of drama or theories of poetry . These began to appear in C4th BCE, a century after 'the great age of Greek drama'. Sidnell suggests this was because it was at this point in time that philosophical speculation began to pay attention to 'man and his works', of which poetry and drama were an example, rather than to the nature of the universe (1991: 14). However, the work of Euripides and Aristophanes and some scattered remarks attributed to Isocrates (436-338BCE) indicate that 'such matters as criteria of poetic excellence, standards of taste, stylistic parody, suitable topics for dramatic competition' etc. were discussed prior to this, although there are no records left to us. The first serious theoretical treatment of poetry came from Plato, and was 'of a negative and censorious nature'. ¹
The Frogs ² (405BCE)	Aristophanes (c448-380BCE) Greek dramatist	First extended consideration of how poetry relates to values; establishes two positions (represented by Aeschylus and Euripides). 1. the poet is a moral teacher; his work must fulfil a moral purpose (Aeschylus) 2. art's function is the revelation of reality irrespective of moral/ethical questions (Euripides). The two 'characters' were otherwise in opposition. Aeschylus condemned Euripides for giving poetic utterances to 'The men, the slaves, the women ... The kings, the little girls, the hags'. Euripides declared that this was not something to be condemned; it was, rather, 'democratic'. All 'had to work' in his plays. ³ Purpose of Theorist: Analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		Moral; revelation of reality	Doing: poetry: playwriting Showing: moral/ ethical values
Republic (c380); ⁴ Laws (c357) ⁵	Plato (c427-347BCE) ⁶ Greek philosopher	Plato was 'drama's severest ancient critic' ⁷ despite (or perhaps because of) admitting that 'we are well aware of the charm it exercises' (Republic 607c) i.e. he acknowledged his own spectatorship. For him, 'theatre ... is a place where people who should know better get swept up in the irrational enthusiasm of the crowd'. ⁸ Rather than an analysis, what he offered was a critique embedded in a concern about the social and moral effects of the art and, in particular, the place of the arts in education, in the context of a theory of specialization of function in which the diversity of imitations created by poetry could be distracting. Poetry was of concern because of its effect on the soul, its effects on an audience and consequently its position in the state. It was also a particular concern because poetry was said to be a source of knowledge, when Plato was claiming that philosophy was the source of knowledge. Through this concern, he introduced the key term mimesis (imitation), offering the first full development of the theme of the relationship of art to life. ⁹ Partly in response to the ideas expressed in The Frogs , Plato saw poetry as representation of mere appearances and thus misleading and morally suspect. ¹⁰ '[E]verything that is responsible for creating something out of nothing is a kind of poetry' (Symposium 205b-c). ¹¹ Poetry could not be an adequate teacher because: 1.	A seeing place	Mimesis: representation of 'mere appearance'	Showing: models for imitation Watching: source of knowledge, the way we learn anything; spectators could get too involved in poetry and begin to treat life as if it were in a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		poets tell corrupting lies about both men and gods (Republic Bks 2&3); 2. poetry feeds the passions instead of discouraging them (Bk 10) and ‘what we enjoy in others will inevitably react upon ourselves ... after feeding fat the emotion of pity [at the theatre] it is not easy to restrain it in our own sufferings’ (Republic 606). Similarly with comedy: after watching buffooneries, you ‘let yourself go so far that often ere you are aware you become yourself a comedian in private’ (606c). Poetic imitation ‘waters and fosters these feelings when what we ought to do is to dry them up, and it establishes them as our rulers when they ought to be ruled’ (606d); 3. poetry is an imitation of an imitation (mimesis as a negative term): ‘Mimetic art ... is an inferior thing cohabiting with an inferior and engendering inferior offspring’ (Republic 603). The poet’s creations were ‘inferior in respect of reality’ and his appeal is ‘to the inferior part of the soul ... he stimulates and fosters this element in the soul, and by strengthening it tends to destroy the rational part ... the mimetic poet sets up in each individual soul a vicious constitution by fashioning phantoms far removed from reality, and by currying favour with the senseless element that cannot distinguish the greater from the less, but calls the same thing now one, now the other’ (Republic 605). Poetry appealed to the ‘irrational’ part of the soul, feeding the passions; it also provided too many often poor models for people to copy, including people below their station and madmen. Plato was particularly concerned about the effects of poetry on the audience because of its relationship to truth. He believed theatre encouraged irrationality and a lack of self-control and therefore was a danger to the better individual and to society.¹² In Laws he complained about audiences coming to think they know how to judge ‘the best’, and making their judgments by ‘clamor’ (701). This was particularly galling when one considered that the best kind of man was likely to be someone unfamiliar to them, someone who controlled their feelings when in the sight of others: ‘a rational and quiet character, which always remains pretty well the same, is neither easy to imitate nor easy to understand when imitated, especially not by a crowd consisting of all sorts of people gathered together at a theatre festival, for the experience being imitated is alien to them’ (Republic 604). This behaviour begins in the theatre but spreads to the polis so that aristocracy is overthrown in favour of theatrocracy or rule by audience (Laws 700-701). Theatre also begins to think it can appear anywhere. Choirs turn up at non-theatrical events and force themselves on the event turning it from a solemn occasion to one of pandering to the audience for approbation. Theatre is thus a			theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		destabilizing force: it disturbs order, authority, and spatial arrangements (Laws 700-701c). The mimetic poet curries favour by mixing the ‘greater’ and ‘the less’ and calling ‘the same thing now one, now the other’ thus encouraging people, especially the ‘nondescript mob assembled in the theater’ to confuse phantoms with reality (Republic 604e-605c).¹³ In the theatre, people forget their place, are heterogeneous, respond with their ‘fretful part’ rather than with ‘intelligent and temperate disposition’, forget restraint and propriety and take stage behaviour home or into public life ‘disturbing domestic as well as civic tranquillity’.¹⁴ This particularly happens in comedy. Plato ‘condemns theater as a particularly dangerous form of mimesis, which encourages people to confuse themselves with the parts they play and consequently to forget their proper place in the organization of the polis’.¹⁵ Contrary to Aristophanes’ belief that the poet was a moral teacher, for Plato, it was philosophy’s role to provide guidance to truth and right behaviour, not poetry’s. Although Plato acknowledged that some poets were inspired for the good, their work appealed only to the ‘irrational’ part of the soul, and they could only be useful to society if they accepted the restrictions placed on them by philosophers to produce only good images.¹⁶ This position of Plato’s, of course, arose in relation to his attempt to legitimize philosophy and his school of philosophy.¹⁷ His concern regarding imitation was also a product and consequence of his understanding of spectatorship as the source of knowledge. Imitation is how we learn: we learn by watching others and then copying them. The instinctive ability of human beings to copy what they saw created a problem for moral teaching. Plato’s solution was to limit the models which could acceptably be copied to the kind of behaviour expected of the person in the position they held, partly to reduce temptation and partly because he believed that the more roles someone could imitate, the weaker they were as a person: ‘dabbling in many things, he would be mediocre in all’. The evidence for this was that poets who were good at tragedy were rarely good at comedy and vice versa. Thus trainee guardians had to be restricted to imitating only one role, that of ‘the really good and true man’ (Republic 395-6). Plato did however, provide a description of what acting involved: ‘Performances given by choruses are representations of character, and deal with every variety of action and incident. The individual performers enact their roles partly by expressing their own characters, partly by imitating those of others’ (Laws 655d). This is what made theatre so dangerous to performers: they came to take on aspects of the imitated character, even if these were

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		aspects they would not ordinarily have approved. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative
Poetics (c330BCE) Politics (c335-322BCE) ¹⁸	Aristotle (c382-322BCE) Greek philosopher	Essential Theorist. Lost – known only through incomplete C10th & C11th copies of fragments which may have been part of a larger work or may have been lecture notes taken by a pupil. ¹⁹ The Poetics is a retrospective analysis of the great theatre of C5BCE, and almost entirely focused on tragedy. There is speculation that there may have been a similar discussion of ‘Old Comedy’ (‘New Comedy’ came after Aristotle), but this is not more than a guess. ²⁰ It was written partly in response to Plato’s condemnation of theatre: rather than concluding that poets should be banished from the perfect society, Aristotle attempted to describe the social function and the ethical utility of art through a ‘scientific’ analysis of it as an objective phenomenon. ²¹ Poetics is therefore the first significant work on theatre theory in relation to the phenomenon itself, rather in terms of a social critique (as in Plato); its major concepts and arguments (although disputed) have continued to influence the development of theory to the present. As in Plato, drama is discussed as part of poetry in the sense of ‘making’. The ‘poet’ was a ‘maker’ of a representation which involved ‘men “doing”’, something which was described by the Dorians using the word dran and the Athenians using the word prattein (Poetics 1448b.1). (This was subsequently misinterpreted by the Romans as ‘poetry’ in the sense of a literary work in verse, ²² a misunderstanding which Aristotle himself noted, and which was to contribute to confusion over what was meant by both drama and theatre down to the Renaissance: ‘[I]t is the way with people to tack on ‘poet’ to the name of a metre, and talk of elegiac poets and epic poets, thinking that they call them poets not by reason of the imitative nature of their work, but generally by reason of the metre they write in’ (Poetics 1447b.10-15). According to Aristotle, the ‘art which imitates by language alone ... is to this day without a name’. One example he gives of this art is ‘a Socratic Conversation’ (1447a.25). Aristotle himself apparently believed that a tragedy could be read and still have an impact ²³ , although see Sidnell for a note of caution about this: since few people read, it is probable, according to Sidnell, that Aristotle meant it could be read aloud as a recitation rather than dramatised. ²⁴ Aristotle’s defence of theatre against Plato’s condemnation involved subordinating spectacle and character to plot, making ‘the specific scenic medium of theater – everything having to do with spectacle’ merely the means to the end of realising the plot: ²⁵ it is ‘the action ... i.e. its plot, that is the end		Enjoyment; catharsis; education (a low priority – possibly a sop to Plato), through imitation	Doing: poetry (drama):playwrighting; the imitation of human action Showing: images: spectacle is an element (perhaps a regrettable one) of drama Watching: enjoyment (even if it is fiction) (9:51b); the ‘act of recognition’ even of unpleasant things gives pleasure because ‘in the process of viewing they find themselves learning, that

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		and purpose of the tragedy; and the end is everywhere the chief thing' (1450a.20). Aristotle's concerns, then, were not with the metaphysics of poetry but with its practicalities. He examines 'poetry' as techné – an applied skill – in order to show 'how playwrights may achieve excellence at their craft', the aim of which is 'to evoke a specific response from audiences'. The practice of drama is divided into three elements: praxis ('to do' something), poiesis (to 'make' something – as the actor makes a character through action) and theoria (to see, in order to 'grasp and understand');²⁶ 'Aristotle describes theatrical theory somewhat like an auto mechanic might describe an automobile'.²⁷ As a consequence, actors and audience become subordinated to the interest in the structure and realisation of the drama, although he 'defends mimesis and the pleasure it both procures and exploits as a natural and inevitable learning process'.²⁸ Weber argues that Aristotle's interpretation of theatre as medium and the connection of medium with means have affected theatre theory and practice to this day. 1. mimesis is a positive, creative process which presents things not as they are but as they ought to be had they been fully realized.²⁹ Imitation is a natural human ability, a key method of learning and an expression of the human delight in learning: 'Imitation is natural to man from childhood ... the first things he learns come to him through imitation [and] we enjoy looking at the most exact images' of things, even when the sight of the real thing 'gives us pain'. All humans 'enjoy the sight of images because they learn as they look'. Where we can't compare the image with the reality (so that we can enjoy the recognition), we enjoy its workmanship or some aspect of the image itself e.g. 'its color' (Poetics 1448b.5). Mimesis encompasses not just 'actors imitating other men in their actions', but every artistic activity, including dancing and lyre-playing, i.e. of reality 'in its widest aspects'.³⁰ Poetry arose through improvisation. 'Epic poetry and Tragedy, as also Comedy, Dithyrambic poetry, and most flute playing and lyre playing, are all, viewed as a whole, modes of imitation'. They differ only in the different kind of means used, different kinds of objects produced and in the manner of their imitations. There are three possible 'manners': one voice (narration); two voices (1 narrative and 1 character) and many voices (dramatic). All use 'rhythm, language and harmony' (Poetics 1447a.20). However, it is the plot, rather than the verse, which makes a tragic poet, for 'he is a poet by virtue of the imitative element, and it is actions that he imitates' (1451b.25). 2. tragedy is cathartic (although interpretations of what this means are varied, it is seen as			is, reckoning what kind a given thing belongs to' (Poetics 48b 12-19). (Other than this comment, Aristotle pays little attention to the spectator of drama – which is one reason why some theorists see catharsis applying to the characters rather than to the effect of the drama on spectators. Tragedy does however arouse 'fear and pity' in spectators, which is seen to be a good thing).

