1527: Diomedes Grammaticus’s Ars grammatical (C4th) was printed in Paris. The essence of poetry lay in its metrical structure. There were three major genres of poetry based on the number/role of the speakers: dramatic (only the ‘personages’ spoke); narrative (only the poet spoke) and epic (a mixture of poet and personages spoke). It remained very influential well into the French Renaissance.³⁸ 1531 A commentary on Horace’s Ars poetica was produced by Italian scholar Parrasio, again heavily influenced by the Latin tradition, especially Donatus’ De Comoedia et Tragoedia (mid C4th).
The Governor (1531); Image of Governanuce (1541)	Sir Thomas Elyot (c1490-1546) English diplomat	A defence of poetry, including tragedy and comedy. Comedy is a mirror of life which warns against ‘the promptness of youth into vice, the snares of harlots and bawds laid for young minds, the deceit of servants, the chances of fortune being contrary to men’s expectations’. Tragedy should only be read by mature men experienced enough to ‘abhor the intolerable life of tyrants and ... condemn the folly and dotage expressed by poets lascivious’. ³⁹ The Image of Governanuce was a treatise on the ideal management of the state which saw theatre as a space of education in which philosophical debates could take place: a ‘space of exposition rather than production, where disputants display their cases “openly” apparently without the mimetic possibilities of dramatic recognition or reversal’; ⁴⁰ much like Habermas’ public sphere is meant to operate. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: functional	A space	Moral instruction	Doing: poetry (literature) (comedy and tragedy); debate
Poetic (1536)	Bernardino Daniello	Heavily influenced by the Latin tradition, especially Donatus’ De Comoedia et Tragoedia (mid C4th), his Poetic drew heavily on Horace as well as Aristotle. Poetry’s goal was to		Moral instruction;	Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	(c1500-1565) Italian scholar, translator, poet & critic	delight and to instruct. Daniello was the first modern writer to discuss the idea of verisimilitude. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		delight	Showing: verisimilitude
Architettura (1537-1547) Dell'Architettura (Second Book of Architecture) (1545)	Sebastiano Serlio (1475-1554) Italian architect	Took up Vitruvius' observations on 'scenes', elaborating them to the extent that Yates claims he was responsible for identifying the art of the theatre with 'the art of changing perspective scenes', a move which coincided with Renaissance developments in perspective, optics and mechanics, and led to the development of the Proscenium Arch. Theatre became 'a 'picture theatre', a window through which the audience looked at changing scenes'. ⁴² The role of the dramatist and actor was reduced (as was the mobility of the spectator) . First attempt to control spectators through a viewing position. This development was expensive and hence limited to court and elite theatre. It reached its apotheosis in the elaborate court masques of Jacobean England. Serlio exerted an enormous influence in C16th English architecture. His Architettura was the first Renaissance work to devote a section to theatre. It incorporated his views on perspective. Serlio coined the term scenography . He set guidelines for theatres and design, based on an interpretation of Vitruvius. He tried to fit classical theatre forms into indoor settings. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A seeing place (for the wealthy)	An art	Doing: visual effects Showing: visual effects Watching: implied
Preface: translation of Sophocles' Electra (1537)	Lazare de Baïf (1496- 1547) French diplomat and humanist	Defined tragedy as 'a morality composed of great calamities, murders and adversities suffered by noble and excellent characters'. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		Moral example	Doing: tragedy
1540's England: original works based on classic models were published in Latin, and showed awareness of classical doctrine. ⁴⁵
Preface to Christus Redivivus (1541)	Nicholas Grimald (1519-1562) English poet	Based on rhetorical study and the art of oratory; a concern with appropriateness of diction and the unities; cites Plautus as his model. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: can't say	A place of listening		Doing: performance : appropriateness of diction
Canace (1541)	Sperone Speroni (c1500-1588) Italian scholar	The playwright presented 'wicked people' as a play's principal protagonists, leading to attacks on the play and a controversy over whether the wicked could be used to inspire pity and terror. Giraldi, for instance, condemned the play because its leading figure could		Reflection of society	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	and dramatist	not inspire and improve spectators.⁴⁷ Speroni argued that, since the average person was ‘midway between good and evil’, they could sympathise with both good and evil characters. [Speroni exhibited more confidence in the judgment of his spectators than was acceptable for the time]. His play was based on a Greek legend. It was performed only once, but widely read and the subject of much literary debate.⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theatre View of Theatre: positive			Showing: both good and evil Watching: spectators could sympathise with both good and evil, and distinguish between the two
An Address by the Tragedy of Orbecche to the Reader (1541); Letter on Tragedy (1543); Prologue to Altile (c1543);⁴⁹ On the Composition of Comedies and Tragedies (1554);⁵⁰	Giambattista Giraldi Cinthio (1504-1573) Italian playwright	First important Renaissance statement on drama by a practising playwright and mostly a defence of his tragedies, which continually broke the ‘rules’. Thought Aristotle ‘too obscure to be taken as a guide’ (Orbecche tragedia), although was happy to take and modify Aristotle where appropriate.⁵¹ Defended happy endings for tragedies, and double plots (both of which Aristotle thought inferior and pandering to spectators).⁵² Plays were written ‘solely to serve the spectators, and to be pleasing on the stage, and to conform better to the practice of the time. For even if Aristotle says that this caters to the ignorance of the audience, the opposing position has also its defenders. I have deemed it better to satisfy the listener with some lesser excellence (if the opinion of Aristotle is to be accepted as better) rather than with a little more greatness to displease those for whom the play is staged’.⁵³ ‘Man is in the world to choose ... this is why our poet believes that the rules of tragedy are not so firm that they forbid him to depart from what is prescribed in order to serve the age, the spectators and subject matter as yet untouched’.⁵⁴ Nevertheless, the aim is, in the end, moral instruction: tragedy shows us ‘what we must avoid’ and how (by purging our passions); comedy shows us ‘that which we must imitate’. Tragi-comedy offers us consolation: ‘the spectator feels an astonishing pleasure on seeing the craft deceived and taken away, and the wicked, powerful and unjust overthrown’.⁵⁵ Giraldi’s support of tragicomedy was his ‘most original contribution to dramatic theory’ according to Sidnell.⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive;	A place in which a play is staged for spectators	Entertainment (to satisfy the listener); moral instruction; to serve the spectators and to please them; consolation	Doing: playwrighting (tragedies) Showing: what we should avoid (tragedy) or imitate (comedy) Watching: spectators (listeners) indicate when they are displeased but enjoy seeing the wicked punished

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		functional
1542: a staging of Mistère du Viel Testament was not permitted in Paris because the acting troupe had a tendency to include farce and ‘mummeries’.⁵⁷ Even in the C17th performances of otherwise acceptable sacred plays were condemned because of the addition of farce. Nevertheless Carlson claims that the 1540’s were ‘the watershed years’ for the Renaissance in France a period in which major theoretical works in French poetics and modern French literature were developed.⁵⁸ 1542: a staging of Mistère du Viel Testament was not permitted in Paris because the acting troupe had a tendency to include farce and ‘mummeries’.⁵⁹
‘Epistre du translateur au lecteur’ (1542); ‘Epistre du traducteur à Monseigneur le Dauphin de France’ (1548)	Charles Estienne (1504-1564) French scholar, Paris-based professor of anatomy	The first is a lengthy essay, written in French, preceding a new translation of Terence’s Andria which attempts to provide a history of the different types of Roman plays, ‘how they were performed and in what public places ... the ornamentation of the theatres and the scenes of the comic plays, then the costume of the actors, their method of playing and of speaking’. He distinguishes tragedy by its ‘grave and exalted argument’. ⁶⁰ The second forms the preface to an Italian play which has been translated at Les abusez , and introduces the critical question of composition in the vernacular. Estienne argues that if French authors followed the lead of Italian writers in using classical techniques, their work could rival Greek and Latin classics. In particular, French comedies would benefit from the application of these rules. Reveals the strong influence of Horace, which persists in French criticism from this period. ⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A place in which plays are performed	Performance	Doing: playwrighting
Dedication, Au roy mon souverain seigneur , translation of Euripides’ Hecuba (1544)	Guillaume Bouchetel (fl. 1540s) French scholar	Influence of Horace. Tragedy ‘is the highest form of poetry because of its gravity of style, its grandeur of argument’ and because ‘it is addressed to lords and princes’ ⁶² for whom it was invented in order to demonstrate ‘the uncertainty and sorrowful instability of temporal things’. ⁶³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Instruction	Doing: poetry (tragedy) - an elite art Showing: the demonstration of temporality
L’art poétique d’Horace (1545)	Jacques Peletier (1517-1582) French scholar	An update of Horace in an attempt to encourage French writers to develop their own literature based on Horatian rules. Peletier did not appear to have known Aristotle. Beginning of a debate on the value of the classic to a new French literature. ⁶⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: poetry as a literary art
1548: possibly the first permanent theatre constructed in Europe since the Romans, the Hôtel de Bourgogne, was constructed by the Confrère de la Passion for the presentation of religious drama, but the French Parliament banned religious drama before it could be completed. The theatre was rented to other groups for secular plays. With

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the banning of religious drama, professional troupes began to spring up in other parts of France. Italian commedia was also performed in Paris and other cities. In the mid-1500's, a literary group called the Pléiade was formed to further writing and culture. Out of this group came French plays based on Italian neoclassical models. ⁶⁵ Court entertainments also emerged during the last half of C16th (festivals, court spectacles, triumphal entries into towns).
Art poétique françois (1548)	Thomas Sébillet (1512-1589) French poet	First major treatise on poetry in the French language; most detailed ever attempted in France; discusses three forms of dialogue: the eclogue (pastoral), the morality (like tragedies but with a happy ending) and the farce (a simple short piece designed to provoke laughter; quite different from Latin comedy). Disagreed with Peletier over the value of Horace to modern French writers. Includes a discussion of the key concept of vraisemblable or 'seemingly true events' (verisimilitude) with regard to serious drama, a concept which is to have considerable influence in France. Also appears to have not known Aristotle, or not been influenced by his work. ⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/r		Different genres have different ends	Doing: poetry (dialogue) Showing: seemingly true events
Librum Aristotelis de arte poetica explicationes (1548) ⁶⁷	Francesco Robortello (1516-1568) Italian scholar	Reintroduction of performance into theory. Occupied the chair of rhetoric at several leading Italian universities. Librum is a collection, synthesis and reinterpretation of the scattered commentaries on Aristotle's Poetics , often in reference to and supported by the Rhetoric . Sidnell calls it a 'difficult and obscure little book'. ⁶⁸ It reinterprets mimesis in terms of enjoyment, bringing Aristotle into line with Horace and thereby substituting rhetorical ends for Aristotle's aesthetic ones: ⁶⁹ Poetry is a form of discourse which deals with 'the false or the fabulous' (Librum : 2). The purpose of this 'mode of discourse' is 'to give delight by representation, description, and imitation of all human actions, every emotion, and every thing, living or inanimate' (Librum : 2) because we delight in images, and we can also learn from them. Robortello restores the idea of performance to dramatic theory, for imitation includes the 'scenic ... acted by the actors' which emphasises action , as well as what is made 'by the poet as he writes', which emphasises character (Librum : 393). 'The end of imitation in tragedy is action, for tragedy imitates actions' (Librum : 58). Tragedy 'does indeed imitate men, but not merely insofar as they are men, but insofar as they are men of action' (Librum : 58). A discussion of genres, the treatment of plot, character etc and rules for writing. Concern: rhetorical effect ('the power to move and persuade') in the service of morals; verisimilitude (misinterprets Aristotle's view that tragedies work best when they focus on the events of a single day (i.e. are compact in time) as a requirement that they deal only with events between sunrise and sunset because people don't usually 'move about or converse' at night (i.e. ought to accord with reality), a view which became established in later Renaissance	A place where poetry was performed	Representation ; performance on a stage; enjoyment and moral instruction; purgation: Purgation is a kind of immunisation: people get a taste of what pity and fear feel like and this helps and consoles them if genuine pain or fear happens to them.	Doing: Poetry; performance (only a superior man can make representations believable) Showing: representations (with decorum and appropriateness); Watching: spectators are 'selective' in what they

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		commentaries.⁷⁰ Enjoyment and instruction: ‘What other end, therefore, can we say that the poetic faculty has than to delight through the representation, description, and imitation of every human action, every emotion, every thing animate as well as inanimate’,⁷¹ however, ‘profit’ is also involved: ‘the imitation and praise of virtuous men incites men to virtue; the representation and condemnation of vice serve as deterrents’. The audience is primarily to gain moral instruction, not from the work as a drama, but from the way it is constructed. An emphasis on the elements which make up the whole in order to consider their individual effectiveness in persuading or pleasing an audience (rhetorical ends), at the expense of any conception of an artistic whole (as in Aristotle). Application of the Horacian ideals of decorum and appropriateness to all elements in the belief that actions, character and language need to be in harmony with existing conceptions in order to please and persuade spectators, who are conceived of as ‘selective’ and ‘receptive’.⁷² According to Egginton, Robortello’s was the first commentary to explicitly treat the dramatic aspects of Aristotle’s Poetics ever published. It reintroduced the notion of performance by deriving from the Poetics two kinds of mimesis, one involving the action of bodies, the other the description of words: aim: persuasion: if what spectators perceive ‘appears relevant to their everyday life, then they may be persuaded to moral improvement’. This depended on how ‘true’ the mimesis was: ‘in general, to the extent that the verisimilitude partakes of truth, it has the power to move and to persuade’ (Librum: 22). Verisimilitude, the expectation that the representation be as close to its object as possible, became the key element of Aristotle’s mimesis (known as ‘the unities’).⁷³ ‘Poetry and acting’ were ‘both concerned with making the minds of readers and listeners, respectively, disposed to receive the image of the object they are trying to represent. For representation or action on the stage unites in some way the image of the thing represented and enacted with the thought and imagination of men, as if it joins the entity itself with thought. Representation of this kind has great power in moving and inflaming men’s minds to anger and fury, then in recalling them to kindness and assuaging them, in stirring them to compassion, weeping, and tears, as well as to laughter and joy’ and to this end, poetry often uses ‘notes, masks, and gestures and many other procedures’ which ‘greatly assist in introducing all kinds of affection and distress into men’s minds’. However, ‘Not everyone can introduce representation into the listeners’ minds. Nothing is more difficult to achieve than that men, on hearing something, should grasp it in their thoughts, as if they saw it with their own eyes. Only an			see, and receptive to what they see; they are persuaded by something which appears to be relevant to their lives; they enjoy seeing representations and may even learn from them, including learning to avoid certain behaviours. Spectators are ‘readers and listeners’ (Librum : 22)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		educated, wise, sharp, and clever man can do this, a man who can clothe himself in ways that are foreign to him ... as if he has forgotten his own existence' (Librum: 22). Such representations 'confer on mankind usefulness of many kinds': the imitation of virtues spur people on to virtue; the portrayal of vice, however, deters and repulses them; the depiction of 'grisly and dangerous events ... reduces man's mindless effrontery and rashness' and events that merit compassion' move the audience 'to feel kindness and compassion'. 'In brief: every imitation and poetic recital allied with action enlivens, softens, presses, incites, moves, and inflames men's souls' (Librum: 22). How does this happen: 'It is quite clear that men are driven to imitation from that fitting and forceful power of the faculty of the imagination. Young children mimic voices and actions, bird calls, and the sound of animals ... No animal does this except man and this distinguishes him from the beasts' (Librum: 29). [This is a virtual paraphrase of Aristotle]. Man both 'teaches by imitation' and 'By this method he learns ... man learns through imitation', and he enjoys imitation, both doing it and watching it, especially as some become master of imitation (Librum: 30): 'men are born with an aptitude for imitation and have been endowed by nature to derive pleasure from imitation or from matters given expression by representation' (Librum: 30). Poetry has a 'double end as its goal ... Imitation comes first and pleasure is second' (Librum: 30). Pity and fear, 'two of the mind's greatest emotions' (Librum: 93) are 'purged' when performed and seen because the representation of them acts as a kind of immunisation: people experience a mild version of these feelings which allows them to have some experience of them and so learn what they feel like and how to deal with them should they happen to them in reality; they also learn that these terrible experiences happen to others, and so 'support themselves with the very powerful consolation of recalling that the same disaster has occurred to others' (Librum: 53) – although some people avoid even this minor experience of fear and pity (Librum: 142), but then they also miss out on the pleasure we can derive in watching a powerful imitation, because we derive pleasure from tragedies as a result of the skill of the imitation: 'even dreadful things, if presented to us portrayed in an imitation, produce delight and pleasure ... Comedy ... gives delight, because it presents a joyous imitation of men's ridiculous actions, while tragedy does so by artfully representing mankind's sadness, grief, and catastrophe ... the pleasure of tragedy is much greater, for it penetrates our minds more deeply, is a rather rare occurrence in our experience, and a greater force is generated by that representation. Therefore, our

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		knowledge of the greater difficulty involved in expressing this imitation causes us to admire it the more, if it has been carried off, and [therefore] to experience greater pleasure' (Librum : 146). [Again, through imitation we learn, although this time we are put into the position of being made to imitate feelings as a kind of preparation for the real thing]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
La defence et illustration de la langue françoise (1549)	Joachim Du Bellay (c1525-1560) French poet and critic	A great critical work produced as part of the debate over modern French writing and in response to Sébillet but which says almost nothing about drama. Whereas Sébillet saw the development of a French literature as an evolutionary process based on classic models, Du Bellay argued for a complete break and a new beginning. ⁷⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-existing theory- aim: the development of a French literature based on classical models View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: using classic models to evolve new forms of literature
1549 First translation of Aristotle into the vernacular, by Italian historian Bernardo Segni (1504-1558), following the example of Robortello (1548)

¹ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 9-10

² Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers. 204

³ West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287.

⁴ Krasner 2008: 10

⁵ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 155

⁶ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 12

⁷ Sidnell 1991: 11

⁸ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 77

⁹ Carlson 1984: 78

¹⁰ Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press. 49

¹¹ West 1999: 260

¹² Carlson 1984: 67

¹³ Vitruvius' book De architectura contained descriptions of both Roman and Greek theatres, but the Renaissance largely concentrated on Roman theatre, which probably goes some way towards explaining the Renaissance confusion between theatre and amphitheatre (Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd. 99), a confusion no doubt exacerbated by the use of Isidore's Etymologies, in which theatre is defined as amphitheatre.

¹⁴ Sidnell 1991: 111

-
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 41
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 47
- ¹⁷ Trissino 1563, La quinta e la sesta divisione, 5v; quoted in Carlson 1984: 47.
- ¹⁸ Cited in West 1999: 260
- ¹⁹ The 'Introduction' is translated by Sidnell in Sidnell 1991: 112-4, its first translation into English.
- ²⁰ Sidnell gives the dates as c1485-c1520.
- ²¹ Naharro 1991/1517: 112 (in Sidnell 1991: 112-4)
- ²² Carlson 1984: 58
- ²³ Sidnell 1991: 111
- ²⁴ Naharro 1991/1517: 113
- ²⁵ Carlson 1984: 58
- ²⁶ Sidnell 1991: 111
- ²⁷ Written for Princess Mary Tudor, daughter of Henry VIII, to whom Vives was a tutor.
- ²⁸ Fernández-Santamaria, J.S. 1998. The Theater of Man: J.L. Vives on Society. Vol. 88 Part 2, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society held at Philadelphia for Promoting Useful Knowledge. Philadelphia Pa: American Philosophical Society. vii
- ²⁹ Christian 1987: 200
- ³⁰ If man is no longer 'a puppet, subservient to the will of the divine' (Christian 1987: 200), however that might be interpreted, what happens to 'the divine'?
- ³¹ Fernández-Santamaria 1998: 1
- ³² Fernández-Santamaria 1998: 6-7
- ³³ Quoted in West, William 1999, 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe', in Masten, Jeffrey and Wall, Wendy (eds), Renaissance Drama New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, Evanston, Northwestern University Press, p. 280n6.
- ³⁴ Vives De disciplinis 90-91, quoted by West 1999: 260
- ³⁵ Sidnell 1991: 122
- ³⁶ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 37, from Bernard Weinberg 1961, A History of Literary Criticism in the Italian Renaissance, Chicago, Vol 1, p. 368.
- ³⁷ Cited in Nicoll 1962: 204
- ³⁸ Curtius, Ernst Robert. 1990/1948. European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages. Translated by W. R. Trask. Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series XXXVI).440
- ³⁹ Elyot 1962, The Book Names the Governor, ed. S.E. Lehmberg, New York, pp. 47-48; in Carlson 1984: 76-77.
- ⁴⁰ West 1999: 260
- ⁴¹ Bondanella, Peter et al 1996, Cassell Dictionary of Italian Literature, Continuum International.
- ⁴² Yates 1969: 123-4
- ⁴³ Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006. 'Introduction to Theatre--the online course'. Northern Virginia Community College <http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm> (accessed 2/3/2007).
- ⁴⁴ Tragédie de Sophocles intitulée Electra, trans. Lazare de Baïf, Paris 1537, p. i; quoted in Carlson 1984: 68.

-
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 77
- ⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 77
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 43
- ⁴⁸ Wikipedia 2009, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sperone_Speroni accessed 4/3/2009.
- ⁴⁹ Translated by Sidnell from Weinberg's edition 1970-1974; excerpt in Sidnell 1991: 122.
- ⁵⁰ Publication date: Giraldi claimed it was written earlier and that it, rather than Segni's, was the first commentary on Aristotle's Poetics in the vernacular. He may also have wanted to pre-date it to avoid charges of plagiarism from Lombardi and Maggi (Carlson 1984: 41). Excerpts are reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 123-128 from Crocetti's edition: Giraldi (Cinthio), 1973 Scritti critici, (ed.) Camillo Crocetti, Milan, p. 184.
- ⁵¹ G.B. Giraldi Cinthio, 1543, Orbecche tragedia, Vinegia, p. 2, quoted in Carlson 1984: 41.
- ⁵² Giraldi 1991/1554: 126
- ⁵³ Giraldi 1991/1554: 126
- ⁵⁴ Giraldi 1991/c1543: 122
- ⁵⁵ Giraldi 1991/c1543: 126-7
- ⁵⁶ Sidnell 1991: 121
- ⁵⁷ Enders, Jody. 2003. 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 40-64.44
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 68
- ⁵⁹ Enders 2003: 44
- ⁶⁰ Première comédie de Terence intitulée Andrie, trans. Charles Estienne, 1542, Paris, iii; quoted in Carlson 1984: 68.
- ⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 69
- ⁶² Carlson 1984: 68
- ⁶³ La tragédie d'Euripide nommée Hecuba, trans. Guillaume Bouchetel, Paris 1544, p. ij; quoted in Carlson 1984: 3.
- ⁶⁴ Carlson 1984: 69-71
- ⁶⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 251
- ⁶⁶ Carlson 1984: 70-71
- ⁶⁷ Published in Florence in 1548; excerpts reprinted from this edition in Sidnell 1991: 85-97
- ⁶⁸ Sidnell 1991: 84
- ⁶⁹ Carlson 1984: 38
- ⁷⁰ Carlson, 1984: 40
- ⁷¹ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 38, from Robortello, Librium Aristotelis de arte poetica explications, quoted and translated in Weinberg 1961, Vol 2, p. 389 (see note above)
- ⁷² Carlson 1984: 38-40
- ⁷³ Egginton 2003: 90
- ⁷⁴ Carlson 1984: 70

Table 5/51 Theories of Theatre 1550-1580

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1550s: the rise of the Commedia dell'arte in Italy. It was very popular in Spain from 1570-1580 and exerted an influence on Spanish playwriting. France had a theatre dedicated to it, the Théâtre Italienne, and Molière incorporated many of its elements into his plays. It died out around 1750 but was rediscovered in the 1960s, during which it became a key aspect of actor training. Elements of commedia have since become a familiar component of theatre around the world.¹ Mid C16th: the development of a Renaissance dramatic tradition, with new plays appearing regularly. The relationship of these plays to classic theory and practice was the subject of continuing concern for theorists and playwrights. In general, the opinions of the playwrights were ignored² but ‘few Elizabethans were willing to sacrifice their delight in variety’ to satisfy Aristotelian views on the unities.³ 1561: First use of the word ‘theatre’ in a title (see Grévin 1561).
Aristotelis librum de poetica communes explanaciones (1550)	Bartolomeo Lombarda and Vincenzo Maggi (fl. 1550s) Italian scholars	Followed the example of Robortello, but with significant elaboration and qualification; while parts may give pleasure, the ultimate aim is instruction of the multitude, therefore ‘common opinion’ has to be followed. Because the aim is to instruct ‘the multitude’, ‘probability’ and ‘verisimilitude’ are interpreted according to what will be accepted by ‘the common crowd’ – hence an emphasis on decorum and appropriateness with regard to characters, and general verisimilitude: ⁴ hence a messenger sent to another country could not return within an hour without the spectators whistling and hissing the actor off the stage for ‘an action lacking in all reason ... contrived by the poet’ (Aristotelis). ⁵ Lombarda and Maggi introduced decorum , ‘the other great theoretical concept to emerge from the Italian renaissance commentaries on theatre’ following Segni’s translation of the Poetics into the vernacular. The principle of decorum meant that dramatists, actors and designers had to be careful not to deviate from the model of a certain ideal of social types: what a king ‘says or does must belong to those things which are usually ... attributed to kings’. It led to highly conventionalized characterizations, one of the distinguishing features of most neo-classical drama. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place with a stage on which drama (poetry) was enacted	Instruction of the multitude	Doing: poetry - playwrighting Showing: credibility; decorum Watching: the ‘common crowd’ requires probability and verisimilitude or it will reject the drama
République aux furieuses défenses de Louis Meigret (1550)	Guillaume des Autelz (c1529-1581) French scholar	An attack on Du Bellay and a defence of the French morality play, which Autelz thought should be revitalized and artistically developed through an understanding of the formal rules of the classics. He regarded classic tragedy and comedy to be too extreme to be valuable for modern moral ends; his argument shows the influence of Patrizi’s De institutione reipublicae (1494) with regard to his attitude to the effects of comedy and		Moral instruction	Doing: playwrighting (literature)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		tragedy. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive: the development of a French literature, in particular, morality plays, based on classical rules View of Theatre: functional
Prologues to La gelosia (1550); La strega (The Witch) (1582) ⁸	Antonfrancesco Grazzini (Il Lasca) (1503-1584) Italian dramatist, editor, poet and polemicist; founding member of the Accademia degli umidi	Grazzini challenged classic authority in his prefaces: ‘Aristotle and Horace knew their own time, but ours is different. We have other customs, another religion, another way of life, and therefore need to create our comedies in another manner’. ⁹ Grazzini also challenged the view that comedies were about instruction: ‘Whoever wants to learn about the civil and Christian life, does not attend comedies to do so’ (La gelosia). ¹⁰ Comedies reflected their own times and were not about civil or Christian instruction: ‘Today we no longer go to see comedies so that we can learn to live but for pleasure, sport, delight, and to while away melancholy, and thus find enjoyment’ – and to admire the opposite sex. ¹¹ The ‘Academy of the Clammy Ones’ was devoted to restoring the Tuscan dialect and finding a place for commedia erudite at a time when lavish intermezzi were the rage for upper classes and the commedia dell’arte was establishing itself as the most popular comic form. The aim was to create a form of drama for the mercantile or middle-class. ¹² Commedie erudite were usually ‘a minor pursuit of men of letters and scholars, performed by amateurs in aristocratic residences’. ¹³ The prologue to The Witch is presented as an argument between Plot and Prologue as to which should come first and how much information should be conveyed to the spectators about the play. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-popular theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place people attend to see comedies, enjoy and divert themselves and ‘admire the opposite sex’	To reflect the time; pleasure; to provide an opportunity for social interaction with other spectators (not about instruction)	Doing: performance Watching: spectators come to comedies to be amused not instructed, and see other spectators
L’Art poétique (1555)	Jacques Peletier (1517-1582) French scholar, poet and mathematician	A response to Du Bellay (c1525-1560), championing classic comedy and tragedy over medieval genres (moralities, farces); draws on Horace, Donatus and Diomedes. Comedy is ‘a mirror of life’; tragedy teaches the spectators ‘to fear the gods, renounce vice, turn aside from evil, and respect virtue’. ¹⁴ He endorses appropriateness and decorum (translates as bienséance , a term which would become extremely popular in C17th France. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: Poetry – (comedy and tragedy) Showing: lessons
1555 A translation of Aristotle’s Poetics into French by French scholar Guillaume Morel.
The Good Ordering of a	William Bavande	Translated from a Latin work by Italian Johannes Ferrarius (Montanus); a political and moral defence of theatre: plays serve ‘partlie to delight, partlie to move to embrace		Entertainment ; moral	Doing: plays - Showing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Common Weal (1559)	(fl. 1550's) English scholar of politics and literature	ensamples on virtue and goodnesse, and to eschue vice and filthie liuying'. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: functional		example	examples
De poeta (in Latin) (1559); Arte poetica (in Italian) (1563)	Antonio Sebastiano Minturno, (d. 1574) Bishop of Ugento	Minturno was a participant in the Council of Trent, which was concerned to determine what was to be preserved and supported from contemporary works. Both these works were produced during the period of the Council. De poeta is a 'huge work', a general study of poetry which discusses Aristotle extensively (two books are entirely on tragedy and comedy); Arte poetica was published as a supplementary text, and focused on the analysis of specific types of contemporary poetry. Book II is devoted to tragedy and comedy. ¹⁷ Dramatic genres are identified and distinguished by types of endings, and the kinds of characters involved: great men are depicted in tragedies, merchants and common folk in comedy and humble, mean and ludicrous people in satiric drama. The end of all poetry is 'to instruct, delight, and move'; tragedy also aims to purify 'the passions [of] the souls who listen'. ¹⁸ Minturno is usually credited with having added 'to move' to the Horatian aims of delight and instruction, although the idea was implicit in Robortello and the general concern with the effects on spectators. Carlson believes Minturno's explicit inclusion probably came from Ciceronian rhetoric, which claimed that the end of rhetoric was 'to teach, delight, and move'. Only what is true can be shown or imitated, so that the spectators accept it as true. Decorum and appropriateness are therefore given a central role. Performances should be limited in time (continuing the misreading by Robortello) and exhibit an overall unity of tone (rhetorical). ¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Entertainment ; moral instruction	Doing: poetry (comedy and tragedy); performance Showing: what is true; decorum; appropriate-ness Watching: concern about effects - spectators are gullible
Preface to Oedipus (1560)	Alexander Nevyle (1544-1614) English translator	Called the play 'a dredfull Example of Gods horrible vengeance for sinne'. ²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: translation View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Showing: results of sin
Commentary on Aristotle's Poetics (1560)	Pietro Vettori (1499-1585) Italian philologist and	The third of the 'great' commentaries on Aristotle's Poetics . Also renowned for his work on Cicero. Concern: the rhetorical tradition, with an emphasis on the feelings and the belief of the spectators. ²¹		To stir the feelings of the spectators	Doing: Poetry (rhetoric)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	classicist	Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: affective
Poetices Libri Septem (1561); ²² written in Latin, it appeared in Paris and Lyon the same year	Julius Caesar Scaliger (c1484-1558) Italian critic; interpreter of Aristotle	The first major Italian critic to challenge the authority of the ancients, Scaliger was a major link between French and Italian criticism, and probably the first critic in France to draw primarily on Aristotle (he became a French subject in 1528). ²³ Poetices was a comprehensive attempt to standardize literary form and content ‘by relating Aristotle’s Poetices to existing literary tradition’ such as Horace ²⁴ as well as a defence against Plato’s condemnation of poetry. ²⁵ It was a widely influential work of the same type as Minturno but ‘larger and more comprehensive ... a huge and erudite compendium’ aimed at developing an orderly and harmonious system, choosing consistency over authority when ideas were contradictory: led him to be ‘widely regarded as the most learned man in Europe’. ²⁶ In England, he influenced Sidney and Jonson. ²⁷ According to Carlson, Scaliger rejected imitation as the end of poetry. Imitation was ‘the foundation of all poetry’ but had for ‘its ultimate goal ... to teach while giving pleasure’ (Poetices I.I.I). Instead of mimesis, Scaliger insisted on ‘versification ... as the primary and defining characteristic of dramatic ... poetry’. ²⁸ Verisimilitude, as a result, did not relate to appropriateness but to the ‘things of nature’, a radical interpretation similar to C19th ideas of realism: drama had to create a reality ‘in which ideally the spectators is unconscious of any artifice’, and this should be done through ‘the lines that are spoken’. ²⁹ Although Scaliger did not develop theories about the unity of time and place himself, his ideas were later interpreted this way to the extent that they were known to the French as unites scaligériennes . ³⁰ He recognized the difference between reading and staging tragedies, however this led him to exclude harmony and song from his definition of tragedy. Tragedy was ‘an imitation through actions of some distinguished life, [generally] unhappy in outcome, in serious metrical discourse’. Comedy was ‘a dramatic poem which is filled with intrigue, full of action, happy in its outcome and written in a popular style’. ³¹ The true end of drama was moral improvement, although Scaliger recognized that this was not Aristotle’s end: ‘imitation is not the goal of poetry; it is learning accompanied with pleasure, by which the character of minds maybe brought to right reason: that by them man may attain perfect action, which is called beatitude’ (Poetices 7.2.346). What does poetry teach? ‘The poet teaches states of mind through actions so that we may embrace the good ones and imitate them to guide out conduct, and to reject the evile ones in order to refrain from them. Action, then, is a means of instruction: a state of mind is what we are taught that	A place people came to for diversion by watching poetry	moral instruction through imitation; pleasure; diversion	Doing: poetry (comedy and tragedy) Showing: a ‘reality’ which appeared devoid of artifice Watching: people came to the theatre for diversion; spectators (listeners) were critical of artifice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		we may act. In a play, the action is, as it were, the model or the means, while the state of mind is the goal' (Poetices 7.3.347). Not that this is what spectators necessarily have in mind: they just 'come[s] together for the express purpose of exchanging the tedium of countless days for several hours' diversion' (Poetices I.6.II). Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-artifice View of Theatre: functional
Preface: 'Brief discourse pour l'intelligence de ce théâtre', La mort de César (1561)	Jacques Grévin (1538-1570) French dramatist	Reveals some influence of Aristotle, whom Grévin cites as the authority for his definition of tragedy: 'an imitation or representation of some fact illustrious and grand in itself', although he dispenses with a singing chorus on the grounds of verisimilitude: 'when the troubles ... come to republics, the common folk would have little occasion to sing'. ³² In any case, he believed that 'various nations do things in different ways'. ³³ Grévin was the first to use the word 'theatre' in a book title Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: an art form; positive	An institution; a practice or art	Imitation or representation	Doing: 'theatre' (tragedy) Showing: verisimilitude
Preface to Romeus and Juliet (1562)	Arthur Brooke (d. c1563) English translator	The 'story taught virtue by [a] miserable example'. ³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: introduction View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: telling a story Showing: examples
1567 First complete translation of Horace's Ars poetica into English, by Thomas Drant. A rather free translation which nevertheless provided a codified body of classical theory in the vernacular. ³⁵ 1570 Translation of Johann Sturm's Nobilitas literata into English, by English scholar Thomas Brown and which introduced the Aristotelian idea of imitation (mimesis) to England.
Schoolmaster (1570)	Roger Ascham (1515-1568) English scholar and teacher	Published posthumously; included a discussion of Aristotle's conception of mimesis : 'The whole doctrine of comedies and tragedies is a perfect Imitation, or fair lively painted picture of the life of every degree of man.' ³⁶ Although Ascham rates tragedy more highly than comedy (as did Aristotle) he does so on moral grounds. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction through imitation	Doing: drama (comedy and tragedy) Showing: imitation
Poetics of Aristotle, Translated into the Vernacular and	Ludovico Castelvetro (1505-1571) Italian scholar	Essential theorist. One of the first of the great commentaries on Aristotle to be published in any modern European language, making it available to a wide audience; ³⁹ less a commentary than an attempt to establish a poetic system rivalling Aristotle's based, not, as Aristotle's had been, on the structure and internal relationships of the drama itself, but on the needs and demands of the spectators (listeners) (the second thread of Aristotle's analyses, according to Crane, ⁴⁰ and the one ignored until Castelvetro). The Poetica	A place in which poetry was staged before spectators	Pleasure; recreation; inurement. Teaching is a false goal. Spectators	Doing: Poetry - a practice or craft of representation Showing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Explicated (1570) ³⁸		offered ‘to interpret, to complete, to update, and even to correct Aristotle’s thought and thus to achieve the status of independent theories’.⁴¹ Represents a radical view both with regard to Aristotle and his contemporaries, not least because of his ‘clear recognition of a non-verbal language of the theatre in his application of the term ‘dramatic’. The ‘dramatic’ was ‘a representation of words and things by means of both words and things’. This distinction between the ‘dramatic’ and the ‘similitudinary’ in which a representation of word and things was made by words alone (as in narrative) was the basis for his insistence on performance ‘as essential to the dramatic genre’ but although ‘many important corollaries follow from it’ some of which were readily taken up (e.g. unity of place) this ‘fundamental premise was virtually ignored’.⁴² He rejects Aristotle’s idea of ‘purgation’ (catharsis), believing it was invented only to answer Plato’s criticisms regarding the value of drama, but, like most theorists who claim that pleasure is the purpose of art, had trouble accounting for the appeal of tragedy, which he claimed gave us ‘oblique’ pleasure, partly because we enjoy the punishment of injustice (‘gladness’), and partly because we learn about how we might be affected by life’s misfortunes (‘sadness’) without being forced to learn this ‘openly and in words’,⁴³ and perhaps also because we become inured to it or fatalistic about it. The stage and drama were invented for the ‘pleasure of the ignorant multitude’ who were not readers but ‘spectators and hearers’, therefore their needs and desires must be considered. Since the purpose of poetry was ‘the pleasure and recreation of the common people, its subjects must be things suited to their understanding and therefore capable of giving them pleasure. Such things are the everyday happenings that are talked about among the people, the kind that resemble those reported in any one day’s news and histories’, not things which require a specialised knowledge of things like astronomy and philosophy.⁴⁴ This focus not just on pleasing spectators but on advocating on behalf of the ‘lowest’ kind of spectator also represents a sharp separation from both Aristotle and contemporary Renaissance thinkers and ‘contradicts all those who attempt to dignify dramatic art by attributing to it a didactic function in relation to a refined audience’.⁴⁵ Dramas were designed to be performed: ‘Aristotle is of the opinion that the delight to be obtained from reading a tragedy is as great as that to be obtained from a performance of it; this I aver to be false’.⁴⁶ Unsophisticated spectators were ‘impressed by the amount of labor involved’ so ‘difficulty overcome’ was one of the criteria of art.⁴⁷ Castelvetro presents a rigid		should be put at their ease;	representations - ‘things that can be understood by the common people’.⁵⁸ Watching: the common people are interested in the things that happen every day; spectators (listeners) also enjoyed and appreciated the skills involved in overcoming difficulties (within the play and in staging). Castelvetro recognized the need for shared conventions for this to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		conception of the two basic ‘unities’: time and place. The time of a play should be identical with real time. Twelve hours was probably the maximum time for a play since the spectators could not be expected to remain in the theatre longer due to bodily necessities, and place should be ‘that vista alone which would appear to the eye of a single person’: there must be ‘due regard for the physical needs of the people’.⁴⁸ In this way he made the actual conditions of theatre in terms of their effects on spectators a central argument in his dramatic theory. His formulation of the unities of time, place and action ‘was the first coherent statement of the “rules”’ and it became a ‘cornerstone of neoclassical criticism’.⁴⁹ His view had an enormous impact, especially in France where he lived in exile after being condemned by the Inquisition for ‘doctrinal deviance’.⁵⁰ His book was not accepted universally in Italy, not least because the book was proscribed. His view of Aristotle’s major unity (action) was broader: ‘There is no doubt that it is more pleasurable to listen to a plot containing many and diverse actions than one which contains but a single one’.⁵¹ Action is preferable to narration on stage, unless it cannot be done with verisimilitude. Marks a shift to audience psychology which is taken up by other theorists both in Italy and elsewhere.⁵² (Castelvetro’s book became available in France before 1572, and in Spain after 1570).⁵³ He drew attention to the original meaning of the word poet as maker when he argued that the poet was an inventor, who invented using language to create an ‘image and imitation of history’, although the imitation created by the poet was not of the same order as the imitation which was natural to men: ‘the imitation required by poetry not only does not copy models set before it or duplicate something already made without knowing why it has been so made, but rather makes a thing in every way distinguishable from any made before that day, and, so to speak, creates a model for others to copy’. The difference lay in reflexivity: ‘the poet should know perfectly the reason why he does what he does’.⁵⁴ He also insisted that performance was ‘a defining characteristic of the dramatic genre’ and that performance used ‘a language of things, as well as of words’.⁵⁵ He also suggested that the kind of government under which a people lived would determine the kind of drama which would be available for them to see. In particular, neither democracies nor monarchies were likely to present a drama in which a common person rose to be a monarch because such a theme might generate political jealousy.⁵⁶ Sidnell remarks that ‘the valuation that Castelvetro in the sixteenth century gives to non-verbal theatrical			happen

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		expression ... is exceptional' both for his own time and earlier, and long afterwards.⁵⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
Prologue to Damon and Pithias (1571) ⁵⁹	Richard Edwards (1524-1566) English logician, musician, poet and playwright	The Prologue is 'one of the earliest examples of an attempt at dramatic theory by an English playwright' and perhaps the first to apply the term tragical comedy.⁶⁰ Spectators sit in 'upright judgment'.⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		To please the spectators	Doing: playwrighting Showing: the nature of characters Watching: spectators were judges
'L'art de la tragédie', preface to Saül le furieux (1572); Prologue: Les corrivaux (1573)	Jean de la Taille (1540-1611) French critic	Brought into French theory the Italian practice of privileging Aristotle over Horace with regard to 'the "laws" of the theatre'; most likely influenced by Castelvetro. The end of tragedy was 'to move and to arouse ... the emotions', ⁶² i.e. a 'clear shift from moral to artistic ends' which reveals the influence of Aristotle in France, and opens up an interpretation which would influence French neoclassicism. An emphasis on the unities, and verisimilitude, especially with regard to offstage action (murders could not be performed for real onstage). An emphasis on a unified and well-constructed plot (as in Aristotle), with nothing 'useless, superfluous, or out of place'. Comedies were 'a mirror' of 'the natural, and the manner of action of all members of the populace'.⁶³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To move or arouse emotion; to mirror 'the natural'	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy) Showing: verisimilitude
Annotationi nel libro della Poetica d'Aristotele (1575)	Alessandro Piccolomini (1508-1578) Italian philosopher and playwright	A similar focus on spectators as in Castelvetro, but without his rigidity with regard to verisimilitude: even ignorant spectators know that they are not viewing reality. An imitation cannot be true or it wouldn't be an imitation. Spectators 'grant and concede to the imitations all that which is far from the truth and which the art of imitation of necessity requires and brings'.⁶⁴ Still accepts the unity of time in terms of spectator comfort: twelve hours is the limit, but spectators can easily accept the convention of stage time, and the compression of time. Tragedies should be based on known stories, however, because familiarity would lead to deeper effects. (Early recognition of 'suspension of disbelief').	A place in which plays (poetry) are staged before spectators	Representation and affect	Doing: poetry (imitation) Watching: spectators know they are not viewing reality; they agree to imitation for the sake of its effects and

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			skill, although familiarity with stories increases effects
1576 English translation of Giovanni della Casa's Galateo (1576) by Robert Peterson. The only reference to katharsis in England during the early Renaissance; Peterson was not impressed with the idea, claiming that 'strong mustard' could achieve the same end.⁶⁵ 1576: Burbage opens either the second or third permanent theatre in Europe after Roman times (there are references to a theatre-like structure at the court at Ferrara c1550, and the Hôtel de Bourgogne was constructed by the Confrère de la Passion for the presentation of religious drama in 1548), and the first in England,⁶⁶ restoring to the term theatre some of the 'sense of place' which it originally carried. Yates argues that this marked a brief period (to 1608) in which 'a type of theatre existed ... in which the true qualities of the ancient theatre had been captured to a degree perhaps never equalled before, or since', a theatre 'which expressed the world in its ground plan'. After 1608, when Shakespeare moved his company to the Blackfriars Theatre, there was a gradual separation from this cosmic and religious connection. By the time of the Restoration, the picture stage theatre, with its elaborate proscenium arch separating spectators and players, became established, holding sway until the mid-twentieth century saw a movement back to an arena type of theatre with an open stage.⁶⁷ Late C16th: credibility not faith was required from the theatre i.e. there was an expectation that what was on stage would be fabricated, but that it should appear 'natural and played without pretense';⁶⁸ what mattered was how credible the fabrication was. According to Postlewait and Davies this accounts for the large number of plays which drew attention to themselves as theatrical at the time, a tactic which also reversed the tables on those who opposed theatre 'for its dissembling inauthenticity' since they explicitly pointed to their theatricality.⁶⁹ Views on how credibility should be attained were contested, especially with regard to the 'unities' of time and space, and the use of original elements: 'Italian Renaissance criticism can never be considered a single unified critical tradition'.⁷⁰ The opening of the first public theatre in England in 1576 precipitated a decade of attacks on the theatre, generally but not always by Puritans. These attacks are reflected in the English literature ('pamphlets and counterpamphlets') on theatre of the time, and somewhat paradoxically also drew on classic authors as well as church fathers to make their attacks. The debate was so extensive that in 1584, Oxford University introduced it as a topic suitable for an MA degree.⁷¹ The conflict anticipated the French critical quarrels on C17th. By the end of C16th, the only theatrical form of the Italian Renaissance which was to survive, the opera, had appeared. Its inventors had thought they were recreating Greek tragedy, which they understood as music fused with drama. The earliest operas were based on Greek mythology: Peri's Euridice (1600) and Monteverdi's Orfeo (1605). It experienced widespread popularity: by the mid C17th, several public operas houses had been built in Venice alone. The form spread to France during C17th.⁷²
Treatise (1577)	John Northbrooke (fl 1567-1589) English clergyman and	The full title of Northbrooke's book is a Treatise wherein Dicing, Daucing, Vaine plaies or Enterludes ... are reprooued by the authoritie of the worde of God and auncient Writers . It is a dialogue between Youth and Age in which theatre is condemned for obscenity and baseness. The treatise nevertheless recommends the use of tragedies and comedies for scholarly study, and defines both along traditional lines. ⁷³	A place of where entertain-ments took place	Instruction (as literature)	Doing: performance Showing: obscenity, baseness

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	writer	Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative; functional (as literature)			Watching: common people are corrupted by such things
Preface to Promos and Cassandra (1578) ⁷⁴	George Whetstone (c1544-1587) English playwright, translator, biographer and anthologist	A response to attacks such as Northbrooke's, also drawing on classic authors and classical definitions of tragedy and comedy, and promoting the moral instruction value of drama: 'by the reward of the good, the good are encouraged in well-doing: and with the scourge of the lewd, the lewd are feared from evil attempts'. ⁷⁵ The most complete summary of English neoclassic ideas on drama to date, it included a brief survey of French, Spanish, Italian and German drama, but also condemned English drama for its lack of decorum, lack of appropriateness and mixing of genres, and for ignoring the unities and verisimilitude: 'in three hours runs he through the world, marries, gets children, makes children men, men to conquer kingdoms, murder monsters, and bringeth gods from Heaven and fetcheth devils from hell'. ⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form	Moral instruction	Doing: drama: an historically and geographically contingent art; Showing: moral consequences of actions; a model for behaviour
Apologie of the Schoole of Abuse (1579); Players Confuted in Fiue Actions (1582)	Stephen Gosson (1554-1623) English humanist and former actor turned Puritan	The Apologie was a series of pamphlets in which Gosson condemned poetry on similar grounds to Plato. While good art might instruct, art could also be turned to evil purposes, stirring up the emotions and 'subjugating reason', thereby hampering moral choice. Players was a response to Lodge: plays originated in pagan religion and were therefore 'the doctrines and inuentions of the deuill.' Using Aristotle's four causes (efficient, material, formal and final), Gosson argues that plays are about 'thinges as neuer were', and generally deceive even when their subject matter is true because the poet makes them 'longer, or shorter, or greater or lesse than they were'. In general, 'to act is to lie, and to lie is to sin', an argument taken up by Elizabethan critics of theatre. ⁷⁷ Finally plays were designed 'to make our affections overflow', overwhelming reason and self-control. ⁷⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A place where 'players' deceive spectators	Deception; loss of self-control	Doing: acting: a dangerous art, an invention of the devil - a lie
A Reply to Stephen Gosson's	Thomas Lodge (c1558-1625) English poet and	Rebuttal of Gosson's attack. Poetry was inspired by God. It was an effective instrument for moral instruction. ⁷⁹		Moral instruction	Doing: Poetry - an instrument of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Schoole of Abuse (c1579)	writer	Purpose of Theorist: polemic – defence of poetry (drama) View of Theatre: functional			instruction
The Defense of Poesy (c1580; 1595) ⁸⁰	Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586) English courtier and patron of the arts; created ‘princely pleasures’ for the Queen and her court ⁸¹	Essential theorist. Written partly in refutation of Gosson’s Platonic attack, The Defense was a ‘milestone’ of Renaissance critical thought for both England and Europe, ⁸² presenting a synthesis of general critical thought of the time. It drew heavily on Aristotle, Plato, Horace, Scaliger and Minturno as well as other Italian commentators, with whom Sidney had become acquainted during three years of travelling on the continent. ⁸³ Sidney argued that Plato did not wish to banish poetry as such, but rather banish ‘the abuse, not the thing’. ⁸⁴ Poetry is ‘an art of imitation A representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth ... a speaking picture, with this end – to teach and delight’. ⁸⁵ His conception of imitation was similar to the Neoplatonists’, and he also stressed a moral purpose: the realisation of virtuous action. He saw poetry as more suited to this than philosophy or history. Comedy and tragedy were defined in terms of their moral utility: ‘comedy is an imitation of the common errors of our life’ to teach us to avoid them ... tragedy ... openeth the greatest wounds and showeth forth the ulcers ... maketh kings fear to be tyrants, and tyrants manifest their tyrannical humours’ and ‘teacheth the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilden roofs are builded’. He argued that delight and laughter were different things, and that we could be delighted without laughing. ⁸⁶ He agreed that poetry had been abused, but that did not mean it could not be put to good use. Poetry did not lie; it simply worked in allegory and figure, which even a child could recognize: ‘fort he poet, he nothing affirmeth, and therefore never lieth’ ... ‘What child is there that coming to a play and seeing “Thebes” written in great letters upon an old door doth believe that it is Theves?’. ⁸⁷ He argued that poetry created ‘a speaking picture’ which was more powerful than any theoretical discussion, although this only appeared to be ‘in the theatre of the mind’. ⁸⁸ He followed the Italian critics in endorsing the unities, and while allowing the mix of genres, such mixing should not be indiscriminate. He also distinguished comedy from farce as more refined, and gave ‘a primacy to tragedy that is new to English scholarship’, although his analysis, based on a sound knowledge of contemporary practice and theory, was soon to be overthrown by the great Elizabethan dramatists: ⁸⁹ ‘the writing and publication of the Defence could hardly have been less opportunely timed’. Sidnell also argues that Sidney had no real	A place where poetry was spoken	To teach; to delight through the realisation of virtuous action	Doing: an art of imitation; ⁹² a ‘speaking picture’ Showing: not lies but allegory and figure Watching: spectators recognize and understand allegory and figure; they are not taken in by theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		enthusiasm for the theatre, and admitted he had limited experience of it:⁹⁰ 'I have lavished out too many words on this play matter. I do it because as they are excelling parts of poesy, so is there none so much used as in England, and none can be more pitifully abused'.⁹¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – defence of theatre View of Theatre: functional

¹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.155

² Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 42-3

³ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.116

⁴ Carlson 1984: 40

⁵ Quoted by Carlson 1984: 40, from Weinberg 1961, Vol 1 p. 412.

⁶ Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.90

⁷ Carlson 1984: 70-71

⁸ Carlson gives the publication date of La strega as 1566, but Sidnell says the play was not published until 1582, although it had been written between 1546 and 1547, while the prologue was written possibly as late as 1574 (Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.115). The version reprinted in Sidnell (1992: 115-120) was originally published in Plaisance, Michel (ed) 1976, La Strega, Paris.

⁹ Grazzini 1991/1582: 119 in Sidnell.

¹⁰ In Antonfrancesco Grazzini 1859, Commedie, Florence, p.5; quoted in Carlson 1984: 43.

¹¹ Grazzini 1991/1582: 118-119

¹² Sidnell 1991: 115

¹³ Sidnell 1991: 115-6n2

¹⁴ Jacques Peletier 1555, L'art poétique, Lyons, p. 70; in Carlson 1984: 71.

¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 71

¹⁶ William Bavande 1559, A work of Ioannes Ferrarius Montanus touchynge the good-orderynge of a commonweele ..., London, p. 81; in Carlson 1984: 77-8.

¹⁷ Carlson 1984: 44

¹⁸ Quoted and translated in Weinberg 1942, 'The Poetic Theories of Minturno', Studies in Honor of Dean Shipley, Washington University Studies N.S. 14, p. 105; quoted in Carlson 1984: 44.

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 44-45

²⁰ Nevyle 1887, The Tenne Tragedies of Seneca, Manchester, p. 162; in Carlson 1984: 78

²¹ Carlson 1984: 43-44

²² Excerpts reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 99-110 from a facsimile reprint of the Lyon 1561 edition with an introduction by August Buck, 1964, Stuttgart and Bad Cannstatt.

-
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 71
- ²⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 176
- ²⁵ Sidnell 1991: 98
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 45
- ²⁷ Sidnell 1991: 98
- ²⁸ Sidnell 1991: 6
- ²⁹ Cited in Sidnell 1991: 6
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 46-7
- ³¹ Translated and quoted in Weinberg 1942, 'Scaliger versus Aristotle', Modern Philology Vol 39, pp. 338, 345; quoted by Carlson 1984: 46.
- ³² Grévin 1562, Le theatre de Jacques Grévin, Paris, p. iij-iiij; in Carlson 1984: 72.
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 72
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 78
- ³⁵ Carson 1984: 78
- ³⁶ Ascham 1864, The Whole Works, 2 vols, London, 2: 213; in Carlson 1984: 78.
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 78
- ³⁸ Translated and published by Andrew Bongiorno, 1984, Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 29, Binghamton, NY; extract reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 130-144 and in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 109-118.
- ³⁹ This was despite the first edition being listed on the Index of Prohibited Books and all copies being burnt. Castelvetro was arrested by the Inquisition, escaped and fled, living the rest of his life in exile, generally in Lyon. The second edition of his Poetics was heavily censored, but the ink on these copies has since faded enough for scholars to be able to read the 'heretical passages' (Gerould 2000: 108).
- ⁴⁰ Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.221
- ⁴¹ Sidnell 1991: 5
- ⁴² Sidnell 1991: 6
- ⁴³ Lodovico Castelvetro 1576, Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e aposta, Basel, p. 299; quoted in Carlson 1984: 50
- ⁴⁴ Castelvetro 1991/1570: 131-135 (in Sidnell)
- ⁴⁵ Sidnell 1991: 129
- ⁴⁶ Castelvetro 1576: 297; quoted in Carlson 1984: 48.
- ⁴⁷ Gerould 2000: 108
- ⁴⁸ Castelvetro 1991/1570: 133
- ⁴⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 177
- ⁵⁰ Sidnell 1991: 129
- ⁵¹ Castelvetro 1576: 535; 504; quoted in Carlson 1984: 49.

-
- ⁵² Carlson 1984: 50
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 58
- ⁵⁴ Castelvetro 1991/1570: 131-133
- ⁵⁵ Sidnell 1991: 129
- ⁵⁶ Castelvetro 2000/1570, in Gerould 2000: 109-118, p. 114-115.
- ⁵⁷ Sidnell 1994: 2
- ⁵⁸ Castelvetro 2000/1570, in Gerould 2000: 109-118, p. 109.
- ⁵⁹ Published in White, Jerry (ed), 1980, Richard Edwards' "Damon and Pithias": a Critical Old-Spelling Edition, NY; reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 146-7.
- ⁶⁰ Sidnell 1991: 145
- ⁶¹ Edwards 1991/1571: 147
- ⁶² De la Taille 1574, De 'art de la tragédie, Paris, p. ij; in Carlson 1984: 72.
- ⁶³ De la Taille 1574, Les corrivaux, Paris, p. iij; in Carlson 1984: 73.
- ⁶⁴ Alessandra Piccolomini 1575, Annotazioni nel libro della Poetica d'Aristotele, Venice, p. 24; quoted in Carlson 1984: 50.
- ⁶⁵ Carlson 1984: 79
- ⁶⁶ Orgel, Stephen. 1975. The Illusion of Power: Political Theater in the English Renaissance. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.²
- ⁶⁷ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd. 171-6
- ⁶⁸ Jean Bouchet, Epistle 90, recorded in Petit de Julleville's 1880 account of the mystery plays; quoted in Enders 2003: 42.
- ⁶⁹ Enders 2003: 15
- ⁷⁰ Carlson 1984: 51
- ⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 79-81
- ⁷² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 158.
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 79
- ⁷⁴ Whetstone 1901/1578, Promos and Cassandra, Tudor Facsimile Texts, London; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 166. Shakespeare was 'heavily indebted' to this play for his Measure for Measure (Sidnell 1991: 165).
- ⁷⁵ Whetstone 1991/1578: 166
- ⁷⁶ Whetstone 1991/1578: 166
- ⁷⁷ Carlson 1984: 81
- ⁷⁸ Stephen Gosson 1974, The Dramatic Criticism, A.F. Kinney (ed), Salzburg), pp 151, 161, 169, 181; in Carlson 1984: 81.
- ⁷⁹ Carlson 1984: 80
- ⁸⁰ Written in c1580, an unauthorized version was published in 1595 under the title An Apologie for Poetrie, followed by an edition printed for William Ponsonby called The Defence of Poesie (also 1595). Excerpts from the Ponsonby edition are reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 176-182. Note that Carlson (1984: 82) gives the date as 1581.
- ⁸¹ Sidney did however, die massively in debt. His father-in-law went bankrupt trying to pay the debts off (Gerould 2000: 118).
- ⁸² Carlson 1984: 82
- ⁸³ Gerould 2000: 117; Sidnell 1991: 176n2

⁸⁴ Sidney 1583/1890, The Defense of Poesy, ed. Albert S. Cook, Boston, Ginn and Co., excerpt in Gerould 2000: 119-127, p. 124.

⁸⁵ Sidney 1890, The Defense of Posei, A.S. Cook (ed), Boston, p. 9; in Carlson 1984: 82).

⁸⁶ Sidney 1991/1595: 179-182

⁸⁷ Sidney 1991/1595: 177

⁸⁸ Sidnell 1991: 176

⁸⁹ Carlson 1984: 82-3

⁹⁰ Sidnell 1991: 177

⁹¹ Sidney 1991/1595: 182

⁹² Sidney 1583/1890, in Gerould 2000: 119-127, p. 121.

Table 6/51 Theories of Theatre 1581-1600

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1580's: construction of the Teatro Olimpico at Vicenza, designed by Palladio based on Vitruvius' triangles. ¹
'Au lecteur', preface to Regulus (1582)	Jean de Beaubreuil (fl. 1580's) French dramatist	Rejected the 'unities'. Included 'long intervals of time' in his drama: they were necessary for understanding it. The adherence to the unity of time (as understood) was 'too superstitious'. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		Performance	Doing: playwrighting
Anatomie of Abuses (1583)	Philip Stubbes (c1555-c1610) English poet & pamphleteer	Similar argument against plays as Gosson (above). ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A dangerous art	Stirring up emotions at the expense of reason	Doing: plays
Sidonia (1583); Commentaries on Tasso	Orazio Ariosto (1555-1593) Italian playwright	Challenged the belief that spectators needed to know the story behind a tragedy. This belief was 'merely another aspect of the false assumption' that spectators could not distinguish between theatre and reality: 'If we wish to concern ourselves with persuading the spectators that the thing represented is really true, it will no longer suffice to make the stage-settings of boards or in any other simulated way, but entire cities will have to be founded; nor will it be sufficient to dress in regal mantles the actors, but we will have to go about resuscitating ... the ashes of those Clytemnestras, of those Oedipuses ... and place them once again, I do not say upon the stage, but in their royal palaces.' ⁴ Audiences are capable of distinguishing between the stage and reality. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place of simulation	Representation	Showing: simulations or representations Watching: spectators were aware they were at the theatre and were not watching 'reality'
Latin commentary on Aristotle (1585)	Antonio Riccoboni (1541-1599) Italian scholar & rhetorician	The shortest of the 'great commentaries'. Featured a critical shift in the traditional views of the purpose or object of poetry: utility is only an accidental end of poetry; pleasure was subject to abuse and the combination of pleasure and utility (instruction) was contradictory; imitation was an inadequate account of poetry. Plot is the central concern of tragedy (as Aristotle says). (The only major commentator of the time to recognize this). ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place where stories are enacted	Story-telling	Doing: Poetry
De gli eroici	Giordano	'Poetry is not born of rules ... there are as many genres and species of true rules as there			Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional			appreciate the skills involved
A Mirrour of Monsters (1587)	William Rankin (fl. 1587) English Puritan	One of the last of the flurry of criticism precipitated by the opening of England's first public theatre, also along Gosson's Platonic line. The complete title of the book reads: A mirrour of monsters: wherein is plainly described the manifold vices, &c spotted enormities, that are caused by the infectious sight of playes, with the description of the subtile slights of Sathan, making them his instruments. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A seeing place (where plays are performed)	Affective: stirring up emotions at the expense of reason	Doing: performing plays Watching: has negative effects on spectators
'Préface sur la Françiadé ' (1587)	Pierre de Ronsard (1525-1585) French poet	Scattered comments on drama; 'clearly subscribes to tradition and rule-centred criticism'. The ends of both comedy and tragedy are didactic, 'and best achieved through verisimilitude [and] the unities [especially] a "minute to minute" correspondence with real life'. Ronsard marks the last French interest in the 'three unities' until c1630. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Instruction through verisimilitude	Doing: drama (comedy and tragedy) Showing: strict correspondence with reality
Discorso introno a que principii, cause, et accrescimenti (1587)	Giasone de Nores (c1530-1590) Professor of moral philosophy, University of Padua	'a staunch defender of classic theory'; attacked the idea of pastoral tragicomedy both for its style, and on moral grounds, drawing on Cicero, Plato and Aristotle: sophisticated urban spectators had no interest in the activities of shepherds and in any case the mixing of tragedy and comedy meant that inappropriate language needed to be used by the characters, 'offending both decorum and verisimilitude', ¹⁶ and therefore interfering with the moral ends of poetry (the imparting of moral lessons). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: poetry Watching: different audiences wanted to see different things
Il verrato (1588); Compendium of Tragicomic Poetry (1589) ¹⁷	Giambattista Guarini (1538-1612) Italian professor of rhetoric, politician, diplomat and	Essential theorist. A response to de Nores' attack on his tragicomedy The Faithful Shepherd as 'a monstrous and irregular composition', the Compendio represents a major document in the controversy over the challenging of decorum and propriety; uses verisimilitude to argue that life itself combines tragic and comic elements (an argument later used by the romantics for the same purpose). The 1601 edition of Guarini's Compendium of Tragicomic Poetry marking 'the climax of a long and heated debate about tragicomedy', ¹⁸ with Guarini arguing that purgation was the job of the Gospels,	A place where poetry is staged and performed	Entertainment, to delight spectators; to purge their melancholy through	Doing: Poetry (an art of imitation) characterized by performance Showing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	dramatist (poet)	not theatre. Guarini argued that tragicomedy was an improvement on traditional genres because it avoided the extremes of both. The purpose of drama was not moral instruction, but the delight of spectators. Guarani drew the distinction, popular at the time, between an instrumental end and an architectonic end: the instrumental end is the imitation of some action; the architectonic end of this imitation in tragedy is purgation of pity and terror in favour of fortitude and in comedy is the purging of melancholy, but Guarini rejected the architectonic end as a legitimate end of contemporary theatre – rather it was the purpose of the teaching of the gospel. A clear separation between theatre and religion. Nevertheless, his definition of tragicomedy represents a paradoxical mix of classic and radical ideas: ‘to imitate with scenic apparatus an action which is feigned and which contains all those elements of comedy and tragedy which can be united according to verisimilitude and decorum, correctly presented in a single dramatic form with the end of purging with delight the melancholy of the audience’.¹⁹ It recognizes imitation as imitation, requires verisimilitude and decorum and unity of form, and considers its end purgation, not of the passions, however, but of melancholy, through delight. Distinction between commercial theatre (commedia) and classical poetry. Despite this belief that the end of poetry was delight, Guarini condemned the then flourishing commedia dell’arte as ‘crass commercialism that degraded the ancient art of comedy’.²⁰ He saw tragicomedy as a means of overcoming this commercialism.²¹ Like Castelvetro, Guarini recognized performance as characteristic of dramatic art: ‘Tragedy and comedy have performance in common, plus all the rest of the stage machinery as well as rhythm, harmony, finite length, dramatic plot, verisimilitude, recognition, and reversal’. Poetry is ‘nothing other than the imitation of the verisimilar’, and it ‘must also keep changing in accordance with changing times and customs’.²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional		imitation of action	decorum; verisimilitude
Arte of English Poesie (1589)	George Puttenham (1529-1590) English writer	The ‘most systematic and comprehensive treatise of the time’ on poetry, seen as literature, although Carlson claims that it offers not much more elaboration than Webbe’s (1586).²³ Puttenham did however defend fiction as being ‘more pleasing and more effective than historical truth’, and claimed that poetry fulfilled important social functions and could therefore be defended on moral grounds even though ‘its great end is emotional and its chief purpose man’s recreation and delight’.²⁴		Recreation; delight, moral efficacy	Doing: Poetry (as literature)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Puttenham introduced the term dramatic into English in his book. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional
The Faerie Queen (1590)	Edmund Spenser (c1552-1599) English poet and philosopher	Spenser was ‘fascinated with the formal problems posed by the stage’, ²⁵ in particular the position of the spectator. While he appeared to accept Aristotle’s model of spectatorship in relation to tragedy: the effect of purgation through a combination of pity and fear (defined by Spenser as ‘admiration and commiseration’ or ‘truth and wonder’), he also saw tragedy as having the capacity to teach moral lessons, generally through the confrontation with the human limits for intervention. This didacticism, however, was related to the positioning and subsequent behaviour of the spectator. If the spectator became engrossed in the tragedy before him, seeing it as a kind of sport, then it seemed that any hope of learning (or purgation) was lost. Yet Spenser seems unsure of this point, because he also saw that efforts to restore order and set the spectator back inevitably followed any manifestation of vicarious enjoyment in the theatre, so that the end of such enjoyment could not be seen. However, since the value of watching tragedy lay in the recognition of human limits and helplessness, it was necessary to have the spectator remain at a distance to what was being played out. This value of watching tragedy did not just apply to theatre – it applied to any tragedy – but, paradoxically, theatre risked counteracting the value because it detached the spectator from real horror of tragedy: in the theatre it was actually possible to enjoy tragedy because theatre allowed this detachment from reality by reducing it to passivity. The end of The Faerie Queen sees Spenser resolve the dilemma through forgetfulness. Characters are offered a drink which encourages them to forget, and therefore makes reconciliation possible. Dolven suggests that Spenser believed that recognizing the limits of individual agency was unbearable for the spectator (both within and outside the play) and either led to efforts to pacify spectators, or to precipitate action which ‘foreclose[d] understanding’. ²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional	A place in which one watches staged tragedies	Moral instruction	Doing: the art of staging Watching: the spectator’s dilemma: to maintain distance, thus maintaining perspective and learning the lessons of tragedy (that humans have a limited capacity to intervene) or to cross the line and act to intervene – and thus lose perspective and possibly cause more harm.
Francesco’s Fortunes (1590)	Robert Greene (c1560-1592) English playwright and pamphleteer	Greene considered acting as ‘a kind of mechanical labour’ and ‘complained that too often the players mistake the work of the writer whose words they use for their own.’ ²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place of performance		Doing: acting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Prologue to The Prison of Love (1590) ²⁸	Sforza Oddi (1540-1611) Italian professor of jurisprudence and playwright	The Prison of Love is a highly developed example of commedia grave (serious comedy), and was immensely popular and esteemed in its time. First performed in 1590, it was reprinted 22 times between 1590 and 1634. The Prologue, a debate between Tragedy and Comedy, is a defense of this ‘modern’ type of comedy, seen by its critics as ‘an improper hybrid’. ²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional	A place of performance	Entertainment and consolation	Doing: playwrighting for performance Showing: a reflection of life ³⁰
1591-1592 Spanish translations of Horace’s Ars poetica appear in Madrid and Lisbon. ³¹
Prologue, Endimion (1591)	John Lyly (1553-1606) English dramatist	Concerned with differentiating between farce and comedy (which he saw as more refined); drama has no moral function; it is a mere pastime. ³² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		A pastime	Doing: drama
Philosophía antigua poética (c1596)	Alonso López Pinciano (c1547-1672) Spanish theorist, poet and physician	Pinciano had previously translated Horace into Spanish. The Philosophía involves a ‘discussion’, often in dialectic form, of poetic genres, plot, tragedy, comedy and the art of acting. The work ‘equals or surpasses most of the more famous Italian works of the century’. ³³ It identifies tragedy and comedy along traditional line, and attempts to combine Aristotle’s katharsis with Horace’s ‘delight and instruction’, and also endorses the ideas of decorum and appropriateness. Includes a substantial discussion on drama as performance (unlike most Renaissance treatises) in which the profession of acting is defended: ‘If poetry is ... an honest work, useful in the world, how can those who execute it be thought vile and infamous?’ ³⁴ Drama should, however, entail verisimilitude to this end. Pinciano even anticipates the C18th debate over what constituted good acting , arguing that it was likely that the best artist would be the one who concentrated on technique, being able to ‘move to tears without weeping himself’. ³⁵ Also included substantial remarks on music, stage machinery, setting and costumes, and a defence of the dramatic unities against Lope de Vega and his followers. Purpose of Theorist: comprehensive overview/analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		Instruction; delight	Doing: (Poetry (a performance art); staging; acting Showing: stage setting enhanced instruction
Th’Overthrow of Stage-Plays (1599)	John Rainold (fl 1590’s) English Puritan	Yet another attack on the stage along Gosson’s lines; indicates the issue continued to bubble away below the surface. Rainold objected to plays because men dressed as women, something he considered ‘evil and an infringement of moral law’, and also because actors appropriated the apparel of those in higher stations. ³⁶		Delusion	Doing: acting as impersonation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative
A Warning for Fair Women (1599)	anonymous ³⁷ (English play)	Includes a discussion of traditional genres, which are represented as characters: Tragedy is a choric commentator who banters with History and Comedy; Comedy describes Tragedy as ‘How some damned tyrant, to obtaine a crowne, / Stabs, hangs, impoysons, smothers, cutteth throats’. Tragedy, however, says her role is that of ‘Extorting tears out of the strictest eyes.’ The play is based on a contemporary domestic crime, and Tragedy admits that it is difficult to build ‘a matter of importance’ from such a subject, although it is popular. Difference between popular and classic theatre. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		Exhorting emotion	Doing: drama (tragedy and comedy)
C16th-C17th: featured concerns over the mixing of genres. Carlson says that the Italian controversy over the mixing of genres encompassed ‘all the enduring questions of theatrical theory’, and indicated that the ‘Quarrel of the Ancients and Moderns’, so much a feature of the C17th, was well underway in Italy, with its pitting of universalistic ideas about genres against the relativistic argument that, since spectators changed over time so should rules, whether or not the classics were prescriptive or merely descriptive of their time, and the purpose or ends of drama (whether they were moral and didactic or aesthetic), and from whence these ends derived: the form of the drama, mimesis, or art.³⁸ Central to this was the belief in the ability of drama to affect its spectators, a conviction which was supported by rhetorical theory even in the absence of actual theatre. (Rhetoric also emphasised listening hence the easy and on-going use of audience in lieu of spectator). Aristotle was used by both sides of the debate to support their position, one side believing his work to be regrettably vague but prescriptive, the other considering it descriptive and useful, but not determining. Generally outside Italy, the prescriptive, didactic view prevailed: Aristotle’s idea of purgation was seen as providing moral improvement, while Plato was used to support the argument for instruction. Verisimilitude was also used by both sides to support their arguments in a debate which would be repeated throughout theatre’s history over the question of the relationship of art to life, and led on the one hand to extreme literalization of time, space and appropriateness, and on the other hand, to the blurring of the boundaries between the classical genres. Although there were many different combinations of opinion, the debate tended to be polarised into a conservative position (‘championship of the ancients, codification of rules, insistence upon decorum and the purity of traditional genres, subordination of art to moral or social concerns’ – most often held by scholars and critics) and a liberal position (‘championship of the moderns, pragmatic and flexible treatment of classic precepts, art seen as an end in itself’ – most often held by theatre practitioners), a polarisation in which the conservative view came to be dominant. Apart from the disdain the scholars exhibited towards theatre practitioners as theorists, a feature of theatre theory still apparent today, there was also considerable discrimination over which other cultures could provide arguments and illustrations. Although similar concerns to those which exercised Italian critics can be found even earlier in Spain, French critics drew on Italian writers, but not Spanish ones, considering the Spanish to be ‘generally free of speculation about or even knowledge of such matters’.³⁹ Unlike Italian practitioners, few of the great English Renaissance dramatists produced any critical theory of the drama.⁴⁰ Schlegel claims that the great theatre of England and Spain developed independently of each other. Neither was aware of the other,⁴¹ even though similarities of form can be detected. According to Egginton, the end of C16th in Italy saw a variety of critical views and theories which largely fell into two camps: traditionalists (which saw Aristotle’s Poetics as prescriptive of how dramatic art ought to be) and modernists (who saw Aristotle’s work as merely descriptive of drama in his own time). It was the traditionalist position that tended to be exported from Italy but generally only to the court, private salons and universities (and even there they were far from popular) while theatre for the masses continued to be medieval theatre (farces, moralities, histories, profane mysteries etc) until Alexandre Hardy, considered to be the first fully professional playwright,⁴² combined elements from both in the popular ‘free’ style. It was not until the 1630’s that ‘the unities’ caught on in France, leading to the concept of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
vraisemblance which aimed at ‘removing from the spectators any occasion to reflect on what they are seeing and to doubt its reality’. ⁴³
L’art poétique François (1598)	Pierre de Laudun d’Aygaliers (1575-1629) French scholar	A flexible view of classic models and rules, including the unities, drawing on Scaliger and Castelvetro. ‘[T]ragedy is created only to please the audience’. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		To please the audience	Doing: Poetry (performed before an audience)
On Mimetic Poetry and the Manner of Representing Scenic Fables (1598) ⁴⁵	Angelo Ingegneri (1550-1613) Italian stage director, producer and playwright	Ingegneri was the first Italian producer and director to publish ‘systemic dramatic theory’. His work is ‘eminently practical’. ⁴⁶ The treatise On Mimetic Poetry was partly a response to criticism of the work of Guarini. He argued that if modern plays were not being written, theatre would have been ‘all but lost’, and the ‘damage to civil life would be great’: apart from the ‘good lessons’ which would be lost, ‘the human soul, in need at times of relaxation and recreation ... would turn in a short time to a source which is less virtuous, lacking in honor and unprofitable’. Ingegneri thought many of the tragedies were ‘unstageable’; they were also ‘sad spectacles’ which did not attract audiences, and were very expensive to mount. Pastorals were a ‘middle-ground’ between tragedies and comedies and were capable of providing ‘delight and the marvelous’. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – promoting contemporary theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form – a part of civil life	Relaxation; recreation	Doing: poetry; staging plays (required money and techniques which should be kept in mind by the dramatist)
Induction to Every Man out of His Humour (1600); Preface to Sejanus (1605); Dedicatory Epistle to Volpone (1607); Prologue to Every Man in	Ben Jonson (1573-1637) English dramatist	The first significant body of critical commentary produced by an English dramatist. Induction includes a detailed consideration of what was the province of comedy (‘humane follies’); it introduces the four bodily fluids of a normal personality (based on medieval physiology and related to the four primary elements of earth, air, fire and water) which are used metaphorically to describe the kinds of personality traits suitable for ridicule and scorn. The purpose of comedy was to ‘scourge’ distortions of the personality through ridicule. There are ‘lawes of Comedie’ (regarding divisions into acts and scenes, numbers of actors, unity of time, mixing of genres etc), which need not be adhered to too closely. The Preface defines tragedies along Senecan lines (dignity of persons, lofty style, sententious observations, verisimilitude) but argues that modern spectators require different approaches (Sejanus has no chorus and ‘offends unity of time’). The Dedicatory Epistle argues that comedy should ‘informe men, in the best reason of liuing’. ⁵⁰ The Prologue repeats Sidney’s arguments for the unities, and claims that the aim of comedy is ‘to sport with humane follies, not with crimes’. ⁵¹ The first of	A place where drama is staged before spectators	Instruction and purgation through ridicule; delight; information; to hold up a mirror to life	Doing: playwrighting : a staged art Showing: information, human follies; the ‘deformity’ of pretenders Watching: different spectators require different

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
his Humour (1616); ⁴⁸ The Magnetic Lady (1640); Timber or Discoveries: Made upon Men and Matter as they have Flowed Out of His Daily Readings or Had their Reflux to his Peculiar Notion of the Times (1640) ⁴⁹		Jonson's 'Inductions' was included in the play Every Man out of his Humour which was first performed at the Globe and at court in 1599. Inductions involved a discussion of a play's approach between its supposed author and others.⁵² This play was to 'oppose a mirror/As large as is the stage' to those who pretended to suffer particular humours (such as melancholy) so that spectators could see this 'vice and folly' and thereby correct it in themselves. Jonson's understanding of comedy as a means of instruction was 'fundamental'. He believed that 'the better sort of spectator [those with 'courteous eyes'] would approve such "physic of the mind" while the worse sort' would utterly reject it.⁵³ The prologue to Every Man in his Humour suggests that unless a dramatist has the art of a Shakespeare, breaking the rules of dramatic construction (e.g. by putting a monster on stage) would simply bring ridicule from spectators, although, since spectators 'have so graced monsters' they may accept anything.⁵⁴ In The Magnetic Lady, Jonson sets up a conceit whereby two 'representatives of the people' engage in a critical commentary on the play with a general assistant from the production, standing on the stage to watch the play and then commenting after each act according to theories of comedy.⁵⁵ Once again, he remarks on the representation of time in a play. His two representatives would have been quite happy to have 'a child be born ... grow up to a man ... come forth a squire ... be made a knight ... travel and do wonders in the holy land ... kill paynims, wild boars, dun cows and other monsters; beget him a reputation ... marry an emperor's daughter ... convert her father's country; and at last come home, lame'. The general assistant complains that they 'think this pen can juggle' when they 'expect what is impossible'.⁵⁶ Begun in 1623 after a fire in his lodgings had destroyed many books and documents including his introduction to Horace's Art of Poetry, Timber was a large range of observations, apparently not meant for publication.⁵⁷ It was published posthumously. Carlson considers it the 'last major work of English Renaissance criticism'. The classics should be considered 'guides, not commanders' for practical dramatists. Instead 'the true artificer' will 'speak to the capacity of his hearers' in a language they understand.⁵⁸ It was 'ridiculous' to make a figure like Aristotle 'a dictator', especially as there were fine poets before him. In the last part of the book, which is devoted to drama, the work of Dutch critic Daniel Heinsius (1611) is at times translated word for word, reflecting the influence of Heinsius in England. Jonson was the first English playwright 'to supervise the systematic publication of his dramatic			approaches; the better sort of spectator (those with 'courteous eyes' – the application of decorum to spectators) would accept the instruction; the worst sort would reject it; spectators were also 'hearers'.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		works'. He was convinced that there was 'a dramatic principle in life itself and that any meretricious theatrical exploitation of it was a danger to be resisted', ⁵⁹ suggesting 'a deeply rooted antitheatricalism', ⁶⁰ although, given his concern with questions of style, plot structure, and characterization, this may reflect more of a concern about the writing process and the protection of plays against misproduction. Nevertheless, he seemed to disdain the taste for vulgarity that writers and spectators for comedies exhibited, preferring drama which instructed and informed. ⁶¹ Distinction between vulgar theatre and classical theatre. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional

¹ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd.122

² De Beaubreuil 1582, Regulus, Limoges, p. I; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.73.

³ Carlson 1984: 81

⁴ Orazio Ariosto 1583, 'Dedicatory letter to Sidonia, December 25, quoted in Weinberg 1961, Vol. 2, p. 936; quoted in Carlson 1984: 51; a similar argument was mounted by Hugo against French neoclassicism's obsession with verisimilitude.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 51

⁶ Giordano Bruno, De gli eroici furore; quoted in Carlson 1984: 52.

⁷ Carlson 1984: 52

⁸ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.148-160

⁹ Carlson 1984: 81

¹⁰ Quoted in Homan, Sidney. 1989. The Audience as Actor and Character: The Modern Theater of Beckett, Brecht, Genet, Ionesco, Pinter, Stoppard and Williams. Lewisburg; London and Toronto: Bucknell University Press; Associated University Presses.164

¹¹ Published by Weinberg, 1970-4; translated by and reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 173-175.

¹² Sidnell 1991: 172

¹³ Giacomini 1991/1586: 173-4 (in Sidnell)

¹⁴ Carlson 1984

¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 73-90

¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 53

¹⁷ Carlson gives the publication date as 1599; publication included Il verrato, which had originally been published under the name of a popular actor of the time (Carlson 1984: 53). Extract from an edition by Gioacchino Brognoligo (1914, Bari) translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 149-159.

-
- ¹⁸ Sidnell 1991: 148
- ¹⁹ Guarini 1991/1589: 155-9
- ²⁰ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 129
- ²¹ Guarini 1991/1570: 158
- ²² Guarini 1991/1589: 150-8
- ²³ Wikipedia 2009, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/George_Puttenham. According to this site, Puttenham's authorship of the book is not certain.
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 82
- ²⁵ Dolven, Jeff. 1999. 'Spenser and the Troubled Theaters'. English Literary Renaissance 29 (2) pp. 179-200. 179
- ²⁶ Dolven 1999: 184n16
- ²⁷ West, William. 1999. 'The Idea of a Theater: Humanist Ideology and the Imaginary Stage in Early Modern Europe'. In Renaissance Drama: New Series XXVIII: The Space of the Stage, edited by J. Masten and W. Wall. Evanston: Northwestern University Press, pp. 245-287. 265
- ²⁸ Oddi 1591, Prigione d'amore, Venice; translated by and reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 160-164.
- ²⁹ Sidnell 1991: 160
- ³⁰ Practitioners of theatre tend to see theatre as a reflection of life. Non-practitioner-theorists of theatre tend to see theatre as outside life, largely because they overlook themselves as spectators.
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 59
- ³² Carlson 1984: 83
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 59
- ³⁴ Lopez Pinciano 1953, Philosophia antiqua poetica, Madrid, Vol 3: 264, in Carlson 1984: 60. As theatre became more popular in Spain during the 1580's, there were increased attacks on it by the church and conservative critics. These attacks (e.g. Diego de Tapias' De eucharistia, 1587, and de Rivadeneira's Tratado de la tribulación, 1589) drew on the traditional criticisms by the Church Fathers, especially Tertullian (Carlson 1984: 61).
- ³⁵ Pinciano 1953, Vol 3: 281, 283, in Carlson 1984: 60.
- ³⁶ Fahraeus, Anna 2005, 'Moors, Social Anxiety and Horror in Thomas Rawlins's The Rebellion', <http://ojs.ub.gu.se/ojs/index.php/njes/article/viewFile/46/50> accessed 9/03/2009
- ³⁷ The play was attributed to Lyly by Edward Phillips in his book Theatrum Poetarum (1675), although this attribution has been called into doubt. Various other authors have been suggested (Lodge, Kyd, Heywood), on various grounds. The play appears to have been performed as there are stage directions in the extant copy (Cannon, Charles D. 1975, A Warning for Fair Women: A Critical Edition, The Hague, Mouton).
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 54
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 55-57. In 1659, a French diplomat, Francois Bertaut, was taken to meet the Spanish playwright Calderón after watching a production of one of his plays and reported that 'by his conversation I saw clearly that he did not know much, for all his white hairs. We argued a bit about the rules of the drama, which they do not know at all in that country and which they ridicule.' (Bertaut 1669, Journal du Voyage d'Espagne, Paris, p. 171; quoted in Carlson 1984: 57); Bertaut's remarks were widely quoted at the time.
- ⁴⁰ Carlson 1984: 84

-
- ⁴¹ Schlegel, August Wilhelm 1994/1809-11. 'Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature 1809-11'. In Sources of Dramatic Theory, edited by M. Sidnell. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 189-205 271
- ⁴² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.252
- ⁴³ Chapelain in Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.93
- ⁴⁴ D'Aygaliers 1969, L'art poétique français, Geneva, pp. 159-61; in Carlson 1984: 74.
- ⁴⁵ Published in Ferruccio Marotti (ed), Lo spettacolo dall'Umanesimo al Manierismo, Milan; excerpt translated by and reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 169-171.
- ⁴⁶ Sidnell 1991: 168
- ⁴⁷ Ingegneri 1991/1598: 169-170
- ⁴⁸ The play was written and first performed in 1598, and published without the Prologue in 1601. The Prologue was added to a revised version in 1616 (Sidnell 1991: 198n17.
- ⁴⁹ All selections here are published in Herford, C.H. and Percy and Evelyn Simpson (eds) 1925-1952, Works, 11 volumes, Oxford; extracts reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 193-200.
- ⁵⁰ C.H. Herford and Percy Simpson (eds) 1925-52, Ben Jonson, Vol. 5, p. 20; in Carlson 1984: 84.
- ⁵¹ C.H. Herford and Percy Simpson (eds) 1925-52, Ben Jonson, Vol. 3, p. 303; in Carlson 1984: 84.
- ⁵² Sidnell 1991: 197n14
- ⁵³ Sidnell 1991: 198n17
- ⁵⁴ Jonson 1991/1616: 198-9 (in Sidnell)
- ⁵⁵ Sidnell 1991: 199n19
- ⁵⁶ Jonson 1991/1640: 200
- ⁵⁷ Sidnell 1991: 193n2
- ⁵⁸ Jonson 1991/1640: 193, 198
- ⁵⁹ Sidnell 1991: 192-3
- ⁶⁰ Barish, Jonas. 1981. The Anti-Theatrical Prejudice. Berkeley: California University Press.132
- ⁶¹ Jonson 1991/1640: 196

Table 7/51 Theories of Theatre 1601 – 1630

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Baroque society was obsessed with the move from warrior to courtier. The body came to be seen as a product of artifice; the aim was self-control. The representation of controlled emotion became the aim of acting, and actors provided a model of self-control . ¹ Private theatres were also established at this time, leading to a greater separation between spectators and fictional stage world. Higher admission prices led to a more gentrified spectator, who also tended to interact less. New codes of spectator behaviour which encouraged civility and passivity began to develop . ²
Prólogo: El peregrino en su patria (1604); Arte nuevo de hacer comedias en este tiempo (The New Art of Making Comedies at the Present Time) (1609) ³	Felix Lope de Vega (1562-1635) Spanish playwright, novelist, poet, priest, judge of the Inquisition and censor	Essential theorist. Lope is said to have been the major object of Cervantes' curate's critique (see below). He claimed that all but six of his 483 plays 'including one finished this week' violated 'the principles of art' ⁴ but 'foreigners should be advised that Spanish plays do not follow the rules, and that I continued writing them as I found them, without presuming to observe the precepts, because with that strictness they would never have been accepted by the Spanish': ⁵ 'Playwriting here began in such a way/That he who would artistic rules obey/Will perish without glory or resource/For custom is more powerful a force/Than reason or coercion'. ⁶ Heavily influenced by Robortello ('that weighty doctor'), Lope qualified tradition according to the demand of his spectators, who were not looking for 'a mirror of human life', but 'pleasing conceits, refined words and a noble purity of eloquence'. ⁷ He claimed that as a dramatist he had one aim, to please the spectator ⁸ and 'let whoever is offended not go to see' them; 'if one has to give pleasure here, the right way to do it is with what works best'. ⁹ He was a leading defender of current custom over classic principles, although he still observed a unity of time (he restricted each act to a day for spectator comfort), and rules of appropriateness and decorum (ladies, for example were required to remain in character even when disguised as males), but: 'So when I have a comedy to write I lock up with six keys out of my sight Plautus and Terence, and their precepts too For fear their cries will even reach me through Dumb books, for I know truth insists on speaking. And then I write, for inspiration seeking Those whose sole aim was winning vulgar praise. Since after all it is the crowd who pays, Why not consider them when writing plays?', ¹⁰	A place to see plays	To please the crowd since they are paying	Doing: playwrighting Showing: appropriateness and decorum Watching: spectators come to the theatre to see 'pleasing conceits, refined words' and eloquence, not a mirror of life.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		His New Art defended his use of the episodic style against neoclassicism.¹¹ Lope said that his treatise was addressed to the ‘famed’ Madrid Academy, ‘a mysterious institution that has defied identification and probably never existed’,¹² and was perhaps a metaphor for academic criticism in general.¹³ Sidnell says the tone of his verse ‘which modulates between an insinuating humility and a jaunty assurance, is difficult to capture’ in a prose translation.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic: anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive
Don Quixote (1605); Prólogo: Ocho comedias y ocho entremeses (1615); Jornada segunda: El rufián dichoso	Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616) Spanish novelist and dramatist	Presents both a common view of the theatre in Don Quixote as well as ‘[s]urely the most famous attack on the theatre’ of the period,¹⁵ in the character of the curate (Ch.48, pt I). Don Quixote reflects that plays do a ‘great service for the nation’ by ‘holding up a mirror to every step we take and allowing us to see a vivid image of the actions of human life; there is no comparison that indicates what we are and what we should be more clearly than plays and players’.¹⁶ The curate concurs: plays ‘should be the mirror of human life, the model of manners, and the image of the truth’ but these days the dramas ‘are mirrors of nonsense, models of folly, and images of lewdness’. After listing the numerous flaws of contemporary drama (among them the failure to obey the unities of time and place, and the principles of appropriateness and decorum), the curate lays the blame not on the ability of the authors but on their desire to pander to the lowest kind of spectator. He recommends censorship: ‘[an] intelligent and sensible person to examine all plays before they were acted’.¹⁷ At the same time, the book itself reverses the classic tradition in having a nobleman the butt of the humour. In his own plays Cervantes presents a position closer to Lope de Vega’s: ‘times make all things change /and thus improve the arts’,¹⁸ and claims that he keeps the rules (arte) when they fit ‘custom’ (uso). The distinction between custom (uso) and the classics (arte) was common in the debate over the position of the classics.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional	A place where plays are performed	Instruction and example; a reflection of what we are and should be.	Doing: plays (play-wrighting) (should obey the rules and not pander to spectators) Showing: appropriateness and decorum
L’art poétique (1605)	Jean Vauquelin de la Fresnaye (1536-1606) French poet	An opposing view to d’Aygalliers (1598). Classic conception of tragedies as ‘grave and true action’, and a proponent of the unities as well as an adherent to Horace’s five-act structure and maximum number of speaking roles: ‘The theatre should never be occupied by an argument which requires more than a day to be achieved’.²⁰ The aim of poetry, especially tragedy, was instruction. Appropriateness and decorum (bienséance) were	A place which poetry occupies	Moral instruction	Doing: poetry (plays as literature) Showing: appropriate-

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		important. However, he supported the idea of a tragedy having a happy ending because it demonstrated that virtue was rewarded – ‘an early statement of the doctrine [of] ‘poetic justice’ as well as an indication of the same ‘quarrel’ between ancients and moderns which was occupying (and modifying the positions of) the Italians, in which Fresnaye occupied the conservative position against d’Aygalliers. Fresnaye marks the end of French critique for the next 20 years. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			ness and decorum; rewards of virtue (poetic justice)
The Advancement of Learning (1605); Instauratio magna: novum organum scientiarum (1620); De augmentis scientiarum (1623); ‘Of Masques and Triumphs’ (1625)	Francis Bacon (1561-1626) English lawyer, politician and philosopher	Reflects the prevalent humanist concern with moral instruction, as well as indicating a strong preference for philosophy over poetry, which he sees as essentially ‘a pleasant but unprofitable stimulation of the senses’. ²² Contemporary drama is generally corrupt and undisciplined, and so of less value than it might have been for the ancients. One of the earliest recognitions of group psychology in his consideration of the sources of the theatre’s powers: ‘Certain it is, though a great secret in nature, that the minds of men in company are more open to affections and impressions than when alone.’ ²³ In general ‘masques and triumphs’ are ‘but Toyes’. If ‘Princes will have such Things, it is better, they should be Graced with Elegancy, then daubed with Cost’ (‘Of Masques’). ²⁴ Introduces the idea of estrangement in order to counteract the ‘depraved habit’ of the understanding of being ‘corrupted, perverted, and distorted by daily and habitual impressions’ (Novum). ²⁵ He considers that ‘poets ... are the best doctors’ of the knowledge of the affections: how they ‘are kindled and incited ... how pacified and refrained ... how they disclose themselves; how they work ... vary ... gather and fortify’. Nevertheless ‘it is not good to stay too long in the theatre’ (Advancement of Learning) given how habit can distort perception and understanding. ²⁶ In the De augmentis (II, xiii) Bacon argues that spectators are the instrument on which the actor (like the orator) plays ²⁷ (from Cicero). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional	A place to watch plays in company	Amusement; moral instruction	Doing: poesy; performance - the actor plays upon spectators like a musician upon an instrument Watching: enjoyment in having the senses stimulated, which is enhanced by being in a crowd
1605: perspective settings were introduced into court theatre in England for a production in a make-shift theatre in Christ Church Hall, Oxford, for the visit of the King. This necessitated the use of proscenium arches, elaborately decorated specifically for the production, which separated the spectators, including the monarch who had previously been seated on the stage, from the actors. The monarch was seated at the focal point of the perspective, with his court arraigned behind and around him according to hierarchy and royal favour. Fischer-Lichte claims that the transfer of perspective from painting into theatre brought about a radical change in the conditions underlying visual perception by the C17th, and as a consequence the possibilities of spectatorship. While spectators of mediaeval and Elizabethan theatre moved around performances on a least three sides and could therefore control what they saw, perspective brought about a radical reduction in movement and range of view of the spectator . Theatre controlled the spectator and what they could see. Only the person seated in the position of 'ideal observer' (usually the monarch) had an undistorted view. ²⁸ It provided the monarch with a useful political tool. James I used it to insult the Venetian ambassadors by placing them further away from him than the Spanish. Popular theatre, such as at The Globe, did not use scenery or proscenium, maintaining a closer (and less complex) relationship with spectators. ²⁹

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'To the Reader', introduction to The Faithful Shepherdess (1609)	John Fletcher (1579-1625) English dramatist	Inspired by Guarini's The Faithful Shepherd , Fletcher's play is unusual in introducing new directions for drama without apology. He calls his play a pastoral tragicomedy, and provides a definition of the genre. Pastoral is defined according to the classical concept of decorum, as are tragedy and comedy, except not as extreme: unlike tragedy it has no killing although 'it brings some near it', which also makes it less like comedy. ³⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional		To correct a deficit or excess of passion	Doing: playwrighting
De tragoediae constitutione (1611)	Daniel Heinsius (1580-1655) Dutch poet and classical scholar	Exerted an enormous influence on Europe and England (see Jonson 1640) in late C16th and early C17th. French neoclassic critics in particular drew heavily on Heinsius. Heinsius was a pupil of Joseph Scaliger, Julius Caesar Scaliger's son, who taught at the University of Leyden. However, Heinsius differed from Scaliger in seeing Aristotle as a philosophic observer of his own culture, rather than a 'lawgiver'. Nevertheless, his definition of tragedy is Aristotelian: 'an imitation of a serious and complete action, which is of proper magnitude; composed of harmonious, rhythmic and pleasing language, so that the various kinds are found in different parts, not narrated but effecting through pity and terror the expiation of these. Thus tragedy is an imitation of the serious and grave while comedy is joyous and pleasant.' ³¹ Katharsis is translated as expiation (expiation) rather than the traditional purgation because the passions themselves were not evil, 'only their deficiency or excess'. 'Thus the proper function of tragedy is to expose the public to pity and horror so that those deficient in them may learn to feel these passions, and those with an excess may become habituated or sated and thus achieve a more moderate emotional state'. This schooling of the emotions is not just in order to prepare for calamity (as in Minturno 1559), but for enduring the stresses of everyday life. This idea brings Heinsius close to Aristotle's idea of identification with the tragic hero, who, like any human being, is flawed, however Heinsius believes that evil can only be knowingly committed by evil men. Heinsius misreads Aristotle in relation to comedy, seeing laughter as a defect or ugliness, a view which is taken up by Ben Jonson and later English neoclassic critics. Heinsius also pays little attention to the unities other than unity of action, and sees verisimilitude (like Aristotle) as 'faithfulness to the essence of the	A place to see drama staged	Purgation, instruction: 'schooling of the emotions'	Doing: drama (tragedy and comedy) Showing: consequences of actions Watching: Instruction in self-control so as to be able to deal with everyday life (rehearsal)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		species, not to individuals', which puts him at odds with Castelvetro. ³² Purpose of Theorist: analysis - prescriptive View of Theatre: functional
Preface to The White Devil (1612)	John Webster (c1580-1625) English dramatist	As with Jonson, acknowledges classical (Roman) rules but finds them incompatible with contemporary tastes – and spectators made up of 'the incapable multitude' (Carlson 1984: 85). Playwrighting is an historically contingent art which must be compatible with contemporary tastes. ³³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place to see plays performed	Satisfying the 'incapable' spectators	Doing: playwrighting
An Apology for Actors (1612); 'The Author to his Book' (1612) ³⁴	Thomas Heywood (1574-1625) English actor, poet and playwright	Heywood had read Alberti and used his arguments in support of the theatre: flourishing theatres were a mark of a flourishing state; great metropolises should offer great theatre as one of its amenities: ³⁵ 'playing is an ornament to the City'. What is more, it helped to refine language 'so that, in process, from the most rude and unpolished tongue it is grown to a most perfect and composed' one. Playing also has 'made the ignorant more apprehensive, taught the unlearned the knowledge of ... histories, instructed such as cannot read in ... all our English chronicles'. Tragedies 'terrify men from the like abhorred practices' and comedies teach them to modify their behaviour so as not to appear ridiculous. They also cheer up the melancholy and 'refresh such weary spirits as are tired with labour or study ... Briefly, there is neither tragedy, history, comedy, moral or pastoral from which an infinite use cannot be gathered' although 'lascivious shows, scurrilous jests or scandalous invectives' cannot be defended and should be banished. ³⁶ Sidnell says it was 'an ineffectual response' to attacks on the theatre, ³⁷ one which 'repeatedly betrays the cause it is attempting to serve'. ³⁸ He was 'so enthusiastic about the power, in itself, of theatrical illusion to influence the spectators' conduct that he scarcely discriminates between good and bad results, though he does argue that the abuse of theatre is not a sufficient reason to abolish an essentially useful and pleasurable institution'. ³⁹ Heywood believed that life was theatre; the loss of it meant the loss of the world itself: 'The world's a theatre, the earth a stage,/Which God, and nature, doth with actors fill/He that denies then theatres should be,/He may as well deny a world to me'. ⁴⁰ Heywood's Apology can also be read as a defence of the profession of acting within the theatre as much as a defence of theatre itself. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A pleasurable institution of play ; a place; a world in itself	Moral instruction, refreshment, general refinement, entertainment and diversion	Doing: playing - a useful and pleasurable amenity of a flourishing state Showing: the greatness of a city; models of behaviour to emulate or avoid;
Dedication to The Revenge	George Chapman	Tragedy includes 'things like truth ... material instruction, elegant and sententious excitation to virtue, and deflection from her contrary'. ⁴¹		Instruction	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
of Bussy d'Ambois (1613)	(c1559-1634) English dramatist	Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			(tragedy)
El pasajero (1617)	Cristóbal Suárez de Figueroa (1571-c1644) Spanish writer & jurist	A spirited defence of arte and a condemnation of comedia , combined with a personal attack on Lope de Vega. ⁴² [anti-popular theatre]. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive (classical); negative (popular)		Aesthetic	Doing: playwrighting as an art
Spongia (1617)	Pedro de Torres Rámila (1583-1658) Spanish poet, satirist, academic	A second defence of arte and a condemnation of comedia , combined with a personal attack on Lope de Vega (Carlson 1984: 63). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive (classical); negative (popular)		Aesthetic	Doing: playwrighting as an art
Tablas poéticas (1617)	Francisco Cascales (1564-1642) Spanish scholar	The second great Spanish 'poetics', also, like Pinciano's, cast in dialogue; continues the classical view of tragedy (noble characters; purgation of the passions through compassion and fear) and comedy (humble characters, cleansing laughter); rejects tragicomedy because it was not used by the ancients, and because tragedy can also end happily, so a new genre is not required. Mixed genres are 'poetic monsters'. ⁴³ Argued for unity of time as well as verisimilitude, but time could be skipped for 'the delight of the audience'. A continuation of the confusion of Aristotle's internal dramatic unity with the unity of time of presentation, and the difficulties this presented. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A place where poetry was performed	Purgation; release; delight	Doing: poetry (tragedy and comedy) – playwrighting Showing: verisimilitude
Musicae Compendium (1618); 'Sixth Meditation', Meditation on First Philosophy	René Descartes (1596-1650) French philosopher, mathematician	A consideration of sensation , which considers the question of why negative emotions might also give us pleasure since generally 'nature ... teaches me to shun the things which cause in me the feeling of pain, and to pursue those which communicate to me some feeling of pleasure' (Sixth Meditation). ⁴⁴ All emotions, including sadness and hatred, are simply stimulations of animal spirits, and hence pleasurable as long as they are under the control of reason and 'when these passions are only caused by the stage adventures which we see represented in a theatre, or by other similar means which, not	A place where 'adventures' are staged	Harmless stimulation of emotions; to please	Watching: spectator as listener; negative emotions can give pleasure through

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1641); Philosophical Works ; 'Letter' (1647)		being able to harm us in any way, [they] seem pleasurably to excite our soul in affecting it.'⁴⁵ Important to the consideration of the question of why we enjoy tragedy which arose again in C18th. Also a challenge to Aristotle: 'we could not better prove the falsity of the principles of Aristotle, than by saying that men have been unable to make any progress by their means during the many centuries that these principles have been followed'.⁴⁶ The Musicae focuses not on theatre, but on music, as its name implies. However, for the first time, attention is given to the listener. Like theatre, 'the purpose of musical sound is ... to please and to arouse various emotions within us'.⁴⁷ Music should have clear themes which can be easily grasped, especially as the listener grasps music as a single unity. Blaukopf argues that this attention to the listener marked 'the formation of a new structure of musical behaviour' which indicates a general change in both social activities and behaviour.⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			distance
1620's Spain: revival of church opposition to drama. ⁴⁹ 1620's France: theatre was pretty 'free-wheeling' and included popular farces, ⁵⁰ not that one would know this from the theory.
The Country Houses of Toledo (Los Cigarrales de Toledo) (1624) ⁵¹	Tirso de Molina (Fray Gabriel Téllez) (c1571-1648) ⁵² Prolific Spanish dramatist	A defence of modern Spanish writing, modelled on Boccaccio's Decameron, which favoured uso over the classic tradition, and defended Lope de Vega. Sidnell claims that 'the very form' of the book, which embeds the texts of three of Tirso's plays 'in a fictional context of imagined performances' which also incorporated critique, suggests that Molina saw 'the whole process of the writing of the playscript and its embodiment by the actors' as 'more a bringing to life than an imitation of life', thereby anticipating Diderot's The Natural Son. What was at stake for Molina was 'the possibility of progress both in the arts and society, an idea which Sidnell says had 'far-reaching theological and philosophical, as well as aesthetic, implications: 'Tirso saw clearly the place of the comedia in the shaping of a modern dramatic form, and he refused to underrate the importance of either Lope de Vega's work or his own in this development'.⁵³ Molina attacked the traditional view of unity of time on the basis of verisimilitude, defending his plays which 'abided by the rules of what is now customary', rules which allowed the development and intensification of 'zeal ... despair ... hope ... the other feelings and occurrences' as well as test faithfulness, all of which required time to develop:⁵⁴ 'how much more undesirable would it be that, in such a short time [twenty-four hours] a suitor in his senses should fall in love with a sensible lady, make his addresses, entertain and	A place where plays were staged	A bringing to life ; representation through image and story	Doing: playwrighting ; representation ; acting – a bringing to life Showing: a 'true' impression Watching: different spectators require different forms; spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		woo her, and before even a day has passed, get her to commit herself and be disposed to favour his attentions in such a way that beginning his suit in the morning he marries her that night?'. Plays created 'an image and representation' of their plots, rather than an imitation of life, and were a kind of "live painting" which could use effects to create these images just as painting used perspective.⁵⁵ [Note the change in the understanding of imitation]. He also argued for the mixing of genres and characters, and against the slavish following of history: it was the impression which needed to be true. Modern works require modern rules in order to suit modern spectators, and were in fact better than the classic dramas, because the art had developed.⁵⁶ We should no more reject modern developments in the arts than we would reject modern developments in tailoring or horticulture.⁵⁷ He claimed that most people enjoyed plays as entertainment, but 'the drones, who do not know how to make the honey that they steal from the productive bees, could not refrain from their old habits and with a buzz of detraction had to pick away at the delightful honeycombs of art' on the grounds that it was too long, inappropriate, untruthful and 'contrary to the rules of decorum' and 'artistic principle'.⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			may develop historically
El mejor príncipe Traiano Augusto (1622)	Francisco de Barreda (fl. 1620s) Prominent Spanish priest	Defended uso over arte. Modern writers were justified in ignoring traditional rules which were likely to be inappropriate for modern use, especially as classic writers often ignored their own rules.⁵⁹ Playwrighting was an historically contingent practice. (This was essentially the end of the dispute in Spain). [Standing up for popular theatre] Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting
Préface de l'Adone du Marin (1623); Letter (1630); ⁶⁰ Discourse de la poésie représentative (1635)	Jean Chapelain (1595-1674) Conservative French literary critic and poet	Espoused unity of action and unity of time, following de la Taille (1572) and Fresnaye (1605), and the reintroduction of classical theory. Reintroduced the theoretical importance of verisimilitude (as vraisemblance) in 1630, and in 1635, introduced the concept of decorum (as bienséance) to French critical language, reviving its connection with suitability and moral decency.⁶¹ He defended the three unities against current practice by playwrights such as Mareschal with arguments which both praised classical rules and contained a theory of how drama worked. Drama was not created to give pleasure but 'to move the soul of the spectator by the power and truth with which the various passions are expressed on the stage and in this way to purge it from the unfortunate effects which these passions can create in himself'. For this to happen,	A place where plays were staged	Purgation of passion	Doing: poetry – a performed art Showing: truthfulness, appropriateness and decorum Watching: if spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		spectators must not be given the chance ‘to reflect on what they are seeing and to doubt its reality’. ⁶² Therefore, drama must adhere to verisimilitude (vraisemblance). The unities help to do this, as does decorum. Also in the interests of verisimilitude, Chapelain suggested that French dramatists should write in prose, as some Italian and Spanish dramatists had begun to do. ⁶³ In 1635, Chapelain repeated his argument that the classic authors had developed the unities in order to uphold verisimilitude. Chapelain reintroduced Pelletier’s concept of bienséance (decorum) as closely allied with verisimilitude. He took the term to mean appropriateness or suitability. Later critics picked it up and used it to imply moral decency. ⁶⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional			were given time for reflection, the drama would fail to have its effect
Buch von der deutschen Poeterey (1624)	Martin Opitz (1597-1639) German poet	The leading proponent of the application of the ideas of Aristotle, Horace and Scalinger to German literature reprinted and read up until Lessing’s Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1769). Tragedy and comedy were essentially defined along French neo-classical lines. The function of tragedy is ‘nothing other than a mirror held up to those who base their activity or inactivity on luck alone’, designed to arouse compassion and teach caution, wisdom and stoic resignation. ⁶⁵ Opitz’ ideas were put into practice in the plays of Andreas Gryphius (1616-1664), but challenged by Harsdoerfer (see 1648). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		To mirror life in order to stimulate compassion; moral instruction	Doing: Poetry (as literature) Showing: consequences of actions
1626 Translation of Aristotle’s Poetics into Spanish by Alonso Ordóñez das Seijas y Tovar, the first vernacular translation in Spain
The Roman Actor (1626)	Philip Massinger (1583-1640) English playwright and translator	Not a theoretical work, but a play which explored the limits of what can be considered theatrical. In the play ‘a professional actor is dragged into an amorous and deadly theatricalization of actual life. A theatre in which all passions are pretended and no actors die is juxtaposed with an “actuality” in which real passions and real death are “staged”. The play examines the consequences ‘of the inability to perceive, and the refusal to acknowledge, the differences between theatrical imitation and theatricalised actuality ’, something which is even more of a concern in today’s media saturated world. The main role is devised so that it becomes impossible for the spectators to differentiate between when the actor is acting a role and when he is acting a role acting a role (a constant concern for Pirandello), even though the difference is ‘a matter of life and death’. ⁶⁶ [Sidnell says the play appeared at a time when Thomas Heywood was cheerfully arguing that all of life was theatrical – his Apology for Actors , featuring the theatrum mundi appeared in 1612].	A place of pretence and illusion	To examine pressing issues through imitation	Doing: plays Watching: spectators can be tricked into seeing actuality as theatre and vice versa – the dangers of the theatre metaphor

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic: pushing the limits of theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent
Preface to Tyr et Sidon by Schélandre (1628)	François Ogier (1597- 1670) French Prior, conservative critic; friend of Balzac	The most famous French statement on the drama of the 1620's: a general attack on neoclassic criticism which focuses almost entirely on the unity of time. Although a conservative position at the time, in the late C19th it was seen as a radical precursor of romanticism. A defence of already well-established popular French drama against the rigidity of Italian neoclassicism based on exceptions to the rules by classic authors themselves precisely because the rules were too rigid and liable to produce drama which irritated and bored the spectator and also on the differences between modern and classical society. ⁶⁷ Unfortunately this position was increasingly opposed by the critical tradition with its insistence on the three unities, which eventually became dominant largely through the efforts of scholars and critics rather than practicing dramatists. ⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory/theatre View of Theatre: positive	A seeing place	Entertainment	Doing: playwrighting (popular) Watching: rigid rules 'irritated and bored the spectator'
1629: French actresses played at the Blackfriars Theatre. They were 'hissed out of town' by spectators who only permitted men to appear on stage. ⁶⁹ 1630's: sudden 'rediscovery' of the unity of place in French theory by several writers 'almost simultaneously', generating letters, prefaces and manifestos between 1631 and 1636 in support of the unities largely on the basis of verisimilitude. ⁷⁰
Preface to Généreuse Allemande (1630)	André Mareschal (1603-1650) French dramatist and novelist	Declared that he had not adhered 'to those narrow bonds of place, time, and action which are the principal concern of the rules of the ancients', despite increasing attention to them in the critical literature. Playwrighting was an historically changing art form. ⁷¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory/theatre View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting

¹ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.29

² Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.3

³ Translated by William Brewster and published in Brander Matthews (ed) 1957, Papers on Playmaking, New York; reprinted in Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.184-191, and in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.136-145.

⁴ Vega 1991/1609: 190 (in Sidnell)

-
- ⁵ Lope de Vega 1971, El peregrino en su patria, Chapel Hill, p. 119; quoted in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.62.
- ⁶ Vega 2000/1609: 136-7 (in Gerould)
- ⁷ Vega 1991/1609: 191
- ⁸ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.235
- ⁹ Vega 1991/1609: 187
- ¹⁰ Vega 2000/1609: 137
- ¹¹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 235
- ¹² Gerould 2000: 135
- ¹³ Sidnell says that there were 'several' Madrid Academies in that city in the early seventeenth century (Sidnell 1991: 183).
- ¹⁴ Sidnell 1991: 183
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 61
- ¹⁶ Cervantes, Miguel de. 2003/1605. Don Quixote. Translated by E. Grossman. New York: ecco/HarperCollinsPublisher.527
- ¹⁷ Cervantes, 1926, Don Quixote, trans. John Ormsby, New York, pp. 438-40; quoted in Carlson 1984: 61.
- ¹⁸ Cervantes 1917, Obras completas, Madrid, Vol 5, p. 97, in Carlson 1984: 63.
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 63
- ²⁰ De la Fresnaye 1885, L'art poétique, Paris, p. 134; in Carlson 1984: 74.
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 74, 90
- ²² Carlson 1984: 86
- ²³ Francis Bacon 1905, The Advancement of Learning, Joseph Devey (ed), New York, p. 116; in Carlson 1984: 86
- ²⁴ Bacon 1965, 'Of Masques and Triumphs', in A.S. Cairncross (ed), Eight Essayists, London, Macmillan & Co. Ltd, p. 7.
- ²⁵ Bacon 1902, Novum Organum, New York, 2.32.185; in Carlson 1984: 386.
- ²⁶ Bacon, Francis n.d/1605., The Advancement of Learning, facsimile of 1866 J.M. Dent edition by Heron Books, pp. 86, 172.
- ²⁷ Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34. 7
- ²⁸ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 1
- ²⁹ Orgel, Stephen. 1975. The Illusion of Power: Political Theater in the English Renaissance. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.5-14
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 86
- ³¹ Heinsius 1643, De tragoediae constitutione, Ámsterdam, p. 18; in Carlson 1984: 87.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 87-88
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 85
- ³⁴ Published with introductions and bibliographical notes by Richard H. Perkins 1941, New York; excerpts reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 202-204. 'The Author to his Book' comes 'at the end of a series of verse commendations of An Apology by his friends (Sidnell 1991: 202n3). It is designated 1612b in the table.
- ³⁵ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd.162-3
- ³⁶ Heywood 1991/1612a: 202-4 (in Sidnell)

-
- ³⁷ Sidnell 1991: 201
- ³⁸ Barish, Jonas. 1981. The Anti-Theatrical Prejudice. Berkeley: California University Press.117
- ³⁹ Sidnell 1991: 201
- ⁴⁰ Heywood 1991: 1612b: 202
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 85
- ⁴² Carlson 1984: 63
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 63
- ⁴⁴ René Descartes 1637-1641, Discourse on Methods and the Meditations, trans. F.E. Sutcliffe, Penguin Books, p. 161.
- ⁴⁵ Descartes 1641, Philosophical Works, trans. E.S. Haldane & G.R.T. Ross, Cambridge, Vol. 1, p. 373, cited in Carlson 1984: 129.
- ⁴⁶ Descartes 1647, 'Letter from the Author', Discourse on Methods and the Meditations, trans. F.E. Sutcliffe, Penguin Books, p. 187.
- ⁴⁷ Descartes 1644, Musicae Compendium; quoted in Blaukopf 1992: 136.
- ⁴⁸ Blaukopf, Kurt. 1992. Musical Life in a Changing Society: Aspects of Music Sociology. Translated by D. Marinelli. Portland, Oregon: Amadeus Press.136-7
- ⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 65
- ⁵⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 252
- ⁵¹ Carlson gives the date of publication as 1621. Sidnell translates and reprints an excerpt from an edition by Armesto (1913).
- ⁵² Sidnell gives the dates as '1583?-1648' (Sidnell 1991: 205).
- ⁵³ Sidnell 1991: 205
- ⁵⁴ Molina 1991/1624: 209 (in Sidnell)
- ⁵⁵ Molina 1991/1624: 209-21
- ⁵⁶ Carlson 1984: 65
- ⁵⁷ Molina 1991/1624: 210-11
- ⁵⁸ Molina 1991/1624: 207-8
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 64
- ⁶⁰ Published in Chapelain 1936, Opuscles critiques, Paris, p. 119; cited by Egginton 2003: 93.
- ⁶¹ Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.93
- ⁶² Jean Chapelain 1936, Opuscles critiques, Paris, p. 119; in Carlson 1984: 92.
- ⁶³ Carlson 1984: 92
- ⁶⁴ Carlson 1984: 93
- ⁶⁵ Carlson 1984: 164
- ⁶⁶ Sidnell 1991: 12
- ⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 91
- ⁶⁸ As so often happens, there is a stark separation between theory and practice and a general disdain for theory which is proposed by practitioners which has continued to this day – see Meyrick 2003 for a contemporary complaint.
- ⁶⁹ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.127

⁷⁰ Carlson 1984: 90- 93

⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 91

Table 8/51 Theories of Theatre 1631-1650

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to Silvanire (1631)	Jean Mairet (1604-1686) French dramatist	Successfully used the ideas of conservative French critic Jean Chapelain (1623). The Preface is a 'manifesto' of neoclassical ideas, based on the need for verisimilitude: drama is 'an active and emotional presentation of things as if they are truly happening at that time'. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		Performance	Doing: playwrighting - an 'active and emotional presentation' Showing: as if things were actually occurring at the time
Preface to Pichou's La filis de Scire (1631)	Isnard (fl. 1630s) French biographer and critic	Isnard was a close friend of the dramatist Pichou, who died suddenly in 1631. The Preface was a biographical note written as a eulogy. It called for an exact correspondence between real and stage time. ² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting Showing: verisimilitude correspondence to life with regard to time
Preface to Ligdamon et Lidias (1631); Observations on Le Cid (1637) ³	Georges de Scudéry (1601-1667) French playwright	Like de Vega, says that he 'has read all the authorities on drama but has consciously chosen to defy them in order to please his public'. ⁴ Scudéry's position is paradoxical given his part in the Cid controversy (see below) in defence of the classic tradition. Observations is a critique of Corneille's Le Cid in which 'the personal bias of a rival dramatist comes through'. ⁵ Invention was 'the chief quality of both the poet and the poem', ⁶ but this had to occur within the rules of art. Le Cid offended all the rules, but especially the rule of verisimilitude. It simply wasn't 'plausible' and it offended decency. Dramatic poetry 'was invented to teach by entertainment, and in this pleasant guise is concealed philosophy ... Sweetened by pleasure, the medicine of instruction is more easily swallowed, and one is cured almost without being aware of the treatment. Thus the poet never fails to let us see virtue rewarded and evil punished', except in Le Cid which	A place	Instruction disguised as entertainment	Doing: poetry: invention within rules designed to support the moral ends of drama and to avoid confusing spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘allowed wickedness to triumph’. The use of a single place for different scenes also meant that spectators ‘do not know where the actors are’. In general, Le Cid represented ‘a serious error in dramatic composition’ [despite its popularity!] Scudéry published his critique anonymously claimed that ‘the subject is completely worthless, that it violates the principal rules of dramatic poetry; that it lacks judgment in its composition; that it has many bad verses; that almost all of its good qualities are plagiarized; and thus the admiration it has received is undeserved’.⁷ Many writers, including Corneille, responded to this critique. The debate threatened to degenerate into a battle of personal insults but Scudéry acknowledged his work and referred it to Richelieu, requesting the newly formed Académie investigate and adjudicate on his claims. The investigation took 6 months, during which ‘the battle of the pamphlets’ over use or rules continued⁸ (see below).⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
Adaptation of Tasso’s Aminte (1632)	Rayssiguier (d. 1660) French playwright	Rejected the rules and authority of the classic tradition: ‘those who wish to gain profit and approval for the actors who recite their verses are obliged to write without observing any rules’.¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		Spectator approval	Doing: playwrighting
Nueva idea de la tragedia Antigua (1633)	Jusepe Antonio González de Salas (1588-1651) Spanish author	Outstanding Spanish commentary on Aristotle: treats the Poetics as an historical document on ancient literary theory. A pragmatic approach which offers Aristotle as a model where appropriate. Stresses the importance of drama as performed; acceptance by the audience indicates successful imitation, since ‘the common folk have an excellent sense’ of nature. Supported Augustine’s view of tragedy; considered the role of music, dance, spectacle and acting. NB: Beginnings of the arguments over what constituted the best acting- emotion vs technique: the best actors genuinely feel rather than pretend to feel the emotions depicted (the other side of the C18th debate on the best acting to that presaged by Pinciano: emotional truth versus technique).¹¹		Spectator satisfaction	Doing: poetry: imitation using music, dance, spectacle and acting: a performed art Showing: actors show genuine emotions Watching: acceptance by spectators indicates

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			successful imitation; the common folk understand what is nature
1636: the establishment of the French Academy. 1637: premiere of Pierre Corneille's play Le Cid precipitated a controversy which came to be known as the Cid controversy. Partly driven by jealousy at the success of the play, Corneille came under attack from dramatists (such as Scudéry) as well as critics. This brought to the surface a struggle between popular theatre and the supporters of Italian neo-classicism. The controversy followed the general lines of argument between the conservative and liberal positions outlined above (see from Guarini forward) which continued to be a feature of debates over poetry in general and drama in particular. Many of these attacks were published. Largely as a result of the controversy, public interest in drama was aroused, the question of rules became a topic of concern for anyone interested in the arts, and France replaced Italy as the centre for critical discussion, a position it retained for the next 150 years,¹² in the process making 'the tradition of neoclassicism almost a national possession'.¹³ The continuing success of the play in the light of the debate and the Académie's ruling against it probably goes some way towards accounting for the contempt the French neo-classics appeared to have for the general populace, and raises questions about the insularity of educated commentary from ordinary life, although George Bernard Shaw later declared that Corneille's (and Racine's) dramas were 'very refined, very delightful for cultivated people, and very tedious for the ignorant'.¹⁴
Traicté de la disposition du poëme dramatique (1637)	anonymous	One of the most radical of the responses to Scudéry's criticism of Corneille, espousing a position similar to Ogier's: 'The object of dramatic poetry is to imitate every action, every place, and every time, so that nothing of any sort which occurs in the world, no interval of time however long, no country of whatever size or remoteness should be excluded from what theatre can treat.' Modern writers should be allowed to form their own rules according to contemporary needs. 'Nature creates nothing that Art cannot imitate: any action, any effect can be imitated by the Art of Poetry. The difficulty is to imitate and to make the measure and proportion of the imitation suitable to those things imitated'. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		To imitate anything; aesthetic	Doing: poetry (art) - defiance of the rules; the object of drama was imitation, not rule-following Showing: imitation of nature
Sentimens de l'Académie française sur la tragi-comédie du	Report of the French Academy (largely the work of	The Academy was 'less concerned whether the audience liked' the play 'than whether they ought to have liked it' since the play 'was not to be considered good merely because it was enjoyable'. ¹⁷ Pleasure was to be 'the instrument of virtue, imperceptibly and without disgust purging men of their vices [since] Bad examples have a dangerous influence, even when only performed in the theatre . All too many real crimes are caused	A place in which poetry was performed	Moral instruction	Doing: poetry (a performed art)- by the rules Showing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Cid (1637) ¹⁶	Chapelain)	by seeing them acted out on stage, and it is very dangerous to titillate the common people with pleasures which could one day cause public affliction. They should be carefully protected from seeing or hearing actions that they would be better off not knowing about'. The report was a point by point commentary on Scudéry's complaints and a scene by scene analysis of the play. Scudéry was accused of being insufficiently Aristotelian' in his complaints. Corneille was criticised much more severely. He had not only offended verisimilitude by putting too much action into a single day, he had offended morality. When Corneille defended the marriage of the daughter to the murderer on the basis that it was a true story, the Academy (Chapelain) argued that '[t]here are abominable truths, which should either be suppressed for the good of society, or if they cannot be concealed, should merely be noted as strange occurrences'. It is primarily in these cases that the poet should prefer verisimilitude to truth since the spectators are more likely to accept plausibility than truth. ¹⁸ The controversy largely ended with this document, although it continued to appear in other writing the following year and in much of Corneille's future work. ¹⁹ Scudéry saw himself as vindicated and went on to write a successful rival play using a similar subject, but avoiding Corneille's faults: L'Amour tyrannique (1639). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent			poetry should always show virtue rewarded and vice punished, irrespective of the truth
Discours de la tragédie (1639)	Jean-François Sarasin (1614-1654) French poet and critic	The book included Scudéry's play L'Amour tyrannique , which Sarasin claimed was 'as great as anything produced by the Greeks and would surely have been taken as a model by Aristotle'. Drawing heavily on Heinsius, whom he translates almost literally, Sarasin produces an Aristotelian analysis of the play. He interprets katharsis as 'molding the passions and guiding them to ... equilibrium', and denies that the final end of poetry is 'the pleasure of the people' who he considers a 'vile multitude'. He also eliminates spectacle and music from the discussion of tragedy. He praises Scudéry for his plot, his adherence to the unities and general Aristotelian principles. Although the conclusion of the play is happy (as in Cid), he considers the play to be a tragedy because it contained no comic elements. Sarasin's comments did much to elevate tragi-comedies to the more valued genre of tragedy. Sarasin submitted his work to the Académie for comment, but Richelieu informed the Académie that no further discussion was required since Scudéry's play was satisfactory. ²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction aimed at 'equilibrium'	Doing: poetry (tragedy) - writing according to the rules Watching: the people were 'a vile multitude': desiring their pleasure was not the end of drama
Poétique	Hippolyte-Jules	Member of the Académie commissioned by Richelieu to produce a work on poetic theory		Moral	Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1639)	Pilet de la Mesnardière (1610-1663) French physician and minor poet and dramatist	designed to resolve any outstanding debate. Only the first section was produced. It is little more than a ‘rambling commentary’ on Aristotle, Scaliger and Heinsius. It also reveals a strong contempt for the ‘vile multitude’ and their taste (an attitude hardly desirable in a physician). Although somewhat flexible with regard to the unities, there is a strong emphasis on moral instruction and poetic justice, to the point where evil characters were to be avoided. Appropriateness and decorum were necessary for verisimilitude, which increased the effectiveness of the drama as a model of virtue. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		instruction; as a model of virtue	(theory) Showing: poetic justice; models of virtue, appropriateness, decorum and verisimilitude Watching: (the people were ‘a vile multitude’)
Dissertation sur la condamnation des spectacles (1640); La Pratique du theatre (The Whole Art of the Stage) (1657) ²²	François Hédelin, Abbé d’Aubignac (1604-1676) French playwright and theorist, theatrical advisor to Cardinal Richelieu	Essential theorist. Another protégé of Richelieu, who had aspirations to become the first director of a national theatre, D’Aubignac acted as ‘unofficial minister of culture’, ²³ drawing up recommendations regarding architecture, scenery, stage morality, seating and audience control. ²⁴ He formulated state policy, and declared the stage ‘an instrument of government’. ²⁵ His work was a defence of ‘the moral, religious, and social utility of a national theatre’ ²⁶ which focused on the practical aspects of staging, despite being liberally sprinkled with quotes from Aristotle in an attempt to make it seem more theoretical. ²⁷ His book was the first to use theatre in the title since Grévin (1561). D’Aubignac loved the theatre and wished to defend it from charges of immorality by conservative clergy. The stage, he believed, could be transformed into ‘a civilized art fit for the best society’, ²⁸ and be made to serve ‘the glory of the ruler’, contribute ‘to the country’s international prestige’ and make citizens ‘forget internal problems and seditious thoughts’. ²⁹ A play was to ‘conform to the public sensibility of its own time and place. Taste and the rules of propriety’ were to be ‘determined by “the customs and manners, as well as opinions of the spectators.” What the audience finds believable and acceptable’ was to be the ultimate criterion. ³⁰ However, the main goal of theatre was to teach: ‘it provides a subtle instruction on things which the people most need to know and are most reluctant to accept’ ³¹ through delight and entertainment. ³² The treatise was highly esteemed in C17th century by critics and playwrights alike. A guide-book for dramatists	‘a place where one watches what is done’ ; an art or practice	To teach through delight and entertainment ; diversion	Doing: the practice of theatre: distinction between the writing of a play and its presentation: the creation of an image characterised by action Showing: credible representations what spectators were likely to find

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		commissioned by Richelieu, it had been put aside at his death and not completed until much later than originally planned (1640s). As well as Aristotle, it also drew heavily on Vossius for its theoretical background, although confined to drama. It was intended as a practical manual of playwriting, and as such, it became a standard reference for dramatists in and outside France for the rest of C17th:³³ ‘Considering the action as real, [the playwright] must look for a motive or a plausible reason, which is called a pretext, for these narrations and these spectacles really to have happened in this way. I dare say that the greatest art in writing for the theatre lies in finding all these pretexts’.³⁴ Imitation consisted in representing things (even imaginative things) as if they existed. The poet should also have spectators in mind when he is writing for the theatre, and be aware that there are two aspects of a play, its representation on stage (spectacle) and the play as a story in itself. They each require a different approach: ‘When he considers [either] the spectacle or representational aspect [‘princes in outward appearance, palaces painted on canvas, feigned deaths ... actors ... made to look like those they represent, and the stage decoration depicts the place where they are supposed to be. An audience is present, the characters speak the common language, and everything [is] clearly perceptible’] ... the playwright does everything in his power, with the aid of art and imagination, to make it admirable to his audience, for his only goal is to please them’.³⁵ However, when he is concerned with the story of the tragedy, ‘his only concern is to make sure that everything is plausible, and to compose all of the actions, dialogues and incidents as if they had occurred. He suits thoughts to character, time to place, and effects to causes ... verisimilitude is his only guide, and he rejects anything which is not compatible with it. Everything is done as if there were no spectators ... as if [the characters] were not seen or heard by anyone except those who are on stage acting and appear to be in the place that is represented ... This convention must be carefully observed’ [first discussion of the illusion of absorption which is elaborated into a principle by Diderot]. With regard to the spectacle or representational aspects, the playwright ‘studies everything he wants and needs to communicate to the audience either aurally or visually, and decides what is to be spoken or shown to them, for he must keep them in mind, in considering the action as represented’. However, these things are not decided arbitrarily but according to the story, which is treated as if it were real: ‘the audience is not the concern of the playwright when the play is considered as a true action, but only when it is seen as a			believable and acceptable: verisimilitude as plausibility Watching: public opinion helped to determine the taste and rules of propriety

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		representation. Representation ‘is the totality of elements that contribute to the performance of a play, and considered in and for themselves are necessary to it, for example, the actors, the scene painters, the scenery, the musicians, the audience, etc ... It is important never to confuse the representational aspect of a play with the true action of the story that is being performed’. However, ‘if the subject is not in keeping with the customs and opinions of the audience, it will never be successful, in spite of all the playwright’s attention to structure and use of ornamentation. For plays must be different depending on the nationality of the people for whom they are to be performed’. The Athenians enjoyed seeing the misfortunes of kings because ‘they lived in a democratically governed state [and] wished to foster the belief that monarchy is always tyrannical, so that those with ambitions of seizing power would be discouraged’ whereas a country which loved and respected the monarchy would not show such a spectacle. People like to see ‘the images of their own daily lives’. Verisimilitude or plausibility was ‘the essence of drama, without which nothing reasonable can be said or done on stage’. The ‘sole purpose is to make all parts of an action plausible, in bringing it to the stage, to create a complete and perfect image of that action’ for ‘drama is nothing more than an image’. D’Aubignac also distinguished between ‘two kinds of duration’ – ‘the actual length of the performance’ which is measured according to ‘how long the audience’s patience can reasonably be expected to last’ given that plays are meant to give pleasure. The ‘second duration ... is the length of the represented action considered as real ... This is the most important length of time ... because it is entirely dependent on the mind of the playwright’, but events should only be represented which would occur in daylight, otherwise they would not, if real, be able to be seen. Although D’Aubignac’s guide was generally a practical one, it nevertheless contains some theory. Tragedy did not mean plays with a sad ending, but plays with a noble or exalted or serious action. Consequently there was no need for the term tragicomedy which merely gave away the play’s ending. Drama ‘means action, and not narrative. Those who perform it are called actors, and not orators. The people for whom it is performed are called spectators and not auditors. Lastly, the place where it is performed is not an auditorium but a theatre , meaning a place where one watches what is done, not, where one listens to what is said ... to speak is to act [on the stage]’. Plays are defended against those who considered them an idle or immoral pastime. They added ‘to the joy of life and the glory of a nation’;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		provided ‘distraction for idle minds’, inspiration and moral instruction: ‘I am certainly of the opinion that plays should teach ... drama is the imitation of human actions, it imitates them merely to teach them, and this must be done directly. But as for moral standards ... drama teaches these only indirectly, and by means of actions ... These general precepts ... must be connected to the subject, and made applicable to the characters and actions of the play, so that the person who is speaking appears to be more attentive to the business at hand than to the fine truths he is expressing’.³⁶ Verisimilitude was emphasized as the way to make drama effective, incorporating appropriateness and decorum. The marvellous, which had become a source of tension with regard to verisimilitude, and which according to Chapelain was acceptable only if it was a reasonable effect of the drama, under the influence of Vossius was reinterpreted as something to be admired rather than something surprising or unnatural, ‘a significant shift’ which particularly influenced Corneille, although Corneille frequently refuted d’Aubignac’s propositions. Carlson considers that the great majority of d’Aubignac’s recommendations and observation regarding the crafting of drama remain valid.³⁷ Nevertheless, Saint-Evremond observed that when d’Aubignac wrote a play according to his rules, it failed. He claims that Prince de Conde had remarked that he was grateful to d’Aubignac for the rules but could not ‘forgive those rules for having made M. d’Aubignac write such a bad tragedy’.³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional
Preface to The Sequel to the Liar (La Suite du Menteur) (1645); Prefaces to Oeuvres (1660): ‘On the Purpose and the Parts of a Play’	Pierre Corneille (1606-1684) French lawyer and dramatist	Essential theorist. As early as 1645, Corneille had declared that all dramatic art was ‘a “divertissement” from the greyness of everyday life’ and he continued to repudiate the theory that it had a moral function throughout his life. Instead, a kind of ‘spiritual enlightenment’ occurred in the spectator’s mind as a result of admiration for the hero. His insistence ‘that the “only goal is to please the spectator” would long remain a minority opinion’,⁴² sharply criticized more than a century later by Lessing, although he always maintained that this required ‘art’.⁴³ Each preface is a theoretical essay on dramatic art, ‘the century’s most fully developed statement of disagreement with the prevailing assumptions of French neoclassic theatrical theory’,⁴⁴ which Corneille believed were written ‘from the point of view of grammarians and philosophers’ rather than from the point of view of ‘how to succeed in the theatre’.⁴⁵ The first begins with an assertion that	A place in which plays were staged	Entertainment ; diversion: to please the spectator	Doing: playwriting (an art) involving the interpretation of the rules and the development of the art Showing: spectacle:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(Vol. I); ³⁹ ‘On Tragedy and the Means of Treating it according to Verisimilitude of ‘the Necessary’’ (Vol. II) ⁴⁰ and ‘Of the Three Unities of Action, Time, and Place’ (Vol. III); ⁴¹ Discourses (1660)		‘pleasure is the sole end of tragedy’.⁴⁶ Although recognizing Aristotle as the central authority on drama (as did the neoclassicists), Corneille argued for the right of the dramatist to reinterpret these rules as required for contemporary drama: ‘I like following the rules but, far from being their slave, I relax or tighten them up as my subject demands ... To know the rules is one thing; to possess the secret of taming them adroitly and harnessing them to our stage is a very different one’.⁴⁷ He considered plays ‘a spectacular art’.⁴⁸ The neoclassic claim for the importance of verisimilitude, too, was based on a misreading of Aristotle in which ‘the probable’ was emphasised at the expense of ‘the necessary’. It was history or common knowledge which provided authority for interpretation, not verisimilitude. Corneille distinguished between tragedy and comedy based on the gravity of their concerns, and reinterpreted the Aristotelian concern that characters and manners be ‘good, suitable, similar, and equal’ as meaning appropriate for the actions of the character rather than ‘virtuous’, which implied a moral purpose. Unlike the neoclassicists (e.g. Chapelain, Scudéry and d’Aubignac) Corneille discussed catharsis at length. He noted that Aristotle never defined the concept, attempted a definition which he found unacceptable and concluded that it is doubtful that ‘it is ever achieved’. Instead he called for a more flexible approach to the emotions, and argued that admiration was a more effective purge of unacceptable passions than either pity or terror.⁴⁹ Corneille claimed to accept the tradition of the unities but revealed a quite individual interpretation of them. Unity of action was related to consistency within the play’s structure (the kinds of obstacles to be overcome in comedies; the peril to be faced in tragedy). Unity of time and space were flexible as long as credulity was not strained. He considered that ‘knowing the rules was not sufficient qualification for writing a successful play, and the only goal of dramatic art was to please the audience’.⁵⁰ However Corneille also suggested the ‘theatrical fiction’ of setting aside a part of the stage as a neutral ‘room’ available to any character engaging in ‘private conversation’, a device taken up and used by Racine. Corneille’s views set off a new round of controversy which was eclipsed by the rise of a new target for criticism, the playwright Molière.⁵¹ Corneille defended his bending of the rules by his popularity. ‘Common consent’ indicated they were successful in practice.⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			‘greatness of soul’ Watching: pleasure; spectator consent indicated the success of a play
Poeticarum institutionum	Gerardus Joannes Vossius	The first summary of the body of rules for all poetic genres developed by the neoclassic critics of late C16th and early C17th. It ignores vernacular critics and criticisms, instead		To stimulate surprise or	Doing: poetry (theory)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
libri tres (1647)	(1577-1649) Dutch scholar, writer and critic	attempting to sum up Latin contributions from Horace, Aristotle, Scaliger, Donatus, Minturno and Heinsius. He endorses the general neoclassic view that poetry should ‘teach with delight’, but believes tragedies stimulate surprise or amazement rather than catharsis or purgation. Was little interested in the unities other than unity of action, on which he wrote several chapters – ‘one of the most thorough [discussions] of the period’. ‘A drama must contain only one action and one hero’ although there can be subordinate parts, as long as they are tied to the main action. These concerns were developed by D’Aubignac and his contemporaries for whom Vossius was as influential as Heinsius had been for the preceding generation. ⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional		amazement; to teach through delight
Poetischer Trichter (1648)	Georg Philipp Harsdoerfer (1607-1658) German poet	A far more detailed poetics than Opitz, which was a blend of neo-classical ideas with elements of the developments in drama from England and Spain. Tragic emotions are aroused, not to teach resignation, but to be purged, through the use of the device of ‘ poetic justice ’. Thus, the end of tragedy is the reestablishment of justice, which leads to ‘harmony in the soul of the spectator’. Any device that achieves this, including the mixing of genres and the rejection of the unities, is legitimate. Harsdoerfer’s ideas were taken up in the historical tragedies of Lohenstein (1635-1683) as well as in the popular and largely improvised Haupt- und Staatsaktionem (chief and state plays) of the period. ⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Purgation and the production of harmony in the spectator	Doing: poetry
Vossius marks the end of the Renaissance period with regard to the development of theories of theatre for Carlson. Critical concerns regarding the drama in England came to an end with the outbreak of civil and religious strife in the mid C17th, which saw the theatres closed and the only writings on the theatre coming from religious denunciations. Only two major documents of English literary criticism which were produced during this period, a preface to Gondibert by D’Avenant (1650), which defended English drama and a letter of response from Hobbes (1650) (see below). Both were written in Paris. Meanwhile, by 1650s, Spain had developed a spectacular form of musical extravaganza called Zarzuela , which mixed stories, dance and spoken text in a way similar to the later English ballad operas and American musical comedy. It was enormously popular until Fernando VII married an Italian. Financial support was withdrawn from the zarzuela in favour of Italian opera. (In 1857, the El Teatro Zarzuela was established in an attempt to revive the form, which has since come to be very popular in Spain. A tour in the 1990s brought it to international spectators. ⁵⁵ Ballet also developed between 1650 and 1660 at the court of Louis XIV.
Letter of response (1650); De corpore politico	Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) English political philosopher	The letter was a response to D’Avenant which argued that all poetry has a moral purpose: tragedy punishes evil while comedy ridicules it. ⁵⁶ The De corpore politico , while not addressing theatrical representation, provides a psychological view of why spectators are attracted to the spectacle of tragedy, a question which is to generate considerable critical debate in C18th. Although Hobbes agreed with Descartes that men generally		Moral instruction; relief that we were not like or in the	Doing: poetry (tragedy) Watching: vicarious: spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1650); De rerum natura (1650)		pursued pleasure and avoided pain, he disagreed with Descartes' view of emotions: some were pleasant (and thus pursued) while others were clearly painful (and thus avoided). This, however, creates the problem of why spectators attend tragedies. Hobbes discusses this through the shipwreck with spectator metaphor drawn from Lucretius:⁵⁷ 'As there is novelty and remembrance of our own security present, which is delight; so is there also pity, which is grief. But the delight is so far predominant, that men usually are content in such case to be spectators of the misery of their friends.'⁵⁸ Hobbes also considered laughter in the same way: '[t]he passion of laughter is nothing else but a sudden glory arising from sudden conception of some eminence in ourselves, by comparison with the infirmities of others or with our own formerly'.⁵⁹ These ideas were picked up by Du Bos in C18th debates over the effects of theatre on spectators. Purpose of Theorist: an analysis of spectator response View of Theatre: functional		predicament of those on stage	enjoy watching tragedy knowing they are not affected

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.93

² Carlson 1984: 93

³ Published in Oeuvres de Pierre Corneille 1862, (ed) Charles Marty-Laveaux, 12 vols., Paris; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press 213-216.

⁴ Carlson 1984: 93

⁵ Sidnell 1991: 212

⁶ Scudéry 1991/1637: 213 (in Sidnell)

⁷ Scudéry 1991/1637: 212-6

⁸ Carlson 1984: 95

⁹ See Armand Gasté 1898, La querelle du Cid (Paris), and Louis Batiffol 1936, Richelieu et Corneille (Paris) for accounts of the controversy.

¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 94

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 65-6

¹² Carlson 1984: 96

¹³ Carlson 1984: 197

¹⁴ Shaw, George Bernard. 1998/1911. 'Against the Well-Made Play'. In Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt. Oxford: Clarendon Press, pp. 98-105.106

¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 95

-
- ¹⁶ Published in Oeuvres de Pierre Corneille 1862, (ed) Charles Marty-Laveaux, 12 vols., Paris; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 216-219.
- ¹⁷ Report 1991/1637: 216
- ¹⁸ Report 1991/1637: 216-8
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 96
- ²⁰ Carlson 1984: 97-98
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 98
- ²² Translated from the original by Sidnell; excerpts reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 221-233; excerpts also reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books..
- ²³ Gerould 2000: 146
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 98
- ²⁵ Gerould 2000: 146
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 98
- ²⁷ Gerould 2000: 146
- ²⁸ Gerould 2000: 146
- ²⁹ Gerould 2000: 24
- ³⁰ Gerould 2000: 127
- ³¹ D'Aubignac 1991/1657: 220-1
- ³² Sidnell 1991: 221
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 99
- ³⁴ D'Aubignac cited in Sidnell 1991: 8
- ³⁵ D'Aubignac 1991/1657: 221-2
- ³⁶ D'Aubignac 1991/1657: 222-232
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 100-101
- ³⁸ Saint-Evremond 1674 cited in Sidnell 1991 253
- ³⁹ Corneille 1965/1660, Writings on the Theatre, H.T. Barnwell (ed), Oxford; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 235-244.
- ⁴⁰ Corneille 1965/1660, Writings on the Theatre, H.T. Barnwell (ed), Oxford; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 244-248.
- ⁴¹ Corneille 1965/1660, Writings on the Theatre, H.T. Barnwell (ed), Oxford; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 248-251; also excerpted in Gerould 2000: 155-167.
- ⁴² Sidnell 1991: 234
- ⁴³ Corneille 1991/1660: 235
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 101
- ⁴⁵ Corneille 1991/1660: 237
- ⁴⁶ Sidnell 1991: 234
- ⁴⁷ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 154.
- ⁴⁸ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.255

⁴⁹ Corneille 1991/1660: 245

⁵⁰ Gerould 2000: 24

⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 101-103

⁵² Corneille 1970/1660, 'Of the Three Unities of Action, Time, and Place', in The Continental Model, ed. Scott Elledge, trans. Donald Shier, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, excerpt in Gerould 2000: 155-167, p. 167.

⁵³ Carlson 1984: 89

⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 164-5

⁵⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 243

⁵⁶ Carlson 1984: 113

⁵⁷ See Blumenberg, Hans. 1997/1979. Shipwreck with Spectator: Paradigm of a Metaphor for Existence. Translated by S. Rendall. Cambridge Mass. and London: The MIT Press. for a history of this metaphor and its relationship to the spectator.

⁵⁸ Thomas Hobbes 1928, The Elements of Law, F. Tönnies, Cambridge, p. 35; in Carlson 1984: 129.

⁵⁹ Cited with approval by Addison 1711 in The Spectator No 47; see Carlson 1984: 130.

Table 9/51 Theories of Theatre 1651-1690

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1660: English theatres reopened, inspiring ‘a number of pronouncements on the drama’, many of them focused on the harmonization of French and English practices. This included a debate over the use of blank verse by Shakespeare.¹ An evening’s entertainment was often a mixed bill: ‘King Lear and three songs and a dance ... followed by Tom Thumb’ with ‘the whole house ... dissolved in tears, or convulsed with laughter’ according to prompters’ diaries.² However, attendance was poor a lot of the time, with the price of the ticket determining the audience composition, as always, although it seems that more and more ‘citizens, ‘prentices and others’ could afford to attend as the century wore on. In 1662, Pepys complained that the Duke’s Theatre ‘was full of citizens’; in 1667, the theatre was full of ‘citizens, ‘prentices and others’.³ By 1699, however, theatres were struggling to attract spectators of any kind. Royal patronage disappeared as William and Mary and Queen Anne showed little interest, and ‘many of the more Civilized Part of the Town ... shun the Theater as they would a House of Scandal [and] the present Plays ... can hardly draw an audience’.⁴ Spectators were typically ‘noisy and boisterous’, but, beginning with Dryden, efforts can be seen to encourage spectators to discipline themselves,⁵ a process that would take more than 200 years to accomplish, but eventually achieved through the combined effects of architectural and technical change, the increase in middle-class spectators and a general exercise of disciplinary power in C19th. (Blackadder sees the last ditch attempts by spectators to retain their ability to disrupt performances in the ‘theater-scandals’ of 1880-1930) although similar responses can be seen to avant-garde theatre (particularly performance art and participatory theatre) to the present day. From the late C17th, ‘the distinction between poet and playwrights was regularly made’. Before that tragedies and comedies were classified as poems, with prose drama regarded as an anomaly.⁶
Preface to Les fâcheux (1662); Impromptu de Versailles (1663); Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes (1663); Preface to Tartuffe (1669)	Molière (Jean-Baptiste Poquelin) (1622-1673) French playwright, founder of Théâtre Illustre (1643-1645)	Modern comedy owes much to the Molière model of comedy: incidentally funny, based on a constant double vision of wise and foolish, right and wrong; where humour is found in the psychological flaws of the characters or in the morals of the time. The first comic playwright to incorporate serious social issues into his plays, Molière was viciously attacked his entire career by the ruling elites.⁷ His preface (and no doubt his enormous success) upset neoclassic critics, moralists and jealous rival playwrights alike by sending the whole dispute up: ‘It is not my purpose to examine here whether all this might have been better done and if all those who were diverted by it laughed according to the rules. The time will come for me to publish my remarks on the plays I have written, and I do not give up hope that one day I, like a great author, will show that I am able to cite Aristotle and Horace!’⁸ Needless to say, they united in their attacks on Molière, precipitating a second great theatre dispute in which Molière (like Corneille before him) was accused of ‘plagiarism, immorality and indifference to the rules of dramaturgy’.⁹ The Impromptu was Molière’s final contribution to the dispute, in which he and members of his company appeared under their own names to discuss the dispute. Includes a consideration of the function of comedy. Comedy should draw from nature. It should ‘represent in general all the defects of men, and especially the men of our own time’,¹⁰ a	A place where plays were performed; a company dedicated to creating and staging plays	To correct through ridicule	Doing: plays: playwriting as social comment Showing: society’s flaws

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		recognition of the topicality of comedy. In the preface to Tartuffe , Molière claimed that comedy aims to correct men's vices through ridicule, a less controversial position possibly chosen to make himself less of a target, ¹¹ although he also said that 'If it be the aim of comedy to correct man's vices, then I do not see for what reason there should be a privileged class'. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory/theatre View of Theatre: functional
Nouvelles nouvelles (1663); Zelinda (1663)	Jean Donneau de Visé (1638-1710) French critic and dramatist	A collection and synthesis of the attacks on Molière which were being conducted in the salons, presented as a discussion between three informed critics, thus giving it an air of objectivity. Carlson claims that Visé saw the dispute as a means of making a name for himself as a drama critic. The publication also included a critique of Corneille's Sophonisbe (1663), which Visé considered 'boring throughout, lacking in both pity and terror, mixed in tone, offensive to good taste, and too filled with incident'. ¹³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-popular theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place where plays were performed	Art	Doing: drama (an art form)
Visé's publication represented 'the opening shots' in a dispute which 'enlivened the French theatrical scene for the next several years' ¹⁴ and included contributions from d'Aubignac and Corneille which again threatened to descend into personal insult. Molière happily added his two-pence worth in Critique de l'Ecole des femmes (1663), in which 'a poet-critic' (Lysidas) condemns Molière's plays while another 'critic' (Dorante) argues that Molière's plays follow 'the greatest of all rules', pleasing spectators. Molière thus set out the terms of the dispute through performance, while ridiculing both, to popular acclaim. ¹⁵ Visé, who identified himself as the character Lysidas, considered that he had been ridiculed and created a 'strident and acrimonious countercomedy' called Zelinda . Similar counterworks were produced by other rival theatre troupes, which in turn were answered by further plays from Molière, including Impromptu de Versailles , and plays by Visé and Montfleury. As in the Cid controversy, the dispute was played out both on the stage and off. Molière's Tartuffe (1664) also provoked criticism, but largely from religious conservatives who considered the play immoral. For many theorists Shakespeare became the 'antidote' to French neo-classicism in what George Bernard Shaw dubbed ' Bardolatry ', and marked a shift in focus 'from royalty to an emerging middle class'. ¹⁶ UK: Beginning of use of scenery and a renewed interest in spectacle.
Short Discourse of the English Stage (1664)	Richard Flecknoe (c1600-1678) English dramatist	Flecknoe argues for the introduction of the sparer French style of play into England. He praises the recent introduction of scenery into English plays but is concerned about the spectacle overwhelming the content and purpose of the drama: 'to render Folly ridiculous, Vice odious, and Vertue and Noblesse so aimable and lovely, as, every one should be delighted and enamoured with it.' ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place where plays were performed	Moral example; instruction	Doing: drama (plays and staging) Showing: Folly as ridiculous, Vice as odious and Virtue as delightful

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to The Rival Ladies (1664); An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668);¹⁸ Defense of An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668); Preface and Epilogue to Conquest of Granada (1672); Preface 'Apology for Heroique Poetry' to State of Innocence (1677); Preface: 'The Grounds of Criticism in Tragedy' to Troilus and Cressida (1679); Preface: The	John Dryden (1631-1700) English poet, dramatist and theorist; Poet Laureate (1668)	Essential theorist. Dryden shared a similar deference to French practice as Flecknoe, and defended the use of rhyme (against Shakespeare), which provoked criticism from Dryden's brother-in-law, the playwright Robert Howard (1626-1698) who defended English practice against 'the fashion' of French practices, and took issue over the use of verse on the basis of verisimilitude. This dispute continued in Dryden's Essay, 'the outstanding work of dramatic theory of this period'.¹⁹ The Essay takes the form of a Socratic conversation (popular among Renaissance theorists) between four contenders in which it is agreed that a play is defined as 'A just and lively image of human nature, representing its passions and humours, and the changes of fortune to which it is subject, to the delight and instruction of mankind'.²⁰ One of the speakers, Crites, objects to this definition on the grounds that it did not concern drama in particular, but could refer to literature or even art in general.²¹ However, the three friends decide to continue, although the definition was 'not altogether perfect'.²² A debate over which was superior, the ancients or the moderns, follows, with the conclusion that the moderns have learnt from the ancients and are therefore superior. Then English and French drama are compared in which English drama is seen as more closely following the definition of a play, followed by a debate over the question of rhyme and blank verse, neither of which are seen as imitating natural speech. Gerould says that the Essay 'opened the debate on mimesis and theatrical form to ... well-bred theatregoers and readers rather than contentious scholars'.²³ The Essay prompted further criticism by Howard on the basis of the unities, to which Dryden responded with Defense in which there is an early statement of what Coleridge was to call the 'willing suspension of disbelief': 'in the belief of fiction, reason is not destroyed, but misled, or blinded [but it] suffers itself to be so hoodwink'd, that it may better enjoy the pleasures of the fiction; But it is never so wholly made a captive, as to be drawn head-long into a persuasion of those things which are most remote from probability'.²⁴ Dryden used this idea to resolve the 'long-confused problem of verisimilitude and the unities'. Place and time in theatre is both real and imaginary: 'The real place is that Theatre, or piece of ground on which the Play is acted. The imaginary, that House, Town, or Country where the action of the Drama is supposed to be ... the imagination of the Audience, aided by the words of the Poet, and painted Scenes, may suppose the Stage to be sometimes one place, sometimes another, now a	A place: 'that ... piece of ground on which the Play is acted'. In 1668, Dryden applied the term theatre to plays, writing, production and the stage.³⁴ Until that time, theatre was generally taken to be a place, a building or position from which something was observed, occasionally an institution. Thus	To produce purgation of the passions, diversion, delight and instruction through the stimulation of the imagination	Doing: poesy (dramatic) Showing: an image of the age³⁵ which was both real and imaginary Watching: delight in the 'pleasures of fiction' and instruction; want to be diverted; but Dryden also called for the audience to 'reform and discipline itself'.³⁶ Spectators used their imaginations to see the stage as 'sometimes one place, sometimes another' and engaged in a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Spanish Friar (1681)		Garden, or Wood, and immediately a Camp'.²⁵ Rhyme is defended on the basis that the end of poetry is delight.²⁶ In 1668, Dryden applied the term theatre to plays, writing, production and the stage.²⁷ Until that time, theatre was generally taken to be a place, a building or position from which something was observed. Thus Dryden began a conflation between drama, theatre, stagecraft and performance which continues to the present day, but he also, '[b]y taking into account the historical and social context in which works of art arose, ... discovered the idea of national and cultural relativism and introduced the comparative method into English literary criticism' (Gerould 2000: 169): 'The genius of each age is different. Shakespeare and Fletcher have written to the genius of the age and nation in which they lived; ... the climate, the age, the disposition of the people, to which a poet writes, may be so different, that what pleased the Greeks would not satisfy and English audience'.²⁸ While French spectators seemed to prefer serious drama, the English 'come to be diverted' (Dryden 1991/1668: 283). He rejected Italian commedia and popular entertainments featuring spectacular effects as mere appeals to the senses rather than to the imagination (Gerould 2000: 169). In his 1672 preface and epilogue, Dryden explained and defended the heroic drama, also defended the use of verse on the stage. Drama had to adapt to its age, and the heightened language and verse of heroic drama suited an age in which the influence of the court had led to an improvement of manners. In any case, those who wanted to remove verse from the stage were 'followers of the false idea of drama as a reflection of commonplace reality' (Carlson 1984: 117). Dryden agreed with Rymer (see below); deferred classic authority as codified by the French; called Rapin 'alone sufficient, were all other Critiques lost, to teach anew the rules of writing'.²⁹ However, it was clear that the strictures of the neoclassic method were chaffing. In 1676 in the prologue to Aureng-Zebe, Dryden declared he had 'grown weary of his lone lov'd mistress, Rhyme'. His next play, All for Love (1678), although following fairly strict neoclassic lines and paying careful attention to decorum, morality and the unities was no longer in rhyme. The 'Grounds' is one of the first detailed discussions in English of Aristotle's principles, including the idea of tragedy as a purgation of spectator passions. Also includes the ideas of delight and instruction (from Horace), and appropriateness or decorum. In The Spanish Friar Dryden tackles the problem of mixing genres, admitting that he does this because spectators 'are grown weary of continu'd melancholy scenes'. He also argues that tragicomedy is a distinct	Dryden began a conflation between drama, theatre, stagecraft and performance which continues to the present day		willing suspension of disbelief. Good theatre appealed to the imagination rather than to the senses.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		form, and as difficult to create as tragedy. Despite his struggles, Dryden seems never to have been able to harmonize his work as a dramatist with the neoclassic rules he espoused. He eventually came to condemn tragicomedy altogether, including his own Spanish Friar.³⁰ Despite all of this, he saw Shakespeare as a special case, someone who ignored the rules but still had earned ‘special status’.³¹ Dryden also marks the beginning of efforts by the theatre to tame noisy and boisterous spectators. His 1692 prologue to Cleomenes contains an appeal to spectators to behave: ‘I think or hope, at least, the Coast is clear./That none but Men of Wit and Sence are here./That our Bear-Garden Friends are all away,/Who bounce with Hands and Feet, and cry Play, Play’.³² Dryden’s theories of heroic drama were parodied by George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, in The Rehearsal (1672). Dryden turned to playwrighting because it was ‘the most lucrative art’ at the time for a writer, although he found it drudgery: ‘’Tis my ambition to be read; that I am sure is the most lasting and the nobler design’.³³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent
Conférence de M. Le Brun sur l’expression générale et particulière (1667) (translated into English in 1701 as A Method to Learn to Design the Passions)	Charles Le Brun (1619-1690) Chancellor of the Académie Royale de Peinture et de Sculpture, French painter and theorist	A guidebook and codification of the principles of Cartesian philosophical psychology which provided a catalogue of instructions complete with drawings, on how to properly depict the effect of each passion on the human face. Although addressed to painters, Le Brun’s book had a significant effect on theatre practice. Actors came to be expected by spectators to express the passions according to a standardized gestural ‘language’. It was reprinted many times, an expensive edition appearing in England in 1813.³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (prescriptive) View of Theatre: practical		To depict	Doing: acting as a craft: technique: recognition of underlying passions from facial expression and gestures: reading emotions and motivations
Preface to The Royal Shepherdess (1669);	Thomas Shadwell (1642-1692) English	Took exception to Dryden’s belief that the end of poetry was delight. This would make the poet ‘of as little use to Mankind as a Fidler, or Dancing Master, who delights the fancy only, without improving the Judgement [and] he that debases himself to think of nothing but pleasing the Rabble, loses the dignity of a Poet’.³⁸ Shadwell elevated comedy		Useful: moral instruction	Doing: poetry (comedy/tragedy) – a performed art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to The Humourists (1671)	dramatist	above tragedy, however, because he believed ridicule was a more effective tool for moral instruction than punishment. (Dryden responded to Shadwell's 1669 criticism in his preface to The Mock Astrologer 1669) Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre View of Theatre: functional
Preface to Samson Agoniste (1671)	John Milton (1608-1674) English poet and dramatist	One of the few of this English generation to give detailed attention to traditional tragedy; a highly conservative discussion which defends the largely outmoded use of the chorus, the rule of 24 hours, simplicity of plot, verisimilitude, decorum and purity of genre. Tragedy provides moral instruction, not in the events portrayed but in the thoughts expressed in the text. He endorses Aristotle's views on the end of drama: the tempering of the passions and delight. ³⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction, purgation and delight; the tempering of the passions	Doing: drama (tragedy)
Casual Expressions of Idle Feelings (1671)	Li Yu (1611-1680) Chinese writer, theatrical entrepreneur and business man	Essential theorist. Drama had practical value for increasing human happiness, so Li included his treatises on drama in a compendium which also contained practical advice about cooking, clothing, bird-watching, grooming and sexual fulfillment. ⁴⁰ Li argued that playwriting was not a minor skill. It ranked high, along with history, biography, poetry and prose: 'A dynasty's position in history rests on the plays that it produced'. A good play needs a central thread, like a house needs a beam. It should be unified in action, 'coherent, and as interconnected as the veins are by the blood that flows through them'. The ability to handle emotion and to handle scene 'constitute the two most important challenges for the playwright'. ' The only reason for writing a play is to have it performed on the stage ', and actors need to be trained in order to do this well. They need to be literate, as well as able to sing and dance. In particular, they need to understand what it is they are saying. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place where plays are staged	To produce pleasure; to increase human happiness;	Doing: plays: playwrighting as a skill; performing as a skill
'To an author who asked my opinion of a play where the heroine does nothing but lament herself'	Charles de Marguetal de Saint-Evremond (1636-1711) ⁴³ French aristocrat, soldier, essayist and playwright	An exile from France who lived in London from 1671, Saint-Evremond exhibited a more cosmopolitan view than other French critics of the time. He agreed with the main assumption of French neoclassic criticism, but was more open to English, Spanish and Italian views, with which he compared French drama. He acknowledged Aristotle, but argued that no theory was 'so perfect that it can establish rules for all nations and every age'. ⁴⁴ In theory, Saint-Evremond supported moral utility as the purpose of drama, but also tended to support the stimulation of emotion, especially through the punishment of evil and the reward of virtue. He rejected catharsis as having any moral purpose, arguing		To stimulate emotion; moral utility; example	Doing: drama; playwrighting Showing: punishment of evil and reward of virtue

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1672); ‘On Ancient and Modern Tragedy’ (c1674); ⁴² ‘Sur nos comédies’ (1677); ‘De la comédie anglaise’ (1677)		that Aristotle himself did not know what he meant by the term. He emphasised admiration rather than pity and terror with regard to tragedy, and rejected love interests and long lamentations as inappropriate. ⁴⁵ According to Carlson, Saint-Evremond was the last major contributor to dramatic theory in C17th France, with subsequent critics such as Le Breton, Haurouche and Boursault, adding nothing new to the debate. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (prescriptive) View of Theatre: functional
Prefaces to plays 1663-1670; Translation and interpretation of Aristotle’s Poetics (undated) ⁴⁷	Jean Racine (1639-1699) French playwright	Racine also came under attack because of his success. His prefaces defended his dramatic practices and attempted to reconcile them with the requirements of the religious fathers of Port-Royal. Although more faithful to neoclassic ideals (especially the unities) than either Corneille or Molière, Racine also recognized the need for flexibility of interpretation, with the ultimate goal being verisimilitude. Generally drama’s purpose is ‘to please and to move’ ⁴⁸ although ‘it might be hoped that our plays were as well constructed and as full of useful instruction’ as the work of the ancients. ⁴⁹ Musset (1838) claimed his plays subordinated action to the development of passion, partly because of the practical difficulty of action on a stage encumbered by spectators , ⁵⁰ but Racine himself declared in the Preface to Alexander the Great (1666) that the critics’ complaints were ‘without foundation, for I have filled all the scenes with action, have made them seem linked together as if by necessity, have given every character an obvious reason for being on stage, and, using few incidents and within a brief compass, have succeeded in writing a play that kept them enthralled, perhaps in spite of themselves, from beginning to end’. ⁵¹ He went on to say in the Preface to Andromache that ‘the public has been too well-disposed to me, to be concerned with the particular displeasure of two or three people who would like all the heroes of antiquity to be reformed and made into ... blameless characters’. ⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place where plays are staged	To delight; to stimulate the emotion; instruction	Doing: drama playwrighting ; a performed art Showing: Verisimilitude through performance Watching: spectators obstructed the action during a performance by sitting on the stage (allowed because tickets could command a higher price)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1674 marked a new phase in English dramatic criticism, with translations of Rapin and Boileau introducing French neoclassic theory to a wide and interested audience.
Réflexions sur la poétique (1674)	René Rapin (1621-1678) French Jesuit priest, poet, critic and teacher	A very influential summation of French neoclassic criticism and the last of the great C16th and C17th commentaries on Aristotle. Serving the public good through the improvement of manners is the principal end of poetry, pleasure is the means. Pleasure can only be obtained through verisimilitude, which results from following the rules, especially the unities. Credulity is more important than truth. Rapin claims to have derived the additional rule of bienséance (decorum) from Horace, but expands it to include amongst its criteria for judgment, 'the moral and social assumptions of the public'. ⁵³ Modern French tragedy and comedy are inferior to the Greek classics, largely because of a failure to observe verisimilitude, bienséance and the need to improve public manners as their end. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		To teach manners through pleasure	Doing: poetry Showing: credulity more important than truth, therefore attention must be paid to the moral and social assumptions of spectators
L'Art poétique (1674); Le Lutrin (1674)	Nicolas Boileau-Despréux (1636-1711) French poet and critic	A series of critical observation in poetic form, modelled on Horace, which 'lay down the rules for the language of poetry' as well as analysed a number of different poetic forms in order to try and elucidate principles. ⁵⁴ L'Art was the second of the two most influential summations of French neoclassic criticism. The moral emphasis is absent; pleasurable emotion is the purpose of drama. However, Boileau agrees with Rapin regarding the traditional rules and the importance of verisimilitude and decorum. Boileau was referred to as 'the dictator of French criticism'. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		Affect - pleasurable emotion	Doing: poetry (drama as literature) Showing: verisimilitude and decorum
Preface to and translation of Rapin: Reflections on Aristotle's Treatise of Poesie (1674); The Tragedies of	Thomas Rymer (c1643-1713) English critic and historiographer	Rymer regarded the neoclassic rules as 'the naturally developed dictates of common sense', which English drama could benefit from applying. The Tragedies is a detailed consideration of three plays by English dramatists Beaumont and Fletcher, which he considers inferior to classical drama. Although the primary end of poetry was pleasure, whatever pleases can also profit: 'The medicine is not less wholesome for the honey or the gilded pill. Nor can a moral lesson be less profitable when dressed and set off with all the advantage and decoration of the theatre' which 'of all diversions [is] the most bewitching: and the theatre is a magazine, not to be trusted but under the special eye and direction of a virtuous government; otherwise, according to the course of the world, it	A place in which plays were put before an audience; a 'magazine' [book] which may include both	Pleasure, moral medicine	Doing: poetry (drama); playwrighting Showing: poetic justice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the Last Age, Considered and Examined by the Practice of the Ancients, and by the Common Sense of all Ages ... (1678); ⁵⁵ A Short View of Tragedy: its Original Excellency and Corruption ... (1692). ⁵⁶		might, possibly, degenerate'. ⁵⁷ He linked together vice and punishment, virtue and reward to argue that drama was more universal and superior to history, introducing the highly influential idea of ' poetic justice ' to English criticism. ⁵⁸ Sidnell suggests the idea came from Plato's requirement that poets not show that 'the wicked are often happy and the good miserable' (Republic 392b). 'Rymer endorsed the idea of decorum both because it related to probability (which underpinned the 'logical development' of the plot) and because it supported poetic justice. He later condemned Othello along neoclassic lines. While few of his contemporaries protested against Rymer's views, which tended to accord with Dryden's, C19th critics regarded him as 'the prototype of the inflexible critic, blinded by limited critical standards ... Macaulay call[ed] him the worst critic that ever lived', ⁵⁹ while Jonson considered him a 'tyrant'. ⁶⁰ His essay on The Tragedies , an extended analysis of a number of plays, was possibly 'the first critical essay of its kind' in England. ⁶¹	good and bad and which therefore needs governing ⁶²
Upon Criticism (c1678)	Samuel Butler (1612-1680) English poet	'An English poet should be try'd b'his Peers And not by Pedants and Philosophers'. ⁶³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional			Doing: poetry
1680: the Comédie Française was established as a government sponsored national theatre – 'a milestone in theatre history'. However, neither it nor other public theatres attracted numbers of spectators. The Comédie operated at only a quarter of its capacity during the last 20 years of the century. ⁶⁴
Essay on Poetry (1682)	John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave (1648-1721) English statesman, patron and minor poet	Influenced by the translations of Horace and Boileau which had recently become available, Mulgrave disagreed sharply with Dryden and Rymer, holding up Shakespeare and Fletcher as models of 'spare and honest drama'. He also condemns ribaldry and obscenity in a concern for the morality of art. Although Wolsley refuted this concern (see below), within a decade, critical writing in England would be dominated by condemnations of the immorality of the theatre. ⁶⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place of performance	Ought to be moral	Doing: poetry (drama as literature)
1684 D'Aubignac's Pratique is translated into English as The Whole Art of the Stage . It exerts a powerful influence on English critics.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Nouvelles de la République des lettres’ (1684, 1686); Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697); ‘Continuation des pensées diverses’ (1704);	Pierre Bayle (1647-1746) French philosopher	Bayle challenged Dacier’s (and neoclassicism’s) respect for traditional rules and emphasis on moral purposes, seeing drama as pure entertainment. Bayle also rejected verisimilitude: dramatists should be free to ‘distort or exaggerate for the entertainment of their audience’. Such challenges to neoclassic theory remained in the minority for most of the following century, although they gradually became more numerous and detailed as time went on. ⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place of entertainment	Pure entertainment	Doing: playwrighting Showing: exaggeration or distortion was appropriate if the dramatist thought it necessary
Preface to Valentinian (1685)	Robert Wolseley (1649-1697) English poet	The ultimate test of art’s worth is not moral but aesthetic - a claim which found few supporters at the time. ⁶⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – poetry as an art View of Theatre: aesthetic		Aesthetic	Doing: art
1686: An English translation of the works of Saint-Evremond appears under the title Mixed Essays of Saint-Evremond . Like D’Aubignac, it also exerted a powerful influence on English critics. Although not directly relevant to drama theory, Saint-Evremond played a significant role in the ‘ Quarrel of the Ancients and the Moderns ’ which enthralled literature and literary theory, traditionally considered to have begun in 1687 when Charles Perrault in his poem Siècle de Louis elevated some modern writers above the Romans and Greeks. This debate, which brought to a head the long debate between conservatives and liberals, signalled a change in intellectual perspective, affecting the terms of later literary criticism. Many of the figures involved in theatre theory were also well represented in this quarrel on behalf of literature in general. Boileau and Racine defended the ancients in this dispute while Saint-Evremond and Perrault defended the moderns, largely on the basis of progress, changing tastes and the replacement of paganism with Christianity. Saint-Evremond introduced this argument into England, where it became known, after Jonathan Swift’s major work in the quarrel in 1697, as the ‘Battle of the Books’. ⁶⁸
On Poetry (1690); Upon Ancient and Modern Learning (1690)	Sir William Temple (1628-1699) English statesman and essayist	An attempt to mediate between the rival claims of profit (instruction) and pleasure. Claimed the dispute was more ‘an Exercise of Wit than an Enquiry after Truth’ since poetry was almost invariably as mix of the two. Temple was greatly influenced by Saint-Evremond; his Upon .. Learning was the first major English contribution to the Quarrel of the Ancients and the Moderns. He considered poetry in general to have declined in modern times, except for drama. English comedy, in particular, he considered richer and livelier than either that of the ancients or of other nations, largely because of the English climate, ease of life and freedom of expression , ⁶⁹ conditions which were to change under	A place of performance	To mix instruction with pleasure	Doing: poetry (literature – of which drama was an example) - a reflection of its social context

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		a building backlash against the disregard of morals in the theatre. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional; positive

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 113

² Winchester Stone Jr., George. 1980. 'The Making of the Repertory'. In The London Theatre World 1660-1800, edited by R. D. Hume. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press. 208

³ Pepys, in Pedicord, Harry 1980, 'The Changing Audience', in The London Theatre World 1660-1800, edited by R.D. Hume, Carbonvale & Edwardsville, Southern Illinois University Press, 236-242, p. 238.

⁴ James Wright Truman 1699, Historia Histrionica, quoted in Pedicord 1980: 239

⁵ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 8

⁶ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 5

⁷ 'Famous Playwrights', Théâtre Français, Arts Alive, National Arts Centre, Canada, www.artsalive.ca accessed 21/2/2007.

⁸ Molière 1873, Oeuvres, 13 vols., Paris, Vol 3 p. 29; in Carlson 1984: 103.

⁹ Carlson 1984: 103

¹⁰ Molière 1873, Vol 3: 414; in Carlson 1984: 105.

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 105

¹² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 258

¹³ Carlson 1984: 103-4

¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 104

¹⁵ The Critique was performed along with L'école des femmes; audience would have been in no doubt of the terms of the debate.

¹⁶ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 11

¹⁷ Flecknoe 1664, Love's Kingdom, London, 67v; in Carlson 1984: 113.

¹⁸ Excerpt reprinted from the first edition in Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 269-290; also in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 114

²⁰ Dryden 1991/1668: 271

²¹ Sidnell 1991: 271n8

²² Dryden 1991/1668: 271

-
- ²³ Gerould 2000: 25-6
- ²⁴ Dryden, John 1956-79, Works, 19 vols., Vol 9, p. 18; in Carlson 1984: 114. Gerould says that the Defense extensively paraphrased and quoted Corneille from the Prefaces. He knew Corneille's plays only through reading (Gerould 2000: 169).
- ²⁵ Dryden, John 1956-79, Works, 19 vols, Vol 9, p. 171; in Carlson 1984: 114-5.
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 115
- ²⁷ Barnhart, Robert K., ed. 1998. Chambers Dictionary of Etymology. Edinburgh: Chambers. 1131
- ²⁸ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 169.
- ²⁹ Dryden, John 1968, Dramatic Works, 6 vols, Vol 3, p. 418; in Carlson 1984: 119.
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 120-121
- ³¹ Krasner 2008: 11
- ³² Quoted in Blackadder 2003: 8
- ³³ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 168
- ³⁴ Barnhart 1998: 1131
- ³⁵ 'The plays that take on our corrupted stage, /Methinks, resemble the distracted age'; Dryden, quoted in Postlewait, Thomas. 1988. 'The Criteria for Periodization in Theatre History'. Theatre Journal 40 (3) pp. 299-318. 302.
- ³⁶ Stallybrass, Peter, and Alison White. 1986. The Politics and Poetics of Transgression: Cornell University Press.88
- ³⁷ Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.164-5
- ³⁸ Shadwell 1927, Complete Works, London, Vol 1, p. 183-84; in Carlson 1984: 116.
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 116-7
- ⁴⁰ Gerould 2000: 180
- ⁴¹ Quotations from Li Yu 2000/1671, Casual Expressions of Idle Feelings, trans. Faye C. Fei and William H. Sun; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 182-190.
- ⁴² Saint-Evremond 1966, Oeuvres mêlées [par] Saint-Evremond, (ed) Luigi de Nardis, Rome; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 253-256.
- ⁴³ Sidnell gives the dates as 1613-703.
- ⁴⁴ Saint-Evremond 1991/c1974: 253
- ⁴⁵ Saint-Evremond 1991/c1974: 256
- ⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 111
- ⁴⁷ Published by Vinaver, Eugene (ed) 1951, Principes de la tragédie en marge de la poétique d'Aristotle, Paris; excerpts translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 258-260
- ⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 106
- ⁴⁹ Preface to Phaedra, in Sidnell 1991: 266
- ⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 271
- ⁵¹ Cited in Sidnell 1991: 260
- ⁵² Cited in Sidnell 1991: 260
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 107-8

-
- ⁵⁴ Wikipedia 2009, 'Nicolas Boileau', http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nicolas_Boileau-Despr%C3%A9aux accessed 9/03/2009.
- ⁵⁵ In Zimansky, Curt (ed) 1956, The Critical Works of Thomas Rymer, New Haven; extract reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 292-295.
- ⁵⁶ In Zimansky, Curt (ed) 1956, The Critical Works of Thomas Rymer, New Haven; extract reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 295-297.
- ⁵⁷ Rymer 1991/1692: 296
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 119; Sidnell 1991: 291)
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 119
- ⁶⁰ Sidnell 1991: 291
- ⁶¹ Sidnell 1991: 292n6
- ⁶² Rymer 1991/1692: 296
- ⁶³ Samuel Butler 1759, The Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose, London, p. 165; in Carlson 1984: 119)
- ⁶⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 264-9
- ⁶⁵ Carlson 1984: 121
- ⁶⁶ Carlson 1984: 111
- ⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 121
- ⁶⁸ Carlson 1984: 110
- ⁶⁹ Carlson 1984: 122

Table 10/51 Theories of Theatre 1691-1730

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1692: A new edition of Aristotle's Poetics produced by André Dacier (1651-1722) was accepted as standard in France and England for most of the C18th; it was closely aligned with the neoclassic tradition, and rejected Saint-Evremond's cultural relativism: 'Good sense and proper reason are the same in all lands and all centuries.'¹ Both comedies and tragedy should fulfil a moral aim. The C18th was a time of theatrical experimentation. Many new forms of drama were developed, including ballad opera, comic opera, middle-class tragedy and sentimental comedy, and during the last years of the century, melodrama. Multipoint perspective was introduced by the scenic designers, the Bibienas. Local colour and three-dimensional sets became common, and there was experimentation with historical accuracy in costuming. Acting was generally bombastic, but attempts were introduced to make it more natural. Fischer-Lichte ties this to an increasing concern with naturalness and the accenting of the sensual in society, so that the aim of acting became the representation of naturalness, epitomised by J.J. Engel's book Ideas on Mimesis (1785-6), an 'exhaustive and detailed description of all possible gestural signs'.² According to Wasserman, this concern with naturalism was part of a more general concern in aesthetics with the role of the imagination in creativity, and led to theories of sympathetic imagination being applied to acting theory. Sympathetic imagination was 'the faculty whereby the imagination ... succeeds in identifying itself with the object of its attention and ... enters ... into the distinctive character of that object'. Opinion was divided between whether this occurred instinctively through the passions or whether it occurred as a result of artifice, or the use of technique. Thus the C18th, as well as contributing to the growing importance of imagination and its relationship to creativity also 'charted the major approaches to the dispute over the significance of conscious artifice and emotionally inspired imaginative insight in acting' a dispute which was elaborated on by the like of Lamb and Hazlitt in C19th and which continues today. These approaches fall into two 'camps': the naturalistic, in which 'artistic insight is gained by the creative faculty of the actor's sympathetic imagination' and 'classical', in which 'acting requires mainly the study of artificial manners that imitate gracefully a reality molded into an art'.³ This period also saw, in line with these ideas about acting, a concern with formalising and standardising expression drawing on the cataloguing of expression devised for the use of painters and sculptors. A central debate occurred throughout the period over whether actors ought to be completely immersed in the emotions which they were expressing or required some distance to be maintained in order to best represent the feelings of the character. This debate received its most famous expression in Diderot's essay Paradoxe sur le comédien but continues today. In the last half of the century, practices of modern directing were introduced.⁴ It was also a period which saw increasing government regulation of theatre, and the introduction of government subsidies,⁵ partly because theatre, particularly in England, had come under attack on two fronts: through the stifling imposition of neoclassical rules and from the churches, which saw it as 'an unnecessary social distraction' at best, and a 'haven for sinners and layabouts' at worst.⁶ According to Hindson and Gray, tragedy was able to answer these attacks by overthrowing the neoclassical rules on the one hand (as Jonson did), and by arguing that it 'performed an important social function' on the other (something parodied by Henry Fielding in his 1730 satire The Tragedy of Tragedies; or Tom Thumb the Great).⁷ Crane argues that the C18th could be characterised by a new focus on drama as performed before an audience. Johnson, for example, claimed that the 'first principle' of dramatic criticism was 'the drama's laws the drama's patrons give'.⁸ Yet Taviani comments on the absence of the spectator in C18th writing on the theatre: 'The spectator is absent from prescriptive manuals as well as scientific and philosophical works on delivery and actors ... The spectator is envisioned no differently from the reader of a book: a book exists independently of its reader, can be read and reread; one can reconsider one's impressions, confront them; in fact, one can arrive at a supposedly objective standpoint in which there is a clear distinction between the object under inquiry and the subject performing the inquiry. The concrete persistence of the book in spite of the flux of different readings gives rise to the awareness – or the illusion – that a work exists independently of its effects on a user'.⁹ Theatre architecture during this period also strove 'to force the actor ... behind the proscenium arch to create a picture' at first in theory and then, increasingly after 1790s, in practice. Actors were to be objects within a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
visual experience.¹⁰ Theatres also underwent an enormous increase in size to accommodate the burgeoning middle-class. As C18th critics began to focus on the effects of drama, the old question of why tragedy should give spectators pleasure became one of great importance. Renaissance explanations (the pleasure of seeing error punished, and the pleasure in the skill of the artist in being able to present a distress subject well) had given way in the mid C17th in the face of the psychological theories by theorists such as Descartes (1618) and Hobbes (1650). Descartes had considered all emotions to be pleasurable as long as they were held in check by reason. In the theatre, even sadness and hatred could be pleasurable since they were unable to harm us in any way. These ideas had been picked up Rapin (1674) and, as a consequence, Dennis (1693), who made the point in The Advancement and Reformation of Poetry that the knowledge of being in the theatre was sufficient to make painful feelings safe and therefore pleasurable. Hobbes, on the other hand, citing Lucretius, believed that the pleasure came from relief at not being in the same predicament (see Hobbes 1650 above). These debates challenged the authority of neoclassic rules through their appeal to reason¹¹ and continued to influence C18th debates and theories, being picked up and promoted by Du Bos (1719). In England to some extent, and in France to a large and unprecedented extent during this period, the theorists of theatre were also practitioners, generally playwrights. Consequently, many exhibited a tension between classical ideas about what was required and what actually ‘worked’ on stage and was applauded by spectators. Voltaire in particular, had difficulty reconciling an essentially conservative view, especially of tragedy, with what were new and clearly successful techniques of playwriting, which he tried to emulate.
Impartial Critick (1693); Usefulness of the Stage to the Happiness of Mankind (1698); Grounds of Criticism in Poetry (1704)	John Dennis (1657-1734) English literary critic and dramatist	Dennis was a protégé of Dryden’s, and one of the most important critics of the time. He wrote a defence of the theatre, as well as some ‘mediocre’ plays.¹² He ridiculed Rymer ‘for attempting to introduce Athenian drama into England, where climate, politics, and social customs were all different’. Dennis later became a significant contributor to the debate surrounding Jeremy Collier’s 1698 criticism of the theatre (see below), as well as a contributor to the debate over why spectators seemed to enjoy tragedy which arose in the C18th. Usefulness is an extended defence of the theatre which admits that the contemporary stage was ‘prey to great abuses’ which demanded reform. However, the stage was ‘useful to the happiness of mankind, the welfare of the state, and the advancement of religion’.¹³ Drama was useful to happiness because it ‘stimulated the passions whilst not denying the reason’, which was something particularly useful to the English, who tended towards reserve. Tragedy in particular was useful to government because it demonstrated the bad effects of ambition and the desire for power, thus discouraging rebellion. It also diverted men from their grievances and towards compassion, duty and patriotism. Drama purged the passions and taught humility, patience and duty, which benefited both state and religion. Moreover, drama taught religion indirectly, since poetic justice was secured through God or Providence. Like Collier, Dennis drew on ancient and modern sources to support his argument. In Grounds, Dennis follows Horace more explicitly in making pleasure a subordinate end to moral reform, although both are achieved by exciting the emotions. In particular, great	A place in which dramas are staged before an audience	Moral and social instruction; catharsis; the stimulation of contemplation; reformation	Doing: poetry which was staged Showing: virtue rewarded Watching: usefulness: we learn virtue by seeing its rewards; passions are purged by tragedy, and we learn humility, patience and duty; we

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		poetry arouses enthusiasm (a concept drawn from Longinus as well as religious thought). Tragedy at its finest also indirectly stimulates later contemplation in its audience (presaging what Wordsworth was to describe as ‘emotion recollected in tranquillity’). Since the purpose of poetry was ‘to instruct and reform the World’, rule and order must be a characteristic of poetry; failure to understand this led to inferior poetry. In his early criticism, Dennis had seemed positive in his defence of English literature. At the beginning of the C18th, his interest in Longinus, in the psychology of the author and the spectator, and the effect of climate and environment on literature suggested considerable flexibility, however, his contributions to the Collier debate seemed in the end to paint him into the corner of a determined defender of neoclassical rules, and his criticisms came to be seen by early C18th writers and critics as ‘increasingly pompous, pedantic, and old-fashioned’.¹⁴ Perhaps it was more that the times were changing, and neoclassicism was losing its grip. Macauley claimed Dennis wrote ‘bad odes, bad tragedies [and] bad comedies’, but he did devise a new machine for making thunder effects for his play Appius and Virginia (1709). When the idea was used by another playwright, he accused them of having ‘stolen his thunder’.¹⁵ Dennis became involved in a debate with Joseph Addison over the proper interpretation of justice. According to Dennis, ‘drama always had a duty to represent the triumph of human virtue ... It must never seem to praise injustice and it should ... never punish human virtue’.¹⁶ To ensure this, he rewrote Shakespeare’s Coriolanus as The Invader of His Country (1705).¹⁷ Pope called him a ‘dunce’, which permanently affected his reputation.¹⁸ Nevertheless, he developed Descartes’ ideas about the psychological effect of theatre on the spectator in The Advancement and Reformation of Poetry into a theory that that the knowledge of being in the theatre was sufficient to make painful feelings safe and therefore pleasurable.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			know we are in the theatre and this is why we can find pleasure in tragedy
‘Of Modern Comedies’ in Country Conversations (1694)	James Wright (1643-1713) English essayist	Complained that modern comedy neglected its moral purpose.²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: comedy
Preface to	Sir Richard	Modern poets were neglecting their moral purpose. Greek drama had been established by		Moral	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Prince Arthur (1694)	Blackmore (1654-1729) English poet and physician	the state for moral instruction (and modern poets should follow suit). Very popular – reprinted twice. (Criticised by Dennis in 1698 in his ‘Remarks on a Book entitled Prince Arthur ’. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		instruction	poetry (drama)
By late 1694 in England, the controversy over the ‘lawfulness’ or morality of plays became ‘as hot ... as it was of late about the ancients and moderns’ (Gentleman’s Journal November 1694). ²²
Reflection on our Modern Poesie (1695)	anonymous	Complained that modern comedy neglected its moral purpose. ²³ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: Poesy (comedy)
“‘On Humour in Comedy’: a letter to John Dennis’ (1695; published 1696) ²⁴	William Congreve (1670-1729) English playwright and librettist	Congreve, like Jonson, was scornful of the tastes of popular audiences. He considered his plays ‘trifles’ and did not appear to take writing seriously. He stopped writing for the stage in 1700 after The way of the World received a poor reception. Dennis had written to Congreve saying he had been entertained by reading several English plays, and asking him his opinion about humour in comedy. In his letter Congreve defines ‘what he takes to be the foundations of characterisation, dialogue, and also morality, in comedy’. ²⁵ Congreve drew a distinction between humour, wit, folly, ‘external habit of body’ and affectation. Humour related to the character and its disposition. Any kind of character could be witty, but would be so according to their ‘humour’. Follies were what ‘men’s humours may incline them to’. External habit referred to ‘a singularity of manners, speech, and behaviour’, which may be affected. ‘ Humour is the life, affectation the picture ... Humour is from nature, habit from custom; and affectation from industry. Humour shows us as we are. Habit shows us as we appear, under a forcible impression. Affectation shows us what we would be, under a voluntary disguise’. In general (and rather reluctantly) Congreve defined humour to be ‘ A singular and unavoidable manner of doing, or saying, anything, peculiar to and natural to one man only; by which his speech and actions are distinguishable from those of other men ’. Congreve believed it was ‘perhaps, the work of a long life to make one comedy true in all its parts and to give every character in it a true and distinct humour’ rather than simply draw entertaining or useful characters from affectations, follies and physical traits. Congreve also associated the superiority of English comedy with the physical and political environment of the country. ²⁶		Amusement	Doing: plays Showing: reflecting the social and political times Watching: popular audience had poor taste

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-popular theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent
Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698)	Jeremy Collier (1650-1726) English theatre critic, bishop and theologian	The period's most famous attack on the theatre, a particularly striking contribution to the tradition of antitheatrical tracts, which was, however, within the mainstream of theatre criticism. It drew upon authorities and arguments generally accepted by literary theorists, including the church fathers, the classic dramatists, Aristotle, Horace, Quintilian, Heinsius and Rapin: 'The business of Plays is to recommend Virtue, and discountenance Vice; To shew the Uncertainty of Humane Greatness, the suddain Turns of Fate, and the Unhappy Conclusions of Violence and Injustice'. ²⁷ Collier quotes Rapin and Jonson in support of poetic justice , and condemns modern plays for their lack of attention to decorum, appropriateness and attention to the unities. Although Collier was not the first to complain about the morality of the contemporary stage, his essay had an immediate and enormous effect, launching 'a battle of pamphlets' that continued in England for the next 25 years and involving more than 80 known contributors. ²⁸ Most of the dramatists attacked by Collier responded but few made any significant contribution to the debate. Dryden made no direct response, considering Collier ill-mannered and uncivil, but acknowledged what he considered Collier's justified complaints in his works of 1698 (Poetical Epistle to Motteux) and 1700 (The Fables). Some historians consider that Collier's essay marked the end of the theatrical Restoration. The sexual content of plays began to be toned down and morality was stressed, marking the beginning of the move towards C18th sentimental comedy. ²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic/prescriptive View of Theatre: negative		Ought to teach the consequences of evil (but don't)	Showing: plays should show poetic justice (but modern plays don't)
1701: an English translation of Charles Le Brun's 1667 book as A Method to Learn to Design the Passions . Although addressed to painters, Le Brun's book had a significant effect on theatre practice. Actors came to be expected by spectators to express the passions according to a standardized gestural 'language'. It was reprinted many times, an expensive edition appearing in England in 1813. ³⁰ 1705-1775: English translations of Aristotle's Poetics from the French translation by Dacier appeared. These were hence heavily influenced by French neo-classicism. Nevertheless, the interpretation was used by C18th critics from Dennis to Goldsmith; it was regarded as authoritative in England as well as in France. ³¹
Discourse upon Comedy (1702)	George Farquhar (1678-1707) English dramatist	One of the first indications that neoclassicism was losing authority in England. Points out that plays written according to neoclassic rules were generally dull and ineffective, largely because they were based on authorities like Aristotle 'who was no Poet, and consequently not capable of giving Instruction in the Art of Poetry'. This seems to have been the first explicit recognition of the paradoxical position of Aristotle as an authority on the construction of drama, although Heinsius (1611) had noted his position as a		To provide moral example	Doing: poetry (plays) - using techniques appropriate

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘philosophic observer’, which presumably meant that he considered Aristotle to be objective in his account, or perhaps impractical. More recent scholarship by Lloyd (1990) indicates that Aristotle might have been far from ‘objective’ in his efforts to distance himself from Plato’s criticisms of drama. Modern writers should not be condemned for ignoring the unities, only if they fail to leave ‘Vice unpunish’d, Vertue unrewarded, Folly unexpos’d or Prudence unsuccessful’, since the end of drama was ‘Counsel or Reproof’.³² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional			to contemporary beliefs and customs Showing: poetic justice
The rise of the modern critic
The Tatler (1709-1710); Preface to The Conscious Lovers (1723)³³	Sir Richard Steele (1672-1729) English reviewer, critic and playwright	The work of Steele in The Tatler marked the beginning of ‘the modern review’.³⁴ His observations contained little theory, and he clearly had no interest in traditional rules other than an interest in indirect moral improvement: ‘It is not the business of a good play to make every man a hero but it certainly gives him a livelier sense of virtue and merit than he had when he entered the theatre’ (The Tatler No. 99, November 26, 1709). Steele also attacked the idea of poetic justice (The Tatler No. 82, October 18, 1709), which he considered a ‘chimerical method’ which ‘an intelligent spectator ... knows ... ought not to be so’, and the use of ridicule as the chief element in comedy. He coined the phrase ‘sober and polite Mirth’ as the aim of comedy, and attempted to write his plays according to this principle so that they could provide positive rather than negative examples. This generated a ‘lively exchange of pamphlets and letters’ between Steele and Dennis and others over the basis of comedy. According to Dennis, Horace, Aristotle and Rapin had all considered ridicule and laughter as the basis of comedy, and comedy should not be used to try and provide positive examples for imitation since such things were ‘serious Things’.³⁵ Steele also suggested that tragedy would be more meaningful if it was about everyday people rather than princes and great men, laying the ground for the rise of ‘sentimental drama’.³⁶ Despite being ‘vigorously attacked and ridiculed’ by critics, Steele’s play The Conscious Lovers was ‘vastly successful’ when it appeared in a lavish production, ‘bringing in the biggest gross in the history of Drury Lane’.³⁷ In the Preface, Steele responds to some of the criticisms, in particular that by John Dennis, made after only reading the play: ‘it must be remembered a play is to be seen, and is made to be represented with the advantage of action ... it is then a play has the effect of example and precept’.³⁸ Reading only provided ‘half the spirit’. One example offered by the play,	A place in which to watch plays: ‘it must be remembered a play is to be seen’	To represent in action for moral instruction; entertainment	Doing: plays - playwrighting; to aim to give a ‘livelier’ sense of virtue; aim of comedy: to produce ‘sober and polite Mirth’; represented with the advantage of action’ acting: a result of the use of the sympathetic imagination, not artifice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		according to Steele, was how to avoid a duel, which he hoped ‘the Goths and Vandals that frequent the theatres’ would learn from. Although he acknowledged the skill of the actors, Steele also suggested that the staging of the play may have been responsible for some of the criticism directed towards it,³⁹ again drawing attention to the differences between reading and seeing a play, this time in a negative sense. In considering acting, Steele ‘consistently held to the ... principle that an emotional conviction leads to automatic sureness of expression. The route to effective acting is “not to study gesture, for the behaviour ... [will] follow the sentiments of the mind ... if the actor is well possessed of the nature of his part, a proper action will necessarily follow’ (Tatler No 201, July 22, 1710)⁴⁰. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional			Showing: positive examples Watching: (implied): critic; spectators preferred to see plays which were about everyday people including ‘the Goths and Vandals that frequent the theatres’
The Spectator issues 39, 40, 42 & 44 (April 1711)	Joseph Addison (1672-1719) English reviewer, critic, essayist and poet	A more substantial body of theoretical writing, focusing especially on tragedy, and echoing neoclassic ideals in the condemnation of tragicomedy and multiple subplots. The aim of tragedy is didactic; neglect of this aim is a major fault of modern drama. Tragedy teaches humility, forbearance and distrust of worldly success.⁴¹ However, he considered poetic justice a ‘ridiculous idea’. It had ‘no foundation in Nature, in Reason, or in the Practice of the Ancients’ (The Spectator No. 40), a criticism denied by Dennis in a letter ‘To the Spectator’ in 1712, citing Aristotle in support. According to Addison, ‘for a play to have an influence upon the moral attitudes of an audience, it must keep the audience in a state of excited suspense ... it was impossible to do this if the audience knew in advance that the hero would triumph and the villain would be ... punished’.⁴²		Didactic: to teach humility, forbearance and distrust of worldly success through the use of suspense	Doing: plays (tragedy) Showing: value of virtue Watching: ‘for a play to have an influence upon the moral attitudes of spectators, it must keep

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			them in a state of excited suspense
'Advice to an Authour' in Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711)	Anthony Ashley Cooper, Third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671-1713) English philosopher	Shaftesbury believed that taste and morality were 'psychologically dependent on each other' and that sympathy and imagination played a major role in this dependency. ⁴³ Sympathy and imagination were also central to the poet and dramatist [note differentiation]. Poetry achieved its greatest mimetic potential when the writer, through the use of imagination and sympathetic identification, 'annihilated' himself as he revealed the characters he was representing: 'The poet ... makes hardly any figure at all, and is scarce discoverable' in his writing. 'From a finger or toe he can represent ... the frame and fashion of a whole body'. It was this sympathetic insight which was the mark of a great writer. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (prescriptive) View of Theatre: positive		To create sympathetic insight through mimesis	Doing: poetry (literature) - writing as annihilation of the self
An Essay on Criticism (1711)	Alexander Pope (1688-1744) English Poet	'Great art comes from the imitation of role models'. ⁴⁵ Krasner considers that Pope's remark marks the final triumph of Aristotle over Plato in relation to theatre theory. He sees this in relation to mimesis , but it also marks the loss of the relationship between actor and spectator , and the beginning of the focus on producing 'drama' as a form of literature. Pope rejected the criticisms of contemporary critics such as Dennis, engaging in dispute with Aaron Hill (1716), who supported them (see below). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: negative		Imitation	Doing: poetry (literature) according to classical models
1714: accession of George I in England saw the renewal of royal patronage for the theatre, which helped to boost theatre-going. ⁴⁶
Lettre écrite à l'Académie française sur l'éloquence, la poésie, l'histoire, etc (1714)	François de Salignac de la Mothe- Fénelon (1651-1715) French theologian	The first major French poetics of C18th, written as a guide to the work of the Académie. Offers excellent summaries of neoclassical critical opinion on tragedy and comedy, coloured by a strong moral concern. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: poetry (tragedy and comedy)
Dedication to The Fatal Vision (1716);	Aaron Hill (1685-1750) Playwright,	An acting treatise. Drawing on Descartes, Hill attempted to provide 'a physiological explanation for the automatic sureness of physical expression that follows from emotional conviction', thus approaching the later theory of sympathetic imagination . ⁴⁸ Carlson		Sincerity in representation	Doing: acting as the embodiment

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The Prompter (1735); Preface to Zara (735); Essay on the Art of Acting (1746)	poet, theatre impresario and commercial entrepreneur	reads this as an attempt to reduce acting to a ‘programmatically, almost mechanistic craft’, ⁴⁹ based on Le Brun’s catalogue of the emotions. A book for actors. Hill, like Betterton, imagined the stage as a tableau vivant with a standardized gestural language. Spectators ‘engaged with actors in a contract of performance and response’ in which both were thoroughly familiar with the range of emotional representations. ⁵⁰ The ‘first requisite of an actor ... is a “plastic imagination”, a “flexible Fancy,” for he must first fix upon his imagination the idea of the emotion to be portrayed’. This required a knowledge of the human passions. Once the idea was fixed, the body adapts itself to the emotion. Consequently ‘true players do not act, but in reality are “the happy, or the wretched which we are to think ‘em”’. ⁵¹ Acting then becomes ‘little more than an act of the will in enforcing the idealized concept of the emotion upon the plastic imagination’. Hill ridiculed those ‘who made a study of the technical details of acting ... the details must spring spontaneously from the emotional idea’: ‘No dull, cold, mouther shares the actor’s plea, / Rightly to seem , is transiently, to be . / [When] ductile genius turns, and passions wind , / And bends, to fancy ’s curve, the pliant mind’. ⁵² Wasserman argues that this demonstrates ‘the formation of a doctrine of the sympathetic imagination, for [Hill] require[d] not merely that the actor feel strongly the emotions he portrays but also that through the intensity of the emotion the actor lose himself in his assumed character and hence act with a sincerity “beyond the reach of art”’. ⁵³ Hill defended contemporary critics such as Dennis against Pope’s diatribes against them, perhaps in order to promote his own career. ⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic (against Pope); analysis View of Theatre: positive			and expression of strongly felt emotions leading to the actor’s identification with the part, the sincere representations of which are recognized by spectators Watching: Hill supported the right of contemporary critics to comment on literature and poetry
Réflexions critiques sur la poésie et sur la peinture (1719)	Abbé Jean Du Bos (1670-1742) French author	Followed Descartes: any emotional stimulation was potentially pleasurable. ⁵⁵ The function of art was as a stimulus to the emotions; tragedy was superior to comedy because it moved more deeply and involved the grand emotions of pity and terror rather than mere amusement and scorn. In order to feel these emotions, the spectator must identify with the hero, but emotional distance was also required to prevent powerful emotions from arousing pain. ⁵⁶ One way to do this was to set tragedies at remote times	A place where drama could be watched from a distance	To affect the spectator – the arts satisfy human desire for excitement	Doing: poetry (tragedy and comedy); the art and craft of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		and places, involving characters who were also distanced. Not only could the spectator then experience tragic emotions safely, but they could experience a new emotion which Du Bos (and Hume after him) considered central to the genre of tragedy: that of admiration. ‘No man can be admirable if he is not seen from a certain distance’.⁵⁷ Comedy also requires some emotional distance if ridicule is to reform rather than hurt, although it needs to be closer to the situations of the spectators to be effective. Du Bos also provides the first extended considerations of the art of acting, drawing extensively on classical authors such as Quintilian. He considers ‘declamation, movement and gesture’, arguing for training in voice and movement for actors, and subordination of the actor’s performance to the requirements of the play.⁵⁸ Lucretius’ metaphor of shipwreck/spectator was again cited ‘in support of an argument placing the audience of theatrical entertainments at a safe imaginative remove from the performance enacted before it’.⁵⁹ Like Shaftesbury, Du Bos argued that an enlightened ‘public’ could ‘properly assess the value of a spectacle because its sentiments’ were ‘refined by education and experience to form a kind of sixth sense, le sentiment.’ Audiences were thus ‘enabled to form disinterested judgments (sans intérêt), particularly about those powerfully moving expressions of emotion which, on the stage as in society, could not effectively conveyed in words’.⁶⁰ Du Bos’ work was ‘genuinely forward-looking’, according to Gaiger because it was specifically addressed to ‘the engaged spectator’.⁶¹ Since the aim of art was the production of an effect on the spectator, then the value of any form of art should be measured by its success or failure in producing an effect. Taste was a matter of taste, a sensory reaction like tasting a stew, not a matter of rules and principles, and was available to anyone. The judgment of experts and critics (gens du métier) was likely to be distorted or ‘calloused’ for three reasons: partisanship and vested interests; appeals to rules and principles which ignored sentiment and because they were likely to be affected by commercial needs:⁶² ‘all the arguments in the world are incapable of persuading someone that a work pleases when he feels that it does not please, or that a work is interesting, when it does not arouse his interest’.⁶³ Sentiment was likely to be more acute in some than others, but since it was something we all shared, eventually we would end up with a common opinion of a work. Human beings seek excitement and amusement, but the pursuit of these entails risk. The arts satisfy these desires by stimulating these passions in an artificial way which entails no risk to us. [An audience/spectator oriented theory of		and amusement in safety	acting required training. Its aim was to affect the spectator and needed to be able to command the spectator’s attention Watching: Spectators must identify with the hero to feel pity and terror but also needed emotional distance to avoid pain and to also feel admiration. With the development of the sixth sense of le sentiment, enlightened

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the arts which does not, however allow for the further development of the aesthetic sense through further knowledge or experience]. Du Bos focused on the beholder or spectator in both theatre and in art and argued that a painting's power to move the beholder was a function of the power of its subject matter to do so in real life. Art needed to be able to command the attention of the beholder in order to divert him from ennui. The depiction of action and strong passions could do this. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory; pro-aesthetic view of theatre View of Theatre: positive			audiences could watch sans intérêt (Refléxions II, xxi-xxii). The success or failure of any art work could be judged on the basis of whether it succeeded in affecting the spectator. The judgment of critics and experts could not be trusted since it was likely to be distorted by partisanship or vested interests. A 'democratic view' of spectatorship, available to any with

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
					some education or experience. 64
Preface to Oedipe (1719/1730); Discours sur la tragédie (1731);⁶⁵ Preface to L'enfant prodigue (1736); Preface to L'Ecossoise (1760)	Voltaire (Francois-Marie Arouet) (1694-1778) French writer	The preface to the 1730 edition of his play Oedipus marked the first of Voltaire's life-long debates with other theorists – this one directed against La Motte. He took a strongly conservative line, arguing that all the unities ultimately reduce to unity of action, including La Motte's unity of interest, and that verse was the appropriate form for tragedy because poetry had more power than prose. Nevertheless, in his later Discours, written after spending two years in England, he explicitly challenged the assumptions of French neoclassic theatre regarding poetry, comparing them unfavourably to the vigour of the less classic-bound English drama. He also defended the introduction of a love interest into tragedy on the basis of verisimilitude provided it was made central to the action. Theatre had a moral purpose: '[t]rue tragedy is the school of virtue, and the only difference between purified theatre and books of morality is that instruction in the theatre is through action which engages the interest and is embellished by the charms of an art originally invented only to instruct the earth and bless heaven'.⁶⁶ Voltaire argued that comedy allowed for experimentation; the only criterion for judging a good comedy was that it interested its spectators and presented itself well, an argument taken up by the romantics. Nevertheless, emotional questions ought to be subordinate to moral ones: [w]hat is much more important, is that this comedy possesses an excellent morality ... while losing nothing of what can please honest men of the world' (L'Ecossoise).⁶⁷ Voltaire insisted that spectators be removed from the stage during performance: 'The seats for spectators that are on the stage reduce the playing space, and make it almost impossible to show any kind of action. This state of affairs means that stage décor ... is seldom appropriate to the play. Above all, it prevents the actors from moving from one room to another in full view of the audience'.⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place in which drama is seen	Moral instruction – theatre was a 'school of virtue' which used pleasure to teach	Doing: poetry (drama): tragedy and comedy Showing: the presence of spectator on the stage interfered with staging Watching: spectators should be in the auditorium, not competing with actors on the stage
Discours sur la tragédie (1721; 1722; 1723; 1726);⁶⁹	Antoine Houdar de La Motte (1672-1731) French	Pleasure, achieved by the arousal of emotion, was the dominant end of drama; rigid adherence to classical requirements (unities, verisimilitude) actually worked against verisimilitude: '[I]t is not natural for all parts of an action to occur in the same apartment or the same place [and] a length of time suitable and proportionate to the nature of the		Pleasure through the arousal of emotions	Doing: drama (tragedy) Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Suite des reflexions sur la tragédie (1730)	playwright	subjects' is to be preferred. ⁷⁰ La Motte introduced the idea of unity of interest : this keeps all the major characters at least emotionally present, and argued for the introduction of prose in tragedy on the grounds of verisimilitude and performance. La Motte's prefaces produced a critical response from Voltaire, with whom he engaged in an on-going debate. (NB: this is Carlson's account of de la Motte's writings: compare with the following from Sidnell): 'Antoine Houdar de la Motte ... ranged himself on the side of the Moderns against the Ancients in the so-called "Quarrel" between them, [and] proposed a general "unity of interest" ... and, in theory, made the spectators' pleasure decisive in the judging of plays, rather than formal criteria'. ⁷¹ This version suggests that de la Motte considered the response of spectators to a play as the main way of judging the value of a play, while Carlson's suggests that striving for such a response was the a purpose of drama, rather than a judgment of it. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			if spectators enjoyed a play it could be considered successful
Thesaurus dramaticus (1724)	Compiler unknown; printed by Sam. Aris for Thomas Butler	An account of the 'poetical beauties' of the English stage which catalogues details of facial aspect, gesture and tone of voice to be used by actors. ⁷² The Thesaurus is a collection of 'all the celebrated passages, soliloquies, similes, descriptions, and other poetical beauties in the body of English plays, antient and modern, digested under proper topics; with the names of the plays, and their authors, referr'd to in the margin'. Further editions were published in 1737, 1756, and 1777, as The Beauties of the Stage . Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: Positive		Performance	Doing: dramatic poetry (plays)
1725: A translation of Alberti's De Re Aedificatoria (1485) into English by James Leoni as Ten Books on Architecture : 'Neither dare I presume to find fault with our Pontiffs, and those who Businessse it is to set a good Example to others, for having ... abolished the Use of publick Shows. Yet Moses was commended for ordaining, that all his people should ... meet together in one Temple and celebrate publick Festivals at stated Seasons ... Doubtless he hoped the People, by thus meeting together ... might grow more humane, and be closer linked in Friendship one with another'. ⁷³ The aim of public shows was the development of a cohesive and civil society
Dissertatio de actione scenica (1727)	Franciscus Lang (1654-1725) German professor of rhetoric and poetry, Jesuit priest	A detailed description of body language. 'As a dramatic art in my senses, I call the decorous Flexibility of the whole body and voice, which is likely to arouse emotion.' ⁷⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Affect	Doing: an embodied art: acting involves the whole body as well as the voice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Two Dissertations Concerning Sense and the Imagination (1728)	Zachary Mayne (1631-1694) English essayist and philosopher	The imagination is 'like the Cameleon, of which Creature it is reported that it changes its Hue according to the Colour of the Place where it happens to be'. ⁷⁵ Keats later picked up this image to describe the 'annihilation' of the 'true poet' in the process of entering into and revealing the essential nature of a character. According to Keats the poet 'has as much delight in conceiving an Iago as an Imogen'. ⁷⁶ Shaftesbury too, considers that in presenting 'the inward form and structure of his fellow creatures' the poet or dramatist 'annihilates' himself. It is only through this chameleon act that poetry can 'reveal its greatest mimetic potentialities'. ⁷⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: aesthetic		Aesthetic	Doing: poetry (literature) - writing as an annihilation of the self
Versuch einer critische Dichtkunst (1730); Ob man (1851)	Johan Christoph Gottsched (1700-1766) critic, professor of poetry Leipzig University	Gottsched was 'a leader of C18th rationalism in German dramatic theory', producing a belated response to the liberties of the German theatre, and Harsdoerfer's approach (1648). He developed 'a system of stifling rigidity', which insisted on the moral function of drama and demanded, in the name of an extreme verisimilitude, 'the virtual identity of dramatic and empirical reality' and an adherence to the unities as rigid as that required by Castelvetro and Dacier. Poetic justice was to be set aside because it was not compatible with the illusion of reality (Ob man). The full title of this essay is Ob man in theatralischen Gedichten allezeit die Tugend als belohnt und das Laster als bestraft vorstellen muss . Carlson translates this as 'whether one in dramatic works must always show virtue triumphant and vice punished', which states Gottsched's position, but loses the reference to theatre , placing Gottsched's critique into literature rather than theatre theory. ⁷⁸ Despite his insistence on verisimilitude, Gottsched felt tragedy should retain its stylized verse form. Characters were also to remain true to traditional types, and exhibit decorum in their speech. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction through extreme verisimilitude	Doing: drama Showing: decorum
Extract from the Poetics of Aristotle and Considerations on the Same (c1730) ⁷⁹	Pietro Metastasio (1698-1782) Italian librettist, theorist, Imperial poet 1730-1782	Metastasio was acutely aware that 'modern times call for a more complex understanding of the psychology of artistic composition and reception' that that of Aristotle. ⁸⁰ He wished that 'Aristotle had explained himself more clearly with regard to the cure [catharsis] that he proposes' – were the passions to be totally destroyed or simply rectified, or meant to create immunity (something Metastasio rejected) – and in any case, why just pity and fear. Also 'even the most wicked spectator admires great examples of heroic virtue ... and takes pleasure in seeing them represented on stage' but what was the value of the 'spectacle of lacerated corpses ... and the howlings and putrid sores of		Affect	Doing: poetry (a performed art) Watching: spectators admire heroic deeds

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Philoctetes ... such a treatment is worse than any infirmity ... the wisdom of his advice needs to be very carefully examined'.⁸¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			and enjoy seeing them represented on stage

¹ Dacier 1733, La poétique d'Aristotele, Amsterdam, p. viii; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.111.

² Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.33

³ Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272.

⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.348

⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 323-327

⁶ Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury.113

⁷ Hindson and Gray 1988: 114

⁸ Cited in Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.229

⁹ Taviani, Ferdinando. 1981. 'Da Dorat a Diderot, da Diderot a Dorat, un'indagine sulla questione dell'attore nel settecento'. Quaderni di teatro 11 pp. 73-106.102-3 in De Marinis, Marco. 1993. The Semiotics of Performance. Translated by A. O'Healy. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 229n2

¹⁰ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.9

¹¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.129-135

¹² Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 299n1

¹³ Carlson 1984: 124-125

¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 125-126

¹⁵ Theatre Database 2007, http://www.theatredatabase.com/17th_century/john_dennis.html, reprinted from W. Davenport Adams 1904, A Dictionary of Drama, J.B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, accessed 10 August, 2007.

¹⁶ Hindson and Gray 1988: 128

¹⁷ Theatre Database 2007.

¹⁸ Sidnell 1991: 299n1

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 129

²⁰ Carlson 1984: 122

²¹ Carlson 1984: 122-3

²² Carlson 1984: 123

-
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 122
- ²⁴ Published by Hodges, John (ed) 1964, Letters and Documents, London; excerpts reprinted in Sidnell 1991: 299-304.
- ²⁵ Sidnell 1991: 299
- ²⁶ Congreve 1991/1696: 300-304
- ²⁷ Jeremy Collier 1698, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, London, p. 1; in Carlson 1984: 123.
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 123-4. See Rose Anthony 1937, The Jeremy Collier Stage Controversy 1698-1726, Milwaukee, for an extended view.
- ²⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 299
- ³⁰ Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 164-5
- ³¹ Sidnell 1994: 20n4
- ³² Farquhar 1967, Works, New York, Vol. 2, p. 335-6, 343; in Carlson 1984: 126-7.
- ³³ Published in Kenny, Shirley Strum (ed) 1971, The Plays of Richard Steele, Oxford; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 17-18.
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 127
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 128-131
- ³⁶ According to Carlson (1984: 132), the first of these to be successful was Aaron Hill's Fatal Extravagance (1721) – produced two years after Steele advanced the idea in The Tatler No 172 (1710).
- ³⁷ Sidnell 1994: 16
- ³⁸ Steele 1994/1723: 17
- ³⁹ Steele 1994/1723: 18
- ⁴⁰ Quoted in Wasserman 1947: 266
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 128
- ⁴² Hindson and Gray 1988: 128
- ⁴³ Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164. 146
- ⁴⁴ Shaftesbury 1711, I. 129-30, 131-2, 136; in Bate 1945: 149-50.
- ⁴⁵ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 9
- ⁴⁶ Pedicord, Harry W. 1980. 'The Changing Audience'. In The London Theatre World 1660-1800, edited by R. D. Hume. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, pp. 236-242. 242
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 142
- ⁴⁸ Wasserman 1947: 266
- ⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 139
- ⁵⁰ Hundert 1994: 165
- ⁵¹ Wasserman 1947: 266-7
- ⁵² Hill 1746, in Wasserman 1947: 267

-
- ⁵³ Wasserman 1947: 267
- ⁵⁴ Gerrard, Christine 2003, Aaron Hill: The Muses' Projector 1685-1750, Oxford University Press.
- ⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 133
- ⁵⁶ Du Bos quotes Lucretius to support this argument
- ⁵⁷ Du Bos 1733, Réflexions critiques, Paris, Vol 1, p. 148; in Carlson 1984: 143.
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 142-3
- ⁵⁹ Hundert 1994: 148
- ⁶⁰ Hundert 1994: 149
- ⁶¹ Gaiger, Jason. 2000. 'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste'. European Journal of Philosophy 8 (1) pp. 1-19.2
- ⁶² Gaiger 2000: 3-4
- ⁶³ Du Bos 1993/1715, Réflexions critiques, Paris, énsb-a; in Gaiger 2000: 12.
- ⁶⁴ Gaiger 2000
- ⁶⁵ Both the Preface to Oedipus and the letters which accompanied the first edition (1719) and the Discours are published by Louis Moland (ed) 1877, Oeuvres complètes, Vol II, Paris; excerpts translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 20-30.
- ⁶⁶ Voltaire 1877-1885, Oeuvres, Paris, Vol 4, p. 505; in Carlson 1984: 147.
- ⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 149
- ⁶⁸ Voltaire 1994/1736: 27
- ⁶⁹ Each play written in these years was prefaced by a Discours.
- ⁷⁰ La Motte 1753-54, Oeuvres, Vol 4, p. 182; in Carlson 1984: 144.
- ⁷¹ Sidnell 1994: 11
- ⁷² Hundert 1994: 165
- ⁷³ Yates, Frances A. 1969. Theatre of the World. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul Ltd.201ff
- ⁷⁴ Quoted on www.shauspiel-in-deutschland.de/hm/historie.schtheorien.lang.htm accessed 10/03/2009
- ⁷⁵ Mayne 1728: 74, in Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164.149n15.
- ⁷⁶ in Bate 1945: 149
- ⁷⁷ Bate 1945: 149
- ⁷⁸ Carlson 1984: 165-6
- ⁷⁹ Published in Brunelli, Bruno (ed) 1951, Tutte le opera di Pietro Metastasio, Milan; translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 31-34.
- ⁸⁰ Sidnell 1994: 31
- ⁸¹ Metastasio 1994/c1730: 31-4

Table 11/51 Theories of Theatre 1731-1750

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1730's in England saw the emergence of a new form of theatre, designed as a parody of Italian opera, the ballad opera, introduced by John Gay's The Beggar's Opera (1728). The form used spoken dialogue interspersed with songs set to contemporary melodies and featured characters from the 'lower' levels of life.¹ A similar form, the opéra comique, developed in France out of the popular fairground theatre, partly as an attempt to get around the monopoly on theatre imposed by the Comédie Française and the opera.² Because of the restrictions on what could be performed, actions were often mimed, with speeches written on signs which were held up in front of the spectators. Performers would be planted in the audience to encourage the spectators to sing the dialogue.
The London Merchant (1731)	George Lillo (c1693-1739) English playwright and tragedian	The end of tragedy is solely moral, hence does not have to be confined to characters of high rank or nobility. The London Merchant is his most famous expression of this belief, but would now be considered a melodrama. ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Moral education through verisimilitude	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy)
Preface to Le glorieux (1732)	Nericault Destouches (1680-1754) French dramatist	First major theoretical justification of the comédie larmoyante (tearful comedy – equivalent to the English sentimental drama): comedy had a moral obligation 'to correct manners, to expose the ridiculous, to condemn vice, and to put virtue into such a favourable light as to attract the esteem and veneration of the public'. The appearance of this kind of comedy, with this kind of purpose marked the beginning of the merging of tragedy and comedy, at least in emotional tone. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Correction of manners	Doing: playwrighting (comedy) Showing: the ridiculous, vice and virtue
Prologue to La fausse antipathie (1733); Critique de la fausse antipathie (1734)	Pierre Nivelle de La Chaussée (1691-1754) French dramatist	Successful playwright of the new sentimental comedies known as comédie larmoyante . In the Prologue, the Genius of the Comédie finds herself paralysed by the conflicting demands of the public, and although La Chaussée's new play seems to offer a solution, she claims she would have preferred 'a better made fable, a little more of the comic, a clearer plot'. The Critique , written in response to criticism of La fausse , contains characters who denounce the work or insist it belongs to someone else. Finally, a character declares it a new genre: épi-tragi-comique . This new style of comedy, which was seen to furnish 'useful lessons' was very popular, inspiring Voltaire to ameliorate his view of comedy to the extent of writing some himself. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction through comedy	Doing: playwrighting (comedy)
'Pensées sur la declamation'	Luigi Riccoboni (1676-1753) Italian actor and	Condemned French acting style as studied and artificial, recommending that actors 'capture' the proper tone through 'feeling' what they said, thus giving 'illusion to the spectators'. The major goal of the stage was the creation of illusion. ⁶ What was required	An historical practice; a place where	The creation of illusion	Doing: acting – passion not technique

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1738); Historical and Critical Account of the Theatre in Europe (1741)	writer	of the actor was ‘an ecstasy of the soul ... When this transformation of personality is achieved, appropriately heightened actions and speech will automatically arise’. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory/anti-French theatre View of Theatre: positive	plays are staged
An Apology for the Life of Mr Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740)	Colley Cibber (1671-1757) English actor and dramatist	Cibber responded to the demand for a moral theatre by placing the Restoration rake in a plot which led to his remorse and reform. ⁸ In Apology , he tried to account for comedy (farce). He felt that tragedy’s effects could be easily explained ‘but it may sometimes puzzle the gravest spectator to account for that familiar violence of laughter that shall seize him, at some particular strokes of a true comedian. How then shall describe what a better judge might not be able to express? The rules to please the fancy cannot so easily be laid down, as those that ought to govern the judgment’. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Moral education	Doing: plays (tragedy and comedy)
Vergleichung Shakespeare und Andreas Gryphius (1741); Schreiben von Errichtung eines Theaters in Kobenhagen (1746); Gedanken zur Aufnahme des dänischen Theaters (1746)	Johann Elias Schlegel (1719-1749) German theorist, critic and poet	A pupil of Gottsched. Wrote extensively and influentially on the theatre, introducing the first appreciation of Shakespeare in German (1741). Schreiben dealt with practical theatre management, while Gedanken dealt with dramatic theory and repertoire. Schlegel emphasized pleasure rather than moral instruction, arguing (in a telling rebuke of academic theory of this most practical of arts which would please many modern theatre practitioners) that ‘[a] play upon which much art has been lavished but which lacks the art of pleasing belongs in the study and not on the stage’. ¹⁰ The emphasis on pleasure led to a rejection of verisimilitude and the unities, except where they form part of the conventions which aid the production, for example, ‘when the unities of time and place are observed, the spectator can give his undivided attention to the plot, the characters, and the emotions’. ¹¹ Internal consistency and believability of plot are more important – hence an emphasis on the art of theatre. Schlegel proposed a spectrum of dramatic genres similar to that developed by Diderot, based upon effect and the types of characters. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place in which dramas are performed; national institutions	To provide pleasure to spectators	Doing: playwrighting (performance)
The History of	Thomas	A contemporary acting treatise. The stage was conceived as a tableau vivant on which		To express	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the English Stage (1741)	Betterton (c1635-1710) English actor and writer	actors drew upon a standardized gestural “language” in order to express the passions. Actors had to master the rules of posture and tone and above all, command their faces according to set rules known to spectators; ¹² what was required was decorum – the appropriateness of gesture to emotion. Betterton particularly praised Mrs Barry for her ability to weep: ‘This is being thoroughly concern’d, this is to know her Part, this is to express the Passions in the Countenance and Gesture’. ¹³ However, he believed that a great actor, having mastered his part could leave his actions ‘to nature’ since the passion would necessarily follow. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		through gesture	acting/performing on the stage – a tableau vivant ; technique not passion
Joseph Andrews (1742); Tom Jones (1749); ‘An Essay on the Knowledge and of the Characters of Men’	Henry Fielding (1707-1754) English dramatist and novelist	Fielding began as a playwright, but the closure of the theatres led to him taking up prose writing. He pioneered the genre he called ‘the comic prose epic’, which he saw in theatrical terms, addressing his readers as audiences or spectators and referring to his characters as actors. The aim of comedy (including the comic prose epic) was educative. It was a ‘physic for the mind’, which used stereotypes in order to reveal the deceit and hypocrisy underpinning affectation, teaching audiences to distinguish between the form of an action and its ethical import, thus allowing proper judgement of human actions by now ‘impartial spectators’. ¹⁵ Fielding, in his plays, used the device of the play within a play in order to distance the audience and prevent it from forgetting that it was in the theatre: ‘The theatrical stage is nothing more than a representation and ... an imitation of what really exists’ (Tom Jones Book VII, Chapter 1). ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place in which representations or imitations are presented	Moral education: a ‘physic for the mind’ (Fielding was possibly being ironic here)	Doing: plays (comedy) Showing: stereotypes revealed hypocrisy, deceit and affectation Watching: spectators needed distance in order to judge impartially
An Essay on Acting (1744)	David Garrick (1717-1779) English actor, playwright and theatre manager	One of the first writings on the general theory and art of acting. Acting is defined as ‘an entertainment of the stage’. Actors use ‘the aid and assistance of articulation, corporeal motions and ocular expression’ in order to imitate, assume or put on ‘the various mental and bodily emotions arising from the various humours, virtues and vices, incident to human nature’ because they know by observation and study ‘each humour and passion, their sources and effects’. ¹⁷ However, the art of acting is not simple imitation: the actors has ‘digested’ what he has seen, made judgments about what is required, perfected it and made it his own. Creative insight accompanied the working of the sympathetic imagination: ‘the greatest strokes of genius have been unknown to the actor himself, till		To affect the spectator	Doing: acting as an art: observation is the foundation of acting; technique not passion

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		circumstances, and the warmth of the scene has sprung the mind as it were, as much to his own surprise, as that of the audience. Thus I make a great difference between a great genius and a good actor. The first will always realize the feelings of his character, and be transported beyond himself; while the other, with great powers, and good sense, will give great pleasure to an audience' but never affect them.¹⁸ Garrick is also renowned for banishing spectators from sitting on the stage.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Watching: requires a separation from the stage
Treatise on the Passions (1747); Preface to Taste (1751)	Samuel Foote (1720-1777) English dramatist, actor, theatre manager	Similar in some ways to Hill's book, but aimed at spectators rather than actors, so that they could judge the accuracy of the actors' performances. The aim of comedy was to expose 'the follies and absurdities of men'.²⁰ By being aware of the correct forms of expression relating to each of the passions, spectators were in a better position to judge performance. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral education	Watching: informed and critical judgment required education
(Dispute in letters and articles over Commedia dell'arte with Gozzi 1748-1762); The Comic Theatre (1753) ²¹	Carlo Goldoni (1707-1793) Italian playwright and 'man of the theatre'	Goldoni began to move the Commedia from scenarios to fully scripted literary works. He argued that drama should be more realistic and less fanciful, and discouraged masks and improvisation. Drama should move towards 'character comedies' (social plays with characters with psychological depth). He engaged in a fifteen year quarrel with Carlo Gozzi over these reforms of Commedia, before moving to France to write for the Comédie Italienne in Paris.²² The Comic Theatre is 'a dramatized poetics of drama and an outline' of the reforms he proposed. In it he argues that 'character comedies have so improved everyone's taste that now even common people have definite opinions about whether a play is well or badly written'. He draws a distinction between French and Italian audiences – the former are content with a single character, but Italian spectators require all the characters in a play to be fully developed, and although 'plays have never had, and never will have, universal appeal. Nevertheless, when a play is good, most people like it, and when it is bad nearly everyone dislikes it'. Spectators become accustomed to more sophisticated theatre (than the improvisational commedia dell'arte) over time and come to appreciate it, although they still retain the capacity to enjoy improvisational theatre (which, in any case, requires different skills from the performers).²³ Goldoni 'used his reformed comedy to promote social criticism and progress'.²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-popular theatre View of Theatre: functional	The name of a cultural form which encompasses different kinds of forms and skills; a place	Education: 'to correct vice and ridicule bad customs'. ²⁵	Doing: poetry (drama; plays) Showing: realism Watching: spectators learn by watching more theatre and come to appreciate more sophisticated theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(Dispute in letters and articles over Commedia dell'arte with Goldoni 1748-1762); Ingenuous Dissertation and Sincere Account of the Origin of My Ten Tales for the Theatre (c1770) ²⁶	Carlo Gozzi (1720-1806) Italian playwright	Defended Italian culture against what he saw as corrupting influences. Instead of Goldoni's more realistic approach to commedia , which he thought made it 'mundane, banal, and meaningless', Gozzi proposed its development into a 'theatre of the fabulous, in which commedia would be transformed through a mixture of prose and poetry and a combination of improvised and planned actions'. ²⁷ He introduced Asian myths to western plays . He was utterly opposed to the everyday and realism, emphasizing the theatrical element in his productions. His work inspired the romantics of the early C19th and the nonrealistic theatre of the C20th. His play Turadot (1761) was made into an opera by Puccini and Prokofiev used his Love of Three Oranges (1761) as the basis of a ballet. ²⁸ 'I am not so shameless as to call ignorant plebeians the noble spectators of improvised comedies, for I have seen with my own eyes that they are the same spectators that attend representations of premeditated plays ... What makes entertainment successful is the number of people that attend it , and written works meant to be staged have always fallen short of their intended lives, inducing boredom in a very short time'. ²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A place; a cultural institution	entertainment	Doing: 'fabulous' plays (both improvisation -al and 'pre-meditated') Showing: the fantastic Watching: a play can be considered successful if it attracts large numbers of spectators
An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748); An Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals (1751) 'Of Tragedy' (1757); 'Of the Standards of Taste' (1757).	David Hume (1711-1776) Scottish philosopher	Hume was concerned with psychology: why painful events give us pleasure in the theatre. Hume drew on Descartes' theories, in contrast to Burke (see below) who drew on Hobbes. He also cited Du Bos with approval. However, since unpleasant events in life do not generally give us pleasure, he agreed with Fontanelle's suggestion that the controlling element provided in the theatre was the knowledge that we were witnessing a fiction . This knowledge allowed the spectator to convert passions aroused by tragic events into feelings of enjoyment because of the success of the work of art. In this, Hume anticipated the aesthetics of Kant and the romantics: the idea that art offers its own realm of experience and generates new feelings, which are attained through the distancing power of art . This view is almost diametrically opposed to the adherence to verisimilitude, which was still being promoted by Lillo. Hume also argued in his discussion of taste , that 'while what made art great was a matter of opinion, some opinions were better than others because their holders had more experience of the works' and the conventions which underpinned them, and so could make 'finer and more justifiable discriminations'. ³⁰ Our opinions of what is pleasing come from the sentiment of approbation which is stirred in our imaginations when we apprehend beauty and	A place in which communication occurs between actor and spectator	Interaction; affect through representation	Doing: poetry/drama (tragedy); acting: actors are animated by the spectators Watching: spectators are emotionally stirred by performances in the theatre, but are nevertheless psychologic-

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		agreeable qualities.³¹ Theatre offers a form of communication between actor and spectators which animates the actors, raising them ‘to a degree of enthusiasm which they cannot command in any solitary ... moment’ and ‘as it were by magic’, is transmitted to the spectators who become ‘inflamed with all variety of passions’ according to the ‘personages of the drama’.³² It is ‘the business of poetry to bring every affection near to us by lively imagery and representation, and make it look like truth and reality’ because ‘our minds are disposed to be strongly affected’ by reality. ‘In every judgement of beauty, the feelings of the person affected enter into consideration, and communicate to the spectator similar touches of pain or pleasure’³³ via an act of sympathetic imagination. Taste, unlike reason, giving rise to happiness or pain, can become ‘a motive to action, and is the first spring or impulse to desire and volition’.³⁴ People have an endless capacity to mix reality and fiction for a variety of reasons: ‘Nothing is more free than the imagination of man; and though it cannot exceed that original stock of ideas furnished by the internal and external senses, it has unlimited powers of mixing, compounding, separating, and dividing these ideas, in all the varieties of fiction and vision. It can feign a train of events, with all the appearance of reality, ascribe to them a particular time and place, conceive them as existent, and paint them out to itself with every circumstance that belongs to any historical fact, which it believes with the greatest certainty. Wherein, therefore, consists the difference between such a fiction and belief?’³⁵ Hume’s theory of taste does allow for reason to interact with sentiment to further the development of the aesthetic sense,³⁶ but he also wants to retain a privileged position for the expert. Hume identifies what he calls the paradox of taste: we recognize that judgments based on feeling are highly subjective, but we also are prepared to argue for one view rather than another on the basis of some objective standard: we accept that some artistic creations are better than others for a variety of objective reasons. Hume accounted for the variations in taste by considering that sometimes judgments of taste were distorted by one or more of five ‘defects’: want of delicacy of imagination; lack of practice in a particular art; failure to draw comparisons; prejudice or the want of good sense.³⁷ Most of these were susceptible to education and or experience, but made expert valuations necessary. A work could be considered valuable if there was consensus about it amongst experts. (Gaiger considers that Hume’s argument as it stands lead to a vicious circle. He proposes a way out of this, using Hume’s five defects as attributes which anyone can acquire).³⁸ There is some			ally distanced so that they can appreciate the art as well as enjoy it. The imagination is free and freely mixes fiction and reality, so the line between a fiction and belief is blurred. Judgment can be distorted by certain natural or dispositional ‘defects’ most of which can be remedied through education and/or experience.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		evidence that Hume had access to the work of Du Bos, which had been translated into English in 1748, and may have been influenced by it, although his is a considerably deeper theory. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
Although not having an explicit theory of the theatre, a number of the group which has come to be called the ‘Scottish Common Sense School’ drew on Hume to argue for the central role of imagination in the acquisition of knowledge, particularly with regard to the association with others: ‘the imagination, by an effort of sympathetic intuition, is able to penetrate the barrier which space puts between it and its object’.³⁹ Some, such as Adam Smith, explicitly linked this to a moral sense or ethics, while others (such as Shaftesbury, Hutcheson and Burke), linked sympathy with morals through taste or aesthetics. Imaginative insight allowed a ‘sympathetic identification’ with others. Smith stressed that sympathy was unable to function without the aid of imagination: ‘As we have no immediate experience of what other men feel, we can form no idea of the manner in which they are affected, but by conceiving what we ourselves should feel in the like situation. Though our brother is upon the rack, as long as we ourselves are at our ease, our senses will never inform us of what he suffers. They never did and never can carry us beyond our persons, and it is by the imagination only that we can form any conception of what are his sensations ... By the imagination we place ourselves in his situation’.⁴⁰ Bate says that Smith’s book ‘elaborated and in a sense crystallized a fundamental premise’ which had come to be accepted as a ‘critical tenet’ by this group of theorists, and which later developed into a ‘doctrine’ of aesthetics. Some writers of the time recognized Smith’s work for this. Since all these theories are predicated on a spectator (implied or explicit), one could argue that what these theorists are suggesting is a theory of spectatorship, and further, that the theatre (which many of them attended regularly) provided an opportunity to exercise this vital faculty, the imagination. If the link which they draw between imagination, sympathy and our moral sense or ethics is accepted, then the long-standing claim that theatre teaches in some way (usually undefined) can be seen to be in some way vindicated. Theorists such as Gerard and Lord Kames developed this link between sympathy and imagination by explicitly acknowledging the dramatist or poet as a spectator on two levels. Provided he remained at the level of description, he remained a dispassionate observer, but when his observations were guided through imagination and sympathetic identification, these writers were able to provide more than mere description; they provided a representation of the passion felt by the character which seemed natural to us, and which therefore also led us to identify and sympathise with the character. Thus the process becomes a dualistic one between the poet/dramatist as initial observer, then sympathetically involved spectator, leading the audience as a removed spectator towards an experience as if it were first-hand, turning them from a dispassionate observer to an engaged one. Shakespeare is generally regarded by these theorists as an ‘outstanding example of the power of entering an object of contemplation, and of “representing” rather than “describing”’ such that we are able to sympathise with what has become for us a ‘natural’ character.⁴¹
Lettre sur la comédie (1749)	Jean Gresset (1709-1777) French poet and playwright	Gresset was a poet and playwright who renounced the theatre on religious grounds. His Lettre dismissing arguments for the utility of drama as sophistic and claiming that ‘the sanctuary and the theatre’ were ‘absolutely unreconcilable’ was targeted at Diderot and was widely read. ⁴² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre/anti-Diderot View of Theatre: negative	A place; an institution	Non-utilitarian	Doing: the practice of theatre; comedy
Le Comédien (1749)	Pierre Rémond de Sainte-Albine (1699-1778)	An extended treatise on acting which took the position of Luigi Riccoboni (1738), that actors should feel the emotions they were expressing . Like Foote (above 1747), Sainte-Albine wanted to bring some order to the art of acting. He argued that actors have some natural ‘emotional gifts’ (wit, feeling and enthusiasm) as well as physical attributes which		To show truth through presentation	Doing: Acting as an art involves the use of the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	French historian and dramatist	should lead them to undertake roles appropriate to those gifts (heroes have imposing bodies and are capable of deep feeling; lovers are attractive; comics have the gift of gaiety and wit). The goal, ‘as always’ is verisimilitude, interpreted as ‘truth in presentation’, with a general application of Horace’s principle of decorum.⁴³ In Chapter 12, Sainte-Albine turns to the ‘modern’ question of the spectator. He distinguishes between the ‘average’ spectator (who will be satisfied with his recommendations regarding verisimilitude and decorum) and the spectator with ‘taste and discernment’. These spectators require not just verisimilitude and decorum but evidence of ‘art’ as well: ‘In their judgment, there is between acting which is natural and true and that which is ingenious and delicate the same difference as between the book of a man who has only knowledge and good sense and the book of a man of genius. They require the actor not only to be a faithfully copier, but that he be a creator as well.’⁴⁴ The book was brought to England by John Hill, who extensively paraphrased it for his book The Actor (1750). According to Wasserman, it is the first fully developed theory of the sympathetic imagination in acting.⁴⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional			emotions Showing: truth in presentation; decorum Watching: different kinds of spectators require different kinds of things from the theatre. Sophisticated spectators require an aesthetic as well as an affective experience
The Actor (1750; revised 1755)	John Hill (1716-1775) English actor (failed), doctor, botanist and writer	A translation (and loose paraphrase) of Sainte-Albine’s treatise, with English examples which was the first fully developed theory of the sympathetic imagination in acting as a critical principle.⁴⁶ Hill stressed the emotionality of the actor: the actor was to be completely emotionally absorbed in the feelings of the character: ‘More is required than to understand the author perfectly; the actor is to be in some degree an author himself’.⁴⁷ The actor was to be like ‘soft wax’ the more easily to be moulded.⁴⁸ Nevertheless, ‘Nature gives sensibility to the player, but experience is the great guide to him how he is to use it’, although in a great actor nature and art were so interrelated they were hardly distinguishable.⁴⁹ This did not mean, however ‘particularized realism’. Hill believed ‘that people go to a play to see imitations, not realities’.⁵⁰ The book stimulated reactions from critics who believed that the art of acting involved a rational and technical component as	A place where people go to see plays and fine acting	Performance; imitation	Doing: acting was an art and craft which involves the emotions Showing: Verisimilitude Watching: people go to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		well (see Diderot and Boswell below). Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			the theatre to see imitations and appreciate good acting
L'art du theatre à Madame xxx (1750)	Antonio Francesco Riccoboni (1707-1772) Italian poet and dramatist	Took issue with his father's 1738 theory of acting: 'an actor who actually felt the emotions of his part would be unable to act. His goal [was] to understand fully the natural reactions of others and to imitate them on stage through complete control of his expression'. ⁵¹ (This idea is fully developed by Diderot in Paradoxe – see below). Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti emotion based acting theory View of Theatre: positive	A place in which the art of acting is displayed	Imitation	Doing: acting an art involving control and technique
The Rambler No 4 (1750); ⁵² The Rambler No 60 (1750); The Rambler No 156 (1751); Preface to his edition of Shakespeare's works (1765); ⁵³ Lives of the English Poets (1780) ⁵⁴	Samuel Johnson (1709-1784) English lexicographer and critic	Essential theorist. Johnson also attacked the rigidity of the French neo-classicists: '[s]ome [rules] are to be considered as fundamental and indispensable, others only as useful and convenient; some as dictated by reason and necessity, others as enacted by despotick antiquity; some as invincibly supported by their conformity to the order of nature and operations of the intellect; others as formed by accident, or instituted by example, and therefore always liable to dispute and alteration'. ⁵⁵ The first principle of dramatic criticism was that ' the drama's laws the drama's patrons give '. ⁵⁶ We should avoid 'the cant of those who judge by principles rather than by perception'. ⁵⁷ Every writer must distinguish between which were rules of custom (and therefore changeable) and which were rules of nature (which must be upheld). Among the rules of custom were included the unity of time, the five-act structure and the limitation on the number of speaking characters. Among the rules of nature were unity of action and the single dominant hero. In his Preface, Johnson argues that mixed drama (the mixing of comic and tragic elements) instructs best because it most closely represents the way the world works. ⁵⁸ It was on this basis that he agreed with Addison on the issue of poetic justice: '[s]ince wickedness often prospers in real life, the poet is certainly at liberty to give it prosperity on the stage. For if poetry is an imitation of reality, how are its laws broken by exhibiting the world in its true form?'. ⁵⁹ He also approved of the trend towards domestic tragedy, since ' [w]hat is nearest us, touches us most '. ⁶⁰ Johnson agreed with Colley Cibber that farce seemed impossible to analyse: 'Nothing is more hopeless than a scheme of merriment'. ⁶¹ On Garrick's death, he wrote that death had 'eclipsed the gaiety of	A place ; a practice: theatre is not life – it is a selection and culling of life	To select and cull aspects of life for 'Harmless pleasure' and moral instruction: 'the end of poetry is to instruct while pleasing'. ⁷⁷	Doing: drama - acting was an art of the intellect which did not involve identification with the character: the writer had a duty to make the world better; writing was a process of selection Watching: equivalent to reading. Spectators did not take

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		nations, and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure'.⁶² In particular, he challenged the rules for their suggestion that audiences would otherwise take what they saw for reality. They were not only contradicted by common sense but also by our experience in reading: 'It is time therefore to tell [the critic] by the authority of Shakespeare, that he assumes, as an unquestionable principle, a position which ... his understanding pronounces to be false. It is false, that any representation is mistaken for reality; that any dramatic fable in its materiality was ever credible, or, for a single moment, was ever credited ... The truth is, that the spectators are always in their senses, and know, from the first act to the last, that the stage is only a stage, and that the players are only players',⁶³ otherwise, they would demand that Garrick be hanged for his portrayal of Richard III. Johnson defended the theatre as an art on moral grounds.⁶⁴ In fact, '[t]he delight of tragedy proceeds from our consciousness of fiction; if we thought murders and treasons real, they would please no more ... Imitations produce pain or pleasure, not because they are mistaken for realities, but because they bring realities to mind'.⁶⁵ 'A play read, affects the mind like a play acted. It is therefore evident that the action is not supposed to be real'.⁶⁶ 'The chief advantage these fictions have over real life is that their authors are at liberty, though not to invent, yet to select objects, and to cull from the mass of mankind those individuals upon which that attention ought most to be employed; as a diamond, though it cannot be made, may be polished by art, and placed in such a situation as to display that lustre which before was buried among common stones. It is justly considered as the greatest excellency of art to imitate nature; but it is necessary to distinguish those parts of nature which are most proper for imitation: greater care is still required in representing life ... If the world can be promiscuously described, I cannot see of what use it can be to read the account; or why it may not be as safe to turn the eye immediately upon mankind as upon a mirror which shows all the presents itself without discrimination'.⁶⁷ Delusion was a 'state of irrational ecstasy ... the audience is fully conscious that it is observing on the stage actors who are imitating reality, and is moved only because the dramatic scene provokes the image-making faculty to conjure up the potentiality of the spectator's participation in a similar scene, and not because the sufferings and joys of the actors appear real ... the actor is merely one who recites a certain number of lines "with just gestures and elegant modulation"'.⁶⁸ Nevertheless, if the stage 'be truly the mirror of life, it ought to show us			what they saw for reality; they remained aware they were in the theatre; however, what they saw reminded them of reality, which is why theatre could produce pain or pleasure. It is imagination coupled with sympathy which allows this to occur. Curiosity keeps us interested. Johnson acknowledged himself as a spectator/reader although he did not

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		sometime what we are to expect'.⁶⁹ Shakespeare, in particular, was capable of making the audience 'anxious for the event'. Curiosity compels us to keep watching (or reading).⁷⁰ Although Johnson distrusted the imagination,⁷¹ he nevertheless saw a role for it in eliciting sympathy through 'the portrayal of the universally, familiarly known':⁷² 'All joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination, that realizes the event ... by placing us, for a time, in the condition of him whose fortune we contemplate; so that we feel ... whatever motions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves'.⁷³ Gerould says that it is doubtful whether Johnson saw many plays well-performed. He attended infrequently, and was totally ignorant of the practical side of the stage. He also had a low view of the theatrical profession.⁷⁴ On the other hand, Sidnell claims that 'he knew the theatre well' mostly because of his friendship with his former pupil David Garrick, who produced Johnson's only play Irene in 1749,⁷⁵ although Sidnell agrees that Johnson 'scarcely differentiates between the activities of the spectator and the reader of plays, declaring them ... to be much the same'.⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: ambivalent, functional			appear to attend the theatre often

¹ A contemporary example of the form was the Baz Luhrmann film Moulin Rouge (2001), starring Nicole Kidman and Ewan McGregor.

² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 314

³ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 133-4; 154

⁴ Destouches 1811, Oeuvres, Paris, Vol. 2, p. 308; Carlson 1984: 148.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 148

⁶ Carlson 1984: 159; Riccoboni 1738, Réflexions historiques et critiques sur les différents theatres de l'Europe, Paris, pp. 31, 34; in Carlson 1984: 159.

⁷ Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272. 266

⁸ Carlson 1984: 131

⁹ Colley Cibber 1968/1740, Chapter V, An Apology for the Life of Mr Colley Cibber, ed. B.R.S. Fone, Ann Arbor; in Styan 1975: 77.

¹⁰ Schlegel 1764-73, Werke, Vol. 3, p. 270; in Carlson 1984: 166.

¹¹ Schlegel 1764-73, Werke p. 293-4; in Carlson 1984: 166

¹² Hundert, E.J. 1994. The Enlightenment's Fable: Bernard Mandeville and the Discovery of Society. Edited by Q. Skinner, Ideas in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 165

-
- ¹³ Quoted in Wasserman 1947: 265
- ¹⁴ Wasserman 1947: 266
- ¹⁵ Hundert 1994: 161
- ¹⁶ Fielding, Henry. 1962/1749. 'A Comparison Between the World and the Stage'. In The History of Tom Jones. London: Heron Books, pp. 252-255.
- ¹⁷ David Garrick 1744, An Essay on Acting, in Toby Cole and Helen C. Chinoy (eds) 1954, Actors on Acting, New York, Crown, p. 133; cited in Hundert 1994: 165n137.
- ¹⁸ Garrick in Wasserman 1947: 269
- ¹⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 346
- ²⁰ Samuel Foote 1799, Works, London Vol 1: iii; in Carlson 1984: 136.
- ²¹ Miller, John W. (trans) 1969, The Comic Theatre, a Comedy in Three Acts, Lincoln; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 70-73.
- ²² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 322
- ²³ Goldoni 1994/1753: 70-73
- ²⁴ Sidnell 1994: 102
- ²⁵ Goldoni 1994/1753: 70
- ²⁶ Petronio, Giuseppe (ed) 1962, Opere: Teatro e polemiche teatrali, Milan; excerpt translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 103-4.
- ²⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 323
- ²⁸ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 323
- ²⁹ Gozzi 1994/c1770: 104
- ³⁰ Becker, Howard. 1982. 'Conventions'. In Art Worlds. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press, pp. 40-67.47
- ³¹ Hume, David. 1975/1751. 'An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals'. In Enquiries Concerning Human Understanding and Concerning the Principles of Morals, edited by P. H. Nidditch. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 267
- ³² Hume 1975/1751: 221-2
- ³³ Hume 1975/1751: 223-4
- ³⁴ Hume 1975/1751: 294
- ³⁵ Hume 1975/1748, Enquiries Concerning Human Understanding and Concerning the Principles of Morals, edited by P. H. Nidditch. Oxford: Clarendon Press: 47
- ³⁶ Gaiger, Jason. 2000. 'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste'. European Journal of Philosophy 8 (1) pp. 1-19.9
- ³⁷ Gaiger 2000: 12
- ³⁸ See Gaiger 2000
- ³⁹ Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164.144
- ⁴⁰ Smith, Adam. 2002/1790. The Theory of Moral Sentiments. Edited by K. Haakonssen. 6th edition ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- ⁴¹ Bate 1945: 148-157
- ⁴² Carlson 1994: 156
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 160
- ⁴⁴ Sainte-Albine 1749, Le comédien, Paris pp. 228-229; in Carlson 1984: 160.

-
- ⁴⁵ Wasserman 1947: 267
- ⁴⁶ Wasserman 1946: 267
- ⁴⁷ Hill 1755: 31 in Wasserman 1946: 264
- ⁴⁸ Hill 1750: 15-16/Wasserman 268
- ⁴⁹ Hill 1755: 84, 223 in Wasserman 1947: 270-1
- ⁵⁰ Hill 1755: 39 in Wasserman 1947: 270-1
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 159
- ⁵² All but seven of the 208 issues of The Rambler to appear between March 1750 and March 1752 were written by Johnson. An excerpt from No 4 is reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 75.
- ⁵³ Johnson 1851/1765, 'Preface to Shakespeare', The Works of Samuel Johnson Vol. II, NY, Harper and Brothers; excerpt reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 221-235 and in Sidnell 1994: 77-87.
- ⁵⁴ Waugh, Arthur (ed) 1959/1906, Lives of the English Poets, 2 vols., London; excerpt from Lives of the Poets: Addison reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 76.
- ⁵⁵ Samuel Johnson 1958-1978, Works, 14 volumes, new Haven, Vol. 5: 67; cited in Carlson 1984: 135.
- ⁵⁶ Cited in Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.229
- ⁵⁷ Cited in Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.119
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 135
- ⁵⁹ Samuel Johnson 1905/1780, Lives of the English Poets, 2 vols., London, Vol 2: 135; cited in Carlson 1984: 136; excerpt also reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 76. Johnson did not always stick to this view. He claimed to have been shocked by the virtuous Cordelia's death in King Lear, and preferred 'the ends of justice' to be observed if possible, although not at the expense of a play's effectiveness (Carlson 1984: 136).
- ⁶⁰ Johnson 1892, Letters, New York, Vol 1: 162 (1770); cited in Carlson 1984: 136.
- ⁶¹ Styan 1975: 77
- ⁶² Cited in Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 346
- ⁶³ Johnson 2000/1765: 231
- ⁶⁴ Wasserman 1947: 271
- ⁶⁵ Wasserman 1947: 232
- ⁶⁶ Johnson 1994/1765: 86
- ⁶⁷ Johnson 1994/1750: 75
- ⁶⁸ Wasserman 1947: 271
- ⁶⁹ Johnson 1994/1781: 76
- ⁷⁰ Wasserman 1947: 234
- ⁷¹ Havens, R.D. 1943. 'Johnson's Distrust of the Imagination'. ELH 10.
- ⁷² Bate 1945: 148

⁷³ Johnson 1750, The Rambler No 60, October 13; in Bate 1945: 148n12.

⁷⁴ Gerould 2000: 219-220

⁷⁵ Sidnell 1994: 74n3

⁷⁶ Sidnell 1994: 74

⁷⁷ Johnson 1994/1765: 81

Table 12/51 Theories of Theatre 1751-1760

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The dispute over whether great acting arose from the passions and was instinctive or whether it was as a result of artifice and intellect continued. Was illusion a fiction, or an authentic realization? The tradition (from Aristotle, Cicero, Quintillian and Horace) had been that ‘We weep and laugh as we see others do, He only makes me sad, who shews the way, and first is sad himself’ (Horace) i.e. ‘the performer should feel the emotion he portrays’, however, this was generally taken to mean the ability to show decorum – to provide the appropriate gestures and expressions for the emotion to be portrayed. In the development of the theory of sympathetic imagination, however, emotion itself ‘becomes the fundamental agent whereby the actor creates his role’, but there were different ideas about how and when this occurred: through the passions or the intellect; at the beginning of the process or the end; as a result of technique and study or through instinct and passion; part of control or a loss of control. ¹
Pro commoedia commovente (1751)	Christian Fürchtegott Gellert (1715-1769) German dramatist, poet and academic;	Gellert occupied the chair of poetry at Leipzig University after Gottsched. Also looked to French models, this time the comédie larmoyante , arguing that comedy instructed best when it aroused compassion. ² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction through the arousal of compassion	Doing: poetry (comedy)
Encyclopédie (1751-1759; 1765-1766): entry on Comédien (1753); Conversations on The Natural Son (1757); ³ Discours sur la poésie dramatique: essay accompanying the play Le pere de	Denis Diderot (1713-1784) French editor/writer critic, playwright	Essential theorist. The goal of theatre was ‘to stimulate virtue, inspire a horror of vice and expose folly’. Actors who did this were carrying out a valuable social task and should be respected and encouraged. Diderot produced works of striking originality, suggesting revolutionary reforms to the theatre e.g. the use of a split stage showing two scenes simultaneously in ‘Conversations on The Natural Son . These were largely ignored in his own time because of the controversy over the Encyclopédie and Rousseau’s essay, but subsequently had enormous impact. (Work on the Encyclopédie continued clandestinely. Diderot’s plays, with the exception of Le pere de famille (performed in 1761) and Le fils naturel (performed in 1771), were not performed but were nevertheless published and widely read). ⁶ Pleasure was more important than rules, although moral instruction remained the end of drama. The source of pleasure lay in the illusion of reality. Action was at least as important as words (Diderot urged that whole scenes be presented in pantomime): ⁷ ‘We talk too much in our plays, and consequently the actors have little chance to act. We have lost an art whose resources were well known to the ancients ... At any given moment do our gestures not correspond to our words’. ⁸ Diderot attacked almost every aspect of contemporary French theatre for its lack of verisimilitude: the inadequate stage space, the seating of spectators on the stage, the traditional settings, the	A place; a cultural form which involved the staging and enactment of plays before spectators; a way of behaving Theatre was not like life: events are ‘joined up’ by the dramatist to	Of a play – to deceive the audience; of drama in general - moral instruction through pleasure – a ‘valuable social task’; pleasure was derived from the creation of the illusion of reality. ³⁵ (NB an	Doing: poetry - all aspects of theatrical activity - acting, writing, staging, performance, use of psychology in playwrighting plays based on ‘roles’ aim: moral instruction; acting as a technical art; poets don’t

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
famille (1758); ⁴ Les bijoux indiscrets (1748); Paradoxe sur le comédien (1769; not published until 1830) ⁵		use of verse, the lack of freedom of expression given actors, limited and stylized stage movement: ‘visually and aurally ... Diderot [laid] the groundwork for the standard compositional practices of the modern stage’ in which observed reality formed the basis of verisimilitude:⁹ ‘The art of creating successful dramatic plots consists in joining the events in a way that will always provide intelligent spectators with a reason they find satisfying’.¹⁰ Diderot suggested a new genre midway between comedy and tragedy – the genre sérieux – which could best serve morality and verisimilitude. In this genre, plays would not be based on individual characters but upon social and familial roles (the politician, the citizen, the husband as the centre of the drama). In both The Natural Son and the Discours, Diderot proposed a formal system of genres which lay along a continuum with traditional or gay comedy (burlesque) at one end, then comédie sérieuse, followed by genre sérieux (now called the drame), finishing with traditional tragedy and ‘the marvellous’ at the other, although he also argued that ‘a play is never strictly confined to only one genre’.¹¹ He advocated a new form of drama suitable for and portraying the problems of the middle classes, a drame bourgeois: ‘new social roles are coming into being every day [and] there is possibly nothing we know less about than social functions, and nothing that should interest us more’.¹² This kind of drama would require greater realism both in stage presentation and acting. He wrote some plays in this genre. They were not very successful but his ideas had an enormous influence, especially his concept of ‘the fourth wall’ according to which spectators were able to observe the action in a room as if the fourth wall had been removed:¹³ ‘Whether you compose or act, think no more of the beholder than if he did not exist ... act as if the curtain never rose’ (Discours). This is a demand he also made of painting, preferring the tableau in which all those represented appeared not to know they were being watched: ‘I myself think that if a dramatic work were well written and well performed, the spectator would see as many real tableaux on stage as there would be in moments in the action that would make good paintings ...’.¹⁴ He particularly detested coup de théâtre, elements which drew attention to the contrived nature of either a play or a painting: the tableau was ‘a stroke of genius’, while a coup de théâtre was ‘an almost infantile piece of work ... The artist must find exactly why everyone would say in the same situation, so that all who hear it will immediately recognize it within themselves’. He also rejected the popular practice of the tirade addressed to spectators, which brought the play to a halt ‘as if [the playwright and	make up the plot in a satisfying way; theatre also generalises	assumption the spectators recognized the difference!).	feel like the rest of us; they are too busy with observing, considering, studying and imitating Showing: moral instruction through verisimilitude; truth to an ‘ideal’ model; the ‘real world’ Watching: Diderot saw himself as an ideal observer, but preferred to watch in secret (as he does in his play The Natural Son). The work of art was to be ‘impervious’ to the spectator, so

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the actor] had both left the stage and come down into the audience’, the practice of asides to spectators: ‘We have spared no effort to corrupt the drama’. Most of all, as a spectator, he did not want to be reminded ‘that I am sitting in a theatre, not a real event’.¹⁵ The Discours also contained a manual of playwriting, in which a key section is devoted to ‘manners’, repeating Diderot’s conviction (against Rousseau) of the moral utility of drama. Drama is useful in rooting out and exposing vices, prejudices and follies, something which governments would find useful: ‘The theatre is the only place where the tears of the virtuous and of the wicked are mingled. There the wicked takes umbrage at the kind of injustice they themselves may have committed, feel compassion for the kind of suffering they may have caused others, and are filled with indignation by a person whose character resembles their own ... the impression is received and remains indelibly within us, whether we like it or not. And the wicked leave their seats ... less inclined to wrongdoing than if they had been chastised by a harsh and unyielding moralist’.¹⁶ Rather than condemning theatre, it should be encouraged for its moral value.¹⁷ In a corrupt society, honest and serious people can ‘escape from the company of the evil companions who surround them by going to the theatre [where] they will find the kind of people [honest and serious] with whom they would like to live’.¹⁸ The Paradoxe was written in response to Sticotti’s 1769 essay on the art of acting. It marked a major change in Diderot’s ideas about acting, as a result of his studies of technical mastery in painting and sculpture and the visit by Garrick to Paris (1764) where he observed Garrick’s techniques in a drawing-room demonstration. Sympathetic feelings were now to be considered the source of mediocre acting and erratic, unreliable performance. What was required for great acting was the complete absence of sympathetic feeling: ‘The actor ... is still listening to himself at the moment when he disturbs your heart, and his whole talent consists not in feeling ... but in re-creating the external signs of feeling with such scrupulous accuracy that you are taken in by them’.¹⁹ Technique, calculation and craft were what were required to ‘imitate so perfectly the exterior signs of feeling that you are thereby deceived’. Art was therefore the ‘product of careful study and preparation’: the actor must ‘have in himself an unmoved and disinterested onlooker’. Truth in theatre was not truth to life but ‘the conformity of action, diction, face, voice, movement and gesture, to an ideal model imagined by the poet, and frequently exaggerated by the actor’.²⁰ Diderot required of the artist a detachment similar to the idea of the ‘romantic			that the spectator could behold in complete freedom without being a voyeur i.e. responsibility for avoiding voyeurism was to fall on the artist. Playwrights and actors had to be ‘cold, tranquil spectators’ so as to convey what they observed convincingly. Theatre (at least the kind of theatre Diderot was interested in) was a minority taste.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		irony' required of the artist by German romanticism. 'Great poets, great actors, and. I may add, all great imitators of nature, in whatever art ... are the least sensitive of all creatures. They are ... too busy with observing, considering, and imitating ... It is we who feel; it is they who watch, study, and give us the results'. 'I require of [the actor] a cold and tranquil spectator ... too engaged in observing, recognizing and imitating, to be vitally affected witnesses'.²¹ 'The stage is a resource, never a choice' according to Diderot. 'Nothing on the stage was the same as real life. The excesses of drama were not intended to inspire the audience but to deceive them'.²² 'The likeness of passions on the stage is not then its true likeness, it is but extravagant portraiture, caricature on a grand scale, subject to conventional rules ... What then is the true talent? That of knowing well the outward symptoms of the soul we borrow, of addressing ourselves to the sensations of those who hear and see us, of deceiving them by the imitation of these symptoms'.²³ According to Fried 'the Paradoxe amounts to a characteristically vigorous and unpredictable development of the notion, implicit from the first in the Diderotian concept of the dramatic tableau, of a radical separation between the point of view of the actor and that of the beholder'.²⁴ Implied in this radical separation was the total freedom of the beholder to read into the art work whatever they thought they saw, irrespective of the meaning intended by the artist or performer, epitomised by Diderot's response to Greuze's painting of a young girl with a dead bird: 'When one sees this picture, one says: delicious!' he says. Continuing in this vein, he talks himself into thinking he can read the thoughts of a real girl mourning over the loss of her virginity: 'There, there, my child, open your heart to me. Tell me the truth. Is the death of this bird really what makes you withdraw so firmly and sadly within yourself? ... You lower your eyes; you do not answer me ...'.²⁵ But to be able to have the freedom to do this, it is important that the work of art or dramatic piece does not acknowledge the beholder because to do so would interfere with the beholder's absorption. Thus the denial of spectatorship work on two levels: men of taste such as Diderot deny the impact of their scrutiny whilst the object of scrutiny appears to deny that it is looked at. This 'annihilation' of the audience and its effects was 'an obsessive concern' for Diderot (as it was for Shaftesbury, from whom Diderot 'borrowed', and for Defoe: 'Diderot's conception of painting [and drama] rested ultimately upon the supreme fiction that the beholder did not exist, that he [sic] was not really there'.²⁶ It was thus paradoxical,

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		because the painting or drama had to recognize that it was going to be beheld in order to structure itself as if it was not. Recognizing that it was to be beheld made the painting or drama theatrical (i.e. it acknowledged the spectator), which was the opposite of what Diderot was seeking for: absorption both within the work of art (characters related to each other rather than the beholder) and by the spectator. However, ‘the very condition of spectatordom, stands indicted as theatrical, a medium of dislocation and estrangement rather than absorption, sympathy, self-transcendence’. Diderot called for ‘a new sort of beholder ... whose innermost nature would consist precisely in the conviction of his absence from the scene of representation’ – a spectator who was not passive by any means but was invisible to himself and the work of art. Fried considers this to be ‘a profoundly different conception of the beholding self, one which narrows the scope of the work of art by eliminating experience, heightens the function of observation because the beholder looks within the work of art for evidence of his interpretation (the girl’s lost virginity was indicated by her down-cast eyes rather than Diderot’s experience of girls’ reactions) and an abstraction: the work of art is seen as autonomous.²⁷ This then is the beginning of an understanding of art that is purely aesthetic: its meaning lies within its internal relations. How different a conception of the spectator this is can be seen by comparing the art of the French with German artists of the same period e.g. Caspar David Friedrich. German art featured a figure with his back to the beholder, as if standing in for the beholder. Not only was the beholder acknowledged, but he was placed in a particular relationship to the work of art: ‘underlying ... the pursuit of absorption ... is the demand that the artist ... find a way to neutralize or negate the beholder’s presence, to establish the fiction that no-one is standing before the canvas [or curtain]’. The way to do this was to conceive of paintings as ‘dramas’ which totally involved the figures within the canvas, and to conceive of theatre as ‘dramas’ in which the audience formed the ‘fourth wall’. In other words, the dramatic rather than the theatrical conception of both painting and theatre was a way of negating the spectator. By appearing to be totally absorbed within itself, art and theatre freed the beholder, enabling him to also become absorbed, without concerning himself with what the painting or drama (artist or performer/writer) might actually be attempting to say to its audience, with his effect on the work of art or about what other spectators might see in him: ‘If an actor is seized by the desire for applause, he exaggerates. This affects the way another actor plays his part.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		There is no longer unity in his delivery of his lines, nor in the delivery of the entire play. Before long, I see no more than a noisy tumult on the stage, with each actor using whatever tone he or she feels like; I am overcome by boredom, I put my hands over my ears and make my escape'.²⁸ Diderot insisted on a number of occasions that he was 'inside the paintings' he talked about: 'Ah! My friend', he said to Grimm on viewing Louthembourg's 1763 painting Un Paysage avec figures et animaux, 'how beautiful nature is in this little spot! Let us stop there ... let us lie down next to these animals'.²⁹ Fried finds this paradoxical given that Diderot also insisted that the painting ignored the beholder, but it is not paradoxical if it is considered in the light of the freedom such a demand gives to the beholder. But this freedom he demanded for himself, to not be alienated or estranged from the work of art simply because he was a spectator, did not extend to others. He complained that a 1767 portrait by Louis-Michel Van Loo made him look like 'an old coquette' rather than absorbed in 'the labors of his deeply preoccupied mind',³⁰ a misrepresentation which Diderot blamed on the distraction caused by Van Loo's wife during the sitting! Portraiture indeed had difficulty meeting Diderot's demand for absorption because the genre was 'inherently theatrical' in the sense of being presented to a spectator.³¹ The 'condition of spectatordom' – 'the estrangement of the beholder from the objects of his beholding' – is transformed and thereby redeemed' by the fiction of there being no spectator (132). Nowhere was this better realised than in the history paintings of Jacques-Louis David (1748-1825) – which is ironical considering the role David played in the design and production of the revolutionary festivals. In general, the demand Diderot made of both art and theatre was that they create a world which was impervious to the spectator: 'If, when one makes a painting, one supposes beholders, everything is lost. The painter leaves his canvas, just as the actor who speaks to the audience steps down from the stage'.³² Diderot was the first to articulate the problematic relationship between work of art/theatre and beholder, although this consciousness was apparent in the number of works which featured blind subjects or characters i.e. figures who were unable to see that they were being seen. In the course of Diderot's life, art in France moved from an open acknowledgement of the beholder (figures in the canvas looked directly out; actors declaimed to and acknowledged the audience in the middle of a drama irrespective of the effect on the plot) to pretending there was no beholder (Chardin), to inviting the beholder to enter the picture by providing

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		a visual path to be followed unseen by those within the art work (Vernet) to providing a surrogate beholder within the canvas (the soldier in David's 1781 Bélisaire), to attempting to provide for multiple beholders as if the scene was three dimensional (David's 1785 Bélisaire), an attempt to collapse painting into drama itself. In each case, absorption was defined against theatricality, which was defined as a work that acknowledged the beholder as a voyeur. Absorption, on the other hand, negated the beholder, 'redeeming' him from voyeurism. (Diderot was not the only proponent of absorption). Diderot's discussion of contemporary theatre in comparison to ancient theatre with regard to spectators is illuminating in indicating how theatre had become a minority taste: 'Strictly speaking, there are no more public entertainments. There is no comparison between the audiences who attend our theatres for the most popular performances and those in Athens or Rome. Those ancient theatres could hold up to eighty thousand people ... But if the presence of a huge audience must have magnified the emotions felt by each spectator, imagine what an influence it had on the dramatists and on the actors! What a difference there is between providing entertainment for a few hundred people, on a given day, within certain hours, in some crowded, dimly-lit nondescript space, and holding an entire nation transfixed, on solemn national occasions, in the most magnificent buildings, and seeing these buildings surrounded and filled with vast numbers of people whose pleasure or boredom will depend on our talents alone!'"³³ [even though he didn't want performers to acknowledge spectators!]. Diderot's technique for detecting 'a dull or strained performance' in either the theatre or art was to block his ears and pretend he was watching mutes performing: gestures and facial expression should be consistent and express unambiguously all that was to be said. The test: was he as beholder persuaded of the work's dramatic and expressive unity. Nevertheless the work of art or dramatic piece had to seem to 'forget the beholder' and 'all interest [was to] be concentrated upon the personages within the drama or work of art.'³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre/theory View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional
Encyclopédie entries on drama (1751); comedy	Jean François Marmontel (1723-1799) French	Marmontel, like Voltaire, stressed the morality of the drama. The purpose of comedy was to encourage us to laugh at the flaws of others while determining to avoid those flaws in oneself: 'It has been found easier and more certain to employ human malice to correct the other vices of humanity' (Encyclopédie). Distinguished between three types of comedy:		Moral instruction through affect	Doing: drama - an historically contingent art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1753); décoration (1754) and tragedy (1765-66)	historian, poet and critic	comedy of character, which sought to render vice odious; comedy of sentiment which sought to make virtue loved and comedy of situation, which depicted men as playthings of events. All three were valuable. Marmontel condemned contemporary adherence to classical rules which ignored verisimilitude. In particular costumes should be suited to character and situation. He also condemned the neutral stage, which confined authors too rigorously to unity of space. Marmontel provided a history and an analysis of the genre of tragedy, using Aristotle and Corneille as 'two famous guides'. Tragedy was the representation of a heroic action calculated to arouse pity and terror with the aim of inspiring a hatred of vice and a love of virtue. There were differences between ancient and modern tragedies: ancient tragedies showed heroes suffering from fate/external causes; modern tragedies showed heroes suffering from the passions. The modern tragedy risked bringing the heroes too close, undercutting tragedy's power. Marmontel does not mention Diderot's new tragic genre, the drame , but does mention briefly tragique bourgeois which depicted the sufferings of people 'like ourselves'. He declined to consider this genuine tragedy. This was a common attitude taken by conservative critics of the time, and was to be challenged by Beaumarchais. ³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional
Encyclopédie entries on Acteur (1751) and Comédien (1753)	Abbé Edme-François Mallet (1713-1755) French Professor of theology	Mentioned the difference between the English and French treatment of actors: the English officially honoured their actors whilst the French scorned theirs (Both Diderot and Voltaire thought the English attitude superior). ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: academic			Doing: actors – treatment by society
The Lives and Characters of the Most Eminent Actors and Actresses (1753)	Theophilus Cibber (1703-1758) English actor, playwright and author, son of Colley Cibber	Cibber came down on the passion/instinct side of the debate over the art of acting, seeing it as an art rather than a craft: 'The Requisites to make either Painter , Poet , or Actor are in a great Measure the same'. ³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic: anti-technical view of acting View of Theatre: positive			Doing: acting – an art
1755: by this time, European theatres were being influenced by theories and ideas from Asia . Voltaire's play, Orphelin de la Chine had an oriental setting, and '[t]he women wore Chinese robes without hoops or ruffles or covering for their arms'. ³⁹ Also immensely popular were marionette shows. Goethe, Hugo and Craig all began their interest in theatre with marionettes, writing plays for them and putting on performances. ⁴⁰

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Reflections upon Theatrical Expression in Tragedy (1755)	Roger Pickering (d. 1755) English observer: a 'frequent Attender' of the theatre	Pickering declared at the beginning of his book that he was 'a Man of no Connection with any Theatre, but a frequent Attender upon our own; which I could wish to see raised above all Degree of Censure '. ⁴¹ He was particularly concerned about the low standing of actors and believed that the value of theatre for moral instruction could not be realised unless it was recognized that some members of the profession were moral and of good standing. The beginnings of the theory of sympathetic imagination applied to acting can be seen in Pickering's comment that: 'the Delicacy of Theatrical Expression can never be expected from an Actor that does not feel his Part', ⁴² however, the implications of this idea were not thought out; the idea continued to mean the use of decorum or appropriateness of expression. Purpose of Theorist: polemic- pro-theatre View of Theatre: functional	A place one attended to see actors perform	Moral instruction and 'improvement to our Minds and Hearts, by a well-directed Application to our Passions', ⁴³	Doing: acting: tragic acting requires considerable talent and accomplishments which should be respected
Treatise: An Essay on the Opera (1755/1767)	Francesco Algarotti (1712-1764) Italian connoisseur of the arts and sciences, philosopher and art critic	'The actors, instead of being so brought forwards, ought to be thrown back at a certain distance from the spectator's eye and stand within the scenery of the stage, in order to make a part of that pleasing illusion for which all dramatic exhibitions are calculated'. ⁴⁴ Algarotti was cited as an authority by Saunders (1790) in his efforts to 'force the actor ... behind the proscenium arch to create a picture'. ⁴⁵ He also believed that all parts of the production should come under one unifying 'poetic' idea, including the singing in operas. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		Aesthetic	Doing: staging: distance helped to create a unified picture Showing: a unified picture Watching: required distance
Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (1756); 'On Taste' (1757); 'Hints for an	Edmund Burke (1729-1797) English politician, writer and critic	Also concerned with psychology, drawing on Hobbes. Points out that people are also fascinated by public executions and the destructive effects of earthquakes and fires. The source of pleasure in tragedy has to do with not being under threat oneself, as Hobbes (after Lucretius) claims. However, it is not immunity itself which produces this pleasure. Such immunity is the precondition for taking 'delight in the sufferings of others, real or imaginary'. ⁴⁶ the distancing power of immunity. This does not necessarily mean, though that we will view horror with pleasure. We may view it with sympathy. We also experience pleasure from witnessing the skill which is involved in representation. With regard to beauty, our sense of beauty is a 'reactive faculty over which we have no	A place in which dramas were staged	Aesthetic; affective	Doing: drama (poetry) is an art; it is contrived or designed as a complete entity - 'the most artificial and

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Essay on the Drama' (c1765).		control': ⁴⁷ 'It is not by the force of long attention and enquiry that we find any object to be beautiful; beauty demands no assistance from our reasoning; even the will is unconcerned; the appearance of beauty as effectually causes some degree of love in us, as the application of ice or fire produces the idea of heat or cold'. ⁴⁸ In particular, it had nothing to do with rational considerations such as proportion. While Burke condemned 'tawdry stage effects', ⁴⁹ he believed 'no part of human life ... is exempted from comedy'. ⁵⁰ In the theatre, comedy was basically 'a satirical poem ... to excite laughter', while tragedy 'celebrated the dead [and] turned ... on melancholy and affecting subjects'. ⁵¹ Burke considered life to occur on a stage in the 'natural' theatre of the world (watched by both the world and by Providence). Actual drama was, by contrast, 'the most artificial and complicated of all the poetical machines' . ⁵² It was highly selective, choosing its parts according to the end it had in mind and, unlike life, 'avoiding ... the intermixture of any thing which could contradict it' or destroy its design. ⁵³ Thus what we might now call actual drama was considered by Burke to be contrived and designed, an artificial view of life. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive			complicated of all the poetical machines' ⁵⁴ Showing: an artificial and highly selective view of life (i.e. theatre is not life) Watching: psychological: the distancing power of immunity allows pleasure at the sight of horror, but we also appreciate skill
'City of Geneva – observations' in the Encyclopédie (1757)	Jean Le Rond D'Alembert (1717-1783) French philosopher and mathematician	Argued that Geneva was mistaken in outlawing theatre in order to protect its youth from corruption. Argued that actors were only immoral because they had been ostracized and wise regulation would establish theatre as a 'school of virtue for all of Europe'. ⁵⁵ Highly controversial entry which provoked Rousseau's famous Lettre à M. d'Alembert Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: functional	A cultural institution	Moral instruction through affect: a 'school' of virtue	Doing: plays
A Serious Enquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage: And a Letter	John Witherspoon (1713-1794) Scottish/ American clergyman and	Witherspoon indicted drama 'for being too truthful and, therefore, an "improper method of instruction". ⁵⁶ This reversal of Plato's criticism of the theatre became commonplace in theatre commentary in C19th century America.		Affect - the presentation of reality (enhanced reality: 'more real than real	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Respecting Play Actors (1757)	philosopher; a signer of the American Declaration of Independence	Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent		life')
Letter to M. D'Alembert (1758); De l'imitation théâtrale (1758); Preface to Narcisse (1752).	Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778) French playwright and philosopher	Essential theorist. Rousseau saw the development of the arts and sciences as a corruption of humankind, ⁵⁷ although Campbell and Scott (2005) argues that in the Discourse on the Sciences and Arts Rousseau ultimately contradicts this claim, coming to argue that the corruption of morals was the cause of the advancement of the sciences and arts and of their subsequent corruptive effects. This switch accounts for the paradoxical nature of the Discourse . ⁵⁸ Yet he also saw the imagination which was used in the arts as part of man's salvation. Imagination was both a human curse and the source of human salvation. It led men to both self-improvements and corruption. This was part of the human condition. ⁵⁹ The Letter was a significant statement about 'the uneasy relationship between culture and politics in modern society'. ⁶⁰ Rousseau was disturbed by the growing influence of Voltaire in Geneva, and set about defending the city. In De l'imitation he specifically appeals to Plato's Laws and the Republic . He was particularly concerned with the effect of theatre on its spectators. He drew a distinction between theatre and theatricality . Theatre does not have instruction as its central aim. It exists primarily to amuse, and therefore must flatter and please its spectators. At best, it might encourage those already virtuous, but is more likely to encourage vice. Rousseau dismisses Aristotle's idea of catharsis: 'The only instrument which serves to purge the passions is reason and ... reason has no effect in the theatre '. ⁶¹ Theatre simply numbs. Theatre corrupts because it deals in deception; actors (especially female actors) are known to be immoral, largely because they engage in deception and therefore cannot be trusted. It also encourages spectators to 'prefer the evil that is useful to us to the good that makes us love' (Letter). However, life is theatrical, and the theatricality of political life (festivals, rituals etc) encourages habits of obedience, so there should be 'many public festivals ... in the open air, under the sky'. '[A] civil polity, a bonded people, are themselves a play' (Letter). Underpinning Rousseau's condemnation of the theatre but endorsement of theatricality is an acknowledgement of the influence of show and a consequent concern with deception. The place that Rousseau gives to festival provided	a place; a cultural institution; a practice Rousseau wanted to collapse theatre into life	Corruption and pacification through deception; amusement through flattery (although the techniques of the theatre could be used in festivals to enhance social cohesion	Doing: plays Showing: The theatre is most likely to encourage vice because it is at heart deceptive. Watching: watching theatre led not to catharsis but to 'numbness'. It was bad for good men, but may protect bad men by rendering them incapable of action. Drama was 'a surrogate for action'. ⁷¹ Rousseau advocated communal festivals in

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the inspiration for the great festivals of the French Revolution and later communist regimes, and the populist theatre theories of C20th. Rousseau had been a contributor to Diderot's Encyclopédie and his letter was seen as a serious blow to the project. D'Alembert also withdrew, and the Encyclopédie was suppressed by royal decree in 1759. Honigsheim claims that Rousseau thought of himself as something of a composer. He composed a number of operettas, one of which, Le Devin du Village, can still be heard in recording.⁶² He tended to favour melodrama, the accompaniment of recitation and dramatic performance with music. This form of activity was well known before the French Revolution, but died out afterwards, appearing only occasionally in the recitatives used in operas such as Beethoven's Fidelio.⁶³ Rousseau considered that theatre only succeeded in its own time. It could not 'change sentiments and manners ... it can only pursue and embellish them ... the general effect of a theatrical entertainment is to enforce the national character, to augment the natural inclinations, and to give a new energy to all the passions of a people'. It followed, rather than led. Consequently, in London 'a play interests the audience if calculated to make them hate the French; at Tunis the prevailing passion is for piracy; at Messina for revenge; at Goa for the honor of burning a Jew'. Tragedies are said to incite spectators to pity, but this pity was only momentary and had no real bearing on life. Theatre patrons might continue to act without pity. If anything, 'whatever is represented on the stage is so far from being brought home to us that it is rather removed to a greater distance' so that 'the duties and obligations of life' become reduced 'to a few transitory affections'. Theatre has no public utility. In the theatre 'all is disproportionate, and we constantly see characters on the stage that are to be met with nowhere else. ... Dramatic productions ... have no other end than public applause.'⁶⁴ Rousseau's attitude towards the theatre was paradoxical, given that he was a successful playwright (and also used theatre as a metaphor). The problem he had, according to Barber, was not theatre as such but with the paradoxical nature of imagination: '[t]he real world has boundaries, the world of the imagination is infinite. Since we cannot enlarge the real one, we must restrict the imaginative one, since all suffering that makes us really miserable arises from the disparity between them' (Julie).⁶⁵ The theatre 'nourishes a silent conspiracy in imaginative self-deception, joined in by audience, actor, and dramatist [and] becomes a means to and an excuse for avoiding experience in the world'.⁶⁶ This is similar to the argument put by Augustine. Imagination underpins			which everyone was a participant

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		compassion, dependency and social harmony, but through the theatre, these aspects of imagination are numbed. Entertainment and instruction were incompatible in the theatre because illusion and entertainment lay ‘at its heart’. Theatre could ‘never do more than entertain’.⁶⁷ Theatre also corrupted, through affect, through simulations and pretense, the absence of reason and the need to please to be successful, and through inauthenticity and vicariousness which produced passivity.⁶⁸ Nevertheless, theatre may be ‘good for men who are bad’. The ‘Preface’ to Narcisse, which is somewhat deprecatory because Rousseau’s play had been a success at a time when he was moving away from theatre and urban life, emphasizes ‘theater’s palliative role in already corrupt societies’, an argument he had mentioned in passing in Letter but had not developed.⁶⁹ Rousseau seems to have become obsessed with overcoming the gap between the psychological self and the social self, the self as others know it. It is inevitable that someone with this obsession would turn their back on theatre or try to collapse theatre into everyday life. For Rousseau, theatre was problematic because it separates: spectators from life; spectators from each other (via the arrangement of seating); the parts of society (through the divisions it shows); spectators from participation (by the way it pacifies by keeping them ‘fearful, immobile in silence and inaction ... in a gloomy cavern’ (Lettre); spectators from performers (creating the binary of passive versus action: spectators are passive while performers are active).⁷⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemical – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative
1759: an endowment from a rich patron allowed the Comédie Française to ban spectators from sitting on the stage during performances
A General View of the Stage (1759)	Thomas Wilkes (fl. c1750’s) English: ‘An observer of theatre’	‘Acting is the most perfect of all the imitative Arts, as being made up of all that is beautiful in Poetry, Painting, and Music’.⁷² The perfect actor ‘must not only strongly impress [the character he portrays] on his own mind, but make a temporary renunciation of himself and all his connections in common life ...; forget, if possible, his own identity ... He must put on the character ... till his imagination, quite absorpt in the extensive idea, influences his whole frame’.⁷³ Wilkes commented on the interaction between performers and spectators. It was apparently ‘very common for young performers, the ladies in particular, in scenes which require the greatest exertion of the natural powers ... to bestow frequent side-glances on the audience, demanding their applause, more for their beauty of person or elegance of dress than for just their acting’.⁷⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – (anti-Diderot) View of Theatre: aesthetic		Expression; absorption	Doing: acting as an art - a renunciation of the self – passion not technique

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Essay on Taste (1759); Essay on Genius (1774)	Alexander Gerard (1728-1795) Scottish philosopher and writer	Gerard explored the difference between the ordinary poet and the great poet (dramatist) through the use of the idea of sympathetic identification driven by the passions which intuitively produced a ‘regularity’ by which the poet maintains his, and therefore our focus. The poet or dramatist is an observer of others. When his sympathy or ‘sensibility of heart’ awakens his passions, his imagination becomes like a magnet, selecting and gathering together ideas in such a way as to focus the attention of the essentials of the experience, bringing them to a ‘high pitch’, such that they reveal themselves ‘with inevitable naturalness’ or verisimilitude.⁷⁵ In such cases ‘the most distant hint is sufficient to direct the imagination’. For example, through Shakespeare’s use of this process ‘[w]e have a very natural and strong presentation of ... Lear’s grief and indignation’ (Essay on Genius), presented comprehensively, but with great economy. The ‘passion’ of the playwright, linked with his sympathy and imagination, has here intuitively directed our view ‘so powerfully and so constantly’ that we become entirely engrossed. However, where passion does not intuitively direct the poet, he remains a spectator, and instead of providing a ‘natural representation of the passion’ he provides only a ‘laboured description of it’.⁷⁶ Representation comes about as a result of sympathetic identification, whereas description remains ‘the inevitable effect of dispassionate observation’.⁷⁷ ‘In mimics this pliancy of fancy appears in a very great degree, though it be employed in an inferior province. Wherever it is possessed, a person’s thoughts are wholly moulded by the present design; he loses sight of himself, and is perfectly transformed into the character which he wants to assume’.⁷⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic- argument for a combination of rationality and emotion in playwrighting and acting View of Theatre: positive		Representation	Doing: poetry (drama) – the poet/dramatist is an observer of others. This is how he generates his art; similarly the actor conveys representations through a combination of art and feeling

¹ Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272.

² Carlson 1984: 167

³ Diderot 1757, published in Caput, Jean-Pol (ed) 1973, Le fils naturel et les Entretiens sur le Fils naturel, Paris; excerpt translated and reprinted in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.36-57.

⁴ Diderot 1758, published in Chouillet, Jacques and Anne-Marie (eds) 1980, Oeuvres complètes, 10 vols., Paris; excerpt translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 57-68.

-
- ⁵ Diderot 1883/1773-8, The Paradox of Acting, trans. Walter Herries Pollock, London, Chatto and Windus; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.198-201.
- ⁶ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.156
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 280
- ⁸ Diderot 1994/1757: 42-3
- ⁹ Carlson 1984: 154
- ¹⁰ Diderot 1994/1757: 37; Diderot cites Lillo's London Merchant as a model (Carlson 1984: 154).
- ¹¹ Diderot 1994/1757: 51
- ¹² Diderot 1757, in Gerould 2000: 197.
- ¹³ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 314. The idea of the fourth wall was especially taken up by André Antoine in his Théâtre Libre during the C19th.
- ¹⁴ Diderot 1994/1757: 40
- ¹⁵ Diderot 1994/1757: 41-54
- ¹⁶ Diderot 1994/1758: 59
- ¹⁷ Carlson 1994: 155
- ¹⁸ Diderot 1994/1758: 58
- ¹⁹ Diderot 1966, Diderot's Selected Writings, ed. L.G. Crocker, New York and London, p. 322.
- ²⁰ Diderot 2000/1773-8: 198-201
- ²¹ Diderot 1769; in Denning 1996: 121.
- ²² Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury. 176
- ²³ Diderot 1957/1769: 53
- ²⁴ Fried, Michael. 1980. Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot. Berkeley: California University Press. 220n142
- ²⁵ Diderot, Salons II in Fried 1980: 558
- ²⁶ Fried 1980: 101-103
- ²⁷ Fried 1980: 104
- ²⁸ Diderot 1994/1757: 44
- ²⁹ Salons I in Fried 1980: 119
- ³⁰ Cited in Fried 1980: 118
- ³¹ Fried 1980: 109
- ³² Diderot, Letter to Sophie Volland 18 July, 1762 in Fried 1980: 147-8
- ³³ Diderot 1994/1757: 48
- ³⁴ Diderot, Discours in Fried 1980: 94
- ³⁵ Diderot 1994/1757: 45
- ³⁶ Carlson 1994: 157
- ³⁷ Carlson 1994: 150

-
- ³⁸ Cibber 1773: viii in Wasserman 1947: 264
- ³⁹ From a journal entry by the critic Colle, quoted in program notes for a 2007 NIDA production of Marivaux's Games of Love and Chance (1730), directed by Aubrey Mellor.
- ⁴⁰ Gerould 2000
- ⁴¹ Pickering 2009/1755 Reflections upon Theatrical Expression in Tragedy: 8 - the book is available in electronic form through OpenLibrary: <http://openlibrary.org/details/reflectionsupont00pick>, accessed 10/03/2009
- ⁴² Pickering 1755: 3 in Wasserman 1947: 265
- ⁴³ Pickering 1755: 9
- ⁴⁴ Quoted in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 9
- ⁴⁵ Iain Mackintosh 1993, Architecture, Actor and Audience, London and New York, Routledge, p. 26; quoted in Blackadder 2003: 9.
- ⁴⁶ Burke, Edmund. 1808/1756. 'A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, with an Introductory Discourse concerning Taste, and several other Additions'. In The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke. Church-Yard, London: Law and Gilbert, for F.C. and J. Rivington, St Paul's, pp. 81-322.
- ⁴⁷ Gaiger, Jason. 2000. 'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste'. European Journal of Philosophy 8 (1) pp. 1-19.8
- ⁴⁸ Burke 1990/1757, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origins of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, ed. Adam Phillips, Oxford University Press; also in Gaiger 2000: 8.
- ⁴⁹ Melvin, Peter. 1975. 'Burke on Theatricality and Revolution'. Journal of the History of Ideas 36 (3) pp. 447-468.448
- ⁵⁰ Burke, Edmund. 1852/c1765. 'Hints for An Essay on the Drama'. In The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke. London/Philadelphia: F. & J. Rivington/electronic version available through Making of Modern Law.165
- ⁵¹ Burke 1852/c1765: 164
- ⁵² Burke 1852/c1765: 164
- ⁵³ Burke 1852/c1765:166
- ⁵⁴ Burke 1852/c1765: 164
- ⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 150
- ⁵⁶ Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press. 222n3
- ⁵⁷ Simon, Julia, ed. 1995. Mass Enlightenment: Critical Studies in Rousseau and Diderot. Albany: State University of New York Press.18
- ⁵⁸ American Journal of Political Science Volume 49 Issue 4 Page 818: 'Rousseau's Politic Argument in the Discourse on the Sciences and Arts'.
- ⁵⁹ Barber, Benjamin R. 1978. 'Rousseau and the Paradoxes of the Dramatic Imagination'. Daedalus 107 (3) pp. 79-92.
- ⁶⁰ Coleman, Patrick. 1984. Rousseau's Political Imagination: Rule and Representation in the "Letter à d'Alembert". Geneva: Droz.8
- ⁶¹ Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. 1773/1758. Politics and the Arts: Letter to M. D'Alembert on the Theatre. Translated by A. Bloom. Ithaca, New York: Cornell Paperbacks, Cornell University Press. 24-26
- ⁶² Barber 1978: 92n5
- ⁶³ Honigsheim, Paul. 1973. 'On Forms of Music and Forms of Society'. In Music and Society: the Later Writings of Paul Honigsheim, edited by K. P. Etzkorn. New York and London: John Wiley and Sons, pp. 201-230. 226. Melodrama has, of course, gone on to have a completely different meaning, now referring to the sensational and histrionic dramas with exaggerated characterizations and effects which were popular in the C19th.