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		a positive thing, and a challenge to Plato's negative view of theatre as harmful). 'The tragic fear and pity may be aroused by the Spectacle; but they may also be aroused by the very structure and incidents of the play – which is the better way and shows the better poet ... The tragic pleasure is that of pity and fear, and the poet has to produce it by a work of imitation ... therefore ... the causes should be included in the incidents of his story' (1453b.1-10): 'The plot should be so framed even without seeing the things take place, he simply hears the account should be filled with horror and pity at the incidents' (1453b1.10). [Clearly audiences are to feel fear and pity – but it is not clear whether this is related to catharsis]. Tragedy has its own peculiar kind of pleasure, which results from 'fear and pity' (1453b.10) and which is produced through the plot, especially one where suffering is brought about between friends (1453b.15). 3. action is central to drama. Plays are called dramas by Dorians because persons act (drân) the story. (The Athenians call them prattein). Plays do not use action to portray characters; they use characters to portray the action (the end and purpose of tragedy). The poet's function 'is to describe, not the thing that has happened, but a kind of thing that might happen ... what is possible as being probable or necessary (1451a.35). Hence, poetry's statements 'are of the nature ... of universals... By a universal statement I mean one as to what such or such a kind of man will probably or necessarily say or do' (1451b.5-10). According to Lovelace, theatre for Aristotle was one method of teaching and reinforcing the inferior role of those deemed unequal. Boal interpreted Aristotle's message as 'happiness consists in obeying the laws'. According to him, Aristotle's theories were aimed at constructing a powerful political system 'for intimidation of the spectator for elimination of the bad or illegal tendencies of the audience'.³¹ This view appears to be a misreading of Aristotle, through Renaissance interpretations which read Aristotle through Plato and Averroës. However, for all his positive view of drama, Aristotle did endorse the censorship of 'pictures and speeches from the stage which are indecent' and recommended that young people not be allowed 'to be spectators of mimes or comedies' until their education had 'armed them against the evil influence of such representations' (Politics 1336b.10-20).³² The Poetics had little influence in its time. Although it was not prescriptive, it was taken by the Renaissance neoclassicist critics as such (along with Horace's Ars poetica).³³ One of the problems with Aristotle is that his

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		writings can be translated with different inferences, as the confusion over catharsis indicates. Is it the audience which experiences catharsis, or the character, or the chorus, with the audience identifying with the impact on either? All that is certain is that Aristotle believed that ‘changes occur as a result of the strong emotions associated with tragedy’,³⁴ although we are not sure to whom. Megumi Sata compares Aristotle’s theory of drama with that of the C14th Japanese theorist, Zeami Motokiyo, in terms of ‘imitation, play structure, effects, and definition of success’.³⁵ The comparison offers insight into how Aristotle viewed drama (tragedy), and the implications this view had for the subsequent history of theatre in the west. Imitation was a key word for both theorists: ‘tragedy is the imitation of an action’ (Aristotle); ‘Role-playing involves an imitation’ (Zeami). Both thought imitation should be ‘beautiful’ i.e. it should enhance. However, Aristotle addressed his theory to the poet or dramatist, while Zeami addressed the actor-poet. For Aristotle, imitation was what the drama did: ‘tragedy is the imitation of an action’. The poet was the imitator, imitation was his art, and the object of the imitation was the action of a character type. Imitation was divided into 6 elements: plot, character, thought, diction, song and spectacle (i.e. playwrighting was a separate activity altogether). Plot, character and thought were the objects of imitation; diction and song were the media of imitation and spectacle was the manner of imitation (and therefore the least important). Greek tragedy shows how a person of a certain type will act on occasions. Nō shows an essential emotion of a certain character type. For Zeami, imitation ‘always refers to the actor’s role-playing’. It was always about character, and it was an art of the actor (not the poet). The imitator is the actor, and the object of imitation is a character type. Structure: another key term for both theorists. Both stressed the important of wholeness and a sense of unity: every play should have a sense of completion. Both divide a play into three sections: beginning, middle and end (Aristotle); jo (introduction), ha (breaking) and kyū (rapid). For Aristotle, a ‘well-constructed plot ... cannot either begin or end at any point one likes’ (Poetics 1450b.30-35). For Zeami, ‘The proper sequence of jo, ha and kyū provides the sense of Fulfillment’ (Zeami). But – Aristotle is talking about ‘the unity of a written plot within which an action starts and concludes’ i.e. unity comes from the ‘textual frame’ and is based on cause and effect. Zeami is talking about the dynamics of live performance: unity comes from the internal coherence of the performance, based on the use of rhythmic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		effects. Effect: both theorists argue that the effect of a play is achieved through imitation within a certain structure, and for both, the concept of effect involves a relationship with an audience. However, for Aristotle, the proper effect of tragedy is catharsis. [Sata notes that this concept, which Aristotle mentions only once, is not well understood and the subject of argument. She plumps for Gerald Else's controversial interpretation that catharsis is not so much what an audience itself feels, as it is generally thought, but something it grants to the hero by way of absolution: 'catharsis is a purgation of the tragic hero's actions through the spectator's full understanding. The spectator acts as a judge [something it was used to doing in Athens] in whose sight the hero's actions are purified. The catharsis brought about by the plot proves that the hero was blameless, and this knowledge allows spectators to have pity on him', and thereby exonerate him.³⁶ Note that this is not a spectator experience, but an experience granted by spectators to a character. Nor is it volunteered by spectators in the course of the play. The degree of effectiveness is brought about by the quality of the play. The effectiveness of the play is not determined by the spectators. The relationship between poet and spectators is strictly one way. Spectators are forced to grant catharsis to the character because of the quality of the writing. For Zeami, on the other hand, the proper effects of the play are 'mysterious beauty' (yūgen) and novelty. Novelty depends on the spectator knowledge and experience because it involves a comparison between the present performance and previously experienced performance. The spectator grants the effects but here, 'only the audience can decide whether it has felt a sense of surprise: 'When the audience can express its astonishment as one with a gasp, the moment of Fulfillment has come' (Zeami, Finding Gems). [Zeami was an actor, and starts his analysis from the point of view of performance]. Success: for Aristotle, a successful tragedy was 'a properly written work with a well composed plot. 'Not being involved in actual dramatic production himself, he easily concludes that, as a matter of course, the best-plotted plays will be successful on stage': 'The best proof is this: on the stage, and in the public performances, such plays, if properly worked out, are seen to be truly tragic' (Poetics 1453a.25). For Zeami, however, 'a successful play of the first rank is based on an authentic source, reveals something unusual in aesthetic qualities, has an appropriate climax, and shows Grace (yūgen)' (Teachings on Style). i.e. success is related to performance: 'Most spectators assume that if a good play is given a fine performance, the results will be successful, yet surprisingly