-
- ⁶⁴ Rousseau 1758, Letter; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 204-218.
- ⁶⁵ Quoted in Barber 1978: 82-3.
- ⁶⁶ Barber 1978: 85
- ⁶⁷ Barber 1978: 85
- ⁶⁸ Barber 1978: 84-5
- ⁶⁹ Barber, Benjamin and Janis Forman 1978, 'Introduction: Jean-Jacques Rousseau's "Preface to Narcisse"', Political Theory 6(4), pp. 537-542. 539
- ⁷⁰ Butwin, Joseph. 1975. 'The French Revolution as Theatrum Mundi'. Research Studies 43 (3) pp. 141-152.
- ⁷¹ Barber 1978: 85
- ⁷² Wilkes 1759: 83, in Wasserman 1947: 264
- ⁷³ Wilkes 1759: 92 in Wasserman 1947: 268
- ⁷⁴ Wilkes 1759 in Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.128
- ⁷⁵ Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164.154-5
- ⁷⁶ Gerard 1774, 'Of the Influence of the Passions on Association', Essay on Genius; in Bate 1945: 156.
- ⁷⁷ Bate 1945: 156. This is a distinction which is shared by many of the Scottish critics, including Lord Kames (Bate 1945: 156).
- ⁷⁸ Gerard 1774: 241-2 in Wasserman 1947: 268

Table 13/51 Theories of Theatre 1761-1780

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Elements of Criticism (1762)	Henry Home, Lord Kames (1696-1782) Scottish philosopher	Follows Hume and Burke's concern with psychology but differs strikingly with regard to emotional distancing. Like Adam Smith, Kames argued that it is emotional involvement rather than distancing which is involved in tragedy, and emotion or 'extreme natural sensibility' is 'the fundamental agent whereby the actor creates his role'. ¹ This allows them to awaken passion 'by an internal effort merely, without any external cause'. ² Tragedy arouses sympathy, which is a manifestation of the better, more altruistic side of our nature, and it is this which brings us both satisfaction and pleasure, albeit at the cost of some pain. This emotional involvement in tragedy makes us better persons. Kames used this theory to attack the rigidity of the French neo-classicists. He had flagged this function of sympathy in his earlier Essays on the Principles of Moral and Natural Religion (1751) where he referred to the ' principle of sympathy ' as 'the cement of human society'. ³ Sympathy is raised in spectators by a flight of the imagination. Passion and sympathy were also vital for the playwright, since abstract knowledge would not 'alone enable an artist to make a just representation of nature'. Rather, he must 'be able to adopt every different character introduced in his work. But a very humble flight of the imagination may serve to convert a writer into a spectator ... Our sympathy is not raised by description ... It is this imperfection ... in the bulk of our plays, that confines our stage almost entirely to Shakespeare'. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		The creation of emotional involvement which led the moral improvement	Doing: acting : required 'sensibility' towards others; playwrighting : involved passion and sympathy to convert him into a spectator Watching: psychological: emotional involvement through sympathy, leading to moral improvement
Essai sur le genre dramatique sérieux (1767) ⁵	Pierre-Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais (1732-1799) French dramatist, government agent	Attacked the conservative view of traditional tragedy, which downgraded the new genre of drame , a genre he invented with his play Eugénie , for which the Essai is the preface. Neither tragedy nor comedy, a drame was 'a faithful picture of human actions' which sought to stir emotions in order to improve morals, something the new genre did better than either classical tragedy or comedy. Adherence to rules never produced fine art and the best poets had always ignored them, pushing new boundaries in their art. Rules were 'that eternal commonplace of critics, that fetish of small minds'. ⁶ Matters pertaining 'to taste, to feeling, to pure effect – in short, matters of spectacle – are sanctioned only on the basis of the immediate and powerful emotion which they arouse in all spectators ... it is not so much a question of discussion and analysis as of feeling, of being delighted or		To teach by providing a picture of reality with emotional appeal	Doing: Drama Watching: spectators cast judgment through their responses; this judgment was not 'false or ill-directed'.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		being moved' and 'the audience's spontaneous judgment' ought not be rashly designated as 'false and ill-directed'. ⁷ Great works create the rules, not the other way round. Beaumarchais refrained from direct attack on French neoclassicism, despite hints of the romanticism to come, ⁸ but his The Marriage of Figaro 'caused more controversy in France than any play since Molière's Tartuffe ' and was refused royal permission for its production. Some saw it as threatening revolution. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional
Garrick, ou les Acteurs Anglais (1769)	Antonio Fabio Sticotti (d. 1772) Italian actor and translator	An abbreviated retranslation back into French of John Hill's translation of Sainte-Albine's essay on acting, with a focus on the qualities of the actor. Exhibiting a strong moral tone, it stressed that the purpose of theatre was the instruction of the spectator, and this was best achieved by actors who were not only talented in presentation, but who had 'the virtues of the honest man and the qualities of the useful citizen'. ¹⁰ The book 'served as the springboard for Diderot's attack on sensibility'. ¹¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Instruction of the spectator	Doing: acting skills
Hamburg Dramaturgy (1767-1769) ¹²	Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781) German playwright, theorist, critic and translator	Essential theorist. Carlson calls Lessing the first great German theorist of drama, ¹³ while Cheney considered him 'the first great critic after Aristotle'. ¹⁴ According to Gerould, however, he 'never wrote a systematic treatise on dramatic theory', ¹⁵ something Lessing himself admitted. ¹⁶ He translated Diderot into German. Lessing acknowledged Aristotle's Poetics as a work 'as infallible as the elements of Euclid' but claimed that French classicism was based on misinterpretation, ¹⁷ probably the first major theoretical recognition of this problem. The aim of tragedy was to excite pity and thereby purge the emotions. However, since it was clear spectators enjoyed tragedies which did not arouse sympathy, enjoyment could also be found in the appreciation of a fine play with a 'through line of action' i.e. spectators appreciated the aesthetics of a performance, and it was through this that pleasure was experienced, despite tragic themes. Lessing took a flexible approach to the unities and rules in general, pointing out that they were a convention associated with the use of a chorus and no longer necessary. He contributed to the theoretical groundwork for a modern conception of tragicomedy in which 'one necessarily arises from [the other]' as part of the dramatic structure. He championed Shakespeare in Germany, and also attempted to devise a theory of criticism which distinguished between the work of the actor and that of the poet (dramatist), but protests from Hamburg actors prevented this. ¹⁸ He translated Francesco Riccoboni and part of	A place people attend to see drama	Theatre was 'the school of the moral world'; it taught through the generation of an intense emotional experience the arousal of compassion (seen as a moral process) led to moral improvement; instruction	Doing: drama (tragedy/ comedy) - the work of the actor was different from the work of the playwright. Acting required the achievement of balance between emotion and technique, but must be underpinned by technique;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Sainte-Albine as well as Diderot, developing from this a position on acting favouring a balance between emotion and technique, but with an emphasis on technique, for which there should be universal rules.¹⁹ Drama was a universalising art: '[f]rom the stage we are not to learn what such and such an individual man has done, but what every man of a certain character would do under the circumstances'.²⁰ He recognized that it was 'not easy to convert a touching little story into a moving drama'.²¹ Lessing raised the question of why people attend the theatre. He found Aristotle's response that it was to experience pity and terror inadequate. Most Germans (and most French people) went to the theatre 'from idle curiosity, from fashion, from ennui, to see people, from desire to see and be seen, and only a few, and those few very seldom, go from any other motive'. No contemporary theatre seemed to offer what the Greeks expected and got from their theatre: 'intense extraordinary emotions' which led them to 'hardly await the moment to experience them again and again'. Since modern theatre did not produce this effect, 'we do not as yet possess a theatre'.²² Lessing introduced the term compassion as one of the feelings (besides pity and fear) which the drama should arouse: 'compassion must be a part of tragedy in order for the audience to experience emotional engagement with the play'. Compassion was 'aroused by the sight of undeserved suffering of people "like us"'. Only if we can perceive the protagonist as "like us" can the dramatic experience succeed'. It succeeds because we 'fear it might happen as well to us or ours':²³ 'the misfortune that becomes the object of our compassion must necessarily be of such a nature that we can fear it might happen as well to us or ours. When this fear is not present compassion does not arise' (Hamburg Dramaturgy). It is because we see ourselves as similar that fear arises, 'the fear that our destiny might as easily become like his as we feel ourselves to be like him, and this fear it is which would force compassion to full maturity' (Hamburg Dramaturgy).²⁴ This understanding of compassion has since become known as empathy, and forms the basis of the desire of marginalized groups wanting to represent themselves on stage, according to Krasner,²⁵ although compassion does not seem to be as self-oriented as empathy. And the purpose of art: 'In nature everything is connected, everything is interwoven, everything changes with everything, everything merges from one into another ... In order that finite spirits may have their share of ... enjoyment, they must have the power to set up arbitrary limits; they must have the power to eliminate and to guide their attention at will. This power we exercise at			playwrighting : required generalisation of particular experiences and stories Watching: catharsis; appreciation of good craftsmanship; people went to the theatre for any number of reasons, including: idle curiosity; fashion; ennui; the desire to be seen; the desire to see; enjoyment of the art involved in staging

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	author	his role, the player also fully retains the consciousness of his own personality in the inner recesses of his mind ... Only in part do excellent actors receive “a colour from the objects around them, like the effects of the sun beams playing thro’ a prism”. ³² All an actor can do it to ‘imagine herself the person she represented ... for to believe it quite, he must be out of his senses and forget his lesson’. ³³ Actors exhibit a kind of ‘double feeling’ whereby they portray the feelings and passions of their character as if possessed by them, while retaining their own character ‘in the innermost recess’ of his mind. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (synthesis) View of Theatre: positive
Shakesper (1773)	Johann Gottfried Herder (1744-1803) German philosopher, theologian, poet and literary critic	Greatly influenced by Johann Georg Hamann (1730-1788) who introduced him to Shakespeare, Herder launched the Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) movement which marked the clear break from the tradition associated with enlightenment ideals, and was a forerunner of C19th romanticism. Sturm und Drang dramatists rejected dramatic rules, often patterning their works on Shakespeare’s episodic structure, mixing of genres and onstage presentation of violence. ³⁴ Herder produced a ‘great outpouring’ of work in the 1770s and 1780s which stressed individualism and inspiration, ‘providing major critical concepts for the subsequent romantic movement and ... for the development of modern theatrical theory’. Classic concerns with the unities and genres are rejected in this material; they were appropriate only for their time. Every play ... belongs to a single genre, which is History. Beyond that, each play has its unique unifying mood ... derived from the images, the incidents, the references, and the evocation of the physical setting’. ³⁵ Herder’s concerns with nature, the sensual and metaphorical, with historical relativism and the search for a unique unifying principle within each work all form the ground for the development of romantic aesthetic theory, and can be seen in Goethe’s early works. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory/existing theatre View of Theatre: positive		Aesthetic	Doing: play-wrighting: rules are appropriate for their time; ‘History’ is the only genre, but each play has its own unique unifying ‘mood’
Essay on the Theatre (1773)	Oliver Goldsmith (1728-1774) Anglo-Irish playwright, poet and physician	The best known document in the C18th debate over the primacy of sentiment or mirth in comedy, which comes down firmly on the side of mirth. ³⁶ Sentiment was not only less amusing, but it was less instructive: ‘Comedy should excite our laughter by ridiculously exhibiting the Follies of the Lower Part of Mankind’. A ‘laughing comedy’ would ‘force audiences to laugh at their own eccentricities and absurdities’. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A cultural institution or form	Instruction through ridicule	Doing: comedy Showing: the spectator’s own eccentricities and absurdities

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Du theatre (1773); Preface to La Brouette du vinaigrier (1775); De la littérature et des littératures (1778)	Louis-Sébastien Mercier (1740-1814) French dramatist	A precursor to Hugo and Stendhal who directly attacked French neoclassicism but was virtually ignored by his contemporaries. Based his conception of theatre on a radical revision of Diderot. French neoclassic theatre suffered from over-regulation and was almost totally estranged from reality. Theatre is about social and moral improvement, which is achieved by a drama which closely follows reality: drama should be a reflection of everyday life. Mercier condemned all imitation. Each work should have 'its own particular and individual organization' (De la littérature). For this reason, Mercier objected to the division between genres: '[f]all, fall, you walls separating the genres! Let the poet's view range freely', and wished to retain only unity of action. Mercier's work featured a 'democratization' of the theatre. ³⁸ He extended serious consideration to the proletariat in the same way that Diderot had considered the bourgeoisie: the dramatist was a 'universal painter. Every detail of human life is equally his object' (Preface). In this statement he anticipates the C19th naturalists concern to broaden the subject matter of serious drama. Mercier also saw drama as capable of stimulating republican virtues and uniting all classes in 'an enlightened patriotism', arguing against Rousseau's influential statement that only festivals could do this: 'both in theory and practice he provided a crucial link between the patriotic manifestations that Rousseau considered ... suitable for his republic, and the pageants and dramas of the Revolution'. ³⁹ His ideas were taken up by Chénier (1764-1811) whose Charles IX (1789) was the major historical play of the Revolution. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional	A cultural institution or form; a practice	To generate social, political and moral improvement and social cohesion including the stimulation of republican virtues and 'enlightened patriotism'	Doing: drama (literature) -to create a 'universal' image which reflected the society
Poetical Works (1774)	Robert Lloyd (1733-1764) English poet	Acting did not gain its perfection from the observance of established rules, but from feeling: ⁴⁰ 'Nature's true knowledge is the only art,/The strong-felt passion bolts into his face,/The mind untouch'd, what is it but grimace? ... Here lies the golden secret; learn to FEEL/Or fool, or monarch, happy, or distress,/No actor pleases that is not possess'd'. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – technical acting theory View of Theatre: aesthetic		Expression of sympathetic imagination	Doing: acting as a result of feeling
1775 Anonymous translation of Aristotle's Poetics (1775) from the Greek into English: a more faithfully rendition than the Dacier version dating from 1705.
'Zum Shakespeares-Tag' (Shakespeare: a Tribute)	Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) German	Essential theorist: Goethe was responsible for a number of important innovations in German theatre. ⁴⁶ After a visit to Italy (1786-1788), which inspired a shift to classical themes and forms in his writing, he argued for 'a rational and flexible classicism', ⁴⁷ reformulating the idea of the unities, decorum and verisimilitude to apply to a work as a coherent whole: 'For if the word unity means anything, what could this be but an interior	A place in which to see, hear and feel; a cultural	To produce a symbolic visual image (not a reflection of	Doing: poetry - coherence and rationality was required in

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1771, published 1854);⁴² Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1777-1785); 'On Epic and Dramatic Poetry' (1797, published 1827);⁴³ On the Truth and Realism (1798); 'Rules for Actors' (c1800);⁴⁴ Shakespeare und kein Ende! ('Shakespeare Once Again' (1813-16); Nachlass zu Aristoteles Poetik (1827)⁴⁵	playwright, artistic director of the Weimar Theatre (1791-1817), Privy Councillor	wholeness, a harmony of parts among themselves, suitability, and verisimilitude'. Goethe, like the later Schiller and Schlegel, drew a distinction between ancient and modern poetry, producing a table of antitheses in Shakespeare und kein Ende! (1813-16): naïve/sentimental; pagan/Christian; classic/romantic; realistic/idealistic; necessity/freedom; destiny (Sollen)/Will (Wollen). He saw Shakespeare as 'exemplary in his expressive power and scope' providing a new model for drama,⁴⁸ in which a theatrical performance could be taken as an autonomous work of art.⁴⁹ He also treated many issues 'in terms of polarities: poet versus playwright, drama versus stage play, reader versus spectator' as part of a closely linked and fluid theoretical and practical thinking about the theatre.⁵⁰ Unlike later theorists, Goethe saw the move towards modern poetry as an unfortunate shift, reducing tragedy to whimsy, 'weak and insignificant, its power dissolved in indulgence and caprice'. Only Shakespeare, through his natural genius and the freedom provided by the primitive and undeveloped condition of Elizabethan stages, had managed to avoid this degeneration, partly because he managed to combine elements of both ancient and modern. Goethe was later to consider that Shakespeare was not a theatrical writer at all, disagreeing sharply with Ludwig Tieck who, in 1826, was urging producers to stage the plays as written, allowing their natural theatricality to come out.⁵¹ Goethe believed that 'a great public should be revered, not used as children are, when peddlers wish to hook the money from them. By presenting excellence to the people, you should gradually excite in them a taste and feeling for the excellent; and they will pay their money with double satisfaction, when reason itself has nothing to object against this outlay. The public you may flatter, as you do a well-beloved child, to better, to enlighten it; not as you do a pampered child of quality, to perpetuate the error you profit from'.⁵² Drama 'should transcend ordinary experience and reveal ideal truths'.⁵³ Goethe's last major essay on drama (Nachlass) focused on the relationship of theatre to morality, especially in regard to catharsis, which he equated with the reconciliation of opposing elements on the stage by the dramatist, rather than the effect on the spectator. Theatre had no direct beneficial effect on the audience either morally or emotionally: 'If the poet has fulfilled his obligation on his side, tying together his knots meaningfully and untying them properly, this same process will be experienced by the spectator – the complications will perplex him, and the solution enlighten him; but he will not go home any the better for it'. If anything, he will just be amazed at himself for not being any different.⁵⁴ He	form	nature) with the aim of revealing 'ideal truths' and to develop excellence in taste	playwrighting; actors should see the play as a whole when rehearsing; the aim of both is to prevent the audience from using its imagination because this interferes with empathy; art is an idealization; it is not life Showing: the revelation of universal, eternal truth; reconciliation of opposing elements (which produces catharsis); Goethe was the first to theorise the symbolic aspects of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		insisted that the symbolic visual image was central to the theatrical effect⁵⁵ and rejected art as a reflection of nature: ‘the sole excuse for the existence of works of art is that they are different from the works of nature’.⁵⁶ His early play Goetz von Berlichingen (1773) is an example of the Strum und Drang movement, an important precursor to romanticism.⁵⁷ While working with Schiller at the Weimar court theatre, he produced a set of regulations for acting and personal behaviour called ‘Rules for Actors’ in which he declared that the ‘stage and the auditorium, the actors and the spectators together constitute the whole’.⁵⁸ [Passow claims Goethe was one of the first theorists to recognize the importance of the audience and that it was not until the 1960s that other theorists took up this recognition].⁵⁹ For this reason, actors should address spectators, not each other. He held intensive rehearsals and expected his actors to work as a unified company, and to know the play as a whole: ‘A common error is to form a judgment of a drama from a single part in it; and to look upon this part itself in an isolated point of view, not in its connection with the whole’.⁶⁰ He also expected their behaviour on stage and off to be constrained, so as to improve their social status. He required them to take their craft and profession seriously, and included in his instructions rules for stage movement, vocal technique and department. His early plays were puppet plays and, according to Gerould, he never really abandoned ‘the aesthetic of the marionette theatre’⁶¹ and believed ‘that the highest purpose of art is to show human forms that are sensuously and aesthetically as significant and beautiful as possible’.⁶² The difference between an epic writer and a dramatic writer lies in the way they must work: ‘the epic writer narrates an event as having happened in the past ... the dramatist represents an event as happening in the present ... the epic writer is by nature a rhapsodist ... the dramatic writer an actor. The rhapsodist is surrounded by a quiet group of attentive listeners, whereas the actor’s audience is impatient both to watch and hear’. These differences ‘determine what is most suitable to each genre, which subject and literary devices’. Epics involve ‘man’s physical interaction with the world ... Tragedy portrays man interacting with himself’ (and can therefore be limited in scope). The aim of the epic writer is to reassure his audience, so that they will listen to him ‘willingly and patiently’ following him back and forth in time and wherever he leads them. However, the actor ‘represents a specific individual and wants us to concentrate exclusively on him and his immediate surroundings. His goal is to make us empathize with his mental anguish and his physical suffering, share his difficulties and			Watching: no direct beneficial effect; audiences needed to be trained to behave with decorum: only either applauding or withholding applause, however, spectators were essential to the whole theatrical event,⁶⁷ and could learn taste from the experience.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		forget ourselves ... It is an absolute necessity that the audience be constantly engaged and not be allowed to assume a position of detached contemplation. The actor wants them to be passionately involved and their imagination completely inactive' whereas the epic writer is content to appeal to the audience's imagination from which they create their own images.⁶³ He recognized the signifying aspect of theatre when he declared that 'nothing is truly suitable to the theater which is not also perceived as symbolic'.⁶⁴ He also worked on establishing a uniform 'stage German' rather than the mix of dialects which was common. He established rules of conduct for spectators: the only appropriate response was applause, or the withholding of applause, thereby establishing 'our modern tradition of audience decorum',⁶⁵ a tradition which was to come under attack from Brecht. After the death of Schiller, with whom he wrote many of his essays, Goethe seemed to lose interest in theatre and became 'an increasingly remote figure' until his death.⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –prescriptive View of Theatre: functional; aesthetic
'Of Sympathy' (1778)	James Beattie (1735-1803) Scottish theorist, scholar and Professor of Moral Philosophy at Aberdeen University	Beattie believed that Adam Smith's 'philosophy of Sympathy ought also to form a part of the science of Criticism'.⁶⁸ He argued that the best dramatists were capable of entering into the character they are representing through sympathy, as were spectators when characters were represented rather than described. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		To prompt an exercise of the imagination with which we can identify	Doing: play-wrighting Showing: a representation with which spectators can identify Watching: when characters are represented rather than described, we too can sympathetically identify with their passion

-
- ¹ Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272. 270
- ² Kames 1762 in Wasserman 1947: 270
- ³ See Bate, Walter Jackson. 1945. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century English Criticism'. ELH 12 (2) pp. 144-164.156n33
- ⁴ Lord Kames 1762, Elements of Criticism, 2. 149-55; in Bate 1945: 156.
- ⁵ Beaumarchais, 1767, Essai, Allem, Maurice and Paul Courant (eds) 1973, Théâtre complet et lettres relatives à son théâtre, Paris; translated and reprinted in
- ⁵ Excerpts from a number of the essays are reprinted in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 128-133.
- ⁶ Beaumarchais 1994/1767: 128
- ⁷ Beaumarchais 1994/1767: 128
- ⁸ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.157
- ⁹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 319. Beaumarchais worked as a government agent giving aid to American Revolutionaries between 1774 and 1775 and was under scrutiny in France for arms profiteering (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 320).
- ¹⁰ Sticotti 1769, Garrick ou les acteurs anglais, Paris, p. 3; in Carlson 1984: 161.
- ¹¹ Wasserman 1947: 271
- ¹² Lessing: excerpts from a number of the essays are reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 107-126, as well as in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 238-247; both use Lessing 1879/1767-9, 'Hamburg Dramaturgy (1767-9)', in Selected Prose Works, trans. Helen Zimmern, London, George Bell and Sons.
- ¹³ Carlson 1984: 167
- ¹⁴ Cheney, Sheldon. 1930. The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft. 2nd ed. London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co. 367
- ¹⁵ Gerould 2000: 237
- ¹⁶ Sidnell 1994: 105
- ¹⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 321
- ¹⁸ Gerould 2000: 237
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 170-1
- ²⁰ Lessing 2000/1767-9: 238
- ²¹ Lessing 1994/1767: 107
- ²² Lessing 2000/1767-9: 244
- ²³ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.11
- ²⁴ Lessing 1962/1767-9, Hamburg Dramaturgy, (tr.) V. Lange, New York, Dover, pp. 180-181; in Krasner 2008: 11.
- ²⁵ Krasner 2008: 11
- ²⁶ Lessing 1994/1767-9: 121-3 Essay Number 70
- ²⁷ Fried, Michael. 1980. Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot. Berkeley: California University Press. 77-8
- ²⁸ Hifferran 1770: 87 in Wasserman 1947: 269n30.

-
- ²⁹ Wasserman 1947: 269n30
- ³⁰ Hiffennan 1770: 87-90 in Wasserman 1947: 269n30
- ³¹ James Boswell 1770, 'On the Profession of a Player', London Magazine, September, pp. 469-470; in Carlson 1984: 140 and in Wasserman 1947: 272.
- ³² Boswell in Wasserman 1947: 272
- ³³ Boswell 1770: 470 in Wasserman 1947: 272n45
- ³⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 321
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 171-2
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 137
- ³⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 319
- ³⁸ Carlson 1994: 158
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 159
- ⁴⁰ Wasserman 1947: 266
- ⁴¹ Lloyd 1774: I, 11-12 in Wasserman 1947: 266
- ⁴² In Nardroff, Ellen and Ernest H. (trans) 1986, Essays on Art and Literature, (ed) John Gearey, NY, Suhrkamp; excerpt in Sidnell 1994: 135-137 and Gerould 2000: 278-287.
- ⁴³ In Nardroff, Ellen and Ernest H. (trans) 1986, Essays on Art and Literature, (ed) John Gearey, NY, Suhrkamp; excerpt in Sidnell 1994: 143-145.
- ⁴⁴ Published in Actors on Acting, eds. Toby Cole and Helen Krich Chinoy, trans. Arthur Woehl, Crown, New York, 1970; cited in Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 347.
- ⁴⁵ Nardroff, Ellen and Ernest H. (trans) 1986, Essays on Art and Literature, (ed) John Gearey, NY, Suhrkamp; excerpt in Sidnell 1994: 150-152.
- ⁴⁶ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 346
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 174
- ⁴⁸ Sidnell 1994: 134
- ⁴⁹ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 338
- ⁵⁰ Sidnell 1994: 134
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 181-2
- ⁵² Goethe 1994/1777-85: 143
- ⁵³ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 347
- ⁵⁴ Goethe 1994/1827: 152
- ⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 280
- ⁵⁶ Hamilton, Clayton. 1910. The Theory of the Theatre and Other Principles of Dramatic Criticism. New York: Henry Holt and Company. 185
- ⁵⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 321
- ⁵⁸ Goethe c1800: § 82
- ⁵⁹ Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254. 237
- ⁶⁰ Goethe 1994/1777-85: 137
- ⁶¹ Gerould 2000: 276
- ⁶² Quoted in Gerould 2000: 277.

⁶³ Goethe 1994/1797: 143-5

⁶⁴ Goethe 2000/1815: 285

⁶⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 348

⁶⁶ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 347

⁶⁷ Goethe c1800

⁶⁸ Beattie 1778, Essays on Poetry and Music, as They Affect the Mind, p. 194; in Bate 1945: 149.

Table 14/51 Theories of Theatre 1781-1800

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to Die Räuber (1781); The Stage Considered as a Moral Institution (1784);¹ Über die tragische Kunst; Über das Pathetische (1793); Über das Erhabene; Über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1793-1794); Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795-6); Preface to Wallenstein (1798); On the Use of the Chorus in	Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805) German playwright and theorist	Essential theorist. Goethe once said that Schiller's genius was 'made for the theatre; he always thought about actors, stage directions, and listeners, not readers'.³ Schiller's play The Robber was also an example of the new Sturm und Drang movement, 'a remarkable first play, written out of his own disaffection as a recruit at a military academy'.⁴ The Robbers had a 'stormy premiere' in Stuttgart, forcing Schiller to flee and go into hiding.⁵ As so many dramatist/theorists were forced to do, Schiller used his Preface to apologise for his 1781 play not meeting neoclassic requirements (as developed by Lessing), in particular by mixing both good and bad qualities in his characters. This he found he was obliged to do for the sake of portraying the characters clearly, although it undercut the moral instruction purposes of drama. He claims he intended it to be read as a piece of dramatic literature rather than seen in performance, and initially argued for the use of such a genre in literature.⁶ In his 1784 work, Schiller brought together the familiar arguments for the social and political utility of theatre, through 'its championship of virtue and condemnation of vice, its guide to practical wisdom and civil life, its value for steeling man to bear the reversals of fortune, its preaching of tolerance, its harmonizing of national interests'.⁷ Thus theatre extends the influence of civil laws because it 'pronounces a terrible verdict on vice'. It extends justice because '[t]here are a thousand vices unnoticed by human justice, but condemned by the stage'. It 'cultivates the ground where religion and law do not think it dignified to stop' by exposing folly, which 'often troubles the world as much as crime'. The stage acts as a mirror, reflecting and turning to ridicule the 'thousand forms of folly', thereby 'chastising us' in a way we find acceptable. The stage is also 'a great school of practical wisdom'. It shows us the vices and virtues of men, teaches us to bear the strokes of fortune by rehearsal, which helps us develop courage; it teaches us to be more considerate to the unfortunate 'and to judge gently' because it shows man's 'secret motive'. It is also a way by which 'the thoughtful and the worthier section of the people diffuse the light of wisdom over the mass'. The stage can be patriotic, because by encouraging the development of a national stage, we can encourage the formation of a nation like the Greek republic, and finally the stage is useful because it entertains men: 'The stage is an institution combining amusement with instruction, rest with exertion, where no faculty of mind is overstrained, no pleasure	A place to come to watch what is put on the stage	To increase happiness through: a revelation of universal, eternal truth; offering moral instruction, education, guides to moral, civil and political life, inurement, chastisement, entertainment and the opportunity for social cohesion	Doing: play-wrighting (literature); the stage - involves a 'play-urge' – an urge to play; it also involves practical considerations: the desire to 'subsist' (producers) and the desire to be seen (actor). Showing: idealizations to reveals universal, eternal truths Watching: spectators are not to blame for a decline in art. They need only receptivity and this they have.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Tragedy (1803) ²		enjoyed at the cost of the whole'. The stage 'revives us' and brings us together 'in a universal sympathy' which overcomes social differences. It allows 'men of all ranks, zones, and conditions, emancipated from the chains of conventionality and fashion, [to] fraternize here in a universal sympathy'.⁸ The aim of tragedy is to arouse pity (as sympathy); the end of poetry is to teach. The techniques of classic drama allow this through the use of distancing devices which ensure that sympathy does not become so strong as to cause pain instead. Schiller's later work is heavily influenced by Kant, whose philosophical work provided important concepts and terminology and enabled a move away from classicism and towards romantic theories of the theatre.⁹ Following Kant, Schiller distinguished between feeling and reason, perception and understanding, seeing the sublime, an essential aspect of art, as transcendental, lying in the gap between man's perceptions of the physical facts of the universe and his inability to grasp intellectually their essence. Schiller called this realm the 'supersensuous'. It lay somewhere between the senses and reason, and, through art, gives us access to the sublime.¹⁰ Nevertheless, for Schiller, tragedy still provides an example of stoic endurance, an 'inoculation against unavoidable fate', with the device of the chorus providing the necessary distance needed to prevent being overwhelmed by the emotions. In Über naïve, Schiller, discussing poetry, suggests that sentimental poetry (unlike ancient naïve poetry) features a gap between the real and the ideal which marks a distinctly modern self-consciousness over expression. The distinction between naïve and sentimental is taken up by later German writers as they attempt to reconcile the differences between the requirements of classicism and those of romanticism.¹¹ Schiller also identified what he called a 'play-urge' (Spieltrieb), by which to account for delight in an activity for its own sake, an important aspect of later aesthetic theory. Schlegel (see below) takes the idea up as 'spirit of play' as the delight which allows us to overlook human discomfort in comedies. Schiller also defended spectators against charges that they 'debased art': [t]he artist debases the public, and in all eras where art declined, it fell because of the artists. The public needs nothing but receptivity, and this it has. Audiences come before the curtain with an undefined longing and with a many-sided capacity [and] a capability for highest things'.¹² Schiller distinguished between theatre as a practical art which had to meet certain practical needs ('[t]he poet ... may work toward an ideal, the critic may judge according to ideas, but qualified, limited, practical art rests upon needs. The			They come to the theatre because of the same 'play-urge' which practitioners have. They bring a longing to play and to experience something which is both aesthetic and uplifting. Spectators in general just want to be entertained and moved.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		producer wants to subsist, the actor wants to be seen, the spectator wants to be entertained and moved. He seeks pleasure and he is dissatisfied when exertion is expected of him just when he is looking for recreation and entertainment' and genuine art , which has a more serious purpose, 'not merely to translate the human being into a momentary dream of freedom, but actually to make him free ... by awakening a power within him ... to transform the sensory world into a free creation of [the] spirit ... to control the material world through ideas'. Therefore, the stage aims at both 'the ideal' and 'the real'; to manage this paradox requires the imagination of the spectator, which depends on the stage being a 'purely ideal space'. ¹³ Early in his career, Schiller saw drama as playing a role in politics, especially in the development of an historical consciousness, but after the French Revolution, he turned to a more apolitical approach. Ultimately, 'drama should increase happiness'. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic/analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
Ideas on Mimesis (1785-6)	Johann Jakob Engel (1741-1802) German author, teacher and philosopher	An 'exhaustive and detailed description of all possible gestural signs'. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: practical		To represent	Doing: natural acting was an art of gesture
A Commentary Illustrating the Poetics of Aristotle (1788)	Henry James Pye (1745-1813) English translator and critic	Translation from the Greek, largely free of French influence. Pye argues that the power of acting 'raises drama above every other art' – in fact, if Aristotle had seen modern acting by Garrick or Siddons, he might have put more emphasis on the presentation of the drama than he did. Pye's comment provides an indication of how much the art of acting had arisen in critical acclaim during C18th. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		To transport	Doing: poetics (drama as an art) - acting has the power to transport, to make 'real'
1789: The most accurate translation of Aristotle from the Greek to date was published by English classical scholar Thomas Twining (1735-1804) under the title Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry. Twining not only rejected any French influence, but also the influence of Horace, claiming that Aristotle nowhere supported the idea that 'utility and instruction' were 'the end of poetry'. His version became the long-standing English version. 1789: one year after English settlement in Australia, desire for theatre was strong enough to allow a performance of George Farquhar's The Recruiting Officer (1706) by 'a "party of convicts" ... performed in "a convict-built hut" in front of an invited audience of officers and dignitaries'. In 1796, Australia's 'first purpose-built playhouse', the Sydney Theatre was opened in The Rocks. The first performance was a tragedy by Edward Young, The Revenge (1720) on 16th January. In July, a triple bill of a tragedy (The Tragedy of Jane Shore (1714) by Nicholas Rowe), a 'theatrical dance called The Wapping Landlady and a farce, The Miraculous Cure was performed before an audience of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
about 180. The aim was ‘to leave them laughing’. Seats were expensive but could be paid in kind (in food or alcohol) as well as coin. According to Meacham, ‘authorities recognised theatre and entertainment as an important social balm ... a diversion from the ordinary, hard life of the colony’ and someone had had the foresight to bring a collection of popular and contemporary scripts out to Australia with them.¹⁷ 1789-1794: French Revolution: the revolutionary government saw the theatre as too powerful a tool to leave unregulated. It issued a series of decrees determining who was permitted to operate and attend the theatre (citizens), what kinds of plays were to be put on (civic performances and neo-classical plays, preferably in verse), how often (three times a week) and under what conditions (the government paid for some performances). Although the use of any kind of linguistic demarcation of class was banned (unless it was used to designate an enemy) and new plays were to be referred to committees for approval, the decrees generally ignored the ‘highly topical sensational drama exploiting the current events of the Revolution, and the comedies of the boulevard stage’ in favour of legislating for ‘ideal moral and linguistic models’ rather than any direct representations of the Republic.¹⁸
Lectures on the drama, Jena (1789) Vienna (1808) (Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature 1809-11);¹⁹ Vorlesungen über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (1819)	August Wilhelm Schlegel (1767-1845) German performer, multi-lingual translator, theorist, chair of Indian studies at the University of Bonn²⁰	Essential theorist. Schlegel was ‘an ideal explicator and mediator of new ideas’ and could be considered ‘the first international star of theatrical theory’. His lectures were ‘politically charged’. They implicitly challenged the Napoleonic cultural hegemony and had to be submitted to police before they could be presented.²¹ He, like his friend Mme de Staël, argued that drama was historically contingent: [t]he Greeks neither inherited nor borrowed their dramatic art from any other people; it was original and native, and for that very reason was it able to produce a living and powerful effect’. The same applied to the English and Spanish drama in the age of Shakespeare and Caldéron. Attempting to imitate the drama of other periods or places merely produced insignificant drama.²² This series of lectures, which codified and disseminated the work of Herder, Kant and Schiller throughout Europe, and can be considered ‘the major statement on the drama’ of the period²³ was translated into all the major European languages, becoming one of the most widely read works of German romantic theory, and leading to a consideration of dramatic theories from the past as historical documents rather than practical aesthetic manuals to be applied contemporarily.²⁴ Schlegel was also influenced by the thinking of Fichte and Schelling. In his lectures, Schlegel drew a distinction between the dramatic and the poetic elements in a drama (long considered the same). To be considered poetic, a drama must be ‘a coherent whole, complete and satisfactory within itself [and] mirror and bring bodily before us ideas Necessary and eternally true thoughts and feelings which soar above this earthly existence’. To be dramatic required the drama to ‘produce an impression on an assembled multitude, to fix their attention and to arouse their interest’.²⁵ In answer to the question ‘what is dramatic’, Lecture 2 provides an extended definition: it is dialogical; it involves action; it is embodied: ‘each of the characters [is]	An historical institution which is subject to social and political mores	Representation producing ‘an impression’ on spectators for the purposes of entertainment ; diversion from life; an expression of the human spirit at a particular time and place; a way of approaching the sublime	Doing: drama - an historical embodied, socially embedded and performative art; effective drama arises out of the culture of its writers and develops its own particular forms Watching: aesthetic experience and ‘play’ which, through the arousal and focusing of interests creates a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		represented by a living individual'; it is spatial; it involves visual representation; it can be judged on two levels: as a use of language (how it is written) and as performance; it is designed to 'produce an impression on an assembled multitude: to rivet their attention and excite their interest and sympathy', by drawing their attention to the actor, and therefore allowing their conventional reserve to be broken through so that the multitude can become an audience: 'a visible communion of numbers', which adds intensity to the theatrical experience: 'we feel ourselves strong among so many associates, and all hearts and minds flow together in one great and irresistible stream' for 'good or bad purposes', which then lead to either censorship or freedom, depending on the state and how it perceives it.²⁶ Schlegel accounted for our enjoyment of human discomfort in comedies through his idea of 'spirit of play'. He considered a number of theories for why we find the spectacle of terrible and painful events associated with tragedy so pleasurable but discounted theories of poetic justice, catharsis, pleasure in the stimulation of emotions and pleasure in the contrast between our own safety and the dangers being presented. Instead he developed Schiller's idea of the 'supersensuous' in relation to moral freedom: 'the moral freedom of man is best displayed when in conflict with the sensuous, and the greater the opposition, the more significant the demonstration'. Tragedies which demonstrated that 'all earthly existence must be held as worthless; all suffering must be endured, and all difficulties overcome' elevated their spectators to the supersensuous region of contemplation, thus putting them in touch with the sublime.²⁷ According to Crane, Schlegel had a Platonic understanding of tragedy, as being for some higher purpose:²⁸ 'the basis of tragedy is 'that longing for the infinite which is inherent in our being [and] which is baffled by the limits of our finite existence'. Tragic Poetry results from 'this tragic tone of mind'.²⁹ Schlegel also pointed to the distancing function of the chorus, characterizing the chorus as 'the ideal spectator', which 'mitigates the impression of a deeply-moving or distressing representation by bringing to the actual spectator a lyrical and musical expression of his own emotions and elevating him to the region of contemplation'.³⁰ Schlegel claimed that arguments of the unities had produced 'a whole Iliad of critical wars',³¹ and advanced the major concept of organic unity, first used by Herder and then developed by Goethe. This 'biological metaphor' provided a suitable substitute for neoclassic ideas of form (called 'mechanical' by contrast) and soon became a major feature of German poetic theory.³² Schlegel drew a number of			community from an assembled multitude; it does this by drawing the attention of the assembled multitude to the actor, which creates a sense of community amongst spectators. The creation of distance through mechanisms such as the chorus removes distress and allows spectators to reach a 'region of contemplation' Critics: their task is comparison and

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		distinctions between classical and romantic drama, arguing that poetry manifested itself in different ways at different times and the genres and rules which applied in one era did not necessarily apply in another. Classical poetry, for example, was obsessed with order, whereas romantic poetry was ‘the expression of the secret attraction to a chaos which lies concealed in the very bosom of the ordered universe, and is perpetually striving after new and marvellous births’. He suggested that the former be considered as a sculpture while the latter be considered as a painting. The first excels in the representation of figure, while painting ‘communicates more life to its imitations’.³³ He insisted upon the distinction between tragedy and comedy based on their ‘prevailing mood’.³⁴ The influence of Fichte’s belief that the will could overcome the gulf detected by Schiller (following Kant) between the world of natural phenomena and that of moral freedom influenced Schlegel and his brother Friedrich, suggesting to them that the poet’s ability to create a fictive universe paralleled the ego’s ability to create the external world, as theorised by Fichte. The Lectures also set up a periodization of theatre history, at least with regard to English theatre, based on the closure of the theatre by the Puritans, a theory of dramatic history which Postlewait considers as based uniquely for the time on ‘nonaesthetic social causes’ rather than changes within the field itself,³⁵ demonstrating a socially embedded or sociological view of theatre. This suggests that Schlegel believed, ‘in opposition to neo-classic principles’ that the art of one period could not be understood or adequately judged by the standards of a different period. History modified art.³⁶ Lecture 1 explains the role of the critic in insisting on this understanding, by placing criticism between history and theory as a kind of moderator. History ‘informs us what has been accomplished’.³⁷ It becomes the province of ‘the learned’, who, ‘incapable of distinguishing themselves by works of their own’, exercise a ‘despotism in taste’ which creates a ‘monopoly’ by turning what are arbitrary rules into universal ones. Theory teaches what ought to be accomplished, and can either support history or support the artist. Poets and artists are ‘compelled by their independence and originality of mind to strike out a path of their own’.³⁸ Criticism provides a link between theory and history, elucidating the history and making theory ‘fruitful’ through ‘comparison and assessment’ not through ‘a certain shrewdness in detecting and exposing the faults of a work of art’.³⁹ In the process, criticism expands our ability to see, especially because it helps to recognize and break up ‘despotism in taste’.⁴⁰ Schlegel also complained about ‘the young			assessment aimed at the expansion of our ability to see. Critics are the link between history and theory and ought not to be despotic.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		men of quality who sat on the stage lay in wait to discover something to laugh at'. They were always likely to find something to laugh at since 'all theatrical effect requires a certain distance, and when viewed too closely appears ludicrous', ⁴¹ suggesting an awareness of distance as a necessary condition of the theatrical experience. Purpose of Theorist: analysis/anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional
Critique of the Power of Judgment (1790, 1793)	Immanuel Kant (1724-1804) German philosopher	Although Kant did not produce a specific theory of theatre (or the arts in general), Krasner considers him to be '[o]ne of the most (if not the most) important figures in Western aesthetic theory', whose influence can be seen particularly in avant-garde theatre theory of the early C20th ⁴² and one of the five most influential theorists for modern art theories of all kinds, including theatre theory (the remaining four are Plato, Aristotle, Hegel and Nietzsche). Although part of the Enlightenment, Kant seemed to be on the hinge between Enlightenment and Romanticism, especially with regard to his understanding of the role of subjectivity and imagination in judgment, and his theories were enthusiastically taken up by Romantic theorists. Kant theorised a basis on which critical judgment of aesthetic objects could be given universal application and therefore authority over mere subjective experience, thereby shifting the understanding of what could be considered aesthetic 'from the artist ... to the audience, who, as critical judges can make determination of art's quality'. In doing so he established the idea of the critic of 'taste' 'as one who judges [both] subjectively and universally'. ⁴³ The judgment of a critic or person of taste could be considered authoritative because it universalised a subjective judgment via a process of detachment in which self-interest was relinquished, allowing one to 'avoid the illusion which, from subjective private conditions that could easily be held to be objective [since it is humans who generate and apply objective categories to phenomenon], would have a detrimental influence on judgment'. ⁴⁴ [Kant argues that the unity of human consciousness 'presupposes orderly experience'. ⁴⁵ Because of the way our consciousness works, we assume that the world is orderly. In fact, we impose order on the world through our categories, especially those of time and space]. Since aesthetic judgment necessarily had to incorporate subjective feeling because feeling and imagination were our initial responses to aesthetic objects (be they a beautiful sunset or a man-made objet d'art), our aesthetic judgment had to be tested before we could consider applying a universal category such as beautiful or sublime. This we did		Affect	Watching: Kant moved the onus for critical aesthetic judgment from the artist to the critical observer, in particular the (elite) observer of 'taste' whose judgment could be considered authoritative because his subjective responses to the work of art had been subjected to a test of 'disinterest' using the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		along four intersecting lines: feeling, non-utility, purposiveness and communal agreement. If the object gave us pleasure, had no utility for us (and therefore we had no particular interest in it or bias towards it) (i.e. it existed in its own right), entailed purposiveness in that to remove it would alter what was around it (in the case of natural objects) or that had been purposively created to be the way it was (i.e. it had autonomy in its form) and we could imagine that others of similar taste would feel the same way about it, then we were justified in applying a universal category (such as beautiful) to the object – which would then bring the object within the purvey of ‘normal’ or logical reason. Aesthetic judgment is thus both individualistic and intersubjective, as well as relational. Aesthetic objects in themselves are not beautiful or sublime (etc), although we treat them this way. They are these things because they affect us this way i.e. subjective judgments, unlike objective judgments, relate to how the object acts upon us rather than to an application of rules or conventions to the object. The tests of non-utility and purposiveness, however, allow a detachment from our subjective feelings in response to the object in order to allow us to perceive the object as an object, while the appeal to a ‘collective consensus’⁴⁶ works in a similar way to the categorical imperative in relation to moral behaviour. According to this principle, we test the morality of our behaviour by a thought experiment in which we imagine that the way we are behaving is to be made a rule of behaviour for everyone: ‘act only on that maxim through which you can at the same time will that it should become universal law’ (Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten 1785).⁴⁷ If we can imagine that others in our community would feel the same way in response to an aesthetic object, then we are justified in our judgment. In this sense then, aesthetic judgment is also moral. Needless to say, critics of all kinds jumped at this theoretical support for their activities at a time when individual opinion was coming to be a dominant force in society (see Habermas for this history in relation to the bourgeois public sphere), despite, or perhaps because Kant failed to ‘point to any neutral, uncontested procedure of identifying successful work’.⁴⁸ It allowed critics to make aesthetic judgments on behalf of others, while at the same time maintaining their subjectivity. The consequence was that theorists from wildly differing positions drew on Kant to justify their positions (e.g. Herder, the Romantic Movement in general and the Sturm und Drang movement in particular to which Kant was opposed), for critics constructed their consensual community in their own image (i.e. Kant’s theory was			criteria of: feeling; non-utility; purposiveness and communal agreement [the triumph of the critic over both the artist and the academic!]. An aesthetic object was anything which affected us (acted upon us). However, Kant did not provide any criteria independent of the critic of taste whereby an aesthetic object could be considered successful. Critics could create their consensual community in their own

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		premised on a homogeneous community). Nietzsche ridiculed Kant's theory in his Genealogy of Morals: 'When, forsooth, our aesthetes never get tired of throwing into the scales in Kant's favour the fact that under the magic of beauty men can look at even naked female statues "without interest", we can certainly laugh a little at their expense'.⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis – prescriptive- to provide criteria for authoritative judgment View of Theatre: unknown			image, which meant that not only could an object be aesthetic to some but not others, but that those who did not agree could be locked out of any debate over the aesthetic value of the object
Treatise on Theatres (1790)	George Saunders (1762-1839) English architect	Argued for a change in the shape of theatres in order to establish a different relationship between stage and spectator and in particular to get rid of the Elizabethan thrust stage: 'A division is necessary between the theatre and the stage, and should be so characterised as to assist the idea of there being two separate and distinct places ... The great advance of the floor of some stages into the body of the theatre is too absurd, I imagine, ever to be again practised'.⁵⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre space View of Theatre: positive; practical	A space which contained both performers and spectators		Doing: performance Watching : modern spectators required a different relationship between performers and spectators
The Rights of Man (1791-2);	Thomas Paine (1737-1809) British journalist, pamphleteer,	In theatre 'facts are manufactured for the sake of show, and accommodated to produce ... effect', particularly by drawing on our 'weakness of sympathy'. Omitting facts which do not suit the purpose is 'one of the arts of drama', and one of the ways in which it aims to control the effect on spectators: 'If the crimes of men were exhibited with their sufferings, the stage effect would sometimes be lost, and the audience would be inclined	A place where things are shown to spectators	To produce an effect	Doing: drama (a contrived art)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	inventor and radical	to approve where it was intended they should commiserate'. ⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative
A Series of Plays: in which it is attempted to delineate the stronger passions of the mind, each passion being the subject of a tragedy and a comedy , (Vol 1: 1798; Vol. 2 1802; Vol 3: 1812). 'On the Effects of large theatres on plays and action' (1812). ⁵²	Joanna Baillie (1761-1851) English playwright and poet	Often considered to be a 'closet' dramatist since none of the plays in the first volume of her work had been performed when the book was published. Later productions of her plays received mixed receptions, although generally critical acclaim. Although she recognized flaws in her work, she also argued (as did others) that 'there was a fundamental incompatibility between certain kinds of drama (including her own) and the size of the London theatres', ⁵³ a theme she explores in 'On the Effects...' (1812). Large theatres mean that 'well-written and well-acted plays, the words of which are not heard, or heard but imperfectly by two thirds of the audience' do not do well [and] 'We ought not, then, to find fault with the taste of the public for preferring an inferior species of entertainment [pantomime and spectacle], good of its kind, to a superior one, faintly and imperfectly given' particular as well-known quality plays such as Shakespeare continue to draw full houses, since spectators know them and 'can still understand and follow them pretty closely'. ⁵⁴ The size of the theatres also means that acting has to be exaggerated 'as can be perceived and have effect at a distance' ⁵⁵ which then limits not only the kinds of things that can be put on the stage (e.g. soliloquy, which requires 'muttered, imperfect articulation which grows by degrees into words', and other more subtle developments of the passions) but also the range of the actor's skills, especially for women. Large stages also are hard to fill, leading to a tendency towards spectacles which lack depth and variation, which limit rather than expand the imagination, and which dwarf the actors. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre structure View of Theatre: positive; practical	A place in which dramas are enacted before spectators – the shape and size of which determine the staging and reception of plays	Entertainment	Doing: play-wrighting - different kinds of plays required different kinds of performance space. The acting space affects what can be achieved. Watching: spectators will reject plays of any kind if they cannot hear or see them adequately
'Speech' (1793)	Bertrand Barère (1755-1841) French journalist and revolutionary; member of the Committee for Public Safety	Theatre should support the political regime, especially through the portrayal of current events: 'It is the duty of the national theatres and stages to repeat ... what was achieved'. ⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic/prescriptive - political View of Theatre: functional	An institution of representation	Representation	Doing: the practices of the theatre
Kritische	Friedrich	To describe the idea of the poetic 'strategy' described above, Friedrich introduced the			Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Fragmente (1797)	Schlegel (1772-1829) German literary critic, philosopher and poet	term irony : a major new concept in critical vocabulary. 'The ironic poet simultaneously revels in the pleasure of creation and recognizes its unreality in relation to the infinite, celebrates the achievement of a work eternally becoming and simultaneously recognizes its failure', a kind of 'transcendental buffoonery'. ⁵⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
Opinion de Portiez (de l'Oise) sur les théâtres (1798)	Louis Portiez (1755-1810) French pamphleteer	An essay on the social and cultural significance of theatre by a deputy of l'Oise à la Convention, which cites Abbé Batteaux: 'man is a born spectator'. Theatres during the French Revolution were scenes of debate and even violent clashes: 'ideas were expressed and values imparted to politicised audiences who in turn accepted, rejected, or transformed those messages as they saw fit'. ⁵⁸ an active conception of spectatorship Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-aesthetic view of theatre View of Theatre: functional	A social and cultural institution; a place of interaction	To present the clash of ideas and generate debate (a form of deliberative democracy)	Doing: expressing ideas Watching: spectatorship as an involved activity
Über den Unterschied der Dichtarten (1799)	Friedrich Hölderlin (1770-1843) German lyric poet	Tragedy (as part of art) was a means of re-establishing the unity of the self with the world, seen as having been lost. The poet's task is reconciliation, since it is the poet who brings art and nature together. ⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theory View of Theatre: functional		Reconciliation between art and nature	Doing: poetry (tragedy)
Botanic Garden (1799)	Erasmus Darwin (1731-1802) English physician, philosopher and poet	In the debate over whether the actor's representation was an illusion of reality or reality itself, Erasmus argued that audiences did not expect reality itself on the stage: 'Nature may be seen in the market-place, or at the card-table, but we expect something more than this in the playhouse or the picture-room'. ⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: positive	A playhouse in which to watch plays	To enhance reality	Doing: acting artifice
The 1790s saw the emergence of melodrama in the boulevard theatres in Paris, a genre which was to achieve enormous popularity in C19th England. The whole of C18th theatre was marked by attempts by governments to regulate theatre production, and the ingenious creativity of theatre entrepreneurs in finding ways around the restrictions. ⁶¹ The boulevard theatres were particularly inventive. Their new forms of theatre proved so popular that the government forced their integration into the Opéra in 1784. All French government restrictions were abolished during the French Revolution. However, this led to 'a marked increase in the rowdiness of theatre audiences'. By the 1790s structural and disciplinary measures were introduced to encourage 'restraint and orderliness, both on stage and off'. ⁶²
Literature Considered in	Anne-Louise Germaine	Essential theorist. Mme de Staël was something of a human dynamo, outspoken about her political beliefs, which led to her exile, and staging many theatrical productions, often	An historically	To reveal a nation's	Doing: play-wrighting;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Relation to Its Relation to Social Institutions (1800); Of the Dramatic Art (1810); ⁶³ De l'Allemagne (1813); Sulla maniera e l'utilità delle traduzioni (1816)	Necker, Mme de Staël (1766-1817) French political dissident, theatrical theorist, performer, playwright, theatre owner	taking the main role as well. According to the novelist Benjamin Constant, her chateau was a 'fury of spectacles'. She staged the world premier of Werner's famous The Twenty-Fourth of February in 1809, with the author and Schlegel playing the principal roles. 'People came from all over Switzerland to attend' her celebrity performances. ⁶⁴ The Literature was the 'first full-blown treatise' after Vico and Montesquieu on the relativity of cultures and the 'historicity of human experience'. ⁶⁵ This marked the beginning of the recognition of culture as a unified, but separate field , out of which a sociology of literature (and ultimately, culture) developed. Her idea of 'national theatres growing out of the distinctive geography, language, and social life of Europe's different peoples' upset the French establishment 'but proved to be a revolutionary idea, enlarging the social function of the stage and liberating the creative energies of writers and artists'. ⁶⁶ A nation's drama revealed its national character, manners, morals, law and religion. Mme de Staël rejected the French adherence to the classical rules (other than unity of action): 'Nothing in life ought to be stationary; and art is petrified when it refuses to change'. The fact that the 'finest tragedies in France do not interest the people' was an indication that the rules produced drama which did not work. In particular, credit ought to be given to the imagination which, since it was capable of consenting to believe 'that actors separated from ourselves by a few boards are Greek heroes dead three thousand years ago', is obviously capable of imagining changes in place and time. She recommended that playwrights study the publics which they address, and 'the motives, of every description' on which public opinion was founded: '[t]he knowledge of mankind is even equally essential to the dramatic author with imagination itself; he must touch sentiments of general interest without losing sight of the particular relations which influence his spectators'. ⁶⁷ De l'Allemagne was written while Mme de Staël was in exile for opposing Napoleon, as a protest against the suppression of intellectual freedom in France. In it she proposed 'a new Europe of independent cultural and political entities'. ⁶⁸ Napoleon condemned the book and all 10,000 copies and the printing type were destroyed. Schlegel managed to rescue a set of proofs. He smuggled them to Berne and the book was eventually published in London in 1813 and Paris in 1814. Mme de Staël was hounded by police spies and her friends were threatened to discourage them from visiting her. ⁶⁹ The Sulla maniera , an essay published in the Italian journal Bibliotheca italiana , encouraged Italian writers to break with neoclassicism. The debate which this essay provoked is said	specific form of culture which serves a social and political function; a place in which drama is performed	specific culture to itself	performance as an art: performing one's culture; therefore the playwright had to have a specific knowledge of his culture and the 'knowledge of mankind' since his task was to combine the particular and the general; public opinion was based on motivation; a playwright who studies this in his public will interest his public Showing: a nation's drama showed its culture Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		to have begun the romantic movement in Italy. ⁷⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional			distance allowed the imagination to operate
By the end of C18th, a body of acting theory was established which contained two distinct positions on the art: 1. ‘that acting was essentially a rationalistic process, a study of the technical means for obtaining a graceful depiction of idealized reality’ (represented by Diderot and Boswell) and 2. that emotional insight and sympathetic imagination were the key, and actors had to ‘go beyond reason to tap the inner springs of feeling’.⁷¹ Actors also engaged in this debate, some coming down on one side, some on the other. See, for example, the debate between Hyppolite Clairon (1723-1803) who supported Diderot (Mémoires 1798) and Marie-Françoise Dumesnil (1713-1803) who championed ‘a sense of pathos’ (Mémoires 1800: 59).⁷² This interest in what was apparently being expressed in contrast to what was actually being felt by the actor was part of a wider social concern about the gap between appearance and reality being expressed by users of the theatre as a metaphor in a much wider field than theatre theory, in particular with regard to what a spectator could or could not perceive (see Appendix C History of the theatre metaphor, Tables 5/17 and 6/17). This concern also led into the development of theories in aesthetics which often included or overlapped theories of the theatre. Although the origins of the kinds of questions which concerned Aesthetics can be found in Plato, modern theories of aesthetics began to emerge in the work of Hume, Kant, Lessing and Hutcheson. Kant in particular confronted the question of how objective aesthetic judgments could be made of what are essentially subjective responses unable to be tied to rules (Critique of Judgment 1790). His answer, that the pleasure of aesthetic experience lies in the consciousness of a harmony produced between understanding and imagination, and was therefore rational and consequently a judgment of taste shared by others,⁷³ produced a dualism which greatly influenced subsequent theorising (especially in Germany) regarding how the connections between individual experience and ‘universal’ rationality might be made through art, including the art of acting,⁷⁴ for, as Kant recognized, ‘we cannot be persuaded that something is beautiful on the say so of others, but insist on submitting it to the verdict of our own experience’.⁷⁵ The concept of taste with relation to aesthetics is said to have arisen with the use by Dominique Bouhours in 1687 of the expression ‘le délicatesse’ (literally delicacy or daintiness) with regard to the importance of emotion in aesthetic appreciation. The idea was taken up by Hutcheson in relation to perception. Hume and then Kant appropriated it for their discussions of aesthetic judgment.⁷⁶ Edmund Burke, a theatre critic and politician, took exception to this conception of taste, producing a brief theory of his own, as well as a more substantial consideration of the difference between the sublime and the beautiful. By the late C18th, theories of theatre had once again begun to move out of the hands of theatre practitioners and into philosophy.

¹ Schiller 1902/1784, ‘The Stage as a Moral Institution’, in Complete Works, Vol VIII, translator anonymous, NY, P.F. Collier and Son, excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 250-254; reprinted in full in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 155-162.

² Schiller 1967/1803, ‘On the Use of the Chorus in Tragedy’, in The Bride of Messina, William Tell, Demetrius, trans. Charles E. Passage, NY, Frederick Ungar; reprinted in Gerould 2000: 255-261 and in Sidnell 1994: 164-170.

³ Gerould 2000: 249

⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 321

⁵ Gerould 2000: 249

⁶ Sidnell 1994: 154n6

⁷ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 174

⁸ Schiller 1902/1784, in Gerould 2000: 250-4, and Carlson 1984: 174. These kinds of sentiments are reiterated as late as 2006: see Tables 50 and 51, especially Armfield.

⁹ Kant is said to have exerted enormous influence on German philosophy in particular and then Western philosophy in general for the publication of his first Critique of Pure Reason in 1781. Not all of this influence was of a positive kind, especially in Anglo-Saxon philosophy. See Graham Bird's article on 'Kantianism' in The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, (ed) Ted Honderich, Oxford, 1995, pp. 439-441.

¹⁰ This idea is further developed by Fichte (1794)

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 177

¹² Schiller 2000/1803: 255

¹³ Schiller 2000/1803: 255-7

¹⁴ Mondot, J. 2005, 'Schiller's theatre and public moral, between political influence and anti-political ideas', Etudes Germaniques 60(4), pp. 681-694, p. 681.

¹⁵ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 33

¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 138

¹⁷ Meacham, Steve. 2007. 'Rough and ready colony had theatrical flair'. The Sydney Morning Herald, 24th September 2007, p. 13.

¹⁸ Sidnell 1994: 172

¹⁹ Excerpts from Lectures 1-5, 17, 18 and 25 are reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 189-205 from Black, John (trans) 1973, Course of Lectures on the Dramatic Art and Literature, New York; excerpt from Lecture 12 'The English and Spanish Drama' from an 1871 edition also translated by Black is reprinted in Gerould 2000: 270-275.

²⁰ Schlegel had a working knowledge of Sanskrit, as well as a number of other languages (Gerould 2000: 268).

²¹ Gerould 2000: 269

²² Schlegel 1871/1809-11, 'Lecture XXII: The English and Spanish Drama', in A Course of Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature, trans. John Black, London, Bell and Daldy; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 270-275, pp. 271-2.

²³ Sidnell 1994: 188

²⁴ Sidnell 1991: 2

²⁵ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 194: Lecture 2

²⁶ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 194-5 Lecture 2

²⁷ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 200-1; Lecture 5

²⁸ Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235. 228

²⁹ Quoted in Crane 1967: 228

³⁰ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 201; Lecture 5

³¹ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 201; Lecture 17

³² Carlson 1984: 180

-
- ³³ Schlegel 1871/1809-11, 'Lecture XXII: The English and Spanish Drama', in A Course of Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature, trans. John Black, London, Bell and Daldy; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 270-275, p. 274.
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 184
- ³⁵ Postlewait, Thomas. 1988. 'The Criteria for Periodization in Theatre History'. Theatre Journal 40 (3) pp. 299-318. 300-2
- ³⁶ Postlewait 1988: 302
- ³⁷ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 185
- ³⁸ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 190
- ³⁹ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 185
- ⁴⁰ Schlegel 1994/1809-11: 195-191
- ⁴¹ Schlegel 1808 in Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. 84n10
- ⁴² Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 12
- ⁴³ Krasner 2008: 17
- ⁴⁴ Kant, Immanuel. 2000/1790. Critique of the Power of Judgment. Translated by P. Guyer and E. Matthews. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 173-4
- ⁴⁵ Blackburn, Simon 1994 The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy, Oxford University Press: 205
- ⁴⁶ Krasner 2008: 16
- ⁴⁷ See Blackburn 1994: 56-7.
- ⁴⁸ Richard Eldridge 2003, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Art, Cambridge MA, Cambridge University Press, p. 55; cited in Krasner 2008: 19.
- ⁴⁹ Quoted in Ben Chaim 1984: 2
- ⁵⁰ Saunders 1790 in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 9
- ⁵¹ Paine, Thomas. 1961/1791-2. 'The Rights of Man'. In Reflections on the Revolution in France and The Rights of Man: Edmund Burke and Thomas Paine. Garden City, New York: Dolphin Books, Doubleday and Company, pp. 267-515. 286, 297.
- ⁵² From 'To the Reader' in Baillie, Joanna 1812, A Series of Plays in which it is attempted to delineate the stronger passions of the mind ..., Vol. III, London; reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 178-182.
- ⁵³ Sidnell 1994: 177
- ⁵⁴ Baillie 1994/1812: 178
- ⁵⁵ Baillie 1994/1812: 179
- ⁵⁶ Barère 1793, in J. Mavido and E. Laurent (eds) 1862-1913, Archives parlementaires de 1787 à 1860, Paris, Librairie Administrative de P. Dupont; quoted in McClellan, Michael E. 2004. 'The Revolution on Stage: Opera and Politics in France, 1789-1800'. Harold White Fellowship Paper: National Library of Australia <http://www.nla.gov.au/grants/haroldwhite/papers/mcclellan.html> accessed 29 May 2007.
- ⁵⁷ Carlson 1984: 183
- ⁵⁸ McClellan, Michael E. 2005. 'Staging the Revolution: Traces of Theatrical Culture in French Revolutionary Pamphlets'. NLA News, May 2005 National Library of Australia <http://www.nla.gov.au/pub/nlanews/2005/may05/article4.htm>; accessed 28 May 2007.
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 187-8, 366

-
- ⁶⁰ Darwin 1799: 72 in Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272. 271
- ⁶¹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 323
- ⁶² McClelland 2005
- ⁶³ Mme de Staël 1871/1810, 'Of Dramatic Art', in Germany, translation anonymous, NY, Hurd and Houghton; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 265-267, and Sidnell 1994: 184-187.
- ⁶⁴ Gerould 2000: 263-4
- ⁶⁵ Jameson, Fredric. 1972. 'The Linguistic Model'. In The Prison-House of Language: A Critical Account of Structuralism and Russian Formalism. Princeton: Princeton University Press, pp. 3-42.5
- ⁶⁶ Gerould 2000: 263
- ⁶⁷ De Staël 2000/1810: 265-7
- ⁶⁸ Gerould 2000: 263
- ⁶⁹ Gerould 2000: 263
- ⁷⁰ Carlson 1984: 198
- ⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 162
- ⁷² Carlson 1984: 162
- ⁷³ Blackburn 1994: 8,205
- ⁷⁴ Carlson 1984: 191
- ⁷⁵ Gaiger, Jason. 2000. 'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste'. European Journal of Philosophy 8 (1) pp. 1-19.12
- ⁷⁶ B. Tregenza 1995, 'Taste', in Honderich 1995: 866.

Table 15/51 Theories of Theatre 1801-1824

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The theatre of 1800 to at least 1875 ‘directly reflected contemporary social and industrial developments’ in which urbanization brought larger audiences, allowing longer runs of popular shows, and technology brought marked changes in theatre architecture, scene design, and presentation,¹ and huge increases in size such that playwright Richard Cumberland could complain in 1806 that ‘The splendour of the scenes, the ingenuity of the machinist, and the rich display of dresses, aided by the captivating charms of the music, now in a great degree supercede the labours of the poet. There can be nothing very gratifying in watching the movements of an actor’s lips, when we cannot hear the words that proceed from them’.² Increasingly during the century ‘theatrical performance existed in many forms catering to distinct audiences’.³ It was a period when ‘a rich tapestry’ of theatrical entertainments was available to ‘a rambunctious, enthusiastic audience’ and an increase in touring theatre, including complete productions.⁴ The beginning of C19th also saw the rise of a rival to French neo-classicism (and French dominance in theory) in German romanticism. The rise of nationalism, however, meant that resistance to the influence of German romanticism became entangled with French patriotism: support for French neoclassicism was seen as a ‘patriotic act’, endorsed by Napoleon, and romanticism took some time to take hold in France. Even then, it was ‘neither unqualified nor long-lasting’.⁵ As late as 1822, a troupe of English actors performing Shakespeare was shouted off the stage in France.⁶ However, in Italy, which had also followed a neoclassic direction with its support of the unities, strict separation of genres, use of elevated language for tragedy and concern for decorum and moral instruction, the growing desire for a free Italian state saw a political connection forged with the romantic movement and opposed to what had come to be considered ‘French’ neoclassicism. This process was encouraged by the Austrian occupation in northern Italy, which aided in the promotion of German romantic ideas,⁷ which had built on Kant’s valorization of the imagination thereby allowing a rejection of ‘the Enlightenment’s self-determining individual exchanging ideas in the public sphere’ in favour of self-discovery through introspection and imagination.⁸ Meanwhile, English criticism and theory tended to be focused around Shakespeare; with most ideas being expressed during the course of a commentary on one of his plays (e.g. Coleridge, Hazlitt, Lamb and De Quincey): ‘much of the romantic theoretical writing tended to become divorced from the theatre’ and, as the nineteenth century advanced ‘the flood of books and serious articles of dramatic and theatrical subjects increased’.⁹ The rise of naturalism saw theory expand to consider costuming and setting as well. A primary influence on this move was the work of Hippolyte Taine (1828-1893), who argued that literature was affected by its environment, particularly by the three ‘primordial’ elements of race, moment and milieu. Race comprised ‘the innate and hereditary dispositions which man brings with him into the world’ and could often be tied to physiology. Milieu was the external surroundings of a people (climate, geography, social and cultural assumptions). Moment was the ‘acquired momentum’ of what race and milieu together had produced at a specific point in time.¹⁰ The products of all human endeavour could be explained in terms of these variables. Zola cites Taine in his essay on costume in Le naturalisme au theatre (1881).¹¹ After Schlegel’s Lectures in Dramatic Poetry (1812), interest in dramatic theory came to be considered in terms of history, as historical documents.¹² Fischer-Lichte argues that from the end of C18th until the beginning of C20th, the focus of theatre theory was centred on the communication between the characters on stage, rather than on the communication between stage and spectator, a focus which was enhanced by the architectural and spatial conditions of the typical European theatre (box set and raised stage).¹³ This is consistent with Diderot’s demand for absorption between the characters, so that the spectator could watch in peace. This focus was to begin to change by the end of the century, with attention being paid to the relationship between stage and auditorium, brought about by the change of focus from language to the body and the new knowledge about theatre of other cultures, especially Japanese theatre. However, Crane argues that the recognition of drama as a performed art before an audience ‘flourished’ during the period 1800-1950. It was ‘probably the most widely accepted frame of reference for writers on the dramatic arts’ and can be seen in the work of Schlegel, Freytag, Sarcey, Brunetière, Brander Matthews, William Archer and George Pierce Baker, to name a few. All of these exhibited ‘a preoccupation, in a thoroughly practical spirit, with questions of dramatic manner in Aristotle’s sense, as determined by the common requirements of literary composition for the stage’ and addressing the question of ‘[h]ow should plays, of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
whatever kind, be written if they are to be actable in theaters to the satisfaction of spectators?”.¹⁴ In other words, theatre remained a place in which drama was enacted, and what were actually produced were theories of drama/poetry. This focus produced ‘a large body of more or less useful advice to playwrights concerning a great variety of technical topics ... validated ... by arguments’ based on precedent and on spectator response. These kinds of questions would not have arisen, according to Crane, without the radical redefinition during the period of both drama and poetry, as two separate entities, and the re-definition of poetry as ‘a certain quality of expression’, usually in verse, rather than Aristotle’s meaning of an imitation constructed by artists.¹⁵ This redefinition then brought about the necessity for critics to explain the relationship between drama and poetry, a question which could not have arisen for Aristotle: ‘critics “are free to lay down their own sets of principles, but once this is done, they can no longer think as they wish – they think as they can”’.¹⁶
Philosophie der Kunst (written 1802-3, published 1809)	F.W.J. Schelling (1775-1854) German philosopher	Presents an historically developed dialectic theory of genres in which reaction against the first poetic form, the epic, produces lyric poetry, with the final synthesis between the two being drama. The driving force is the conflict between necessity and freedom. In tragedy, freedom in the person of the hero is in conflict with objective necessity; in comedy, subjective necessity is in conflict with objective freedom. The end of both tragedy and comedy is the condition of stasis: the restoration of the moral order. Unity of action is the only required unity as it reflects the inner unity of the work. The chorus is an instrument for ‘elevating the spectator ... to the higher sphere of true art and symbolic representation’.¹⁷ Modern drama represents the naivety of the epic, mixing comic and tragic elements and therefore unable to represent the conflict between freedom and necessity. Instead it depends on character, which itself becomes a kind of destiny or nemesis. Tragedy based on character confronts not freedom with necessity, but freedom with freedom. (This conception of character was to be very influential in the romantic movement). Schelling concludes his consideration of drama with a call for the rediscovery of a lost universality, in which the arts of music, poetry, dance and painting are reunited, replacing the current ‘realistic external drama’ by an ‘internal, ideal drama’¹⁸ which would unify its spectators ‘as a people’.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		To unify the spectators as a people	Doing: drama
Memoirs (1806)	Richard Cumberland (1732-1811) sentimental dramatist	It was the duty of the comic dramatist ‘to reserve his brightest coloring for the best characters, to give no false attractions to vice and immorality, but to endeavour, as far as is consistent with that contrast, which is the very essence of his art, to turn the fairer side of human nature to the public’.²⁰ Cumberland complained in his book that theatre had been overtaken by spectacle. They had become ‘so enlarged in the dimensions as to be henceforward theatres for spectators rather than playhouses for hearers ... The splendour of the scenes, the ingenuity of the machinist, and the rich display of dresses, aided by the	A place – now for spectacle rather than for listening (because of its size)	To show something about human life	Doing: play-writing as an art Showing: the fairer side of human nature Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		captivating charms of the music, now in a great degree supercede the labours of the poet. There can be nothing very gratifying in watching the movements of an actor's lips, when we cannot hear the words that proceed from them'.²¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-spectacle View of Theatre: functional			hearers were now spectators rather than listeners
Über die dramatische Kunst (1806)	Adam Müller (1779-1829) German Romantic Critic, political economist and publicist	Attempted to avoid the classic versus modern dualism prevalent at the time. Although all poetry 'belongs to one great organism', it will vary according to the 'scientific, economic and religious concerns' of the time, since each work is part of the social system of its own era. This approach allowed a tolerance for a wide variety of work, and allowed Müller to defend both French classicism and romantic drama as appropriate for the particular social systems and times in which they were embedded. They should therefore be judged by different standards. Drama was a mirror 'not of nature but of the political, economic, and religious concerns of a specific community'.²² Müller proposed that the theatre should stand 'between the marketplace and the church' so that it could 'serve as a link between the concerns of everyday life and those of eternity'. Both comedy and tragedy were seen as affirmative: comedy stresses joy and life, while tragedy demonstrated the conquering of death. He was very critical of contemporary drama, 'divided in half by the proscenium, on one side of which are those on the stage who are only seen and on the other those in the audience who only see', arguing that the original, and ideal, form of drama was as 'a communal celebration, not a one-sided spectacle, a cold representation, or a petty mirror of manners'.²³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-contemporary drama View of Theatre: functional	A place; a social institution between the market and the church	To reflect a community's political, economic and religious concerns; to affirm the community; to celebrate the community	Doing: drama – part of its social system Watching: concern about the separation between performers and spectators; advocated a collapse of the gap between the two in communal celebration
Critical Essays on the Performers of the London Theatres (1807)	Leigh Hunt (1784-1859) English essayist	Drama is 'the most perfect imitation of human life'. It 'teaches us in the most impressive way the knowledge of ourselves'. Hunt takes a neoclassic line with regard to the two major genres, but argues that 'passion is the essence of tragedy', and it is from passion that good acting flows.²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	A place in which drama is performed	The imitation of life in order to teach	Doing: drama; acting Showing: knowledge of ourselves
'Shakespeare's Judgment Equal to His	Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834) English poet,	Coleridge expressed ideas very similar to the German romantics, especially the Schlegels. He was unhappy with contemporary drama and saw his dramatic criticism as an effort 'to reform the theatre and through it the political life of the nation' both of which were (post-French Revolution) 'too open to the influence of vulgar, levelling (or democratic)	A place of entertainment and amusement	Imitation or representation of reality for the purposes	Doing: poesy (drama; plays): 'the stage' – the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Genius' (1808-1819); 'On Poesy or Art'; The Drama Generally and Public Taste'; Biographia Literaria (III.6); 'Progress of the Drama'; various Notes and fragments; 'On "what the drama should be"' (c1808); 'Desultory Remarks on the Stage and the present state of the Higher Drama' (1808)²⁵	playwright and critic	views'.²⁶ He also shared with other Romantic critics 'a fundamental distrust of scenic aspects of performance' and, like many of his contemporaries, was 'fixated' on Shakespeare.²⁷ He introduced into English criticism the romantic idea that a play possessed its own internal unity. Each drama grew from a single organizing idea, involving an imbalance or opposition which the play must resolve. The dynamic of art is reconciliation (based on Kant's opposition of reason and understanding, reconciled by imagination). The 'one great principle' common to all the arts was an 'ever-varying balance, or balancing, of images, notions, or feelings, conceived as in opposition to each other' ('The Drama'). The stage is a harmonious combination of all the arts with the aim of 'imitating reality ... under a semblance of reality' ('Progress'). Semblance requires a contribution from the spectator: a 'willing suspension of disbelief' – 'a sort of temporary half-faith, which the spectator encourages in himself' so that 'We choose to be deceived': 'Not only are we never deluded, or anything like it; but the highest possible degree of delusion to beings in their senses sitting in a theatre is a gross fault, incident only to low minds, who feeling unconsciously that they cannot affect the heart or head permanently, endeavour to call forth the momentary affections – pain no more than what is compatible with co-existing pleasure and to be amply repaid by thought – else onions, or shaving the upper lip'.²⁸ Also drama is 'not a copy of nature; but it is an imitation. This is the universal principle of the fine arts [and] what we delight in'.²⁹ Theatre, on the other hand, 'is the general term for all places of amusement through the ear or eye in which men assemble in order to be amused by some entertainment presented to all at the same time'.³⁰ The fact that Coleridge felt the need to spell this out reflects the struggle over the definition of the word which was occurring during this period.³¹ The 'STAGE (res theatralis histrionic)' is 'the most important and dignified of this genus' and can be 'characterized ... as a combination of several, or of all the fine arts to an harmonious whole having a distinct end of its own, to which the peculiar end of each of the component arts ... is made subordinate and subservient; that, namely, of imitating reality ... under a semblance of reality ... stage presentations are to produce a sort of temporary half-faith, which the spectator encourages in himself and supports by a voluntary contribution on his own part, because he knows that it is at all times in his power to see the thing as it really it ... this suspension of the act of comparison [e.g. between a forest and a representation of a forest], which permits this sort of negative		of reconciliation ; aesthetics – a play was an aesthetic object while theatre was a place of entertainment	performance aspects of drama Watching: the spectator chooses to be deceived (willing suspension of disbelief)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		belief, is ... assisted by the will'. It is neither 'actual delusion' nor the denial of it altogether.³² English contemporaries of Coleridge had little tolerance for what they saw as 'abstract speculation'.³³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic/analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
1810: first gaslight and then limelight is introduced into theatre. An enormous increase in the range of lighting effects available both for the stage and in the auditorium which fostered spectacular productions, and also encouraged actors to move behind the proscenium arch since they could now be seen. The introduction of electric lighting in 1880 increased this tendency enormously, a move which 'weakened' the actor/spectator bond, according to Blackadder,³⁴ but perhaps protected the actor from spectators.
'On the Marionette Theatre' (1810) ³⁵	Heinrich von Kleist (1777-1811) German playwright	Kleist wrote seven plays, none of which he saw performed, partly because Goethe thought they were 'waiting for a theatre yet to come'.³⁶ His work has since been recognized as 'of uniquely dramatic genius'. The idea of the actor as puppet for the playwright foreshadows the concerns of Craig, Maeterlinck, Appia and others. A marionette would 'never act affectedly ... [they] have the advantage of antigravity', lack vanity and self-consciousness and refuse to deceive or be deceived. A human re-learning these things would regain their innocence.³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre View of Theatre: functional	A practice	Re-education	Doing: play-wrighting
'Schlegel on the Drama'; Lectures on the English Poets; The Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (1817); 'On Modern Comedy'; 'On Actors and Acting' (1817); ³⁸ A View of the English Stage (1818); Lectures on	William Hazlitt (1778-1830) English theatre critic and reviewer; teacher	Great poets (such as Shakespeare) exhibit a sympathetic identification 'with human nature in all its shapes, degrees, depressions, and elevations'. The effect of dramatic poetry is also based on sympathy: the audience is moved by the work as the poet was moved by nature.³⁹ Sympathy overcomes selfishness, giving 'a high and permanent interest, beyond ourselves, in humanity as such', teaching us 'that there are and have been others like himself ... It opens the chambers of the human heart'.⁴⁰ Hazlitt considers comedy inferior to tragedy because it elicits detachment rather than sympathy, appealing 'to our indolence, our vanity, our weakness and insensibility'. For this reason he condemns plays which combine tragedy with comedy (even Shakespeare's). Despite his negative view of comedy, he sees it as having a moral purpose: by exposing vices and follies it encourages its audience to correct or at least hide these faults in themselves. However, both genres end up exhausting their material: comedy leaves nothing to laugh at, while tragedy disengages men from the world so that they 'learn to exist, not in [themselves], but in books'. This creates a barrier between man and nature and dooms drama, eventually, to extinction.⁴¹ Actors were 'the only honest hypocrites ... The height of their ambition is to be beside themselves ... They ... hold up a glass to humanity ... We see ourselves at second-hand in them: they show us all that we are, all that we wish to	A place for public exhibitions	The generation of sympathy in order to teach, provide models for imitation and refinement and to amuse and provide an occasion for interaction between different groups and classes	Doing: dramatic poetry - good playwrighting and acting is based on sympathy and attempts to elicit sympathy from spectators. The Stage: the term referring to all the activities involved in the performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the English Comic Writers (1819); Lectures Chiefly on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth (1820)		be, and all that we dread to be. The stage is an epitome, a bettered likeness of the world, with the dull part left out' and we imitate actors as they imitate us ... They teach us when to laugh and when to weep, when to love and when to hate, upon principle, and with a good grace! Wherever there is a playhouse , the world will go on not amiss. The stage not only refines the manners, but is it the best teacher of morals, for it is the truest and most intelligible picture of life ⁴² ... the acting of the Beggar's Opera ... has done more towards putting down the practice of highway robbery than all the gibbets that ever were erected' or any sermon. 'If the stage is useful as a school of instruction, it is no less so as a source of amusement ... and a never-failing fund of agreeable reflection afterwards ... public exhibitions contribute to refine and humanize mankind ... by supplying them with ideas and subjects of conversation and interest in common... the stage thus introduces us familiarly to our contemporaries' as well as teaches us about history and other cultures and the profession of acting provides us with an example of how to cross class barriers since 'there is no class of society whom so many persons regard with affection as actors'. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			of drama Showing: vice, folly and tragedy Watching: the effects of dramatic poetry are based on sympathy
'My First Play'; 'On the Tragedies of Shakespeare ...' (1811); 'On the Artificial Comedy of the Last Century' (1822); 'Stage Illusion' (1825);	Charles Lamb (1775-1834) English essayist	Theatre is 'the most delightful of recreations'. ⁴⁴ Lamb, like Hazlitt, contrasts tragedy and comedy on the basis of sympathy and detachment. ⁴⁵ Dramatic delight requires 'a judicious understanding ... between the ladies and gentlemen on both sides of the curtain'. There is no such thing as the perfect illusion on stage. A certain distancing is both inevitable because of the physical reality of the stage and useful for it not only prevents the spectator losing himself in the play, but also removes the play from any moral consideration. Plays are 'a world of themselves almost as much as fairyland ... a passing pageant, where we should sit as unconcerned at the issues ... as at the battle of the frogs and mice'. Perhaps for this reason, Lamb famously declared that Shakespeare was better read than acted, for it allowed the reader to lose himself in the play without being distracted by 'body and bodily action'. ⁴⁶ Lamb argued that 'acting was in itself so artificial as to preclude any performer – even the most celebrated – from feeling the passion of a character or scene during the acting'. ⁴⁷	A place of recreation	To create 'a world' in itself, a recreation	Doing: plays acting: all acting is artifice the stage: the place of performance Watching: requires a 'judicious understanding' between spectators and performers; distancing is inevitable

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			(although morally regrettable) because of the physical reality of the stage
'Essay on the Drama' (1814)	Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) English novelist	The aim of every artist is to bring to his spectators 'the same sublime sensations that had dictated his own compositions'. Drama has a better chance of doing this because it uses physical representation. Nevertheless, he agrees with Lamb that Shakespeare might provide 'a more lively impression' when read. ⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Generating an impression through representation	Doing: drama (an embodied art)
Lettera semiseria di Grisostomo a suo figliuolo (1816)	Giovanni Berchet (1783-1851) Italian poet and patriot	Drew a distinction between classicism and romanticism as 'the poetry of the dead' and 'the poetry of the living' with regard to the subjects treated and methods employed: ⁴⁹ 'the romantic writer deals with his own culture, speaks to the common man, and imitates nature; the classic author deals with the cultures of the past, writes for scholars, and creates "an imitation of imitations"'. ⁵⁰ He considered the strict division of drama into tragedy and comedy as well insistence on the unities of time and place as unnatural restrictions on the freedom of the poet, scoffing at precise calculations of time which suggested that 'an additional minute will overburden the poor human mind'. He also scoffed at the idea that spectators would be so deluded in the theatre that they would think a stage setting reality, and so not be able to accept scene changes. ⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		Different forms have different aims	Doing: poetry (drama) Watching: spectators were not deluded by what they saw on stage
'Due articoli sulla Vera idea della tragedia di V. Alfieri' (1818) ⁵²	Silvio Pellico (1789-1854) Italian dramatist and essayist	Dramatic forms must change as theatrical conditions change. So should the subject matter of drama. ⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		Reflection of social conditions	Doing: drama
Idee elementary sulla poesia	Ernes Visconti (1784-1841) Italian author	Argued that the unity of time confused two sorts of time operating in the theatre: the time required for the development of the events portrayed and the attention span of the spectator. ⁵⁴	A place in which drama is watched	Dual : a concern for the internal	Doing: poetry (drama)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
romantica (1818); Dialogo sulla unit� drammatiche di luogo e di tempo (1819)	and philosopher	Purpose of Theorist: polemic - anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	by spectators	relations within the play (aesthetic) and the physical comfort of the spectator (practical)
Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (The World as Will and Idea) (1819); Parerga; Paralipomena	Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) German philosopher	Essential theorist. ‘The end of drama in general is to show us in example what is the nature and existence of man’. ⁵⁵ Art under certain circumstances can provide temporary relief from the ceaseless striving of the Will (Kant’s Ding-an-sich or ‘unknowable essence’). Tragedy, in particular, by emphasising the futility of struggle takes us to a point of ‘disinterested contemplation of the process’, thereby producing a momentary quietus . Modern tragedies of everyday life are best for this since they remind us of our own situations. Comedies, by contrast, offer only an accidental and transient view of life, which disguises the reality of suffering. They are of little interest to the ‘reflective spectator’. While actors can never completely efface their own individuality, the best give ‘equal truth and naturalness to every character’ they present. ⁵⁶ A ‘work of art must be perceptual’ before it can carry any other value, ‘and to be perceived the work must be particular’. ⁵⁷ “Great poets transform themselves into each of the persons to be represented, and speak out of each ... like ventriloquists ... Poets of the second rank transform the principal person to be represented into themselves’ leaving the other characters lifeless. ⁵⁸ Schopenhauer ‘became a superbly qualified spectator’ of the theatre while on a grand tour with his parents in 1803 and ‘[b]y the time he was in his twenties, [he] was intimately acquainted with the theatre of five nations in their native languages’ as well as knowing commedia , Sanskrit drama and the classics and romantics. He had a strong interest in popular arts and ‘frequented the theatre and opera regularly all his life’. ⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional		To show examples from which we can learn; to produce quietus	Doing: poetry (drama) - a perceptual art acting: actors can never efface themselves completely Showing: ‘in example ... the nature and existence of man’ Watching: we learn to accept the futility of struggle Schopenhauer acknowledges himself as a spectator
�ber das Wesen des	Franz Grillparzer	The essence of drama lies in strong causality, thereby emphasising necessity at the expense of freedom. The theatre ‘does not and should not’ offer spectators ‘pleasant	A place; an activity	Elevation of the spirit	Doing: drama - a way of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Drama (1820)	(1791-1872) Austrian dramatist	entertainment or trite morals' – it should provide 'a kind of exhilaration': ⁶⁰ 'an elevation of the spirit, an exaltation of the whole existence' which comes through 'an overview over the totality of life; insight into oneself; the meshing together of one's sufferings and those of others'. ⁶¹ (A similar view is expressed by Grillparzer's contemporary, Schopenhauer). Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-popular theatre View of Theatre: functional			viewing the whole Showing: a view of the whole
Preface to Il conte di Carmagnola (1820); Lettre à M. C—sur l'unité de temps et de lieu dans la tragédie (1823)	Alessandro Manzini (1785-1873) Italian romantic author	Theatre should improve mankind. Application of arbitrary rules such as the unities tended to reduce its effectiveness. The Lettre was an extended response to French criticism regarding this position. In it Manzini claimed that French neoclassicism misunderstood the unities, severely restricting the freedom of their poets. Unity of action, for instance, did not require a single event, only that a series of events be closely related. Theatre, particularly tragedy, 'can help us learn the habit to fixing our thoughts on those calm and great ideas which overpower and dissolve everyday realities and which ... will unquestionably improve our wisdom and dignity'. ⁶² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: functional		To improve mankind	Doing: poetry (tragedy) Showing: the transcendence of everyday realities
Defense of Poetry (c1821, published 1840) ⁶³	Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822) English Romantic poet	Poetry is 'a product of the imagination that synthesizes things known into eternal truths, giving both pleasure and moral improvement'. ⁶⁴ Shelley believed that the Greeks possessed the only true theatre, which 'employed language, action, music, painting, the dance, and religious institution, to produce a common effect in the representation of the highest idealism of passion and power'. The modern period had separated and weakened the arts. Drama was now 'in thrall' to social conditions, decaying as society decayed (as in the Restoration). Poets must rescue drama and restore it as the mirror of the best in man. For this reason, poets should be the 'legislators of the world'. ⁶⁵ Shelley argued that the emancipation of women was an illustration of the legislative power of the poet: 'if the error which confounded diversity with inequality has been partially recognized ... we owe this great benefit to the worship of which chivalry was the law, and poets the prophets'. ⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre View of Theatre: positive	A multi-faceted art	To mirror the best in man	Doing: poetry (drama) Showing: the best in man
1820-21: the first formal black theatre in America, the African Grove, founded by William Brown (an African American) and James Hewlett (a West Indian actor). The black actor Ira Aldridge (1806-1867) performed at the African Grove before becoming a touring star, one of the leading Shakespearean actors of the century in Europe where he had gone because he could not gain acceptance in America. James Hewlett was the first black man to play Othello. Racial tension led the police to close the theatre around 1820. ⁶⁷

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth’ (1823); ‘Theory of Greek Tragedy’ (1840); ‘The Antigone of Sophocles as Represented on the Edinburgh Stage’ (1846).	Thomas De Quincey (1785-1859) English author and intellectual	The effect of tragedy comes from the juxtaposition of opposites. Comedy tends to be a universal form; the form of tragedy varies enormously from one place or time to another. ⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Affect	Doing: drama
Racine et Shakespeare: Chapters 1-3 (1823); ⁶⁹ Racine et Shakespeare II (1825)	Henri Beyle (Stendhal) (1783-1842) French writer	One of the first to use the term romanticism . Pleasure is the purpose of tragedy, a pleasure of reflection rather than admiration. It occurs in the brief moments of ‘perfect illusion’ which are achieved in the theatre. Stendhal draws a famous distinction between classicism and romanticism: ‘Romanticism is the art of offering the public literary works which, given their present habits and beliefs, are capable of giving them the greatest possible pleasure. Classicism, on the other hand, offers them the literature which gave the greatest possible pleasure to their grandparents’. ⁷⁰ Hence it is imitation which defines classicism. Comedy in particular is conditioned by its social circumstance. A ‘light-hearted’ society will produce comedy of universal amusement; a rigid society will produce comedy which is limited in its ability to amuse. Stendhal’s comments provoked an intense debate in Paris. Romanticism was officially condemned by the Académie Française in 1824. It was declared by the Grand Master of the University of Paris ‘an attack on the monarchy and organized religion’. In his 1825 response, Stendhal repeated his claim that classicism was mere imitation of great romanticists of the past. He called for an end to ‘epic and official language’ as well as the artificial support given classicism by the church and state through censorship. ⁷¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive (classical) theory View of Theatre:		Pleasure	Doing: drama (comedy and tragedy) - an art which is conditioned by its society Showing: moments of ‘perfect illusion’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		positive
Mémoires en réponse aux mémoires d'Hippolyte Clairon (1823) ⁷²	Mlle Dumesnil (Marie-Francoise Marchand) (1713-1803) French actress	Dumesnil was 'one of the outstanding players of her time'. ⁷³ She distinguished between the illusion created by the playwright, and that created by the actor: 'The distance between the art of composition and that of recitation is incommensurable'. ⁷⁴ She believed that spectators would be reached 'through emotions rather than intellect', however the performer 'should always be conscious of the effect she is making as a performer on the spectators, rather than confining her attention to the supposed reactions of the imaginary character' as Diderot proposed. Diderot was particularly critical of Dumesnil for this 'theatricality'. Her 'whole treatise on the principles of the art of the theatre' entailed five questions applied to every one on the stage: 'Who am I with respect to every other character ? Who am I in each scene? Where am I? What have I done? And what am I going to do?' Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive acting theory (Diderot) View of Theatre: positive	A place of performance	To reach spectators through their emotions	Doing: acting – involved artifice, and performing with an awareness of the effect being made on the spectator as well as the relationships between characters

¹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.355

² Cited in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.9

³ Blackadder 2003: xiii

⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 352

⁵ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 270

⁶ Carlson 1984: 203

⁷ Carlson 1984: 198

⁸ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 19

⁹ Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers. 208

¹⁰ Hippolyte Taine 1866-71, Histoire de la littérature anglaise, Paris, 5 vols., Vol 1, pp. xxiii-xxx, xlii-xliii; in Carlson 1984: 278.

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 277

¹² Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 2

¹³ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 41, 65

¹⁴ Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.229-230

-
- ¹⁵ Crane 1967: 230, 233-4
- ¹⁶ Crane, quoting philosopher Etienne Gilson, 1967: 217
- ¹⁷ Schelling 1839, Sämmtliche Werke, Stuttgart, Vol 5, p. 705; in Carlson 1984: 186.
- ¹⁸ Schelling 1839, Sämmtliche Werke, Stuttgart, Vol 5, p. 736; in Carlson 1984: 187.
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 187
- ²⁰ Richard Cumberland 1806, Memoirs, London, p. 141; in Carlson 1984: 137.
- ²¹ Cited in Blackadder 2003: 9
- ²² Carlson 1984: 189
- ²³ Müller, 1806, 'Vorlesungen über die deutsche Wissenschaft und Literatur', in Kritische, aesthetische, und philosophische Schriften, Berlin, Vol. 1, p. 129-30; in Carlson 1984: 189.
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 227
- ²⁵ Excerpts from these two 1808 texts reprinted from T.M. Raysor, 1930 Coleridge's Shakespearean Criticism, 2 vols., Cambridge MA; in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 221-225.
- ²⁶ Sidnell 1994: 219
- ²⁷ Sidnell 1994: 220
- ²⁸ Coleridge 1994/c1808: 222. Also cited in Carlson 1984: 219-221. Coleridge's remarks on drama are fragmentary and scattered, often untitled.
- ²⁹ Coleridge 1994/c1808: 222
- ³⁰ Coleridge 1994/c1808: 224
- ³¹ See discussion in Chapter 3.
- ³² Coleridge 1994/c1808: 225
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 221
- ³⁴ Blackadder 2003: 11
- ³⁵ Reprinted from Sembder, Helmut (ed) 1982, Samtliche Werke und Briefe in Vier Banden, 4 vols., Munich in Sidnell 1994: 235-240.
- ³⁶ Cited in Sidnell 1994: 234
- ³⁷ Kleist 1994/1810: 235-240
- ³⁸ Reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 242-248 from Howe, P.P. (ed) 1930-34, The Complete Works of William Hazlitt, London.
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 222
- ⁴⁰ Hazlitt 1930-34, 'Characters of Shakespeare's Plays' in Collected Works, ed. P.P. Howe, London, Vol 4, pp. 200, 346-47; in Carlson 1984: 222.
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 223
- ⁴² Hazlitt 1994/1817: 242
- ⁴³ Hazlitt 1994/1817: 242-4
- ⁴⁴ Lamb 1965, 'My First Play' in (ed.) A.S. Cairncross, Eight Essayists, London, Macmillan & Co Ltd, p. 124.
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 224
- ⁴⁶ Charles and Mary Lamb 1903, Works, (ed.) E.V. Lucas, New York, Vol. 1, p. 108; Vol 2., p. 144, 165; in Carlson 1984: 224-5.

-
- ⁴⁷ Lamb in Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272.272
- ⁴⁸ Scott 1827, Miscellaneous Prose Works, Edinburgh, Vol. 6, pp. 368-9; in Carlson 1984: 225.
- ⁴⁹ Berchet 1972, Opere, Naples, p. 463; in Carlson 1984: 198.
- ⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 198. Berchet recognized that this definition meant that Greek poets like Homer and Sophocles were 'romantics' in their own time, in some respects (Carlson 1984: 198).
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 199
- ⁵² Published in the journal Pellico compiled, Il conciliatore, September 6, 1818, and reprinted in Egidio Bellorini (ed) 1943, Discussioni e polemiche sul romanticismo, Bari, Vol. 1, p. 408; in Carlson 1984: 199.
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 199
- ⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 2000
- ⁵⁵ Schopenhauer 1883-6/1819/1844, The World as Will and Idea, trans. R.B. Haldane and J. Kemp, London, Trubner and Co; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 290-297. 292.
- ⁵⁶ Schopenhauer 1888, Sämmtliche Werke, Vol. 3, p. 500; Vol 6, pp. 469-70; in Carlson 1984: 193.
- ⁵⁷ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 31
- ⁵⁸ Schopenhauer 1883-6/1819/1844, in Gerould 2000: 293.
- ⁵⁹ Gerould 2000: 288-9
- ⁶⁰ Carlson 1984: 190
- ⁶¹ Grillparzer 1909-48, Sämmtliche Werke, Vol. 14, part 1, page 31 and Vol. 7, part 2, page 332; in Carlson 1984: 190-1.
- ⁶² Manzoni 1957-1974, Tutte le opere, Milan, Vol. 2, p. 1710; in Carlson 1984: 202.
- ⁶³ Shelley 1948/1840, A Defence of Poetry and A Letter to Lord Ellenborough, London; excerpt in Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371.370.
- ⁶⁴ Carlson 1984: 227
- ⁶⁵ Shelley 1880, Works, London, Vol. 7, pp. 114, 144; in Carlson 1984: 228.
- ⁶⁶ Shelley 1948/1840: 35-37
- ⁶⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 375
- ⁶⁸ Carlson 1984: 225-6, 228
- ⁶⁹ Chapters 1, 2 and 3 were published separately in the Paris Monthly Review of British and Continental Literature (Carlson 1984: 203).
- ⁷⁰ Beyle 1927-37, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 13, p. 43; in Carlson 1984: 203.
- ⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 204-5
- ⁷² Republished in Geneva 1968; excerpt translated and reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 95-101; Hippolyte Clairon was a rival actress, whose approach to acting was along the line approved of by Diderot.
- ⁷³ Sidnell 1994: 94
- ⁷⁴ Dumesnil 1994/1823: 95

Table 16/51 Theories of Theatre 1825-1835

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Blackadder argues that the period increasingly saw ' the rise of the visual ', with the spectator taking precedence over the 'auditor', a term which had been used interchangeably with spectator by Colley Cibber in 1740 but now disappeared from use. The 1830s included a number of records reflecting that 'the pleasures of the stage had migrated from the ears almost entirely'. ¹
Reflections of the Actor's Art (1825)	François-Joseph Talma (1763-1826) Great French actor	The comic actor represents everyday persons, for which he must draw on his own nature. The tragic actor must preserve the ideal forms created by the poet, which requires technical skill as well. Nevertheless, contrary to Diderot, sensibility is more important than intelligence in acting in producing a deeply moving performance. There are 'three phases in the functioning of sensibility. The first reflects merely the traditional demand that the actor be truly moved by the emotions of his part and that his sensibility be sincere enough to affect his body and voice. It is now that the creative, artistic insight of the imagination takes place – not ... the imagination which vividly recalls objects formerly perceived, "but that imagination which, creative, active and powerful, consists in collecting in one single fictitious object, the qualities of several real objects, which associates the actor with the inspirations of the poet, transports him back to the past, and enables him to look on at the lives of historical personages or the impassioned figures created by genius, - which reveals to him, as tho by magic, their physiognomy, their heroic stature, their language, their habits, all the shades of their character, all the movements of their soul, and even their singularities"', allowing the actor to identify with his role. ² Wasserman considers this the most complete expression of the theory of the sympathetic imagination in acting. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; practical		To move the spectator	Doing: acting (different skills for different genres) requires imagination in order to identify with the role
1825 Pierre Rémond de Sainte-Albine's book Le comédien (1749), an extended treatise on acting which took the position of Luigi Riccoboni (1738) that actors should feel the emotions they were expressing, is republished.
Théorie de l'art du comédien (1826)	Aristippe Bernier de Maligny (d. 1864) Well-known French actor	Distinguished between 'actors by imitation' (neither outstandingly good nor outstandingly bad); 'actors by nature' (relied on genius and were therefore highly erratic); and 'sublime actors' (they 'coldly observed human nature' then 'rendered it with spirit and energy'). ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti sympathetic imagination theory of acting View		Representation of human nature	Doing: acting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	and teacher	of Theatre: positive; practical
Nachgelassene Schriften und Briefwechsel (1826)	Karl Wilhelm Ferdinand Solger (1780-1819) German philosopher	Influenced by Schelling. Irony was the basis of all art, including drama. It is in art that the 'temporary union of the absolute and the accidental, of the world of essence and that of phenomena, can be achieved'. ⁴ Although his conception of irony is similar to Friedrich Schlegel's, Solger is considered to have provided the first serious, philosophic development of the concept. Where he differed was in his interpretation of tragedy and comedy. Since both were based on irony, both must provide at least a momentary glimpse of eternal order. In tragedy the universal is affirmed over the individual. Solger influenced the views of Hegel and Hebel. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		A glimpse of eternal order; irony	Showing: drama (art) - a glimpse of eternal order Watching: the recognition of a higher order through art
Preface to Cromwell (1827); ⁵ Preface to Hernani (1830); revised preface to Marion de Lorme (1831); Preface to Le roi s'amuse (1831); Lucrèce Borgia (1833)	Victor Hugo (1802-1885) French poet, playwright, political dissident ⁶	Essential theorist. Hugo launched the major period of romantic theory in France with the success of Hernani . Its 'tumultuous premiere' resulted in fist fights between the supporters of romanticism and the defenders of classicism. ⁷ Inspired by the melodramas of Pixérécourt, Hugo introduced the idea of the grotesque as the driving force which pushes poetry from lyric to epic to dramatic phases in each historical era. The grotesque was associated with Christianity, which 'forces the poet to deal with the full truth of reality'. ⁸ The poetry born of Christianity was the drama, 'the only poetic form that seeks the real' by 'combining the sublime and the grotesque' in order to achieve 'a harmony of contraries'. ⁹ The classical rules are in fact undercut by verisimilitude, since they do not match reality. Drama is not an ordinary mirror, which reflects poorly, but 'a focusing mirror which ... collects and condenses the rays of light ... from a glimmer it must make light; from light, a flame'. ¹⁰ The theatre was 'an optical point' a 'point of view': '[a]ll that is found in the world, in history, in life, in man, can and ought to be reflected in it, but under the magic wand of art ... which arouses the enthusiasm of the spectator, and of the poet'. ¹¹ The lifting of censorship with the revolution of 1830 brought an enthusiastic review of the role of the poet: it was the poet's responsibility 'to create a theatre in its entirety, a vast yet simple theatre, one varied, national in its historical subjects, popular in its truth, human, natural, and universal in its passions'. Hugo specifically linked romanticism in literature with liberalism in politics, but claimed that both classicism and romanticism were outmoded and should be 'swallowed up in the united consciousness of the masses, upon which the art of the future must be based'. ¹² Theatre had a moral function, 'a natural mission, a social mission, a humane mission [to leave its spectators	A cultural institution; an 'optical point'; a point of view; a focusing mirror; a practice	To hold up a concentrating mirror before different classes of spectators to arouse enthusiasm and provide moral instruction	Doing: playwrighting: action with passion is the prime essential for a play in order to arouse enthusiasm in the spectator Showing: 'The real', accessed through contradiction; the connection between the arts and politics; Watching: there are three classes of spectator: a great play

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		with] some austere and profound morality’ best achieved by touching ‘upon everything without being stained by anything’.¹³ The genre of drame is ‘the third great form of art’ because it contains and merges comedy and tragedy. The genre of melodrama, on the other hand does not combine the best features of comedy and tragedy, and is ‘vulgar and inferior’. Each genre appeals to different kinds of spectators: women are interested in tragedy (because of the passions and emotions); the general crowd in melodrama (because of its action-filled plot and sensational effects). Thinkers enjoy comedy because of their interest in human beings and their motives.¹⁴ Thinkers demand characterisation in plays; women demand passion and the mob demand action. Every great play must appeal to all three at once. Hamilton argues that Hugo’s successful play Ruy Blas applies these rules, but not evenly, indicating that appeal to the mob is more important than appeal to women, which is more important than appeal to thinkers. Hamilton puts this down to the fact that more of the first two attend plays than the third¹⁵ [an economic consideration!] Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; functional			appeals to all three.
This period saw considerable debate over the relationship between melodrama and the romantic drama (a relationship which continues to be debated). Few theorists of classicism or romanticism bothered with the genre, classicism often conflating it with romantic drama. According to neoclassic critic Jean-Louis Geoffroy, ‘the determining characteristics of melodrama are the abuse of pantomime and machines, combats, dances, the mixing of tragedy and low comedy, declamation and bombast’.¹⁶ Spectators might see ‘a snow-storm, a conflagration, a shipwreck, trap-doors of all sorts, disguises, songs, dances, thunder in a variety of forms, abductions, escape-ladders, combustible hogsheads, forests, dressing rooms, caverns, every imaginable alteration of the seasons and all possible degrees of light and darkness, from sunrise to midnight’.¹⁷ A feature was the ‘tableaux vivant’ in which action came to a halt and characters were arranged as if in a portrait. Melodrama was seen as the theatre of the proletariat in contrast to the classic theatre and the ‘well-made play’ (introduced by Eugene Scribe). It has nevertheless proved ‘a popular and durable form’.¹⁸ Much of the debate over the two forms (melodrama and romantic drama) took place in prefaces and introductions attached to plays either by critics or the playwrights themselves.
‘Réflexions sur la verité dans l’art’ – preface to Cinq-Mars (1827); ‘Lettre’ (1829);	Alfred de Vigny (1797-1863) French novelist and translator	Draws a distinction between the True (le Vrai) ‘which is the totality of objective facts and events’ (the historian’s province) and Truth (la Vérité), ‘which is an attempt to explain and understand these facts in terms of human imagination’ (the poet’s province).¹⁹ Truth is ‘an ideal ensemble of [the True’s] principal forms ... the sum total of all its values’ created from the ‘choosing and grouping [of the True] ‘around an invented center’. It is Truth which is the goal of dramatic art.²⁰ The goal of the dramatist is threefold: to offer ‘a sweeping picture of life ... ‘characters, not roles’ and a mixture of the comic, tragic and epic.’²¹ A work should be related to its historical setting: ‘To present a tragedy is nothing		The creation of an ‘evening’ or ‘occasion’ in which a view of Truth and of life might be seen	Doing: poetry (dramatic art); producing an ‘occasion’ Showing: a momentary view of Truth

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Dernière nuit de travail (1835)		else than to prepare an evening, and the most accurate title ought to be the date of the performance', ²² an anticipation of C20th theorists who 'regard drama as occasion'. ²³ In 1835 Vigny claimed that '[t]he most vain of vanities is perhaps that of literary theories, which have their moment of popularity and are soon ridiculed and forgotten'. What he was acknowledging was a change in public taste, away from grand effects towards simpler more serious drama, which he called 'the drama of thought', the kind of theatre which he had condemned in 1829. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
Tableau de la poésie française au XVIe siècle (1828)	Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804-1869) French literary historian and critic	A significant defence of romanticism, recommending that the French look back to the Renaissance for inspiration rather than to the classicism of the C17th. ²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			Doing: poetry - an art which changes over time
Preface to Etudes française et étrangères (1828)	Emile Deschamps (1797-1871) French poet	True romantic drama is to be found 'in the individualized painting of characters, in the continual replacement of recitation by action, in the simplicity of the poetic language or the coloring'. ²⁵ Deschamps recommended that the French translate Shakespeare as a way of overcoming their classicist restraints. ²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To present in action	Doing: drama (a performed art - action not recitation)
Preface to Henri III et sa tour (1829); Preface to Napoléon Bonaparte; Antony (1831)	Alexandre Dumas (1802-1870) French novelist and playwright	Claimed the only rules he followed were 'to amuse and to interest'. ²⁷ His play Antony (1831) contains a discussion of the difficulty of writing plays in a democratic era such as the Revolution had ushered in. In comedies 'the painting of manners' is impossible for 'all social classes have been confounded'. Drama, on the other hand, deals with the passions and if an attempt is made to portray these in a modern setting, the writer is accused of exaggeration. The play nevertheless attempts to present a dramatization of a personal emotional crisis, in what Dumas calls a 'scene of love, jealousy, and wrath in five acts'. ²⁸ It was attacked for its immorality. Dumas claimed that this was because the spectators recognized themselves 'as in a mirror'. The moral function of drame was rendered ambiguous in Antony , anticipating the popular 'shocking' drama of the C19th. ²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive		To amuse and to interest; to explore modern reality	Doing: playwrighting Showing: a dramatization of a personal emotional crisis Watching: the audience recognizes itself
De la Guerre	Benjamin	Called for flexibility and a regulatory system for both theatre and society which united			Doing: tragedy

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
de Trente Ans (1829); ³⁰ Réflexions sur la tragédie (1829)	Constant (1767-1830) Franco-Swiss novelist and political writer	‘order and liberty’. ³¹ There are three possible bases for tragedy: passion (as in French classic tragedy), character (as in Shakespeare and German and romantic theatre) and (one which so far had not been explored) the individual in conflict with society. Constant recommended the third for tragedies of the future because its possibilities were ‘inexhaustible’. ³² His novel Adolphe was a forerunner of the modern psychological novel. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive
Preface to Boris Godunov (1829); ‘On National Drama and on Marfa Posadnitsa (1830)	Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837) Russian dramatist	Found the traditional idea of verisimilitude ridiculous: ‘what kind of verisimilitude is there is a room divided into two parts, one of which is occupied by two thousand people supposedly not visible to those who are on the stage?’ ³³ Pushkin considered drama to be the most unrealistic of all genres ‘because for the most part the spectator must forget time, place, and language’. The only important verisimilitude was ‘truth of passions, verisimilitude of feelings in the proffered circumstances.’ ³⁴ He felt that Shakespeare had managed this, while Racine had not, partly because of their respective use of language. The problem was, as he saw it, ‘to find an idiom ... accessible to the common people’. ³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting (a genre of poetry) Showing: truth of feelings in the circumstances Watching: spectators must put aside reality in order to enjoy drama
Aesthetik (1832-1833)	Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768-1834) German theologian	Included a consideration of the art of acting. Art was essentially the expression of emotion, modified and transfigured by deliberation (Besonnenheit), an internal process which imposed order and harmony, producing a unique emotional experience in which the individual was united with the absolute or infinite and the gap between human perception and the higher world defined by Kant was bridged. Communication with an audience was incidental to this. The value of the work lay in itself. ³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: aesthetic		The expression of emotion	Doing: acting as an aesthetic practice, an art.
Fischer-Lichte argues that the application of theories of relativity to perception had considerable effect on theatre theory during the C19th. It was recognized that ‘the act of observation itself directly affects the observed’. This undermined the idea of the beholder ‘as a fixed eternal observer’ who could be largely taken for granted, and instigated an interest in spectators , at least in relation to how they affected performers . This problem was acutely reflected in Diderot’s demand that performers appear to be absorbed in what they were doing. Fischer-Lichte argues that in this recognition of the impact of observation on the observed lay the beginnings of an interest in performance, and language’s loss of domination of theatre theory ³⁷ – although it took until the late C20th for its overthrow to be complete.
Vorlesungen	Georg Wilhelm	Essential theorist. Hegel was an ‘inveterate theatre-goer and connoisseur of acting’ who	A place to	The sensuous	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
über die Aesthetik (The Philosophy of Fine Art) (1835 from lectures during 1820s) including 'Art in Relation to the Public'; 'Supremacy of Drama'; 'Modern Comedy and the Dissolution of Art';³⁸ 'Tragedy as a Dramatic Art';³⁹ 'The Relation of the Dramatic Composition to the General Public'.⁴⁰	Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831) German philosopher	believed that the performance of drama 'was an essential aspect of the genre'. Plays were to be judged as they appeared on the stage.⁴¹ His lectures on aesthetics drew large audiences, and his writings virtually summarise the entire German philosophical and aesthetic tradition, providing a profound and detailed treatment of drama, especially tragedy.⁴² His treatment of tragedy was said to be 'both searching and original'.⁴³ Hegel proposed three historical stages for aesthetics, as part of the 'unfolding of the Absolute Mind': a symbolic age (roughly corresponding to Egyptian culture), a mimetic age (the Greek and Roman classical period) and a romantic age (the Christian period) and argued that 'the art of each period manifests the age's cultural heritage and values'. Each period thus 'embodies and expresses a dominant, controlling Weltanschauung or world view'.⁴⁴ For Hegel dramatic poetry represented the culmination of classical art,⁴⁵ 'the most perfect totality of content and form',⁴⁶ epitomised by Sophocles' Antigone.⁴⁷ Drama was 'the presentation of human actions and relations in their actually visible form to the imaginative consciousness, that is to say, in the uttered speech of living persons who ... give expression to their action'. It includes 'definite ends individualized in living personalities and situations pregnant with conflict [and brought to a] tranquil resolution'.⁴⁸ In his 'highly questionable' reading of Antigone Hegel suggests that 'art is an attempt, which necessarily falls short, at the sensuous realization of spirit. This attempt is manifested in terms of the content of the artistic representation and ... its striving for an enabling form ... that form, in its highest development, is dramatic and its medium is the theatre'. Drama thus provides 'ways of apprehending spirit' or 'knowing' in ways which manifests the 'interpenetration of the knower and the known' (something scientific or objective knowledge pretends not to occur).⁴⁹ Drama, according to Hegel, was 'only possible in the intermediate and later epochs of a nation's development'.⁵⁰ Hegel considered the parts of the drama, diction and dialogue as well as the three unities, of which he considered, in line with his belief that a play could only be properly judged in performance and should be written with performance in mind, that unity of action to be the only essential one. Action must be dramatic, involving a quest for a remote goal, resistance to the quest, and a resolution (an application of 'dialectic'). In a section concerning aspects of drama as a performed work of art, Hegel touches on music and scenery, but focuses on the art of the actor, contrasting his 'responsibilities' in ancient and modern theatre. Modern drama stresses individual personality and thus demands	watch a performance	realization of spirit to spectators: a work of art, 'however far [it] may form a world inherently harmonious and complete ... exists not for itself, but for us, for a public which sees and enjoys the work of art. Art is a compensation for hard work in the world and the bitter labor for knowledge	– a performed art (an aesthetic practice): What makes drama dramatical 'is the display of action' but performers must generate a dialogue with the spectators Showing: Harmony through resolution of conflict; the revelation of universal, eternal truth, of 'wholeness' Watching: it is the 'beholder' of the dialectical struggle who holds the colliding forces in thought

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		more of the actor, who must not only ‘assimilate profoundly the spirit of the poet and the part [but also] supplement the part with his own creative insight, to fill in gaps, to discover modes of transition and generally, by his performance, to interpret the poet’.⁵¹ Hegel’s extensive analysis of tragedy in particular indicates a belief that the purpose of dramatic poetry is reconciliation or the achievement of harmony with the universe. Consequently, he found modern tragedy and comedy inadequate, although he recognized that they had their own power and richness. He deplored the subjectivity and chance which they demonstrated, fearing the creation of characters ‘so essentially diverse that they are incapable of all homogeneous relation’.⁵² Despite a concern with the role of destiny or fate in Greek tragedy, he believed that ‘what we see before us are the definite ends of individualized purposes in living personalities and conflictual situations’ (Vorlesungen). Krasner says that ‘what we see’ is a ‘key term’ for Hegel: ‘Tragedy... is dialectical and external, its themes being moral forces of “ethical substances” colliding’. The ensuing conflict ‘is held together in thought’ by the beholder, ‘who weighs equally the colliding wills’.⁵³ This external conflict is what made Greek tragedy preferable to modern dramas such as Hamlet, which featured an internal struggle within the protagonist, a struggle which might produce sympathy for the character, but would not be seen as tragic. Tragedy arose in the conflict between two opposing but equally valid views. A work of art, ‘however far [it] may form a world inherently harmonious and complete ... exists not for itself, but for us, for a public which sees and enjoys the work of art. The actors, for example, in the performance of a drama do not speak merely to one another, but to us, and they should be intelligible in both these respects ... every work of art is a dialogue with everyone who confronts it’.⁵⁴ ‘Art is the most beautiful side of [world-] history and it is the best compensation for hard work in the world and the bitter labor for knowledge’.⁵⁵ Dramatic art is different in that it must consider its spectators: ‘It is on account of ... visual presence and nearness of approach’ that drama has a more direct relation to the public than either literature or painting: ‘Here we have a distinct public for which the author has to cater, and he is under certain obligations towards it. Such a public possesses the right of applause no less than expressed displeasure ... A public of this sort, as in the case of any other public jury, is of a very varied character ... to ensure complete success ... a relative shame-facedness in regard to the finest demand of genuine art, may be necessary. No doubt the dramatic poet has always the alternative			(although it is not clear whether this watcher is the author, others on stage or the spectator, or all three); the spectators are the final tribunal of a work of drama, varied in its responses and background as any public ‘jury’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		left him to despise his public. But in that case he obviously fails to secure the very object for which dramatic writing exists'.⁵⁶ Hegel is particularly critical of the Schlegels for this scorn of spectators. 'Inasmuch ... as it is an essential part of the definition of the dramatic composition that it should possess the vitality able to command a favourable popular reception, the dramatic poet should submit to the conditions ... which are likely to secure this result in an artistic form'. One way to do this is to have the ends 'either possess a general human interest, or ... have at bottom a pathos, which is of a valid and substantive character for the people for whom the poet creates his work', although if the work does not have some universal qualities, it will not last or be exportable. Drama must also 'offer a living actual presence of situations, conditions, characters, and actions [which is] either so thoroughly poetical, vital and rich with interest that we can discount what is alien to our senses ... or it should not pretend to do more than present such particular (local) characteristics as external form'.⁵⁷ He rejected caricatures as well as allegorical abstract 'characters' (e.g. Reason). Characterizations should be 'vital and self-identical throughout, a complete whole' as in Goethe or Shakespeare. And there must be 'real emphasis laid on the collision of the ultimate ends involved ... there must be action'. What makes drama dramatical 'is the display of action'.⁵⁸ Finally, we should acknowledge the work of the playwright as an art, although not to be read: 'I go to the length of maintaining that no dramatic work ought to be printed' other than as a manuscript for performers.⁵⁹ Dramas should 'always keep the audience in view, and throughout address themselves to it'.⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: idealist; prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
Letter in Danton's Tod (28 July, 1835) ⁶¹	Georg Büchner (1813-1837) German revolutionary activist and playwright	Büchner refused to accept the dominant view of art in Germany at the time: art as idealization, as the revelation of universal, eternal truth. The duty of the dramatist was to re-create history in a direct, living form. Drama should offer 'people of flesh and blood', capable of arousing our emotions. Büchner's work was largely ignored until the appearance of naturalism half a century later.⁶² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-idealism View of Theatre: positive; historical		To arouse the spectators' emotions	Doing: playwrighting - a direct, living, historical form Showing: 'people of flesh and blood'
'Some	Alexis de	A theory of both the relationship between theatre and its political regime, and of	A place in	To 'show' or	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Observations on the Drama Amongst Democratic Nations' (Ch XIX Democracy in America) (1835) ⁶³	Tocqueville (1805-1859) French political and social theorist	audiences, especially democratic audiences. Changes in regimes can first be detected in the theatres: 'revolution ... first manifests itself in the drama'. Different kinds of regimes demand and propel different kinds of drama. Court theatre (e.g. Louis XIV) was concerned with rules of appropriateness and decorum. Democratic theatre is more interested in the emotions of the heart, and in having curiosity and sympathy awakened. 'The principal object of a dramatic piece is to be performed, and its chief merit is to affect the audience ... You may be sure that if you succeed in bringing your [democratic] audience into the presence of something that affects them, they will not care by what road you brought them there; and they will never reproach you for having excited their emotions in spite of dramatic rules.'⁶⁴ Tocqueville also acknowledges the effects of religion on theatre when he considers the position of drama in democratic America: 'The Puritans ... were not only enemies to amusements, but they professed an especial abhorrence for the stage ... These opinions ... have left very deep marks on the minds of their descendents. The extreme regularity of habits and the great strictness of manners ... opposed additional obstacles to the growth of dramatic art. There are [also] no dramatic subjects in a country which has witnessed no great political catastrophes, and in which love invariably leads by a straight and easy road to matrimony. People who spend every day in the week in making money, and the Sunday in going to church, have nothing to invite the muse of Comedy.' As well, despite their commitment to freedom of speech, drama is censored. Consequently 'a very small number of them go to theatres'.⁶⁵ Tocqueville insisted that theatre was performative: 'the principal object of a dramatic piece is to be performed, and its chief merit is to affect the audience ... They do not expect to hear a fine literary work, but to see a play' and they do not care much about 'dramatic rules'.⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive; sociological	which drama is staged	express a society in order to affect spectators	(plays) is enacted; the stage is the practice Showing: Political, cultural and sociological: 'the present condition of a society' is closely connected with its drama; an observation of its drama can reveal a great deal about the society and what might be about to change in it. Watching: the 'chief merit' of a dramatic piece is to affect spectators

¹ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 10

-
- ² Talma 1825 in Wasserman, Eric. 1947. 'The Sympathetic Imagination in Eighteenth-Century Theories of Acting'. Journal of English and Germanic Philology 46 pp. 264-272. 270
- ³ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 218
- ⁴ Carlson 1984: 184
- ⁵ Excerpt translated and reprinted in Sidnell, Michael, ed. 1994. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 2: Voltaire to Hugo. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 257-265, from Souriau, Maurice (ed) 1897, La Préface de Cromwell, Paris. Also reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 300-313, from Hugo 1983/1827, 'Preface to Cromwell, in Revolution in the Theatre, ed. And trans. Barry V. Daniels, Westport, Conn., Greenwood Press; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 300-313
- ⁶ Hugo was forced to flee France in 1852 over his opposition to the political coup by Louis Napoleon (Gerould 2000: 299).
- ⁷ Gerould 2000: 299
- ⁸ Carlson 1984: 205
- ⁹ Hugo 1967-70, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 3, p. 60; in Carlson 1984: 206.
- ¹⁰ Hugo 1994/1827: 263
- ¹¹ Hugo 2000/1827: 312-3
- ¹² Carlson 1984: 211
- ¹³ Hugo 1967-70, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 4, p. 656; in Carlson 1984: 212.
- ¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 213
- ¹⁵ Hamilton, Clayton. 1910. The Theory of the Theatre and Other Principles of Dramatic Criticism. New York: Henry Holt and Company. 52
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 214-5
- ¹⁷ Dublin drama critic Robert Bell, 1837, 'Modern English Drama', Dublin Review 2, p. 378; quoted in Schoch 1999: 48.
- ¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 215
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 207
- ²⁰ Vigny 1914-1935, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 5, p. viii; in Carlson 1984: 207.
- ²¹ Vigny 1914-1935, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 3, p. xiv; in Carlson 1984: 208.
- ²² Vigny 1914-1935, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 3, p. xii-xiii; in Carlson 1984: 208.
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 208
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 207
- ²⁵ Deschamps 1872-74, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 2, pp. 285-6; in Carlson 1984: 208.
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 208
- ²⁷ Dumas 1863-74, Théâtre complet, Paris, Vol. 1, p. 115; in Carlson 1984: 210.
- ²⁸ Dumas 1954-67, Mes mémoires, Paris, Vol. 4, p. 302; in Carlson 1984: 212.
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 212
- ³⁰ A substantial reworking of the preface to his 1809 translation of Schiller's Wallerstein, entitled Quelques réflexions sur la tragédie de Wallestein et sur le théâtre allemand in which he argued that the French playwrights were in need of their rules, despite their limitations (Carlson 1984: 209)

-
- ³¹ Constant 1957, Oeuvres, Paris, p. 918; in Carlson 1984: 209.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 210
- ³³ Pushkin, The Critical Prose, trans. Carl Proffer, Bloomington, 1969, pp. 66-67; in Carlson 1984: 241.
- ³⁴ Pushkin, The Critical Prose, trans. Carl Proffer, Bloomington, 1969, pp. 40, 131; in Carlson 1984: 241.
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 242
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 191
- ³⁷ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 4, 7
- ³⁸ From Knox, T.M. (trans) 1975, Aesthetic: Lectures on Fine Art, 2 vols., Oxford; excerpt reprinted in Sidnell 1994: 209-218.
- ³⁹ In Hegel, 1962, The Philosophy of Fine Art, Anne Henry Paolucci (ed), New York, Harper Torchbooks, Harper and Row, pp. 1-96.
- ⁴⁰ In Hegel, 1962, The Philosophy of Fine Art, Anne Henry Paolucci (ed), New York, Harper Torchbooks, Harper and Row, pp. 22-30.
- ⁴¹ Gerould 2000: 314
- ⁴² Carlson 1984: 193
- ⁴³ A.C. Bradley 1950, Oxford Lectures on Poetry, London, p. 69; in Carlson 1984: 193.
- ⁴⁴ Postlewait, Thomas. 1988. 'The Criteria for Periodization in Theatre History'. Theatre Journal 40 (3) pp. 299-318. 303
- ⁴⁵ Bernard Bosanquet 1949, A History of Aesthetic, London, p. 352; in Carlson 1984: 193.
- ⁴⁶ Hegel 1994/1835: 209
- ⁴⁷ Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 21
- ⁴⁸ Hegel 1962/1835: 3
- ⁴⁹ Sidnell 1994: 206-8
- ⁵⁰ Hegel 1962/1835: 3
- ⁵¹ Hegel 1920, The Philosophy of Fine Art, Trans. F.P.B. Osmaston, London, Vol. 4, p. 248; in Carlson 1984: 194.
- ⁵² Hegel 1920, The Philosophy of Fine Art, Vol. 4, p. 324-25; in Carlson 1984: 196.
- ⁵³ Krasner 2008: 22
- ⁵⁴ Hegel 1994/1835: 209
- ⁵⁵ Hegel 1994/1835: 218
- ⁵⁶ Hegel 1962/1835: 23
- ⁵⁷ Hegel 1962/1835: 24-5
- ⁵⁸ Hegel 1962/1835: 35
- ⁵⁹ Hegel 1962/1835: 34-5
- ⁶⁰ Hegel 1962/1835: 42
- ⁶¹ Büchner 1967-71, Sämtliche Werke und Briefe, Hamburg, Vol. 2, pp. 443-4; in Carlson 1984: 248.
- ⁶² Carlson 1984: 248-9
- ⁶³ Republished in Eric Bentley (ed) 1978, The Theory of the Modern Stage: An Introduction to Modern Theatre and Drama, Penguin Books, England, pp. 479-484.

⁶⁴ de Tocqueville, Alexis. 1978/1835. 'Some Observations on the Drama amongst Democratic Nations'. In The Theory of the Modern Stage: An Introduction to Modern Theatre and Drama, edited by E. Bentley. England: Penguin Books, 479-484. 483

⁶⁵ Tocqueville 1978/1835: 483-4

⁶⁶ Tocqueville 1978/1835: 482-3

Table 17/51 Theories of Theatre 1836-1860

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Reception speech to the Académie Française (1836)	Eugène Scribe (1791-1861) French dramatist	Successful dramatist who introduced the idea of the ‘well-made play’, with its techniques of careful construction and preparation of effects, a model which continues to exert its influence on play construction. Scribe took issue with the idea that comedy reflects the manners of its own society. On the contrary, spectators go to the theatre ‘not for instruction or improvement but for diversion and distraction, and that which diverts them most is not truth but fiction. To see again what you have before your eyes daily will not please you, but that which is not available to you in everyday life – the extraordinary and the romantic’. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-idealist and didactic theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place spectators go to see plays	Diversion and distraction	Doing: playwrighting Showing: fiction (something different) Watching: for diversion and distraction
‘The Petersburg Stage in 1835-36’ - written in 1836, published posthumously ‘After the Play’ (1836); ‘On the Theatre’ (1845); ‘The Conclusion of The Government Inspector ’ (1846) ²	Nikolai Gogol (1809-1852) Russian dramatist and performer	Argued for a combination of classicism and romanticism in a socially oriented drama which aimed to expose the ills of contemporary society, using laughter as its major weapon. Gogol considered laughter as ‘the great poetic force for the elevation and ennoblement of mankind’. This gave poetry and drama a ‘noble mission’. ³ Theatre should ‘teach ‘a whole crowd a living lesson’ with the aid of “unanimous laughter” and “universal sympathy”’. ⁴ Gogol rejected arguments which condemned all theatre as corrupt. Theatre at its best could be ‘an instrument for the service of God’ which, by giving living representations of noble deeds, could renew and revitalise the spectator. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre; idealist View of Theatre: positive; functional	An institution; ‘an instrument for the service of God’, a noble mission	Renewing and revitalising the spectator through laughter	Doing: playwrighting; performance Showing: exposing the ills of contemporary society
Über das Erhabene und Komische	Friedrich Vischer (1807-1887)	Vischer was widely read in the late C19th. He demonstrates a clear Hegelian approach both in his historical analysis of the development of tragedy and in what constitutes tragedy, seeing both in a triadic form: the conflict between opposites which results in a		The revelation of universal,	Doing: drama (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1837); Ästhetik (1847-58)	German aesthetician	synthesis or 'higher unity in the absolute spirit'. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: idealist View of Theatre: positive; aesthetic		eternal truth through a conflict of opposites
1838: the enormous success of the actress Rachel brought new life to the French classic tradition. ⁷
'De la tragédie à propos des débuts de Mlle Rachel (1838)	Alfred de Musset (1810-1857) French poet, dramatist and novelist	Inspired by Mlle Rachel's performances to take a fresh look at the tragic genre, he concluded that both classic and romantic approaches should form part of the French tradition, in a new modern form of tragedy which drew on French history. The unities and other rules of classicism were not arbitrary, but essential components of the art of poetry: 'An architect uses wheels, pulleys, framework; a poet uses rules, and the more precisely these are observed, the greater will be the effect and the more solid the result'. ⁸ Ponsard's 1843 play Lucrèce was considered the beginning of this new school, which came to be known as the école de bon sens . ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: poetry: playwrighting – a rule-governed art
Cours d'esthétique appliqué (begun 1839; unfinished)	François Delsarte (1811-1871) French acting theorist and teacher	Delsarte advocated 'a scientific approach' to acting. ¹⁰ It was the 'most notorious' theory of acting of the period. In a reaction against the mechanistic and formalized actor training of the time, Delsarte carefully recorded 'natural' expressions and gestures produced by instinct and emotion. However, codified by his students, this produced a rigorous formal system which became synonymous with the mechanistic system it was intended to break. ¹¹ His system did however require that actors' movements and gestures be based on observations of everyday life. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; practical		Representatio n	Doing: acting as a scientific technique
1840's: audiences in Cuban theatre were prohibited 'from calling out any actor or actress, or for repetition of any piece, under penalties of fifteen days in prison'. ¹³ Whitman felt this was a breach of an audience's 'inalienable rights' to actively participate in a performance. Such participation encouraged the best in the performer.
Dramaturgische Aphorismen (1840-60); Shakespeare-Studien (1871)	Otto Ludwig (1813-1865) German dramatist	Rejected socially engaged drama (as promoted by Hebbel and Hettner) and the pragmatic approach of Freytag whom he thought lacked passion and therefore didn't understand the essence of drama. The essence of tragedy was emotional conflict, but this occurred within the hero rather than between man and fate or man and society. Ludwig's analysis and view of tragedy is Hegelian. He advocated a 'poetic realism' tragedy: a synthesis of naturalism and idealism. Passion, however, was 'the chief motive, not reflection'. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist View of Theatre: positive		The demonstratio n of emotional conflict and passion within a character	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Woe from Wit’ (1840); ‘The Division of Poetry into Kinds and Genres’ (1841); ‘The Russian Theatre in Petersburg’ (1841); ‘A Survey of Russian Literature’ (1847);	Vissarion Belinsky (1811-1848) Russian literary critic	First major Russian literary critic, credited with establishing the emphasis on social and political concerns characteristic of the Russian critical tradition. ¹⁵ He sought to maintain art’s aesthetic integrity, while also retaining its social function: ‘art must be, first and foremost art – and then only can it be an expression of the spirit and direction of social life during a given period’ (‘A Survey’). Followed Hegel in arguing that tragedy portrays ‘the conflict of opposing principles’ in a world of necessity, while comedy portrays a world of chance and illusion. ¹⁶ After Belinsky, Russian theory split into two strands. The first continued his emphasis on the social importance of poetry (the ‘civic or democratic critics’). The second reacted against this emphasis, focusing on formal concerns (the aesthetic or conservative school). The first group were favoured by subsequent Soviet thought. Consequently, the second ‘faded into relative obscurity’. ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - idealism View of Theatre: positive; aesthetic	A national cultural institution	Aesthetic - art has a social function only in as much as it is art	Doing: poetry Showing: art expresses the spirit and direction of social life in a given period
Introduction to Pixérecourt’s Théâtre Choisi (1841)	Charles Nodier (1780-1844) French author of fantastic tales	An extended defence of the genre of melodrama. The essence of melodrama is its morality: ‘virtue is always rewarded and crime is never without punishment’ (thus it embodies ‘the morality of the Revolution’). Although its language is often exaggerated and affected, it serves its purpose: to instruct and delight, and demonstrate about poetic justice. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-melodrama View of Theatre: functional		Moral instruction	Doing: playwrighting Showing: poetic justice
Dernières réflexions de l’auteur sur le melodrama (1843)	Guilbert de Pixérecourt (1773-1844) French playwright	The ‘founding father of melodrama’, according to Carlson. ¹⁹ A dramatic work should always exhibit ‘complete unity’: through the representation of the three unities ‘as much as possible’, plus unity of vision between writing and production, best achieved by having both writing and production under the care of a single person. Pixérecourt condemned romantic drama for its disregard of the unities, but most of all for its lack of morality in subject matter. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			Doing: drama Showing: morality
‘Slavic Drama’ (1843)	Adam Mickiewicz (1798-1855)	Like Mme de Staël, Mickiewicz saw theatre as a historically contingent form, and argued for the development of a national form of theatre for Poland. He travelled widely in Europe, was friendly with James Fenimore Cooper and translated Emerson’s essays on	A place on earth for drama – a	To animate the masses	Doing: drama (an historical form of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	Polish poet, theorist, gifted improviser, political dissident and academic	transcendentalism into French. He believed that drama was not only ‘the most powerful artistic realization of poetry’, it ‘almost always’ announced ‘the end of one era and the beginning of another’ in its attempts to ‘animate’ the masses. There were two aspects of the drama: ‘the creation and the execution ’. In creating drama, poets drew on the poetic imagination of their people. This varied from people to people, as could be seen in the different ways of conceiving the supernatural world, but all drama must have some aspect of the marvellous ‘like a breath from a higher region’. But drama also needed ‘a place on the earth: it requires a building and actors; it needs the support of all the arts’. ²⁰ Poetic improvisations were a popular form of entertainment in Italy in the period, but Mickiewicz appeared to be the only major European poet to cultivate the art. He was apparently charismatic, and able to astonish spectators. He saw the ability as a gift, and ‘evidence of his credentials as a prophet’. He was arrested by the Tsarist secret police in 1823, and his books were banned. He spent the rest of his life in exile. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist View of Theatre: positive	building		poetry); a performed art Showing: a sense of spirit; the marvellous
‘The Ancient Tragical Motif as Reflected in the Modern’ in Either/Or (1843); ²² ‘The Crisis and a Crisis in the Life of an Actress’ (1848); ‘Herr Phisto as Captain Scipio’ (1848) ²³	Søren Kierkegaard (1813-1855) Danish philosopher and writer	Rejected Hegel’s rationalistic emphasis on universals and the striving for ultimate harmony. Kierkegaard presented a romantic reaction, ‘emotional and individualistic, preaching not harmony but paradox, and seeking the ultimate not by logic but by individual religious insight’, what Carlson calls ‘the aesthetic consciousness’. Both comedy and tragedy ‘are manifestations of contradictions arising from partial perspectives, and will disappear when the transcendent religious stage is reached’. Modern tragedy differs from ancient tragedy in its focus on the individual. Art is a transparent medium ‘through which shine ideal forms’. The problem for the actor is how best to realise this. Reflection appears to be the key, for both performer and spectator or critic, who should ‘observe and understand the performance with a reflection no less detailed and circumstantial’. ²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - romantic idealism View of Theatre: positive; aesthetic		The expression of the ideal through reflection	Doing: drama (art) - a ‘transparent medium through which the ideal shines; acting – required reflection Showing: manifestations of contradiction Watching: required reflection
My Word about Drama	Friedrich Hebbel	Hebbel also rejected Hegel’s rationalistic approach. Art is ‘realized philosophy’; drama (‘the summit of all art’), not philosophy, mediates ‘between the Idea and the condition of	A place; an institution:	(Possibly): to illustrate ‘the	Doing: drama playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1843); Tagebücher (1903); 'The Relationship of Dramatic Art to its Age and Allied Matters: The Preface to Mary Magdalene (1844)	(1813-1863) German dramatist	man and the world', when it reflects the historical process and the 'spirit of its own age'. ²⁵ Hebbel constructed a theory of tragedy based on the distinction between Being (Sein – the 'original nexus' or mean) and Becoming (Werden – individual manifestations), as part of the process of individualization, a process which inevitably destroys the individual: '[a]ll action, when confronted with fate ... dissolves into suffering'. ²⁶ What was revealed by this was 'a clear view of the individual's relation to the whole'. ²⁷ Unresolved and unresolvable conflict lies at the centre of the universe; art can look at this symbolically, and provide a temporary resolution. The function of drama, 'assuming that it has any function at all' is to illustrate 'the existing state of the world and man in their relationship to the Idea' (the whole), and 'to help bring it [the world-historical process of introducing a new form of humanity] to a conclusion'. ²⁸ Great drama occurs when some significant change is occurring in this relationship. Hebbel claimed that there had been three such situations in the history of drama. The first occurred during the period of Greek tragedy, with the challenging of the naïve conception of the gods by the new concept of fate . The second period occurred at the time of Shakespeare: rising Protestant consciousness shifted attention to the individual, changing the conflict between man and fate to a conflict within the individual. The third period was occurring in Hebbel's own age: '[t]he existing institutions of human society, political, religious and moral' had become problematic, constituting a conflict within the Idea of the whole, and producing a drama of social criticism. The essence of all tragedy is the portrayal of universal conflict through individual cases and deals 'with the basic tensions of the human condition'. ²⁹ Hebbel urged dramatists to 'ignore the mobs of aesthetics who only wish to have good health demonstrated in the very disease' . ³⁰ The artist had no choice but to show the full picture. Not all drama achieved epoch-making status, however all drama was about action : 'there is no place for thought and emotions in drama but only to the extent that they translate directly into action' but this action had to be historically and culturally contextualised, because theatre was 'the intermediary organ between poetry and the public'. Art was 'philosophy realized'. Bourgeois tragedies were possible, but only if their action is based on necessity and can not be circumvented. ³¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-aesthetic theory View of Theatre: positive	'the intermediary organ between poetry and the public'	existing state of the world and man in their relationship to the Idea' via symbolic means and using action	- realized philosophy - plays are 'artistic offerings to the age' in which they are written Showing: art not philosophy provides the highest interpretation of life and a temporary resolution of its conflict; the portrayal of universal conflict through individual cases
Gegen die speculative	Hermann Hettner	Hettner criticized the metaphysical approach to art which dominated German theory. His 1852 book displays a 'spirit of social revolution'. The drama of the future can 'only be		To reflect the social and	Doing: drama (art)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Aesthetik (1845); Das moderne Drama (1852)	(1821-1882) German literary theorist and historian	social and historical' rather than political ³² and reflect 'both the social and emotional needs of its audience'. ³³ Bourgeois social drama is best suited for this. There are three kinds of tragedy: tragedy of condition (the individual against fate); tragedy of passion (the hero in conflict with himself) and the tragedy of idea (the conflict of ideas and obligations such as in Sophocles' Antigone). The third is the 'highest' and should be the goal of serious drama in the future. Hettner's ideas strongly influenced Ibsen. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-metaphysics View of Theatre: positive		emotional needs of spectators
Drama criticism (1846); Democratic Vistas (c1892)	Walt Whitman (1819-1892) American poet, critic and writer	'The drama of this country can be the mouth-piece of freedom, refinement, liberal philanthropy, beautiful love for all our brethren, polished manners and an elevated good taste. It can wield potent sway to destroy any attempt at despotism'. ³⁴ Whitman believed spectators had 'inalienable rights' and when participating intelligently, could bring out the best in the performer and thus generate 'an electric' feeling which created a collective out of the many different individuals present. In other words, an 'audience' was created through the course of the performance. He based this largely on his experiences at the Bowery Theatre when a youth, where spectators were participatory in this way – but were also almost totally male. Whitman saw theatre as a metaphor for American democratic life, a way of overcoming the tension between individualism and collectivity. Unfortunately this conception of democracy was based on the exclusion of much of the population – not just women but also the more refined. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-democratic theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place; a moral institution	Moral instruction; the development of a sense of collectivity	Doing: drama – a performed art Watching: participatory: spectators have rights, and 'call out' the best in the performers; critical: the 'penetrating eye' sees below or through 'the sham'
'A propos' to Agnès de Méranie (1847); 'Discours de réception à l'Académie Française' (1856)	François Ponsard (1814-1867) French lawyer and dramatist	Leader of the école de bon sens , a school of drama which reflected the concerns and ideals of the new bourgeois society: written in simple and direct verse, featuring reason and moderation, and focused on duty to family and society. Ponsard called for the rejection of formulas and doctrines and the concern over innovation or imitation: all art was simply good or bad, 'the only sovereignty to be admitted [was] good sense ... all doctrines, ancient or modern, should be continually submitted to this supreme judge'. ³⁵ The goal should be simplicity and truth. ³⁶ Dramas and tragedies are primarily concerned with 'the representation of character, the development of passions, or the re-creation of the spirit and manners of a period', subordinating the plot to this dominant idea. 'Any		The representation of character, the development of passions, or the re-creation of the spirit and	Doing: playwrighting (art) Watching: 'good sense' (reason) as the only judge of whether art was good or play, on the contrary, which seeks only to astonish and move the spectator by a rapid succession of adventures and unexpected turns would be a melodrama'. Each has their own particular 'laws'. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theatre View of Theatre: positive		manners of a period	bad.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1848-49: revolutionary upheavals affected most of Western Europe. Involvement in riots in Dresden forced Wagner into a ten-year exile in Zurich.³⁸ 1849: in England, the advent of gaslight allowed the lights of auditoriums of theatres to be extinguished, shutting the spectator off from the actor 'by a curtain of darkness'.³⁹ According to Styan, this was to have a profound effect on the relationship between actor and spectators, bringing to an end the interplay between actor and spectators and between spectators and spectators which had been a feature of theatre until then. Wagner is credited with being the first to use this effect, which he did to help the spectators focus on the stage.
Die Kunst und die Revolution (Art and Revolution) (1849); Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft (The Work of Art of the Future) (1849); ⁴⁰ Oper und Drama (1851); Gesammelte Schriften (1872);	Richard Wagner (1813-1883) German composer	Wagner's ideas 'profoundly influenced the course of modern theatre'. ⁴¹ He wanted to create a 'communal' theatre like the Greeks. He urges architects to design theatre so that spectators could be 'classless', but able to see and hear perfectly so that they could become absorbed in the work of art and forget themselves in the auditorium. ⁴² Art itself had a history: Greek drama was a political and spiritual creation through which the whole people came to understand themselves as a unity. The decline of Athens saw this common spirit shatter along with the drama. The Romans rejected drama because they rejected its spirituality; the Christians rejected it because they rejected sensual pleasure. It was revived during the Renaissance as a corruption: 'an amusement for the rich and powerful'. ⁴³ Art needed to become revolutionary in order to overcome the influence of modern society, ⁴⁴ which was suffused with 'blubberty, debased sentimentality ... in order to hire for itself a private little paradise'. ⁴⁵ The 'only conceivable and valuable artwork of the future' was musical drama, viewed as an autonomous art work: ⁴⁶ 'All artistic creativity becomes universally intelligible, wholly understood and justified to the extent that it passes over into drama, that it is ... illuminated by drama'. Drama was the only universal form of art, 'the only real, free, that is to say the only intelligible , work of art'. ⁴⁷ The source of this new art lies in the Volk , 'the sum total of all those who feel a common need'. The Volk can reunify the arts (which had become separated and corrupted) by responding to this felt need. ⁴⁸ Oper und Drama was Wagner's major theoretical work. It continues the line discussed above. He complained that in opera, 'a means of expression (music) has been made the end, and the end of the expression (drama) the means', and urged a reunification of poetry and music as an expression of the total being of the Volk . Wagner's works were popular with spectators although critics disapproved of the idea of	A place of experience; the experience itself (NB: Wagner distinguished between theatre and 'common' performative -ity	Expression; the focusing of attention	Doing: Art (drama was the only universal form) Showing: using all forms of art Watching: spectators were to behave with decorum; through the efforts of the performer, audiences came into being as spectators became absorbed in what was on stage

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘total theatre’ and some of Wagner’s other techniques.⁴⁹ His insistence on a total stage illusion led to the requirement that musicians tune their instruments outside the orchestra pit and that spectators not applaud until the end of the presentation. He is credited with being the first director to extinguish the auditorium lights in order to focus the spectators’ attention on the stage.⁵⁰ Wagner is said to have ‘invented’ theatricality (which he called Gebärde or ‘gesture’) as a value.⁵¹ From Wagner onwards, theatricality was not just a mode of a particular art form, but was a value attached to that art form (either positively or negatively). Many subsequent theorists objected to the notion of theatricality but not its status as a value (negative in its association with inauthenticity; positive in its being seen as ‘the essence’ of theatre). He claims to have had a nightmare about a theatre in which ‘a reading of a Goethe novel and the performance of a Beethoven symphony taking place in an art gallery among various statues’ occurred.⁵² His nightmare was of the common ‘performativity’ of theatre, a condition which had existed since the Middle Ages, and against which Wagner rebelled. His ideas of a total theatre were to influence theatre up until the 1950s when ‘the performative function’ was rediscovered.⁵³ Nevertheless, he recognized the crucial nature of the audience: ‘the performer becomes an artist only by being completely absorbed into the audience. Everything that breathes and moves upon the stage, breathes and moves only from an eloquent desire to communicate, to be seen and heard’ while the audience only becomes an audience as it ‘lives and breathes in the work of art ... upon the stage which seems to it to be the universe’.⁵⁴ However, the audience was not to interfere either with the stage or with other spectators: ‘Wagner is venerated as the first to remove all of the distractions inherent in the multi-tier auditorium with the aim of concentrating attention of the stage picture contained within the proscenium arch’.⁵⁵ Blackadder sees this as a distinct change in the ‘social contract’ with the audience/spectators: spectators are ‘given a specific role to play’ as spectators rather than participants in a social event.⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-‘total theatre’ – theatre as a complex, multifaceted experience View of Theatre: positive
1850’s: amateur theatricals became ‘a vogue’ in American middle-class homes, and manuals such as Tony Denier’s Amateur’s Handbook and Guide to Home or Drawing-Room Theatricals (1866) and O.A. Roorbach’s Practical Guide to Amateur Theatricals (1881) began to appear to help turn the family into ‘the primary theater of private life’⁵⁷ and plays were especially written for domestic theatricals.⁵⁸ 1851: the first of the ‘so-called World Exhibitions ... where Western culture proudly displayed the achievements of its civilization’.⁵⁹ By 1850, ‘the primacy of the visual’ had become an obligation. In 1863, William Bodham Donne declared that ‘All must be made palpable to sight’. ⁶⁰ Blackadder claims that this emphasis on the visual ‘necessarily brings with it a decline in the intellectual substance of the performance [and] an emphasis on entertainment rather than on the communication of ideas’ ⁶¹ – although the ‘communication of ideas’ does not seem to be a preoccupation of theorists to date.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Criticism’ (1851); ‘Recent Novels: French and English’ (1847); ⁶² On Actors and the Art of Acting (1875); ‘The Old and Modern Dramatists’ (1850); ‘Shakespeare’s Critics: English and Foreign’ (1849) ⁶³	George Henry Lewes (1817-1896) Leading English critic of literature and theatre; philosopher	Introduced the concept of realism to English criticism: ‘What we most heartily enjoy and applaud is truth in the delineation of life and character: incidents however wonderful, adventures however perilous, are almost as naught when compared with the deep and lasting interest excited by anything like a correct representation of life’. The art of acting is one of representation, not illusion. Actors convert natural expression into art by a process of purification, and represent these in such a way that the spectators recognize them and ‘are thrown into a state of sympathy’. ⁶⁴ Plays reflect their historical conditions, and acting must take account of this. The veneration of past plays as models was ‘the greatest injury yet sustained by the English drama’. Also injurious was the focus on Shakespeare’s poetry, leading to the mistaken view that they were works to be read (as by Lamb and Scott) rather than plays to be performed. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-modern theatre; anti-the view of drama as literature View of Theatre: positive		A delineation of life	Doing: acting as an art of representation Showing: recognizable representations Watching: spectators are ‘thrown’ into a state of sympathy through the actors’ representations
The Aesthetic Relation of Art to Reality (1855)	Nikolai Chernyshevsky (c1828-1889) Russian critic	The best known of the Russian ‘civic’ critics; championed scientific materialism, utilitarianism and social progress; was highly regarded by Marx and Lenin. Art is inferior to reality: its primary goal is not to imitate but to reproduce reality ‘to compensate man in case of absence of opportunity to enjoy the full aesthetic pleasure afforded by reality’. Art also ‘will present, or solve, the problems that arise out of life for the man who thinks ’. Real life was the standard by which artistic success was to be measured. Consequently, Chernyshevsky argued against transcendental ideas such as destiny, fate or necessity: ‘[t]he tragic is a man’s suffering or death [whether accidental or not] – this is quite enough to fill us with horror or sympathy’. ⁶⁵		A reproduction of reality as compensation	Doing: Art (tragedy) Showing: presentation and resolution of problems Watching: aesthetic pleasure

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-idealist theory View of Theatre: functional 1856: Tableaux vivant became a feature of performances (as well as exhibitions), including performances of Shakespeare. The prompt book for an 1856 production of The Winter's Tale featured the following stage-directions: 'The gaslights go up full and before the audience hears a word, it sees a picture of Leontes, Polixenes and Hermione "reclining on couches ... after the manner of the Ancient Greeks. Hermione seated at the extremity of Leontes' couch ... Cup bearers, slaves, female water carriers, and boys, variously employed"'. ⁶⁶
'On the Modern Element in Literature' (1857); 'Culture and Anarchy' (1869); 'The French Play in London' (1879) ⁶⁷	Matthew Arnold (1822-1888) English poet and cultural critic; inspector of schools	Drama is the most lasting and enjoyable form of literature. Arnold argued that 'the state should become involved in the support and encouragement of the drama'. ⁶⁸ Arnold saw culture in general as valuable to the state. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – utility of art View of Theatre: functional		Civilising	Doing: drama (literature)
Preface to Le fils naturel (1858); Preface to Un père prodigue (1859); Preface to L'étrangère (1879)	Alexandre Dumas fils (1824-1895) French author and dramatist	Helped establish social drama as the first major postromantic school in France (along with Augier). The dramatist is an observer, a spectator: someone who passes by, who regards, who sees, who feels, who reflects, who hopes and who says or writes down whatever strikes him in the form which is the clearest, the quickest, the most suitable for what he wishes to say . The dramatist has no need of imaginations: [w]e have only to observe, to remember, to feel, to coordinate and to restore ... what every spectator should at once recall having seen or felt without taking note of it before. Reality as a base, possibility in facts, ingenuity in means that is all that ought to be asked of us.' Nevertheless, Dumas recognized the importance of style and of artistic form, considering that 'the ideal drama must excel in both technique and observation'. ⁶⁹ Drama had a moral purpose; it was didactic: 'All literature which is not concerned with perfectibility, morality, the ideal, the useful, is in a word an unhealthy and rickety literature, dead at birth'. ⁷⁰ Dumas claimed that Zola, in attempting to place an exact replica of life on stage, had lost sight of both the methods and purpose of art, denying the conventions which defined dramatic art. The artist's task is 'to discover and reveal to us that which we do not see in what we daily observe, [to give] a soul to material things, a form to the things		Moral instruction	Doing: playwrighting dramatist: an observer, a spectator Showing: the revelation of things which we do not see in what we daily observe

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of the soul, and in a word, to idealize the real that is seen and make real the ideal that is felt'. ⁷¹ Dumas marks the beginning of an idealist reaction against naturalism, on the basis that it did not present a true picture of the human condition, but only a picture of the base side of man. ⁷² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalist theatre View of Theatre: functional
Letters to Lasalle (1859);	Karl Marx (1818-1883) German political philosopher	'A significant body of modern theatre criticism acknowledges Marx as its intellectual father'. ⁷³ Although remarks are scattered, key documents for Marx's views on drama are letters to Ferdinand Lassalle (1825-1864) responding to his request for opinions on his historical drama Franz von Sickingen . Marx clearly shows a preference for realism over abstraction, suggesting Shakespeare rather than Schiller as a model, and rejected the use of drama as a vehicle for promoting abstract ideas at the expense of characterisation. Tragedy involves an element of conflict between the individual and his historical position. ⁷⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		The promotion of ideas	Doing: playwrighting
Letters to Lasalle (1859); Letter to Paul Ernst (1890)	Friedrich Engels (1820-1895)	Engels was also asked for his opinions by Lassalle. In general, his views on drama were similar to those of Marx. He also recommended Shakespeare as a model. In his letter to Ernst, he was critical of the latter's interpretation of Ibsen because it was not flexible enough to take account of cultural differences between German and Scandinavian cultures: ⁷⁵ 'the materialist method is converted into its direct opposite if, instead of being used as a guiding thread in historical research, it becomes a ready-made pattern by which one tailors historical facts'. ⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting
1859 saw the deaths of both De Quincey and Hunt, effectively ending romantic criticism in England. During the Victorian era, drama was generally considered frivolous , a perspective which did not encourage speculation. Lord Macaulay (1800-1859), for instance, declared all theory 'useless' – it 'filled the world with long words and long beards; and ... left it as wicked and as ignorant as they found it'. ⁷⁷ It was not until the 1880s that theatrical theory again began to develop in England, with an initial focus on the art of acting. ⁷⁸ Capon argues that 'there is virtually no written aesthetic of the theatre' after Aristotle, most classic statements being more concerned with literature than theatre, or concerned with the practical aspects of staging. ⁷⁹

¹ Scribe 1854, Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 1, p. 6; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 216.

² Gogol 1966, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, pp. 1058-9, 1061-2; 1556; in Carlson 1984: 242-3.

-
- ³ Carlson 1984: 243
- ⁴ Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371.353
- ⁵ Carlson 1984: 243
- ⁶ Carlson 1984: 249
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 270
- ⁸ Musset 1866, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 9, p. 325; in Carlson 1984: 271.
- ⁹ Carlson 1984: 271
- ¹⁰ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 374
- ¹¹ Carlson 1984: 218
- ¹² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 374
- ¹³ Walt Whitman cited in Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press. 83
- ¹⁴ Ludwig 1891, Gesammelte Schriften, Leipzig, Vol. 5, p. 163; in Carlson 1984: 260.
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 240
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 240-1
- ¹⁷ Carlson 1984: 244
- ¹⁸ Pixérécourt 1841-43, Théâtre choisi, Paris, Vol. 1, p. iii; in Carlson 1984: 214.
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 215
- ²⁰ Mickiewicz 1986/1843, 'Slavic Drama', from 'Lectures on Slavic Literature: Lesson 16 (4 April 1843)', trans. Daniel Gerould, TDR (T111), Fall, excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.330-335.330.
- ²¹ Gerould 2000: 327-8
- ²² Kierkegaard 1959, Either/Or, trans. David and Lillian Swenson, Garden City New York.
- ²³ Kierkegaard 1967, Crisis in the Life of an Actress, trans. Stephen Crites, London.
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 249-251
- ²⁵ Hebbel 1901-7, Sämtliche Werke, Berlin, Vol. 11, pp. 56-7; in Carlson 1984: 251; substantial excerpt translated by Brandt in Brandt 1998: 71-79.
- ²⁶ Hebbel 1901-7, Sämtliche Werke, Berlin, Vol. 11, pp. 52; in Carlson 1984: 252.
- ²⁷ Hebbel 1903, Tagebücher, Berlin, Vol. 2, p. 269; in Carlson 1984: 252.
- ²⁸ Hebbel 1844 cited in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.72
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 253
- ³⁰ Hebbel 1844 in Brandt 1998: 73
- ³¹ Hebbel 1844/Brandt 1998: 76-8
- ³² Hettner 1924, Das moderne Drama, Berlin, p. 9; in Carlson 1984: 257.
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 256-7

-
- ³⁴ Quoted in Ackerman 1999: 43-4
- ³⁵ Ponsard 1865-76, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 3, p. 352; in Carlson 1984: 272.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 272
- ³⁷ Ponsard 1865-76, Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 3, pp. 372-3; in Carlson 1984: 214.
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 253
- ³⁹ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 170
- ⁴⁰ Excerpt published in Brandt 1998: 4-11.
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 254
- ⁴² Wagner 1998/1849: 5
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 254
- ⁴⁴ Wagner 1871-72, Gesammelte Schriften und Dichtungen, Leipzig, Vol. 3, pp. 11-12, 21; in Carlson 1984: 254.
- ⁴⁵ Wagner 1998/1849: 7
- ⁴⁶ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 338
- ⁴⁷ Wagner 1998/1849: 7-11
- ⁴⁸ Wagner 1871-72, 'Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft', Gesammelte Schriften und Dichtungen, Leipzig, Vol. 3, p. 48; in Carlson 1984: 255.
- ⁴⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 381
- ⁵⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 382
- ⁵¹ McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]. 18
- ⁵² Quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 234
- ⁵³ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 234
- ⁵⁴ Wagner 1998/1849: 6
- ⁵⁵ Iain Macintosh 1993, Architecture, Actors and Audience, London and New York, Routledge, p. 41; quoted in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 11.
- ⁵⁶ Blackadder 2003: 11
- ⁵⁷ Michelle Perrot (ed) 1990, A History of Private Life IV: From the Fires of Revolution to the Great War, trans. A. Goldhammer, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, p. 97; cited in Ackerman 1999: 155-6.
- ⁵⁸ Ackerman 1999: 160
- ⁵⁹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 225
- ⁶⁰ Quoted in Blackadder 2003: 10
- ⁶¹ Blackadder 2003: 10
- ⁶² 'Criticism' was published in the Leader Vol 2 (71), August 2 1851; 'Recent Novels ...' was published in Fraser's Magazine No. 36, December 1847.
- ⁶³ 'The Old and Modern Dramatists', published in the Leader, Vol 1(19), August 1850; 'Shakespeare's Critics' in the Edinburgh Review No. 90, 1849.
- ⁶⁴ Lewes 1875, On Actors and the Art of Acting, London, pp. 112-3; in Carlson 1984: 230.

-
- ⁶⁵ Chernyshevsky 1953, Selected Philosophical Essays, pp. 373, 375, 311; in Carlson 1984: 244.
- ⁶⁶ Schoch, Richard W. 1999. "'We Do Nothing but Enact History': Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past". Nineteenth-Century Literature 54 (1) pp. 27-52.41n31
- ⁶⁷ Arnold 1960-77, The Complete Prose Works, Vol. 1, p. 34; Vol 9, p. 69; in Carlson 1984: 231-2.
- ⁶⁸ Carlson 1984: 232
- ⁶⁹ Carlson 1984: 273
- ⁷⁰ Dumas fils 1890-98, Théâtre complet, Paris, Vol. 3, 10, 31, 211-12, 219; in Carlson 1984: 273.
- ⁷¹ Dumas fils 1890-98, Théâtre complet, Paris, Vol. 6, p. 178; in Carlson 1984: 285.
- ⁷² Carlson 1984: 285-6
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 255
- ⁷⁴ Carlson 1984: 256
- ⁷⁵ Carlson 1984: 256
- ⁷⁶ Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels 1956-69, Werke, Berlin, Vol. 37, p. 411.
- ⁷⁷ Carlson 1984: 229
- ⁷⁸ Carlson 1984: 232
- ⁷⁹ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269.261

Table 18/51 Theories of Theatre 1861-1880

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The Technique of Drama (1863) (published in English 1894)	Gustav Freytag (1816-1895) German dramatist and novelist	An empiricist/pragmatist who promoted an aesthetic view of drama: considered the drama as an aesthetic artefact. Freytag analysed the work of five ‘masters’ (Sophocles, Shakespeare, Lessing, Goethe and Schiller) to discover ‘the fundamental laws of dramatic construction’. ¹ He set down the basic rules of drama in a structure similar to the French idea of a well-made play. Perhaps not unexpectedly, ‘the general basis of his system is Aristotelian. Action is primary’ and ‘[u]nity, probability and magnitude’ are considered important enough to warrant a full chapter. ² However, his view of tragedy was not Aristotelian. He argued for tragedies which reflected contemporary concerns in which ‘strong characters’ were involved in a ‘significant struggle’, although he agreed with the idea of catharsis: the aim was ‘beautiful transparence and joyous elevation’. The most effective drama had a ‘pyramidal structure’ consisting of five parts (introduction, rising movement, climax, falling movement, catastrophe) and three crises (the first initiates the rising movement; the second ends the climax and the third is ‘the moment of final tension before the catastrophe’). His book was also a practical manual of theatre operation and practice, with specific suggestions on all aspects of theatre practice, from the construction of plays to how to manage them on the stage, to the role of the playwright in the rehearsal process. The book was translated into English in 1894, and became the standard manual for young playwrights until well into the C20th, despite its mechanistic approach. ³ He considered that the ‘ most important thing for the poet is the aesthetic effect of his own invention, for the sake of which he plays around with and changes the real facts however it suits him ’. ⁴ He believed people of the lower classes could not be heroes of a drama because they were generally inarticulate. The dominance of this aesthetic position was to be challenged by Naturalism, which argued that ‘truth’ was the most important thing to be conveyed. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: aesthetic		Aesthetic: ‘beautiful transparence and joyous elevation’ through catharsis	Doing: drama (an art of poetry); a practice Showing: effect not Truth
Review (1863); Experience and Poetry (1905); ‘Die	Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911) German philosopher,	Critical review of Freytag’s book which dismissed Freytag’s interpretation of catharsis. The function of tragedy was the ‘lifting of man to a higher consciousness, to the free realm of the universal’. ⁵ Dilthey also questioned the significance of Freytag’s theory of dramatic structure, arguing it ignored the essence of art and encouraged a focus on codified rules: ‘[a]esthetics, like ethics, is not concerned with the rules of nature, but with	An autonomous art form	To lift man’s consciousness to a higher world; meaning	Doing: poetry(art) Watching (specialised): theatre as an

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Typen der Weltanschauungslehre' (1911)	psychologist, historian, aesthetician and literary critic	masterpieces'.⁶ The true organizing principle of a great work was like the 'inner form' of the romantics, 'the secret soul of the drama' which dictates the placement of every character and every scene as well as the general course of the action. It derives from the artist's psychic reaction to the world, which becomes symbolised in the work of art. 'Die Typen' postulates three types of world view: positivism, objective realism and dualistic idealism. Each 'places its stamp' on the philosophical, social, and artistic products of its era. Positivism sees nature as 'a blind purposeless creative force' and this view is reflected in naturalism in art. Objective realism is pantheistic, 'seeking a unified spirit that can organize man, nature, and society in a coherent whole'. The work of Shakespeare and Goethe reflect this view. Dualistic idealism 'sees the human spirit independent of nature and creating its own order and meaning'. This idea emerged with Kant and is reflected in the work of Corneille and Schiller. This approach, which tried 'to relate artistic and intellectual manifestations within a particular period on the basis of a presumed common psychic ground' was extremely popular in Germany in the first half of C20th.⁷ Dilthey was instrumental in devising 'a systematic foundation for the humanities'.⁸ He argued that the social world could only be understood 'in terms of the meaning given to it by the people who participate in it'.⁹ In Experience and Poetry he proposed that 'scholars in the field of humanities should focus on the individual artwork' which could only be understood by experiencing it. 'Thus, he singled out the individual work, the unique event, as the only object deserving the attention of a scholar in the humanities' and, according to Fischer-Lichte, thereby promoted the idea of theatre as an autonomous art-form experienced in performance.¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist; analysis View of Theatre: aesthetic		through performance	artwork could only be experienced through performance
L'art théâtral (1863)	Joseph Samson (1793-1871) Acting teacher	The major acting text of the period in France. As befitted his neoclassical leanings, Samson's text was written in verse. Actors should not rely on inspirations but: 'Meditate, plan, and test all in advance. Such careful work will give you confidence' [then] Add to effects learned with deliberation The tones and movements drawn from inspiration.'¹¹ Zola (1873) found this training deplorably artificial. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: practical	A place; a practice		Doing: acting as an art
Essays on the	William	Drama was about the visual: 'All must be made palpable to sight'. ¹²		Creating a	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Drama and on Popular Amusements (1863)	Bodham Donne (1807-1882) English essayist	Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: practical		visual experience	drama: a visual art
Russian Theatre (1864); Sobranie sočinenij; Vospominanija (1930).	Apollon Grigoriev (1822-1864) Russian critic	The 'conservative' critic most concerned with drama. His criticism reflected both the influence of German romanticism (the idea of art as an organic process) and the Russian 'native soul' movement which encouraged a distinctive Russian culture. For this reason he considered Ostrovsky's plays a 'mirror of the national consciousness'. Grigoriev believed that the greatest theatre must arise from the people (the masses), and express 'collective need'. Art was not about giving instruction on current social questions but should give insight into popular consciousness and general historical development. The dramatist must be 'a priest who believes in his god and ... never gives the masses the least hint of insincerity ... who instructs the masses, [and] puts before them the summit of their own world view'. The actor was a major creator, almost as important as the poet, a view which led him to favour actors who relied on emotion and inspiration (such as Mochalov and Shchepkin, who saw acting as a search for inner truth) over those who subordinated themselves to the intent of the text. ¹³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - romanticism View of Theatre: functional	A national cultural and artistic practice	To give insight; to instruct	Doing: drama (art) - art as an organic creative process ; acting – as creative as playwrighting Showing: the masses' own world view
1865: the Bancrofts introduce realism or naturalism (what Capon calls 'surface reality') to English theatre: 'characters were dressed in current fashion and ... the stage doors had real handles and opened and shut like real doors'. It was a reaction to the 'unreal theatricality' of the theatre of the early C19th, with its restricted social content and avoidance of any serious subject. Capon claims that spectators were 'stunned'. However, the movement was short-lived, the last plays of its main playwright, Ibsen, already showing a move away from surface reality to more expressionistic theatre. ¹⁴
Essays (1869-1881) ¹⁵	Théodore de Banville (1823-1891) French poet	A rejection of the concrete realism of the naturalists. Poetry was 'the great evoker' and needed no assistance from 'real silk, real cloth of gold ... propos, furnishings, projected electric lights' (1873), which only served to distract the spectator from 'the ideal harmony aroused ... by the genius of the poet' (1879). The stage should be a neutral playing space (as in Shakespeare) (1877). Although Banville's play Le forgeron (1887) could have been staged in this way, he wrote it only for reading. Mallarmé considered this 'spectacle in an armchair' the best kind of theatre, 'a theatre of the mind'. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: ambivalent			Doing: poetry (literature) Staging: a neutral play-space was required so that the poetry could be heard
Contribution	Mark Twain	Twain complained of a church minister who refused a Christian burial to the actor		Moral	Doing: actor

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
to the Galaxy (1871)	(1835-1910) American writer	George Holland. Theatre had the capacity to combine amusement with instruction and ‘for fifty years it was George Holland’s business, on the stage, to make his audience go and do right, and be just, merciful, and charitable – because by his living, breathing, feeling pictures he showed them what it was to do these things, and how to do them’. ¹⁷ In other words, the actor was in the same business as the clergy. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre View of Theatre: functional		instruction; amusement	as teacher Showing: actors showed and thereby instructed spectators in how to be moral
Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik (The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music) (1872)	Friedrich Nietzsche (1844-1900) German Romantic philosopher	Essential theorist. Nietzsche is said to have ‘invented a theatrical philosophy [which] managed to produce a host of followers’. This philosophy featured a focus on and fascination with the theatre, a reliance on functional characters and masks as a vehicle for philosophy and an ‘elusive theory of forces’ which could be seen as based on theatricality as a ‘primary condition of reality’. Nietzsche’s philosophy was thus anti-essentialist and anti-foundational. ¹⁸ Die Geburt was ‘the most influential theoretical statement on the drama in German’ of the late C19th, and inspired a wide range of modern critics. ¹⁹ It considered the conditions under which tragedy arose in ancient Greece, its decline and death, and how tragedy might be revived in modern times. The book reflects the general romantic tendency to see the world in terms of opposites (classic/romantic; ancient/modern, naïve/sentimental) with its distinction between Apollonian and Dionysian modes. The Apollonian mode represents dreams, illusions and the principle of individuation. The Dionysian mode represents intoxication and the loss of self in ‘primordial unity’ and ‘life-giving’ chaos. Nietzsche saw tragedy as ‘the great life-affirming response’ to the vision of the purposelessness of the universe. Through great art, as in the Greek period, these two modes were balanced against each other, and life was affirmed rather than negated. Since Euripides, however, there had been an imbalance in favour of the Apollonian mode, with its focus on morality and rationalism. However, with the realization that ‘human logic cannot penetrate the deepest mysteries of the universe or correct all contradictions,’ a new tragic vision will arise in which both modes are again put in balance. Nietzsche suggested Wagner as a pioneer in this regard, although he was later to withdraw his support for his work in favour of Strindberg. ²⁰ Die Geburt was generally received in silence at the time, or dismissed for ‘faulty scholarship’,	A seeing-place	A momentary unification of two ‘perpetual antagonisms: the apollonian and the dionysian	Doing: drama (tragedy) – a response to the purposeless of life Showing: a ‘universal’ vision Watching: spectatorship is an external relationship, a separate concept.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		although it has since been recognized as ‘a work of major poetic insight’.²¹ Nietzsche dismissed suggestions that the chorus of Greek tragedy was either an ‘ideal spectator’ or a representation of the common people. The latter was a ‘blasphemous’ explanation by later democrats who enjoyed seeing kings levelled by commoners. Such an explanation might exist in Aristotle, but that kind of relationship between kings and people did not exist at the time of the first tragedies. Nietzsche, as well as other theorists, believed that the great age of Greek tragedy was over some one hundred years before Aristotle’s analysis of tragedy. Tragedy ‘died when music fled’, and when character ceased to be expanded into a universal type, but reduced to individuality. Nietzsche considered this ‘the victory of phenomenon over the Universal’. It was marked by the rise of Socrates.²² Nor could the chorus have been an ‘ideal spectator’ in the sense of representing spectators in the theatre, since they actually participate in the performance. Schlegel, who had put this argument, was simply applying ‘the deep Germanic bias in favour of anything called “ideal”’, as well as using this ideal to draw disparaging comparisons with contemporary German spectators. Nietzsche supported Schiller’s explanation of the chorus as a ‘living barrier’ between spectators and the drama, designed to preserve the domain and the freedom of the ‘vision’ which was being generated by the chorus: ‘a decisive step by which war is declared against naturalism’. The chorus was the barrier which, through the use of music, dance and rhythm, protected the play as a play, thereby allowing it to generate the cathartic response in the audience in which the gulf between man and man, state and society was ‘neutralized’. The spectator could not be within the play. The spectator as a concept only exists in a position of externality, as ‘a separate concept’. The whole point of drama, to overcome the gap between man and man, is lost if the spectator is part of the drama, as is the cathartic effect.²³ Nietzsche found attending theatre ‘exhilarating’. He did some performing himself, wrote a six-act play along Greek tragedy lines, wrote some songs and sang in choirs. As a professor, he obtained press credentials so he could attend the theatre as a critic.²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalism View of Theatre: positive
Preface to Thérèse Raquin (1873); Le	Emile Zola (1840-1902) French novelist, playwright, art	Essential theorist. Zola campaigned to revitalize theatre through naturalism: drama was ‘slipping towards extinction’ because it was failing to come to terms with the new age of naturalism.²⁶ It needed to adhere closely to the laws of nature as understood at the time.²⁷ The Preface was a ‘kind of manifesto of naturalism’.²⁸ Zola rejected didacticism in	A place where drama is performed as if there	To show Truth	Doing: drama – a science; the artist as scientist

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
naturalisme au théâtre (1873); ²⁵ Nos auteurs dramatiques (1881); Le roman expérimental (1881);	critic	theatre, regarding it responsible for Dumas films lack of success. Zola believed the artist should emulate the scientist in method (the careful study of objective phenomena) and aim ('an exact analysis of man'), rather than 'play the role of moralist and legislator'.²⁹ The scientific metaphor appears frequently in Zola's theory in relation to the novelist whose work he describes as 'experimental'. He also believed that 'the experimental and scientific spirit of the century will prevail in the theatre, and that there lies the only renewal possible for our stage'. Naturalism would eventually triumph over both classicism and romanticism in all aspects of the theatre, including settings, costuming and acting styles.³⁰ The artist's temperament has a role to play in this, but the artist should never 'distort or falsify to suit either his own concerns, the conventions of the form, or the tastes of his public'.³¹ Zola rejected the 'deplorable tradition' of acting as taught by Samson (1863). He promoted 'natural' acting, as if spectators did not exist for the performers (similar to Diderot but for different reasons). He argued that the provision of appropriate settings and costumes would assist this naturalist performance since people 'act as they do in real life in part because of the clothing they wear and the surroundings in which they live'.³² He was significantly influenced by the historicism of Taine, considering naturalism 'the inevitable literature of the Republic of 1870', although he had little to say about the negative aspects of 'a government based on positivist thought and a scientific analysis of the needs of the nation'.³³ He had a significant influence on the theatre of Antoine, Jullien and Strindberg. 'Every epoch has its own formula, and our formula certainly isn't that of 1830. We live in an age of method, of experimental science, what we need is exact analysis' and a drama which accepts nature instead of seeing it as something 'to be cleaned up and elevated': 'truth has no need for dressing up; it can walk naked'.³⁴ What was needed was a truly great dramatist whose work was good enough to 'win the crowd over' to this new drama'. 'In the face of a truly strong man the spectators would give in', as they had to Victor Hugo.³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-naturalism View of Theatre: positive	were no spectators		under the influence of his environment (milieu). Actors: should act as if there was no spectator Showing: life Watching: 'The public in the mass do not like to have their customs interfered with and their judgments are as brutal as the death sentence',³⁶ however, they can be won over to new ideas by a strong dramatist.
1874: the first travelling exhibit of a non-European/indigenous culture (from Lapland). These kinds of exhibits proved so popular that they continued until 1931. 'Colonial exhibitions all over western Europe attracted an extremely broad range of spectators right up to World War I. In 1910, Meyerhold saw the Samoa exhibition in Hamburg and was impressed by the dances and chants. Similarly, Artaud was greatly influenced by the Balinese dancers at the Colonial Exhibition in Paris in 1931'.³⁷ Attending such exhibitions was seen as affordable education, and spectators from all strata of society came to view them. Often 'special rates' were offered on Sundays to allow working

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
people to attend.³⁸ 1875: Wilson and Goldfarb consider that modern theatre began from this point, arguing that there was sometimes ‘a delay before written drama reflects social changes’. The ideas of Marx and Darwin, for instance, were not particularly apparent in drama until the late C19th and early C20th.³⁹ After 1875, however, a theatre developed which had ‘characteristics and a shape all its own’ and which reflected the ‘drastic shift in the way people regarded themselves and the world around them’ which was one of the marks of the modern period.⁴⁰ This move was assisted by the opening of Japan to the west in 1868 and the appearance of articles and books on Japanese theatre. In 1899 the Otojiro Kawakami troupe toured American and Europe, introducing European and American spectators to a modernized version of kabuki. Although critics considered it naïve, spectators ‘were captivated’.⁴¹ The appearance of other cultures at the various world exhibitions also introduced new ideas of theatre and performance not tied to language which were to have a profound effect on the theatre of the early C20th, providing initially a ‘counter-model’ to European naturalistic theatre, and then a comparison of performance technique.⁴²
Essai d'esthétique de theatre (1876)	Francisque Sarcey (1827-1899) French theatre critic	Dramatic art is ‘the ensemble of universal or local, eternal or temporary conventions by the aid of which one represents human life on a stage so as to give to the public the illusion of truth’.⁴³ The effect on the public is central to drama. The question is not what happens in real life (e.g. a mix of comedy and tragedy) but whether ‘twelve hundred persons gathered in a theatre auditorium can easily move from tears to laughter and from laughter to tears’.⁴⁴ The audience should be the point of departure for any consideration of theatre: ‘It is an indisputable fact that a dramatic work, whatever it may be, is designed to be listened to by a number of persons united and forming an audience ... no audience, no play. The audience is the necessary and inevitable condition to which dramatic art must accommodate its means. I emphasise this point because it is the point of departure, because from this simple fact we can drive all the laws of the theatre without a single exception’.⁴⁵ Public taste changes, so the content of plays will change to please contemporary taste. For this reason, Sarcey championed well-made plays which pleased the public over revolutionary new forms which try to overthrow the rules. Clarity and logic of structure were vital. The keystone of structure was the scène à faire (the obligatory scene), a term which became a central concept in the analysis of play construction. The careful arrangement of anticipation (the setting up of an obligatory scene) and fulfilment (the playing out of the obligatory scene) was the essence of theatrical experience.⁴⁶ One of the few critics who considered farce, he claimed that ‘All farces congeal when they are transferred from the stage to a cold description of them’.⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – the well-made play View of Theatre: positive	A place where people gather to listen	Representation on stage before an audience	Doing: drama (a conventional art); a performed art; playwrighting as craft Showing: a combination of anticipation and fulfilment Watching: the effect on the audience is central; all drama must accommodate itself to the presence of listeners

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'On the Idea of Comedy' (1877)	George Meredith (1828-1909)	One of the few English essays of the period to consider abstract literary and dramatic theory. ⁴⁸ Comedies can be divided into satire, irony and humour, according to the degree of sympathy with the object of laughter. The test of true comedy is 'that it shall awaken thoughtful laughter' when shown follies that depart from common-sense. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To arouse sympathy	Doing: the stimulation of sympathy; self-awareness Showing: follies 1877: English translation of François-Joseph Talma's Quelques reflexions sur Lekain et sur l'art théâtral . Translation was arranged by Henry Irving in order to counteract the influence of Diderot and Coquelin. ⁴⁹ The comic actor represents everyday persons, for which he must draw on his own nature. The tragic actor must preserve the ideal forms created by the poet, which requires technical skill as well. Nevertheless, contrary to Diderot, sensibility is more important than intelligence in acting in producing a deeply moving performance.
Introduction to Henriette Maréchal (1879); preface to Henriette Maréchal (1885)	Edmond de Goncourt (1822-1896) German dramatist	Goncourt rejected the realist tradition entirely. Drama as an art form was 'a box of conventions, a pasteboard creation' ... 'a pasteboard temple of convention'. Instead of the 'learned verbal displays of the romantics or the flat banalities of the naturalists', theatre should develop a 'literary spoken language' which would allow the portrayal of 'sentiments in the characters which are in accord with nature'. ⁵⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		The portrayal of sentiments through language	Doing: playwrighting ; a conventional art form Showing: the sentiments of characters
1880s: the emergence of a new naturalist movement in Germany and France, which rejected 'engaged social drama' such as was being promoted by Hebbel, Freytag and Ludwig. ⁵¹ The German Naturalism movement was far more systematic than in other countries, albeit belated. Its 'explicit objective was to completely remove the barrier separating theatre from life ... [to] render the theatrical medium absolutely transparent', a 'stunning example of "anti-theatrical" theatricality'. ⁵² The public had become 'obsessed with naturalism and with cinematograph'. ⁵³ Theatre had picked up on this idea, as it picked up everything, but Meyerhold believed the obsession was obstructive to the theatrical art. The German critic Heinrich Hart called for 'an overcoming of the prosaic and commonplace which now rules' in favour of a 'deep, internal, emotional poetry, which bears profound thoughts on its wings and joins heaven and earth with its vision' as a counter to the impact of film . ⁵⁴ Despite this, realist theatre ruled, aided by the introduction during the 1880s of the proscenium arch and the use of electric lighting , which 'fixed and framed' the action and the actors. ⁵⁵ From 1878 to 1902, scenery and actors became more and more integrated; actors ceased to be 'the stage picture' and became inserted into a scene as pictorialism became a theatrical convention. ⁵⁶ Also new was the rise of serious discussion of comedy as well as ' a steady emphasis upon technique ' with the appearance of practical guides to playwrighting, suggesting that good plays could be produced to a formula. ⁵⁷ However, also on the rise were complaints about spectator passivity and 'stolid indifference in the stalls' . ⁵⁸
Pariser Theatereindrü	Otto Brahm (1856-1912)	A founder of the Berlin Freie Bühne, a pioneer 'members-only' theatre for presenting modern ideas of staging and dramaturgy, modelled on Antoine's Théâtre Libre. By being	A place for the	To show nature in 'her	Doing: drama (art);

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
cke (1880); ‘Der Naturalismus und das Theater’ (1891); Review of Ibsen’s Ghosts (1887); Freie Bühne für modernes Leben (1890); ‘Von alter und neuer Schauspiel-kunst’ (1892)	German critic and founder of Freie Bühne	a subscription organization, the Freie Bühne aimed to circumvent both convention and the censorship which prevented naturalist plays from being presented. Brahm condemned the reliance on convention rather than naturalism: the theatre could ‘recover its great spiritual power over the life of the Germans only by walking the path of naturalism’.⁵⁹ This was a naturalism which was still tempered by metaphysical idealism. The ‘pure’ work of art was one in which the influence of temperament (subjectivity) was mastered so that it did not dominate. The ideal, however, was not an immutable absolute, but a process, ‘a dynamic of change and constant organic growth’. Theory must change to ‘accommodate the ever-changing rules of art’.⁶⁰ The ‘battle cry’ of new art was truth, as revealed in the struggles of actual existence.⁶¹ This was not an argument for imitating nature. The actor must not just be a keen observer but an individual who experiences life deeply, so that he can present nature ‘in her entirety, her fullness of soul’.⁶² Brahm’s Freie Bühne theatre championed the work of naturalist dramatist Gerhart Hauptmann (1862-1946), whose work dealt with ‘significant social questions in a strikingly realistic manner’.⁶³ The first production of Hauptmann’s Beyond Sunrise in 1889 provoked a ‘theater scandal’, a battle between spectators, and between spectators and stage.⁶⁴ Brahm’s work later inspired the formation of a similar theatre for the proletariat, championed by Bruno Wille (1890). Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conventional theatre/pro-naturalism View of Theatre: positive	presentation of plays	fullness of soul’, Truth	acting: keen observation and deep experience required for the actor Showing: actual existence Watching: spectators should be challenged and shocked out of their complacency (even if they were subscribers)
L’art et le comédien (1880; translated into English as ‘Art and the Actor’ 1880); ‘L’art du comédien’ (1887); ⁶⁵ ‘A Reply to Mr Henry Irving’	Constant Coquelin (1841-1909) French actor	The actor is an independent artist who uses the creation of the dramatist to make his own creation. The only reason acting can be considered an art is because of the paradox pointed to by Diderot: that the best acting of emotion is one which is done ‘on condition of complete self-mastery’ and an ability to express feelings which have never been experienced. Naturalism cannot be effective on stage. ‘The theatre must heighten and select with wisdom and taste’.⁶⁷ The essay provoked a debate between Coquelin and Kemble, Irving, Jenkin, Boucicault and Archer, and instigated a response from Coquelin in his 1887 essay. The actor has a dual personality. ‘The “first self” conceives the character to be created in terms of the “second self”, his instrument’, which must be kept under the control of the first to avoid the actor’s individuality from eclipsing the role and thus losing the characterization. In his ‘Reply’, Coquelin suggested that the differences between his view and Irving’s may be cultural, the French favouring tradition while the		The effective use of emotion	Doing: drama – a performed art; acting as an art of doubling

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1887) ⁶⁶		English favour originality and spontaneity. Nevertheless, he maintained that unless the actor is well studied in his part, he will not be able to use emotion effectively and theatrically. ⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalistic acting View of Theatre: positive
Etudes critiques sur l'histoire de la littérature française (1880); Le roman naturaliste (1882); Nouvelles questions de critique (1890); Les époques du théâtre français (1892); 'La loi du théâtre' (1893) (translated as The Law of the Drama 1894) ⁶⁹	Ferdinand Brunetière (1849-1906) Influential French literary theorist and critic	A critic of Zola's naturalism, claiming it distorted realism as severely as the romantics, but in the opposite direction, producing characters which were either puppets or mere animals and a focus on 'the crude and gross'. ⁷⁰ 'The great error of the century has been to mingle and confuse man with nature, never stopping to consider that in art, in science, and in morality, man is man only to the extent that he distinguishes himself from nature and becomes an exception to it'. ⁷¹ Naturalism required idealism to provide a complete and balanced depiction of reality. Drama was 'the conflict of opposing duties and desires'. He preached 'No struggle, no drama'. ⁷² Brunetière was influenced by Darwin, and attempted to apply the doctrine of evolution to literary history. He accepted the forces of race and environment suggested by Taine, however he argued that works in one era influenced subsequent works, a theory associated more with Hegel. Changes of taste could best be explained by a kind of dialectic process driven by a desire to do 'something different'. Darwinian natural selection determines who will become great, and affects those who come after. In this way 'A genre is born, grows, attains its perfection, declines, and finally dies'. ⁷³ Brunetière proposed three 'general laws' of the drama: the first 'connects the theatre with other genres and with life itself in that it requires that the action turn upon 'some question of general interest' i.e. it is a case of conscience or a social question. The third law, which is also common to all genres, is that as art evolves, it 'employs the debris of what it has overthrown', thus retaining something from previous forms. The second law, the only one specific to drama and later advanced by Brunetière as drama's only law, is that 'A theatrical action must be conducted by wills, which, whether they are free or not, are at least always conscious of themselves'. ⁷⁴ This 'formula' of a will seeking some goal and conscious of the means it employs operates in all dramatic genres. It also allows the differentiation of genres (species) according to the kind of obstacle against which the will is directed (laws of nature, fate, internal passion, prejudice, social convention etc.). The greatest drama is produced 'when an entire people is engaged in a project of the will', such as occurred during the Peloponnesian Wars, Spanish and English imperial expansion, the unification of the	A place	Communication; 'self-definition'	Doing: drama (an historically evolving genre of literary art which reaches its peak during periods of conflict and struggle); a self-conscious art Showing: struggle Watching: communication on the basis of emotional sympathy

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		French nation. The influence of Schopenhauer can be heard in Brunetière's use of the will, although the will, for Brunetière, leads to deeper involvement rather than distance. 'If will is common to all men, then upon it understanding and communication can be postulated. It provides between us and the dramatic hero a base for the emotional sympathy sought by the English critics', which is 'in danger of being lost by the objectivity of the naturalists and the subjectivity of the impressionists. A recognition of will as the basis of existence leads to a commitment to action as self-definition, both for individuals and nations:⁷⁵ 'The belief in determinism is more favourable to the progress of the novel, but the belief in free will is more favourable to the progress of dramatic art. Men of action ... have always been fond of the theatre'.⁷⁶ Carlson sees in this a hint of existentialism. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalism View of Theatre: positive

¹ Freytag 1965, Die Technik des Dramas, Darmstadt, p. 7; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 257.

² Carlson 1984: 257-8

³ Carlson 1984: 258-9

⁴ Freytag 1863 quoted in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 35

⁵ Carlson 1984: 259

⁶ Dilthey 1914-82, Gesammelte Schriften, Leipzig, Vol. 8, p. 110-112; in Carlson 1984: 259). Dilthey's review was first published in Berliner Allgemeinen Zeitung in 1863.

⁷ Carlson 1984: 259

⁸ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 338

⁹ Johnson, Allan G. 2000. The Blackwell Dictionary of Sociology: A User's Guide to Sociological Language. 2 ed. Massachusetts and Oxford: Blackwell. 364

¹⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 338

¹¹ Samson 1863, L'art théâtral, Paris, p. 56; in Carlson 1984: 276.

¹² Donne 1863 cited in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 10

¹³ Carlson 1984: 244-5

¹⁴ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269. 262-3

¹⁵ De Banville's essays were published in the National, December 22, 1873, April 14, 1879 and September 24, 1877.

-
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 289
- ¹⁷ Twain 1871 in Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press. xiv
- ¹⁸ Puchner, Martin. 2006. 'Kenneth Burke: Theater, Philosophy, and the Limits of Performance'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 41-56. 42
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 261
- ²⁰ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 342
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 263
- ²² Nietzsche 1872, in Gerould 2000: 349
- ²³ Nietzsche 1872, 'The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music', in Ecce Homo and The Birth of Tragedy, trans. Clifton P. Fadiman, N.Y., The Modern Library, 1927; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 339-350.
- ²⁴ Gerould 2000: 337
- ²⁵ Zola 1966/1873, 'Preface to Thérèse Raquin', in From the Modern Repertoire, Series Three, trans. Kathleen Boutall, ed. Eric Bentley, Bloomington, Indiana University Press, reprinted in Gerould 2000: 353-357, p. 354; also translated by and reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 80-88.
- ²⁶ Zola 1881 in Brandt 1998: 86
- ²⁷ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 179
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 275
- ²⁹ Zola 1927-29, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 43, p. 133; in Carlson 1984: 274.
- ³⁰ Zola 1927-29, Oeuvres complètes, Paris, Vol. 38, p. iii; in Carlson 1984: 275.
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 275
- ³² Carlson 1984: 277
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 282
- ³⁴ Zola 1881 in Brandt 1998: 86
- ³⁵ Zola 1881 in Brandt 1998: 87
- ³⁶ Zola 1881 in Gerould 2000: 354
- ³⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 75, 358n3
- ³⁸ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 226. Fischer-Lichte saw what she considered a similar 'colonial' exhibition in Seattle in 1993 when she visited a Native American settlement as a tourist. They all shared the aim of comparing 'civilized' (western) society with some 'primitive' society. They were satirized by performance artists Fusco and Gomez-Peña in their Two Undiscovered Amerindians Visit ... during the 1990s, in which the artists 'lived' in a cage as an exhibit of a newly discovered primitive people. This performance produced very mixed responses in audiences, from direct sexual challenges to the performers by white Europeans to extreme discomfort with the whole idea by indigenous and black viewers. Some viewers appeared to believe the characters were real while others appeared to resent the duplicity. Often the irony was lost (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 229-230). The reactions of the white European and Americans 'betray[ed] a continuation of a colonial mentality ... still conditioned and governed by former stereotypes

[and] brought to light how colonial mentality is still deeply rooted in Western culture' and revealed that the apparently privileged spectators were themselves the subject of a gaze, that of the performers (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 230-1), something not at all recognized in the C19th.

³⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 355

⁴⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 398

⁴¹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 117

⁴² Fischer-Lichte 1997: 130-1

⁴³ Sarcey 1900-1902, Quarante ans de théâtre, Paris, Vol. 1, p. 132, in Carlson 1984: 282-3.

⁴⁴ Sarcey 1900-1902, Quarante ans de théâtre, Paris, Vol. 1, p. 140, in Carlson 1984: 282-3.

⁴⁵ Sarcey 1876, quoted in Mazrui 1975: 176, and in Crane 1967: 230.

⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 283-4

⁴⁷ Cited in Styran, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.77

⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 232

⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 233

⁵⁰ Edmond and Jules de Goncourt 1888, Préfaces et manifestes littéraires, Paris, pp. 112-3, 136; in Carlson 1984: 278-9.

⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 263

⁵² Williams, Kirk. 2001. 'Anti-theatricality and the Limits of Naturalism'. Modern Drama 44 (3) pp. 284-381.285

⁵³ Meyerhold, Vsevolod Vaslov. 1998/1913. 'On the theatre: The Fairground Booth'. In Modern Theories of the Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990, edited by G. Brandt. Oxford: Clarendon Press.133

⁵⁴ Heinrich Hart 1882-84, Kritische Waffengänge, Vol. 2, p. 28; in Carlson 1984: 264.

⁵⁵ Schoch, Richard W. 1999. "'We Do Nothing but Enact History": Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 54 (1) pp. 27-52. 42

⁵⁶ Schoch 1999: 43-4

⁵⁷ Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers.209

⁵⁸ Booth, Michael 1975. 'The Theatre and its Audience'. In The Revels History of Drama in English VI: 1750-1880, edited by M. Booth, et al., London: Methuen.

⁵⁹ Brahm 1964, Kritiken und Essays, Zurich, p. 418; in Carlson 1984: 264.

⁶⁰ Brahm 1964, Kritiken und Essays, Zurich, p. 103; in Carlson 1984: 265.

⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 265

⁶² Brahm 1964, Kritiken und Essays, Zurich, p. 473; in Carlson 1984: 265.

⁶³ Carlson 1984: 266

⁶⁴ Blackadder 2003

⁶⁵ Published in Harper's, No. 74, May 1887, p. 894.

⁶⁶ Translated by Theodore Child and published in Harper's Weekly Vol. 31(1612), November 12, 1887.

⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 232-3

⁶⁸ Carlson 1984: 234-5

⁶⁹ This elision of theatre and drama is endemic in 'theatre' theory.

⁷⁰ Carlson 1984: 284-5

⁷¹ Brunetière 1890, Nouvelles questions de critique, Paris, p. 393; in Carlson 1984: 286.

⁷² Hamilton, Clayton. 1910. The Theory of the Theatre and Other Principles of Dramatic Criticism. New York: Henry Holt and Company. 35

⁷³ Brunetière 1880, Etudes critiques, Paris, p. 23; in Carlson 1984: 298.

⁷⁴ Brunetière 1892, Les époques du théâtre français, Paris, pp. 8-9, 367; in Carlson 1984: 298.