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		enough such a performance may not succeed' (Teachings on Style). Success can only be judged in relation to performance because a successful performance is one 'which is accepted and praised by the audience'. Audience: As a professional actor, Zeami knew that 'communicating with the audience is difficult and unpredictable' – hence his great emphasis on acting skills. Nō is a performing art, and Zeami 'wrote as an actor striving to gain the audience's respect and approval'. His writings are read today by performers of all kinds because of this. Aristotle, on the other hand, 'shows condescension towards both actors and spectators': it was an indication of how uncultivated spectators were that they required gesture (acting) in order to comprehend tragedy, and 'the fact that such acting was not of aesthetic interest to Aristotle', writing 'unluckily late for his topic', was 'decisive' for the history of drama in the west, for it was he who established the criteria on which drama was to be judged for centuries to come: drama 'as a unidirectional process wherein the artistic achievements of the playwright are presented to an audience through the medium of language with the help of acting (gesture). [Note, however, that Aristotle specifically mentions gesture in the context of an actor realizing that their audience does not understand, and therefore resorting to 'perpetual movement ... bad flute players, for instance, rolling about' (Poetics 1461b.25) – this he considers to be a criticism of acting, rather than of tragedy, and the point is made in the context of defending tragedy against those who prefer epic poetry. It could also relate to the particular conditions of performance – Greek theatres were huge and spectators were noisy. The resort to gesture was a way of dealing with this]. Aristotle's guiding concept that the poet-playwright's goal is achievement of an ideal work of art (his ideal tragedy) causes him to ignore the taste of the audience'. [This same disregard can be seen in countless western theories of drama to this day]. For Zeami, on the other hand, 'Success with the audience' was 'everything'. Pleasing spectators was 'an integral component' of the art of performance. The ultimate achievement of the artist lay in the ability 'to see and grasp the audience and adjust one's way of presentation accordingly'. Zeami thus solves the conflict between the artist's ideal and the spectator's desire by seeing it as part of the art of the artist to deal with. The Aristotelian dramatist, on the other hand, must struggle with this conflict even today. [He generally does this by recognizing spectators only as a mass, largely unknowable and generally despicable!]. Aristotle's influence on later generations has been 'incalculable and unquestioned'.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Sata suggests that his focus on the text has influenced the historical development of theatre in the west [as is clearly shown in this historical table]. Sidnell, however, suggests that Aristotle's position 'is more complex and difficult to interpret' and that most critiques of him, especially that he 'privileges the written text' may be anachronistic. For example, he argues that what Aristotle calls 'reading' would have actually been recitation: the idea of a solitary reader is a much later development. He also takes exception to Else's interpretation of catharsis as occurring between the characters rather than in spectators: 'The interpretation involved in this rendering is dubious and it can be aligned with the many interpretations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that locate the pity and fear in the tragic action rather than in the spectators ... the emotional element can be readily discussed since it supposedly lies in the tragic action itself and the spectators' response, being a rational one, can also be predicted or deduced'. It also brings it into line 'with a long tradition of didactic theory, and with the almost universally accepted Horatian maxim that the function of drama is to teach and delight'.³⁷ However, Sata's discussion of Else's theory in relation to Zeami casts a different light again on what catharsis might mean, since it suggests not that it lies in the text or is an effect on spectators, but something spectators grant to the character through their shared humanity. Unfortunately, Aristotle only mentions catharsis once in the Poetics, and just how tragedy is supposed to affect spectators is not explained: 'It it be asked whether tragedy is now all that it need be in its formative elements, to consider that, and decide it theoretically and in relation to the theatres, is a matter for another inquiry' (Poetics 1449a.5). This is not necessarily because Aristotle was not interested in these aspects but because he saw them as 'another inquiry', perhaps to be answered later. [We need to continually remind ourselves that we only have fragments of his work]. Sidnell says that the 'doctrine of the unities was foisted on Aristotle by the theorists of the sixteenth century as they tried to formulate their own structural principles' (1991: 10), although the concept of genre was 'a genuine inheritance from antiquity'.³⁸ The Poetics had little influence in its time.³⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
Poetics	Heracleides of Pontus (c390-310BCE)	lost: poetry should both teach and give pleasure. ⁴⁰		instruction ; pleasure through	Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	Greek astronomer	Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		imitation
Poetics	Theophrastus (372-287BCE) Greek philosopher	lost. Theophrastus was a successor to Aristotle. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: View of Theatre: can't say			Doing: poetry
	Aristoxenus (fl. C4thBCE) Greek philosopher & musicologist	lost: wrote on tragic poets and tragic dancing. Also wrote on music and rhythm. ⁴² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: can't say			Doing: poetry
	Chamelen (unknown)	lost: wrote on satiric drama and ancient comedy. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: View of Theatre:			Doing: drama
Letter to Herodotus; On Nature ⁴⁴	Epicurus (c341-270BCE) Athenian philosopher	Epicurus' epigram is widely seen in the literature as a theatre metaphor. Careful reading however indicates that it is rather a theory of spectatorship and may well have a place in Theatre Theory, although none of the anthologies recognize him. Epicurus believed that theatre ('Shews') is like life; it provides an exhibition of life which allows the wise man to understand how passion moves men. This allows him to remain undisturbed: 'The Wise Man ... shall reap more Benefit, and take more Satisfaction in the public Shews, than other Men. He there observes the different Characters of the Spectators; he can discover by their looks the effect of the Passions that moves 'em, and amidst the Confusion that reigns in these places ... he has the Pleasure to find himself the only person undisturb'd, and in a State of Tranquillity.' ⁴⁵ He can achieve this because the gods, if they exist, are remote. '[W]e nothing have to hope and nothing fear' from them. ⁴⁶ Nevertheless, one can aim to be an undisturbed spectator who passively contemplates the world: the 'principle of detached spectatorship',⁴⁷ is an accomplishment. This principle was fundamental to the later Stoics and Satirists. ⁴⁸ McGillivray argues that Epicurus' version of the metaphor was a reaction to Polybius, ⁴⁹ and aimed at producing 'imperturbability' in the face of Fortune. Epicurus' account of the world was given a detailed exposition by Lucretius (c94-c50BCE) in which form it was revived in C17th. ⁵⁰ It was connected with the theatrum mundi in C18th as a way of examining 'the gulf between the detached observer of the world and the mass of men who remained	A seeing-place	To show in action	Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		imaginatively ensnared by its public rituals', ⁵¹ a use which is evident in Addison's Mr Spectator of The Spectator journal. ⁵² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional
After 300BCE: Philosophical considerations of art declined with the decline in intellectual life in Athens. ⁵³
Essays	Aristophanes of Byzantium (c250-c180BCE) Greek scholar, grammarian; librarian at Alexandria	fragments: two essays, one on theatrical masks and the other on the tradition of tragic subjects. ⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: View of Theatre: can't say			Doing: drama
Amphitruo (prologue)	Plautus (c254-184BCE) Roman dramatist	Indication that a definition of genre based on characters was already established; indication also of a misunderstanding of the Greek concepts of tragedy and comedy: the prologue calls Amphitruo a 'tragic-comedy' because it contains both kings and gods and a servant. ⁵⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwriting
Heautontimor u-menos (prologue)	Terence (c185-159BCE) Roman dramatist	A condemnation of boisterous, action-filled farces and the promotion of 'quiet' comedies ⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-existing theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent			Doing: playwriting
Tractatus coislinianus	unknown ⁵⁷	(from a C10th copy): Poetry is classified into either mimetic or nonmimetic . Mimetic poetry is further classified as dramatic or narrative . Dramatic poetry is divided into four: comedy, tragedy, mime and satyr-drama. Comedy is then subdivided into three: Old Comedy (the laughable), New Comedy (the serious) and Middle Comedy (a mixture of Old and New). Outlines a theory of comedy similar to Aristotle's theory of tragedy, with catharsis brought about through laughter. (NB: an example of the misunderstanding of poetry mentioned by Aristotle) Purpose of Theorist: Analysis View of theatre: functional		To show in action; catharsis	Doing: poetry (verse)
Roman commentary on theatre is dominated by a concern with Rhetoric, and judged by Rhetorical standards. Generally poetry was not studied for aesthetic reasons but for practical usage, especially in relation to effective rhetoric, which supported a view of drama as dramatic poetry. ⁵⁸

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
De architectura (90BCE)	Vitruvius (c80BCE-c15BCE) Roman architect and engineer	Roman writer on architecture; had an enormous influence on the Renaissance when popularised in Italy through Alberti's De re aedificatoria (1485). De architectura was republished in Latin in 1486, and then brought into English through John Dee's Preface to Euclid in 1570. Described both Greek and Roman theatres but it was his descriptions of Roman theatre which were taken up by Renaissance scholars and artisans. Yates argues that Vitruvius was known to Burbage, who built the first public theatre in England in 1576, through the mathematician John Dee. ⁵⁹ Although Vitruvius was overwhelmingly concerned with sound in the theatre, Renaissance classicists took up his much more minor concern with 'scenes', developing them into a theatre primarily of spectacle. Yates argues, however, that the emphasis on sound is what was taken up by the artisan/actor theatre builder Burbage, which accounts for the tremendous difference between the theatres of the court and elite and the public theatres. ⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: technical analysis View of theatre: positive	A space (a hearing place)	Performance	Doing: staging Showing: spectacle
Oratory and Orators; Brutus (c45BCE)	Cicero (106-43BCE) Roman statesman, philosopher, lawyer and orator	Scattered but influential comments; saw comedy and characters as sources for rhetorical use. Defined the purpose of comedy as 'the imitation of life, the mirror of manners, and the image of truth' (Donatus, De Comoedia et Tragoedia C4CE). ⁶¹ Much repeated particularly during the Renaissance. ⁶² In Brutus (liv199) he argued that the audience was an instrument on which the orator or actor plays , ⁶³ an idea picked up by Bacon. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of theatre: positive		To imitate/reflect life; to produce an image of truth	Doing: acting - the actor plays upon the audience as on an instrument
The Art of Poetry (1BCE)	Horace (c68-8BCE) Roman poet, philosopher and drama critic	Essential theorist. Often considered to be the Roman equivalent to Aristotle's Poetics (although Sidnell says this is a 'mistake') ⁶⁴ and the sole work from the period to rival its influence; 'endlessly debated' both as a work of poetry and a literary theory; considered drama and then the epic as the most significant poetic genres. One of the puzzles of the work is that it was produced at a time when interest in drama, particularly the writing of satyr-plays, was slight, and 'there is no evidence ... that satyr-plays were ever performed at Rome, either in the Augustan period or at any other time'. ⁶⁵ This suggests that Horace was deriving his ideas from Aristotle, and indeed, this is how Horace was often seen during the Renaissance, however, the differences between the two are 'more striking than the similarities', and Horace is thought to have been unlikely to have had direct access to Aristotle's work. In particular, his 'emphasis on the didactic function of poetry, the insistence on "decorum" and propriety in all aspects of poetic composition, the necessary		To teach: things are remembered more when seen rather than just heard; to delight	Doing: poetry; playwrighting (literature); Showing: things which might disgust and shock belief should not be shown on stage (decorum)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		blend of ars and ingenium in the making of poetry, and the “five-act” rule’ lacks ‘any clear precedent’ in Aristotle.⁶⁶ <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. stressed decorum and appropriateness (central concerns of Roman criticism) 2. hints of a ‘method’ form of acting: if an actor was to make spectators weep, he had first to feel grief himself 3. the aims are ‘to delight’ (pleasure) and ‘to profit’ (instruction) – central concerns taken up in neo-classical theatre theory. 4. writers should attempt to be truthful (verisimilitude – another concept which received wildly different interpretations in later history). Horace stressed rules. His view of the need for decorum (the idea that the language, action and dress of characters should be appropriate for their age, gender and social status) was perhaps the first consideration of what we would now call shared conventions between performers and spectators or spectator expectation. While he considered that ‘A thing when heard ... strikes less keen/On the spectator’s mind than when ‘tis seen’, he believed certain things should not be shown on stage: ‘Yet ‘twere not well in public to display/A business best transacted far away’.⁶⁷ Horace is said to have ‘detested the vulgar mob and deplored the poor taste of “unlearned and foolish spectators” who called for bears or boxers’.⁶⁸ Drama was for ‘utility and pleasure’:⁶⁹ to instruct through enjoyment: ‘The aim of a poet is either to benefit or to please/or to say what is both enjoyable and of service ... everyone votes for the man who mixes wholesome and sweet/giving his readers an equal blend of help and delight’.⁷⁰ According to Bellinger, ‘certain verse forms and meters, said Horace, have been established as appropriate to comedy, others to tragedy, and these recognized styles should be followed. A tragic hero should not speak in the same rhythm as a comic one. Characters should be consistent with themselves, and should conform to the general expectation: boys should be childish, youth fond of sport, reckless and fickle, mature men should be businesslike and prudent, while old men should remain praisers of the past, sluggish and grudging. The poet should not try to change the character of well-known figures of the stage, such as Agamemnon, Medea, Hercules; at the same time, he should not stick too closely to the stock of subjects. When beginning a play, avoid pomposity and grandiloquence; but when once the play is launched, rush the spectator on through the action, leaving out the ungrateful parts of the story. Do not present ugly things on the			Watching: things are remembered more when seen rather than just heard (need for verisimilitude)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		stage. The traditional structure of plots should be used, but such contrivances as the god-from-the-machine should not be worked to death. Keep to the three-actor play, and remember to use the chorus for the expression of moral sentiments and religious tone. Above all things, stick to the Greek models. Some people may have been fools enough to admire Plautus, but that is no reason why everyone should do so. Plautus is rude and barbarous, not worthy of study beside the Greeks. Every play should either instruct or delight--better if it does both. "Mix pleasure and profit, and you are safe." Such were the rather humdrum instructions of Horace, who indeed followed Aristotle, but a long way behind. It was the influence of Horace, however, which was largely responsible for the perpetuation of the so-called "rules of Aristotle" through the Renaissance to modern times. Some of the medieval and Renaissance writers, however, had a positive genius for misinterpreting and misreading both Aristotle and Horace; so neither one should be held to blame for all the crimes committed in the name of classicism.⁷¹ Horace's theory had little influence in his own time.⁷² Purpose of Theorist: Analysis-prescriptive View of theatre: positive; functional

¹ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.14

² Carlson discounts Aristophanes' critiques of Euripides in The Acharnians and Peace as 'exaggerated and often unfair' (Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.15).

³ Quoted in Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers.202

⁴ Plato. 1997a. 'Republic'. In Plato: Complete Works, edited by J. M. Cooper. Indianapolis, Cambridge: Hackett Publishing Company, pp. 971-1222.

⁵ Plato. 1997b. 'Laws'. In Plato: Complete Works, edited by J. M. Cooper. Indianapolis/Cambridge: Hackett Publishing Company, pp. 1318-1616. Most dates for Plato's works are contested (Cooper 1997: xii).

⁶ Sidnell has 429-327BCE.

⁷ Sidnell 1991: 16

⁸ Hallward, Peter. 2006. 'Staging Equality'. New Left Review 37 (January-February).

⁹ Note, however, that the meaning of the term mimesis had not yet been fixed, and Plato used it in a number of ways. For instance it could mean imitation, and refer to poets, painters and actors or it could mean impersonation (Sidnell 1991: 16n2).

¹⁰ Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006. 'Introduction to Theatre--the online course'. Northern Virginia Community College <http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm> (accessed 2/3/2007).

-
- ¹¹ Plato Symposium in Cooper, J.M. (ed), Plato: Complete Works, trans. A. Nehamas and P. Woodruff, Indianapolis, Cambridge, Hackett Publishing Company, pp. 457-505; also in Great Dialogues of Plato, New York, Mentor Books.
- ¹² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.40
- ¹³ Cited in Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.38
- ¹⁴ Weber 2004: 38
- ¹⁵ Weber 2004: 254
- ¹⁶ Sidnell 1991: 16
- ¹⁷ See Nightingale, Andrea Wilson. 2004. Spectacles of Truth in Classical Greek Philosophy: Theoria in its Cultural Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- ¹⁸ All quotations from Aristotle are from The Complete Works of Aristotle, the revised Oxford translation, edited by Jonathan Barnes, 1984, Princeton University Press.
- ¹⁹ Nicoll 1962: 201
- ²⁰ Nicoll 1962: 201
- ²¹ Trumbull 1998-2006
- ²² Tigerstedt, E.N. 2003. 'Poetry and Poetics from Antiquity to the Mid-Eighteenth Century'. In The Dictionary of the History of Ideas. Charlottesville VA: Electronic Text Center, University of Virginia Library, pp. 526-532. 526
- ²³ Trumbull 1998-2006
- ²⁴ Sidnell 1991: 7
- ²⁵ Weber 2004: 99-100
- ²⁶ Fergusson, Francis 1961, 'Introduction', Aristotle's Poetics, London, McGill-Queens University Press, p10.
- ²⁷ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.7-8
- ²⁸ Weber 2004: 254
- ²⁹ Aristotle's view of reality is that of a process or 'becoming' (Carlson 1984: 17)
- ³⁰ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269.269. Mimesis or imitation has often been taken to support the kind of realism which appeared in the naturalistic theatre on the mid-C19th. However, Capon argues that this is a misunderstanding of the term, something which can easily be seen when one considers that it was used to describe a theatre which was 'as 'total' in its scope and as stylized in its execution as anything that has ever existed' (Capon 1965: 269).
- ³¹ Alice Lovelace 1996, 'A Brief History of Theater Forms', In Motion Magazine, February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27 February 2007.
- ³² Aristotle 1959/c335-322BCE, Politics and The Athenian Constitution, edited, translated and introduced by John Warrington, Heron Books, in arrangement with J.M. Dent & Sons, pp. 219-220.
- ³³ Sidnell 1991: 33
- ³⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.39
- ³⁵ Sata, Megumi 1989, 'Aristotle's Poetics and Zeami's Teachings on Style and the Flower, Asian Theatre Journal 6(1), pp. 47-56.
- ³⁶ See G. Else 1963, Aristotle's Poetics: The Argument, Cambridge MA, Harvard University Press.
- ³⁷ Sidnell 1991: 7

-
- ³⁸ Sidnell says that the absence of a treatise on comedy has generally been attributed to the loss of much of Aristotle's work, not that he didn't write one. Many have tried to reconstruct (or construct) such a work, beginning with Robortello (1548) and most recently in Janko's 1986 book Aristotle on Comedy. Eco, in his novel The Name of the Rose (1983) has a copy of Aristotle's 'work' on comedy 'deliberately suppressed by reactionary clerics, rediscovered, and destroyed' (Sidnell 1991: 10).
- ³⁹ Sidnell 1991: 33
- ⁴⁰ Carlson 1984: 21.
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 21.
- ⁴² Carlson 1984: 21
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 21.
- ⁴⁴ Preserved in Diogenes Laertius' Lives of the Eminent Philosophers. The most complete account of Epicurus' teachings is in Lucretius' De rerum natura (J.C.A. Gaskin 1995, 'Epicurus', in Honderich, Ted, ed. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 240).
- ⁴⁵ Quoted in Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 147.
- ⁴⁶ Gaskin 1995: 240.
- ⁴⁷ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]. 159
- ⁴⁸ Christian, Lynda G. 1987. Theatrum Mundi: The History of an Idea. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc. 12
- ⁴⁹ McGillivray 2007: 159
- ⁵⁰ Gaskin 1995: 240
- ⁵¹ Hundert 1994: 147
- ⁵² Paulson, Ronald. 1976. 'Life as Journey and as Theater: Two Eighteenth-Century Narrative Structures'. New Literary History 8 (1) pp. 43-58.
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 21
- ⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 21
- ⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 22
- ⁵⁶ Carlson 1984: 22
- ⁵⁷ Has been attributed to Aristotle, his students or an imitator; provides an insight into late Greek and early Roman comic theory (Carlson 1984: 22)
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 23-6
- ⁵⁹ Although there are no records extant which can prove this connection, both Burbage and Dee were sponsored by the Earl of Leicester, and Dee was interested enough in the theatre to devise some mechanical effects for it. His library, which he particularly made available to artisans such as Burbage, contained copies of Vitruvius in Latin, French and Italian, including Daniele Barbaro's edition which contained plans by Palladio. Dee also possessed a French translation of Alberti's De re aedificatoria and his own Preface to Euclid substantially referred to Vitruvius. Given Leicester's interest in both and the open invitation to the artisan classes to make use of Dee's collection, it is likely they would have known each other and that Burbage would have had some use of Dee's library and Dee's knowledge of Vitruvius (Yates 1969).
- ⁶⁰ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd. 95-118.
- ⁶¹ Reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 79.

-
- ⁶² See Postlewait, Thomas. 1988. 'The Criteria for Periodization in Theatre History'. Theatre Journal 40 (3) pp. 299-318. 302 and West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287. 252
- ⁶³ Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34.
- ⁶⁴ Sidnell 1991: 62
- ⁶⁵ Sidnell 1991: 62
- ⁶⁶ Sidnell 1991: 63
- ⁶⁷ Horace, 'The Art of Poetry', in Satires, Epistles, and Ars Poetica, trans. John Conington, London, G. Bell and Sons, 1922; reprinted in Gerould 2000: 70-83.
- ⁶⁸ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 68
- ⁶⁹ Horace cited in Krasner 2008: 9
- ⁷⁰ Horace 331-344, in Horace: Satires and Epistles/Persius: Satires: A Verse Translation with an Introduction by Niall Rudd 1979, Penguin; reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 73-4.
- ⁷¹ Bellinger, Martha 1927, 'The Maxims of Horace', A Short History of the Drama, New York: Henry Holt and Company, pp. 89-90, from <http://www.theatrehistory.com/ancient/horace002.html>, accessed 21/04/11.
- ⁷² Trumbull 1998-2006

Table 2/51 Theories of Theatre 1CE to 1200

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Epistles ; various other writings	Seneca (4BCE-65CE) Roman Stoic, philosopher and dramatist	Seneca's philosophical writings and letters are devoted to the working through of the Stoic philosophy as a positive means to achieve wisdom. His dramas, though, especially Medea , seem to offer a negative working out of the philosophy when its dialogic nature is grounded in individual passion rather than community values. In general, Seneca observed that poets (as opposed to philosophers) were 'indifferent to ethical truths', partly because they 'make us believe wealth is important'. However, he also believed that 'poetry sharpens the meaning' and that 'drama can provide the viewer with a corrective mirror of his own sins': ¹ 'It is easy to rile up a listener to want what is right; for to all of us nature gave the foundation and the seed of the virtues ... Don't you see how the theater goes resound together every time things are said which we publicly recognize and unanimously avow to be true? ... The same things are heard more carelessly and make less of an impression when spoken in prose; but when meter is added and fixed feet constrain a striking idea, the same sentiment is hurled as if from a more violent throw'. ² Seneca, like most elite Romans of the time, had a disparaging view of actors, but was not against writing for the theatre, even though his major characters seem to mock his Stoic theories. Purpose of Theorist: Analysis of drama View of Theatre: functional; negative (towards actors)	A place to which people go to listen to poetry	Instruction; example; a social mirror: theatre offers a way to remind listeners of virtue.	Doing: drama (performed poetry) Showing: what is right Watching: listeners recognize virtue even if they personally fail to live virtuously
Nāṭyaśāstra C1 st CE (c400BCE-200BCE)	Bharata Muni ³ (cC1BCE-C1CE) Indian musicologist	Nāṭya is made up of words, music, movement, make-up and emotional acting (drama+dance+music). It not only teaches but it gives pleasure. It is a gift from Brahma and is designed to encompass the demonic elements of life. It gives 'peace, entertainment and happiness, as well as beneficial advice based on the actions of high, low and middle people. It brings rest and peace to persons afflicted by sorrow or fatigue or grief or helplessness. There is no art, no knowledge, no yoga, no action, that is not found in Nāṭya '. Spectators enjoy the various emotions expressed by the actors, coming to experience through this, rasa . Rasa is like taste, 'the cumulative result of stimulus, involuntary reactions and voluntary reactions'. Decorum must be shown. Since families attend the theatre together, there should be nothing shown which would make any member blush. The production of drama is 'intended to be successful'. Success can be measured by the reactions of spectators – which can range from smiling, laughter, 'hair	A place of performance	Pleasure; instruction	Doing: performing using words, movement and music Showing: decorum Watching: spectators experience rasa , and respond in a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		standing on end', exclamations in the course of the drama ('how wonderful!' or 'Alas!'), vociferous applause and standing ovations. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: Prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional			variety of ways to indicate the success of the drama
Institutes of Oratory	Quintilian (c40-118) Roman rhetorician	interested only in dramatists as possible models for orators (poetry was considered as part of grammar) Purpose of Theorist: Analysis View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: poetry
Comparison between Aristophanes and Menander	Plutarch (c50-125) Roman historian	Menander is praised for his balance, temperance, decorum and sense of appropriateness; Aristophanes condemned for mixing tragedy and comedy, lewdness, and inappropriate characterisations. Tragic drama is useful because it can 'prepare one for the misfortunes of life, and teach one to avoid errors of judgment'. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Rehearsal for life; instruction	Doing: Poetry (tragedy and comedy)
De spectaculis (c198)	Tertullian (c160-c220) Church Father, theologian	The most extended and bitter early attack on theatre. Three basic arguments against spectacles: 1. the scriptures were against them 2. they were 'idolatrous' in nature 3. Their effects were evil (Platonist view). The theatre [spectacles] stimulates frenzy and the passions and encourages a loss of self-control: 'There is no spectacle without violent agitation of the soul'. Tertullian is the source of much subsequent anti-theatrical commentary; he marks the beginning of an obsession with the effects of 'theatre' on its spectators which is a hallmark of the writings of the Church Fathers and medieval scholarship to the Renaissance and linked also with their view of rhetoric. Cheney considers that Tertullian's rant against the theatre 'contains, by implication, practically the whole history of the theatre in Europe ... for nearly a millennium ... [he] set forth graphically not only the iniquities of the Roman stage of his time, but also the means by which the Christian Church was to strangle theatric art ... for eight hundred years': distrust of the pleasures of life, 'including dressing up and congregating socially'; zeal for redeeming men's souls; intolerance and threats (Tertullian cited examples of women who had attended theatre either dying horribly or becoming possessed). ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A place of spectacle	Stimulation of the passions through spectacle	Watching: negative effect on spectators: encouraged frenzy and passion and produce violent agitation of the soul
Enneads I.6: 'Beauty'	Plotinus (205-269)	Opened a way to justify art on Platonic grounds by a redefinition of mimesis : 'the artist imitates not material but spiritual things'. He is therefore 'a visionary, not a mere		Representation (mimesis)	Doing: imitation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	Neo-Platonist philosopher	observer'. ⁷ Plotinus applied this to sculpture, but the idea was taken up by Proclus and applied to poetry and drama and could be said to have contributed to the misreading of drama as a form of poetry. Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-Plato; defence of mimesis View of Theatre: n/a
On the Mysteries	Iamblichus (c250-325) Syrian Neoplatonist philosopher	Concern: effect on spectators: when we witness the emotions of others in either comedy or tragedy, we qualify our own; we 'work them off more moderately, and are purged by them'. ⁸ (Includes himself as spectator) Purpose of Theorist: Analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place where spectators witness the emotions of others	Purgation; self-moderation	Watching: efficacious
	Melampus (pseudonym) C3rd	Printed along with Diomedes during the Renaissance. Either he or Diomedes was reputed to have said that the aim of tragedy was to move the hearer to tears while that of comedy was to move them to laughter: a limitation of the scope of both. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place where tragedy was heard	To stimulate and direct emotion (affect)	Doing: drama
	Arius (c250-c336) Priest and heretic	Arius outlined a plan for a Christian theatre to counter the pagan drama. He was excommunicated for his 'heretical doctrinal views'. ¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-pagan theatre View of Theatre: functional	An art form	To proselytise	Doing: drama
Ars grammatica	Diomedes Grammaticus (fl. C4th) Latin Grammarian	Printed in Paris in 1498 and 1527. Still influential during the French Renaissance. ¹¹ Drama was a form of poetry (because it was written in verse) which was enacted. The essence of poetry lies in its metrical structure. Distinguished three major genres of poetry based on the number/role of the speakers (from Aristotle): dramatic (only the 'personages' spoke); narrative (only the poet spoke) and epic (a mixture of poet and personages spoke). This idea came from Plato, although we do not know how Diomedes came to know of it. ¹² Also reputed to have said that the aim of the tragedy is to move us to tears, that of comedy to laughter and that when we witness these emotions we qualify our own and thus purge them. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place where drama was enacted	Purgation (affect); self-moderation	Doing: Poetry Watching: efficacious
Easter sermon against circuses and spectacles	John Chrysostom (c347 - 407) Archbishop of	Condemned theatre-goers for abandoning themselves to 'transports, to profane cries' and for delivering their souls to the mercy of their passions. (Nevertheless provided a description of theatre: 'In bright daylight curtains are hung up and a number of actors with masks appear. One plays the philosopher, though he is nothing of the kind himself;	A place of spectacle	To mislead; to encourage abandon through	Showing: illusion Watching: negative