⁷⁵ Carlson 1984: 299

⁷⁶ Brunetière 1894 in Brandt 1998: 24

Table 19/51 Theories of Theatre 1881-1891

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1880s: a fascination with Japanese theatre. Articles and books about it were widely read and ideas were taken up into theatre practices, especially in Europe. Stage designer Emil Orlik spent 1900-1901 in Japan studying and brought back information about theatre practices which influenced Reinhardt. A continuing concern with acting: how much the performer showed through the character; which came first – technique or passion; the balance between the two.
'On the Stage', preface to Notes upon Some of Shakespeare's Plays (1882)	Frances Kemble (1809-1893) poet, dramatist, diarist and actress	Drew a distinction between the dramatic and the theatrical . The dramatic is the 'passionate, emotional, humorous element' in human nature; it has 'a power of apprehension quicker than the disintegrating process of critical analysis.' The theatrical 'is the conscious, artificial reproduction of this' element, and therefore has an analytic quality. Great actors have a talent for both, but rely most strongly on their dramatic talent, using the theatrical only as far as they need to to meet the physical demands of the theatre. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis – acting View of Theatre: positive	A place of performance	Representation through artifice	Doing: acting as an art
'Das 'deutsche Theater' des Herrn L'Arronge (1882); 'Für und gegen Zola' (1885)	Heinrich Hart (1855-1906) German critic and naturalist	Drama was 'the summit of all art'. The stage 'opens to us the pure world of ideas, free of any restrictions or chance occurrences; it shows us man in his essence, in the full range of his deeds and actions; it is a mirror of mankind, and brings man into consciousness of his feelings and drives'. ² The neglect of the poetic dimension of drama by both writers and theatre practitioners had brought drama into decline. Hart urged the dramatist to oversee the production of his work to protect his original vision: the purpose of presentation was simply to give this vision 'a greater effect on the senses'. ³ 'We need to dispel the disastrous delusion that the stage is nothing more than an institution of pleasure ... We need to turn the theatre back into a reflection of the times.' ⁴ Hart wanted 'a theater of truthfulness', a 'representation of life' not convention and artifice. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist; anti-popular theatre (theatre for pleasure) View of Theatre: ambivalent	An institution; a practice; a place where drama is staged	Presentation: the mirror of mankind; Truth	Doing: drama (a performed poetic art enacted on the stage) Showing: a vision of mankind Watching: man comes into a consciousness of his own feelings and drives: self-understanding
Preface to English translation of	Henry Irving (1838-1905) English actor	Irving disagreed with both Diderot and Coquelin, citing Talma (whose publication in English he had arranged in 1877) in support: 'the great actor does not deny his sensibilities; he feels emotions perhaps more keenly than others and uses these feelings in		The creation of characters; inspiration	Doing: acting as art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Diderot's The Paradox of Acting (1883); 'The Art of Acting'; 'An Actor's Notes' (1887) ⁵	and director	his art'. 'An Actor's Notes' is a response to Coquelin's 1887 essay in which he insisted upon the value of 'occasionally losing oneself in passion on the stage'. ⁶ In any case, it was neither possible nor desirable to remove all trace of the actor's personality from the role they were playing, since it was a factor that made each creation of a character unique. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – contemporary acting theory View of Theatre: positive		through feeling
'Talma on the Actor's Art' (1883)	Fleeming Jenkin (1833-1885) Student of C19th acting	The art of the actor is largely the result of a training in emotional memory : 'by the aid of memory' actors rehearse and perfectly reproduce a tone or cry so that 'that tone or cry brings back simultaneously a close reproduction of the feeling by which it was first created'. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Reproduction of emotion through training	Doing: acting as an art
1883: the beginning of complaints about the 'passivity' of spectators: 'It is a melancholy but undoubted fact that an ordinary, every-day theatrical audience is chiefly composed of a very dull set of people, stupid, yet captious, who only ask to be amused, and object to being emotionally excited'.⁸ This perception of spectator passivity is paralleled by the rise of playwrights who set out to shock, 'to affront the spectators as forcefully as circumstances would allow'. Blackadder argues that the 'changes in the physical configuration and lighting of theatre space [over the past fifty years] had manoeuvred the spectators into a position from which they could only look at, but not contribute to the theatrical event'.⁹ The conflict created between these pacified spectators and confrontational work which was designed to attack them produced the violent clashes ['theater-scandals'] which marked much new work between 1880 and 1930. 1884: A major exhibition from Ceylon, which travelled through Europe and England, attracted almost a million visitors.¹⁰ The late nineteenth century saw the 'rise of the Director' in an effort to unify the performance of a play under a 'single vision' which could provide aesthetic unity and coherence.¹¹ The German touring troupe Saxe-Meiningen provided a model for this kind of coordinated approach, 'meticulous in its concern for historical accuracy and authenticity in costumes and sets' and sharply focused productions. In particular, the troupe had brought the handling of crowd scenes 'to perfection' (German critic Karl Frenzel 1876). The troupe had a profound effect on André Antoine, the founder of the subscription-only Théâtre Libre in Paris (1887), on Stanislavski in Moscow and Max Reinhardt in Berlin, bringing the position of director to prominence.¹² Antoine (1858-1943) opened his independent experimental theatre, which was a members' only theatre in order to get around censorship regulations, with the aim of promoting naturalism in the theatre. In May 1890, he published a brochure explaining the goals of the theatre. Influenced by Zola, the theatre was to be based upon 'truth, observation, and the direct study of nature'.¹³ Actors were to be trained in natural gestures and plays would feature realistic settings. This movement was later to be challenged by what came to be known as the symbolist movement. A feature of this latter movement was the problematizing of the physicality of theatre, in particular the physical presence of the actor, with solutions to this problem ranging from the requirement that actors were to remain static, or wear masks, to their replacement with marionettes.
'Richard Wagner,	Stéphane Mallarmé	Mallarmé was a key figure in the development of the symbolist movement, which grew out of the antirealist reaction to naturalism, especially that promoted by Zola. The	A space in which drama	Aesthetic expression;	Doing: poetry (drama was a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
reverie d'un poète français' (1885); ¹⁴ Le livre (unfinished)	(1842-1898) French poet	movement was at times anti-theatrical, considering the best theatre to be 'the theatre of the mind'. The physical presence of actors and scenery detracted from art's expressiveness. ¹⁵ Mallarmé's writings on theatre were scattered and never very clear, but he urged dramatists to 'depict, not the object, but the effect which it produces'. ¹⁶ The writings of disciples such as Charles Morice (1861-1919), although clearer, tended to disregard theatre altogether or predict its demise. Others, calling themselves idéoréalistes , tried to combine features of realism and idealism (see Coulon 1892). Mallarmé did however continue to accept theatre as a performed art, acknowledging its social nature and the enhancing effect staging could have (as long as it was subordinated to the poetry). ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalism View of Theatre: ambivalent	is performed	symbolism	performed art of poetry) Showing: dramatists should depict, not the object, but the effect produced by the object
'Notes sur la peinture wagnérienne' (1886)	Teodor de Wyzewa (1862-1917) Polish writer, leading exponent of the Symbolist art movement in France	Wyzewa was one of the founders of the Revue wagnérienne (1885), which drew on Wagner much as the romantics had drawn on Shakespeare in order to combat naturalism in favour of the ideal world of art. Art was a mystic expression of a deeper reality. Its purpose was 'to build a holy world of a better life above the world of everyday profane appearances'. As Wagner had, the movement favoured the integration of all the arts to create an aesthetic whole. This antirealist position led to the rise of symbolism . The Revue wagnérienne was the first journal devoted to this movement, although not everyone agreed with the idea of Wagner as a guiding spirit or the Wagnerian emphasis on music and theatricality as the vehicle for the recreation of the world of the spirit. ¹⁸ Wyzewa himself believed that 'A drama read, will appear to sensitive souls more alive than the same drama given on stage by living actors'. ¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realist; anti-theatre View of Theatre: negative	A place where drama is staged	Transcendental - 'to build a holy world of a better life above the world of everyday profane appearances'	Doing: drama (a literary art better read) Watching: reading was better than watching drama
'Coquelin-Irving' (1887) ²⁰	Dion Boucicault (c1820-1890) French Dramatist	Different techniques of writing, and therefore probably acting, are required for different genres: comedy requires more circumspection, self-conscious deliberation and calculation; tragedy, on the other hand, requires more spontaneity and passion. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting
Masks or Faces? (1888); Play-making	William Archer (1856-1924) drama critic	An attempt to resolve the dispute over the art of acting by an empirical study. Summed up the debate over the art of acting as 'To feel or not to feel? – That is the question?'. ²² Undertook a survey of leading English and French actors, questioning them about whether and when they actually 'truly wept, blushed, and so forth, on stage'. ²³ His	A place of assembly	The portrayal of life for social function	Doing: drama (not poetry – story-telling in action)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1912); The Old Drama and the New .		conclusions tended to support both sides of the debate without shedding light on the essential problem: the relationship between the text, one's emotions, imaginative sympathy and the will.²⁴ Archer shared Shaw's view on the social function of drama. Crisis not conflict drove drama, which 'may be called the art of crises'.²⁵ However, character was 'the noblest part of drama',²⁶ and the art necessarily had to pay attention to spectators: 'The art of theatrical story-telling is necessarily related to the audience to whom the story is to be told. One must assume an audience of a certain status and characteristics before one can rationally discuss the best methods of appealing to its intelligence and sympathies ... The painter may paint, the sculptor model, the lyric poet sing, simply to please himself, but the drama has no meaning except in relation to an audience. It is a portrayal of life by means of a mechanism so devised as to bring it home to a considerable number of people assembled in a given place'.²⁷ Archer also argued that good 'new' drama had nothing to do with poetry (as 'old' drama had). Drama was a 'faithful imitation' of life as we know it.²⁸ This distinction would have been unthinkable, according to Crane, without the change in understanding of poetry, from Aristotle's meaning of the making of an artistic imitation to the idea of poetry as 'a certain quality of expression' usually in verse.²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-poetry View of Theatre: functional		using imitation	using imitation; acting as an art and craft Watching: drama is created assuming an audience, which is 'a considerable number of people assembled in a given place'
1888: Japanese kabuki theatre was described by Alfred Lequeux in his book 'Le théâtre du Japon'. ³⁰ It was to have a significant effect on staging techniques in experimental European theatre.
Letters to editor and critic A.S. Suvron (1888; 1890) ³¹	Anton Chekhov (1860-1904) Russian dramatist	Chekhov wrote little in terms of theory. In these letters, however, he considered the question of the artist's relationship to social issues. The artist's duty, according to Chekhov, was 'not to solve problems, but only to state them clearly':³² 'The artist should be, not the judge of his characters and their conversations, but only an unbiased witness'.³³ The evidence is placed before the readers or spectators, who pronounce judgment. This evidence must be particular: 'God preserve us from generalizations', he is reputed to have said.³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-universalistic (aesthetic or symbolic) theatre View of Theatre: positive		The dramatist (artist) was an 'unbiased witness' who aimed to state problems clearly and place the evidence before the readers or spectators	Doing: playwrighting (an art) Watching: readers/spectators pronounced judgment

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘The Decay of Lying: An Observation’ (1889); ‘The Critic as Artist’ (1890) ³⁵	Oscar Wilde (1854-1900) English writer, playwright, poet and essayist	Considered the relationship between art and life. Art should be a model for life, not of life. The aim of art is aesthetic (as Aristotle argued) – its purpose is ‘simply to create a mood’. ³⁶ True art comes from form , not feeling. All art is a form of deception. It has nothing to do with reality: ‘To conflate life and art is to reduce art to mirroring life’ . ‘Lying is the proper aim of Art’. However, art sets the forms through which life can express itself. Since art is often in opposition to its time, this makes the use of art to read the history of life problematic: ‘To pass from the art of a time to the time itself is the great mistake that all historians commit’. Art is imaginative, pleasurable, abstract, decorative, recreative, it re-fashions life, it is ‘absolutely indifferent to facts’, complex, is a form of exaggeration, a form of selection, an ‘intensified mode of over-emphasis, stylistic, ‘a veil not a mirror’, makes and unmakes the world, never expresses anything but itself, is autonomous and often in opposition to its time. Nature, on the other hand, reveals a lack of design, has ‘curious crudities’ and extraordinary monotony, is in an ‘absolutely unfinished condition’, is imperfect, uncomfortable, has no laws and no uniformity, and provides only the rough material for Art. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism/pro-aesthetics View of Theatre: aesthetic		The creation of a mood, aesthetics; allowing the expression of life	Doing: art Showing: a selection of life as a model of life
Preface to L’échéance (1889)	Jean Jullien (1854-1919) French dramatist	Leading critical spokesman for Antoine’s naturalist theatre: ‘A play is a slice of life placed on the stage with art’ – a ‘common way of describing naturalist drama’ at the time. ³⁸ By art, Jullien does not mean the traditional construction of a play. The art of the drama involved the dramatist ‘living for a long time mentally with his characters, coming to think like them and thus gaining a language proper to each of them and being able to write a real dialogue without seeking to make effects in an inappropriate style ... structuring the acts and scenes logically on a solid base composed of observed facts instead of being concerned with the clever linking of conversations’ and ensuring that technical matters (like entrances and exits) ‘are justified by nature’. Movement was more important than language to Jullien, whose strong emphasis on pantomime raised the revolutionary possibility that the essence of drama might not lie in words at all. This insight would be considered by a significant part of C20th theatrical theory. ³⁹ Actors were to be encouraged to adapt roles to themselves, performing as if they were at home. The proscenium opening was to be considered ‘a fourth wall, transparent for the public, opaque for the actor’. The auditorium was to be darkened, footlights abandoned, props real and costumes appropriate in order to reinforce this vision of the theatre as an illusion	A place in which to see plays staged	To create an illusion of real life; to encourage spectators to ‘lose themselves’ in the play (hence the idea of ‘the fourth wall’ marked by the point where the lighted stage met a	Doing: playwrighting - an art in which movement takes precedence over language Watching: the spectator is required to behave a certain way: to ‘remain attentive and of real life. The spectator ‘must lose for an instant the feeling of his presence in a theatre’. Seated in darkness, he should ‘remain attentive and no longer dare to speak’. ⁴⁰ The application of disciplinary conventions to spectators. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-naturalistic drama View of Theatre: positive		darkened auditorium)	not speak.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘The New American Drama’ (1889) ⁴¹	William Dean Howells (1837-1920) American novelist and essayist	The representation of character was beginning to make its appearance in playwrighting and the theatre, replacing the concentration on action and plot which had been a feature of American theatre until now: ‘because the drama has been in times past and in other conditions the creature, the prisoner, of plot, it by no means follows that it must continue so; on the contrary, it seems to us that its liberation follows; and of this we see signs in the very home of the highly intrigued drama [melodrama], where construction has been carried to the very last point, and where it appears to have broken down at last under its own inflexibility’. ⁴² Howells preferred the new drama to be presented like a novel, as a series of sketches, rather than as the European ‘well-made’ play. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-plot driven drama View of Theatre: positive		Presentation	Doing: drama
Pamphlet (1890)	André Antoine (1858-1943) founder of the Théâtre Libre and Théâtre Antoine (1897)	Antoine, a clerk in a gas company with little acting or theatre experience, opened his independent experimental subscription theatre with the aim of promoting naturalism in the theatre, providing a model for an independent theatre which was quickly imitated elsewhere in Europe. ⁴³ In May 1890, he published a brochure explaining the goals of the theatre. Influenced by Zola, the theatre was to be based upon ‘truth, observation, and the direct study of nature’. ⁴⁴ Actors were to be trained in natural gestures and plays would feature realistic settings. Antoine was innovative in production: he used real carcasses on stage, used the ‘box set’ and ‘ fourth wall ’, discouraged declamation, replaced footlights with more natural lighting, emphasized ensemble acting and insisted that ‘each play had its own environment’. ⁴⁵ He was influential in both gaining acceptance for realism/naturalism, and in the development of the independent theatre movement (or ‘little’ theatre movement, as it became known in America) and ‘renowned for his realism and utilization of the fourth wall’. According to Krasner, he epitomised the Hegelian stream in modern theatre which espoused the ‘single-minded determination to see the world objectively’ and use the theatre as a ‘laboratory’ to examine the world. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theatre/pro-naturalistic theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place (of experiment-ation)	The truthful observation of life	Doing: plays; performance; productions Showing: real life
‘Le théâtre’	Maurice	Essential theorist. The leading dramatist of the symbolist movement, Maeterlinck	A place in	To create a	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1890); 'The tragical in Daily Life' (1894); ⁴⁷ Le drame moderne (1904) ⁴⁸	Maeterlinck (1862-1949) French-Belgian poet, dramatist and mystic	struggled to find a satisfactory way to resolve the tension between the vision of the poet and the physicality of theatre and the actor: 'Every masterpiece is a symbol and the symbol can never support the active presence of a man'. ⁴⁹ Maeterlinck's first dramas were written for marionettes. His 1894 article was a manifesto calling for a new type of drama, a drama of stasis rather than action in order to provide a 'deeper, more human and more universal' and timeless moment which would encourage spectators to meditate. Although Maeterlinck later dismissed the idea as 'a theory of my youth, worth what most literary theories are worth – that is, almost nothing', his ideas subsequently appeared in the work of Yeats and Strindberg. ⁵⁰ Maeterlinck was not happy with the doom and gloom of modern theatre – or even ancient Greek or Shakespearean drama, since it was its settings that made it appear great despite the venality of the plots and the inevitable death and blood. He looked forward to a theatre 'of peace, and of beauty without tears' more in keeping with modern times. ⁵¹ Violent theatre was like being 'back for a few hours among my ancestors watching a life I don't share'. In modern life, 'we spend most of our lives far away from blood, shouting, and swords, and the tears of mankind have become silent ... and almost invisible'. ⁵² He recognized, however, that action was 'the sovereign law of the stage' , ⁵³ and all theatregoers, no matter how intelligent or wise, were transformed into 'the mere instinctive spectator, the man electrified negatively by the crowd, the man whose one desire is to see something happen'. He believed this transformation was 'incontestable ... there are no words so profound, so noble and admirable, but they will soon weary us ... if they lead to no action'. ⁵⁴ Although the desire to see action on the stage was an inevitable effect of the stage, Maeterlinck thought that such action should be rooted in more useful or 'less nefarious' conflicts than those which were depressing and inevitably ended in death. Although he recognized that theatre transformed theatre-goers into a particular kind of spectatorship , one which involved some kind of 'primitive, almost unimprovable' faculty for thinking, feeling and being moved ' en masse ', his main concern was with drama as literature : 'When I speak of the modern drama, I naturally refer only to those regions of dramatic literature that ... are yet essentially new'. ⁵⁵ Maeterlinck introduced the idea of different levels of dialogue: an outer level or order which was necessary to the action and a second order or inner dialogue 'that seems superfluous' but revealed the strivings of the soul, indicating that 'there are in mankind many more fruitful, more profound, and more interesting regions	which drama is embodied	'timeless moment' through action	playwrighting (poetry/literature); drama – a performed art Showing: peace and beauty Watching: spectators want to see action on the stage – it is the inevitable response to the stage; spectators were 'electrified' by being in a crowd into wanting to see something happen

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		than those of reason or intelligence'. ⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalistic theatre/anti-classical violence View of Theatre: ambivalent
'Aufruf zur Gründung einer Freien Volks-Bühne' (1890) ⁵⁷	Bruno Wille (1860-1928) German director	Argued for the establishment of a proletariat version of Brahm's Freie Bühne. Wille believed that theatre's moral and thought-provoking functions had been reduced under capitalism to mindless entertainment. He saw the establishment of a proletariat theatre as a means to address this. He was the first director of the Freie Volksbühne, but his program did not satisfy the Socialist party, who replaced him with Franz Mehring (1892). ⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-entertainment theatre View of Theatre: functional	A social and cultural institution	Moral instruction; a stimulus to thinking about important issues; cultural improvement	Doing: theatre as a political practice
The Quintessence of Ibsenism (1891); Preface to Mrs Warren's Profession (1894); 'The Problem Play' (1895); 'Better than Shakespeare?' (1900); Preface to The Shewing-Up of Blanco Posnet (1907); 'Literature and Art'	George Bernard Shaw (1856-1950) English dramatist, director and drama critic (a 'super spectator') ⁶⁰	Essential theorist. Shaw was 'the most prolific author/critic of the late nineteenth century'. ⁶¹ He aimed to transform the British theatre and its public. ⁶² He was 'stoutly opposed' to the formalist view of the drama advocated by Wilde. The primary aim of art was didactic: to present, and encourage, 'a thoughtful consideration of social questions'. ⁶³ It was the 'task' of theatre to be 'a factory of thought, a prompter of conscience, an elucidator of social conduct, an armory against despair and dullness, and a Temple of the Ascent of Man'. ⁶⁴ Drama is about the presentation of a problem, and its possible solution, allowing 'bewildered spectators of a monstrous confusion' to be changed into 'men intelligently conscious of the world and its destinies'. ⁶⁵ The problem investigated should be about political and temporal circumstance. To prefer a subject in which the conflict is 'between man and his apparently inevitable and eternal ... circumstances, is due ... to the dramatist's political ignorance (not to mention that of his audience)'. ⁶⁶ Verisimilitude makes its reappearance in Shaw. To properly engage spectators in moral questions, they must be presented with 'a familiar world': ⁶⁷ '[t]he beginning and end of the business from the author's point of view, is the art of making the audience believe that real things are happening to real people'. ⁶⁸ Nevertheless, Shaw balanced this didacticism in his plays with a theatrical skill which ensured their popularity perhaps in spite of their moralistic aim. A play should do work in the world: 'the highest genius ... is always intensely utilitarian'. ⁶⁹ Shaw rejected both the lyricism associated with symbolism and naturalism: 'I write plays with the deliberate object of converting the nation to my opinions in these	An institution: 'a factory of thought, a prompter of conscience, an elucidator of social conduct, an armory against despair and dullness, and a temple of the Ascent of Man'. ⁸²	Instruction: all art was ultimately didactic; there was no such thing as art for art's sake. Theatre is 'an older and greater Church'	Doing: drama (art) – playwrighting; staging, performance Showing: the presentation of a social problem and its possible solution Watching: required his spectators to keep their distance ⁸³ so that they could see the order the dramatist was

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1908); ‘How to Write a Popular Play’ (1909); ‘Against the Well-Made Play’ (1911); ⁵⁹ ‘Tolstoy: Tragedian or Comedian?’ (1921);		matters’.⁷⁰ Shaw believed that all art, in the end, was didactic, and that ‘the man who believes in art for art’s sake [was] a fool’.⁷¹ ‘great art is never produced for its own sake. It is too difficult to be worth the effort. [Great artists] believe they are apostles doing ... the Will of God’ or some equivalent.⁷² He argued that the traditional genres of tragedy and comedy were no longer viable; they had been replaced by tragicomedy (of which Ibsen had been the great pioneer).⁷³ Shaw thought of his plays in terms of music (‘Sing it: make music of it’), and demanded that voice be considered when casting them. He urged his actors to use a presentational, even flamboyant, style of acting: ‘Say it to the audience, they’ll be hearing it for the first time’. His plays were to be declaimed ‘just as Shakespeare’s should be’.⁷⁴ Shaw claimed that his ‘method of getting a play across the footlights is like a revolver shooting: every line has a bullet in it and comes with an explosion’.⁷⁵ He believed that it was ‘the business’ of the dramatist ‘to pick out the significant incidents from the chaos of daily happenings and arrange them so that their relation to one another becomes significant, thus changing us from bewildered spectators of monstrous confusion to [people] intelligently conscious of the world and its destinies’.⁷⁶ Clearly, Shaw was ‘already parting company with the naturalistic vogue in acting’.⁷⁷ He particularly condemned the ‘well-made play’, which he saw as ‘not an art [but] an industry [in which] men of mediocre talent and no conscience can turn out plays for the theatrical market’.⁷⁸ They were merely a ‘recreation of the trivial’.⁷⁹ The problem with ‘slice of life’ plays is that they commit the writer ‘to plays that have no endings ... The curtain comes down ... when the audience has seen enough ... to draw the moral, or must either leave ... or miss its last train’.⁸⁰ ‘the tragedy of modern life is that nothing happens, and that the resultant dullness does not kill’⁸¹ – why theatre is not life. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-aesthetics/anti-naturalism View of Theatre: functional			making out of the chaos of daily happenings
Die Überwindung des Naturalismus (1891)	Hermann Bahr (1863-1934) Viennese critic	A highly influential book. Naturalism contained the seeds of its own destruction: an increasing attention to detail would end up in simply ‘a multitude of evanescent sense impressions’. The art of the future must turn to psychology in a new ‘impressionist’ approach, influenced by the philosophy of Ernst Mach (1838-1916) who argued that reality was not only subjective but in constant flux: all experience was totally conditioned by the observer, who was not fixed, but was a constantly changing constellation of impressions.⁸⁴		The generation of an experience	Doing: art - impressionistic Watching: all experience was conditioned

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic - rejection of naturalism in favour of psychological impressionism View of Theatre: aesthetic			by the observer, who was not fixed
Kapital und Presse (1891); Die Lessing-Legende (1892); 'Über den historischen Materialismus' (1893); 'Der heilige Naturalismus' (1893); Die Volksbühne (1901)	Franz Mehring (1846-1919) German journalist and editor	Mehring was the first literary theorist to try to apply the principles of Marxism to European literature. He replaced Wille as director of the Freie Volksbühne. Die Lessing considered Lessing's works and reputation in terms of historical materialism, i.e. as products of social and economic forces. He considered the Volksbühne in similar terms: as a product of rising proletarian consciousness and a sign of a developing 'proletarian aesthetic', which would 'relate to proletarian politics as the bourgeois aesthetic relates to bourgeois politics'. ⁸⁵ He believed naturalism had provided the impetus to break away from formalism, but although it promised a new form of drama, its concentration on 'hopeless and disconsolate pessimism' had eroded man's desire to improve his society. ⁸⁶ He came to believe that a new and higher art would only appear after the disappearance of both bourgeois theatre and society. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent		Aesthetics as a means of improving society	Doing: drama (literature)
'Die neueste litterarische Richtung in Deutschland' (1891); 'Das Drama und die moderne Weltanschauung' (1899); 'Die Möglichkeit der klassischen Tragödie' (1904)	Paul Ernst (1866-1913) German dramatist	Ernst had initially been drawn to naturalism as an artistic movement which seemed to be harmonious with social democratic concerns, but by 1891, he was condemning naturalism 'for its ignorance of the process of development of modern society and its lack of support for socialism'. He was at the time a radical member of the Social Democratic Party, concerned with maintaining the party's 'revolutionary zeal'. He resigned from the party in 1896, turning his attention to literature. He found that the conventions of naturalism did not satisfy his attempts to produce a drama which dealt with modern social questions. Instead, they turned theatre into 'a place of resignation and hopelessness', in which man appeared to have no free will. The classic hero, on the other hand, 'left the spectator or reader the strongest impression of human worth and power'. ⁸⁷ Ernst felt that a modern version of this classic hero could be created in order to keep drama alive until 'social man' (the worker) became capable of creating his own drama. Opposition of the hero to necessity had always been essential to great tragedy, and this could be created in modern capitalist times because the rules and obligations of capitalist society had, for the		To reflect the social and political times in order to inspire the reader or spectator	Doing: playwrighting (literature) Showing: social conflict

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		individual, the quality of fate. (This view of drama – as a description of conflict - was also becoming apparent in the work of André Gide 1904). ⁸⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois drama View of Theatre: ambivalent
Notes de mise en scène pour L'Anneau de Nibelung (written 1891, published 1954); La mise en scène du drama Wagnérien (1895); La musique et la mise en scène (1899); ⁸⁹ Preface (1898); Preface (1918); ⁹⁰ L'oeuvre d'art vivant (1921); 'Organic Unity' (1921); ⁹¹ 'Actor, Space, Light, Painting'.	Adolphe Appia (1862-1928) Swiss stage designer and theorist	Appia produced a penetrating and profound consideration of the proper visual setting for Wagnerian works which became one of the twentieth century's most significant contributions to staging in the theatre. He argued against the intellectualization of the theatre which led to actors doing one thing while set designers and stage managers did another. ⁹² His theory of staging was 'completely unlike anything in the European theatre of that time', ⁹³ and has continued to serve as a model for the modern theatre. ⁹⁴ He argued that neither convention nor external reality should determine the design of a work; the design (or mise-en-scène) should arise from the work itself, in particular from the human body of the actor, which determined the space and time of the dramatic space. ⁹⁵ In opera this setting should be conditioned by the music. Music was the principle which unified the production by dictating time and sequencing. ⁹⁶ Actor and scenery should not add new information but simply express the life already in the work, mediated through the use of light. ⁹⁷ Appia was the first to do a 'light-plot' for a production. ⁹⁸ He argued that in order for drama to be more than an 'inferior' art form (inferior because of the dramatist's dependence on others to complete it) all aspects of the production should form a whole unique to each work. He argued in 'Organic Unity' that dramatists should also be stage directors in order to free themselves from the slavery of accommodating themselves to 'this sad model' of the stage as a spectator space: 'When we consider the stage as something to be stared at ..., as something quite distinct from the audience, it eludes us'. The stage was not 'something in itself'. It was a space in which the living body creates a work of dramatic art and which the spectator sees as if looking through a 'key hole' only to 'overhear bits of life never intended for us'. Therefore 'we must clear the table, we must effect in our imagination this apparently difficult conversion ... of no longer looking upon our theatres, our stages, our halls, as necessarily existing for the spectators. We must completely free the dramatic idea from any such apparently changeless law ... dramatic art does not exist to present the human being for others ... Our first move ... will be to place ourselves imaginatively in a boundless space, with no witnesses but ourselves ... it will be for ourselves alone that we will create space'. This was not so much that spectators weren't part of theatre but that the dramatist should not have the	A space in which drama was embodied	To create a work of art	Doing: drama (art) – the inner unity of each production to be determined by the human body; dramatists were to forget about the spectator and concentrate on the living body of the actor as the definer of the theatrical space ; the play would then determine the setting rather than the other way round. Showing: symbolic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		stage as a space ‘to be stared at’ in his mind when creating his drama. In this way, the play would determine setting rather than the other way round. Theatres should be totally flexible, so that each drama could be developed ‘in its own unique performance space’: ‘Dramatic art is a spontaneous creation of the [living] body’ in time and space ... A spectator comes to be moved or convinced; there is the limit of his role. The work lives for itself – without the spectator’ because it is to do with the living human body.⁹⁹ This idea became highly important in C20th theory. Nevertheless, Appia recognized that theatre was always ‘bound strictly by the special conditions imposed by the age’ and particularly prone to failure as an art form because of its dependence on so many elements external to the dramatist’s vision: ‘[t]he greater the number of media necessary for the realization of the work of art, the more elusive is harmony’.¹⁰⁰ Although the actor as an original artist is demoted in Appia’s theory, he remains the central element of the production, the vehicle by which the work is expressed to spectators: ‘The first factor in staging is the interpreter, the actor. The actor carries the action. Without him there is no action, hence no drama’.¹⁰¹ Embodiment is vital because it is through the performer that the spectator becomes involved: ‘the performer tends, almost implicitly, to come closer to the spectator’. Modern productions which featured settings at the expense of the performer’s body forced the spectators ‘into ... miserable passivity’ and humiliation ‘in the shadowy recesses of the auditorium’, but when spectators can see a body on stage trying to ‘rediscover itself’, they feel a kind of ‘fraternal collaboration’ and sense of responsibility which breaks down the barrier between stage and spectator.¹⁰² Spectators want illusion. They will ‘always ask to be deceived’. They want ‘the most exact replica of what [they are] capable of seeing in the outer world. Drama, of all the arts, was ‘best suited to satisfy such a desire’, but, in the absence of a unifying principle in a production, spectators would create one for themselves drawing on their own experience, just as they unconsciously create meaning out of the appearances of things in everyday life.¹⁰³ Despite Appia’s strong emphasis on production, in his 1918 preface and his last major book he called for theatre in which ‘the idea of production would become an anachronism. Instead theatre would be a ‘new sort of religious celebration without auditorium, stage, play, or spectator, an experience of the pure sense of joy of the free body moving in space participated in by the entire community’,¹⁰⁴ and ‘the dramatic act of tomorrow will be a social act, in which each of us will assist. And, who knows,			unity of a work; Watching: spectators respond to the way a production is staged, in particular to the actor’s physical presence, which produces a ‘fraternal collaboration’ . Spectators will attempt to provide ‘a unifying principle’ to a work if none is provided; nevertheless, they watch ‘as if looking through a key hole’ i.e. they are voyeurs overhearing ‘bits of life never

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		perhaps one day we shall arrive ... at majestic festivals in which a whole people will participate, where each of us will express our feelings, our sorrows, our joys, no longer content to remain a passive onlooker. Then will the dramatist triumph'. ¹⁰⁵ Appia shared similar beliefs about design with Edward Gordon Craig, although they worked independently of each other. Appia designed the first modern age theatre building without a proscenium arch for Dalcroze's theatre school in Hellerau, Germany. ¹⁰⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –theatre as an art form in itself View of Theatre: aesthetic			intended' for them; they also want illusion – they want to be deceived

¹ Kemble 1882, Notes upon Some of Shakespeare's Plays, London 1882, p. 3; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 233.

² Heinrich Hart 1882-84, Kritische Waffengänge, Vol. 4, p. 20; in Carlson 1984: 264.

³ Heinrich Hart 1882-84, Kritische Waffengänge, Vol. 4, p. 24-5; in Carlson 1984: 264.

⁴ Hart 1882, quoted in Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 19

⁵ Published in Nineteenth Century Vol 21, June 1887, pp. 800-803.

⁶ Carlson 1984: 233-4

⁷ Jenkin 1883, 'Talma on the Actor's Art', Saturday Review No. 55, April 28, p. 542; in Carlson 1984: 234.

⁸ English magazine Theatre 1883; quoted in Blackadder 2003: 14

⁹ Blackadder 2003: 14-15

¹⁰ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 73

¹¹ ArtsAlive. 2006. 'Major historical eras'. French Theatre: History National Arts Centre www.artsalive.ca/en/thf/histoire/epoques.html (accessed 21/2/2007).

¹² ArtsAlive 2006

¹³ Carlson 1984: 279

¹⁴ Published in Revue wagnérienne, No. 1, 8 August 1885.

¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 287

¹⁶ Quoted in Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 419.

¹⁷ Carlson 1984: 289

¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 287

¹⁹ Wyzewa 1886, 'Notes sur la peinture wagnérienne', in Revue wagnérienne No. 2, p. 102; in Carlson 1984: 286-8.

²⁰ Published in the North American Review No. 145, August 1887.

²¹ Carlson 1984: 234

-
- ²² Archer 1888: 211; in Carlson 1984: 235.
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 235. Archer asked the critic Francisque Sarcey to supervise this survey in France. Sarcey refused, calling the survey a procedure ‘which is American in nature’ and ‘inimical both to criticism and to art’ (cited by Archer in his book) (Carlson 1984: 235).
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 236
- ²⁵ Archer 1912, Play-making, Boston, p. 36; in Carlson 1984: 309.
- ²⁶ Crane, R.S. 1967. ‘Varieties of Dramatic Criticism’. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235.216
- ²⁷ Archer 1912 in Crane 1967: 231
- ²⁸ Crane 1967: 234
- ²⁹ Crane 1967: 233-4
- ³⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 64
- ³¹ Chekhov 1920, Letters, trans. Constance Garnett, New York.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 246
- ³³ Chekov, Letter, 30th May 1888
- ³⁴ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.31
- ³⁵ These articles were originally published in Nineteenth Century, then in a collection entitled Intentions (1891) (Carlson 1984: 236).
- ³⁶ Wilde 1969, Works, Vol. 8, p. 183; in Carlson 1984: 237.
- ³⁷ Wilde, Oscar. 2008/1889. ‘The Decay of Lying: An Observation’. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Oxford, Malden MA: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 47-50.
- ³⁸ Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 170n8
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 280
- ⁴⁰ Jullien 1892, Le theatre vivant, Paris, pp. 10-11, 14-5, 18; in Carlson 1984: 280.
- ⁴¹ Editorial, Harper’s Monthly July 1889; quoted in Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press. 11.
- ⁴² Howells 1998 in Ackerman 1999: 11
- ⁴³ Blackadder 2003: 19 but see Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006. ‘Introduction to Theatre--the online course’. Northern Virginia Community College <http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm> (accessed 2/3/2007). Trumbull says that Antoine wanted to produce a dramatization of a Zola novel but the amateur groups he approached refused, so he opened his own theatre.
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 279
- ⁴⁵ Trumbull 1998-2006
- ⁴⁶ Krasner, David. 2008. ‘Introduction’. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 35
- ⁴⁷ Excerpt reprinted in Brandt 1998: 116-121.
- ⁴⁸ Reprinted in full in Krasner 2008: 65-70.
- ⁴⁹ Maeterlinck 1890, ‘Le théâtre’, La jeune belgique No. 9, p. 331; in Carlson 1984: 296.

-
- ⁵⁰ Brandt 1998: 115
- ⁵¹ Maeterlinck 2008/1904: 70
- ⁵² Maeterlinck 1998/1894: 117
- ⁵³ Maeterlinck 2008/1904: 68
- ⁵⁴ Maeterlinck 2008/1904: 68
- ⁵⁵ Maeterlinck 2008/1904: 65
- ⁵⁶ Maeterlinck 1998/1894: 119-121
- ⁵⁷ Published on March 23, 1890, in the Berlin Volksblatt, the chief publication of the Social Democrats (Carlson 1984: 267).
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 268
- ⁵⁹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 104-9 and in Brandt 1998: 98-105.
- ⁶⁰ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 428.
- ⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 237
- ⁶² Gerould 2000: 428
- ⁶³ Carlson 1984: 238
- ⁶⁴ Shaw 1998/1911: 98
- ⁶⁵ Shaw 1934, Prefaces, p. 205; in Carlson 1984: 238.
- ⁶⁶ Shaw 1959, Shaw on Theatre, (ed) E.J. West, New York, p. 65; in Carlson 1984: 238.
- ⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 239
- ⁶⁸ Shaw 1959, Shaw on Theatre, p. 153; in Carlson 1984: 239.
- ⁶⁹ Shaw 1961, Shaw on Shakespeare, (ed.) Edwin Wilson, New York, p. 63; in Carlson 1984: 239.
- ⁷⁰ Shaw 1930-38, Works, London, Vol. 13, p. 380; in Carlson 1984: 308.
- ⁷¹ Shaw 1962, Platform and Pulpits, ed. Dan Laurence, London, p. 44; in Carlson 1984: 309.
- ⁷² Shaw 2008/1911: 107
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 309
- ⁷⁴ Styan 1975: 173
- ⁷⁵ Quoted in M. Meisel 1963, Shaw and the Nineteenth Century Theatre, Princeton, p. 436; in Styan 1975: 173.
- ⁷⁶ Shaw 1909, 'How To Write a Popular Play', quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 35.
- ⁷⁷ Styan 1975: 174
- ⁷⁸ Shaw 2008/1911: 106-7
- ⁷⁹ Shaw 2008/1911: 105
- ⁸⁰ Shaw 1911 in Brandt 1998: 101
- ⁸¹ Shaw 1911 in Brandt 1998: 101
- ⁸² Shaw 2008/1911

-
- ⁸³ Styan 1975: 13
- ⁸⁴ Carlson 1984: 266. This impressionist approach was promoted in Berlin by the journals Blätter für die Kunst (established 1892) and Dramaturgische Blätter (1898).
- ⁸⁵ Mehring 1901, Die Volksbühne Vol. 9(2), p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 268.
- ⁸⁶ Carlson 1984: 268
- ⁸⁷ Ernst 1906, Der Weg zu Form, Berlin, pp. 30-31; in Carlson 1984: 332.
- ⁸⁸ Carlson 1984: 331-2
- ⁸⁹ First published in German as Die Musik und die Inszenierung (1899), published in English as Music and the Art of the Theatre, trans. R.W. Corrigan and M. Douglas Dirks, University of Miami Press, Coral Gables, Florida, 1962.
- ⁹⁰ The two Prefaces were written for English editions of Music and the Art of the Theatre and are both published in the 1962 edition above.
- ⁹¹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 150-154, and in Brandt 1998: 145-152.
- ⁹² Appia 2008/1921: 154
- ⁹³ Carlson 1984: 293
- ⁹⁴ Krasner 2008: 150
- ⁹⁵ Appia 2008/1921: 154
- ⁹⁶ Appia 1962/1898: 14-16
- ⁹⁷ Carlson 1984: 295
- ⁹⁸ Lee Simonson 1962, 'Foreword', in Appia 1962/1899, Music and the Art of the Theatre, p. xii.
- ⁹⁹ Appia 2008/1921: 153-4
- ¹⁰⁰ Appia 1962/1898: 7-10
- ¹⁰¹ Appia, 'Actor, Space, Light, Painting', in Adolphe Appia: Essays, Scenarios, and Design, in Brockett and Ball 2004: 296.
- ¹⁰² Appia 1962: 5
- ¹⁰³ Appia 1962: 33
- ¹⁰⁴ Carlson 1984: 355; Appia 1960, The Work of Living Art, trans. H.D. Albright, Coral Gables Florida, pp. 54-55
- ¹⁰⁵ Appia 1962/1918: 6
- ¹⁰⁶ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 425

Table 20/51 Theories of Theatre 1892-1900

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Symbolism played a significant role in Russian theory, where translations of Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Wilde and Nietzsche all appeared during the 1890s. Again, Wagner proved a significant inspiration, with Serge Diaghilev (1872-1929) and Alexander Benois (1870-1960) both rejecting the belief that art should have a utilitarian aim. As elsewhere, Russian symbolist theories of theatre focused on lyric poetry (drama as poetry), although their theories were to have a great influence on early twentieth century theatre directors. Some Russian symbolists, inspired by Wagner and Nietzsche, argued for an ‘art for the masses’, often in terms so abstract that their aims were impossible to achieve. (This was different to the ‘theatre of/for the people’ movements which occurred in Germany (the Volksbühne theorists) and France, which tended to be driven by sociological concerns, and drew on Rousseau rather than Wagner for their inspiration). Divisions between symbolists regarding the masses meant that, once again, the age-old problem of who exactly was the theatre for emerged. In an article in Figaro, September 17, 1896, Belgian symbolist poet and playwright Georges Rodenbach (1855-1898) argued that art was not created for the people. It was too complex and subtle, essentially aristocratic. ‘[T]he people love only the most direct, clear, and simple presentations of life’. Once again the distinction was drawn between ‘art’ for the superior spectator and ‘entertainment’ for the lower kinds of spectator, a distinction that at times was widely separated while at others came very close: either productions were to have two levels of meaning simultaneously, or, in the case of Yeats and some Russian symbolists, the masses were somehow to be brought along with the poet. For the Russians, this was to be achieved by a Wagnerian integration of all aspects of the performance arts: music and dance as well as lyric poetry. Unfortunately, the epitome of this kind of theatre was opera – perhaps the least available form of mass theatre. Rodenbach, on the other hand, argued for ‘a parody of art’ for the people, something which was essentially ‘only a means of propaganda in the service of ideas called philanthropic or the interests of politicians’.¹ Rodenbach’s distinction makes it clear that the endless debate over the purposes of the theatre has always been based on an unstated view of particular kinds of audiences: the theatre of instruction and catharsis being directed toward the lower levels of spectators; the theatre of inspiration, ecstatic vision, and reflection being directed toward the ‘superior’ kind of spectator. The end of C19th was a ‘period of artistic experimentation’ as theoretically minded and radical theatre practitioners attempted to break with contemporary styles and methods. According to Krasner, these crystallized into two dominant directions as the C20th began: an Hegelian view of mimetic theatre marked by a ‘single-minded determination to see the world objectively’ (as epitomised in the work of André Antoine) and a Nietzschean inspired ‘non-referential’ theatre determined by ‘the artist’s subjectivity’ (epitomised by the work of Aurélien Lugné-Poe).² Increasingly in this latter stream, the dominance of language in the theatre came under challenge.³
‘Wohin mit dem Drama?’ (1892)	Hans von Gumpenberg (1866-1928) German theatre critic	Called for drama to ‘scrupulously’ reproduce everyday life, using ‘true living speech’. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		The reproduction of everyday life	Doing: drama
‘Das Drama’ (1892)	Julius Brand (1862-1895) German dramatist	A response to Gumpenberg, also published in the Münchener Kunst (Vol 2(41)). Brand objected to the whole concept of ‘slice of life’, including the use of dialect, which he considered more suited to the novel than to the stage. The stage was not capable of showing ‘the secret inner workings of the spirit’ since it involved ‘conflict, explosion, struggle, dialogue, dualism, dialectic’. ⁵		Showing something on stage	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic - rejection of naturalism View of Theatre: positive
'Essai de rénovation théâtrale' (1892) ⁶	François Coulon (d. 189) French journalist and dramatist	Member of the idéoréalistes associated with Mallarmé's symbolist movement. Diverged from the anti-theatricality of Mallarmé and some of his followers. Wagner's 'great insight' was that it was only in the theatre that all the arts could be synthesized and thus bring the greatest poetic vision to the public. In the theatre 'if spectators, even hostile, experience a formidable struggle of human passions in an idéoréaliste drama, they will perhaps give us their attention even when they do not understand the symbol of the piece, a symbol accessible only to the elite'. Thus theatre could play on two levels: one for the superior public who appreciated a play of ideas, and one for the lower public who could be moved by realistic human emotions and conflicts. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –pro-theatricality View of Theatre: positive	A place in which drama is presented to spectators	Representation of emotion, conflict and ideas	Doing: drama (a synthesis of all the arts) Watching: two levels of spectators: superior and lower - each could find something in drama
'Notes sur un essai de dramatique symbolique' (1892) ⁸	Camilla Maclair (1872-1945) French symbolist, poet, art critic, travel agent; founder of Théâtre de l'Oeuvre	Maclair was also a symbolist, but took a different approach to Coulon. Maclair was instrumental in setting up (with Aurelian Lugné-Poe) the Théâtre de l'Oeuvre in 1893, which was 'to symbolism what Antoine's Théâtre-Libre had been to naturalism'. ⁹ In 'Notes', Maclair attempted to outline a theory of symbolist drama . He identified three contemporary conceptions of drama: positivist ('the vision of modern life from the psychological point of view'), metaphysical ('more philosophical in essence than dramatic') and symbolist , which aimed to create 'philosophical and intellectual entities [through] superhuman characters in an emotional and sensual decor'. All traces of specific time and place, anything individualistic, was to be purged from setting and characters in order to suggest only what was eternal and fixed. The leading actors were to 'have no value except as incarnations of the Idea they symbolize'. They were to move little, enunciating 'eternal ideas [in] magnificent language, resplendent with poetry'. Maclair agreed with the idéoréalistes that only the 'artist-spectator' could be expected to appreciate this. He recommended that the central figures be surrounded with realistic secondary characters who would carry on everyday activities, making comments that would help the ordinary spectator understand the central figures. These would act, like the classic chorus, as an intermediary 'between the ideality of the drama and the intellect of the public'. ¹⁰ This strategy of presentation would unite idealism and realism, passion and poetry, and psychology and dream. The theatre produced by Maclair was, despite these static, abstract ideas, lively and colourful, and strongly engaged both in art and in	A place where drama is presented	Evocation	Doing: drama - the fusion of idealism and realism, passion and poetry, psychology and dream; actors as symbols Showing: theatricality - a unity of idealism and realism, passion and poetry, psychology and dream; evocative; an

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		life. Evocation, however, was the purpose of theatricality, rather than verisimilitude. Although the theatre never pursued the symbolic possibilities of nonhuman figures in the theatre, ‘shadow figures ... marionettes, the English pantomime, the clown pantomime’ were all seen as highly theatrical ways to deal with the stubborn reality of the physical presence of the actor. The physical and financial resources of the Théâtre de l’Oeuvre were beyond the reach of this kind of idea, though, and Maclair’s associate Aurelian Lugné-Poe (1869-1940) came to argue for the bare stage and minimal effects of the Elizabethan stage, as used by the experimental Elizabethan Stage Society in London.¹¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatricality not verisimilitude (anti-realist theatre) View of Theatre: positive			attempt to overcome the physical reality of the actor Watching: only the artist as spectator could fully appreciate what was being presented; spectators needed the assistance of strategies of presentation e.g. extra characters.
Les 36 situations dramatiques (1894)	Georges Polti (1868 -) French writer	The apotheosis of the logical, scientific approach to dramatic structure: a codification which created a ‘periodic table’ of ‘basic’ emotions upon which situations could be based. Combinations could produce thousands of possible scenarios: ‘bringing into battle, under the command of the writer, of an infinite army of possible combinations ranged according to their probabilities’.¹² Zola was apparently unimpressed.¹³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (scientific) View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting as a science
‘Des arts nouveaux’ (1894); ‘The Role of Chance in Artistic	August Strindberg (1849-1912) Swedish playwright	Essential theorist. In ‘Des arts’, Strindberg described the work of the artist as ‘a charming mixture of the unconscious and the conscious’ in which the artist keeps ‘nature’s model in mind without trying to copy it’.¹⁵ Strindberg reacted to the middle-class, melodramatic theatre of his time by producing plays with psychologically complex characters whom he described as ‘conglomerates’. The Preface to Miss Julie was written in response to criticism of his play The Father (1887) and is probably the best-known	A place for watching drama; an educational institution: ‘the theatre	Public instruction: the dramatist was ‘a lay preacher hawking the	Doing: art Showing: complex motivations Watching: spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Creation (1894); Preface to Miss Julie (1888); ¹⁴ Preface to A Dream Play (1902); 'Truth in Error' (1907)		statement of the ideas and practices of the naturalist theatre. ¹⁶ Krasner called it 'a ground-breaking outline of theatrical modernism' which was influenced by Nietzsche, and which in turn influenced Naturalism, Symbolism and Expressionism. ¹⁷ Miss Julie was written under the influence of Zola, and presented at the Théâtre-Libre. Its characters had no 'character' in the traditional sense of a predictable set of reactions drawn from type. Instead they reflected 'the variety of forces playing upon them'. ¹⁸ Modern characters were to be 'vacillating, disintegrated ... conglomerations of past and present stages of civilization' for whom the spectators should feel no pity , enjoying instead 'the strong and eternal struggles of life' being presented. ¹⁹ Accordingly, Strindberg's dialogue shows 'people's minds working irregularly, as they do in real life'. However, although he insisted on a realistic setting, real props, and the abolition of footlights because of their unnatural light, and said that one day he would also like to see the abolition of make-up, and actors prepared to 'play within the scene to each other' rather than the spectator, his plays retained a subjectivity that put them more in harmony with symbolist and psychoanalytic drama. ²⁰ After 1900, he became more experimental. A Dream Play is an attempt to 'reproduce the disconnected but apparently logical form of a dream'. His late plays had an enormous influence on German expressionism. The idea expressed in 'Truth in Error' that 'The world is a reflection of your interior state, and of the interior states of others' ²¹ could be taken as a 'motto' of the expressionist movement. ²² Strindberg claimed that the 'theatre ... seemed to me to be, like art in general, a Biblia pauperum , a Bible in pictures' for the illiterate, and the playwright 'a lay preacher hawking the ideas of the day in popular form.' ²³ Spectators responded to the plight of the heroine with compassion because they imagined themselves in the same position. Although spectators tended to simplify motivation, Strindberg wanted to present individuals who had complex motives, because naturalists like him 'know how rich the soul-complex is and realize that "vice" has a reverse side closely resembling virtue'. ²⁴ Strindberg generally had a negative opinion of theatre spectators, and in later life declared that he 'loathed the theatre' and thought artists were 'apes, conceited, rebels, lecherous, impudent, dishonest [and] [g]enerally look like bandits'. ²⁵ Ibsen thought he was 'delightfully mad'. ²⁶ He wanted to see theatre that was 'a place of entertainment for educated people' (Preface), presumably like himself, a theatre that was more appropriate for modern times, which produced believable, complex characters with psychological depth, and one in which theatres were	has always been a public school for the young, the half-educated, and women, who still possess that primitive capacity for deceiving themselves or letting themselves be deceived [by] the playwright's power of suggestion': ²⁷ 'theatre ... seemed to me to be, like art in general, a Biblia pauperum , a Bible in pictures' for the illiterate, but	ideas of the day in popular form' to spectators who were in school; enjoyment.	don't want to think too hard: a negative view of spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		structurally smaller and more intimate so that more natural lighting could be used, allowing a more natural acting style (less make-up, not playing to the spectator, less caricaturing etc). He thought European theatre was in ‘serious’ crisis, and the primary spectator, the middle classes, were content to applaud or hiss, which prevented the more educated spectator from being ‘objective’. At the same time, he produced shorter plays in order to eliminate intervals, so that spectators had no time to reflect on what they were seeing and therefore the illusion created by the playwright was less likely to be broken. He believed spectators reduced complex motivations to whatever fitted their own interests and understanding. They reacted with compassion only if they could see themselves in the character’s position. They could also sense when an illusion was broken so he left his monologues and mimes only loosely scripted so that a skilled actor could sense when the spectator had had enough. A polemical and sometimes incoherent mix of love and hate. Strindberg clearly longed for an educated, elite and well-behaved audience with the stamina to sit through several hours of complex psychological material, while recognizing that actual theatre and audiences were not like this. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-realism/pro-didactic drama View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional	preferably a place of entertainment for educated people. The size of the building influenced dramatic possibilities
‘On the Uselessness of the ‘Theatrical’ in Theatre’ (1896);²⁸ ‘Questions de theatre’ (1896)²⁹	Alfred Jarry (1873-1907) French ‘anti-classical’ writer and producer	It was impossible to please ‘the infinite, mediocre multitude’. The spectator was just a ‘herd’.³⁰ ‘I think the question of whether the theatre should adapt itself to the masses, or the masses to the theatre, has been settled once and for all. The masses only understood, or pretended to understand [what they already knew]. Besides it’s a fact that most of them are over their heads’ ... genius, intelligence, and even talent [such as exhibited by Shakespeare, Michelangelo and Leonardo da Vinci] are larger than life, and so beyond most people’ ... the masses don’t understand anything by themselves but want to be told’. Theatres should be able to forcibly ‘expel anyone who doesn’t understand’ and concern itself with ‘the five hundred persons who ... have a touch of Shakespeare and Leonardo in them’, and who find the cluttered contemporary stage ‘horrificing and incomprehensible’. Bare settings allowed such spectators to ‘conjure up for himself the background he requires’. Actors should wear masks, speak in a monotone and use formal, stylized gestures.³¹ Jarry’s 1896 production of Ubu Roi, however, gestured more towards surrealism in its setting than Jarry’s comments suggest. An 1898 production used marionettes. His productions produced hostile and violent responses – and produced	An institution for the staging of drama; a practice	Provocation through exaggeration	Doing: theatre practice - writing and staging plays Showing: symbols on bare stages which can be interpreted by the spectator Watching: the [special] spectator can ‘imagine for himself’ and

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		debates in newspapers and cafes which he is likely to have been ‘pleased and amused by’ since his aim was to encourage and provide opportunities for more spectator ‘participation’.³² According to Jarry ‘I wanted the scene that the audience would find themselves in front of when the curtain went up to be like that mirror in the stories of Madame Leprince de Beaumont, in which the depraved see themselves with bulls’ horns, or a dragon’s body, each according to the exaggeration of their vices; and it is not surprising that the public should have been aghast at the sight of their ignoble double ... Ubu was not meant to utter witticisms ... but stupid remarks, with all the authority of the Ape ... It is because the public [la fule] are an inert and obtuse and passive mass that they need to be shaken up from time to time so that we can tell from their bear-like grunts where they are – and where they stand’.³³ Contemporary reports indicate, however, that the spectator got bored, and welcomed the diversion of the uproar in the theatre which Jarry had been hoping for (he had employed a claque to encourage it in case it didn’t happen). Jarry’s rationalization at the expense of the spectator is also hypocritical given that he consistently misrepresented the play as a comedy to the director Lugné-Poe in order to get it put on.³⁴ Jarry’s legacy can be seen in the works of Ionesco and Beckett.³⁵ He has come to be seen as ‘a pioneer of a deliberately provocative approach to theatre’, although the response to his and other confrontational theatre suggests playwrights should be careful what they hope for – the reaction almost never accords with the kinds of response the playwright aims for, and spectators quickly get used to and come to expect to be confronted.³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-existing theatre/anti-spectator View of Theatre: positive			thereby participate in the production; the rest need to be shocked into a reaction since they were a ‘mediocre multitude’ or ‘herd’ who only pretended to understand
The Sense of Beauty (1896); ‘Croce’s Aesthetics’ (1903). ³⁷	George Santayana (1863-1952) Spanish/ American poet, writer and philosopher	A major contemporary rival to Croce in the field of Aesthetics, although it does not appear that theatre theorists drew on his (albeit brief) ideas on drama at the time, even those opposed to Croce’s views.³⁸ Plot is the essential element of drama. It is the formal principle. Character is merely ‘a symbol and mental abbreviation for a set of acts’.³⁹ He insists on the physicality of art. Material presentation is essential to the aesthetic experience. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: aesthetic		Performance	Doing: drama (aesthetics) Showing: materiality
What is Art? (1897);	Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910)	The most important function of art is the communication (the infection) of feeling from the artist to the spectator, the metaphor of infection indicating the power of art ‘to evoke		The communic-	Doing: drama (art)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Shakespeare and the Drama (1906)	Russian novelist, dramatist and educational reformer	in the audience a powerful involuntary response', although he condemned 'the excitation of base sensuality', valuing 'the "infection" of the spectator with religious feelings above all others. ⁴⁰ For this reason, Tolstoy was critical of drama such as that by Ibsen, Maeterlinck and Hauptmann. It was 'perversely difficult', indicating a removal of art from the people, for the amusement of the elite. He was critical of Shakespeare on the same grounds, claiming he despised the masses and had 'no interest in improving the existing order of society'. ⁴¹ The business of art was to make 'comprehensible and accessible what in the form of reasoning may remain incomprehensible and inaccessible.' ⁴² Good art contributed to the progress of the human soul through the quality of the feelings it expressed: it helped its spectator evolve 'better feelings': human sympathy and brotherhood. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-elite drama View of Theatre: functional		ation of feeling for the improvement of society (infecting the spectator with these feelings)	Showing: making comprehensible the incomprehensible Watching: (implied) 'catching' infection so spectators can develop sympathy for others
'Von intimen Theater' (1898) ⁴⁴	Johannes Schlaf (1862-1941) German dramatist	Schlaf was one of the 'pioneers' of German naturalism. ⁴⁵ The essence of modern drama involved a shift to internal action, 'the inner movement of the soul', which was to be revealed indirectly through dialogue and situation. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-naturalism View of Theatre: positive	A place	Revelation through dialogue and situation	Doing: playwrighting
'Theater' (1898) ⁴⁶	Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926) German poet	Drama should be 'more concentrated, more searching' than life. Rilke denounced fourth-wall realism as having 'not one wall too few, but three too many' to be truly reflective of human existence. ⁴⁷ The stage 'must find room for all which fills our days and from childhood on moves us and makes us what we are'. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalist theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place in which dramas are staged	Concentrated searching	Doing: drama Showing: all which fills our days
'Überbrette Manifesto' (1899)	Ernst von Wolzogen (1855-1934) German poet and cultural critic	Wolzogen founded the Überbrette or 'supercabaret' in Berlin. His manifesto argued for the significance and longevity of the art of variety, along with its device of the grotesque. ⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-variety and the grotesque View of Theatre: positive			Doing: cabaret (the art of variety)
Le théâtre du peuple (1899)	Maurice Pottecher	Major French spokesman for a people's theatre, which he founded in rural Bussang in 1895. Although there was 'a crudeness' in the taste of this public, Pottecher argued that it	An institution	Education	Doing: drama as art for the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	(1867-1960) French writer; founder People's Theatre	was not necessary to pander to this with 'gross melodramas' and 'circus farces'. Instead, one could 'elevate them to purer feelings and higher thoughts' through an educative theatre 'by means of a language the spectator can understand and representation of heroic acts'. ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-popular theatre View of Theatre: functional			people Showing: representation of heroic acts
'The Theatre' (1899); ⁵⁰ 'The Tragic Theatre' (1910); ⁵¹ 'Certain Noble Plays of Japan' (1917); ⁵² Per Amica Silentia Lunae (1918); 'A People's Theatre' (1923)	William Butler Yeats (1865-1939) Irish poet, playwright, nationalist and politician	Essential theorist. Yeats believed that commercial theatre catered for the eye not the ear since it discovered that 'an always larger number of people were more easily moved through the eyes than through the ears'. ⁵³ Commercial theatre was a 'masterpiece of that movement towards externality in life and thought and art'. ⁵⁴ Yeats struggled with the central question of how to make the drama spiritually significant. ⁵⁵ He rejected the contemporary theatre in which vision had been sacrificed to character studies and surface reality, denying that character was essential to drama. Character was the essence of comedy: lyric expression was the essence of great and serious theatre. Tragedy 'must always be a drowning and breaking of the dykes that separate man from man'. ⁵⁶ The ideal form of theatre is symbolic, a unity of verse, ritual, music and dance, mask, stylized gesture and non-realistic decor. The mask, which was a central image for Yeats, provided a technical means of expressing 'the ideal, the superhuman, the otherworldly', ⁵⁷ as in Japanese Nō drama (although Yeats had a limited understanding of Japanese theatre derived largely from secondary sources and performances by a visiting Japanese dancer, according to Brandt) ⁵⁸ . Yeats distinguished between human reality (anima hominis) and superhuman reality (anima mundi). The former is a realm of conflict and partial perspective, driven by the Daemon ; the latter a realm of 'all music and rest', an 'anti-theatre', an 'unpopular theatre [for] an audience like a secret society where admission is by favour and never too many' for a theatre which works 'by suggestion'. ⁵⁹ 'The Tragic Theatre' was an attempt to analyse what made a great tragedy, one which affected an ideal spectator (such as Yeats). It was not a pre-occupation with 'character', but the ability of the drama to summon up in its spectator 'excitement, dreaming and moments of exaltation' through the stimulation of memory: 'it is always ourselves that we see upon the stage'. ⁶⁰ Yeats preferred to devise 'little' plays, 'distinguished, indirect, and symbolic' which had 'no need of mob or Press to pay their way'. Japanese staging techniques could reduce production costs: 'this noble form ... need absorb no one's life, ... its few properties can be packed up in a box or hung upon the walls [as] ornaments'.	An institution; an art form	Suggestion	Doing: playwrighting (an art of literature; comedy and tragedy) Showing: the ideal, the superhuman Watching: only for members of a secret society (Yeats had contempt for 'the common people' and those who were 'without the memory of beauty and emotional subtlety'. ⁶²

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Little plays could afford to play to small spectators which appreciated poetry in intimate spaces such as drawing rooms or studios, for while '[a]ll imaginative art remains at a distance, this distance must be firmly held against a pushing world' not made even more distant by being placed on large stages accompanied by mechanisms and loud noise. He recognized, though, that such theatre was not for everyone: 'Realism is created for the common people', for minds 'without the memory of beauty and emotional subtlety'. Yeats had a low opinion of 'common' people because they did not appreciate poetry: 'In the studio and in the drawing room we can found a true theatre of beauty'.⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-commercial and popular theatre; idealist View of Theatre: ambivalent
'On Oedipus and Hamlet' (1974/1899)⁶³ 'Psychopathic Characters on the Stage' (c1905); The Interpretation of Dreams (1900); Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (1905); 'Psychopathic Characters on the Stage' (c1905); Beyond the Pleasure Principle (1920); 'On	Sigmund Freud (1856-1939) Austrian neurologist and psychologist	That plays such as Oedipus Rex and Hamlet are still capable of moving us is an indication that 'the effect of the ... tragedy does not depend upon the conflict between fate and human will, but upon the peculiar nature of the material by which this conflict is revealed ... [the protagonist's] fate moves us only because it might have been our own'. The dramatist 'forces us to become aware of our inner selves, in which the same impulses are still extant, even though they are suppressed'.⁶⁴ For Freud, drama provided a safe means of 'opening up sources of pleasure or enjoyment in our emotional life'. Direct enjoyment comes from identification with the hero, an identification which is free from all political, social, or sexual concerns. There is also an indirect masochistic satisfaction when this figure is defeated, without pain or risk to ourselves. 'Suffering of every kind is thus the subject-matter of drama'.⁶⁵ The spectator is 'compensated for its sympathy by the psychological satisfactions of psychical stimulation (provided the suffering is mental rather than physical and not too threatening). The suffering arises from 'an event involving conflict' which includes 'an effort of the will together with resistance'. Freud's view of drama, its history and its psychological effects, were of course an off-shoot of his general theory of the psyche, and consequently psychological dramas such as Hamlet, were said to consist of a conflict between a conscious impulse and a repressed, unrecognized one, which could not be brought out into the open because only neurotic spectators would derive pleasure from it. All others would be inhibited from experiencing 'the pleasure of purging emotions tied to unconscious wishes': 'for normal persons to sympathize with such a hero, they must enter his illness with him', something which the dramatist can only achieve if the repressed impulse is kept hidden.⁶⁶ In dreams '[n]o		Revelation; self-awareness; vicarious pleasure	Showing: heroes the spectator can identify freely with; situations which generate sympathy Watching: Psychological satisfaction as a result of extending sympathy; a collapse of the distance between theatre and life; identification with the hero allows the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the History of the Psycho-analytic Movement'		matter what impulses from the normally inhibited Ucs [unconscious] may prance upon the stage, we need feel no concern; they remain harmless, since they are unable to set in motion the motor apparatus by which alone they might modify the external world'.⁶⁷ Theatricality, for Freud, lies in the 'attempt to create the appearance of being in control'.⁶⁸ 'There is for Freud a theatre of the mind, where 'scenes' are staged and observed, screens are erected and images flow through them, enactment occurs, and acting out may lead to a form of catharsis'.⁶⁹ Wright considers that in Freud we see 'the emergence of a psychoanalytic spectator theory', which both counters Aristotle (socially undesirable emotions are indulged in rather than got rid of) and supports his view ('the process is still adaptive and maintains the status quo').⁷⁰ Freud also used theatre as a metaphor, especially drawing on dramatic characters (e.g. Oedipus), to illustrate his theories. He could be said to represent precisely what the anti-realists were afraid of: the pushing of realism in theatre so far that it collapses into actual reality: Oedipus, for instance, ceases to exist as a character and instead becomes every man. The transition from stage to metaphor to reality is almost seamless, in effect destroying both drama and reality through the positing of another reality (an inner reality) for both. [The question is, of course, if we all suppress these urges, how is it that dramatists are able to articulate them?] Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional			pleasure of purgation
Le rire (1900) ⁷¹	Henri Bergson (1859-1941) French philosopher	One of the few theorists who considered comedy rather than tragedy, Bergson also reacted against the scienticism of Zola and his generation, focusing on the inner world of the emotions and intuition. He introduced the concept of élan vital (vital impulse): 'a current of inner life, which we can perceive by instinct or intuition but which is utterly inaccessible to rigid intellectual systems or to the scientific accumulation of data that so fascinated the naturalists':⁷² the idea of 'life as a continuous psychic stream'.⁷³ Le rire is primarily a study of the sources of laughter, but includes a general theory of art and drama. For Bergson, 'creative impulses (not evolution) are the driving forces of consciousness'.⁷⁴ The artist plays a special role in Bergson's system since he, like the philosopher, 'possesses the special gift of touching the inner world of the élan vital', allowing the conventional generalities by which most of us live to be brushed aside so that we can be brought face to face with reality. Drama provides glimpses into 'the secret, hidden part of our nature' and into the 'elemental passions of individual man' which are		A glimpse of inner life; correction	Doing: drama (comedy) - a social 'weapon of intimidation', not art Showing: incongruity makes us laugh Watching: comedy requires us to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		generally covered with the ‘cooling crust’ of civilization. In tragedies, this stimulates us to seek our own individual insight. Comedies, on the other hand, are an affirmation of the social order: ‘The comic expresses ... a special lack of adaptability to society’. The subject is a ‘social misfit’ whom our laughter is meant to humiliate and correct. Because comedy has social utility, it is not ‘art’. It is ‘a weapon of intimidation by society’.⁷⁵ Laughter is ‘a distinctly human attribute’, which requires detachment (indifference to the feelings of the object of the laughter), appeals to our intelligence rather than our emotions, is a social event (it is ‘in need of an echo’), is infectious, unfolds in social settings, arises as a result of physical incongruity, and affects our bodies. Man is ‘an animal which is laughed at’: ‘step aside, look upon life as a disinterested spectator: many a drama will turn into a comedy’. Laughter’s ‘natural environment ... is society ... Our laughter is always the laughter of a group ... laughter always implies a ... complicity, with other laughers, real or imaginary’. Life is mobile, not machine-like. We laugh when the mobility and fluidity of life collides with some rigidity,⁷⁶ and much comedy can be traced back to the childhood games of Jack-in-the-box, the String-puppet, the Snowball and Repetition and Inversion: ‘You take a set of actions and relations and you repeat it as it is, or you turn it upside down or you transfer it bodily to another set with which it partially coincides: all processes that consist in looking upon life as a repeating mechanism, with reversible action and interchangeable parts’.⁷⁷ His ideas influenced Jules Romain (1911). Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional			be indifferent to the feelings of the object of laughter (even if momentarily). Adopting the position of disinterestedness turns ‘many a drama’ into a comedy
Le théâtre de l’âme (1900) (The Theatre of Life)	Edouard Schuré (1841-1929) French philosopher, poet, writer and music critic	Early French champion of Wagner. Had an essentially aristocratic view of theatre. Nevertheless, he suggested three dimensions or forms for the theatre of the future, based on ‘the three levels of life, consciousness, and beauty’.⁷⁸ 1: the ‘rural and provincial Popular Theatre’ of life, as envisioned by Rousseau. 2: ‘City Theatre’ or ‘Theatre of Conflict’ – intellectual drama exposing contemporary social reality as in Ibsen, and 3: ‘Theatre of Dreams’ or ‘Theatre for the Soul’ which would reflect eternal truths in the mirror of history, legend, and symbol, as in Maeterlinck. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A cultural institution which manifested in different ways	Various	Doing: drama Watching: different levels of life required different kinds of theatre
By 1900, symbolism was waning in France, but its influence continued to spread into other countries. With symbolism, the focus changed to the Director . Theorists became less concerned with the dramatist and actor, and more concerned with the ‘art of the stage director’, particularly in England. ⁷⁹

-
- ¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 313-5
- ² Krasner, David. 2008. 'Introduction'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 35
- ³ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 61
- ⁴ Von Gumpenberg's essay was published in Münchener Kunst Vol 2(39), 1892, p. 360; cited in Carlson 1984: 266.
- ⁵ Carlson 1984: 266
- ⁶ Published in Mercure de France No. 6, October 1892.
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 290
- ⁸ Published in the Revue indépendante de littérature et d'art, No. 22, March 1892.
- ⁹ Carlson 1984: 290
- ¹⁰ Maclair 1892, 'Notes ...', p. 309, 311-14; in Carlson 1984: 290-1.
- ¹¹ Carlson 1984: 291-3.
- ¹² Polti 1895 in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 17
- ¹³ Carlson 1984: 284
- ¹⁴ Published in Strindberg 1961, Miss Julie, tr. E.M. Springhorn, San Francisco: Chandler Publishing; reprinted in full in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. Also excerpted in Krasner 2008: 38-45.
- ¹⁵ Strindberg 1968, 'The New Arts', trans. Albert Bermel, Inferno, Alone and Other Writings, New York 1968, p. 99; in Carlson 1984: 346.
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 280
- ¹⁷ Krasner 2008: 37-8
- ¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 281
- ¹⁹ Strindberg 1955, Six Plays, trans. Elizabeth Sprigge, Garden City, pp. 62-5; in Carlson 1984: 281.
- ²⁰ Carlson 1984: 281
- ²¹ Strindberg 1962, En Blå Bok, Stockholm, p. 216; in Carlson 1984: 347.
- ²² Carlson 1984: 346-7
- ²³ Strindberg 2000/1888, 'Preface to Miss Julie, in Five Plays, trans. Harry G. Carlson, Berkeley, University of California Press, reprinted in Gerould 2000: 371-380, p. 371.
- ²⁴ Strindberg 2000/1888, in Gerould 2000: 374.
- ²⁵ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 370
- ²⁶ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 369. It appears Strindberg suffered from what we would now call 'dissociative disorder' or multiple personality (Gerould 2000: 369).
- ²⁷ Strindberg 2000/1888: 371
- ²⁸ Published as 'De l'inutilité du théâtre au théâtre' in the Mercure de France in September 1896.
- ²⁹ This essay was published after the first performances of Ubu Roi (Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. 65).
- ³⁰ Jarry 1998/1896: 163
- ³¹ Jarry 1998/1896: 161-4
- ³² Blackadder 2003: 43-6

-
- ³³ Jarry 1896, Questions in Blackadder 2003: 65
- ³⁴ Blackadder 2003: 44-45
- ³⁵ Malaspina.com 2005, Great Books, www.mala.bc.ca downloaded 19 August 2005.
- ³⁶ Blackadder 2003: 186
- ³⁷ Santayana 1903, 'Croce's Aesthetics', Journal of Comparative Literature, Vol 1., p. 191; in Carlson 1984: 312.
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 312
- ³⁹ Santayana 1896, The Sense of Beauty, London, p. 175; in Carlson 1984: 312.
- ⁴⁰ Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371.353
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 247
- ⁴² Tolstoy 1904, Complete Works, trans. Leo Weiner, Vol 11, p. 232; in Carlson 1984: 246.
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 246
- ⁴⁴ Published in Dramaturgische Blätter Vol 2(1) 1899, p. 36; see Carlson 1984: 267.
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 267
- ⁴⁶ Published in Dramaturgische Blätter Vol 1(38) 1898, p. 296; see Carlson 1984: 267.
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 267
- ⁴⁸ Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.134n4
- ⁴⁹ Pottecher 1899, Le théâtre du peuple, Paris, p. 16; in Carlson 1984: 316.
- ⁵⁰ Reprinted in Brandt 1998: 123-125.
- ⁵¹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 99-103.
- ⁵² Reprinted in Brandt 1998: 126-131
- ⁵³ Yeats 1998/1899: 124
- ⁵⁴ Yeats 1998/1899: 125
- ⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 305
- ⁵⁶ Yeats 1961, Essays and Introductions, New York, p. 243; in Carlson 1984: 305.
- ⁵⁷ Carlson 1984: 305
- ⁵⁸ Brandt 1998: 123
- ⁵⁹ Yeats 1912, 'A People's Theatre', Explorations, pp. 213-5; in Carlson 1984: 306.
- ⁶⁰ Yeats 2008/1910: 101-2
- ⁶¹ Yeats 1998/1917: 126-9
- ⁶² Yeats 2008/1910: 99; 1998/1917: 129
- ⁶³ In The Interpretation of Dreams 1899; in B.F. Dukore (ed), Dramatic Theory and Criticism: Greeks to Grotowski, New York, Holt, Rinehart and Winston, pp. 827-31.
- ⁶⁴ Freud 1974: 828-9 in Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 88
- ⁶⁵ Freud 1953-74, The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works, trans. James Strachey et al, Vol. 7, pp. 305-307; in Carlson 1984: 335.
- ⁶⁶ Carlson 1984: 335

-
- ⁶⁷ Freud 1900 in McGillivray, Glen James. 27/04/2008. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008]. 166n17
- ⁶⁸ Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press. 254; emphasis added
- ⁶⁹ Goldhill, Simon, and Robin Osborne, eds. 1999. Performance-culture and Athenian Democracy. Cambridge UK; New York: Cambridge University Press. 14
- ⁷⁰ Wright, Elizabeth 1996, 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance' in Patrick Campbell (ed), Analysing Performance: A critical reader, Manchester and New York, Manchester University Press, pp. 175-190, p. 175-6.
- ⁷¹ Republished in Wylie Sypher (ed) 1956, 1980, Comedy, Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, pp. 63-85; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 52-54 and excerpted in Brandt 1998: 26-34.
- ⁷² Carlson 1984: 299
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 317
- ⁷⁴ Krasner 2008: 51
- ⁷⁵ Carlson 1984: 301
- ⁷⁶ Bergson 2008/1900: 52-3
- ⁷⁷ Bergson 1998/1900: 26-34
- ⁷⁸ Schuré 1900, Le théâtre de l'âme, Paris, Vol. 1, p. xiii; in Carlson 1984: 316.
- ⁷⁹ Carlson 1984: 302-4

Table 21/51: Theories of Theatre 1901-1904

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The rediscovery of the spectator – but only to change them. From the Renaissance to the symbolist movement, theatre assumed spectators saw more or less the same thing and that there were ‘clear-cut differences’ between the spectator and representations. As part of a general recognition that the distinctions between appearance and reality were not clear-cut and that ‘The opposition between the self and the world’ was itself an illusion, the end of the C19th brought a period of artistic experimentation and challenges to the dominance of language, especially the dramatic text. Familiarity with Japanese theatre, especially its use of different kinds of staging, led to a [at least partial] rediscovery of the spectator, and helped bring about a change of focus from the communication occurring between the performers on the stage and which had absorbed practitioners from the end of C18th to the communication occurring between stage and auditorium: ‘the very act of looking on [came to be] understood as an active, creative process’ – one which had been blocked by the typical European theatre architecture. Avant-garde theatre practitioners such as Peter Behrens, Georg Fuchs, Reinhardt and Meyerhold actively tried to dissolve the architectural separation between stage and auditorium¹ with the aim of constituting theatre as an autonomous art form: ‘a theatre which did not imitate a reality which actually existed, but which created its own reality; a theatre which nullified the radical split between stage and spectator and which developed new forms of communication between them, so that the chasm between art (theatre) and life, so typical and characteristic of bourgeois life, might be bridged’.² The first production to do this was Reinhardt’s Sumurun, which opened in Berlin in 1910, was reproduced in London in 1911 and toured to New York and Paris in 1912. It was hugely successful and popular, although critics were divided over it. The play marked ‘the beginning of a series of experiments which opened up totally new theatrical spaces’ – circus arenas, marketplaces, churches, parks, meadows, woods – and introduced the hanamichi to European theatre, and revealed that the communication between stage and spectator was an intensely personal one. Since the spectator’s eye was able ‘to wander between different points in space ... each and every spectator brings forth her/his own performance. The process of reception is realized as a subjective construction’. Fischer-Lichte sees this as the rise of what she calls theatricality: the capacity to trigger ‘processes of construction’ and which marks ‘a new kind of relationship between the subject and the object of perception and cognition, as well as between theatre and reality’.³ Theatricality operates on the basis that spectators actively construct what they see, and therefore entails strategies to engage this activity. However, an equally strong drive towards non-referential theatre which explored the artist’s subjectivity also led to avant-garde theatre which, explicitly or implicitly, rejected spectatorship and focused on the artistic process. (As the twentieth century progressed, this focus came increasingly to be upon the performer rather than the dramatist, culminating in the phenomenon of ‘performance art’ and a renewed fascination with performance). In this case, the opening up of eastern theatre to the west did not break with the long-standing tradition of seeing theatre in terms of doing rather than as a triadic relationship between doing, showing and watching, as exemplified in Zeami and Japanese Nō. As always, one sees what one wants to see. Even the renewed understanding that there was no way round the body did not necessarily lead to a celebration of the body but more often to rigorous ways of taming it so that its interference was minimised (at least in the perception of the artist). Fischer-Lichte argues that the C20th saw the body as a tabula rasa, as ‘raw material for sign processing’; gestures were ‘abstract articulations’ and the body was raw material to be ‘reshaped according to artistic intentions’ as part of a general approach to the body as a site of reshaping.⁴ (There was an obsession with physical culture in the early to mid C20th, along with extreme anxiety about the fitness of young men in the military). Fischer-Lichte also argues that the focus of attention by theorists shifted onto the communication between stage and spectator. Many theorists during this period commented on the passivity of bourgeois spectators. Some clearly saw it as an historical phenomenon (Meyerhold, Kershentsev), based in the bourgeois concern for order. There were various ‘solutions’ offered to this ‘problem’: the Futurists thought they needed to shock spectators out of their passivity; Brecht thought it was necessary to alienate them; Kershentsev wanted to activate them; Meyerhold wanted to ‘frighten off [and] shake them awake ... after making them walk over the acting space’,⁵ and Eisenstein sought to guide them ‘in the desired direction’.⁶ According to Fischer-Lichte, ‘the spectator was at the core of their reflection and activities’. Changing the spectator

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
would not only bring theatre ‘out of its deep crisis’ ⁷ but might also change the world! In 1927, Walter Gropius designed a theatre for Erwin Piscator which had the goal of ‘shackling the spectator out of its intellectually based apathy, to assault it, to take it by surprise and to make it participate in the play’. ⁸ Few sponsors were found for such radical designs, though. ⁹
Estetica (1902); Ariosto , Shakespeare e Corneille (1919); Conversazioni critiche (1931); Terze pagine sparse (1948)	Benedetto Croce (1866-1952) Italian critic, idealist philosopher and politician	The technical means of the arts (e.g. genres, traditional rules) should not be used as critical tools because they limit artistic expression. Not all drama requires actors or scenery. Some plays can produce their effects simply through being read. ¹⁰ Stage interpretations are not guides to the meaning of a text because they necessarily transform a text, producing what is, in effect, a new work of art. Croce later modified this position, since it ‘required a greater separation between text and performance than most theorists were willing to accept’ ¹¹ (see 1921 for the debate between Croce, D’Amico and Gobetti). In Conversazioni , Croce praised Gobetti’s answer to the ‘vulgar and common theory [that] a work composed for the theatre can be judged only with reference to the theatre’. ¹² Performance could not illuminate a text as literary criticism could. The actor was merely a translator, attempting to express the text in another language so as to make it accessible (in a reduced way) ‘to those who cannot or do not know how to read it; to make it more readily and easily apprehended [and] to underline certain parts for better understanding’. Comments made in 1948 suggest a greater willingness to see the art of theatre as holistic: ‘Diction, gesture, and scenery become one in the performance ... a single act of artistic creation in which they cannot be separated’, according to Carlson, ¹³ although there is nothing in this comment to indicate that he did not, still, see the text as a separate entity. Croce and the playwright Pirandello (1918) maintained a life-long antagonism over Croce’s assertions about humour: that it was essentially undefinable, even non-existent in its abstract sense; it existed only in individual humorous works. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-performance View of Theatre: functional;	A place in which drama was performed	Making texts easier to understand for those who did not know how to read them	Doing: drama (literary art); the actor as mere translator of a text Showing: a new work of art Watching: listening
‘Unnecessary Truth’ in The World of Art (1902); ¹⁴ ‘Realism and Convention on the Stage’ (1908) ¹⁵ .	Valery Bryusov (1873-1924) Russian playwright, poet and theorist	‘Unnecessary Truth’ was The World of Art ’s first major statement on the theatre; a ‘manifesto’ of the new symbolist movement, which urged the theatre to turn away from Stanislavskian reproduction of psychological reality towards conscious stylization. The stage should supply only ‘that which is needed to help the spectator to picture as easily as possible in his imagination the scene demanded by the plot of the play’. The dramatist provides the primary form of the drama. However, the central creative artist is the actor . Script and setting exist only to allow the actor the greatest creative freedom to ‘reveal his soul to the audience’. ¹⁶ Bryusov had a significant influence on the	An institution; an art form	To reveal the soul of the performer	Doing: drama – a conventional art; acting as a creative activity Showing: through

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		development of symbolist theatre in Russia. He founded a journal called Scales (1904) in which Remizov (1904) had his views on the 'New Drama' published. In 'Realism' he attempted to find a middle ground between Stanislavski's realist theatre and Meyerhold's theatre of symbolism and convention. Realism eventually must confront the basic unreality of the stage or disappear into reality itself, while symbolism and convention must confront the reality of the 'obstacle of the human body' or disappear into puppetry or pure abstraction. 'One path extinguishes theatre by merging it with life, the other by merging it with thought'.¹⁷ Both deny the essence of drama, which was action: 'As shapes are to sculpture and line and color to painting, so action, direct action, appertains to drama and the stage'. Because of this, the living actor was essential to theatre. Bryusov was influenced by Maeterlinck, Baudelaire, Mallarmé and Verlaine. He rejected realism/naturalism as denying drama 'its artistic possibilities'.¹⁸ Art cannot be the same as life: 'Not only the art of the theatre, but art of any kind cannot avoid formal convention, cannot be transformed into a recreation of reality ... Not a single one of the spectators sitting in the orchestra and paying three or four rubles for his seat is going to believe that he is really looking at Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, and that in the final scene the prince lies dead ... Wherever there is art, there is convention. To oppose this is as absurd as to demand that science would dispense with logic'. Theatre-goers acquire 'deep habits'. Their first reaction to any stage effect, such as 'an avalanche of wadding' descending onto the stage as snow, especially ones which aim to be realistic, is to ask 'How was that done?'. Then, 'in time, audiences ... become used to the device they now find so novel and will cease to notice them. But this will not come about because the audience will take wadding for snow in real earnest ... but because these devices will simply be numbered among the usual theatrical conventions'.¹⁹ Theatre is irrevocably different to life in any number of ways: spectators can 'see' in the dark; only one actor speaks at a time, no matter how many are on stage; focus is generated for spectators: words are stressed, phrases emphasised, extraneous 'dialogue' may be mimed etc. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive (realism) View of Theatre: positive			action we see the soul of the actor Watching:²⁰ spectators are not fooled by stage devices ; they are initially curious about how it is done but they quickly accept a new convention; all art is conventional, including drama. Theatre goers acquire deep habits – their first response is to ask how things are done.
The Development of the Drama	Brander Matthews (1852-1929)	Drama is 'a story in dialogue shown in action before an audience'. All dramatic masterpieces were underpinned by 'a solid structure of dramaturgic technic'. The appeal of drama is always 'to the mass and to the communal desires of the main body'. The	A place in which drama is performed	Representation; education; pleasing mass	Doing: drama (action before spectators)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1903); A Study of the Drama (1910)	First professor of dramatic literature in America	theatre spectator reacts as a crowd, not as isolated individuals. The only true test of a drama is whether it pleases the mass spectator. Only three writers on theatre can be considered to have grasped its essentials: Aristotle, Lessing and Sarcey.²¹ Matthews' views instigated a debate over whether drama was only realised in performance or whether it lay in the text, and could therefore be read. His main protagonists were Spingarn (1910) and Walkeley, his main supporter was Clayton Hamilton (1910). He insisted that 'drama should always be studied with relation to contemporary conditions of representation'.²² Drama had an educational purpose because it dealt 'with themes of universal interest'.²³ The 'true worth of the dramatist can be measured in his ability to teach the masses'.²⁴ 'a dramatist has ever to find the greatest common denominator of the public as a whole'. This is why 'partisan politics and sectarian religion are, both of them, totally out of place on the stage'.²⁵ Through the teaching of theatrical performance (by which he meant the ability 'to visualize an actual performance' rather than to put one on), students could be uplifted 'to a higher purpose' and learn 'a set of "universal" principles that would eclipse their social differences'.²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – drama involved performance View of Theatre: positive; functional	before spectators	spectators; by appealing to the group it can help overcome social difference	Watching: Drama is only realised in performance; it is a communal art . Theatre spectators react as a crowd , therefore drama must speak to the 'common denominator' which can help overcome social difference
'Preface and prologue to Les mamelles de Tirésias ' (1903/1917); ²⁷ Program notes for Parade (1917); ²⁸	Guillaume Apollinaire (1880-1918) Polish/Italian Surrealist playwright (wrote in French)	Apollinaire was influenced by Jarry, whom he knew personally. ²⁹ He rejected naturalism, coining the terms ' surrealism ' to denote 'a style that was more impudently aggressive and less open to soulful interpretation than ... symbolism'. The play, preface and prologue were written some 14 years before the play was performed. Apollinaire distinguished between drama and plays: drama meant action whereas a play might be about manners. The aim of every dramatic work was 'to interest and entertain ... I don't think that the theatre ought to make anyone feel desperate' even if the drama was about a serious social issue (as Les mamelles was). The Prologue declared that 'the actors .../...above all will try to entertain you/so that you will be inclined to profit/ From all the lessons that the play contains'. He also took exception to critics saying his play was symbolic: 'there is no symbolism in my play ... it is transparent'. He nevertheless recognized that people would see in the play whatever they wanted to: 'you are free to find in it all the symbols you	An art form;	The provision of lessons through entertainment	Doing: drama (action) Showing: the workings of the subconscious Watching: being entertained made spectators more likely to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		want and to disentangle a thousand meanings'. ³⁰ Surrealism translated reality into a coherent ensemble: 'a total theatre piece'. ³¹ Apollinaire compared the work of the stage to the wheel. The wheel was an invention to imitate walking, but bore no resemblance to a leg. Similarly, the stage was 'no more the life it represents than the wheel is a leg'. It was therefore legitimate for it to use such aesthetic principles as it saw fit. '... the theatre must not be 'realistic'/It is right for the dramatist to use/All the illusions he has at his disposal'. ³² The attempt to recreate the subconscious, 'the highest plane of reality' made surrealist plays appear dreamlike, mixing recognizable events with the fantastic. ³³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalism View of Theatre: positive; functional			learn the lessons the play contained
Le théâtre du peuple (1903) ³⁴	Romain Rolland (1866-1944) French dramatist Editor of Revue d'art dramatique (1900-1903)	Anti-elitist: one of the few theorists who considered the popular spectator. Inspired by the work of Pottecher, and influenced by Rousseau. Denounced both traditional classics and contemporary bourgeois drama as irrelevant and incomprehensible to the masses and called for a new and more appropriate repertoire designed to inspire and uplift them. Through the Revue he encouraged the writing of populist drama, and urged the government to become involved. He too envisioned a theatre which was accessible and educative without being condescending or exclusive. It was to provide relaxation, be energising and stimulating to the mind: 'Pleasure, strength, intelligence – these are the major conditions for a people's theatre'. The aim was not moral, but to 'gradually raise the taste' of spectators, to 'let in more light, air, and order into the chaos of the soul'. ³⁵ Unlike Pottecher's theatre, it was not to be limited to a geographically restricted spectator. Although his ideas were not realised, they have continued to be present in theatre theory. They reappear in the work of Gatti, Benedetto and Mnouchkine ³⁶ and Luis Valdez' Teatro Campesino. ³⁷ The People's Theatre was to operate under three principles: joy or pleasure, energy and intelligence: '[t]he first requisite of the People's Theatre is that it must be a recreation ... It must first of all give pleasure [which is] a sort of physical and moral rest' for the worker. The second requisite was that theatre ought to be a source of energy ... to render them better able to set to work on the morrow'. Finally, ' theatre ought to be a guiding light to the intelligence '. Exercising the working man's brain is good, and will give him pleasure. Two excesses were to be avoided: moral pedagogy (which the people can see through and will simply avoid) and 'mere impersonal dilettantism' (which they will laugh at but will disdain). ³⁸ Rolland condemned the trend for elite angst over the fare offered in popular theatre, suggesting that a	A form of recreation which should not be confined to elites	To give joy, pleasure and energy as well as to gradually raise the taste of spectators through appeals to their intelligence	Doing: drama Watching: spectators differ not just geographically and historically, but also culturally, and have different interests and requirements of their theatre ⁴¹

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		preoccupation with suffering was an elitist indulgence for those who did not actually suffer: 'As for the sufferings and doubts of the "cultured", let them keep those to themselves: the people have more than enough already'. When people are already suffering, what they want is a recreation which will give them 'a rest'.³⁹ Krasner places him in the line he draws from Hegel rather than Nietzsche.⁴⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-elitism View of Theatre: positive; functional
1904: in the summer of 1904, Russian liberals 'launched a political offensive against the autocracy that made itself felt even in the heavily censored press'. 'A host of social and professional bodies ... joined the campaign,' including the theatre.⁴² Theorist/practitioners fought over the idea of a democratic theatre, with participatory spectators. The discovery of the spectator was also accompanied by the discovery of the actor as a body – and reflecting a pre-occupation with the body and its health and movement in wider society.
'New Drama' (1904)	Aleksei Remizov (1877-1957) Russian literary manager of the Fellowship of the New Drama	The Fellowship was established by Vsevolod Meyerhold (1874-1940). Although influenced by Bryusov, Remizov, along with Ivanov and Sologub, drew heavily on German philosophy to champion 'a theatre of spiritual ecstasy and mass participation',⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-participatory drama View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form	Generating a communal experience with spectators	Doing: drama
'The Poet and the Mob' (1904); 'New Masks' (1904); 'Wagner and the Dionysian Rite' (1905); 'Presentiments and Portents: The New Organic Epoch and the Theater of the Future'	Vyacheslav Ivanov (1866-1949) Russian symbolist	Ivanov was 'the main theoretician of Russian symbolism'. Heavily influenced by Nietzsche and Wagner, he called for a 'new theatre', a 'truly national art ... a democratic theater, which would foster a new national community' and restore the ancient, symbiotic relation between the poet and the masses. He 'condemned the poet's estrangement from the public' as demonstrated by Evreinov and Sologub. He particularly 'condemned what he called the "tyrannical" notion ... that the theatrical spectacle should so hypnotize members of the audience that they forgot themselves and their fellows' which he saw as 'art as both a manifestation and means of the artist's will to power' and 'He reminded his readers that the social influence of the theater derived not only from instructions emanating from the stage but also from the interaction among members of the audience'. The masses provided the poet with symbols, which the poet worked into 'the myths' that answer the collective need, restoring to the masses its sense of 'the total unity of suffering'. 'New Masks' was Ivanov's first essay on theatre. In it he 'observed that theater had long ceased to "infect" the audience, let alone to transform it'. The task of theatre was 'to "forge a link" between the poet and the crowd and to unite them in a	A social art; a collective, interactive enterprise	Communion with the spectator/the crowd; providing for the expression of the popular voice	Doing: drama (an art of poetry) Showing: total unity of suffering Watching: involves a power which the artist 'seeks to subordinate ... to himself' but which is interactive

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1906); 'The Crisis of the Theater' (1909) ⁴⁴		common "celebration and service". His model was the Dionysian orgies of ancient Greece, transformed into classical drama, through which 'the audience would break free of habit and convention and would "feel" itself and the world in a new way'.⁴⁵ He criticised Wagner for allowing the participation of spectators to remain only 'potential and latent',⁴⁶ a participation he considered to be insufficient for a democratic theatre, calling instead for 'the reinstatement of a human chorus in musical drama, so that the "crowd" would have a proper organ of representation and participation' in theatre as in politics. In this way, '[t]ruly democratic drama ... would function as a forum for national self-definition and self-affirmation [and] would engage in a synergistic relationship with national political institutions'.⁴⁷ Political freedom and democratic theatre were interdependent, and theatre provided a model of collective enterprise. Theatrical "communes" would provide 'the genuine referendum of the true popular will'.⁴⁸ In this way, Ivanov 'challenged political leaders to devise a new public life for Russia', given a voice through popular theatre. 'True political freedom depended on the success of free democratic theater'. Moeller-Sally points out, however, that privately (as revealed in a letter to Bryusov in October 1905) Ivanov 'maintained a sympathetic identification between artist and autocrat [since] who could appreciate unlimited executive power better than an artist'. This was a sentiment which would be taken up by other modernists.⁴⁹ In 'Crisis', however, he claimed that 'a power struggle was taking place between the artist and the audience in the modernist theater' which 'sought to control the audience's response to a dangerous degree, leading ultimately to "the mortification of every personal reaction, the complete depersonalization of the perceiver [as] [t]he artist seeks to subordinate the spectator to himself [and] supposing his victory in this subordination: if he does not conquer, his art was in vain." Theater [like other art of the time] was thus becoming a "form of coercion ... perverted into a means for the enslavement of souls"' through the intelligentsia's 'longing for community, for a more [purely] unified, harmonious society,' their consequent distrust of democracy and their understanding of art as 'formative' in producing this unity.⁵⁰ He was deeply concerned with 'the tension between individuality and social unity'.⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti- coercive theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent			and participatory via a representative body such as a chorus .
Die Schaubühne	Georg Fuchs (1868-1932)	Director of the Munich Art Theatre. Rejected naturalism and the trend towards ever-increasing realism in the theatre: the theatre could never truly reproduce nature:	A practice	To reach out to spectators;	Doing: drama – an

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
der Zukunft (1904); The Stage of the Future (1905); 'The Dance' (1906); Die Revolution des Theatres (1909); Revolution in the Theatre: Conclusions Concerning the Munich Artists' Theatre (1972).	German Theatre Director	compared to nature, 'all scenes are quite untrue, impossible, and silly'.⁵² Too much realism had resulted in the spectator becoming increasingly disenchanted with theatre: it had lost that sense of enchantment, of festival, and fulfillment as a people that theatre originally had offered. The theatre should renounce literalism and literature and restore the actor to a position of primacy, then renounce realism in order to allow the actor to reach out to the spectator, an instinctive urge which was essential to the effectiveness of the theatre.⁵³ The author was to be subject to the creativity of the actor, creating texts based on 'a delicate understanding of the possibilities of form which are inherent in the personalities of the performers'.⁵⁴ Fuchs was part of the turn against literature which occurred at the turn of the century. Along with Craig, he saw the body 'as a means to overcome the crisis of "culture"'.⁵⁵ The body, and the cultivation of the body and its movements, was to be a replacement for language. Dance not language was the true basis of the theatre: 'dance and acting are one and the same ... rhythmical movement of the human body in the space'.⁵⁶ Fuchs was a disciple of Nietzsche, and a proponent of a physical culture. The dancing body was 'a perfect semiotic system' able to do what language no longer could do.⁵⁷ Fuchs was also influenced by contemporary knowledge of Japanese theatre, especially kabuki with its use of a bridge (hanamichi) which made a path through the auditorium to the stage so that different actions (and sub-plots) could be represented simultaneously with the main scene, something Japanese spectators appeared to enjoy, becoming intensely involved and even at times participating. In the theatre of the future 'it is of great importance never to forget that drama, by its very essence, is one with the festive crowd. For it comes into existence the very moment it is experienced by the crowd. Performer and spectator, stage and auditorium, are, in origin, not opposed to one another, they are a unity. The Japanese theatre has kept this unity right up to the present time by use of the bridge along which the actor proceeds out of the auditorium onto the stage'.⁵⁸ He introduced the concept of retheatricalization as an antidote to naturalism, an idea which was taken up enthusiastically by 'almost the whole avant-garde movement',⁵⁹ and which continues to be a theme in contemporary European theatre, as part of a way to distinguish theatre from other media.⁶⁰ He reintroduced the idea of the spectator as a vital component of the dramatic experience: 'it is in the spectator that the dramatic work of art is actually born – born at the time it is experienced – and it is differently experienced by every individual member of the audience. The		to provide a dramatic experience for them and to generate a sense of festival with them	embodied art); the primacy of the body of the actor Watching: drama ... is one with the festive crowd. For it comes into existence the very moment it is experienced by the crowd. Performer and spectator, stage and auditorium, are, in origin, not opposed to one another, they are a unity although the actor takes precedence (Fuchs 1905: 38). People go to the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		beginning of a dramatic work of art is not upon the stage or even in a book. It is created at that moment when it is experienced as movement of form in time and space'.⁶¹ The 'purpose' of theatre is 'dramatic experience'.⁶² Fuchs was one of the few theorists who considered why people went to the theatre in the first place. They did so because they enjoyed being part of a crowd: 'There is a strange intoxication which overcomes us when, as part of a crowd, we feel ourselves emotionally stirred. Scientific investigation may perhaps determine from what distant ancestors we inherit the proclivity for such intoxication. But whether it springs from primitive orgies or from religious cults, this is certain: there is an emotion which runs through each of us when, as part of a crowd, we find ourselves united in an overwhelming passion'.⁶³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalism theatre View of Theatre: positive			theatre because they enjoy being part of a crowd: 'there is an emotion which runs through each of us when, as part of a crowd, we find ourselves united in an overwhelming passion'.
'The Stylized Theatre' (c1904); 'The Naturalistic Theatre and the Theatre of Mood' (1908); 'First Attempts at a Stylized Theatre' (1908);⁶⁴ 'The New Theatre Foreshadowed in Literature' (1908); On	Vsevolod Meyerhold (1874-1942) Russian actor and symbolist director	Essential theorist. Influenced by Georg Fuchs and the most significant theorist of the external anti-realist movement.⁶⁶ A proponent of the 'new theatre', a 'universal, festive theatre' which would 'intoxicate the spectator with the Dionysian cup of eternal sacrifice' and make the spectator a 'fourth creator', in addition to the author, the director, and the actor'.⁶⁷ Nevertheless, the actor should always be 'the principal element in the theatre', although the director also was a major positive force: 'the theatre must employ every means to assist the actor to blend his soul with that of the playwright and reveal it through the soul of the director'.⁶⁸ Actors should be trained in music to help them achieve a precise rhythm in their performances, while directors should be trained in 'the composition laws of painting, music and literature'.⁶⁹ He rejected modernistic formal experimentation for its own sake: '[w]ithout self-restriction, there is no craftsmanship'.⁷⁰ In 'The Fairground Booth', Meyerhold defended theatricality and stylization, the puppet and the mask, and the elevation of form over content, against claims that his 'theatre of convention' was destructive of theatre. Theatre must always remain theatre, as Bely said, but it should seek its effects through its own means: the mime, the mask, the juggler, the puppet, improvised action, and the grotesque, all of which allowed drama to suggest the	A seeing place (a place to see art); a cultural institution with a disciplinary structure; an artefact (an arrangement of the material); a practice; a symbolic and spiritual	'To transport the spectator to a world of make-believe, entertaining him on the way there with the brilliance of [one's] technical skill'; to 'force' the spectator to think	Doing: theatre: creating an artefact; Showing: the art of theatre is to stylize, to suggest, which stimulates the spectator's imagination: 'To stir the imagination is "the essential

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the History and Technique of Theatre (1909); 'The Fairground Booth' (1913); ⁶⁵ Notes for The Dawn (1920); 'The Actor of the Future and Biomechanics' (1922); 'Meyerhold o svojom Lese' (1924); Theaterarbeit 1917-1930 (1974)		'vast unfathomed depths' beneath visible reality and force the spectator to a deeper vision.⁷¹ The public came to the theatre 'to see the art of man ... [it] expects invention, playacting and skill [not] a slavish imitation of life'. The use of masks, for instance allowed the spectator 'to fly away to the land of make-believe' bringing all the previously experienced versions of the character associated with the mask to mind. Meyerhold believed that there was 'no place for the cinematograph [realism] in the world of art'. All realism had done was to obstruct theatre, and driven 'fairground' theatrical skills into cabaret and the musical hall. Artists always stylized although 'stylization involves a certain degree of verisimilitude' which suggested that the stylist was in fact 'an analyst par excellence', although what he produced was not the 'truth of reality' but 'the truth of my personal artistic whim'. Stylization was a form of impoverishment of life: it reduced 'empirical abundance to typical unity'. This could be done in a variety of ways. The grotesque did it by mixing opposites 'creating harsh incongruity ... and originality'. Mixing realism and the grotesque 'forces the spectator to adopt an ambivalent attitude towards the stage action' because it continually switches the spectator 'from the plane he has just reached to another which is totally unforeseen'. Meyerhold objected to the view of 'that art of the grotesque' as merely 'a genre of low comedy'. It was an art based on 'the conflict between form and content' and could be applied to the tragic as much as the comic, the 'high' as well as the 'low': 'The grotesque aimed to subordinate psychologism to a 'decorative task' thereby making it 'expressive'. In doing so, 'the fantastic will exist in its own right on the stage; joie de vivre will be discovered in the tragic as well as in the comic ... and the commonplace of everyday life will be transcended'.⁷² Despite being poles apart in their ideas of theatre, Meyerhold was asked by Stanislavski to rejoin the Moscow Art Theatre as director of the new Studio in 1905. Although Stanislavski was famous for his realist productions of Chekhov and Gorki, he had realised that new dramatists required a different approach and that in any case, 'realism and local colour had lived their life and no longer interested the public. The time for the unreal on the stage had arrived'.⁷³ Once again, they found it impossible to work together and Meyerhold departed to join Vera Komissarzhevskaya as director of her experimental symbolist theatre (see Blok 1906). Meyerhold was a strong supporter of the new proletarian theatres after the revolution. He was put in charge of the national Theatre Department in Moscow in 1920. The department published a journal, the Theatre Herald	experience; as conventional (theatrical); theatre as a reflection of its society		condition of aesthetic activity'''. ⁸⁸ He also quotes Voltaire: 'The secret of being boring is to tell all'. ⁸⁹ Watching: Spectators should be stimulated and also allowed to use their imaginations to fill in the implications of a play. Naturalistic theatre which does this for them simply reduces them to 'merely looking on'. Spectators are also capable of understanding

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		(Vestnik teatra) which championed nonprofessional Proletcult productions. Meyerhold worked with young and inexperienced actors to develop a new approach to acting called biomechanics, an attempt to relate acting to the new machine age and the new political order by emphasizing physical training rather than inspiration or psychological insight, thus making it available to a broader segment of the population. He believed that theatre and acting always reflected their society, and the new Russia therefore demanded a new vision of theatre [a somewhat paradoxical position, if theatre reflects society]. The actor was now a 'joyful' worker, like any other, except that his field was the 'plastic' arts. He was therefore to study 'the mechanics of the body, seeking not psychological insight but physical clarity',⁷⁴ which was a state of 'excitation which communicates itself to the spectator and induces him to share in the actor's performance'.⁷⁵ In 'First Attempts' he produced two models of the theatre, which he called the 'Theatre-Triangle' and the 'Theatre of the Straight Line'. In the former, the director acts as the interface between the theatre and the spectator. The author and actor are forced to work through the director's conception, which is directed to the spectator in such a way that it denies both the spectator and the actor any creativity. It reduces the stage to 'an antique shop', the spectator to 'merely looking on', and the actor to a technical virtuosi like a musician. 'The spectator experiences only passively what happens onstage. The stage acts as a barrier between the spectator and the actor dividing the theatre into two mutually foreign worlds: those who act and those who watch – and there are no veins that could bind these two separate bodies into one circulatory system. The orchestra brought the spectator close to the stage. The stage was constructed where the orchestra had been and separated the spectator from the stage'.⁷⁶ In the latter model, the director assimilates the author's ideas and communicates them to the actors, who assimilate both, then use their own creativity to communicate these ideas to the spectator, who in turn uses his imagination to fill in the gaps: 'The actor reveals his soul freely to the spectator, having assimilated the creation of the director, who, in his turn, has assimilated the creation of the author ... the actor [then] stands face to face with the spectator (with director and author behind him) and freely reveals his soul to him, thus intensifying the fundamental theatrical relationship of performer and spectator'. The first model treats the theatrical production as if it were an orchestra with a conductor. The actor is reduced and 'de-personalised' in order to pass on the director's conception. The 'Theatre of the Straight Line' is the only			clever dialogue; they do not need all the details explained to them – and in any case, this interferes with the overall impression of the play: 'In the theatre the spectator's imagination is able to supply that which is left unsaid. It is this mystery and the desire to solve it which draws so many people to the theatre'.⁹⁰

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		way in which there can be ‘an ideal blend’ of those involved in a production. It is based on the recognition that ‘Above all, drama is the art of the actor’. It leaves both actor and spectator free, and forces the spectator ‘to create instead of merely looking on, by stimulating his imagination’.⁷⁷ Setting was meant to enhance this: ‘Instead of aiming at an aesthetic effect, the set should move the spectator to the point where he no longer sees the difference between this and such events in real life, such as maneuvers, parades, street demonstrations, war, and so on’.⁷⁸ Meyerhold, like so many other avant-garde directors, was influenced by Japanese theatre and made use of the hanamichi, sometimes to extreme. In 1924, with reference to a highly stylized interpretation of The Forest in which characters were reduced to grotesque ‘social masks’ utilizing movements based on biomechanical exercises, Meyerhold declared that ‘a play [was] simply the excuse for the revelation of its theme on the level at which the revelation may appear vital today’.⁷⁹ He experimented with multi-media, and introduced theatricalist ideas in what became known as constructivist sets (skeletal frames, ramps, stairways, platforms and chutes) which were highly theatrical but nevertheless practical apparatuses for performance,⁸⁰ as well as planning new kinds of theatres which would overcome ‘the divide ... into auditorium and stage’.⁸¹ He believed that ‘this deeply rooted idea’ was wrong, and the source of the passivity of the spectator. Spectators were passive because they had been disciplined: ‘If the theatre were not divided into stalls, dress, and upper circle, if the orchestra did not stand as a chasm between the stage and the auditorium, if there were no stage, if the theatre were one whole, and a natural incline linked the acting space with the spectator, then I would frighten off this passive, immobile mass, shake them awake, before I would allow them, after making them walk over the acting space, to return to their seats’.⁸² ‘Above all, we also want the modern spectator to escape out of this constrictive shell of theatre into the freedom of the different levels of the stage’.⁸³ Unfortunately he could not realise all his ideas, and some misfired e.g. widening the Japanese hanamichi to take trucks: ‘Our audience was uncomfortable. The vehicles pumped out fumes, they could have hit someone, run someone over’⁸⁴ and he was forced to conclude that ‘The audience has changed so much that we are forced to readjust our own frame of reference. The new spectator cannot stand much’.⁸⁵ In the 1930s he was attacked by the Soviet government for failing to produce ‘socialist realism’. After a speech to the All-Union Conference of Stage Directors in 1939 in which he condemned

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Soviet control of the theatre he was arrested and sent to a labour camp where he was interrogated and tortured for seven months, before being executed by firing squad on February 2, 1940.⁸⁶ His wife and leading actress, Zinaida Raikh, was murdered by the secret police.⁸⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - anti-naturalism View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘De l’évolution de théâtre’ (1904)	André Gide (1869-1951) French dramatist	Expressed similar ideas to those of Paul Ernst (1891): ‘the contemporary world [was] stultifying to the human spirit and the contemporary drama [was] a pathetic reflection of man’s loss of hope’. He did not however trace this situation to socioeconomic causes as Ernst did, but to the ‘imposition upon all individuals of arbitrary values and moral systems’, what Lukács would call the loss of a shared ‘ethical centre’. His solution was, however, similar to Ernst’s: the keep the spirit of man’s freedom alive through the exaltation of the individual hero. The interest in realism was ‘a reflection of illness in both art and nature and the false belief that the cure for a languishing art lay in nature. Art and nature were rivals: ‘beauty’ was not natural but the result of ‘artifice and constraint’. The way out of illness for art was not the stifling realist dramas of Ibsen, but for theatre to ‘seize the initiative’ and create ‘new models of heroism for the world’.⁹¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: positive; functional		Provision of hope	Doing: drama (art) Showing: heroes designed to keep the spirit of man’s freedom alive
Bilanz der Moderne (1904); Der Ausgang der Moderne (1907)	Samuel Lublinski (1868-1910) Neo-classic dramatist	Expressed a similar move from socialist realism to neoclassicism as Ernst. Bilanz was strongly Marxist, and condemned both romanticism and naturalism ‘for presenting symbols and partial perspectives and avoiding real portrayals of society’. He later rejected these views. In Der Ausgang, he also concluded that contemporary conditions for the working class meant they were unable to ‘take part in cultural improvement’, and advanced the idea of the individual hero in conflict with society as ‘the only source of tragedy’.⁹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-romanticism View of Theatre: functional		Cultural improvement	Doing: drama (tragedy) Showing: a real portrayal of society; the individual in conflict with society Watching: dependent on economic and cultural conditions

-
- ¹ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 61-5
- ² Fischer-Lichte 1997: 115
- ³ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 65-71
- ⁴ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 34-7
- ⁵ Meyerhold 1974: 161-2 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 47
- ⁶ Eisenstein 1923 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 42
- ⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 43
- ⁸ Gropius 1935 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 47
- ⁹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 47
- ¹⁰ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 311-12
- ¹¹ Carlson 1984: 369
- ¹² Croce 1924-39, Conversazioni critiche, Bari, Vol. 3, p. 71-2; in Carlson 1984: 369.
- ¹³ Carlson 1984: 369
- ¹⁴ Partially reprinted in Krasner, David. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 56-60.
- ¹⁵ Bryusov's contribution to the book Theatre: A Book about the New Theatre (1908), reprinted in Senelik (trans.) 1981, Russian Dramatic Theory from Pushkin to the Soviets, Austin (Carlson 1984: 322).
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 314
- ¹⁷ Carlson 1984: 322
- ¹⁸ Krasner 2008: 55
- ¹⁹ Bryusov 2008/1902: 57-9
- ²⁰ Yet another case where the secondary author anthologising a theorist's work ignores the comments the author makes regarding spectators. Both Carlson and Krasner provide a thumbnail sketch of Bryusov's work, but neither refers to his view of the spectator.
- ²¹ Matthews 1910/1903, The Development of the Drama, New York, p. 3; A Study of the Drama, New York p. 3, 92-3; in Carlson 1984: 310-311.
- ²² Cheney, Sheldon. 1930. The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft. 2nd ed. London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co. 369
- ²³ Matthews 1910/1903: 85
- ²⁴ Lee, Josephine. 1999. 'Disciplining Theater and Drama in the English Department: Some Reflections on 'Performance' and Institutional History'. Text and Performance Quarterly 19 pp. 145-158. 150
- ²⁵ Matthews 1910/1903: 85
- ²⁶ Lee 1999: 150
- ²⁷ Reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 165-170.
- ²⁸ This was a collaborative production of the ballet by Apollinaire, Cocteau, Picasso and Satie.
- ²⁹ Brandt 1998: 165
- ³⁰ Apollinaire 1998/1903: 166-9
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 343