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(399)	Constantinople	another plays the king; a third plays the physician, though really only recognizable as such by his costume; an illiterate plays the school master. They represent the opposite of what they are... The philosopher is only one because of the long hair on his mask. '); theatre was misleading (from Plato). ¹³ Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative		illusion	effects on spectators
Confessions (c397); The City of God (413)	Augustine (c350-430) Church Father; Bishop of Hippo Regius (now Algeria)	Condemned theatre because of its effects: the arousal of passions, and the relief of moral responsibility for the pain they see others suffering. ¹⁴ Nevertheless raised significant questions about the effects of theatre, including speculation about why it affected audiences that way. Book II of The City of God contains extensive observations on theatre, with the aim of demonstrating how Roman manners had decayed and how pagan gods were morally inadequate. He cited with approval Plato's banishment of poets from the ideal republic, and Roman legal sanction against actors, and noted that traditional tragedy and comedy were the least objectionable because of their chaste language, and their beauty of language meant that they were read as part of a liberal education. Last of the major figures in the early Church to produce any theoretical considerations of theatre. Also one of the few commentators who tried to explain why tragedy appeared to be so attractive. We have a 'perverse fascination with grief' which is innate; this is positive when it produces pity and compassion because it moves us to take action to alleviate suffering; however, theatre produces a 'feigned and personated' misery which does not require this response. It therefore corrupts the emotion and detaches it from our moral responsibility (Confessions 3, 2-4) by turning suffering into a source of entertainment. He recounts the experience of a student, Alypius, as an example of the negative effects of the theatre (in this case, a Roman gladiatorial contest): 'Instead of turning away, he fixed his eyes upon the scene and drank in all its frenzy, unaware of what he was doing. He was no longer a man who had come to the arena, but simply one of the crowd he had joined'. ¹⁵ Alypius had attempted not to look by closing his eyes but 'the din' had forced him to open his eyes. Like Plato, 'Augustine associates theatre with violence and irrational emotions, with the victory of 'savage passion' over reason and orderly thought ... Alypius goes into the arena a moral man, but leaves it fallen'. ¹⁶ According to Augustine, 'Spectacles transform the emotions, making pain a source of pleasure and rendering ethical feelings a matter of aesthetic enjoyment ... what most troubles Augustine about the theatre is the structural relationship of spectator to spectacle. Alypius	A place of spectacle	To arouse the passions through spectacle	Watching (direct): the excitement of theatre can lead us to forget ourselves (and our moral values) and become one with the crowd.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		falls not just because of what he sees, but because of the way, and the position from which, he sees it'. ¹⁷ Augustine acknowledged the experience of attending the theatre, and cited examples of the effects on others he knew Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative
Handbook on the Seven Liberal Arts ¹⁸ (c410)	Martianus Capella (fl. 410-429) African Roman writer	Very influential during the Middle Ages; accepted as 'authoritative'. ¹⁹ (Poetry, including the classic dramas, studied as literature) Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: poetry (literature)
The Church Fathers eventually made little distinction between the different types of spectacle. References to comedy and tragedy as the Greeks understood them was gradually lost, and eventually lost any necessary connection with drama, now thought of as a form of poetry. ²⁰ Nevertheless, there was a continuing concern with the effects of dramatic poetry on listeners, indicating some experience of performance, if only as recitation.
De Fabula	Evanthius (d. c359) Roman grammarian & rhetorician	Widely distributed and quoted during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Roman view of genres (very influential): 'In comedy, the fortunes of men are middle-class, the dangers are slight, and the ends ... are happy: but in tragedy everything is the opposite – the characters are great men, the fears are intense, and the ends disastrous. In comedy the beginning is troubled, the end tranquil; in tragedy the events follow the reverse order. And in tragedy the kind of life is shown that is to be shunned; while in comedy the kind is shown that is to be sought after. Finally, in comedy the story is always fictitious; while tragedy is often based on historical truth'. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: Dramatic poetry
De Comoedia et Tragoedia (Commentary on Terence) (fragment extant) ²² (c350s)	Aelius Donatus (fl. mid C4th) Roman grammarian and teacher of rhetoric	Donatus taught Latin in Byzantium, which gave him access to Greek theory; he incorporated Evanthius' De Fabula into his commentary for reasons which are now unknown. ²³ His work was widely distributed and quoted during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance (printed in Paris in 1527) and was frequently used as an educational text in humanist schools. ²⁴ He remarked on the staging of classical drama, symbolic values of costumes, delivery of lines and use of music and defined drama as ' a general term: its two main parts are tragedy and comedy ' (Donatus 6.1). Comedy has a didactic function, providing moral lessons to be absorbed by the audience: 'Through them people learn what is useful in life and what, on the other hand, ought to be avoided' (5.1). He was against any self-awareness being displayed by the actor in performance arguing that it was 'incompatible with decorum', indicating an early concern with what became	A place where drama is staged	Instruction; the 'imitation of life and manners' (5.5); teaching	Doing: Drama (tragedy and comedy): writing and staging; acting Showing: moral lessons Watching: educational

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		known as theatricality (see Diderot): ‘how can a character acknowledge that he or she is within a play being watched by an audience without dissolving the rules of propriety? Such self-awareness would destroy the straightforwardness of character that made up the idea of decorum, since any player would be torn between the character he was and the character he portrayed’. ²⁵ This objection, which seems strange for a period which had little awareness of practical theatre, may be because Terence as a dramatist loved to include his spectators in his productions, delighting in the idea of life as theatre and theatre as life. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional 395: Roman Empire finally divided into east and west after the death of Theodosius. 476 Western Roman Empire fell to the Germans.
Commentaries on Plato’s dialogues	Proclus Diadochus (c410-485) Greek Neoplatonist philosopher	Last great figure of the Neo-platonic school of the late classical period. Took up Plotinus’ redefinition of mimesis ; nevertheless supported Plato’s idea that comedy and tragedy should be banned from the ideal state because of its effects on the ‘soul’. The artist is a visionary; he imitates spiritual things, not material things (therefore not imitating an imitation). Nevertheless, drama indulges the passions, offers false and misleading information and tempts ‘the soul’ into diversity and ‘away from the simplicity and unity that characterize both virtue and God’. ²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A place where drama is staged	To affect spectators; to indulge their passions and tempt them away from simplicity and unity	Doing: drama (comedy and tragedy) Showing: false information
484: first schism between Eastern and Western Churches
Commentary on Aristotle; Consolatio philosophio (524)	Anuncius Manlius Severinus Boethius (c480-524) Roman scholar, philosopher and theologian	‘Tragedy’ was a narrative rather than a dramatic genre. This understanding came to dominate the Middle Ages because, for centuries, Aristotle was known in the West only through Boethius’ commentary. ²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: Prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r		To tell a story	Doing: literature
529: Athenian schools close. Although Curtius considers that, with regard to literature, the sixth century was perhaps the most significant in terms of lasting influence, and includes the works of Cassiodorus and ‘the last Roman poet, Venantius Fortunatus’ (Curtius 1990/1948: 22-3), references to either drama or theatre were few.
Originum sive etymol-ogiarum libri	Isidore of Seville (560-636)	Distinguished between comedy and tragedy as two kinds of poetry or drama (carmen) declaimed before listeners, then divided comici into two classes: old (Plautus, Accius, Terence) and new (Horace, Persius, Juvenal). This division led to confusion as to what	A place of spectacle and	Moral degradation	Doing: poetry (comic or tragic)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(Etymologies) (622)	Spanish scholar, Archbishop of Seville	constituted drama , ²⁸ a confusion apparent in John of Salisbury. ²⁹ Isidore also appears to have confused theatrum (theatre) with amphitheatrum (amphitheatre), claiming theatres were places where orgies were enacted, another confusion which continued into the C16th and C17th centuries. ³⁰ Nevertheless, the Etymologies served as a 'basic book' for the entire Middle Ages. ³¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: negative	declamation		declaimed before listeners
800: Charlemagne crowned first Holy Roman Emperor: beginning of the Carolingian period in the West, which produced the Scholia Vindobonensia (C8th-C10th), a line by line commentary on Horace's Ars poetica which indicates that the (unnamed) author had little conception of drama as performance. According to Carlson, Byzantine scholars continued to have access to Greek criticism while scholars in the West continued the Latin tradition, with a loss of the conception of tragedy and comedy as dramatic performances in theatre settings. ³² However, some kind of performance must have continued, perhaps for the masses, because there was confusion between theatre and amphitheatre, with a subsequent confusion between spectacle and theatre, indicating an awareness of theatre as a spectacular activity. Amalarius, Bishop of Metz (c780-850) also drew attention to the dramatic elements in the Mass. 968: University of Cordoba founded. Cordoba was the centre of Arabic culture in Spain
Collection of Christian comedies (c950-1001; first published in 1501)	Hrosvitha (c935-1001) German (Saxon) nun, poet and playwright	Earliest known female dramatist. She studied classical Roman texts for their form and style. Wrote her six plays (in rhymed Latin) to counter the 'evil effects' of Terence's comedies; they aimed 'to glorify Christian virgins' and featured martyrdom, conversions, renunciations of sinful pasts and penance as recurring themes. There was no evidence they were performed, although they may have been read aloud. ³³ Drama as instruction (an early attempt to use the same form of composition used by the ancients for good effect). Purpose of Theorist: Polemic – anti-pagan theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A performed art	Moral instruction	Doing: Playwrighting
C12th: early glimmerings of new awareness of theatre? A closet play, Christos Paschon appeared during this period. It was originally thought to have been written by Gregory of Nazianus (c329-c389). A third of the 2640 lines were paraphrases of Euripides. 1113: first modern European university founded in Bologna
Gemma Animae (c1100)	Honorius of Autun (d. c1151) Christian theologian, disciple of Amalarius	Stressed the dramatic elements in the Mass: 'It is known that those who recited tragedies in the theatres represented to the people, by their gestures, the actions of conflicting forces. Even so our tragedian represents to the Christian people in the theatre of the church, by his gestures, the struggle of Christ, and impresses upon them the victory of his redemption'. Gestures in tragedies represent 'the actions of conflicting forces'. ³⁴	A place where drama was recited	Representation	Doing: Performance - recitation of tragedies with gestures Showing: the action of conflicting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: Polemic- defence of theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional			forces
	John Tzetzes (c1110-1180) Byzantine (Georgian) scholar, poet and grammarian	Observations on tragedy and comedy which indicate the influence of classic Greek sources. Comedy: imitates an action, purges emotions, is constructive of life, is moulded by laughter and pleasure and embraces fictitious accounts of everyday life. Its aim is to move hearers to laughter in order to produce social equilibrium . Comedy ridicules evil-doers and ‘pestilent’ fellows, settling the rest into ‘decorum’. Comedy founds life and ‘renders it solid’. ³⁵ Tragedy: concerns deeds from the past represented as happening in the present with the aim of moving hearers to lamentation; tragedy ‘dissolves’ life. The emphasis on hearing and decorum indicates familiarity with Latin conceptions Purpose of Theorist: Prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place where people listen	To move hearers to laughter through ridicule and thereby generate social equilibrium	Doing: Tragedy and comedy(as recitation)

¹ Bartsch, Shadi. 2006. The Mirror of the Self: Sexuality, Self-Knowledge, and the Gaze in the Early Roman Empire. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.279

² Epistle 108.8-10 in Bartsch 2006: 279

³ Although most of this history table is concerned with Western theatre, the existence of theorists such as Bharata, and later Zeami and Li Yu, all of whom wrote in the absence of any knowledge of western theatre, indicates that neither the urge towards theatre nor the development of theatre was the uniquely western phenomenon it has so long been taken to be. What these theorists perhaps also indicate is that the development of theatre in one direction rather than another has much more to do with the view the state and/or society tends to take of it. Where it is accorded a significant place in the life of a people, it will develop into a very sophisticated form. Where the common people are generally treated with disdain, a split occurs between the kinds of performances that are considered to be theatre.

⁴ Bharata Muni 1986/c1CE, Nāṭyaśāstra, trans. Adya Rangacharya, Bangalore, Ibh Prakashama; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 86-95.

⁵ Bartsch 2006: 279n96

⁶ Cheney, Sheldon. 1930. The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft. 2nd ed. London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co. 135.

⁷ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 27

⁸ Carlson 1984: 27

⁹ Carlson 1984: 27

¹⁰ Cheney 1930: 137

¹¹ Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI).441n24

¹² Curtius 1990/1948: 440

¹³ Carlson 1984: 29

-
- ¹⁴ Hundert, E.J. 1992. 'Augustine and the Sources of the Divided Self'. Political Theory 20 (1) pp. 86-104.95
- ¹⁵ Quoted in Potolsky, Matthew 2006, Mimesis, Abingdon, NY, Routledge, p. 71.
- ¹⁶ Potolsky 2006: 72
- ¹⁷ Potolsky 2006: 73
- ¹⁸ The seven Liberal Arts formed the basis of a 'liberal' education from the Middle Ages until at least C19th. They were divided into the Trivium (grammar, rhetoric and logic) which was studied initially in introductory levels of university and then in grammar schools, and the Quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, astronomy and music), which was studied in the higher levels of university. Poetry (including plays) was included under grammar).
- ¹⁹ Curtius 1990/1948: 22
- ²⁰ Carlson 1984: 30
- ²¹ Evanthius 1974, 'De fabula', trans. O.B. Hardison Jr, Classical and Medieval Literary Criticism, New York, p. 305; quoted in Carlson 1984: 25.
- ²² Wessner, Paul (ed.) 1962-3, Donatus: Commentum Terenti, Stuttgart; reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 79-83.
- ²³ Sidnell 1991: 78
- ²⁴ West 1999: 261
- ²⁵ West 1999: 261
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 27
- ²⁷ Kirwan, C. 1995, 'Boethius', in Honderich, Ted, ed. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.97.
- ²⁸ Exact notions of what ancient drama had been like had been practically lost at this stage (Christian 1987: 235n2 see page 64)
- ²⁹ Christian 1987: 235n2
- ³⁰ Christian 1987: 238:n8
- ³¹ Curtius 1990: 23. In Labyrinths (1970), Borges has the Islamic scholar Averroes attempting to come up with a definition of theatre from a scrap of Aristotle's writings, to absurd ends. This story, and Christian's discussion of Isidore of Seville's misunderstanding of theatre as amphitheatre serve as reminders to beware of seemingly familiar words in historical documents. The word drama is particularly problematic in this regard as it is applied retrospectively so much that it becomes difficult to locate when it came into use in any one period. For example, neither a nineteenth century nor a twentieth century Latin dictionary carries the word drama as a Latin word. Plays were called fabula or carmen. This does not mean that learned Romans didn't use the Greek word, but, reading works that have been many times translated, it is not easy to be sure what the original word used in reference to plays was.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 30
- ³³ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.124
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 31
- ³⁵ Cited in Carlson 1984: 31