-
- ³² Apollinaire 1998/1903: 166
- ³³ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 447
- ³⁴ Reprinted in part in Krasner 2008: 61-63.
- ³⁵ Rolland 1913, Le théâtre du peuple, Paris, p. 116; in Carlson 1984: 317.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 317
- ³⁷ Krasner 2008: 61
- ³⁸ Rolland 2008/1903: 61-3
- ³⁹ Rolland 2008/1903: 62
- ⁴⁰ Krasner 2008, 'Introduction'.
- ⁴¹ Again, Rolland makes a pertinent point about spectators which is overlooked by Carlson and Krasner.
- ⁴² Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371. 358-9
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 314
- ⁴⁴ Published in Apollon Vol 1, 1909; discussed in Moeller-Sally 1998: 350.
- ⁴⁵ Moeller-Sally 1998: 350-370
- ⁴⁶ Ivanov 1905 cited in Moeller-Sally 1998.
- ⁴⁷ Moeller-Sally 1998: 359
- ⁴⁸ Ivanov 1906 cited in Moeller-Sally 1998
- ⁴⁹ Moeller-Sally 1998: 359-60
- ⁵⁰ Moeller-Sally 1998: 350. 'A number of Russia's greatest artists proclaimed the spiritual unification of the public as the highest function of art' at the time (Moeller-Sally 1998: 353).
- ⁵¹ Moeller-Sally 1998: 356
- ⁵² Fuchs 1959, Revolution in the Theatre, trans. Constance Kuhn, Ithaca, p. 99; in Carlson 1984: 319.
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 319
- ⁵⁴ Fuchs 1959, Revolution in the Theatre, trans. Constance Kuhn, Ithaca, p. 99; in Carlson 1984: 319.
- ⁵⁵ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 63
- ⁵⁶ Fuchs 1906: 13 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 63.
- ⁵⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 64
- ⁵⁸ Fuchs 1905: 38 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 64
- ⁵⁹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 361n1
- ⁶⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 109-110
- ⁶¹ Fuchs 1972: 43 in Fischer-Lichte 1997
- ⁶² Fuchs 1905: 95 in Fischer-Lichte 1997
- ⁶³ Fuchs 1972:4 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 43

-
- ⁶⁴ Part of 'The Naturalistic Theatre and the Theatre of Mood' (1908); reprinted in Krasner 2008: 76-87.
- ⁶⁵ Excerpt reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 132-137.
- ⁶⁶ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 426
- ⁶⁷ Meyerhold 1969, 'The Stylized Theatre', in Meyerhold on Theatre, trans. Edward Braun, New York, p. 60.
- ⁶⁸ Meyerhold 1969, 'The New Theatre Foreshadowed in Literature', in Meyerhold on Theatre, trans. Edward Braun, New York, p. 38. Originally published in a volume dedicated to Stanislavski: Theatre: A Book about the New Theatre (1908) (Carlson 1984: 320).
- ⁶⁹ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 407
- ⁷⁰ Quoted in Gerould 2000: 407.
- ⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 323
- ⁷² Meyerhold 1998/1913: 132-7
- ⁷³ Constantin Stanislavski 1956, My Life in Art, trans. J.J. Robbins, New York, p. 428; in Carlson 1984: 318.
- ⁷⁴ Carlson 1984: 357; Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427
- ⁷⁵ Meyerhold 1922, 'The Actor of the Future and Biomechanics', in Meyerhold on Theatre, trans. Edward Braun, New York, p. 197-199; in Carlson 1984: 357.
- ⁷⁶ Meyerhold 1909, quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 41.
- ⁷⁷ Meyerhold 2008/1908: 86-7
- ⁷⁸ Meyerhold 1979, Schriften, 2 vols, Berlin, Henschel, Vol 2, p. 47, in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 124.
- ⁷⁹ Meyerhold 1924, 'Meyerhold o svojom Lese, Novy Zritel Vol. 7, p. 6; in Carlson 1984: 359.
- ⁸⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427
- ⁸¹ Theatricalists believed in exposing the devices of the theatre: the way theatre machinery worked etc in order to make the spectators aware that they were watching a construction when watching a performance. Theatricalists also borrowed techniques from the circus, music halls and other popular entertainments (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427).
- ⁸² Meyerhold 1974: 161-2 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 47
- ⁸³ Meyerhold 1974: 49 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 49
- ⁸⁴ Meyerhold 1974: 162 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 49
- ⁸⁵ Meyerhold 1920 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 43
- ⁸⁶ Gerould 2000: 407. The circumstances of his death were only made known in 1989 (Gerould 2000: 407).
- ⁸⁷ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427
- ⁸⁸ Meyerhold quoting Schopenhauer 2008/1908: 79
- ⁸⁹ Meyerhold quoting Schopenhauer 2008/1908: 78
- ⁹⁰ Meyerhold 2008/1908: 78
- ⁹¹ Carlson 1984: 332-3
- ⁹² Carlson 1984: 333

Table 22/51: Theories of Theatre 1905-1910

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Gedanken zum Drama (1905)	Wilhelm von Scholz (1874-1922) Neoclassic dramatist	Scholz was credited by Lublinski (above) with laying the ‘aesthetic and philosophical groundwork’ for modern tragedy. Scholz became concerned with neoclassicism ‘through a consideration of how the drama engages and works upon its audience’. ¹ He called for a drama that engaged its public through the ‘emotional tension’ derived from an inevitable struggle ‘of will against will’. ² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		The generation of emotional tension	Doing: drama (modern tragedy)-playwrighting
‘The Ideas of Wagner’ (1905); ‘A new Art of the Stage’ (1902, 1906); Plays, Acting, and Music (1909)	Arthur Symons (1865-1945) English critic	Symons was a key figure in the introduction of symbolist ideas in England. Most of the central concepts of symbolist theatre are explored in his essays, especially in the collection Plays, Acting, and Music . Like all symbolists, the physicality of the actor was problematic . Symons agreed with Maeterlinck that a puppet would ‘portray the more general and universal, and hence the more emotional and poetic, idea’. ³ Distinguishes between three kinds of actors: realist, conventional and those who function like ideal puppets, simply reflecting the mood or soul of the drama. Great drama must be a mixture of life and beauty, action and poetry and inner harmonies. Action alone is mere melodrama. He advocates ‘suggestion instead of reality, a symbol instead of an imitation’. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realist theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent		Suggestion	Doing: plays – staging and performance Showing: inner harmony
On the Art of the Theatre (1905); ‘An Expert and a Playgoer are Conversing’ (1905); ⁵ ‘The Actor and the Über-Marionette’ (1908); ⁶ ‘The Artists of the Theatre of the	Edward Gordon Craig (1872-1966) English actor, designer and producer/director	Essential theorist. Craig declared himself ‘a first-rate spectator in a theatre’. ⁷ He developed a symbolist-oriented aesthetic for the theatre, stressed the holistic nature of theatre and drew a distinction between the written text and the performed work. Texts which were complete in themselves (such as Shakespeare) could not be improved by performance. Theatre should concentrate on texts which require performance to be realised, thus making the art of the stage director paramount . The aim: the subordination of all elements to a single artistic vision. The idea of a director’s theatre had ‘taken root’ in the nineteenth century and Craig’s theoretical foundation for it helped it to become ‘the dominant mode’ in twentieth century theatre. ⁸ Theatre was a co-operative exercise but ‘a theatre in which so many hundred persons are engaged at work is ... like a [naval] ship, and demands management’ as well as obedience ‘to the ‘captain of the vessel’’. It also involved a refusal to compromise, especially with ‘the enemy’ – ‘vulgar display, the lower public opinion, and ignorance’. ⁹ In his 1908 work, Craig	A seeing place; a place for the performance of drama; a co-operative practice; an autonomous, holistic art	A single, artistic vision	Doing: the production and performance of drama Watching: the director as master spectator – ‘captain of the vessel’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Future' (1908).		condemned the art of acting, which introduced the accidental and 'personal caprice'. He urged actors to renounce impersonation and representation, using instead 'symbolic gesture'. The ideal actor would be the Über-Marionette, and 'inanimate figure', a figure of symbolist vision.¹⁰ Masks were one way human actors could achieve this 'removal of the accidental', and truly portray 'the emotions of the soul'. The stage should never attempt to reproduce nature, but instead create its own forms and visions.¹¹ In his designs for theatrical productions, Craig's work was similar to Appia's, but whereas Appia sought to work with the actor, Craig tried to minimise the impact of the actor as he saw acting as the weakest element. Craig set up the magazine The Mask (1908-1928), which was very influential in avant-garde theatre. He shared many of Appia's ideas about staging, and devised the modern unit setting, a single basic set for an entire performance which used movable screens to mark scene changes.¹² Along with Fuchs, he considered the body more important than language in the theatre.¹³ He claimed to be the first 'to define theater as an autonomous art ... independent from literature'.¹⁴ As usual, contemporary theatre was 'on its last legs'¹⁵ and required the kinds of reforms Craig envisaged. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-theatre as an autonomous art View of Theatre: aesthetic
'Colored Men and Women on the Stage' (1905) ¹⁶	Aida Overton Walker (1880-1914) African-American dancer, singer and actress	Walker's article was an attempt to defend the profession from black critics at a time when minstrelsy had made the idea of a black performer 'opprobrious'.¹⁷ She argued that black performers were not only as good as white performers, but they also did more to alleviate the ignorance that produced racism than any other profession: '[w]hen a large audience leave a theatre after a creditable two hours and a half performance by Negroes, I am sure the Negro race is raised in the estimation of the people'.¹⁸ The profession also gave black artists 'entrée' to places other blacks would never be able to access, including Buckingham Palace and Oxford University. She argued also for the development of a 'good school' to train black actors and actresses, and that anyone serious about the profession and prepared to work should be encouraged. She saw the stage as something which gave pleasure and lightened the burdens of others, which in turn gave pleasure to the performers. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-professionalism View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place of performance a profession	Pleasure and recreation; the alleviation of ignorance	Doing: acting as a profession

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘French Dramatic Literature and French Eighteenth Century Painting from the Sociological Standpoint’ (1905); ‘Historical Materialism and Art’; ‘Henrik Ibsen’ (1906-8);	Georgy Plekhanov (1857-1918) Russian Marxist critic	Introduced the phrase ‘dialectical materialism’ to the arts: varying human conditions were determined not by changes in human thought but ‘by the stage of their productive forces and their relations of production’. ¹⁹ The proletariat were the ‘only class capable of being inspired with zeal for everything noble and progressive’. In the absence of such a class, theatre turns to individual liberation, symbolism and abstraction: abstract visions of human betterment substitute for social revolution. Rejected the ‘civic critics’ over-emphasis on the utilitarian function of the theatre. Although ‘social man’ looks for utility, the individual can also enjoy art purely aesthetically: an attempt to reconcile ‘disinterested’ aesthetic pleasure with social utility. ²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois art View of Theatre: functional; positive	A social institution	Moral instruction combined with aesthetic pleasure for social man:	Doing: art Watching: proletarian spectators were capable of being inspired
‘The Dramatic Theatre of V.F. Komissarzhevskaya’ (1906); ‘On Drama’ (1907)	Aleksandr Blok (1880-1921) Russian actor, dramatist	A fairly typical symbolist amalgam of Wagner and Nietzsche: theatre, like poetry, arise from rhythm , the ‘earth’s primitive element’. Drama is ‘the highest creative manifestation of this rhythm. The people bear within themselves ‘the spirit of music’, and they demand, through theatre, not distraction but a ‘reconciliation of contradictions’ – ‘a bestowing of wings’. ²¹ His play, The Fairground Booth , mixed popular elements of traditional folk drama (the farce, the clown, the commedia) in what appears to have been an attempt to ‘recapture a naïve theatrical consciousness.’ Although a supporter of symbolist theory, Blok recognized as misguided and impractical attempts to create a ‘true’ symbolist drama: its most successful form was not drama but ‘subtle and evanescent lyric poetry’. ²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: positive; functional		The reconciliation of contradiction – ‘a bestowing of wings’	Doing: drama Watching: spectators demand reconciliation not distraction
Preface to Three Plays with Happy Endings (1907)	St John Hankin (1869-1909) Dramatist	‘[I]t is the dramatist’s business to represent life, not to argue about it’. ²³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-political/social drama View of Theatre: positive		Representation of life	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to The Playboy of the Western World (1907); Preface to The Tinker's Wedding	John Millington Synge (1871-1909) Irish playwright and poet	Attempted to blend the symbolist and naturalist styles: 'One must have reality and one must have joy'. ²⁴ Drama is at its best not when it is dealing with social problems but when it 'feeds the imagination': 'The drama is made serious ... not by the degree in which it is taken up with problems that are serious in themselves, but by the degree in which it gives the nourishment ... on which our imaginations live. We should not go to the theatre as we go to a [pharmacy] ... but as we go to dinner.... The drama, like the symphony, does not teach or prove anything.' ²⁵ Nevertheless, it is 'a collaboration.' ²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-medicinal drama View of Theatre: Positive	A place to go to to watch drama	To give nourishment not medicine	Doing: drama Showing: both reality and joy Watching: spectators should come to the theatre for nourishment
'The Theatre of One Will' (1908) ²⁷	Fyodor Sologub (1863-1927) Russian symbolist poet ²⁸	Like Ivanov and Evreinov, 'Sologub looked beyond the surface of politics and progressivism for the substance of the new art, for only an art that satisfied some deep, universal human need or desire could transform the theatrical "crowd" into a community'. He saw 'the real purpose of theater' as being 'to satisfy the human desire for deliverance from the "tight fetters of tedious and meagre life"'. Theatre was a place of escape "from the world of strange and laughable coincidences, from the sphere of comedy" and into "the world of necessity and freedom ... the sphere of high tragedy" through which they could be transformed by a theatre of 'enchantment and ecstasy'. To experience this, however, spectators had to 'submit to the will of the artist only one will would rule in the theater': ²⁹ 'The drama is the work of a single conception'. ³⁰ The actor must become a marionette, 'a transparent expression of the poet's vision', in which the spectator becomes inspired to participate 'as a choric participant' and through the 'liberating power of dance': ³¹ 'the rhythmic frenzy of body and soul, plunging into the tragic element of music'. ³² Moeller-Sally calls this work 'a fantasy of strangely beautiful bleakness' combining 'political and philosophical pessimism, despairing of both freedom and community'. ³³ It 'questions the feasibility of democratic institutions and abjures the importation of democratic standards into the realm of art', despairing of the very possibility of democracy. Communion was not possible in the contemporary theatre. Contemporary theatre 'could only be a theater of spectacle, not of participation. Any effort to break down the barrier between the stage and the spectator would yield only a masquerade, a combination of play and spectacle lacking a fundamental mystery or hidden truth that would truly unite the participants'. Instead, spectacle should be changed	A place of escape from the uncontrolled world; an art form	To generate a sense of unity with the poet; to confront spectators with their isolation; to provide an escape from the boredom of life	Doing: drama (poetry) Showing: the poet's vision Watching: Spectators 'go so gladly to the theatre'. the inspired spectator collapses the separation between stage and spectator and participates, but only according to the will of the poet: thus a chance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		to be more mysterious and ritualistic. He proposed a drama in which the author would sit and read every word of the play, including stage directions, while the actors did exactly what the author said and no more – this ‘barring of the device’ would reveal the level of ‘unfreedom’ in people’s lives:³⁴ ‘as a poet, I create drama in order to recreate the world according to My new design. Just as My will alone rules in the world at large, so in the little circle of the theatrical spectacle only one will should rule – the will of the poet’.³⁵ There was no ‘possibility of the absence of coercive power’, no possibility of equality or of any full cooperation ‘within any common endeavour ... either in politics or the theater’.³⁶ There was only ‘unity in subjugation’: ‘Every common business is done according to the thought and plan of one [person]. Every parliament listens to the orator and does not make an ecumenical din, ecumenicizing in a merry ecumenical uproar ... And therefore the crowd - the spectators – can be joined to the tragedy by no other means than by extinguishing in themselves their old and trivial words. Only passively. The one who executes the action is always alone’.³⁷ Everything, including the spectator, ‘constitutes a means for realizing the Poet’s will: ‘every union of people has meaning only insofar as it brings man to ME – from vainly seductive separation to true unity. The pathos of the mystery is nourished precisely by this: that a chance multitude is transformed mysteriously into a necessary unity. It reminds [us], that every individual existence on earth is only a means for Me - a means to exhaust in the infinity of the experiences of this place the countless multitude of My – and only My – possibilities, the sum total of which creates laws, but which itself moves freely’.³⁸ Completely rejecting the possibility of democracy and equality, Sologub ‘fantasized a theater in which the spectator would be completely alone. Darkness, solitude, and silence would ensure maximal control over the viewer’s attention and response and would thereby strengthen the exercise of “My will” over his will. By depriving the spectator of fellow spectators, the “theater of one will” would drive home to the spectator yet another truth of his existence: his utter isolation’. Such a theatre would then move beyond representation to an actual experience of human alienation and powerlessness. Thus Sologub, like Evreinov, recognized that ‘a desire for power and subjection lay at the heart of the artistic project as well as of politics’ but his ‘theater of one will’ would be a compensation for unfreedom and individual helplessness.³⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-democratic , anti-conventional theatre View of			multitude is transformed mysteriously into a necessary unity. By depriving the spectator of fellow spectators, the “theater of one will” would drive home to the spectator yet another truth of his existence: his utter isolation’. Such a theatre would then move beyond representation to an actual experience of human alienation and powerlessness: ‘Neither the tragic nor the comic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Theatre: ambivalent			mask deceives the attentive spectator'. ⁴⁰
'Theatre and Modern Drama' (1908); 'The Symbolist Theatre' (1907)	Andrey Bely (1800-1934) Russian symbolist	Published in the same book as Sologub's essay, Bely completely rejected Sologub's ecstatic vision, reflecting a growing recognition of the tension between abstract visions of drama and their physical presentation. The 'ancient sense of community' was not so easily regained because the physicality of the theatre would always prevent transcendence: 'Life remains life, theatre remains theatre' . ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-transcendent theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place, a practice	Performance	Doing: the practice of theatre 1908: a 'counter-anthology' to that which contained the essays of Sologub, Bely and Blok was produced in which the idea that the 'theatre of convention', as symbolist theatre had come to be known, was destroying the art of theatre as a whole by destroying the creativity of the actor. It was entitled The Crisis in the Theatre . 'The modern theatre' was being torn between puppet show and mystery, and 'fast losing whatever relevance it might have for contemporary man'. ⁴² In particular, it led to the severance of the relationship between Meyerhold and Komissarzhevskaya. As dramatists and theorists began to turn away from both naturalism and symbolism, there was a call 'for a return to classic principles', especially in Germany. This led to a ' neoclassic revival ', best demonstrated in the plays and theories of Paul Ernst (1891). The experimentation associated with this movement had been influenced by the writings of Simmel, and consequently came to influence Lukács (1911).
'Socialism in the Theatre' (1908);	Anatoly Lunacharsky (1873-1933) First People's Commissar of Education in Bolshevik Russia	Attacked the traditional 'bourgeois' theatre for its assumption that the tired worker wants only light entertainment. Theatre should deal with ideas in a way which will engage the common people. It should be a theatre of 'rapid action, major passions, rare contrasts, whole characters, powerful sufferings and lofty ecstasy ... noisy, rapid, glittering ... Its satire will strike one's cheeks loudly; its woes will make one sob. Its joy will make one forget oneself and dance; its villainy will be terrifying'. ⁴³ The classics were to be 'recaptured' for the people. Experimentation was also to be encouraged. In 1923, in response to directions from the Twelfth Party Congress, Lunacharsky called on Russian theatre to return to 'the spirit' of Ostrovsky, basing their drama on character study and 'realistic depictions of the concerns of everyday life'. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois (traditional) theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place; a bourgeois practice	The presentation of ideas in a way which would engage the common people	Doing: the practice of theatre Watching: spectators did not want just light entertainment but ideas
'An Apology for Theatricality'	Nicolay Evreinov (1879-1953)	Like Ivanov, 'Evreinov asserted the transformative power of theater, but he declined to put this power at the service of the masses ... the community of Evreinov's play [The Beautiful Despot 1905] was esoteric ... and adamantly hierarchical'. Although he aimed	A place; a complex practice	The exercise of power to transform life	Doing: the practice of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1908); The Theatre as Such (1912); The Theatre for Oneself (1915-17). ⁴⁵	Performer, historian, philosopher, psychologist, government official, teacher	at 'the complete theatricalization of everyday life', the power for this lay in the artist's will: 'an artist used his art to overpower his reluctant audience'. Art was 'an instrument of personal power' for Evreinov. ⁴⁶ The only way life could become theatre was for everyone to become artists. This was the seduction held out by the artist - that people could yield to the artist and so become 'theatricalized'. Evreinov founded the Ancient Theatre in 1907, devoted to the attempt to recover the theatrical consciousness of earlier period, as an antidote to realism. It specialised in the presentation of the drama of earlier period in conditions as close as possible to the original performance conditions. The theatre was not dramatic literature, but a totality : of drama, acting, staging, and spectator. In 'An Apology', he argued that theatricality was one of man's basic instincts. ⁴⁷ The basis of theatre is transformation , the desire to change, to be something other than oneself. 'Realism, a useless double of life, and symbolism, which subverts the direct joy of visual perception by emphasizing the internal, [were] both hostile to the true spirit of theatre'. ⁴⁸ In his books, Evreinov pushes the implications of his theory to its limits, calling for a recognition and embrace of the theatrical in life itself, thus re-introducing participation into the theatre. In the early days of the Bolshevik Revolution, he staged massive open-air recreations of major historical events with casts of thousands. ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: positive; functional			Watching: participatory
'Illustrators, Actors and Translators' (1908); 'Theatre and Literature' (1918); 'On Comedy' (1920); ⁵⁰ 'The New Theatre and the Old' (1922) ⁵¹	Luigi Pirandello (1867-1936) Italian playwright, founder of Teatro d'Arte (1925-1928)	Pirandello claimed that the written text was a completed artistic form and that performance was only an inferior 'scenic translation'. He castigated authors who claimed to write 'for the theatre' rather than 'for literature' for writing incomplete works, considering them to not be creative artists. Every complete work created a world 'unique in itself and beyond comparison'. ⁵² Nevertheless, Pirandello experimented boldly with theatrical techniques. ⁵³ Despite the implication that he saw his plays as literature, in Each in His Own Way (1924) he includes several spectator positions – an acknowledgement that spectators could not be taken en masse , or simply divided into the 'superior minority' and the 'crowd', and that many had an agenda when attending a play. Styan claims that Pirandello was the first playwright since Goldsmith in the C18th to encourage 'extra-dramatic address' in the form of 'a modest improvisational technique' in order to dramatize 'the spectator's uncertain sense of reality and illusion ... to make an audience self-conscious participators to the point of total confusion'. It was 'a trick to bridge a chasm between stage and audience' ⁵⁴ in his quest to examine 'the elusiveness of identity	A place for the performance of drama (plays); a place to see and be seen (or hide); an art	An attempt to bridge the gap between performers and spectators, to make spectators self-conscious and reflective about incongruities which they	Doing: art (literature) Showing: theatricality; breaking of conventions Watching: spectators were within the play as well in a variety of positions outside and

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		[and] the uncertainty of reality'.⁵⁵ He complained that critics who insisted on applying previous standards to new works would inevitably misunderstand them.⁵⁶ 'In the theatre, a work of art is no longer the work of an author ... but an act of life realized on stage from one moment to the next'.⁵⁷ Nevertheless, 'Art in general abstracts and concentrates; that is, it catches and represents only the essential and characteristic ideality of men and things' while 'Life is a continuous flow which we continually try to stop, to fix in established and determinate forms outside and inside of ourselves ... The forms in which we try to stop and fix this continuous flows are the concepts, the ideals, within which we want to keep coherent all the fictions we create, the condition and the status in which we try to establish ourselves'.⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatricality for its own sake View of Theatre: positive; functional		initially think are comic	each had their own agenda for being present
'Some Platitudes concerning Drama' (1909)	John Galsworthy (1867-1933) English playwright and novelist	Distinguishes two main paths for future English drama: the symbolist and the naturalist. He did not think they could be combined, and preferred the latter, arguing, like Zola, that the artist and the scientist were 'the only two impartial persons' in society. The artist should present the world in an undistorted way, leaving the public to draw its own moral. Character was more important than plot: 'a human being is the best plot there is'. The dramatist's task was basically 'to assemble interesting characters, set them in motion with a dominant idea, and record their actions and dialogue'.⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		Presentation of the world (the artist, like the scientist was an impartial observer of society)	Doing: drama
1909 saw the rise of the avant-garde futurist movement, initially in Italy, then soon after in Russia. While futurism was developing, other avant-garde experimental movements were arising elsewhere: dada in Zurich, expressionism in Germany, and formism in Poland. All challenged perceived problems in contemporary theatre in some way, often in ways that overlapped. Often these movements began in the field of art, coming to be applied to dramatists as they began to express similar kinds of ideas or in similar kinds of ways. For instance, expressionism began in art criticism and was subsequently applied to certain German dramatists who began 'to deal with material in highly subjective and often radically distorted ways'.⁶⁰ This movement peaked between 1918 and 1922, with few expressionist works appearing in Germany after 1923.⁶¹ Futurism, which originated in Italy in 1909, idealized war and machinery. Futurists argued that new forms had to be created for a new era, advocating a 'synthetic theatre', consisting of 'short, seemingly illogical dramatic pieces' involving mechanical action which appeared to go nowhere. They attempted to incorporate new electronic media, puppetry and the visual arts into theatre. They also believed that spectators should be confronted and antagonized, and argued against the separation of performers and spectators.⁶²
'Manifesto of Futurism' (1909); ⁶³	Filippo Tommaso Marinetti	Essential theorist. Called for 'a new art suited to the new century, dedicated to speed and to struggle, to the mob, the factory, and the machine'.⁶⁸ Theatre 'among all literary forms' could 'serve Futurism most effectively' by rejecting 'proven formulas and popular	A place; an art form; a practice with	Provocation	Doing: drama – a literary form

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Manifeste des auteurs dramatiques futuristes’ (1910); ‘The Pleasure of Being Boomed’ (1911);⁶⁴ ‘Il teatro di varietà’ (The Variety Theatre) (1913);⁶⁵ ‘Futurism and the Theatre’ (1913);⁶⁶ ‘Il teatro futurista sintetico’ (1915);⁶⁷ ‘Il teatro della sorpresa’ (1921).	(1876-1944) Italian theatre critic, futurist performer, lecturer and agitator, founder of the futurist Variety Theatre	success’ as well as traditional psychology, and instead working ‘to force the soul of the audience away from base everyday reality and to lift it into a blinding atmosphere of intellectual [and scientific and dynamic mechanical] intoxication’. This, of course, would be resisted by ‘smug, satisfied, traditionalist audiences’ – hence authors and actors must learn to enjoy being booed. ‘Il teatro di varietà’ denounced contemporary theatre, urging futurist dramatists to look to the variety theatre for inspiration and for an antidote to psychology, which he called body-madness (fisicofollia): ‘an exaltation of ‘action, heroism, life in the open air, dexterity, the authority of instinct and intuition’.⁶⁹ Variety theatre was immediate, practical, vital, inventive, fun to do and diverting to watch, iconoclastic, dynamic, instructive, a ‘school of cerebral subtlety, complication and synthesis’ in the way it brought disparate elements together, deflated the excesses of romanticism, was naturally anti-academic and was eccentric and extravagant. It was ‘the only theatre in which the public does not remain inert like a stupid onlooker, but noisily participates in the action [which] is carried on ... on the stage, in the boxes, and in the pit [and] continues at the end of the play’.⁷⁰ In fact, spectators were to be shocked and forced to act by smearing mud over a few seats ‘so that the spectator ... sticks to it and causes general hilarity’, or by selling the same seat ‘to ten people, which will result in jostling, bickering, and strife’, or by providing free seats to the ‘slightly mad’ so they can ‘provoke confusion’, or by sprinkling seats ‘with itching or sneezing powder’.⁷¹ ‘The Futurist theatre will be able to excite its audience, that is, make it forget the monotony of daily life, by sweeping it through a labyrinth of sensations imprinted on the most exacerbated originality and combines in unpredictable ways’ thereby creating ‘BETWEEN US AND THE CROWD A CURRENT OF CONFIDENCE RATHER THAN RESPECTFULNESS, in order to instil in our audiences the dynamic vivacity of a new futurist theatricality’.⁷² Form, colour, words and physical action was to be displayed and enjoyed for their own sake; tradition was to be actively destroyed, the spectator was to be kept amazed and surprised, as well as encouraged to collaborate by joining ‘noisily in the action, in the singing, accompanying the orchestra, communicating with the actors in surprising actions and bizarre dialogues’.⁷³ In 1915, he proposed a new kind of ‘synthetic’ drama, a compressed, compact form, lasting only a few minutes, which would reshape reality and challenge accepted logic.⁷⁴ This would be a kind of ‘gymnasium’ which would ‘train the spirit for life in the new world of speed and scientific progress’.	different genres		Watching: spectators were to be confronted and antagonized into action; artists were to expect to be booed.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Marinetti's ideas prompted other Italian theorists to consider how to implement futurism on stage: generally with an emphasis on 'electrical and mechanical magic'.⁷⁵ The futurists tended to be eclipsed by Pirandello and others after 1920. Marinetti's support of fascism provided 'clear evidence ... that avant-gardism was not necessarily synonymous with a progressive political stance'.⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-traditional theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
1910: Reinhardt's Sumurun, which experimented with the Japanese hanamichi staging opened in Berlin. It was 'an overwhelming box office success' although critical reaction was mixed, especially over whether the staging was distracting. ⁷⁷
The Theory of the Theatre (1910)	Clayton Hamilton (1881-1946) American critic; student of Matthews (1903)	'A play is a story devised to be presented by actors on a stage before an audience'.⁷⁸ It will necessarily be interpreted by actors, and must appeal to a heterogeneous audience. Hamilton agreed with Brunetière (1893) that drama was based on struggle, but went further to explain why this was necessary. According to Hamilton it was because of the necessity of playing to a crowd. The drama is the only art other than oratory and some forms of music which is specifically designed to appeal to a crowd, and a dramatist who despises the crowd will inevitably fail.⁷⁹ The only way to keep a heterogeneous crowd's attention was to provide clear distinctions between protagonists. Crowds tended to be partisan, and to appreciate appeals to the passions more readily than appeals to the intellect. They also preferred action to words, since actions more readily communicated themselves. Spectators were similar to crowds, except that they were likely to be even more heterogeneous. Playwriting is a process whereby a play is devised rather than written. Successful plays are always written with their spectator in mind and are always designed for performance. They contain a number of strategies for controlling the spectator. It is sheer good fortune that a play might also be good literature. The primary purpose of going to the theatre is for pleasure, not edification. We go to have an experience about ourselves. The dramatist 'in any period when the theatre is really alive [i.e. popular with spectators] is obliged to tell the people in the audience what they themselves have been thinking'.⁸⁰ Theatre is about shared communication between one side of the footlights and the other. It must therefore be about things the spectator knows. It works by making present, in a concentrated form, some aspect of life which can be recognized by a heterogeneous audience.⁸¹ Hamilton also discusses the 'four leading types of drama' (tragedy, melodrama, comedy and farce) and their	An industry; a venue for the presentation of drama	To tell spectators 'what they themselves have been thinking'; ⁸⁴ shared communication; enjoyment	Doing: drama: a performed art, an art of concentrating attention Watching: spectators share some of the characteristics of a crowd; people go to the theatre for enjoyment; theatre is necessarily conventional.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		characteristics, as well as the ‘modern social drama’ or ‘problem play’, which he considers a modern type of tragedy. All drama must be ‘a view of its time’.⁸² Social drama was impossible before the French Revolution and the resurgence of Romance, which ‘unsettled conservative views of the place of the individual within society’. Social drama plays out this struggle over the relationship between ‘the one and the many’.⁸³ Hamilton provides a theory by which the morality of such plays can be judged, prompted by the polarisation amongst critics over whether Ibsen was a ‘moral teacher’ or a corrupter. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive
‘New Criticism’ (1910); ‘Dramatic Criticism and the Theatre’ (1913)	Joel Elias Spingarn (1875-1939) American educator and literary critic	Influenced by Croce, Spingarn called for a rejection of all traditional rules, concepts of genres, moral judgments of art, history of themes. Every work should be approached as a fresh and individual attempt at expression, ‘governed by its own laws’, and with its own unity and form.⁸⁵ The emphasis on performance was ‘a confusion of aesthetics with cultural and social history’. Theatre conditions and theatre spectators had ‘no more relation to drama as an art than a history of publishing [had] to poetry’.⁸⁶ ‘Dramatic Criticism’ was a response to Walkley (1911), and focused upon the idea of spectator psychology (which he traced from Castelvetro, Diderot, Sarcey and Archer). True poets write to express their inner vision, irrespective of conventions and the possibilities of performance. Performance is ‘only one, and a very insignificant one, of all the influences that have gone to make up dramatic literature’.⁸⁷ As a consequence of this view, Spingarn considered the actor to be of little aesthetic concern. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-performance; anti-convention View of Theatre: ambivalent	A practice not an art; a place in which drama could be performed	Expression of a vision	Doing: drama (literature)
Spingarn and Matthews each articulated positions which had long been opposed, neither of which seemed to have any way of accommodating the other. They developed in America into two long-lasting opposing camps: drama as literature (performance is incidental) versus drama as essentially realised in performance.

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 333

² Scholz 1905, Gedanken zum Drama, Munich, p. 5; in Carlson 1984: 333.

³ Carlson 1984: 302

⁴ Symons 1909, Plays, Acting, and Music, p. 165; in Carlson 1984: 303.

-
- ⁵ Included in the 1911 edition of On the Art of the Theatre ; excerpt reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.139-144.
- ⁶ Reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 88-98.
- ⁷ Quoted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 390. Craig loved all theatre: farces, melodramas, music hall, variety, even the mutilated Shakespeare loathed by George Bernard Shaw (Gerould 2000: 390-1).
- ⁸ Brandt 1998: 138
- ⁹ Craig 1998/1911: 139
- ¹⁰ Craig 2008/1908: 88-98. Craig built and collected marionettes, setting up a museum of puppetry in Florence (Gerould 2000: 391).
- ¹¹ Carlson 1984: 304
- ¹² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 425
- ¹³ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 63
- ¹⁴ Sarrazac, Jean-Pierre. 2002. 'The Invention of "Theatricality": Rereading Bernard Dort and Roland Barthes'. SubStance 31 (2&3). 70
- ¹⁵ Craig 1998/1911: 141
- ¹⁶ Originally published in Colored American Magazine Vol 9(4) 1905, pp 571-5; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 71-74.
- ¹⁷ Krasner 2008: 71
- ¹⁸ Walker 2008/1905: 72
- ¹⁹ Plekhanov 1953, 'Historical Materialism and Art', trans. Eric Hartley, in Art and Social Life, London, p. 56; in Carlson 1984: 327.
- ²⁰ Carlson 1984: 327-8
- ²¹ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 319
- ²² Carlson 1984: 319-322
- ²³ Hankin 1912, Dramatic Works, New York, Vol. 3, pp. 120-121; in Carlson 1984: 308.
- ²⁴ Synge 1935, The Complete Works, New York, p. 4; in Carlson 1984: 308.
- ²⁵ Cited in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.18.
- ²⁶ Quoted in Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34. 6.
- ²⁷ Sologub 1977/1908, 'The Theatre of One Will', trans. Daniel Gerould, Drama Review Vol. 21(4).
- ²⁸ Schiller considered these theorists 'sentimental poets, vainly attempting to create a naïve consciousness,' through a view of such abstraction that it could never have had mass appeal (Carlson 1984: 315).
- ²⁹ Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371. 365
- ³⁰ Sologub 1977/1908: 91
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 315
- ³² Sologub 1977/1908: 94
- ³³ Moeller-Sally 1998: 355

-
- ³⁴ Moeller-Sally 1998: 366-7
³⁵ Sologub 1977/1908: 91
³⁶ Moeller-Sally 1998: 367
³⁷ Sologub 1977/1908
³⁸ Sologub 1977/1908
³⁹ Moeller-Sally 1998: 368-9
⁴⁰ Sologub 1977/1908: 87
⁴¹ Bely 1981, 'Theatre and Modern Drama', trans. Laurence Senelick, in Russian Dramatic Theory from Pushkin to the Soviets, Austin, pp. 158-60; in Carlson 1984: 321.
⁴² Carlson 1984: 323
⁴³ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 354
⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 358
⁴⁵ Major chapters of these last two books were combined for an English translation entitled The Theatre in Life (1927) (Carlson 1984: 326).
⁴⁶ Moeller-Sally 1998: 361-70
⁴⁷ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1995. 'Introduction: theatricality: a key concept in theatre and cultural studies'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 85-90.
⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 326
⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 355
⁵⁰ Originally a lecture, first published in 1908, then substantially revised by Pirandello before republishing in 1920; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 139-143.
⁵¹ Although Pirandello's 'most extended and best-known critical essay' was his 1908 response to Croce, 'L'Umorismo' [Humour], his most important expression of his position on theatre occurs in these two essays (Carlson 1984: 370).
⁵² Pirandello in H.M. Block and Herman Salinger 1960, The Creative Vision, New York, pp. 111-112, 127; in Carlson 1984: 370.
⁵³ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 458
⁵⁴ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 156-7
⁵⁵ Krasner 2008: 139
⁵⁶ Carlson 1984: 370
⁵⁷ Pirandello 1908 quoted in Bentley, Eric. 1986/1946. The Pirandello Commentaries. Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press. 98.
⁵⁸ Pirandello 2008/1920: 143, 141
⁵⁹ Galsworthy 1912, The Inn of Tranquillity, New York, p. 190-201; in Carlson 1984: 307.
⁶⁰ Carlson 1984: 347
⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 351
⁶² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 446
⁶³ First published in Figaro, 20 February, 1909; republished in Marinetti: Selected Writings, trans. R.W. Flint, New York, 1972.
⁶⁴ A rewrite of 'Manifeste des auteurs', published in Le futurisme in 1911 (Carlson 1984: 339).
⁶⁵ This essay was reproduced in abridged form in the London Daily Mail and in Craig's journal Masks almost immediately after its appearance (Carlson 1984: 340).
⁶⁶ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 111-115.

-
- ⁶⁷ Written with Emilio Settemelli and Bruno Corra; published as 'The Futurist Synthetic Theatre' in Marinetti: Selected Writings, New York 1972; excerpt reprinted in Brandt 1998: 177-181.
- ⁶⁸ Carlson 1984: 339
- ⁶⁹ Marinetti 1972, 'The Variety Theatre', in Marinetti: Selected Writings, New York 1972, p. 120; in Carlson 1984: 340.
- ⁷⁰ Marinetti 2008/1913: 112
- ⁷¹ Marinetti 1913, quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 42
- ⁷² Marinetti 1998/1915: 181
- ⁷³ Marinetti 1972/1913, 'The Variety Theatre' in Selected Writings, ed. And trans. R.W. Flint, NY, Farrar, Straus and Giroux; reprinted in Gerould 2000: 420-426, p. 422. Meyerhold, who met Marinetti in Paris in 1913, remarked that Marinetti was merely reinforcing the 'unhappy tradition' of anarchy in Italian theatre (Carlson 1984: 340).
- ⁷⁴ He suggested reducing 'the whole of Shakespeare to a single act' and his own farces 'to a single phrase ... what?' (Marinetti 2008/1913: 114, 115n7).
- ⁷⁵ Carlson 1984: 342
- ⁷⁶ Brandt 1998: 176
- ⁷⁷ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 65
- ⁷⁸ Hamilton, Clayton. 1910. The Theory of the Theatre and Other Principles of Dramatic Criticism. New York: Henry Holt and Company.³
- ⁷⁹ Hamilton 1910: 30, 49
- ⁸⁰ Hamilton 1910: 139
- ⁸¹ Hamilton 1910: 217
- ⁸² Hamilton 1910: 133
- ⁸³ Hamilton 1910: 138-9
- ⁸⁴ Hamilton 1910: 39
- ⁸⁵ Spingarn 1931, Creative Criticism, New York, p. 22; in Carlson 1984: 311.
- ⁸⁶ Carlson 1984: 312
- ⁸⁷ Spingarn 1931, Creative Criticism, New York, p. 76; in Carlson 1984: 313.

Table 23/51: Theories of Theatre 1911-1917

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Preface to Tragedy of Nan (1911)	John Masfield (1878-1967) English poet & playwright	An attempt to combine both symbolism and naturalism. Tragedy was 'a vision into the heart of life' which led the masses 'to a passionate knowledge of things exulting and eternal'. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		To lead the masses to knowledge	Doing: tragedy
'Romance and the Modern Stage' (1911)	Edward Lord Dunsany (1878-1957) Irish writer, poet & dramatist	Also championed symbolist drama; called for a return of 'poetic vision' to the theatre to 'build new worlds for the fancy, for the spirit as much as the body needs sometimes a change of scenery'. ² Poets will return simplicity and beauty to the world, which will equip us better to deal with our problems, and leave a lasting inheritance of romance and song. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-symbolist drama View of Theatre: positive; functional		To build new worlds for the fancy; education	Doing: drama (poetry)
'Criticism and Croce' (1911)	A.B. Walkley (1855-1926) English critic	A refutation of Spingarn's position. The dramatist is more restricted than any other artist because he must work under particular performance conditions. Not only can actors never coincide exactly with his ideas, but he is also limited 'by the peculiar psychology of the crowd he addresses'. ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – performance View of Theatre: positive		Performance	Doing: drama a performative art) Watching: the spectator limits the freedom of the dramatist
Preface to L'armée dans la ville (1911)	Jules Romains (1885-1972) French dramatist	Supported populist drama for both sociological and philosophical reasons. Considered that the 'collective' expressed Bergson's concept of élan vital more clearly than did the individual. Recognized theatre as a group activity: the group was the basis of all drama, both in its depictions on stage and in its addressee, the spectator. He coined the term unanimité for works that focused upon the group: 'What is a scene but the life of a precarious, emotional group? An act is a filiation of groups'. ⁴ The drama of the future was to both depict the crowd (preferably in verse) and address the crowd, depicting subjects of mass appeal on a proper stage, in a language suited to raise 'the spirits of a whole people'. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – future drama View of Theatre: positive		To depict society in ways which lifted the spirits of the people	Doing: drama – a group activity Showing: subjects of mass appeal Watching: collaborative – a group activity
A History of	Georg Lukács	As a student, Lukács helped to found the Thalia, a theatre which sought to bring modern	A place for	Entertainment	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the Development of Modern Drama (1911); ‘Metaphysik der Tragödie’ (1911); The Sociology of Modern Drama (1914); Die Theorie des Romans (1916); Mein Weg zu Marx (1933); ‘Willi Bredels Romane’ (1931); ‘Reportage oder Gestaltung’ (1932); Aus der Not eine Tugend ’ (1932); ⁶ ‘‘Grösse und Verfall’ des Expressionismus’ (1933); ‘Es geht um	(1885-1971) Hungarian Marxist literary critic and advocate of realism	drama to the working class. He was later strongly influenced by Simmel and Max Weber. He became a member of the Communist Party in 1918. In ‘Zur Soziologie’, he picks up the theme of modern alienation described by Simmel, approaching drama from a sociological and historical point of view. ‘The drama manifests clearly the tensions of bourgeois culture in general The modern dramatist shares the alienation of all modern artists, cut off from the shared body of belief that bound him to his public in the precapitalist period’. ⁷ In theatrical art this has led to the separation of drama and theatre: drama has become didactic and biased, a ‘ground for the struggle of classes’, a means for the bourgeoisie ‘to inspire, to encourage, to exhort, to attack, and to teach’. Under these terms, drama has ceased to be an art, and has withdrawn to the printed page, to literature. Theatre, in the meantime, has turned to ‘mindless entertainment’. Both theatre and drama have lost any trace of ‘the festive, the religious, or even at the least some sort of religious feeling’. This had provided a mythology, a sense of the heroic. Without these, modern drama has been reduced to the material of daily life, which is ‘no longer dramatic’ because it does not possess ‘the possibility of mixing the timeless poetic and the sensations of the moment in a naïve synthesis’ in which an agreed upon ethical system is expressed in aesthetic terms. ‘When mythology is absent ... the basis on which everything must be justified is character’, but character cannot offer a ‘vital center’ because it is a ‘shifting, unstable thing’. Consequently, man’s struggle becomes reduced to a defense of individuality, a defense which is not based on any positive ethical structure, and man ‘drifts towards isolation’. This is expressed in dialogue which is increasingly ‘fragmented, allusive, impressionistic’, even pathological. ‘The subjectivity of the characters pervades the entire world of the play’ which becomes reduced to simply ‘a point of view’. Lukács rejected the modern genre of tragicomedy, which reduced tragedy ‘to the level of the banal and trivial’ or ‘distorted into grotesquery’. The cure for this disastrous situation, however, must be found in life rather than in art. An ‘ethical centre’ which is shared by dramatists and their public needs to be rediscovered. ⁸ Lukács’ views on tragedy were influenced by the neo-classic dramatists Ernst, Lublinski and Scholz as well as Kant and Neo-Platonism. Tragedy was a ‘form-creating’ transcendent experience; its essence was self-fulfillment. It expressed the tension between the empirical world of the everyday and ‘the crystalline vision of real life, uncompromised and totally fulfilled’. His later work could be seen as a challenge to the Brechtian view of	the performance of drama; a social and historical art; a form of entertainment	; but ideally to generate a sense of festive or religious feeling	Showing: the reconciliation of contradiction

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
den Realismus' (1938); Wider den missverstandenen Realismus (1958); Festschrift (1966)		theatre. The proletariat should produce 'realist' literature, with characters which combined the particular and the general to produce a universal 'type' illustrative of the universal laws of society. He believed that Brecht (and the novelist Ernst Ottwalt q.v. 1932), in their attempt to break away from the psychological, subjective tradition of bourgeois drama, had concentrated too much on objective fact and thereby lost 'the dialectical interaction of subjectivity and formal elements'.⁹ These comments launched 'a major theoretical debate within Marxist criticism' which has echoed through to the present. Lukács' position was essentially that art could unite contradictions to express an essential 'totality'. This was different to Brecht's position. Lukács saw Brecht's stress on contradiction not as Marxism but as 'a disguised bourgeois expression of meaninglessness ... common in twentieth-century decadent art'. Lukács found Russian socialist realism a support for his position after 1933. He agreed with their condemnation of nonrealistic or formalistic experimentation. His 1933 article condemned expressionism as a decadent, regressive form associated with the development of Fascism. Marxist art had an essential obligation to 'give shape to reality and to a world of interrelationships'.¹⁰ (Brecht wrote several responses to this debate but declined to submit them for publication). In 1958, Lukács joined the debate over the proper function of drama, this time championing realism against 'modernism', which he believed depicted man as 'solitary, asocial, unable to enter into relationships with other human beings' in a directionless world, a position epitomised by Kafka, the early Brecht, and 'the pretentious, empty experimentalism of Ionesco'.¹¹ His position was challenged by Theodor Adorno (1958), who was, in turn, challenged by Hochhuth (1963) in Lukács' Festschrift. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-modern drama View of Theatre: ambivalent
'Der Schauspieler und die Wirklichkeit' (1912); 'Zur Philosophie des Schauspielers'	Georg Simmel (1858-1918) German sociologist	Simmel believed that Marx's description of the commodity fetish was only a particular case of a general 'tragedy of culture' which had produced the unsolvable modern condition of alienation. The tragedy involved the replacement of the subjective by the objective, and the replacement of 'a culture of persons' by 'a culture of things'. He took issue with 'two popular misconceptions of the art of acting: that it attempts to reproduce reality, and that it serves only as an illustration of a poetic text'. He suggested as an axiom that 'the dramatic arts as such transcend both poetry and reality'. The dramatic actor, like other artists including the poet, 'creates within himself a complete unity with	A social and cultural institution	The translation of a text into performance; to create a work of art through performance	Doing: drama - an artistic form expressed through performance Showing: a unity between

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		its unique laws'. His task is 'not to transform the dramatic work into reality' but to transform reality itself into a work of art through the medium of the text. ¹² True acting is 'an expression of the primary artistic energy of the human soul, which assimilates both the poetic art and reality into one living process'. ¹³ Theatre as an artistic form was about 'the translation of a 'one-dimensional end product (the text) into the 'visible, three dimensional reality' of actual performance'. ¹⁴ Simmel was also a pioneer in the sociology of music. Art music (like art in general) was distinguished from musical (or theatrical) activities not by anything intrinsically aesthetic but because its production was governed by a system of rules. Individuals become familiar with the rules governing artistic expression in their society through the processes of socialization. Art is therefore 'a highly developed articulation of social processes' and can be studied as such. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive			poetry and reality
'Excursus on the Ritual Forms Preserved in Greek Tragedy' (1912); The Classical Tradition in Poetry (1927).	Gilbert Murray (1866-1957) English anthropologist	Drew on the work of Sir James Frazer (The Golden Bough) to identify the 'ritual structure' of death and rebirth which he claimed lay beneath all Greek tragedy. Although this view was dismissed by theatre scholars, it has persisted to the present day. ¹⁶ Murray continued to consider tragedy in terms of mythology. The 'vibrations of ancient myth' were the primary source of tragic pleasure, reinforced by 'beauty of form in the execution'. ¹⁷ The feeling of catharsis is much more than the reconciliation of conflicting impulses within ourselves, as Richards suggested, but an expiation: 'the sins he [the hero] expiates are really ours'. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		Expiation	Doing: drama (tragedy) (performance of ritual) Showing: myth Watching: catharsis
'A Slap in the Face of Public Taste' (1912); 'Theatre, Cinematography, Futurism' (1913)	Vladimir Mayakovsky (1893-1930) Russian futurist	'Slap' was the first and most famous manifesto of Russian futurism, written by Mayakovsky and three others. It urged the overthrow of 'Pushkin, Dostoyevsky, Tolstoy, et al. , et al. ' and a disdain for 'fame and reputation'. ¹⁹ Mayakovsky condemned realism as a 'sterile path' for theatre. Realism should be left to the cinema. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: positive	An art form		Doing: drama Showing: a view of the future Watching: (a threatened position)
'On stage composition'	Vasilii Kandinskii	"Every work of art and every one of the individual means belonging to that work produces in every man without exception a vibration that is at bottom identical to that of		Evocation of response in	Doing: art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1912)	(1866-1944) Russian expressionist painter and art theorist	the artist”’. However, ‘[t]his power to evoke an identical response in every member of the spectator was not to be wielded frivolously, but rather with the aim of “the progressive refinement of the soul”’. ²⁰ Moeller-Sally says that ‘this idea that art should forge a community of feeling and belief’ was ‘a tradition of Russian culture’, apparent in artists from Gogol and Tolstoy to Kandinskii. It encouraged the taking up of the ideas of Wagner in Russia, and influenced Ivanov, Evreinov and Sologub in varying degrees. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-communal theatre View of Theatre: functional		order to refine the soul and forge a sense of community between artist and spectator
Der Bettler (1912)	Reinhard Sorge (1892-1916) German expressionist dramatist	The first fully developed example of German expressionism, the play features a discussion between two abstract figures (the Poet and the Son) about ‘a new drama’ which would liberate mankind. It would have no plot. It would be ‘filled by eternal relations’. ²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-expressionism View of Theatre: positive; functional		Liberation	Doing: drama
Essay in Debating the Theatre (1912); The Art of the Actor and the Theory of Stanislavski (1916)	Fyodor Komissarzhevsky (1882-1954) Theatre director	Defended the art of acting as a creative art, arguing that both realism and convention reduced the actor to a mere imitator, either of physical actions (convention) or psychological states (realism). ²³ Komissarzhevsky praised Stanislavski for his work on the inner psychology of a character, which he thought helpful to the creative actor, but in the hands of the uncreative actor, turned ‘genuine living experience into reasoned simulation’. (Stanislavski was to come to the same conclusion himself and turn in the 1930’s to his ‘method of physical actions’ or method acting). Komissarzhevsky argued for a synthesis between the two approaches, as well as for a theatre in which all the arts united to ‘convey simultaneously the same feelings and ideas to the spectator’. He called for a ‘universal actor,’ one who could master all the means of expression, for it was the actor who accomplished the unification. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conventional/realism View of Theatre: positive	A place; a cultural institution or practice	To convey feelings and ideas	Doing: acting as a creative art Showing: a unification of all the arts through the performer
‘Rejecting the Theatre’ (1912)	Yuli Aikhenwald (1872-1928) Russian literary critic and theatre reviewer	A leading counterstatement to Meyerhold’s defense of theatricalism; essentially an elaboration of the argument made by Bryusov in 1908 (which Aikhenwald himself did not appear to believe): ‘the conventionalized theatre, by denying the art of the actor, runs the risk of eventually eliminating the stage itself, since intellectual abstraction can as easily be conjured up in the mind of the intelligent reader’. Drama was a hybrid of other arts, and therefore inferior to them. It is essentially literary. Stage productions were inferior to those created in the imagination of the discriminating reader, for the benefit of an illiterate or semi-literate public. ²⁴	A place	Performed because of the limits of a semi-literate public	Doing: drama – a hybrid art better considered as literature Showing: never as good as what can be

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-performance/anti-theatricalism View of Theatre: ambivalent			imagined Watching: (reading)
““Psychical Distance” as a Factor in Art and an Aesthetic Principle’ (1912)	Edward Bullough (1880-1934) British philosopher	The ‘first – and still only systematic – attempt to explain the phenomenon’ of distance . ²⁵ Bullough argued that there was a notable difference between the perceiving during the aesthetic experience and otherwise, and that aesthetic perception was filtered: ‘cleared of the practical, concrete nature of its appeal’ by the mechanism of distance . ²⁶ It was distance which made us realise the characters in a play as fictional, not vice versa (as commonly supposed): ‘Events and characters of the drama ... appeal to us like persons and incidents of normal experience, except that that side of their appeal, which would usually affect us in a directly personal manner, is held in abeyance. This difference ... is generally explained by reference to the knowledge that the characters and situations are “unreal”, imaginary ... But, as a matter of fact, the “assumption” upon which the imaginative emotional reactions is based is not necessarily the condition, but ... the consequence, of Distance: that is to say, the converse of the reason usually stated ... Distance, by changing our relation to the characters, renders them seemingly fictitious, not that the fictitiousness of the characters alters our feelings toward them’. ²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A seeing place in which distance is used to change the spectator’s relation to what they see	Affect	Doing: art Watching: distance allows us to understand theatre as fiction
‘Letter on the Theatre’ (1913)	Leonid Andreyev (1871-1919) Experimental dramatist	A similar, though less radical position to Aikhenwald which reveals a similar distrust of traditional theatre. He proposed a theatre of ‘panpsyche’ which renounced action and spectacle and focused on ‘human thought, with all its sufferings, joys, and struggles’. Instead of trying to overcome the actor through etherealizing reality, this theatre would be static, depicting instead ‘the quiet and external immobility of living experience’. ²⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realist (traditional) theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent	An art form	Varied according to type	Doing: experimental drama
‘Essai de rénovation dramatique’ (1913); Souvenirs du Vieux Colombiers	Jacques Copeau (1879-1949) French theatre director and theatre critic; established the Théâtre Vieux	Copeau promoted text-oriented theatre. He insisted on high standards in production, and his theories were to influence a generation of French theatre directors. ²⁹ Copeau had often declared that he was ‘an enemy of abstract theorizing’, ³⁰ especially when it ‘ a priori and systematically exclude[d] from dramatic art any aspect of human truth, any ambition towards beauty’. ³¹ He deplored modern theatre which he saw as given over to ‘commercialism, cheap sensationalism and exhibitionism, ignorance, indifference and lack of discipline’ which debased both theatre and its public. ³² [Copeau’s criticism]	An ongoing process; communion	To restore beauty	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: bare boards (focus on the text) Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1931)	Colombier in 1913.	suggests that, as always, there were two different kinds of theatre going on at the time, one recognized by theorists, and the other produced by theatre practitioners for the general public]. Copeau proposed ‘a new theatre’, one built ‘on absolutely solid foundations’ which could be a centre for actors, authors and spectators ‘who are possessed by the desire to restore beauty to the scenic spectacle’.³³ This was to be done in a way which was quite different to contemporary practices, both commercial and avant-garde, and which the first avant-garde movement of the C20th (futurism) sharply opposed. There was to be a ‘primacy of the text’, a ‘veneration of the classics’ as models for the present, an ‘emphasis on the actor’ (and demotion of the director), and a ‘disencumbering of the stage’ – ‘the famous tréteau nu (bare boards) which would allow the actor and author to present the text without ‘theatrical’ intrusion. Nevertheless, the text should ‘demand’ theatricalization,³⁴ but the focus should be on the play rather than its ‘trappings’.³⁵ This was to be achieved by the use of a mise en scène by which he meant ‘the sketch of a dramatic action. That is, the collaboration of movement, of gesture, and of pose, the accord of facial expression, speech and silence; it is the totality of the spectacle on stage which stems from a single idea which it sketches, orders, and harmonizes. The director develops a hidden but visible string with the actors – an alternately sensitive and relative relationship, the absence of which would cause the drama to lose the essence of its expression even if it were performed by actors of outstanding quality’.³⁶ Copeau focused strongly on training the actor, using the text, improvisations, ensemble acting, mask work and the idea of theatre as ‘communion’ based on his study of Japanese theatre which he saw as ‘the strictest [form] that we know and demands exceptional technical skills from the actors’.³⁷ He tried to find ways to break down the barrier between spectator and actor, and designed his theatre as a bare stage, using simple screens and lighting effects to establish settings. He believed that theatre was ‘an ongoing process rather than a finished work’, something Wilson and Goldfarb consider ‘his greatest contribution to modern drama’ and one taken up by the contemporary director Robert Lepage. He took his company to New York in 1917, giving two seasons of performances, and many lectures on his theories of drama. These were subsequently to have an enormous influence on the development of American post-war theatre.³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –theatre as process View of Theatre: functional			communion between performers and spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Epilogue to the Actor (1913); 'Theater und anderes' (Theatre and Change) (1918)	Paul Kornfeld (1889-1942) German expressionist playwright	Condemned realism, naturalism and method acting (where actors 'visit bars to see how people act when they are drunk'). The actor should not 'be ashamed of the fact that he is acting [nor] deny the theatre or try to feign reality'. ³⁹ The play should 'artificially stimulate' the emotional expression of the actor, which the actor then externalises. ⁴⁰ In 1918, Kornfeld drew a distinction between 'old' drama which was based on man's character as a 'sum of attributes and abilities, ruled by a psychological causality', and the 'new' drama of the soul, which 'argues that man is no mechanism, that conscious subjectivity is destructive, and that psychological causality is as unimportant as material'. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism, naturalism and method acting View of Theatre: ambivalent	An art form in itself; a practice	An exploration of inner life	Doing: Drama; acting as an art of feigning
The Tragic Sense of Life (1913)	Miguel de Unamuno (1864-1936) Spanish philosopher and playwright	Unamuno juxtaposed the human desire for immortality against the equally human serious doubt that it could be achieved, arguing that tragedy arises from the conflict between the two. His idea was to have considerable influence on existentialist playwrights, although his plays received few productions owing to the political climate in Spain. ⁴² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		To explore the relationship between the desire for immortality and human mortality	Doing: tragedy
'A Declaration about the Futurist Theatre' (1914)	Vadim Shershenevich (1893-1942) Russian Futurist critic	An attack on both Stanislavski and Meyerhold for 'repressing the actor'. The movement of the actor was 'the true basis of theatre'. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realist/method acting techniques View of Theatre: positive	An art of performance	Creating theatre	Doing: performance; acting
'Versuch eines zukunfftigen Dramas' (1914); 'Zur jüngsten Dichtung'	Kurt Pinthus (1886-1975) German expressionist	The aim was no longer the development of plot or character, but in the expression of 'a soul swollen with tragedy' in terms which would be universally recognized. ⁴⁴		Expression of the universal inner man	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1915)		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-expressionism View of Theatre: positive
Introduction to English translation of Brunetière's Law of the Drama (1914)	Henry Arthur Jones (1851-1929) English Dramatist	True drama must always involve opposition; our recognition of such conflict as the basis of life is what makes drama interesting to us. ⁴⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To show conflict as the basis of life	Doing: playwrighting
How To See A Play (1914)	Richard Francis Burton (1861-1940) American writer and playgoer	Room should be made in 'the modern educational scheme' for 'some training in intelligent playgoing ... Surely, some knowledge in a field so broad and humanly appealing, both for legitimate enjoyment of the individual and in view of his obligations to fellow man, is of equal moment to a knowledge of the chemical effects of hydrochloric acid upon marble, or of the working of a table of logarithms. These last are less involved in the living of a normal human being'. Burton considered his idea marked 'a revolution in thought'. ⁴⁶ The book takes seriously Colley Cobber's claim that bad audiences produce bad theatre and provides training and advice to prepare theatre goers for more intelligent viewing. To this end, Burton provides a potted history of mostly English theatre, and a break-down of the structure of a play and the pitfalls of playwrighting and performance. Since the spectators is 'the necessary coadjutor with the player and playwright in theatre success' he can 'also become an adept in his part of the co-operative result.' Indeed, it is an 'obligation of the theatre-goer to insist on sound plays', one which has been too long overlooked. ⁴⁷ Such 'intelligent cooperation is the open sesame' to better theatre and to better box-office. ⁴⁸ Burton sees the theatre as a participatory activity which provides cultural opportunities to all involved: it is a 'democratic mode of story-telling, attracting vast number of hearers and universally popular'. ⁴⁹ Burton encourages theatre-goers (particularly American spectators) to express their disapproval of bad plays as audibly as they express their approval e.g. through hissing. Otherwise, spectators who don't know any better will applaud and a bad play will continue on unaware that the better spectators have disapproved of it and simply stopped coming, and advised their friends to stay away as well. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place; a participatory art	Enjoyment; enlightenment	Watching: enhanced by training; intelligent spectators should make their disapproval as well as their approval known
After 1914, a 'new stagecraft' movement appeared in America, in which European experimental ideas came to be championed by a group of American directors, designers and critics, led by Sheldon Cheney. ⁵⁰

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Zum Phänomen des Tragischen’ (1915) ⁵¹	Max Scheler (1874-1928) German phenomenologist, social philosopher and sociologist of knowledge	A student of the phenomenological philosopher, Husserl. Husserl was concerned with the process of cognition – ‘the determination of what exists on the basis of what appears’. Scheler’s focus was on the emotive dimension of consciousness. His value in terms of the theatre (and possibly politics) was his recognition that the way the individual relates to the world, and vice versa, is necessarily partial. Tragedy arises out of these partial perspectives and the values on which they are based. Tragedy portrays the ‘make-up of the cognitive world – its associations, powers and beliefs’ and the ‘disjunctures’ in these, and the struggle of participants to do their best to resist a tragic outcome. It is this resistance which produces the ‘specific tragic grief and tragic sympathy’ in the spectator, as well as the peace which comes at the resolution. ⁵² Scheler identifies the partial perspective which is only ever available to any spectator other than God, but attributes this problem to the character, rather than to audience members or theorist Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		To portray the ‘make-up of the cognitive world’ through the struggle of individual characters	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy) Watching: sympathy and peace is produced by watching characters with partial perspective struggle
‘Das Theater von Morgen’ (1916); Preface to Der Sohn (1916); ‘Über der Tragische’ (1921)	Walter Hasenclever (1890-1940) German expressionist playwright	Hasenclever was one of the first German expressionist playwrights. For him, the theatre was not only a means of expressing the inner man, but ‘a medium between philosophy and life’ that seeks to expose ‘the unexpressed schism between what exists and what man needs’. ⁵³ Hasenclever, like many other expressionists, denounced the war and called ‘for a new world order based on brotherhood and a belief in the fundamental goodness of man’. ⁵⁴ He saw his play Der Sohn as a political drama, which portrayed ‘the struggle of the spirit against reality [teaching] that we are all sons, but [we were also] brothers’. His 1916 play Antigone proposed love as the only way to achieve happiness, but love could not flourish until immoral, authoritarian rulers were deposed, ⁵⁵ thus tying individual happiness directly to forms of government. Hasenclever located the conflict which creates tragedy in the relationship between ‘the world as it exists and men who must live in it’, a conflict which comes about because of the ‘tragedy’ of perception : ‘All perception is tragic: it is a reflection of human forms on the boundaries of the possible. When these bounds are surpassed, thought is surpassed; causality is neutralized; the formulas of logic no longer apply’. ⁵⁶ This conception of perception and the idea of the collapse of causality and logic would reappear in Ionesco and other ‘absurdist’. ⁵⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional	A medium of expression	To expose the tragedy of perception	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy) Showing: the gap between what exists and what man needs;
‘Über Shakespeares	Oskar Walzel (1864-1944)	Introduced a strictly formal analysis of theatre, based on the work of Dilthey and the art historian Heinrich Wölfflin (1864-1945). Wölfflin’s contrast of Renaissance and baroque		Aesthetic	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
dramatische Baukunst' (1916); Gehalt und Gestalt in Kunstwerk des Dichters (1923)	German critic	art on the basis of formal oppositions (line/colour, surface/depth, closed form/open form, multiplicity/unity and clarity/vagueness) gave Walzel conceptual tools which subsequently became part of the standard critical approach for literary theorists. Open (atectonic) versus closed (tectonic) form became the dominant polarity in dramatic theory, but the others were also used, including line versus colour (line-based versus scene-based dramaturgy). ⁵⁸ Walzel's 1923 book challenged the traditional emphasis on content (Gehalt) by showing that content was related to and inter-related with structure (Gestalt). ⁵⁹ Walzel saw the process of literary history as a series of reversals between opposing Gestalten (attempts at structuring). For example, the closed (tectonic) form (gestalt) of scientific naturalism was, at the time, giving way to various open (atectonic) forms such as expressionism . ⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
1917 saw the rise of the Bolsheviks to power in Russia, although it took another decade before a distinct shift towards Marxism became apparent in dramatic theory. In the meantime, the party drew on the populist ideas of Belinsky, Rousseau, Wagner and Rolland, and the comments of Marx and Engels on Franz von Sickingen. The dominant approach remained antirealist, encouraged by the criticisms of 'bourgeois' realism by the first People's Commissar of Education, Anatoly Lunacharsky (1908), although eventually a theory of realism and political comment developed. The State Exemplary Theatre (founded 1919) took an experimental approach to the classics, while the Proletarian Cultural Educational Organization (Proletcult), headed by Alexander Bogdanov, completely rejected the past, aiming instead at the creation of a 'totally new culture of the workers'. What form this should take was the subject of considerable debate. Some theorists drew on Ivanov and Appia, others on Rolland and Rousseau and the models of the great festivals of the French Revolution. Evreinov and director Max Reinhardt staged huge open-air experimental recreations of major historical events with casts of thousands.⁶¹ Meyerhold (1904) was a significant supporter of the new proletarian theatre in his role as head of the national Theatre Department in Moscow after 1920. It was a 'remarkable period' of experimentation which produced great directors: Reinhardt, Tairov (1921), Evreinov (1908), Yevgeny Vakhtangov and Komissarzhevsky (1912), as well as Meyerhold.
'What We Stand For' (1917); The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft	Sheldon Cheney (1886-1980) American supporter of 'new stagecraft', theatre critic and historian	The introduction of European experimental ideas into America under the term 'new stagecraft'. Commercialism, naturalism and the star system were denounced. A 'new race of artist-directors' would produce plays, not as ends in themselves, but 'as contributions to a larger unity, a synthesis or harmony of all the lesser arts – a newer, truer art of the theatre'. ⁶² In his 1929/30 book, Cheney ventures an outline of a theory of the arts of the theatre, one which considers the nature of the appeal that the stage performance makes to a spectator . He bases his suggestions on what is known about the individual's response to any sort of art. Art is defined as 'a product of perceptive experience on the artist's part and a source of aesthetic experience to the beholder'. ⁶³ Thus, art is about an emotional experience , which Cheney considers 'important in its own kind'; it is not about a lesson, a	A place for seeing	Generating an emotional and aesthetic experience	Doing: stagecraft - a synthesis of all 'lesser' arts; a special way of seeing, expressed in a variety of media Showing: a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1929; 1930).		reminder, diversion or enlightenment (although any of these things might come about as a result of the experience of art). Art is also made. It is not nature, and this is what distinguishes it from other things we might consider beautiful. Art has an elusive quality, which, for want of a better word, could be considered form: ‘the sum of the unexplained and unchartable elements that evoke aesthetic response in the beholder’.⁶⁴ Cheney also believed that the theatre shared in ‘the spirit’ of the times, yet, surprisingly, when the spirit of the times was democratic, no notable or lasting theatre was produced. He particularly believed that the ‘outward clash and fevered excitement’ of revolution was ‘no congenial environment for art ... Man’s creative facilities ... atrophy in the red glare of continuous battle’.⁶⁵ The only aspect of democracy which had clearly appeared with the democratic spirit was in the audience, which would itself ‘perform’ if it was unhappy with what was presented or what it cost.⁶⁶ Cheney dates the beginning of modern theatre at 1900, with the rise of the director, who has restored theatricality to theatre by unifying its conglomerate parts into one overall action, thus allowing it to be autonomous as an art form. Purpose of Theorist: analysis; polemic – pro-stagecraft as a synthetic art View of Theatre: positive			unity from the flux of life Watching: art is an emotional experience which satisfies ‘aesthetic hunger’;⁶⁷ the spectator “gives”.⁶⁸ Spectators would ‘perform’ if they were unhappy with what was presented
The Social Significance of Modern Drama (1917) ⁶⁹	Emma Goldman (1869-1940) Russian socialist	Art can be seen as having two functions: art for art’s sake and art as the mirror of life. In the former, the artist requires ‘an attitude of aloofness toward ... the ebb and tide of life’ so he can conjure ‘beautiful forms’.⁷⁰ Modern drama, however, follows the latter: the mirror of life. The artist is immersed in life. It is his role to raise the pressing social questions of the day. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		To raise the pressing social questions of the day	Doing: modern drama

¹ Masfield 1921, The Tragedy of Nan, New York, p. vii; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 308.

² Dunsany 1911, ‘Romance and the Modern Stage’, National Review No. 57, July 1911, p. 834; in Carlson 1984: 307.

³ Walkley 1911, ‘Criticism and Croce’, London Times March 20th, p. 12; in Carlson 1984: 312.

⁴ Romains 1911: x; in Carlson 1984: 317.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 317

-
- ⁶ Lukács' response to Ottwalt, published in Die Linkskurve, Vol. 4(12), December 1932.
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 329-330
- ⁸ Carlson 1984: 330-1
- ⁹ Lukács 1932, 'Reportage oder Gestaltung', Die Linkskurve, Vol. 4(7), p. 25; in Carlson 1984: 387.
- ¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 334-390
- ¹¹ Lukács 1962, The Meaning of Contemporary Realism, trans. J. and N. Mander, London, pp. 20, 86-7, 89; in Carlson 1984: 425.
- ¹² Carlson 1984: 334
- ¹³ Simmel 1968, The Conflict in Modern Culture and Other Essays, trans. K.P. Etzkorn, New York, pp. 95-97; in Carlson 1984: 329.
- ¹⁴ Simmel, 'Zur Philosophie des Schauspielers' cited in Burns 1972: 98
- ¹⁵ Etzkorn, K. Peter. 1973. 'Introduction'. In Music and Society: the Later Writings of Paul Honigsheim, edited by K. P. Etzkorn. New York and London: John Wiley and Sons. 6, 14
- ¹⁶ A similar, more elaborated, view can be found in Themis, by Jane Ellen Harrison (1850-1928) (Cambridge 1912) and in F.M. Cornford's The Origin of Attic Comedy (1914), Cambridge 1934. As Carlson says, the insistence by these theorists 'that drama – especially tragedy - had to be considered in the light of ritual made a permanent impression on modern critical thought, despite a 'devastating' attack by the 'pre-eminent modern scholar of the Greek theatre', A.W. Pickard-Cambridge (1873-1952), in his book Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy (1927), published by Cambridge in 1934 (Carlson 1984: 337). Anthropology's interest in drama led to the rise to contemporary dominance of the view that the origins of drama lay in ritual, a view which is only just beginning to be challenged (see Postlewait, Thomas, and Tracy C. Davis. 2003. 'Theatricality: an introduction'. In Theatricality, edited by T. C. Davis and T. Postlewait. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 1-39. and Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.)
- ¹⁷ Carlson 1984: 365
- ¹⁸ Murray 1927, The Classical Tradition in Poetry, Cambridge, p. 67; in Carlson 1984: 365. Anthropologists also turned their attention to spectatorship during the 1930's, instigating projects of 'mass observation' in Britain in which the whole of life was observed as if it were theatre.
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 341
- ²⁰ Kandinskii 1912 in Moeller-Sally, Betsy. 1998. 'The Theater as Will and Representation: Artist and Audience in Russian Modernist Theater, 1904-1909.' Slavic Review 57 (2) pp. 350-371. 353
- ²¹ Moeller-Sally 1998: 353-4
- ²² Carlson 1984: 347
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 324-5
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 323-4
- ²⁵ Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. x
- ²⁶ Bullough, Edward. 1912. 'Psychical Distance' as a Factor in Art and an Aesthetic Principle '. British Journal of Psychology 5 (June) pp. 87-118. 91
- ²⁷ Bullough 1912: 91-2
- ²⁸ Andreyev 1919, 'Andreyev on the Modern Theatre', trans. Manart Kippen, New York Times 5th October, 1919, section 4, p. 3; in Carlson 1984: 324.
- ²⁹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 454

-
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 338
- ³¹ Copeau 1923, 'Critiques d'un autre temps', Nouvelle revue française Vol 21, p. 225; in Carlson 1984: 338.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 338
- ³³ Copeau 1923, 'Critiques d'un autre temps', Nouvelle revue française Vol 21, p. 234; in Carlson 1984: 338.
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 372
- ³⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 454
- ³⁶ Copeau 1974/1913: quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 2.
- ³⁷ Copeau 1931, Souvenirs du Vieux Colombiers, Oaris, Les Etincelles; quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 99.
- ³⁸ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 455
- ³⁹ Kornfeld 1963, 'Epilogue to the Actor', trans Joseph Bernstein, in Walter Sokel, An Anthology of German Expressionist Drama, New York, p. 7; in Carlson 1984: 348.
- ⁴⁰ Carlson 1984: 348
- ⁴¹ Kornfeld 1918, 'Theater und anderes' [Theatre and change], Das Junge Deutschland Vol. 1, pp. 11-12; in Carlson 1984: 349
- ⁴² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 455
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 341
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 348
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 310
- ⁴⁶ Burton, Richard 2010/1914, How To See A Play, New York, Macmillan, Project Gutenberg, <http://manybooks.net/titles/burtonri3243332433-8.html> accessed 27/6/2010. Also cited in Lee 1999: 151. 24-5
- ⁴⁷ Burton 1914: 2-3
- ⁴⁸ Burton 1914: 53
- ⁴⁹ Burton 1914: 8
- ⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 361
- ⁵¹ Scheler 1954, 'On the Tragic', trans. Bernard Stambler, Cross Currents Vol 4(2), p. 180; in Carlson 1984: 336.
- ⁵² Carlson 1984: 335-6
- ⁵³ Hasenclever 1916, 'Das Theater von Morgen' [The Theatre of Tomorrow], Die Schaubühne Vol. 12, p. 477; in Carlson 1984: 348.
- ⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 348
- ⁵⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 445
- ⁵⁶ Hasenclever 1921, 'Über der Tragische' [About the Tragic], Menschen Vol. 4(2), p. 18; in Carlson 1984: 350.
- ⁵⁷ Carlson 1984: 350
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 351
- ⁵⁹ Gestalt here means 'form' or 'shape'. The term has since been taken up into psychological theory to mean 'an organized whole that is perceived as more than the sum of its parts'. In gestalt psychology and therapy, perceptions are explained as gestalts rather than being analysed according to their constituent parts. Role-play is often used in this type of therapy (Pearsall 1999: 595).
- ⁶⁰ Carlson 1984: 351

⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 354-5

⁶² Cheney 1917, 'What We Stand For', Theatre Arts, Vol. 1, p. 149; in Carlson 1984: 362.

⁶³ Cheney, Sheldon. 1930. The Theatre: Three Thousand Years of Drama, Acting and Stagecraft. 2nd ed. London, New York, Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co. 470

⁶⁴ Cheney 1930: 474

⁶⁵ Cheney 1930: 410

⁶⁶ Cheney was referring in particular to the Old Price riots, in which, for sixty-one performances in Drury Lane, spectators rhythmically shouted 'O-P, O-P, O-P' throughout the performance, and devised a dance called the O-P dance which it would break into, along with much stamping of feet and canes, cat-calls, ringing of bells and hissing. 'Attendance at the riots became a social affair [and] theatre democracy had come with a vengeance' (Cheney 1930: 397).

⁶⁷ Cheney 1930: 470

⁶⁸ Cheney 1930: 474

⁶⁹ Foreword reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 131-133.

⁷⁰ Goldman 2008/1917: 131

Table 24/51: Theories of Theatre 1918-1920

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The Creative Theatre (1918); Das schöpferische Theater (1922);	Platon Kershentsev (1881-1940) Russian avant-garde; Member of the Proletcult	Concerned with the bourgeois theatre and its effects on the spectator, especially its capacity to turn the spectator into a consumer : 'The entire development of bourgeois theatre has brought with it the absolute passivity of the spectator ... The theatre is no longer a place of creative forms and experiences but a place of recuperation in which one need do nothing at all ... This is typically characteristic of the bourgeois order: politics are controlled and ruled by a small group of politicians while the great masses of the people remain passive'. ¹ Kershentsev was influenced by Japanese theatre, as were so many of the avant-garde, and made use of the hanamichi as a means of bringing the dramatic moments of a play close to the proletarian spectator. He provides the leading theoretical statement on theatre from the Proletarian Cultural Educational Organization (post-revolutionary Russian): the entire existing theatre was so tainted by bourgeois culture as to be unsavable. All had to go: the repertory, the personnel, the production methods, authors and artists. New authors and artists were to be found amongst the proletariat 'to release the creative instincts of the masses'. Theatre artists were no longer entertainers, but 'fellow workers with their audiences'. ' The traditional creator-spectator relationship must disappear and the spectator should play an active part not only in performance but in rehearsals and in all the work of the theatre '. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place in which plays are performed; an institution	Re-activating spectators to release the creative instincts of the masses	Doing: plays: a collaborative art Watching: spectators have been turned into consumers by bourgeois theatre and need to be re-activated and turned into participants in all aspects of theatre
Hamlet (1919); The Uses of Poetry and the Uses of Criticism (1933); 'Poetry and Drama' (1950) ³	T.S. Eliot (1888-1965) English poet, dramatist and critic	Eliot drew a distinction between prose and poetry and ordinary, everyday speech. Both prose and poetry when used on the stage were 'but means to an end'. ⁴ Prose on the stage was 'as artificial as verse: or alternatively ... verse can be as natural as prose'. Either way, if the spectator is conscious of how a play is written, whether prose or poetry, then the dramatist has failed, for the spectator has seen the play and the language of the play 'as two separate things.' Dramatists now 'have to accustom our spectators to verse to the point which they will cease to be conscious of it.' ⁵ Both prose and poetry on the stage have rhythm, something everyday speech does not have. It is this rhythm which is important to maintain, and the sense of dramatic inevitability of the medium. Eliot's plays were experimental in both form and content. He insisted on the separation of art and the everyday, which is why he could conceive that 'The ideal medium for poetry is the theatre'. ⁶ A central function of art is the expression of emotion and order. Both word and	A place where drama is presented; the ideal medium for poetry	Imposing order on the world so that we gain some perception of order in life; to express emotion and order	Doing: playwrighting: whatever medium is used in which to write a play, it should seem so inevitable that it does not draw attention away from the play itself

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		action are determined by the poet in order to achieve ‘a precise and calculated emotional response’:⁷ ‘I myself should like an audience which could neither read nor write’, forcing them to rely on the spoken word and its impact.⁸ However, ‘I should not like to close ... without attempting to set before myself and ... before you, though only in dim outline, the ideal towards which it seems to me that poetic drama should strive. It is an unattainable ideal [which] provides an incentive towards further experiment and exploration ... It is a function of all art to give us some perception of an order in life, by imposing order upon it ... To go as far in this direction as it is possible to go, without losing that contact with the ordinary everyday world with which the drama must come to terms, seems to me the proper aim of dramatic poetry. For it is ultimately the function of art, in imposing a credible order upon ordinary reality, and thereby eliciting some perception of an order in reality, to bring us to a condition of serenity, stillness, and reconciliation; and then leave us, as Virgil left Dante, to proceed toward a region where that guide can avail us no further’.⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘The New Path of the Theatre’ (1919)	Kenneth Macgowan (1888-1963) American director	The modern stage art must be based on three things: simplification (a rejection of realism), suggestion (emphasizing the evocative) and synthesis (a ‘complex and rhythmic fusion of setting, light, actors, and play’).¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-traditional theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place or institution in which plays are staged	Suggestion	Doing: Directing
Chronique zurichoise (1919); ‘Le dadaïsme et le théâtre’ (1922)	Tristan Tzara (1896-1963) dadaist	Tzara initiated the dadaist movement in 1916 with a series of manifestos. Theatre was to shed ‘the burden of imitating life’. It was to ‘live by its own scenic means’, in full view of the spectators, making them a part of the theatre world.¹¹ Dadaism called for ‘artistic autonomy’ (echoed in much French theatre theory of the time, including surrealism),¹² and aimed to confuse and antagonise spectators.¹³ German ‘Oberdad’, Johannes Baader, for instance, favoured disrupting such things as a morning mass at Berlin Cathedral (17 November 1918) and Weimar proceedings (1919), by shouting and swearing, handing out pamphlets and threatening to ‘blow Weimar to pieces’ on behalf of Dada, collapsing theatre into life.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-establishment theatre View of Theatre: positive	An autonomous world watched by spectators	To confuse and antagonise spectators to make them part of the theatre world	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: the irrationality of the world
Die Wandlung (1919);	Ernst Toller (1893-1939)	A committed political activist who was jailed for his part in the Munich uprising in 1918-19, Toller called the play ‘a political pamphlet [whose aim was] to renew the spiritual	A vehicle for the	Didactic: to renew the	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Creative Confession (1920); Man and the Masses (1921); 'Letter to a Creative Collaborator' (1922) ¹⁵	German expressionist playwright (political poet) and anti-fascist activist	content of human society'. He considered himself a 'political poet'. Like a religious poet, a political poet taught a message: 'man feels himself answerable for himself and for every brother in human society'. ¹⁶ Yet this was not without its perils: ' As a politician I act as if human beings [and their] actual conditions ... were real facts. As an artist I perceive the highly questionable nature of these 'real facts'' turning 'human beings X and Y and Z [into] 'ghastly puppets, fatefully driven by dimly perceived compulsions'. ¹⁷ His plays depicted 'the descent from optimism to disillusionment', ¹⁸ a reflection of the journey the western world had taken. His 1921 play represented 'a milestone in non-naturalistic staging technique', ¹⁹ and is remarkable for having a woman as its main character. She struggles to help oppressed workers but 'gets caught in the crossfire between those who uphold humanitarian ideals and zealous ideologues who believe than any means, including violence, is justified in attaining the workers' aims'. ²⁰ The character was based on Sonia Lerch, a fellow prisoner of Toller's. ²¹ Toller distinguished between a 'bourgeois' world and a 'proletarian' world: 'what seems to be to the 'bourgeois' a quarrel about dry-as-dust words in the social world and its artistic image, is for the proletarian a tragic division, a terrifying assault. What seems to the 'bourgeois' a 'deep insight', 'significant', the expression of the most moving intellectual struggles, leaves the proletarian totally unmoved'. Both forms of art, however, 'must lead on to humanity ... to the shaping of the eternally human'. ²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois/pro-political theatre View of Theatre: functional	expression of political messages; a social institution	spiritual content of human society	(poetry) Showing: humanity
The Political Theatre (1919); 'The Programme of the Proletarian Theatre' ²³ (1920)	Erwin Piscator (1893-1966) German director of the Proletarisches Theater, Berlin	Piscator argued that theatre and drama could be made to serve the proletarian spectator without a complete rejection of tradition [or theatre as such]. With 'judicious rewriting', prologues and epilogues, the standard repertoire 'could serve the cause of the Proletarian revolution just as universal history serves to propagate the idea of class struggle'. Proletarian Theatre however, must strive to eliminate 'all neoromantic, expressionist and similar styles' and 'must aim for simplicity of expression, lucidity of structure, and a clear effect on the feelings of a working-class audience' along with 'Subordination of all artistic aims to the revolutionary goal .. of class struggle'. ²⁴ ... 'the guiding principle must be whether the vast circle of the proletarian audience will derive some benefit from it, or whether it will be bored or confused, or even infected by bourgeois notions'. Established actors could be retrained until working class actors arose, however, actors must become	A space for the staging of drama; an institution; a vehicle for social change	Politics not art; collaborative participatory work; revolution and social change	Doing: playwrighting Showing: manifestos for the working classes Watching: spectators as participants (use of space to incorporate

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		political beings, ‘presenting material clearly and concretely’ to their equals in the spectator in the style of a manifesto by Lenin. Authors were to put their own ideas to the back of their minds, and concentrate instead on ‘bringing out the ideas which are alive in the psyche of the masses’, cultivating ‘trivial’ forms which are clear and can be ‘easily understood by all’.²⁵ All those involved in the theatre, actors, authors, directors, designers, spectators, should view themselves as equal participants in a common effort directed toward a common goal²⁶ and ‘each spectator, wherever he may be, whatever he may be saying or doing, must act in a fashion which stamps him unmistakably as a Communist’.²⁷ He developed the concept of epic theatre, by which he meant primarily ‘large-scale ... involving major social forces’,²⁸ but which was later to be taken up by his friend Bertold Brecht as a form of narrative detachment, and explored ways of changing the traditional actor-spectator relationship, including the design of a theatre space featuring flexible stage forms. His theatre was ‘first and foremost political’, aimed at social change.²⁹ At the time his manifesto ‘The Programme of the Proletarian Theatre’ was published there was no suitable drama for his concept of epic theatre, which led to controversial productions of ‘classics’ and the fostering of new left-wing authors (including Brecht). He had to wait for some four decades before ‘congenial’ drama arose in the work of Hochhuth, Kipphardt and Weiss.³⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois theatre and drama View of Theatre: functional			spectators)
‘On a new Type of Play’ (1920); ³¹ ‘A Few Words about the Role of the Actor in the Theatre of Pure Form’ (1921).	Stanislaw Witkiewicz (1885-1930) Polish avant-garde theatre producer, bohemian and Formist theorist	In 1918, Witkiewicz became involved in experimental work which remained largely misunderstood until the 1960s, after Beckett and Ionesco.³² The Formists distinguished between different kinds of reality, arguing that each was a legitimate form to which the artist could give expression: naturalism depicted material reality; surrealism depicted psychological reality; futurism or expressionism depicted the reality of the free imagination. Witkiewicz called for a new kind of theatre which was not based upon external reality or psychological reality but upon pure form (as in experimental painting or music). It could be based on either reality or fantasy, but would be ‘a creative synthesis of sound, décor, movement, and dialogue’.³³ Each element would be seen as a formal element, accepted not for itself but as part of the whole, like ‘chords in a musical work’, including the actors.³⁴ (See Eisenstein (1923) who was working towards the same idea in Russia in what he called a ‘theatre of montage’). ‘A Few Words’ was prompted by	A composite art	Artistic expression – to create unity within diversity (not for spectators but within the art work); affect	Doing: plays Showing: pure form, not a heightened view of real life Watching: theatre puts spectators into a relationship in which they experience

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Komissarzhevsky's book on Stanislavski. Witkiewicz rejected the idea of the actor 'experiencing' the inner life of a role. Rather, he should try to grasp 'the formal conception of the work (as distinct from its real-life mood) and its character apart from all real-life probabilities', subordinating himself not merely to the acting ensemble (as Stanislavski suggests) but to the entire work, choosing tones and gestures 'not on the basis of imitation or of psychological truth but for their contribution to the whole'. The overall form was the responsibility of the director. The duty of the actor was 'to keep himself firmly under control, [to] forget completely about life'³⁵ and 'devote himself entirely to building up the total theatrical experience'.³⁶ 'The actor, in his own right, should not exist'.³⁷ Theatre was 'a composite art' which made it difficult, but not impossible 'to write a play in which the performance itself, existing independently in its own right and not as a heightened picture of life, would be able to put the spectator in a position to experience metaphysical feeling' (as a symphony or sonata did). What was essential was that 'the meaning of the play should not necessarily be limited by its content ... the drama should no longer be tied down to pre-existing patterns based solely on life's meaning or on fantastic assumptions'. The goal was to create 'unity within diversity in Pure Form', to 'fill several hours on the stage with a performance possessing its own internal, formal logic, independent of anything in "real life" ... if the play is seriously written [i.e. created rather than invented for commercial reasons] and appropriately produced this method can create works of previously unsuspected beauty' which the spectator would experience as if it were 'some strange dream' which was nevertheless satisfying because it was complete in itself and had its own formal logic which made all its components seem perfectly inter-related. Such a work would 'compel the spectators to accept it as inevitable', just as they had come to accept abstract art, because it would enable them to experience something 'metaphysical' rather than just the 'tension in the pit of the stomach' which only arises from a 'debased feeling of pure curiosity about real life', and which leaves the spectator 'with a bad taste in his mouth, or ... shaken by the purely biological horror and sublimity of life, or ... furious that he has been fooled by a whole series of tricks'.³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –expressionist art View of Theatre: positive			feelings about what they see. Where theatre limits the freedom of the spectators to experience their feelings (as realist and psychological theatre does), it leaves them unhappy, dissatisfied, or even furious. Spectators do not like to be tricked.
'Preface to The	Yvan Goll (1891-1950)	Goll represents a link between the French and German avant-garde, and a transition point between expressionism and surrealism. He was the first German author to use the word	A place	To teach spectators to	Doing: drama – an 'unreal

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Immortals ' (1920); 'Preface to Methusalem, the Eternal Bourgeois ' (1922) ³⁹	German/French expressionist playwright and poet	'surrealism'. His play Methusalem foreshadowed absurdist drama, especially that of Ionesco. ⁴⁰ Goll called for an Überdrama as 'the third and final stage of drama's development' after the Greek drama and to replace 'the useless dramas of the last century which aimed to be nothing more than interesting, forensically challenging or simply descriptive imitations of life, not creative'. ⁴¹ Überdrama or superdrama would show the conflict between the soul of man and external reality – 'all that is thing like and beastlike around him and within him'. It would show this in symbolic form, as 'a grotesque that does not cause laughter' and would use theatre's 'primary symbol', the mask, and attempt to regain the perception of the child. ⁴² The stage 'was nothing but a magnifying glass', ⁴³ and its first emblem was the mask. The function of art was 'not to make life easy ... in so far as it aims to educate, ameliorate, or be somehow effective, [it] has to kill off the everyday citizen, terrifying him as the mask does a child ... Art must turn man into a child again ... The drabness and stupidity of people are so enormous that only enormity will get to them. Let the new drama be one of enormity'. Theatre should be 'unreal reality' or 'superdrama'. 'Superrealism is the strongest negation of realism. The reality of appearance is unmasked in favour of the truthfulness of being'. 'The dramatist is a researcher, a politician, and a legislator' who 'sets down things from a distant realm of truth which he had heard by putting his ear against the world's closed walls'. The aim of the author is to 'give you some dolls, teach you how to play and then scatter the sawdust of the broken dolls in the wind again'. Theatre is not like life: 'life carries on, everybody knows that. But the drama stops because you've got tired, you've aged in a single hour, and because truth ... may only be swallowed in very small quantities'. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-established theatre View of Theatre: functional		be children again, to play: to act as a 'magnifying glass'	reality' Showing: Moving to an ever more refined understanding of the condition of man as conflict

¹ Kershentsev 1922 in Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 42

² Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 355

³ Published in Eliot, T.S. 1951, Poetry and Drama, Cambridge MA, Harvard University Press, pp. 10-17; reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 270-273.

⁴ Eliot 2008/1950: 271

⁵ Eliot 2008/1950: 271-2

⁶ Eliot 1933: 146 in Krasner 2008: 270

-
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 370
- ⁸ Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34. 3
- ⁹ Quoted in Crane 1967: 219-220.
- ¹⁰ Macgowan 1919, 'The New Path of the Theatre', Theatre Arts, Vol. 3, p. 88; in Carlson 1984: 362.
- ¹¹ Tzara 1975, Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 1, p. 564; in Carlson 1984: 343.
- ¹² Carlson 1984: 343
- ¹³ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 447
- ¹⁴ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 51
- ¹⁵ The Preface to the second edition of Masses and Man published in 1922; translated and reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 217-9.
- ¹⁶ Toller 1920, Schöpferische Konfession, [Creative Confession] Berlin, p. 48; in Carlson 1984: 349.
- ¹⁷ Toller 1998/1922: 218
- ¹⁸ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 446
- ¹⁹ Brandt 1998: 217
- ²⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 446
- ²¹ Brandt 1998: 218n3
- ²² Toller 1998/1922: 219
- ²³ Included in 1980 reprint of The Political Theatre by Methuen; reprinted in Brandt 1998: 221-223.
- ²⁴ Piscator 1998/1920: 221
- ²⁵ Piscator 1998/1920: 222-3
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 356
- ²⁷ Piscator 1998/1920: 222
- ²⁸ Brandt 1998: 220
- ²⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 449
- ³⁰ Brandt 1998: 221
- ³¹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 145-148, and in Brandt 1998: 182-187.
- ³² Carlson 1984: 345; Krasner 2008: 144
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 345
- ³⁴ Witkiewicz 1968, The Madman and the Nun and Other Plays, trans. Daniel Gerould and C.S. Durer, Seattle, p. 292-3; in Carlson 1984: 345.
- ³⁵ Witkiewicz 1977, 'A Few Words about the Role of the Actor in the Theatre of Pure Form', trans. Daniel Gerould, in Twentieth Century Polish Drama, Ithaca, New York, 1977, p. 154-6; in Carlson 1984: 345-6.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 345-6
- ³⁷ Witkiewicz 2008/1920: 145
- ³⁸ Witkiewicz 2008/1920: 145-8

³⁹ Both reprinted in Brandt 1998: 171-3 and 174-5.