Table 3/51 Theories of Theatre 1201 – 1500

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1204: Fourth Crusade captured Constantinople, giving West access to Greek writings.¹ 1236: Cordoba fell to Spain, also giving the West access to Arabic holdings of Greek writings, as well as their comments on it. The rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics with the translation of Aristotle from Arabic texts and commentaries reintroduced the concept of drama which came to be equated with playwrighting – specifically the writing of tragedies and comedies. However, the bias towards the use of drama for moral ends (to instruct) meant initially a stronger concern with audience appeal than Aristotle allowed.² At the same time, the reactions of spectators were often considered 'confused' by elite theatre-goers.³ C13th: 'brought a burst of theatrical activity' in a renewed interest in spectacle. Although the Italian Renaissance was not to become known for its great playwrighting,⁴ it not only saw the 'rebirth' of theatre both as an art form and a place, but its restructuring. Almost all western theatre was eventually to be influenced by the developments in Italy – from dramatic criticism, the imposition of rigorous rules for play construction to the unparalleled advances in architecture for theatre and scenic construction.⁵
Commentary on Aristotle's Poetics , (translated into Latin in 1256 by Hermannus Alemannus)	Averroës of Cordova (1126-1198) Arabic philosopher, astronomer, scholar and writer	The translator, Hermannus Alemannus, distinguishes between two traditional attitudes towards poetry: poetry as a branch of rhetoric (from Cicero) and poetry as a branch of grammar (from Horace) and claims Aristotle (based on Averroës' translation) represented a third tradition: poetry as a branch of logic. The aim was, as for Cicero, ethical instruction. Averroës' work 'harmonized' well with prevailing attitudes and gained widespread acceptance. It was printed in 1481. Averroës misunderstood the term mimesis and the idea of spectacle: 'Every poem and all poetry are either praise [tragedy] or blame [comedy]'. Attributes 'moral instruction' to Aristotle's view of drama, a misunderstanding which continues for several centuries: virtue and vice are the basis of both action and character; the goal is to encourage 'what is proper' and reject 'what is base'. Tragedy stimulates the 'animal passions' (pity, fear, sorrow) in order to perturb the soul so that it will be receptive to virtue. ⁶ Spectacle is deliberation (consideratio), presentation 'a kind of public reading' which was unnecessary since skilled poets did not need to enhance their reputations 'through extrinsic aids like dramatic gestures and facial expressions.' ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place of public reading	Ethical instruction – to praise (tragedy) or blame (comedy)	Doing: Poetry
A period of struggle by both scholars and performers to accommodate Aristotle into considerations of what drama meant and what could be included in the only kinds of drama available – the dramatic poems, mystery plays and Church processions - amidst an increasing concern with audience appeal. Translations (some better than others) proliferated, in Latin, Greek and the vernacular. Latin translations of Aristotle travelled from Italy to Spain after 1536. William of Moerbeke, Bishop of Corinth, produced a reasonably accurate translation of Aristotle's Poetics directly from the Greek in 1278, but it was not considered compatible with current views and was not printed until the C20th – a missed opportunity!⁸
Catholicon	Johannes	Ideas of comedy and tragedy handed down from the grammarians (e.g. Donatus who saw			Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1286)	Januensis de Balbis (John of Genoa) (d. 1298) Italian grammarian and priest	comedy as ‘the epitome of public and private fortune without peril of life ... the imitation of life, the mirror of custom, and the image of truth’. ⁹ Comedy ‘deals with private citizens, was written in humble style, began unhappily and ended happily’; tragedy ‘dealt with kings and princes, was written in elevated style, began happily and ended unhappily’. ¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r			(literature)
c1315: Eccerinus , by Albertino Mussato (1261-1329) said to be the first tragedy of the Renaissance (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 154)
Epistle to Can Grande della Scala (c1315)	Dante Alighieri (1265-1321) Italian poet	As in Averroës, the terms comedy and tragedy apply only to different poetic forms. ‘[T]heatrical connotations ... have almost totally disappeared’. ¹¹ Dante’s influence was widespread during the following century, including on Chaucer. Tragedy ‘begins admirably and tranquilly, whereas its end or exit is foul and terrible’; its language is ‘exalted and sublime’. Comedy ‘introduces some harsh complication, but brings its matter to a prosperous end’; its language is ‘lax and humble’. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: poetry (literature)
c1350: Paulus by Pier Paolo Vergerio (1370-1445) said to be the first comedy of the Renaissance, although comic theatrical sketches were presented at graduations at Italian academies. ¹³
Commentaries on Divine Comedy (1375)	Benvenuto da Imola (c1320-1388) Italian academic	Da Imola lectured at the University of Bologna. His commentaries were the first significant attempt to apply Averroës’ version of Aristotle, but to literature rather than drama. Tragedy is about praise; comedy is about blame. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		To praise or blame: moral judgment	Doing: poetry (literature) – tragedy and comedy
End 1300’s: Manuel Chrysolaras revived the teaching of Greek.¹⁵ 1347-1351: Black Death ravaged Europe. It killed one third of the English population. 1402: the Confrère de la Passion was organised in Paris to present religious plays.¹⁶ After 1453: transfer of surviving Greek and Roman manuscripts to Italy, followed by the publication of all extant plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, Plautus, Terence and Seneca, as well as the works of Aristotle and Horace.¹⁷ The ‘resurrection of [Aristotle’s] Poetics ... created a profound shift in European theatre theory’ away from Horace and from the Medieval and early Renaissance idea of theatre as useful for moral instruction and towards an obsession with mimesis.¹⁸ This shift culminated in, and was exemplified by Pope’s An Essay on Criticism (1711) in which Pope asserted that ‘great art comes from the imitation of role models’.¹⁹ It arose at the same time as the commedia dell’arte (comedy of the profession) and allowed a clear distinction to be made between ‘highbrow’ theatre and mere entertainment, as well as providing a criterion by which different national theatres could be judged.²⁰ The implications of these distinctions can still be felt today.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1456: Jehan le Prieur's mystery play Mystère de la Résurrection was rejected by clerical authorities in Angers because it included parts that were considered 'irrelevant to the subject'.²¹ 1468: Ludus Coventriae (Coventry Plays) preserved in a manuscript from 1468. Where and how the Ludus was performed is unknown. It is preceded by a verse prologue which says that the play will consist of forty pageants (not extant). It seems more appropriate to call it a play rather than a processional, although there is an intermediary (the Doctor) between actors and spectators and it is mostly allegorical like most medieval processions. Nevertheless it contains some elements of dramatised realism which suggest a move towards theatrical awareness. It promotes the view of drama, traceable back to Horace that it should both 'delight' and instruct.²² Early Tudor period in England produced no systematic discussion of drama, despite overlaps with rhetoric (for example with regard to the concept of decorum).²³
De re aedificatoria (Ten Books on Architecture) (1485)	Leo (Leone) Battista Alberti (1404-1472) Italian architect	Popularized Vitruvius' De architectura (90BCE). Alberti's book was 'very widely known throughout Europe' and was published in Italian in 1550, in French in 1547 and 1572, in English in 1725. ²⁴ Offered a 'sanctification' of theatre which was to be widely used, and the idea of theatre as socially useful: 'Neither dare I presume to find fault with our Pontiffs, and those who Businesse it is to set a good Example to others, for having ... abolished the Use of publick Shows. Yet Moses was commended for ordaining, that all his people should ... meet together in one Temple and celebrate publick Festivals at stated Seasons ... Doubtless he hoped the People, by thus meeting together ... might grow more humane, and be closer linked in Friendship one with another'. Different kinds of entertainment were used for different kinds of effects: 'some [poetry and music] were contrived for the Delight and Amusement of Peace and Leisure' while others [such as 'Wrestling, Boxing, Fencing, Shooting, Running'] were for 'the Exercise of War and Business'. Theatres were created for the former while circuses or amphitheatres were created for the latter. ²⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place for public shows and entertainment	Functional: entertainment, leisure, training: provided instruction in the development of civility	Showing: civility Watching: produced a sense of community as well as helped develop a variety of skills (depending on the kind of theatre)
1490: an early attempt by Italian Francesco di Giorgio to reconstruct the acoustics of ancient theatre, based on Vitruvius. ²⁶
De institutione reipublicae (1494)	Francesco Patrizi of Sienna (1413-1494) Italian political writer	Plato was mistaken in banishing poets from the ideal city, since 'the enticements of fiction were an excellent aid to teaching'. ²⁷ Patrizi did however want to ban tragedy and comedy. Tragedy 'has within it a certain excessive violence mixed with despair which readily changes stupid men into madmen and drives the unstable to frenzy' while comedy 'corrupts the mores of men, makes them effeminate, and drives them to lust and dissipation.' ²⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic: pro-poetry; anti-drama View of Theatre: negative		Instruction; the stirring of the passions	Doing: poetry
1498 A Latin translation of Aristotle's Poetics by Italian scholar, Giorgio Valla (c1447-c1500) – a moderately accurate version of Aristotle which failed to be taken up because it was not compatible with current thinking which was still influenced by the Hermannus translation of Averroës' version. ²⁹ Diomedes Grammaticus's Ars grammatical (C4th)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
was printed in Paris. The essence of poetry lay in its metrical structure. There were three major genres of poetry based on the number/role of the speakers: dramatic (only the 'personages' spoke); narrative (only the poet spoke) and epic (a mixture of poet and personages spoke). ³⁰ Speaking was not necessarily taken to be recitation.
On the Art of the Nō Drama C15th	Zeami (1363-1443) Japanese performer and theorist	Essential theorist. Zeami used the idea of the Flower as a metaphor for nō. The charm of both lay in their ephemerality and in their ability to reproduce something familiar as something new (although containing within itself the seeds of all previous flowers or performances). For the nō artist this involves constant practice and the development of technique to such a level that he is able to transcend his technique, moving beyond mere imitation to showing the 'inner music' of the role. Zeami believed that an actor who specialised in a particular role would not be able to do this because he would never be able to understand what was special about the role without some contrast and would therefore never be able to offer something novel to spectators. The aim always was to offer something novel, even in a performance which spectators knew well. The 'real flower' was 'the one that seems novel to the imagination of the spectator'. The Cause of this Effect of novelty was the skill of the actor. An artist with a good technique could pace his performances so as to conserve his energies. The Flower was the means to give rise to a sensation of the unexpected in the audience and exists 'only to the extent that the actor has a firm self-understanding of the principle of novelty in all things'.³¹ Blau argued that Zeami demonstrated that 'it is possible to perform the seeming absence of an ado as a precise nothing to be done'.³² The art of appearing to do nothing involved enormous concentration of mind, in which the artist 'connected all the arts together', an artist's 'greatest and most secret skill'.³³ Megumi Sata compares Aristotle's theory of drama with that of Zeami's in terms of 'imitation, play structure, effects, and definition of success'. Imitation: a key word for both theorists: 'tragedy is the imitation of an action' (Aristotle); 'Role-playing involves an imitation' (Zeami). Both thought imitation should be 'beautiful' i.e. it should enhance. However, Aristotle addressed his theory to the poet or dramatist, while Zeami addressed the actor-poet. Imitation 'always refers to the actor's role-playing'. It was always about character, and it was an art of the actor (not the poet). The imitator is the actor, and the object of imitation is a character type. Structure: another key term for both theorists. Both stressed the important of wholeness and a sense of unity: every play should have a sense of completion. Both divide a play into three sections: beginning, middle and end (Aristotle); jo (introduction), ha (breaking) and kyū (rapid). For Zeami, 'The proper sequence of jo, ha and kyū provides the sense of		to bring happiness to the spectators; to stimulate the imagination of the spectators	Doing: performance; playwrighting Showing: perfect unfolding, demonstrating something novel Watching: the stimulation of the imagination by the performer led the spectator to experience something unexpected

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Fulfillment' (Zeami). Zeami is talking about the dynamics of live performance: unity comes from the internal coherence of the performance, based on the use of rhythmic effects. Effect: both theorists argue that the effect of a play is achieved through imitation within a certain structure, and for both, the concept of effect involves a relationship with spectators. For Zeami the proper effects of the play are 'mysterious beauty' (yūgen) and novelty. Novelty depends on spectator knowledge and experience because it involves a comparison between the present performance and previously experienced performance. Spectators grant the effects but here, only spectators can decide whether they have felt a sense of surprise: 'When the audience can express its astonishment as one with a gasp, the moment of Fulfillment has come' (Zeami, Finding Gems). The emphasis is on the performance rather than the text – Zeami was an actor, and starts his analysis from the point of view of performance. Success: for Aristotle, a successful tragedy was 'a properly written work with a well composed plot. For Zeami, 'a successful play of the first rank is based on an authentic source, reveals something unusual in aesthetic qualities, has an appropriate climax, and shows Grace (yūgen)' (Teachings on Style). i.e. success is related to performance: 'Most spectators assume that if a good play is given a fine performance, the results will be successful, yet surprisingly enough such a performance may not succeed' (Teachings on Style). Success can only be judged in relation to performance because a successful performance is one 'which is accepted and praised by the audience'. Spectators: As a professional actor, Zeami knew that communicating with spectators was 'difficult and unpredictable' – hence his great emphasis on acting skills. Nō is a performing art, and Zeami 'wrote as an actor striving to gain the audience's respect and approval'. His writings are read today by performers of all kinds because of this. For Zeami, 'Success with the audience' was 'everything'. Pleasing spectators was 'an integral component' of the art of performance. The ultimate achievement of the artist lay in the ability 'to see and grasp the audience and adjust one's way of presentation accordingly'. Zeami thus solves the conflict between the artist's ideal and the spectator's desire by seeing it as part of the art of the artist to deal with. Zeami recognized the variation in spectators and made it part of his art to cater for all: 'In the case of those spectators who have real knowledge and understanding of the nō, there will be an implicit understanding between them and an actor who has himself reached his own level of Magnitude. Yet in the case of a dull-witted audience, or the vulgar audiences in the countryside or in the far-

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		off provinces, spectators will have difficulty in reaching a proper level of accomplishment. How should an actor behave in such a case? ... When the location or occasion demands, and the level of the audience is low, the actor should strive to bring happiness to them by performing in a style which they truly can appreciate. When one thinks over the real purposes of our art, a player who truly can bring happiness to his audiences is one who can without censure bring his art to all ... However gifted a player, if he does not win the love and respect of his audiences, he can hardly be said to be an actor who brings prosperity to his troupe. ... The Flower ... must differ depending on the spirit of the audience' (Teachings on Style). This attitude makes Zeami's manual 'a practical manual of theatre survival' as well as a manual on the art of performance. Nō is still performed before appreciative spectators as a living theatre. Sata suggests this is because it has always been directed to a present-day audience, underpinned by a dramatic theory based on performance in which 'the relationship between performer and spectator' is considered to be 'of the greatest value'. 'In this Japanese experience we can see an alternative to the art-versus-pandering schism which the impractical idealism of Aristotle introduced into Western theatre'.³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescription View of Theatre: positive; functional

¹ Honderich, Ted, ed. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 949

² Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 41

³ Enders, Jody. 2003. 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 40-64. 59

⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 149

⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 180

⁶ Carlson 1984: 33

⁷ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 33.

⁸ Carlson 1984: 34

⁹ Cited in West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287. 281n20

¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 34

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 35

-
- ¹² Quoted in Carlson 1984: 35.
- ¹³ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 155
- ¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 34
- ¹⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 155
- ¹⁶ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 251
- ¹⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 155
- ¹⁸ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 9
- ¹⁹ Quoted by Krasner from M. Potolsky 2006, Mimesis, NY, Routledge, p. 51. The quote shows the perils of quotation, though, because Pope did not use the term 'role model' in his poem, and the phrase was not 'attested' until 1957, according to Online Etymology Dictionary (2007), <http://www.etymonline.com/index.php?term=role> accessed 13 April 2009.
- ²⁰ Krasner 2008: 9
- ²¹ Enders 2003: 44
- ²² Carlson 1984: 36; The Cambridge History of English and American Literature in 18 Volumes (1907–21), Volume V. The Drama to 1642, Part One, Bartleby.com www.bartleby.com/215/0315.html 2/11/2006. There is doubt about the origins of these plays based on their language and dissimilarity to the Coventry Corpus Christi plays which were famous in the fifteenth century and patronised by royalty.
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 76
- ²⁴ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd. 119
- ²⁵ Alberti 1955/1725, Ten Books on Architecture, London, given in extract in Yates 1969: 201-206.
- ²⁶ Yates 1969: 121
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 70
- ²⁸ Francesco Patrizi 1534, De institutione reipublicae, Paris, p. 27; quoted in Carlson 1984: 70.
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984; Krasner 2008: 9
- ³⁰ Curtius 1990/1949: 440
- ³¹ Zeami 1984/C15th, On the Art of the Nō Drama: The Major Treatises of Zeami, trans. J. Thomas Rimer and Yamazaki Masakazu, Princeton NJ, Princeton University Press; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 98-107, p. 105.
- ³² Blau, Herbert. 1989. 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play'. In By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, edited by R. Schechner and W. Appel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272. 250
- ³³ Zeami in Gerould 2000: 106.
- ³⁴ Sata, Megumi 1989, 'Aristotle's Poetics and Zeami's Teachings on Style and the Flower, Asian Theatre Journal 6(1), pp. 47-56.

Table 4/51 Theories of Theatre 1501-1549

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
By the early 1500's, 'an extraordinary examination of Aristotle's Poetics had begun, providing criteria by which different national playwrights could be judged in 'highly polarized and excessively academic debates' which differentiated 'true' drama from 'the common ruck of medieval barbarism represented by sprawling street fairs and unwieldy pageant plays [and] the chaotic effect of mixing comedy and tragedy ... art [could] be elevated by a set of formally applied rules'.¹ Nicoll says that both France and Italy were 'hag-ridden by the ghosts of Aristotle and Horace'.² Distinction between popular theatre and 'proper' theatre, muddled by what West calls an 'ideology of theater' held by humanist scholars which developed from texts before the revival of actual theatre spaces and which was in many ways contrary to actual theatre practice, along with an early concern about theatrical self-consciousness – what would later be called theatricality (see More 1516).³ The period saw a fragmentation of theatre practices, particularly in the division between mass or popular theatre and 'proper' theatre which applied 'reason and logic' to the creative impulse, thereby creating 'an elitist drama for a select group'.⁴ Italian plays were still based on classical models but no longer written in Italian. Other popular forms of drama besides tragedy and comedy developed: the intermezzi (short pieces developed from court entertainment and performed between the acts of full-length plays) and pastorals (imitations of Greek satyr plays), in spite of the academic debates:⁵ 'Giving the spectators what they want and allowing them to spend time in the theatre in ways that best please them often results, it appears, in mixtures that defy generic classification'.⁶ Polonius in Hamlet (2.2.412) sends up this proliferation, reciting a list of 8 genres, plus two kinds of plays which do or do not preserve the unity of place and time.⁷ In England: Aristotle and Horace were studied at Oxford and Cambridge; classic plays were read and occasionally performed during the early C16th.⁸ In general, in England as well as in Europe, Horace was considered more accessible and was more easily assimilated than Aristotle,⁹ but between 1536 and 1542, criticism of the quality of actors' performances and on the 'reality' or 'truth' of the presentation began to appear. In Les Actes des Apotres (1536) in Bourges: 'the majority of the onlookers considered the business to be the truth and not pretence':¹⁰ theatre was expected to be life-like, although there was dispute over what this meant or how it was to be achieved. Thomas More condemned actors who drew attention to themselves or other actors as actors when they were playing a role because they spoiled the play.¹¹
Instructif de la seconde rhétorique (1501)	Regnaud Le Queux (c1440- 1525) French poet and scholar	Detailed advice on the writing of moralities, comedies and mysteries (Chapter 10): moralities deal with 'praise and blame' in 'honorable language' with no jokes; comedies treat 'joyous matter' in a light, melodious and inoffensive manner; mysteries consider significant subjects and show decorum (appropriateness of character, rank etc). ¹² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Praise or blame (moral judgment)	Doing: writing Showing: decorum
Praenotamenta on a commentary on Terence (1502)	Jodocus Badius (c1461-1535) Belgian scholar and printer	Influenced by Donatus (mid C4th), and showing a knowledge of Diomedes, Horace and the Roman writers, Suetonius and Vitruvius (who wrote on architecture and buildings). ¹³ A 'moderately complete' compendium on the available theoretical material on theatre, which considers the differences between comedy and tragedy, the types of comedy and their appropriate language, the construction of theatres, Roman games, characters and costumes, and the principles of decorum, propriety and verisimilitude, as well as presenting a life of Terence and a summary of one of his plays (Andria). The book was designed for young scholars. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r	A place in which to see drama		Doing: playwrightin g staging Showing: decorum; propriety; Verisimilitude.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1508 A Greek translation of Aristotle's Poetics by an unknown Venetian scholar - another moderately accurate version also ignored in favour of Hermannus' version of Averroës' version, and yet another missed opportunity to come to terms with Aristotle's theory. Most scholars preferred the Averroës' version which failed to treat poetry (tragedy/comedy) as a dramatic form. 1508: Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533), Italian poet, author of the epic poem Orlando Furioso, arranged regular performances of plays at the court of the Duke of Ferrara, and argues for a revival of productions of classic plays. Stimulated Giraldi to write tragedies which were strongly influenced by Seneca.¹⁵ 1515: the term 'drama' introduced into English as drame.
Sofonisba (1515) La poetica (Bks I-IV 1529; complete 1563)	Giangiorgio Trissino (1478-1550) Italian playwright, critic, diplomat and grammarian	La poetica was a widely influential work. His tragedy, Sofonisba, one of the first Renaissance tragedies, was inspired by ancient tragedies and served as a model for European tragedies throughout the C16th. Its preface (published in 1524) displayed an usually broad knowledge of Aristotle. The last two books of La poetica were translations and commentaries on Aristotle, similar to Robortello, and coloured 'by the prevailing rhetorical view of criticism'¹⁶ and an emphasis on instruction. '[P]oetry imitates "to praise and admire good men" or "to blame and censure bad ones"'.¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Instruction	Doing: poetry – (tragedy) Showing: imitation in order to praise or blame
Utopia (1516); History of Richard III (c1513-18)	Sir Thomas More (1478-1535) English lawyer, author and statesman	Concerned about the impropriety of mixing serious and comic material. (More coined the term 'utopia'). More was also concerned about actors who drew attention to themselves or other actors during performance. He believed this spoiled the play: 'And in a stage play all the people know right well, that he that playeth the sowdayne [sultan] is percase a sowter [shoemaker]. Yet if one should can so little good [be so ignorant] to show out of seasonne what acquaintance he hath with him, and calle him by his owne name whyle he standeth in his magestie, one of his tormenters might hap to breake his head, and worthy for marring of the play'.¹⁸ This suggests an early concern about theatricality or theatrical self-consciousness. West considers this arose because of the dissonance between theatre practice and the 'ideology of theater' to which humanists of the period subscribed in which theatre was to present a picture suspended in time for detached viewing rather than action unfolding through time and directed towards spectators for effect. Purpose of Theorist: prescription View of Theatre: ambivalent		Instruction	Doing: playwrighting; acting
Propalladia (1517) ¹⁹	Bartolomé de Torres Naharro (c1485-c1531) ²⁰ Spanish	The first treatise of dramaturgy printed in Europe; includes eight plays written as a result of a visit to Rome. He defines tragedy and comedy traditionally and cites Horace, but goes on to say: 'All of which takes longer to tell, it seems to me, than it is necessary to hear ... comedy is nothing more or less than an artful construction of remarkable and	A place where dialogue is enacted	Performance; pleasing the audience	Doing: comedia (comedy and tragedy) –

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	playwright	ultimately happy events, enacted in dialogue [by players]'. ²¹ Carlson calls this 'a statement of striking originality' which anticipates the independence of Spanish dramatists from the classical tradition, ²² written with 'no knowledge of Aristotle's Poetics to aid or trouble him'. ²³ Unlike critics both in Spain and elsewhere, Naharro understood comedy and tragedy (which he referred to generally as comedia) as more than just poetic terms: they implied performance and presentation. For example, he considers that more than 12 characters in a comedy would generally confuse spectators. ²⁴ 'Naharro speaks always as a pragmatic dramatist', aware of the classical tradition but only prepared to follow it if it was practical in the theatre ²⁵ and was 'a provocative and highly original writer'. ²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic -practical staging View of Theatre: positive			the practice of drama: the artful construction of enacted dialogues
Fabula de Homine (Fable About Man) (1518) Satellitium (1524); ²⁷ De causis corruptiarum atrium (1531) (a volume of De Disciplinis libri XX (1531).	Juan Luis Vives (1492-1540) Spanish humanist and teacher	Vives was 'one of the most prolific thinkers within the northern humanist tradition'. ²⁸ His theatrical view of life tied man to society: society was the only way man could achieve his ends. For the first time, man chooses his roles, and directs the play, a use of the theatre metaphor which renders it incoherent, according to Christian: ²⁹ the actor is no longer subservient to the playwright or director, who nevertheless lingers. ³⁰ The entire Fabula is 'conceived and executed in theatrical terms'. ³¹ This stage was essentially a social existence. Man could no longer make a connection with God on his own. He could only do this through society. By his interactions with others, in ways which demonstrated his capacity for perceiving both the future and the present, he could also demonstrate his affinity with the gods. According to Fernández-Santamaria, this placed Vives in an external position equivalent to that of 'the experienced drama coach privy to one fundamental fact unknown to the performer', for he alone could reveal and explain 'the nature of God's plan for man'. ³² In De causis , Vives argued that education was one of the functions of theatre, even as he clearly stated the relationship of performer and spectator: 'Poetry comes onto the stage, with the people gathered to watch, and there just as the painter displays a picture to the crowd to be seen, so the poet [displays] a kind of image of life ... thus the teacher of the people is both a painter and a poet'. ³³ Vives condemned acting which drew attention to the actor rather than the role: 'They act plays so as to seem to act ... which is an indecorum: for a play refers not to itself, but to what is done, or whatever deed is feigned, as a picture [refers] to a thing, not to itself'. ³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent	A space of performance	Education; Access to God (enlightenment)	Doing: performance ; directing
1519: the term tragi-commedia introduced into Italy with the publication of the Spanish novel Celestina by de Rojas. ³⁵

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
De in cantationibus (1520)	Pietro Pomponazzi (Petrus Pomponatius) (1462-1525) Italian philosopher	A consideration of the function of ‘the fables of poets’ based on the writings of Averroës and the Latin tradition. The fables of poets ‘tell untruths so that we may arrive at the truth and so that we may instruct the vulgar crowd, which must be led toward good action and away from wicked action’ ³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place (implied)	Instruction and moral guidance	Doing: Poetry Showing: guidance through fable Watching: the crowd is vulgar and must be led
De arte poetica (1527)	Marco Vida (c1485-1566) Italian humanist, Bishop of Alba	Following Horace, ‘[f]ollow the ancients ... Don’t try any novelties ... Keep to your five acts ... Imitate Seneca ... Keep to the unities’. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: can’t say			Doing: Poetry