⁴⁰ Brandt 1998: 171

⁴¹ Goll 1998/1920: 172

⁴² Carlson 1984: 350

⁴³ Goll 1998/1920: 172

⁴⁴ Goll 1998/1922: 172-5

Table 25/51 Theories of Theatre 1921-1924(a)

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Stoll considered that the avant-garde of the 1920s to 1940s to be engaged in a 'rear-guard' action to keep out the masses through a 'cult of the esoteric and unintelligible'. He believed their theories reflected 'an extreme indifference to the pleasure or enlightenment of the ordinary public', and to the conception of art as a communication for imaginative and emotional effect.¹ Krasner, on the other hand, claims that the period saw the rise of a number of experimental theories and ideas, including 'newsreel theatre', which drew attention to the world-wide depression, negritude which was a 'celebration' of African cultural identity, existentialist in orientation, which proposed that 'the man of nature' used 'instinctive reason' rather than European rationalism, and 'stream-of-consciousness' interior monologues. The development of 'talkies' also had a powerful influence on the arts, as did the ideas of Freud, Einstein and Marx. Marxism in particular, led to theatre theories and practices to do with human liberation and social reform, as well as a turn to 'folk' art. The period saw two major movements in theatre theory: Brecht's 'new realism' aimed at social change and the application of Semiotics to theatre (theatre seen as a complex verbal, visual and acoustic text),² two movement which could be seen as opposed to each other. Many of the avant-garde exhibited a fierce rejection of the dominance of 'the text': 'the most powerful drug used by mankind'.³ During this period, the Fascist regime in Italy actively promoted theatre as a means to 're-educate the population ... by offering them new types of theatrical performances that were in line with the 'new spirit' of the times. Theatre, authors and directors were subsidized, there was a drive to establish a 'mass-theatre', there were national competitions in playwrighting and 'Theatrical Saturdays' were introduced where tickets were very cheap. Generally the theatre accepted the support while paying lip-service to the political ideology of fascism, although there were some who embraced the ideology, producing theatre that was more or less successful. In Italy, an attempt at a mass theatre event, inspired by Evreinov's work in Russia, produced a largely unsuccessful mass battle performance near the river Arno which was attended by some 25,000 people (who had been allocated tickets) but which was hard to see or understand, and which received a negative reception in the Fascist press, causing the government to drop further plans for mass theatre.⁴ The period featured a struggle over what was to have dominance in theatre as an art form: the text, the performer, the staging, the director or the spectator. This in part was a result of increased specialisation, and the recognition of theatre as a composite art.
Notes of a Director (1921)	Alexander Tairov (1885-1950) Russian director	Rejected past formulas of theatre, and promoted physical training for actors, similar to Meyerhold. He called for a 'synthetic' theatre, centred upon a 'master-actor' similar to Komissarzhevsky's 'universal actor'. Theatre should be a fusion into an organic unity of the harlequin, tragedy, operetta, pantomime and circus, refracted through the master-actor. The poet [author] would be just one of a group of contributing artists, whose creative will is expressed collectively through the director, guaranteeing unity. Tairov rejected the Proletcult's idea of bringing the spectator into the creative process, not because there would be no-one to watch, but because this move introduces the element of chance, destroying art. The spectator is only the witness to the art, in no way essential to it. Even performance itself may not be essential, since rehearsals themselves can be 'so inspired that no subsequent performance can compare with them'. ⁵	An art form	The expression of unity	Doing: directing; theatre as a composite activity requiring synthesis; acting Watching: watching was incidental not essential; a form of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-participatory theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent			witnessing
Maschere (1921)	Silvio D'Amico (1887-1955) Italian theatre historian	Rejected the separation between text and performance suggested by Croce (1902). Drama is always 'created presupposing ideally, if not always materially, a scenic integration' and must be analysed in those terms. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –performance realises the text View of Theatre: positive		Performance	Doing: drama – a performed art
'L'interpretazione' (1921)	Piero Gobetti (1901-1926) Italian critic	Supported Croce's separation between text and performance against D'Amico, arguing that D'Amico had 'confused the work of the actor with the work of the poet': ⁷ 'The work of the poet should be judged as the work of the poet and the work of the actor as the work of the actor'. ⁸ A text must be considered complete in itself: inadequacies ought not to be tolerated on the grounds that they might disappear in performance. Similarly, flaws in the text should not affect judgment of the actor's achievement. No dramatic work could ever be judged a failure on the basis of performance, because 'the proper presentation of it might always occur in the future'. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – text and performance are separate arts View of Theatre: ambivalent			Doing: poetry (text)
'Der Mensch im Tunnel' (1922) ('Man in the Tunnel, or: The Poet and the Play' 1923) ¹⁰	Georg Kaiser (1878-1945) German expressionist playwright	Like Shaw, Kaiser saw the theatre as 'an intellectual forum'. ¹¹ The drama 'trains man in one of the most difficult but essential parts of life, the ability to think '. This training occurs for both writer and spectator. For the dramatist, 'to write a play is to think a thought through to the end'. ¹² Plato's dialogues were an outstanding example. The dramatist's role was to 'push back the frontiers', encouraging others to join him, so that he could show them the purpose of being, which was 'the attainment of record achievements', ¹³ through a constant movement towards 'a more comprehensive vision of reality'. ¹⁴ 'You can't keep caning bottoms if what you want is to bring in some light at the top'. The dramatist must 'subject himself ... to the enormous labor of formulating his drama' and must 'heroically' keep 'a grip on the rope until he has groped his way through to the end' 'and then stop' because 'The shaping of a play is the means and never the goal'. Drama 'is a passageway'. The aim was 'to live – that's what it's all about. The aim of the poet was to force himself to think an idea through to its ends, in order to leave a 'record', an achievement. 'Everything [including drama] was a passageway for 'the universally active man' who, when the work is complete, turns away from it and goes 'into the desert' again'. ¹⁵ Kaiser reacted against the trend for meditation and passivity. Man was active, and must continually be active, although he also needed to know when	An intellectual forum; a place of exploration	To train man to think;	Doing: playwrighting Showing: theatre showed the way towards 'a more comprehensive vision of reality'

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		to stop working at something, to leave it and begin something else. He was particularly critical of those who rested on their laurels. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-didactic drama View of Theatre: functional
‘Der Arbeit der Bauhausbühne’ [The Work of the Bauhaus Stage] (1922); ‘Vom modernen Theaterbau’ (1928)	Walter Gropius (1883-1969) German experimental designer	Gropius was a director of the Bauhaus, an influential school of design founded in 1919. He invited Lothar Schreyer (1922) to develop a theatre studio at the Bauhaus, devoted to experimentation in production techniques. The aim of theatre was ‘metaphysical’: to place ‘in physical evidence’ a ‘supersensuous idea’. The aim of the Bauhausbühne was to incarnate an immaterial idea through a mastery of organic and mechanical means (including the actor as ‘inspired workman’). ¹⁶ The goal of theatre architecture was ‘to make the theatre instrument as impersonal, as flexible, and as transformable as possible in order to place no restraint upon the director and to allow him to express the most diverse artistic conceptions’. ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical	A place; an instrument for the expression of ideas	Artistic expression	Doing: design; experimentation in techniques of staging
‘Das Bühnenwerk’ [Stagework] (1922)	Lothar Schreyer (1886-1966) German experimental designer	Theatre was to produce life ‘as life produces life’, using technical means to free ‘the living parts of the work’. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical	A practice	Technical mastery	Doing: stage-craft Showing: the living parts of a work
Preface to Les mariés de la Tour Eiffel (1922)	Jean Cocteau (1889-1963) French surrealist dramatist	Influenced by Apollinaire (1917) and Jarry (1896). Cocteau called for ‘a new art combining many elements’: ‘the fantastic, the dance, acrobats, mime, drama, satire, music, and the spoken word’. He rejected traditional verse drama as poetry in the theatre and espoused ‘poetry of the theatre’ – which was to be achieved by all the means available to the staged performance. Called for a rejection of realism in favour of a ‘deeper realism’ which could be termed absurd , since it accentuated the absurdity of life in order to ‘paint more truly than the truth ’. ¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-established theatre View of Theatre: positive	A place; a composite art	To paint a picture	Doing: a composite art Showing: distinction between poetry in the theatre and the poetry of the theatre; the absurd
The Drama and the Stage (1922)	Ludwig Lewisohn (1882-1955)	Focus on tragedy, which was ‘the expression of the inevitable suffering of humanity.’ Modern tragedy should seek to ‘understand our failures and our sorrows’ and try to convey a ‘profound sense of the community of human suffering’. In order to achieve this		To ‘understand our failures	Doing: drama (tragedy) Showing: the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	American critic	communion, drama should always strive to expand its audience, bringing ‘the gravest and most stirring of the arts’²⁰ to more and more people.²¹ Lewisohn insisted that the actor remain faithful to the dramatist’s vision, but nevertheless saw his function as a creative one: the character was created by both dramatist and actor. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		and our sorrows’ and try to convey a ‘profound sense of the community of human suffering’	suffering of humanity Watching: communion; as wide an audience as possible
The Critic and the Drama (1922)	George Jean Nathan (1882-1958) American critic	Completely rejected Lewisohn’s view of tragedy. Drew a distinction between levels of spectator. Tragedy only appealed to the ‘spiritually superior minority’,²² for whom it brings a ‘wistful sadness’ at the spectacle of ‘what they might, yet alas cannot be’. Lewisohn, like Sarcey, reduced the value of drama to its effect on the crowd, who were not capable of any higher vision than wondering why they should be ‘permitted to be alive at all’.²³ Nathan also supported Spingarn’s view of the actor: acting was not a creative art; even the best actor was ‘simply an adaptable tool in the hands of the dramatist’.²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-mass spectator View of Theatre: ambivalent		Affect (using the actor as a tool)	Doing: drama (tragedy) Watching: two kinds of spectators – the spiritually superior and the crowd
‘Le silence au théâtre’ (1922) ²⁵	Jean-Jacques Bernard (1888-1972) French dramatist	A leading member of Baty’s Les Compagnons de la Chimère, and a leading theorist of what became known as the ‘théâtre du silence’ (theatre of silence) or ‘théâtre de l’inexprimé’ (theatre of the unexpressed). Bernard claimed that the theatre’s worst enemy was literature, which ‘expresses and dilutes what should only be suggested’. However, unlike Maeterlinck, Bernard was not after mystical experience, but access to the subconscious. The spectator was to be enlightened concerning the emotions of the characters, rather than mystified.²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text View of Theatre: functional	A place of performance an art form	Enlightening the spectator	Doing: performance (anti-text)
In 1923, the Twelfth Party Congress urged Russian dramatists a return to more realistic depictions ‘using the episodes of the heroic struggle led by the working class’.²⁷ This was interpreted in vastly different ways, from extreme realism (Maly and Stanislavski) to extreme stylization (Meyerhold and Tairov).²⁸ Directors such as Reinhardt and Vakhtangov tried to bridge the gap between the two, arguing that each play or each production should define its own form,²⁹ although theorists who did work in the Hegelian and Marxist traditions ‘naturally stressed the manner in which theatre was conditioned by historical, social and economic processes’.³⁰ Such experimentation was tolerated at first, but by 1927, ‘a much narrower and more politically engaged theory of the theatre’ was in evidence as leftist literary organizations demanded a more clearly socialist theatre, and censorship tightened.³¹ Theory, once again, has moved further away from actual practice, leaving practice to be written about in purely technical terms.
‘Silence’	Denys Amiel	Member of Les Compagnons de la Chimère and proponent of the theatre of silence.	An art form	The	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1923); Theatre (1925)	(1884-1971) French dramatist	Theatre should be 'based almost entirely on silence, with words occurring at intervals like echoes'. ³² Looking into a theatre text was like looking into an aquarium with all its silent movement. Similarly polite society had a hidden, silent depth which might be being torn apart by passion. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text View of Theatre: positive		expression of the inexpressible	performance
'Theater, Zirkus, Varieté' (c1923); Vision in Motion (1947); The New Vision, from Material to Architecture (1932)	László Moholy-Nagy (1895-1946) Hungarian Bauhaus designer and photographer	Called for a 'total theatre', in which man was no longer the dominant element but just one formal element amongst many others. [Typical designer call! As always, the 'weighty and carnal' figure of the actor interfered with the vision of the designer]. The performance space should be 'totally flexible', even incorporating the spectator: ³³ 'Stage and spectator are too much separated, too obviously divided into active and passive, to be able to produce creative relationships and reciprocal tensions.' It is time to produce a kind of stage activity that will no longer permit the audience to be silent spectators'. ³⁴ He suggested designs using runways and suspended bridges and drawbridges which could be moved towards the spectator, creating effects similar to the close-up in films and designed to 'place the spectator in a dynamic relationship with the action'. ³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-established theatre which separated spectators and performers View of Theatre: practical	A space of performance	To break up the separation between spectators and performers	Doing: stage design
'Mensch und Kunstfigur' (c1923)	Oskar Schlemmer (1888-1943) Bauhaus director	Schlemmer took over the supervision of the theatre division of the Bauhaus from Schreyer in 1923. Unlike other Bauhaus members, he was not willing to give up the central position of man in the theatre, although he was not prepared to concede the actor complete creativity. He proposed an ideal stage figure (the Kunstfigur), an 'artificial figure' which was both formal and spiritual (similar to Craig's Über-Marionette). ³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-dominance of the actor View of Theatre: positive	A place;	Creativity	Doing: the practice of theatre
The Montage of Attractions (1923)	Sergei Eisenstein (1898-1948) Russian avant-garde director	Eisenstein was a student of Meyerhold, and 'a representative of the leftist radical proletarian movement to which Kershentsev also belonged'. ³⁷ He saw theatre as an instrument of ideological self-discovery for proletarian spectators. The objective of 'every utilitarian theatre [is] to guide the spectator in the desired direction'. This was 'the main task of every functional theatre', ³⁸ and all elements of the production were to be geared to this end, producing a theatre far removed from 'illusory imitativeness [and] representationality'. The production would instead be an assemblage of 'attractions' (attractions were 'any aggressive aspect of the theatre; that is, any element ... which	A seeing place; a space for performance an instrument of (guided) self-	Guiding the spectator	Doing: directing a composite art Showing: the way; the ideological side of what is

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		subjects the spectator to a sensual or emotional impact ... experimentally regulated and mathematically calculated to produce in him certain emotional shocks [so that the spectator could be enabled] to perceive the ideological side of what is being demonstrated'.³⁹ The music hall and the circus provided models for this montage. Eisenstein experimented with a variety of new spaces for theatre, for example, his production of Tretyakov's The Gas Masks (1923) was set in a gasworks. He also used town squares and streets for the huge revolutionary festivals he worked on through the proletcult movement, including the first mass play produced for the anniversary celebrations on May 1, 1920.⁴⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-traditional theatre View of Theatre: functional	discovery		demonstrated Watching: the achievement of self-understanding
1923 The Moscow Art Theatre, under Stanislavski, toured western Europe and America. Richard Boleslavsky, a former student at the theatre, opened an acting school in America later that year, publishing six 'lessons' on acting which served American actors as an introduction to the Russian system.⁴¹ Stanislavski's ideas had an enormous influence on acting theories, long before he actually put them in print.
L'art du théâtre (1923)	Henri Ghéon (1875-1944) French playwright	Dismissed Wagner's concept of 'total theatre' as difficult, perhaps impossible, to achieve. Although the text was primary, it must be created to be 'playable', providing a range of possibilities for the actor. To complete the experience, there must also be a spectator which stands 'on the same intellectual and moral ground' as the author in order to be receptive to his vision. This can only occur in a 'truly organic society: 'only a truly organic society can have a true theatre'.⁴² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	An organic art form made up of text, performer and spectator	Performance	Doing: a composite art requiring spectators for completion Showing: the author's vision Watching: spectators were an essential component of theatre
'Réponse à l'enquête de Xavier de Courville sur le théâtre et la	Gaston Baty (1882-1951) Member of the Cartel des Quatre; member	The Cartel dominated the French stage in 1930's. Its other members (e.g. Jouvet 1938) rejected theory and gave primacy to the text, and the beauty and spirituality of theatre. Baty however, differed sharply from his associates in all respects. Although he saw the text as a crucial element, it played the same part in the theatre as the word in life. If the theatre was to present 'an integral vision of the world' which lay beyond rational	A place; a composite art form which renders the	To render the world sensible; to 'engage both the	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: an integral

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
mise en scène' (1923); Le masque et l'encensoir (1926); Testimonial in Gouhier's L'essence du théâtre (1943); Rideau baissé (1949)	of Les Compagnons de la Chimère	analysis, it also had to use 'plastic expression, color, light, music, gestures' etc. Baty sees theatre and religion as having a common origin and a common purpose: both sought to 'engage both the intellectual and spiritual parts of man'. It is the non-textual aspects of theatre which address man's spiritual side. He supported the Wagnerian concept of 'total theatre', and argued against performance as translation: 'If nothing more than a translation of literature is sought, we should content ourselves with literature'.⁴³ Theatre should not merely speak of the world, but 'render it sensible'.⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-integrated theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	world sensible	intellectual and spiritual parts of man'	vision of the world using theatrical means Watching: a religious experience
Philosophie der symbolischen Formen (1923-29)	Ernst Cassirer (1874-1945) German philosopher and intellectual historian	A 'universalistic' view. Man is essentially 'a maker of symbols'.⁴⁵ All 'functions of the human spirit' (including Art) are all concerned with 'symbolic forms'. Art creates an 'image-world' which does not merely reflect the empirically given but creates it.⁴⁶ Note that Cassirer does not draw a distinction between the symbolic and the literal: 'all human knowledge depends on the power to form experience through some type of symbolism'.⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		To create an 'image-world'	Doing: art
Literature and Revolution (1924)	Leon (Lev) Trotsky (1879-1940) Bolshevik revolutionary and Marxist theorist	Attacked the Proletcult vision of a new art by and for the workers. 'The party ... should encourage progressive tendencies in art by commentary or clarification but should not attempt to stimulate or control art'.⁴⁸ Such stimulation was the work of 'historic processes of history'.⁴⁹ Whatever seemed positive and promising should simply be encouraged. Although he expressed scepticism regarding such things as biomechanics, experimental theatre ought not to be condemned. However, theatre should be encouraged to seek 'a new realistic revolutionary repertoire, particularly Soviet comedy'. (Trotsky had an historical perspective on the development of tragedy. The essential feature of tragedy was conflict, but how this conflict played out differed in different societies. He believed that tragedy in the new society was likely to express the conflict between the individual and the collective or 'between two hostile collectives in the same individual'. The focus was not yet clear).⁵⁰ In the future, theatre would 'emerge out of its four walls and ... merge with the life of the masses'. At that time, experimentation would be more appropriate.⁵¹ Carlson detects some contradictions in Trotsky's view of tragedy: his theory suggests that	An activity which reflects the processes of history	Revolution	Doing: art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		it is subject to ‘a continual becoming’, which implied that the ideal socialist state would never be achieved. ⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-control of art View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘Notes on the Theatre’ (1924); The Dramatic Imagination (1941)	Robert Edmund Jones (1887-1954) American theatre designer and director	The leading designer of the ‘new stagecraft’ movement. His view on theatre was reminiscent of Craig and Yeats. There was to be no ‘explicitness’; the ‘tyranny of the writer, the maker of words’ was to end. Theatre should seek an ecstatic vision of the ‘immense, brooding, antithetical self of the world, a completion of everyday incompleteness, the unconscious awakening from the dream of life into a perception of living, spiritual reality’. It should deal with not character but passion. ⁵³ In 1941, Jones wrote that ‘[s]tage designing should be addressed to the eye of the mind’. ⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text View of Theatre: positive	A seeing-place; a composite art form	To address the eye of the mind	Doing: drama: stagecraft Showing: a vision of living, spiritual reality
Program note to The Ghost Sonata (1924); ‘Memoranda on Masks’ (1932); ‘Second Thoughts’ (1932); ‘A Dramatist’s Notebook’ (1933) ⁵⁵	Eugene O’Neill (1888-1953) American playwright and director	O’Neill was a ‘tireless experimenter’ who tried to extend the language of the stage, ‘to create a vivid ‘poetry of the theatre’’. ⁵⁶ He defended the use of masks in a number of articles – a ‘relatively rare effort at theorization’. ⁵⁷ He saw masks as both opening up ‘the inner man’ (as in Yeats) and as depersonalizing or dehumanizing the actor (as in Craig), providing a solution to the modern dramatist who wanted to ‘express those profound hidden conflicts of the mind’ which realism could only hint at. ⁵⁸ Praised the expressionists for ‘breaking through the restraints of realism’, ⁵⁹ so that ‘some form of super-naturalism’ could ‘express in the theatre what we comprehend intuitively of that self-defeating self-obsession which is the discount we moderns have to pay for the loan of life’. ⁶⁰ Theatre should deal with ‘the most basic human quest: to find a meaning for life and a way ‘to comfort the fears of death’. He advocated the use of the mask as a ‘symbol of inner reality ... those profound hidden conflicts of the mind’ revealed by psychology. Such a theatre would be a non-realistic imaginary theatre in which ‘the religion of a poetical interpretation and symbolic celebration of life’ could be ‘communicated to human beings, starved in spirit by their soul-stifling daily struggle to exist as masks among the masks of living!’ ⁶¹ ‘Tragedy [for O’Neill] was the natural consequence of the human condition’. ⁶² Existence itself was tragic as a consequence of consciousness, human awareness. (This view of tragedy is found in Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, and is characteristic of C20th dramatic theory). O’Neill believed that this required us to adopt masks in order to cope with both ourselves and with others. Masks therefore were not extra-ordinary, but every day things which people would as readily accept on stage as	A seeing place; a ‘laboratory’ for exploring the everyday use of illusion. ⁷¹	To find a meaning for life and a way ‘to comfort the fears of death’	Doing: drama (tragedy) (poetry) Showing: inner reality Watching: spectators were capable of appreciating and readily adapted to new forms of theatre; the form of the theatre determined their responses

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		they did in life. O'Neill believed that the public was receptive to new ideas if they seemed appropriate to the times. His 'mask-drama' The Great God Brown was a testament to this, running for eight months in New York, despite it being 'psychological, mystical and abstract' at a time when realism was supposedly the paradigm of theatre.⁶³ O'Neill experimented with a variety of forms and styles and avant-garde dramaturgical techniques throughout his career.⁶⁴ He believed the use of masks would overcome the problems of recognition brought about by familiar actors using plays as 'star vehicles',⁶⁵ and that masks would also force actors to use their bodies as well as their faces for expression rather than being merely 'bored spectators that have been dragged off to the theatre when they would have much preferred a quiet evening in the upholstered chair at home'.⁶⁶ 'The use of masks will be discovered eventually to be the freest solution of the modern dramatist's problem as to how ... he can express ... [the] inner drama' of the mind, allowing him to create 'a drama of souls ... with the masks that govern them and constitute their fates'.⁶⁷ Masks could also be used for stage-crowds and mobs in order to create the idea of the crowd or mob as a single entity (a technique which has been readily taken up by political demonstrators both for comment and parody).⁶⁸ Masks allowed the themes and issues of the plays to come through clearly and without interference from the familiarity of star performers or cross-cultural incongruities (such as western actors playing eastern roles).⁶⁹ In particular, he argued for a 'non-realistic imaginative theatre' which would give more scope to all involved in the production, including the spectator which was 'growing yearly more numerous and more hungry in its spiritual need to participate in imaginative interpretations of life rather than merely identify itself with faithful surface resemblances of living'.⁷⁰ i.e. identification was a function of the kind of play which was being presented to the spectator rather than a trait of desire of the spectators. Spectators adapted themselves to the kind of drama given to them. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-naturalistic theatre View of Theatre: functional
The period between the two world wars saw renewed attempts to imitate and adapt both classical Greek and Shakespearean drama, some experimenting with the use of verse.⁷² The renewed interest in tragedy in America led to a revival of the speculation on why people found pleasure in tragedy. No new answers appear to have been found, despite offerings from fields ranging from literature and psychology, anthropology, and literary criticism. Only Lucas thought of tragedy in terms of presentation, although he insisted on 'the ear being favoured over the eye'.⁷³ Once again, theatre collapsed into drama as literature. Nevertheless, both American and English theorists in general believed that the genre of tragedy remained relevant: 'its observations on moral order, on the human condition, on guilt and atonement were still operative for modern man'.⁷⁴ In Germany, however, a 'sense of living in a world in decline' was widespread and German social theorists took a much more pessimistic view of the relevance of tragedy to the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
contemporary world. This debate can still be seen in the 1950's and 60's, although few by then defended the traditional concept of tragedy 'as a mode of ordering the universe'. ⁷⁵ Styan considered that formal tragedy was 'a lost genre', lost when 'the ritual and religious sharing of the tragic experience ceased – quite early, probably before Euripides'. It was a 'colossal' form of theatre which was no longer 'imaginable'. ⁷⁶ At the same time, a debate continued over the importance of performance to the dramatic script . As part of this debate, there was renewed argument over the function of the actor . Was acting a creative art, or was the actor simply a (hopefully transparent) medium for the creative work of the dramatist?
Tragedy (1924)	W.M. Dixon (1866-1946) American critic	The aim of tragedy was not to document the hopelessness of the human condition but to show how 'great and astonishing' is the world of which man is a part. Modern ideas of tragedy, with their focus on social and psychological concerns, destroyed the 'joy' of tragedy. ⁷⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To show the world	Doing: drama (tragedy) Showing: how 'great and astonishing' the world is
Principles of Literary Criticism (1924)	I.A. Richards (1893-1979) Critic; rhetorician	An attempt to apply the insights offered by psychology to the experience of art. Art 'organizes and balances emotional responses'. ⁷⁸ The most powerful art deals with the balance of opposing emotion. In tragedy, '[pity], the impulse to approach, and Terror, the impulse to retreat, are brought ... to a reconciliation which they find nowhere else'. The best tragedies offer the highest experiences man can achieve, harmonizing and creating joy from the confrontation of impulses which are generally avoided. It teaches that 'all is right here and now in the nervous system'. ⁷⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		To teach the present	Doing: art (tragedy) (literature)
'Dramatist and Theatre' (1924)	Ashley Dukes (1885-1959) English critic and director	Called for an end to the reign of 'Napoleonic dramatists' like Shaw and realists, who tried to 'crush' actors and directors 'under the dead weight of rigid conception'. What was required was 'work of a plastic quality that can be handled and moulded by ... fellow craftsmen' (such as Shakespeare's plays). ⁸⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-dominance of dramatist View of Theatre: positive	A craft	Performance	Doing: drama, not text.

¹ Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34.19

² Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 135-6

³ Rudyard Kipling 1923 in Mazrui, Ali A. 1975. The Political Sociology of the English Language: An African Perspective. The Hague, Paris: Mouton and Co. 209

-
- ⁴ Verdone, Mario 1996, 'Mussolini's 'Theatre of the Masses'', in Berghaus, Gunter (Ed), Fascism and Theatre: Comparative Studies on the Aesthetics and Politics of Performance in Europe, 1925-1945, Providence, Oxford, Berhahn Books, pp. 133-139.
- ⁵ Tairov 1969, Notes of a Director, trans. William Kuhlke, Coral Gables, Florida. p. 141; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 358.
- ⁶ Carlson 1984: 369
- ⁷ Carlson 1984: 369
- ⁸ Piero Gobetti 1969-74, Opere complete, Vol. 3, p. 12; in Carlson 1984: 369.
- ⁹ Carlson 1984: 369
- ¹⁰ English translation published 1923; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 156-7.
- ¹¹ Carlson 1984: 349
- ¹² Kaiser 2008/1923: 156
- ¹³ Kaiser 1963, 'Man in the Tunnel', in Walter Sokel, An Anthology of German Expressionist Drama, New York, p. 48; in Carlson 1984: 349.
- ¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 349
- ¹⁵ Kaiser 2008/1923: 156-7
- ¹⁶ Carlson 1984: 352
- ¹⁷ Gropius 1928, 'Vom modernen Theaterbau' [The latest in theatre-building], Die Scene, Vol. 18, p. 4; in Carlson 1984: 353.
- ¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 352
- ¹⁹ Cocteau 1966, 'Preface to The Wedding on the Eiffel Tower', trans. Michael Benedikt, in Michael Benedikt and George Wellwarth, Modern French Theatre, New York, p. 95-8; in Carlson 1984: 344.
- ²⁰ Lewisohn 1922, The Drama and the Stage, New York, p. 15, 23; in Carlson 1984: 363.
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 363
- ²² Carlson 1984: 364
- ²³ Nathan 1922, The Critic and the Drama, New York, pp. 31-32; in Carlson 1984: 364.
- ²⁴ Nathan 1922, The Critic and the Drama, New York, p. 91; in Carlson 1984: 368.
- ²⁵ Published in Bulletin de la Chimère, Vol. 5, May 1922; cited in Carlson 1984: 375.
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 375
- ²⁷ Marc Slonin 1962, Russian Theatre from the Empire to the Soviets, New York, p. 303; in Carlson 1984: 358.
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 358-9
- ²⁹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 429. Wilson and Goldfarb refer to these two directors as the eclectics because of their attempts to bridge realism and anti-realism (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 429-430).
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 434; Krasner 2008
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 360
- ³² Amiel 1923, 'Silence', Bulletin de la Chimère, Vol. 5, May 1923, p. 67; in Carlson 1984: 373.
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 352-3

³⁴ Quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 289.

³⁵ Brockett and Ball 2004: 289. Gropius's Total Theater of 1926, and Molnár's 'U-Theater' were the most famous attempts to realize this vision, but it still appeared in the participatory aims of theatre groups in the 1970s in England (e.g. Joan Littlewood's studio) and Australia (experimental theatre-in-education group, Pageant Theatre), and the mid-to-late C20th trend of moving the action off the stage and into the spectators.

³⁶ Carlson 1984: 352-3

³⁷ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.⁴⁷

³⁸ Eisenstein 1923 in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 43

³⁹ Eisenstein 1970, 'Montage of Attractions', trans. D. & E. Gerould, Drama and Theatre Vol. 9, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 356.

⁴⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 50

⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 376

⁴² Carlson 1984: 373

⁴³ Baty 1923, 'Réponse ...', Revue critique des idées et des lettres, August 25; in Carlson 1984: 374.

⁴⁴ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 396

⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 435

⁴⁶ Cassirer 1953-57, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, trans. Ralph Manheim, Vol. 1, p. 78; in Carlson 1984: 434.

⁴⁷ Donal Verene 1996, 'Cassirer', in Audi (ed), The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy, p. 105-6.

⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 359

⁴⁹ Trotsky 1957, Theatre and Revolution, trans. Anon, New York, p. 218; in Carlson 1984: 359.

⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 360

⁵¹ Trotsky 1957, Theatre and Revolution, trans. Anon, New York, p. 238-9; in Carlson 1984: 360.

⁵² Carlson 1984: 360

⁵³ Jones 1924, 'Notes on the Theatre', Theatre Arts, Vol. 8, pp. 323-25; in Carlson 1984: 362.

⁵⁴ Jones 1941, The Dramatic Imagination; quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 182.

⁵⁵ The last three are reprinted in Krasner 2008: 185-189 and are referenced as O'Neill 2008/1932a; 2008/1932b and 2008/1933; 'Memoranda on Masks' and 'A Dramatist's Notebook' are also excerpted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 153-7.

⁵⁶ Brandt 1998: 153

⁵⁷ Brandt 1998: 153

⁵⁸ O'Neill 1998/1932: 154

⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 362

⁶⁰ O'Neill 1924, in Oscar Cargill et al, 1961, O'Neill and His Plays, New York, pp. 108-121; in Carlson 1984: 362-3.

⁶¹ O'Neill 2008/1933: 189

⁶² Carlson 1984: 363

⁶³ O'Neill 2008/1932a: 186

⁶⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 467

⁶⁵ O'Neill 2008/1932b: 187

⁶⁶ O'Neill 2008/1933: 189

⁶⁷ O'Neill 2008/1932a: 186

⁶⁸ O'Neill 2008/1933: 188. Demonstrators frequently wear face masks of the very political figures they are protesting against. Consequently, one might see a sea of John Majors, or John Howards or President Bushes. It is a very theatrical way of deflecting attention away from the identity of demonstrators and back on to the targets of the demonstration, and the media, of course, loves it because it makes such a great image.

⁶⁹ O'Neill 2008/1932b: 188

⁷⁰ O'Neill 2008/1933: 189

⁷¹ Krasner 2008: 185

⁷² Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 157

⁷³ Carlson 1984: 365

⁷⁴ Carlson 1984: 366

⁷⁵ Carlson 1984: 446

⁷⁶ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.69-70. Styan reveals here his belief that theatre originated in religious ritual, a view that is now under challenge.

⁷⁷ Carlson 1984: 364

⁷⁸ Carlson 1984: 364

⁷⁹ Richards 1934, Principles of Literary Criticism, London, p. 245-6; in Carlson 1984: 364-5.

⁸⁰ Dukes 1924, 'Dramatists and Theatre', Theatre Arts, Vol. 8, p. 685-7; in Carlson 1984: 372.

Table 26/51 Theories of Theatre 1924(b)-1926(a)
(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'L'évolution du décor' (1924); Manifestos for the théâtre de la cruauté (1932, 1933);¹ 'Le théâtre alchimique' (1932); 'En finir avec les chefs-oeuvre' (1933); 'Le théâtre et la peste' (1934); 'Lettre à Jean Paulhan' (1936); 'Un athlétisme affectif' (1936); Le théâtre et son double (1938) (incl. 'On the Balinese Theatre' and 'No More Master-pieces');² 'Le théâtre et la	Antonin Artaud (1896-1948) French avant-garde stage and film actor, poet, director and theorist, head of Théâtre Alfred Jarry	Essential theorist. Artaud believed that drama originated 'as an expression of man's great fears, as a response to the dangers of human life, and as a reflection of the conflict which was the most potent stimulant of human progress.'³ He wanted a theatre which would change man psychologically, as opposed to explaining him psychologically, which would 'wake us up' and he 'challenged the respectability of the stage and its position as a cultural institution by his violent and vituperative assaults on his audience'.⁴ He thought that 'theatre has been created to drain abscesses collectively',⁵ but the realist theatre of the time had turned the spectator 'into Peeping Toms'.⁶ He considered discursive thought 'a barrier to the awakening of the body's inner spirit'.⁷ He called for 'the spirit and not the letter of the text' to be the focus, but rejected the goal of the Cartel des Quatre of 'retheatricalizing the theatre'. Theatre should 'throw itself back into life': 'The theatre must make itself the equal of life – not an individual life ... in which CHARACTERS triumph, but the sort of liberated life which sweeps away human individuality and in which man is only a reflection'.⁸ Designers and performers should attempt to create a theatre where the public comes 'not to observe, but to participate'.⁹ Theatre should show spectators 'the anguishes and concerns of their real lives' so that the spectator would undergo 'a real operation, involving not only his mind, but his senses and his flesh'. Weber says Artaud's theatre was underpinned by Aristotelian principles, although Artaud himself referred to Plato's forms.¹⁰ Theatre was meant to be cathartic and to teach: 'I defy a spectator whose blood will have been traversed by violent scenes ... to abandon himself on the outside to ideas of war, of revolt, and of dangerous murders'.¹¹ Against accusations that this kind of theatre would only produce more 'murder', he admitted that there was a risk, however 'though a theatrical gesture is violent, it is disinterested; ... the theatre teaches precisely the uselessness of the action'. Theatre was not an incentive but 'an exceptional power of redirection'.¹² Theatre should not be driven by the psychology of characters, which simply placed man at the centre of everything. It should be a 'theatre of magic',¹³ addressed to 'the most secret recesses of the heart',¹⁴ and which showed that the forces at work could not be 'measured in terms of the distinctive traits of modern man ... self-consciousness, freedom and autonomy'.¹⁵ Theatre also had to 'expel' God, in the form of the author-creator 'armed with a text' who kept watch, assembled and regulated	A place where spectators come to have their collective abscesses drained; a place of pure presence; an autonomous art; a vehicle by which to change life; a weapon against the illnesses and neuroses of life	Objectification The agitation of spectators to provoke self-revelation, participation and change not spectatorship; catharsis; moral education; therapy; to redirect men – to teach them that the sky could fall on them	Doing: directing; the practice of theatre Watching: the spectator was to experience the horrors of the forces at work in life and over which he had, in fact, no control. This was meant to be cathartic as well as educational, and would hopefully lead to a reduction in the violence which men did to other men.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
science' (1947)		the text through 'interpretive slaves' before the 'voyeuristic scrutiny' of 'a passive, seated public, a public of spectators, of consumers, of "enjoyers"',¹⁶ so that 'the director [is] forced to play second fiddle to the author'.¹⁷ This simply produced a perversion of the theatre. Artaud was expelled from the Cartel, which had become committed to a political role for surrealism, for advocating 'no more than a change in the internal conditions of the soul'. Artaud however argued that since the root of man's problems lay within him, 'the only revolution worthy of support' was one which freed the inner man. While his critics called him a 'formalist', interested only in art for art's sake, Artaud claimed his goal was 'extratheatrical, a reintegration of life itself'.¹⁸ He argued that 'art for art's sake' was a 'feeble and lazy idea' which was only acceptable 'as long as the life outside endures'. It was entirely inappropriate at a time when 'everything that used to sustain our lives no longer does so, that we are all mad, desperate, and sick'. It was now time 'to react'. Theatre was the vehicle by which we could do this because in theatre, whatever is gesticulated and pronounced 'is never made the same way twice': 'the theatre, utilized in the highest and most difficult sense possible' had 'the power to influence the aspect and formation of things'. In 1932, he coined the term theatre of cruelty to describe his aims. This was not cruelty in the sense of physical bloodshed, but the cruelty of 'implacable intention and decision, irreversible and absolute determination' which does not offer any release for the spectator from the heart of darkness in life which is being revealed, the implacable cruelty 'which things can exercise against us'.¹⁹ 'Everything that acts is a cruelty'.²⁰ 'We are not free. And the sky can still fall on our heads'. The theatre was created 'to teach us that first of all'.²¹ Life was cruel, for Artaud, in this cosmic sense, although recognition of this was repressed, especially in Western society with its ideas of the individual as free and autonomous. Theatre, therefore, had to be like a plague in order to reveal and release this darkness, to confront the complacent: 'Imbued with the idea that the public thinks first of all with its senses and that to address oneself first to its understanding ... is absurd, the Theater of Cruelty proposes to resort to a mass spectacle; to seek in the agitation of tremendous masses, convulsed and hurled against each other, a little of that poetry of festivals and crowds when ... the people pour out into the streets'. He wanted to 'attack the spectator's sensibility on all sides', advocating 'a revolving spectacle which, instead of making the state and auditorium two closed worlds, without

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		possible communication, spreads its visual and sonorous outbursts over the entire mass of the spectators ... to resuscitate an idea of total spectacle by which the theater would recover from the cinema, the music hall, the circus, and from life itself what has always belonged to it', a spectacle of 'direct action ... unafraid of going as far as necessary in the exploration of our nervous sensibility'.²² Theatre was 'the only place in the world, the last general means we still possess of directly affecting the organism and, in periods of neurosis and petty sensuality like the one in which we are immersed, of attacking this sensuality by physical means it cannot withstand'. Like a snake charmer charming a snake through the vibrations of his music, the theatre director would work upon the physical organism of the spectator who was 'in the center', surrounded by the spectacle, using 'sounds, noises [and] cries ... chosen ... for their vibratory quality', light and dynamic and forceful action. If nothing else, it would 'get us out of our [malaise] instead of continuing to complain about it, and about the boredom, inertia, and stupidity of everything'.²³ Artaud's 1938 book elaborated his concept of the double: 'If the theatre is the double of life, life is the double of the true theatre'.²⁴ The double of the theatre is not everyday, observed reality in its emptiness and meaninglessness (as so many world-weary users of the theatre metaphor seem to suggest). It is 'archetypal and dangerous reality' – that same reality which has been the goal of alchemy and occult experimentation. [Few users of the theatre metaphor see theatre this way – Terence, Vico and Edmund Burke seem to be the only exceptions.] Artaud desired a theatre modelled on Balinese dance in which words were eliminated, but cries and gestures would awaken an intuitive response in the spectator, in an effort to free the theatre from subordination to the text. He considered that the Balinese had realised 'the idea of pure theatre, where everything, conception and realization alike, has value, has existence only in proportion to its degree of objectification on the stage'. It was a sublimely refined form of theatre in which everything was significant, an intelligent and 'stupefying realization' of something which western theatre had only theorised about²⁵ which victoriously demonstrated 'the absolute preponderance of the director',²⁶ as a kind of 'manager of magic, a master of sacred ceremonies' generating 'an exorcism to make our demons flow', all without the use of words, and having 'nothing to do with entertainment, the notion of useless, artificial amusement, of an evening's pastime' characteristic of western theatre – and which made western theatre seem 'unspeakably gross and childish'. Yet it was also a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		popular and secular form of theatre.²⁷ This observation led Artaud to argue that if a contemporary spectator did not understand a classic play such as Oedipus Rex it was ‘the fault of Oedipus Rex and not of the public’. Too much respect for masterpieces, especially literary ones, meant that things were not being started anew or afresh. Spectators should be addressed ‘in its own language’ and in theatre forms which responded to the needs of the time: ‘Far from blaming the public, we ought to blame the formal screen we interpose between ourselves and the public, and this idolatry ... of fixed masterpieces’. ‘The public, which takes the false for the true, has the sense of the true and always responds to it when it is manifested. However, it is not upon the stage that the true is to be sought nowadays’ (contrary to his enthusiastic reception of Balinese dance theatre) ‘but in the street; and if the crowd in the street is offered an occasion to show its human dignity, it will always do so’. The ‘disinterested idea of the theatre which wishes a theatrical performance to leave the public intact’ which had existed since the Renaissance no longer showed the public anything ‘but the mirror of itself’. This was why spectators were unresponsive – they were bored. He blamed this on a preoccupation with psychology, which ‘works relentlessly to reduce the unknown to the known, to the ... ordinary’. What was needed was a theatre that would ‘shake the organism to its foundations and leave an inefaceable scar’: ‘both the theatre and we ourselves have had enough of psychology’.²⁸ Artaud then argued that the western actor had to learn to see himself and his body in terms of double as well: a ‘specter’ to be remade as a hieroglyph. Theatre was ‘not a scenic parade but a crucible of fire’ in which bodies were remade. Artaud horrified spectators with his grotesque and often incoherent readings of his writings,²⁹ and he was eventually committed to an asylum. His ideas initially exerted little influence due to the dominance of the Copeau-Jouvet tradition, however, by the 1960s they were spreading rapidly, strikingly reinforced by the work of Grotowski, despite warnings from directors such as Roger Planchon (1968) of a drift towards an alogical and ahistorical approach to theatre. Capon sees Artaud as at the opposite pole to Brecht: offering ‘a deeply emotional, unconscious and metaphysical’ view of reality as opposed to Brecht’s psychological and intellectual experience, a view of man, not in society, but in the cosmos.³⁰ Artaud’s ideas began to attract widespread interest when Peter Brook began to experiment with them in the 1960s, where they became equated with Brook’s work.³¹ According to Krasner, he, like Witkiewicz, ‘inspired the counterculture’s effort to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		merge theatre and life'.³² The 'theological stage' was 'a stage which does nothing but illustrate a discourse'³³ and was a perversion of theatre, which was a reality in its own right (like Plato's Forms) and of which man was just a pale imitation. [Rather than collapsing theatre into life, then, perhaps Artaud was trying to collapse life into theatre. Unfortunately his ideas have generated a desire to collapse theatre into life in his 'heirs' who have misunderstood this idea of theatre as a pure form which men imitate. What Artaud seemed to be trying to achieve was the kind of theatre (the mise-en-scene) which offered a glimpse of this purity, which seemed to be to do with 'presence': in theatre we could be in 'pure presence' – a kind of timeless space?]. He particularly saw language as limiting, although he too had to use it: 'All writing is garbage. People who come out of nowhere to try and put into words any part of what goes on in their minds are pigs'.³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text-based drama; anti-realist theatre which turned spectators into voyeurs (anti-Diderot) View of Theatre: functional
Psychology of Acting (1925)	Lorenz Kjerbüll-Peterson (1891- German theatre director	Concerned with how plays work in the theatre. All art is characterized by 'aesthetic illusion' and by 'conscious self-deception'. To achieve this paradoxical effect, a work must contain both 'illusion-fostering' and 'illusion-hindering' elements, so that the receiver's consciousness vacillates constantly between the two. The theatre spectator presents a particular problem, since it is essentially a psychological mob, and, as such, has a tendency to abandon itself to emotion and lose the balance essential to art. Therefore, the theatre must employ many elements to prevent this loss, such as the curtain, the proscenium frame, the use of programs etc. The most important device for spectator control is the living actor, who must be constantly aware of and adjusting the shifting balance. Since no actor ever completely embodies a role, he challenges the spectator to complete the 'mystic unity of person and character' which is one of the 'principal charms of the theatre'.³⁵ [There is something incoherent about this view. I suspect the 'mob' is just a ploy for a theory of acting, rather than an understanding of spectators as such]. It is the responsibility of the actor to encourage this process in his spectator. It is his skill in fine-tuning (by constantly observing his spectator and reacting to their slightest movement appropriately) the balance of illusion which is the source of the unique power of the theatre. This skill is developed through study of the particular concerns of his spectator, a knowledge of their hopes and fears, and a recognition of the	An art form which uses conventions to discipline spectators	To control the mob; to prevent it abandoning itself to emotion	Doing: directing; acting as a skill Showing: an aesthetic illusion Watching: spectators are a constantly variable psychological mob which needs to be controlled through the skill of the artists

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘constant variability of the mob’.³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent
‘The Negro and the American Stage’ (1926); ‘The Drama of Negro Life’ (1926)³⁷	Alain Locke (1886-1954) American philosopher, literary critic and academic	Locke was a central figure of the ‘Harlem Renaissance Movement. He advocated ‘folk art’ in drama in his efforts to elevate African American literary and cultural visibility.³⁸ He saw folk drama as the key to the development of a particular African American drama, similar to the Irish drama being produced by Synge, Yeats and O’Casey. He believed drama could change perceptions, but rejected didactic/propagandist drama. If drama was to represent the common life and everyday speech of African Americans rather than the negative stereotypes of Negroes currently presented in plays written by whites for white spectators, then political change would eventuate. Locke believed that the Negro actor already had a considerable influence on the American stage but that this influence had not spread to drama. American drama ‘for all its frantic experimentation’ was ‘an essentially anemic drama’ which lacked the vitality which Negro folk resources and natural colour, expression and ‘temperament’ could bring to it. For this to really develop, Negro dramatic art had to also free itself from the restrictions imposed on it by white theatrical conventions. It had to have ‘the courage to develop its own ideas, to pour itself into new moulds’. It could do this by drawing on its African heritage. Such a flowering of Negro drama would indicate ‘cultural and social maturity’ because ‘the surest sign of a folk renaissance seems to be a dramatic flowering’.³⁹ Locke recognized that drama flowered only a certain times in a culture’s life: ‘when life itself moves dramatically, the vitality of drama is often sapped’, suggesting that drama was not a reflection of its time. Rather ‘drama is the child of social prosperity and of a degree at least of cultural maturity’.⁴⁰ Dramatic art, like any art, required objectivity on the part of the dramatist to be great. This was why overtly political drama rarely worked: ‘it is futile to expect fine problem drama ... before the natural development in due course of the capacity for self-criticism’, which was not likely to develop while people were struggling merely to live. More important was to develop something of which the cultural group could be proud and in which they could find stimulation: ‘While one of the main reactions of Negro drama must and will be the breaking down of ... false stereotypes ... it is more vital that drama should stimulate the group life culturally and give it the spiritual quickening of a native art’.⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-black drama View of Theatre: positive; functional		Cultural and spiritual nourishment; political change	Doing: folk drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
“‘Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre’: The Story of a Little Theatre Movement’ (1926); ‘Criteria of Negro Art’ (1926) ⁴²	W.E.B. Du Bois (1868-1963) African American philosopher, sociologist, critic and Civil Rights activist	Du Bois argued against Locke for a specifically propagandist theatre as ‘a way of correcting history’s inaccuracies’. ⁴³ His four criteria for ‘a real Negro theatre’, listed in ‘Krigwa’ became ‘the clarion call of black drama’ for the twentieth century. Instead of Negro actors performing in plays by whites for white spectators, what was needed was a Negro drama evoked and watched by a Negro spectator. A ‘real Negro theatre’ must be (1) About us ; (2) By us ; (3) For us ; and (4) Near us . ⁴⁴ Du Bois believed that ‘all Art is propaganda and ever must be’, but that some of it silences the other side: ‘I do not care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda. But I do care when propaganda is confined to one side while the other is stripped and silent’. ⁴⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – propaganda View of Theatre: functional; political	A place; a movement; an art form	Propaganda - creating a ‘real Negro theatre’ by and for Negroes.	Doing: drama (art)

¹¹ The ‘Theater of Cruelty (First Manifesto)’ is reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 437-440 and in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 188-194.

² ‘On the Balinese Theatre’ and ‘No More Masterpieces’ are reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 207-216 and 216-221. They are referred to here as Artaud 2008/1938a and b. Excerpts from The Theatre and Its Double are also reprinted in Gerould 2000, as indicated. ‘No More masterpieces’ is also reprinted in Brandt 1998: 195-199 as ‘An End to Masterpieces’.

³ Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke’s Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury. 63

⁴ Gerould 2000: 434

⁵ Artaud 1938, quoted in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 191.

⁶ Artaud 2008/1938b: 218

⁷ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 393

⁸ Artaud 1938 in Derrida 2008/1966, ‘The Theatre of Cruelty and the Closure of Representation’, in Krasner 2008: 361

⁹ Artaud 1956, ‘L’évolution du décor’, Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 1, pp. 213-6; in Carlson 1984: 393.

¹⁰ Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.

¹¹ Artaud 2008/1938b: 220

¹² Artaud 2008/1938b: 221

¹³ Carlson 1984: 393

¹⁴ Artaud 1956, ‘Le Théâtre Alfred Jarry’, Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 2, pp.13-14, 23; in Carlson 1984: 393.

¹⁵ Weber 2004: 282

-
- ¹⁶ Derrida 2008/1966: 362
- ¹⁷ Derrida 2008/1966: 363
- ¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 393
- ¹⁹ Artaud 2008/1938b: 218-9
- ²⁰ Artaud 2000/1938: 435
- ²¹ Artaud 2008/1938b: 219
- ²² Artaud 2000/1938: 435-7
- ²³ Artaud 2008/1938b: 220-1
- ²⁴ Artaud, January 25, 1936, in Oeuvres complètes, Vol. 5, p. 272; in Carlson 1984: 395.
- ²⁵ Artaud 2008/1938a: 212
- ²⁶ Artaud 2008/1938a: 207
- ²⁷ Artaud 2008/1938a: 207-217
- ²⁸ Artaud 2008/1938b: 216-218. One cannot help wishing that more theatre practitioners had paid attention to this complaint of Artaud's!
- ²⁹ Gerould 2000: 434
- ³⁰ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269. 267
- ³¹ Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 191
- ³² Krasner 2008: 207
- ³³ Derrida 2008/1966: 364
- ³⁴ Quoted by Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 71
- ³⁵ Kjerbüll-Peterson 1935, Psychology of Acting, Boston, p. 75-76; in Carlson 1984: 371.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 371
- ³⁷ Originally published in Theatre Arts Monthly Vol 10(2), February 1926, and Vol 10(10), October 1926, respectively; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 159-163 and designated here as Locke 2008/1926a: 159-161 and Locke 2008/1926b: 161-163.
- ³⁸ Krasner 2008: 158
- ³⁹ Locke 2008/1926a: 159-60
- ⁴⁰ This suggests that those who hanker after life as theatre may be bored with their mundane lives.
- ⁴¹ Locke 2008/1926b: 161
- ⁴² Published in Crisis Vol 32(3), July 1926, and Vol 32(6), October 1926, respectively; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 165-168; designated here as Du Bois 2008/1926a: 165 and Du Bois 2008/1926b: 165-168.
- ⁴³ Krasner 2008: 164
- ⁴⁴ Du Bois 2008/1926a: 164-5
- ⁴⁵ Du Bois 2008/1926b: 168

Table 27/51 Theories of Theatre 1926(b)-1927

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Notes' (1926); 'Ovation für Shaw' (1926); Notes to Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny ('The Modern Theatre is the Epic Theatre') (1930);¹ 'Die Grosse und die kleine Pädagogik' (c1930); Notes to Die Horatier und die Kuratier (1934); 'Verfremdungseffekte in der chinesischen Schauspielkunst' (Alienation Effects in Chinese Acting) (1935); Theatre for	Bertold Brecht (1898-1956) German writer, director and activist	Essential theorist. The most significant and profound influence on C20th theatre, whose views on the role of the spectator almost parallel those of Hannah Arendt's in politics, offering a challenge to Aristotle and the idea of theatre as a spectator activity. He is one of the few dramatists as well known for his theories as for his plays.⁴ Krasner considers him to be 'one of the most (if not the most) important figures of theatrical theory, whose ideas have become 'embedded in the fabric of modern theatre'.⁵ This influence has not just been in the recognized areas of transgressive theatre and performance, where Brecht basically offered a way for politically minded theatre practitioners to remain in the theatre and be political, but also in the increasing specialisation of theatre functions, and the minimalist approach to staging. In Brecht we see the separation of responsibility for the various components of a production, originally as a part of his attempt to alienate or estrange by breaking up the theatrical experience into components which could work against each other. Brecht believed that 'human nature was not constant' and the 'aim of his drama was to present on the stage characters who were recognisably the creatures of their particular social and economic conditions'.⁶ He also believed that 'political commitment was a necessary condition for valid intellectual work' and that the artist's 'revolutionary role' was to transform the tools of his professions into 'tools of human liberation'.⁷ Although he believed that the theatre should be 'a place of fun and pleasure', he did not want to 'wring the pleasure' from his spectator by draining them emotionally, as in the idea of catharsis, or allow spectators to empathize with the protagonist. Brecht rejected the prevailing theory that empathy was the appropriate response to art. In empathy all one identified with was oneself: 'We are sorrowful, but at the same time we are people observing sorrow – our own'. Empathy was therefore 'hostile to thought'.⁸ Instead he wanted 'to stimulate the minds of his spectator concerning the world around them, their status in that world and the conflicts that were playing out around them', responding intellectually rather than emotionally.⁹ In these beliefs he was at loggerheads with Adorno (1944), with whom he eventually broke. Brecht's notes from the early 1920's indicate a search for a new idea of drama amid a general and widespread feeling in Germany that 'drama as an art form is outmoded'.¹⁰ He began to develop what he called episches Drama (epic theatre),¹¹ a theatre addressed to reason instead of empathy	A place of entertainment; a place of political engagement;	Entertainment and pleasure (in order to teach); 'to put morals and sentimentality on view'; to 'alienate' the spectator to encourage it to think	Doing: epic drama – a composite art involving writing, acting; directing: Showing: the actor shows the character to the spectator Watching: spectators were rational but in need of force to bring to judgment: 'what Brecht asked [or perhaps tried to force] us to do ... is to observe critically'.⁶¹ Spectators 'must have complete freedom' to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Pleasure or Theatre for Instruction’ (c1936); ² ‘Short List of the Most Frequent, Common, and Boring Misconceptions about the Epic Theatre’ (c1937); ‘Über experimentelles Theater’ (1939); ‘Weite und Vielfalt der realistischen Schreibweise’ (1954); ‘Volkstümlichkeit und Realismus’ (1958); Kleines Organon für das Theater [A Short Organum for		since reason could be relied on more than feelings, ¹² influenced by his study of Marx, whom he considered ‘was the only spectator for my plays I’d ever come across’. ¹³ He drew the term from the director Edwin Piscator. In his notes on Mahagonny (1930), he drew up a table comparing dramatic theatre with epic theatre as follows: <table><tr><td>dramatic theatre plot implicates the spectator in a stage situation wears down his capacity for action provides him with sensations experience the spectator is involved in something suggestion instinctive feelings are preserved the spectator is in the thick of it, shares the experience the human being is taken for granted inquiry he is unalterable eyes on the finish one scene makes another growth linear development evolutionary determinism man as a fixed point thought determines being feeling [Note that Brecht removed the last line in 1938 because it had led people to believe that Epic Theatre was anti-emotion when it rather aimed at the examination of emotion].¹⁵ The difference between the two forms was to do with ‘their different methods of construction’. Hallmarks of the ‘dramatic’ were: ‘strong centralization of the story, a momentum that drew the separate parts into a common relationship. A particular passion</td><td>epic theatre narrative turns the spectator into an observer but arouses his capacity for action forces him to take decisions picture of the world he is made to face something argument brought to the point of recognition the spectator stands outside, studies the human being is the object of the he is alterable and able to alter eyes on the course each scene for itself montage in curves jumps man as a process social being determines thought reason’.¹⁴</td></tr></table>	dramatic theatre plot implicates the spectator in a stage situation wears down his capacity for action provides him with sensations experience the spectator is involved in something suggestion instinctive feelings are preserved the spectator is in the thick of it, shares the experience the human being is taken for granted inquiry he is unalterable eyes on the finish one scene makes another growth linear development evolutionary determinism man as a fixed point thought determines being feeling [Note that Brecht removed the last line in 1938 because it had led people to believe that Epic Theatre was anti-emotion when it rather aimed at the examination of emotion]. ¹⁵ The difference between the two forms was to do with ‘their different methods of construction’. Hallmarks of the ‘dramatic’ were: ‘strong centralization of the story, a momentum that drew the separate parts into a common relationship. A particular passion	epic theatre narrative turns the spectator into an observer but arouses his capacity for action forces him to take decisions picture of the world he is made to face something argument brought to the point of recognition the spectator stands outside, studies the human being is the object of the he is alterable and able to alter eyes on the course each scene for itself montage in curves jumps man as a process social being determines thought reason’. ¹⁴		observe both the feelings of the character and what possesses him; this can only be achieved by disallowing empathy between spectator and character. ⁶² Spectators come to the theatre for entertainment, but different spectators took pleasure in different ways, and one of the pleasures lay in acquiring knowledge and understanding dramatic theatre plot implicates the spectator in a stage situation wears down his capacity for action provides him with sensations experience the spectator is involved in something suggestion instinctive feelings are preserved the spectator is in the thick of it, shares the experience the human being is taken for granted inquiry he is unalterable eyes on the finish one scene makes another growth linear development evolutionary determinism man as a fixed point thought determines being feeling [Note that Brecht removed the last line in 1938 because it had led people to believe that Epic Theatre was anti-emotion when it rather aimed at the examination of emotion]. ¹⁵ The difference between the two forms was to do with ‘their different methods of construction’. Hallmarks of the ‘dramatic’ were: ‘strong centralization of the story, a momentum that drew the separate parts into a common relationship. A particular passion	epic theatre narrative turns the spectator into an observer but arouses his capacity for action forces him to take decisions picture of the world he is made to face something argument brought to the point of recognition the spectator stands outside, studies the human being is the object of the he is alterable and able to alter eyes on the course each scene for itself montage in curves jumps man as a process social being determines thought reason’. ¹⁴

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the Theatre] (1948/1964). ³ The Messingkauf Dialogue (1956/1965); 'Notes on Stanislavsky' (1964).		of utterance, a certain emphasis on the clash of forces', a description which could be considered Aristotelian. An epic work, on the other hand, can be 'cut into individual pieces, which remain fully capable of life'. ¹⁶ Each part stood on its own. Brecht claims that this distinction was clear in Aristotle but had since lost its 'rigidity' – with 'epic' coming to be associated with literature. This was a misunderstanding. The terms were not oppositional and 'epic theatre' was not 'self-contradictory'. They were simply different approaches. Epic theatre had become possible because of technical advances. In epic theatre, 'the spectator was no longer [to be] in any way allowed ... to submit to an experience uncritically (and without practical consequences) by means of simple empathy with the characters in the play ... The dramatic theatre's spectator says: Yes, I have felt like that too – Just like me – It's only natural – It'll never change – The sufferings of this man appal me, because they are inescapable – That's great art; it all seems the most obvious thing in the world – I weep when they weep, I laugh when they laugh'. This 'Witchcraft' had to be 'fought against'. ¹⁷ In epic theatre, the spectator says: 'I'd never have thought it – That's not the way – That's extraordinary, hardly believable – It's got to stop – The sufferings of this man appall me, because they are unnecessary – That's great art: nothing obvious in it – I laugh when they weep, I weep when they laugh' ¹⁸ – all of which implies a certain heartlessness on the part of the spectator, forced into an objective position by the staging in order to think critically about the circumstances that the characters find themselves in. His plays attempted to demonstrate 'that society and the historical process' were not unalterable. ¹⁹ In his Notes (1930), Brecht's table of changes of emphasis between 'Dramatic Form' and 'Epic Form' indicate that Drama produced an emotional response, encouraging its spectator to become engulfed in the plot, accepting it 'as an unalterable linear development of experience'. It tended to be aesthetic or 'culinary', and encouraged passivity in the spectator whereas Epic was to produce a rational response by presenting its action as alterable, distancing the spectator, forcing them to consider other possibilities and the judge between them. Epic theatre was to be viewed as 'political' theatre. It was to feature a radical separation of theatrical elements so that each may comment on the others, again forcing the spectator to weigh alternatives and make decisions. The aim of epic theatre was educative . It was to have a social function, by exposing the hidden contradictions within a society and forcing the spectator to make a choice ('cast his vote'), to activate the spectator into a more engaged role.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		[Brecht appeared to be fond of drawing such distinctions. He repeated the process in ‘Alienation Effect’ in relation to ‘bourgeois’ theatre versus epic theatre. In bourgeois theatre objects are timeless; Man is Universal Man; the incidents in the drama are universal and the responses are inevitable; it is therefore ahistorical; Man remains unchanged and the environment in which he finds himself is merely a pretext for the story. In epic theatre, on the other hand, man is a function of his environment and the environment is a function of man – they are intertwined and therefore historical; everyday events are remarkable and each incident is ‘a unique, historical one’²⁰ which reflects the entire structure of the society at the time. Brecht complained that patrons for dramatic or ‘culinary; theatre ‘hand their normal behaviour’ in to the cloak room with their hats and ‘take their seats with the bearing of kings’. He longed to ‘persuade them to get out their cigars’ and become involved in ‘free discussions’, taking up ‘a position’ towards the production so that the means of pleasure becomes ‘an object of instruction’.²¹ In ‘Die Grosse’, Brecht distinguished between the ‘lesser pedagogy’ of epic theatre, which ‘merely democratized the theatre during the prerevolutionary period’ and was created for the instruction of the spectator and the ‘greater pedagogy’ which would transform ‘the role of playing completely, abolish[ing] the system of spectator and performer [and converting] all interests into the interests of the state’.²² In the teaching plays of the greater pedagogy instead of performers and spectators, groups of workers would participate in mutual instruction: ‘whoever presents a teaching play must perform it as a student [since it teaches] not by being seen but by being played. Fundamentally, no spectator is necessary for a teaching play.’²³ ‘Verfremdungseffekte’ is Brecht’s first extended discussion of his central concept of alienation (Verfremdung or V-effekt). Whereas bourgeois [and the use of this terminology starts to give the game away!] theatre presented events as universal, timeless and unalterable, epic theatre was an historicizing theatre; it used alienation to render events ‘remarkable, particular, and demanding enquiry’. ‘A representation which alienates is one which allows us to recognize its subject, but at the same time makes it seem unfamiliar’ and creates ‘a barrier to empathy’. One way actors could achieve this alienation was to use as a model traditional Chinese acting style to make what they did appear strange, by utilizing ‘gest’, by which he means that the movements and representation of a character

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		should arise from the social situations and contexts in which the character finds itself: 'Everything hangs on the 'story'; it is the heart of the theatrical performance ... The 'story' is the theatre's great operation, the complete fitting together of all the gestic incidents, embracing the communications and impulses that ... go to make up the audience's entertainment'. However, the spectator was not to be invited 'to fling itself into the story as if it were a river' carrying them 'vaguely hither and thither'. Rather 'individual episodes' in the story were to be 'knotted together in such a way that the knots are easily noticed' to give the spectator 'a chance to interpose our judgment' for 'If art reflects life it does so with special mirrors'.²⁴ This form of theatre restores considerable freedom to the various artists who work in the theatre. The V-Effekt became a standard part of Brecht's critical vocabulary. This effect was created by structuring the performance to foreground a key figure in such a way as to attract the full attention of the spectator, and using techniques of staging and performance which led the spectator into 'a process of discovering and interpreting the conditions of life'²⁵ through the use of self-consciousness on the part of the actors and 'anti-illusionistic staging', freezing of action, hesitations and other performance 'signals' designed to indicate a 'meta-message' vis symbolic means.²⁶ The idea is further advanced in his 1939 essay. Once again, he set up a comparison between ordinary (bourgeois) theatre and epic theatre. What he sought was not sympathetic understanding but 'surprise and curiosity'. Although this idea of alienation is now closely associated with Brecht, and Brecht is considered by some to be anti-Aristotelian, it can be detected in Aristotle's Poetics (Ch. 22: the poet had an obligation to make familiar things unfamiliar) and in Francis Bacon's concept of estrangement in Novum Organum) as well as in Shklovsky, leader of the Russian formalists (from whom Brecht borrowed the idea), although none of these gave it the political edge that Brecht did. Brecht saw social reality as essentially contradictory and rationality as sceptical and experimental. Art did not unite contradictions, as in Lukács, but encouraged thinking. Brecht thought that it was Lukács who was still trapped in the bourgeois literary tradition of realism, which had 'been as nicely corrupted as socialism by the Nazis'. Brecht considered that Lukács had defined realism too narrowly. It should be 'broad and political', and not restricted by either aesthetics or convention.²⁷ In any case, 'One cannot decide if a work is realist or not by finding out whether it resembles existing, reputedly realistic works ... In each individual case the picture given of life

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		must be compared ... with the actual life portrayed'.²⁸ Brecht contributed only his 'Short List' to the debate between American theorists over Marxist theory while he was in America. He returned to Europe in 1947, where he wrote his major theoretical statement, the Kleines Organon, which brought together the various elements of epic theory 'within an aesthetic framework':²⁹ the historicizing of the present, alienation, the actor's distance from his role, the division of the action into individual and dialectically opposed episodes, the separation of the various elements to create estrangement. Brecht specified that the actor's performance was based on knowledge rather than feeling: 'Without opinions and objectives one can represent nothing at all. Without knowledge one can show nothing; how could one know what would be worth knowing ... the choice of viewpoint is ... a major element of the actor's art'.³⁰ [Brecht articulates here a major difference between performance in the theatrical sense and performance/performativity as used in social construction and language theory. In the latter, knowledge comes through the act of performing. This may occur for the actor as well while he is performing, but is quite different from the knowledge Brecht requires the performer to have in order to perform in the theatre. See Fleche for a misunderstanding of the different kinds of knowledge involved in theatrical performance].³¹ Perhaps surprisingly, he stresses that the proper basis of theatre in the context of aesthetics is entertainment, with pleasure its only justification: 'From the first it has been the theatre's business to entertain people ... It is this business which always gives it its particular dignity; it needs no other passport than fun, but this it has got to have', but this must be within the context of the times: 'we and our forebears have a different relationship to what is being shown' and therefore we require a different theatre, one suitable for 'children of a scientific age' [based on Marxism]: 'science and art ... are there to make men's life easier, the one setting out to maintain, the other to entertain us. In the age to come art will create entertainment from the new productivity which can so greatly improve our maintenance'. This new productivity will be based on a critical attitude, which will also be applied to the theatre if it allows itself to 'be carried along by the strongest currents in its society and associates itself with those who are necessarily most impatient to make great alterations there'; 'The theatre has to become geared into reality if it is to be in a position to turn out effective representations of reality, and to be allowed to do so' so that 'the audience can 'appreciate' the feelings, insights and impulses which are distilled by the wisest, most

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		active and most passionate among us from the events of the day or the century'.³² 'The problem holds for all art, and it is a vast one ... how can the theater be both instructive and entertaining? How can it be divorced from spiritual dope traffic and turned from a home of illusions to a home of experience'.³³ However, different spectators saw different things as entertaining, and 'the contrast between learning and amusing oneself is not laid down by divine rule' and 'there is such a thing as pleasurable learning'. The division between learning and amusement was a consequence of the way power restricted the ability to learn and access to knowledge. 'If there were not such amusement to be had from learning the theatre's whole structure would unfit it for teaching', however, 'Theatre remains theatre even when it is instructive theatre, and in so far as it is good theatre it will amuse. Nor are art and knowledge 'wholly distinct fields of human activity'. People combine 'every possible aid to understanding' no matter what field they work in and Brecht claimed to draw on the scientific fields of psychology, sociology, economics and history in order to show the motivations of his characters. The spectator 'of the scientific age' required entertainment which reflects a modern, scientific view of reality. Although epic theatre was essentially a moral institution for Brecht, in that it showed the victims of social circumstances at a time when victims were generally expected to be 'contented with their lot'.³⁴ Brecht also defended epic theatre on what were primarily aesthetic rather than political grounds: it 'brings into the field of human relationships ... the scientific spirit that men already employ in their dealings with nature and the world, and thus creates an entertainment relevant for and harmonious with the modern consciousness'.³⁵ Epic theatre, then, was only suitable for certain times and places, since it 'demands not only a certain technological level but a powerful movement in society which is interested to see vital questions freely aired with a view to their solution, and can defend this interest against every contrary trend. In modern times, epic theatre was a 'vital' new force 'in the sphere of politics, philosophy, science and art'.³⁶ Despite these comments suggesting a softening of Brecht's views, his theory has come to be associated with a theatre which aims to stimulate the spectator to reason and analysis, an almost diametrically opposite position to that taken by the other major figure of theatre theory of the time, Antonin Artaud (1924). See also Barthes (1955). [Brecht's ideas are similar to those of revolutionary Russia and essentially collapse theatre into life, as well as theatre into politics]. The founders of The Living Theatre (1947) felt that Brecht (like Shaw)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		made the ‘fatal’ mistake of assuming that one could not speak directly to spectators about human problems – which is why he had used ‘theatrical diversion – allowing the spectator to enjoy the distraction and ignore the essence’.³⁷ Dürrenmatt (1955), who also had an interest in epic theatre,³⁸ but perhaps a stronger sense of the absurdity of life claimed that Brecht’s plays succeeded more or less in spite of himself but ‘so often he cuts off his own nose. Sometimes his plays say the very opposite of what they claim they say ... Often it is simply a case where Brecht, the poet, gets the better of Brecht, the dramatic theorist, a situation that is wholly legitimate and ominous only were it not to happen again’.³⁹ Eric Bentley says much the same thing.⁴⁰ Szondi (see Table 33) lists Brecht as another of the few dramatists (along with Eisenstein) who successfully broke through the ‘traditional’ form of modern drama in a way which acknowledged the spectator,⁴¹ although it seems from Dürrenmatt and Bentley’s comments that this occurred more or less by accident. The Organum indicates Brecht’s horror of the spectators for illusory theatre, ‘the theatre as we see it before us’:⁴² ‘we see somewhat motionless figures in a peculiar condition: they seem strenuously to be tensing all their muscles, except where these are flabby and exhausted. They scarcely communicate with each other; their relations are those of a lot of sleepers ... True, their eyes are open, but they stare rather than see, just as they listen rather than hear. They look at the stage as if in a trance ... a cowed, credulous, hypnotized mass’.⁴³ Nevertheless, Styan argues that Brecht’s concept of ‘the actor as critic of the play he is in, making of his performance a discussion with the spectator he is addressing’ [while startling, was] not new, except in its context of social realism ... Brecht’s epic acting has simply revived the spectator’s former function as participator, and the actor’s as theatrical go-between’.⁴⁴ Brecht’s theatre’s main function was to reveal social reality, a reaction to what he called ‘culinary theatre’ in which people’s emotions were ‘seduced into a tacit identification with the leading characters [and] where the critical faculty was lulled to sleep’.⁴⁵ He hoped his plays would start the spectator talking and wanting to change social reality. Capon says, though, that ‘a good performance of his plays’ revealed ‘a fatal weakness in the basic theory’. Emotion kept creeping back in. Spectators identified with his main characters despite Brecht’s best efforts.⁴⁶ Brecht required his actors to not try to be the character but to show the character to the spectator: ‘He is not Lear, Harpagon, or the good soldier Schweik – he is ‘showing’ them to spectators ... Giving up the idea of complete

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		transformation, the actor brings forward his text, not as an improvisation, but as a quotation ... In this sort of acting, where the transformation of the actor is incomplete, three devices can contribute to the alienation of the words and actions of the person presenting them: 1. The adoption of a third person. 2. The adoption of a past tense. 3. The speaking of stage directions and comments ... Through this threefold process the text is alienated in rehearsal and in general will remain so in performance'.⁴⁷ The aim was to break up the theatrical experience, in opposition to the Wagnerian idea of total work of art, and to draw attention to the different components making up the theatrical experience. Actors as well as spectators, 'had to be able to criticize'.⁴⁸ Brecht carried out research during the 1940's on what he called 'everyday theater': 'I have already done some work on the application of theatrical techniques to politics in fascism, but in addition to this the kind of everyday theater that individuals indulge in when no one is watching should be studied, secret "role-playing" [with the aim of] making the art of theater profane and secular and stripping it of religious elements'.⁴⁹ Erickson argues that for all his desire to alienate the spectator, he still demanded empathy from them – however, at the level of the victim rather than some abstract idea of morality,⁵⁰ although this seems to be Erickson confusing empathy and sympathy (a common confusion these days, but the distinction was clear in Brecht's time). The alienation effect was meant to hinder the spectator from simply 'identifying itself with the character in the play'. In other words, it was to work against empathy by utilising ideas from 'primitive' forms of theatre. These included fairs or circuses, as well as Chinese theatre, which Brecht first saw (in Europe) in 1935.⁵¹ The particular aspect Brecht wanted to borrow from these forms of theatre was the performer's awareness of the spectator, so that 'the audience can no longer have the illusion of being the unseen spectator at an event which is really taking place' for them. This not only would have the effect of preventing spectators from seeing themselves in the character (and thus seeing only themselves) but it also meant that 'the whole elaborate European stage technique' devoted to creating the illusion of reality by arranging scenes so that 'the audience can view them in the easiest way' could be discarded.⁵² This in itself offered a considerable benefit for cash-strapped marginal theatre producers! In going down this path, Brecht was rejecting precisely what Diderot was demanding: the right as a spectator to determine

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		what the object under view meant. Brecht, in this sense then, was attempting to take back that power from the spectator – in the name of empowering spectators but in fact as an exercise designed to return theatre to its role as moral instructor. Again, the techniques Brecht offered have proven to be of major benefit to contemporary transgressive theatre which also seeks to do this, also in the name of empowering spectators which are invariably seen as passive and accepting.⁵³ Brecht wanted to empower spectators to change what he saw as wrong with the world by forcing them to remain objective while watching a performance. Ideally, they would then sympathise rather than empathise with the characters and (in true Adam Smith style), resolve to change their society. However, Brecht never seems to consider that Chinese acting techniques might not have the same alienating effects on Chinese spectators as they did on western spectators who were unused to them. Instead, he suggests that the technique ‘misfires’ when some spectator members seem to become engrossed in what is being depicted.⁵⁴ In other words, he assumes Aristotle’s analysis of theatre relates only to Western theatre; assumes an ahistoric universality where there is only an historical convention (spectators appearing to be passive), and takes his own responses to Chinese theatre as evidence of the effect. The very things he wanted to take from Chinese acting (and elevate to an art form) were the things Diderot most despised in his contemporary theatres: the artist’s failure to portray absorption; the artist’s awareness of his performance space and awareness of his spectator; the direct communication with the spectator or, what Diderot called it, ‘playing to the audience’, the power of the performer to direct how and what spectators observed in the performance, rather than the spectator determining the meaning of what they saw. Brecht believed that Diderot’s ideal theatre ‘raped’ the spectator: ‘The Western actor does all he can to bring his spectator into the closest proximity to the events and the character he has to portray. To this end he persuades him to identify himself with him (the actor) and uses every energy to convert himself ... into ... the character’.⁵⁵ This presumably allows the character to act on the spectator as a rapist might act on a drugged victim. Thus Brecht recognizes the power of the theatre to act on spectators, but not that spectators might demand this. Perhaps, as so often happens, by the time theatre had travelled from Diderot to Brecht, this demand was extreme, and could only be seen in a negative light. Certainly Brecht suggests that it puts enormous pressures on the actor, who had to put themselves through feats of ‘conversion’ and severe training, not to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		mention the theatre as a social structure affected by financial considerations. He saw Chinese acting as ‘the artistic counterpart of a primitive technology, a rudimentary science’ which only ‘those [such as himself] who need such a technique for quite definite social purposes’ could ‘profitably study’ and turn into a scientifically based art which could ‘further the great social task of mastering life’.⁵⁶ Luckily for theatre and mankind, his heart was in the right place, unlike the proponents of Fascist aesthetics, although Brecht was committed to ‘altering and enhancing spectators’ intellectual and political receptivity’⁵⁷ at a time when Nazism was rising without any major concerted opposition in Germany, which raises questions about ‘how productive or counterproductive theater scandals have been or could be’. All his productions of plays and operas in the 1920s and 1930s provoked theatre scandals, despite the enormous variety in his work. Indeed ‘the grounds for and nature of spectators’ protests’ also varied. However, in the end the theatre scandal came to be seen as ‘a mode of reception’, which altered its significance and threw into doubt the ‘authenticity of protests’, leading to their decline after 1930.⁵⁸ Sartre argues that epic theatre only worked in the west where people had a simplistic understanding of Marxism, and it simultaneously ‘effaces’ the dramatist as well as the spectator because the work is ‘demonstrative and does not speak in his own words’. This was ‘fine’ in the west where Brecht could ‘consider himself the spokesman of the oppressed classes and “judge-explicator” of the bourgeoisie to those classes ... ‘When one does not share the aims of a social group one is defining, one can create a kind of distanciation and, as a result, show people from the outside. But when one is in a society whose principles one shares, this becomes more difficult’. One ends up with a theatre that doesn’t ‘demonstrate’ but one which ‘tries to understand’, which brings theatre back to subjectivity. ‘The error’ Brecht makes ‘lies in believing that one can present a society-object to the audience’.⁵⁹ Abel defended Brecht on the grounds that he affirmed ‘the human body in its warmth, its weakness, its susceptibility, its appetites, the human body in its longing and in its thought’. Because of this he ‘devoted indefatigably to the details of his productions ... for the right stage business to bring out the strongest meanings of his plays’⁶⁰ [which rather undoes Barthes’ claim that one could understand Brecht by reading him!]. [See 1930 (Table 28) for comments on the first performance of Mahagonny]. However, also detectable in Brecht is a Platonic thread: intellectual involvement is superior to emotional involvement.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois/Aristotelian drama (culinary theatre); pro-politically engaged and intellectual drama View of Theatre: functional
Tragedy (1927)	F.L. Lucas (1894-1967) English critic, essayist, poet and novelist	An attempt to return to Aristotle's observations before their 'modern encrustations' by the speculations of psychology. The attraction of tragedy arises from 'curiosity, the fascination of life itself and the joy of emotional experience. We go to tragedies not 'to get rid of emotions, but to have them more abundantly'. ⁶³ Tragedies which succeed in doing this 'show us something that strikes us as both significant and true to life'. ⁶⁴ Consequently, we gain a broader experience of human existence. We also gain enjoyment from 'the fineness' with which this is communicated. In the chapter entitled 'Diction and Spectacle', Lucas 'deplores the modern tendency to emphasize visual elements at the expense of the text', ⁶⁵ suggesting that the theatre 'needs an audience, not spectators ... those whose only sense is visual should have elsewhere to go'. ⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place for listening rather than seeing	Affect; to broaden human experience	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy) Showing: something significant and true to life Watching: spectators should go elsewhere – what was required was an 'audience' who would listen; audiences approached tragedy through curiosity and looking for enjoyment as well as for a broader experience of human existence
The Theatre	Stark Young	Totally rejects the Croce/Pirandello belief that translations are necessarily inferior.	A place	Performance	Doing: plays

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1927)	(1881-1963) American critic	‘Theatre is a re-creation in its own terms of a text, just as the text is a re-creation in its own terms of the raw material of life’. The success of either depends on the ability of the artist, not the quality of the material used. ⁶⁷ A play is ‘a piece of literature about a section of life written in such a way that it will go over the footlights, in such a way that what it has to say can be said in the theatre’. ⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-performance View of Theatre: positive	where plays are performed		– pieces of literature written for performance

¹ Published in Willett, John (ed) 1957, 2000, Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic, NY, Hill and Wang; reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 446-453, and in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 171-173

² Published in Willett, John (ed) 1957, 2000, Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic, NY, Hill and Wang; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 173-178.

³ Reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 233-246.

⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 450

⁵ Krasner 2008: 169, 171

⁶ Hindson, Paul, and Tim Gray. 1988. Burke's Dramatic Theory of Politics. Aldershot UK, Brookfield USA: Avebury. 178

⁷ Buck-Morss, Susan. 1977. The Origin of Negative Dialectics: Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Benjamin, and the Frankfurt Institute. New York and London: The Free Press (Collier Macmillan). 33-34

⁸ Brecht 1965 in Krasner 2008: 170

⁹ Lovelace, Alice. 1996. 'A Brief History of Theater Forms (from Aristotle to Brecht, Baraka, O'Neal, and Boal)'. In Motion Magazine February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27/02/2007.

¹⁰ The notes are collected under Elizabeth Hauptmann 1957, 'Notizen über Brechts Arbeit 1926' in Sinn und Form, Vol. 2; The quote is taken from Jan Knopf 1980, Brecht Handbuch, p. 429; in Carlson 1984: 382.

¹¹ A term he took up from Erwin Piscator (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 449).

¹² Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 383

¹³ Cited in John Willett 1964, Brecht on Theatre, New York, p. 24; in Carlson 1984: 383.

¹⁴ Brecht 2008/1930: 171-2

¹⁵ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.

¹⁶ Brecht 2008/c1936: 173

¹⁷ Brecht 2008/1930: 172

¹⁸ Brecht 2008/c1936: 174

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 420

-
- ²⁰ Brecht 2008/1936: 183
- ²¹ Brecht 2000/1930: 451
- ²² Brecht 1971, 'Die Grosse und die kleine Pädagogik' [The greater and lesser Pedagogy], Alternative 78/79, August 1971, p. 126; in Carlson 1984: 385.
- ²³ Brecht 1963-67, Schriften zum Theater [Writings on Theatre], Frankfurt, Vol. 3, p. 1022-1024; in Carlson 1984: 385.
- ²⁴ Brecht 1998/1948: 240-246
- ²⁵ Kiebuszinska, Christine Olga 1988, Revolutionaries in the Theater: Meyerhold, Brecht, and Witkiewicz, Ann Arbor MI, UMI Research Press; cited in Calkowski, Marcia 1991, 'A Day at the Tibetan Opera: Actualized Performance and Spectacular Discourse', American Ethnologist 18(4), pp. 643-657: 88
- ²⁶ Calkowski 1991: 652.
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 391
- ²⁸ Brecht 1958, 'Volkstümlichkeit und Realismus', Sinn und Form, Vol. 4, p. 109; in Carlson 1984: 391.
- ²⁹ Brecht 1998/1948: 233
- ³⁰ Brecht 1998/1948: 243..
- ³¹ Fleche, Anne. 1997. 'Echoing Autism: Performance, Performativity, and the Writing of Donna Williams'. TDR (1988-) 41 (3) pp. 107-121.
- ³² Brecht 1998/1948: 233-7
- ³³ Brecht 1964, 'A Short Organum for the Theatre' in Brecht on Theatre, trans. J. Willett, London; in Barber, Benjamin R. 1978. 'Rousseau and the Paradoxes of the Dramatic Imagination'. Daedalus 107 (3) pp. 79-92.84-5.
- ³⁴ Brecht 2008/c1936: 175-7
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 392
- ³⁶ Brecht 2008/c1936: 178
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 420
- ³⁸ Krasner 2008: 287
- ³⁹ Dürrenmatt 1955, in Krasner 2008: 290
- ⁴⁰ Bentley, Eric, ed. 1978. The Theory of the Modern Stage: an Introduction to Modern Theatre and Drama. England: Penguin Books.
- ⁴¹ Szondi 1956: 141 in Carlson 429-430
- ⁴² Brecht 1998/1948: 237
- ⁴³ Brecht 1998/1948: 237-8; Brecht 1964, 'A Short Organum for the Theatre' in Brecht on Theatre, trans. J. Willett, London; in Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.126.
- ⁴⁴ Styan 1975: 175
- ⁴⁵ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269. 265
- ⁴⁶ Wilson and Goldfarb claim that the influence of Brecht has recently begun to be questioned, with critics pointing to his tendency to appropriate the work of others, particularly female collaborators, without acknowledgment, his capitalist management of his financial affairs (despite his Marxist position) and his unwillingness to criticize the totalitarian government of East Germany (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 453).
- ⁴⁷ Brecht quoted in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.355
- ⁴⁸ Brecht 1964 in Krasner 2008: 171

-
- ⁴⁹ Brecht, journal entry 6th December 1940, quoted in Fiebach, Joachim. 2002. 'Theatricality: From Oral Traditions to Televised "Realities"'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2 and 3) pp. 17-32. 32
- ⁵⁰ Erickson, Jon. 2006. 'Presence'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 142-159. 157
- ⁵¹ Krasner 2008: 184
- ⁵² Brecht 2008/1936: 178-9
- ⁵³ This suggests that theatre theory, like political theory, see-saws between allowing power to spectators and then wresting it back – usually in the name of empowering spectators along certain preferred lines. Brecht, for example, wanted to empower spectators to change what he saw as wrong with the world by forcing them to remain objective while watching a performance.
- ⁵⁴ Brecht 2008/1936: 181
- ⁵⁵ Brecht 2008/1936: 180
- ⁵⁶ Brecht 2008/1936: 182
- ⁵⁷ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. xiii
- ⁵⁸ Blackadder 2003: xiii
- ⁵⁹ Sartre, Jean-Paul. 2008/1960. 'Beyond Bourgeois Theatre'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 318-323. 322-3
- ⁶⁰ Abel 2008/1963 (in Krasner)
- ⁶¹ Blau, Herbert. 1989. 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play'. In By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, edited by R. Schechner and W. Appel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272. 264
- ⁶² Brecht 1998/1948: 241
- ⁶³ Lucas 1957, Tragedy, London, p. 73; in Carlson 1984: 365.
- ⁶⁴ Carlson 1984: 365
- ⁶⁵ Carlson 1984: 365
- ⁶⁶ Lucas 1957, Tragedy, London, p. 166; in Carlson 1984: 365.
- ⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 371
- ⁶⁸ Young 1954, The Theatre, New York, p. 48; in Carlson 1984: 372.

Table 28/51 Theories of Theatre 1928-1937

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Physiognomie der Zeit und Theater der Zeit' (1928)	Wilhelm Michel (1877-1942) German literary critic and philosopher	The reappearance of turn-of-the-century naturalism as Neue Sachlichkeit [New Realism], drama which would show 'the 'thing' itself, life itself, the authentic object' [because] 'Illusion is no longer acceptable'. In such a 'problematic' era, theatre was to be 'direct' and 'of real action'. ¹ Its aim was to 'accumulate evidence and stimulate discussion of contemporary problems'. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-naturalism in theatre View of Theatre: functional	A place for witnessing; a courtroom	To show evidence	Doing: drama Showing: the thing itself - Realism Watching: spectator as witness and judge
'The Oberiu Manifesto' (1928)	Daniil Kharms (c1905-1938) Russian avant-garde theorist	The Oberiu was one of the last theatrical avant-garde groups to appear in Soviet Russia. The Manifesto advanced a theory of leftist art which aimed, not at realism, but at an 'organically new concept of life [which would] penetrate into the center of the word, of dramatic action, and of the film frame'. Art had a logic of its own, and could not be forced to resemble life without falsifying it. Instead of a dramatic plot, there should be a 'scenic plot, which arises spontaneously from all the elements of our spectacle'. There should be no attempt to subordinate individual elements because their conflicts and inter-relationships were the basis of theatre. ³ The Oberiu disbanded in 1930, as the realistic approach triumphed. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realist art View of Theatre: positive		To allow the conflict between the elements of the art to show	Doing: art Showing: a 'scenic' plot
Ursprung des deutschen Trauerspiels (1928); Versuche über Brecht (written 1930's, published 1966); 'The Work of Art in the Age	Walter Benjamin (1892-1940) German literary and cultural critic; member of the Frankfurt School	Drew a distinction between classic Greek tragedy and the modern form, dating from the baroque, which he called trauerspiel (mourning play), claiming it was in fact an entirely different genre, based on a different foundation and seeking a different effect. Tragedy had perished with the Greeks: only its 'rules' had been revived. ⁶ Myth was the basis of Greek tragedy, while history was the basis of trauerspiel . Classic tragedy depicted a 'cosmic achievement' and transcendence; trauerspiel is enacted in 'an inner world of feeling' that separates human existence and mortality from any transcendental meaning. Instead of transcendence there are only allegories indicative of the corruption of existence. ⁷ Benjamin supported Brecht's theories and concepts, although he was sympathetic to Adorno's position. Brecht had realised that a change in theatre required a change in production techniques, otherwise any proletarian theatre would simply be absorbed into traditional entertainment. Benjamin called Brecht's technique 'montage'.	A place; a distinct and significant, historical artistic form	Entertainment ; possibly transcendence ; moral and political instruction; experimentation; to allow collective experience; strategic	Doing: art (literature); an endorsement of Brecht's epic theatre Watching: the spectator is positioned by the production to enable the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
of Mechanical Reproduction' (1936); ⁴ 'What is Epic Theatre?' (1939) ⁵		By bringing action 'to a stand-still in mid-course [it] compels the spectator to take up a position towards the action, and the actor to take up a position towards his part'. ⁸ Art for Benjamin served theological, philosophical and political ends. Fascism 'gives the masses ... a chance to express themselves' which leads to the aestheticization of politics, and hence to war, while communism politicizes art. ⁹ The rise of photography and the rise of socialism were also linked, and had resulted in the attempt to 'theologise' art i.e. turn it into 'pure' art or art for its own sake, as can be seen in the work of Mallarmé. ¹⁰ Despite its implications in totalitarianism, Benjamin defended photography and cinema. Not only had technical reproduction become an art form in itself, but it allowed 'simultaneous collective experience [which] encourages progressive rather than reactionary responses from the masses'. ¹¹ However, they exploited a 'new mode of perception' (first introduced by architecture) – the idea of 'reception in a state of distraction' in which 'the public is an examiner but an absent-minded one', ¹² one who combines enjoyment with 'the orientation of the expert'. ¹³ This fusion occurs because film separates the spectator from the actor, enabling them to 'take the position of a critic, without experiencing any personal contact with the actor'. ¹⁴ This produces an approach of 'optical testing' of the actor in which the actor has no opportunity to adjust his performance to the spectator and encourages the actor to represent himself rather than 'someone else', especially because he finds himself in a position in which he must expose 'his whole living person' without the aura which is created through interaction with spectators in live performance and often without the benefit of continuity. This leads to minimalist acting in 'many separate performances', produces the 'star' as an alternative, compensatory 'mode of aura' and paves the way to the possibility of anyone becoming an actor. This is what places the spectator in the position of expert, while at same time allowing them to enjoy what they see. ¹⁵ Film, by focusing attention and scrutiny of small 'slips of behaviour' both helps us understand the necessities which rule us, but also expands our field of action. Thus film is a new form of participation in art, one in which the work of art is absorbed into the spectator rather than the other way round. ¹⁶ It is not the same experience as viewing a stage play: there was 'no greater contrast than that of the stage play to a work of art that is completely subject to or, like the film, founded in mechanical reproduction'. ¹⁷ The theatre 'remains a distinct and significant artistic form'. ¹⁸ Benjamin celebrated the rise of technology which enabled the mechanical reproduction of art because, although art lost			absorption of the spectator into the play; Brecht's epic theatre filled in 'the orchestra pit', an 'abyss which [had] separated the players from the spectator as it does the dead from the living', and allowed the actor 'to sit down on a dais' within direct reach of the spectator; 'The adjustment of reality to the masses and of the masses to reality is a process of unlimited scope'. ²¹

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		its 'aura', it became more accessible to people, as well as de-emphasising the idea of an 'original'.¹⁹ Benjamin wrote many unfinished pieces on numerous and original themes. He tried to combine Marxist historical materialism with Judaic spirituality, and to recover history 'from the bottom up'. A friend of Brecht's, he supported his notion of a didactic, epic and revolutionary theatre. He claimed that Brecht's epic theatre was an attempt to recover the forms of theatre of the past which acknowledged and included its spectator, as well as bringing back to idea of the 'untragic Hero'. The allowed catharsis to be eliminated, as well as appeals to empathy. Instead, the aim was to produce astonishment in the spectator – astonishment 'at the circumstances under which [characters] function'. This astonishment was produced and marked by the use of the technique of 'interruption': 'one of the fundamental devices of all structuring' and one which produced 'gestic' theatre. Epic theatre was meant for the actors as much as for the spectators. 'Every spectator is enabled to become a participant' and every actor was 'cool and relaxed'. Since the actor had responsibility for 'showing his subject' as well as showing himself, he had to reserve for himself 'the possibility of stepping out of character artistically' to reflect about his part. In this way, epic theatre filled in 'the orchestra pit', an 'abyss which [had] separated the players from the audience as it does the dead from the living', and allowed the actor 'to sit down on a dais' within direct reach of the spectator.²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-participatory theatre such as epic theatre View of Theatre: functional
Thèses (1928)	The Prague Linguistic Circle	The first significant attempt to apply semiotics to theatre analysis. The theses distinguished between the practical function of language and its poetic function 'when language is directed toward the sign itself'.²² Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional		Signification	Doing: textual analysis Showing: the semiotic character of theatrical language Watching: reading signs
The Modern Temper	Joseph Wood Krutch	Another, pessimistic, contribution to the debate over tragedy. Tragedy was no longer possible because man had 'lost the conviction that his actions [were] significant'. We		To show that action was	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1929)	(1893-1970) American writer, critic and naturalist	could still read tragedies, but could no longer write them, and soon even this would disappear. ²³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – end of tragic genre View of Theatre: negative		significant	(tragedy)
1930: premiere of Brecht and Kurt Weill's The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny was 'tumultuous',²⁴ producing the following musings by critic Alfred Polgar: 'Theatre scandals are tremendously stimulating. It's good to see people ready to come to blows over the theoretical questions which art brings up – or throws down – and getting so worked up that they're beside themselves. There's nothing to be won in such battle in the theater (battles which ... remind one of religious wars) other than the upper hand, and yet they're fought with venomous effort, as if prizes were up for grabs ... And the festive character that goes along with every gathering of paying theatregoers all at once reveals surprisingly malicious traits. Perfectly healthy people are overcome by a shouting-fever, and it's contagious; they turn red in the face and whistling comes out of them; suddenly, innocuous souls conceive and admit to an opinion, instead of calmly waiting for one to be delivered to them in the morning paper'.²⁵ The 1930s was 'a pivotal decade in modern dramatic theory', producing three major theorists: Brecht, Artaud and Stanislavski (who only began to write towards the end of his life). Interest in soviet culture was also high in America, with experimental theatre such as The Group Theatre (founded in 1931) relying heavily on Russian theatre experiments for inspiration. Lee Strasberg, who was in charge of acting at The Group, had translations of several of Stanislavski's speeches which he used for actor training, as well as notes on actor training by Vakhtangov.²⁶ Later, two members of the Group, Stella Adler and Harold Clurman, went to France to study directly under Stanislavski. Their claim that Stanislavski placed more emphasis on the study of text and character than on the actor's emotional memory led to a split with Strasberg, who left the company.²⁷ The period also featured a distinct division between commercial theatre, aimed at making money, and more socially committed theatre such as the workers' theatres, which aimed at social change. Workers' theatres considered theatre 'a weapon in man's struggle for justice'.²⁸ In general, the focus was on doing, in particular with the art of acting, with little regard for showing (except amongst those interested in semiotics), and even less for watching. The interest in developing a drama 'relevant to the concerns of the common man and to the problems of contemporary society' was widespread, although there was not necessarily agreement on how to go about it.²⁹ Brecht's ideas were challenged even within Germany, by both von Horváth and Lukács. In America and England there was a long and tedious debate between mostly literary theorists over whether or not a modern form of tragedy was possible. Although drama was recognized as being something which was 'presented' [with all the varying degrees of performativity this might imply], the debate was generally based on the usually implicit assumption that drama was literature and reading was capable of giving an adequate account of it.
Counter-Statement (1931); The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941); The Grammar of Motives (1945); 'Dramatic	Kenneth Burke (1897-1993) Literary and music theorist, critic, rhetorician and philosopher	A response to Krutch's pessimism regarding the future of tragedy. Burke agreed that any work of art reflects to some extent its own time, but rejected the prognosis of decline and decay. Modern society no longer shared a common ideology or moral system, which meant that modern art had become more centred on the artist's 'subjective' experience. However, the concerns of tragedy - 'man's intimate participation in processes beyond himself' – remained. Instead of investigating the relationship to a divine process, it now investigated the relationship to an historic process: 'the slow, unwieldy movement of human society'. ³¹ In his 1941 book, Burke suggests that since human beings enact roles, define themselves by actions, and participate in social dynamics in life as in drama , 'human relations should be analyzed with respect to the leads discovered by a study of	A place for the presentation of plays; an historically contingent activity	A way of imposing order on life	Doing: drama (literature) Watching: spectators quickly work out what not to expect and apply these 'negative expectations'

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Form – And: Tracking Down Implications’ (1966) ³⁰		the drama’.³² This idea is developed in his subsequent books where it becomes known as dramatism. According to Puchner, dramatism is based on a ‘theory of gesture’. Gesture was ‘the category that connects corporeality to linguistic articulation and therefore promises to fill the gap left by theories of language based on the semantic ideal’.³³ Literary work for Burke was more than ‘mere text’. It was ‘designed to ‘do something’ for the poet and the reader ... and we can make the most relevant observations about it ... by considering [it] as the embodiment of this act’.³⁴ Tragedy begins with an action which arouses opposition, leading to knowledge or learning. This ‘tragic rhythm’ could be used to analyse not only imaginative literature, but most human actions. Burke’s main interest was in the ‘shifting, mutually illuminating, and conditioning elements of the dramatic situation’.³⁵ Critics who wanted to analyse modern drama, especially avant-garde drama, should pay attention to the terminology used in the play because particular terminologies had particular implications. For a start, the critic should consider the title of the play as a possible unifying issue. For example, Ionesco’s Victims of Duty, which in the surface seems to defy any attempt to locate some kind of internal or structural unity can be analysed in terms of a juxtaposition of victimhood and duty. Any work, no matter how radical, must have some kind of internal consistency, albeit of a fragmentary nature, to exist as a ‘work’: ‘Trick it out as you will, you can’t get a work of art without some measure of internal consistency. Man is of such a nature that, if you throw down pebbles at random, he will necessarily see them as falling into some kind of order. At its extreme, even the sheer word “chaos” imposes an order. A total violation of classical propriety is simply impossible ... for if a work did not embody classical principles of consistency and development at least in fragmentary ways, it could not even continue to be’ as a work. The critic’s job was to locate this principle. Burke believed that it might be possible ‘to work out a calculus for studying the internal consistency’ that would ‘fit all plays’ even contemporary ones that had ‘abandoned the traditional classical criteria of form’.³⁶ [Of course, this kind of analysis can only occur after the event of creation. There is no evidence that dramatists are as aware of their application of principles as the critic is able to make them seem, and there is evidence to the contrary: many playwrights claim to write ‘by instinct’, discovering their rules when they have finished creating, although this is not to say that they might not have absorbed some principles in their early education). The careful analysis Burke applies to plays such as			when approaching avant-garde theatre. ³⁷

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Victims of Duty may enhance one's enjoyment of the play, but there seems to be something cold-blooded about these kinds of analyses]. Burke suggests that the presentation of plays in theatre is underpinned by an implicit theory of motivation. This theory claims that motivation is revealed to spectators in a number of ways. He designates these as his 'dramatic pentad': five areas in which motivation is displayed: ... We are able to use these theatrical terms to help us locate the visible signs of motivations in any public behaviour, since the theory of motivation used in the theatre must have originated in the close observation of human behaviour, otherwise the reproduction of these visible signs would not mean anything to us. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional
On Dramatic Method (1931)	Harley Granville-Barker (1877-1946) English critic and director	A concern with the dynamics of performance. The actor was not an interpreter but a collaborator. The hidden depths of a text were only revealed in performance. Sometimes a dramatist might envision something beyond 'the imperfect medium' of the actor, but this just serves to drive the actor to do better. (A similar position to that of Copeau: see 1913).³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – performance as collaboration View of Theatre: positive	A collaborative art	To reveal the text	Doing: acting as a collaboration, not an interpretation
'What the Group Theatre Wants' (1931)	Harold Clurman (1901-1980) American theatre director and critic; founding member of the Group Theatre	A good play was not literature or art, but one which presented contemporary social or moral problems in the hope of solving them.³⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-socially and politically engaged theatre View of Theatre: functional	A social and political institution	The presentation of contemporary social or moral problems	Doing: directing Showing: possible solutions
'A Theatre is Born' (1931)	Hallie Flanagan (1890-1969) American director of the Federal Theatre Project	Distinguished between two kinds of theatre: commercial theatre, 'which wants to make money' and the workers' theatre, 'which wants to make a new social order'.⁴⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent	A practice	Depends on the kind of theatre	Doing: directing
The Aesthetics	Otakar Zich	The first major Czech work on theatre theory. Zich rejected Wagner's Gesamtkunstwerk		Performance	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
of the Art of Drama (1931)	(1879-1934)	[total fusion] The various elements in dramatic art interacted with each other to produce both the material or physical (audial and visual) elements and the imagery or conceptual elements of dramatic action, character, dramatic plot, and dramatic place. The distinction between physical and conceptual elements brought his theory close to semiotics' distinction between signifier and signified, and Zich's work was extensively drawn on by Prague linguists such as Mukařovský. ⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – an interactive art View of Theatre: positive			- an interactive art Showing: visualization and materialization of the interactive process
'An Attempt at a Structural Analysis of a Dramatic Figure' (1931); 'Art as Semiotic Fact' (1934); 'On the Current State of the Theory of the Theatre' (1941)	Jan Mukařovský (1891-1975) Prague Linguist	The application of semiotics to theatre analysis. Representational arts such as theatre do use signifiers in an informational way, but all signs in art were primarily 'autonomous', referring to 'the total content of social phenomena'. The recognition of the semiotic character of art was essential to understanding the function of art. His 1931 essay was an analysis of the 'gestural signs' used by Chaplin in City Lights . ⁴² Mukařovský's 1941 essay was 'a kind of summation' of the first generation of semiotic/structuralist criticism of theatre, which aimed to demonstrate that, despite all the material tangibility of its means, the theatre is essentially 'an immaterial interplay of forces moving through time and space and pulling the spectator into its changeable tension, into the interplay which we call a stage production, a performance'. ⁴³ The analysis of this interplay had encouraged the study of certain basic elements of theatre – particularly the text, the dramatic space, the actor, and the spectator – and produced some central critical problems which were to be taken up in the late 1960s when semiotics re-emerged as a major critical approach. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional	A representat-ion art featuring an interplay between time and space before spectators	The generation of tension	Doing: performance – an interplay of forces indicated through gesture Watching: reading gestures
The Case for Tragedy (1932)	Markham Harris (1907-2001) American literary critic	Follows a similar argument to Kenneth Burke (1931). Aside from philosophical and aesthetic concerns, 'one must always keep in mind the sociological concerns of the drama', the values cherished by the spectator's era, which are 'objectified for him in the dramatic spectacle'. Tragedy always 'places in jeopardy' ⁴⁵ the personal or collective values of an era. As long as man seeks value, in whatever form, in the universe and fears challenges to that value, a tension is created which makes tragedy possible'. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A social institution	Objectification of the values of an era	Doing: drama (tragedy) Showing: objectification of the social values of an era
Interview	Odön von	Horvath, too, drew a distinction between the old theatre (the Volksstück or folk theatre)	An artistic	To expose	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1932); 'Gebrauchsanweisung' (1932)	Horváth (1901-1938) Hungarian dramatist	and a new theatre which would depict the concerns of the people 'seen through the eyes of the people'. Unlike Brecht's theatre, it would 'call upon the instincts rather than the intellect', and attempt to expose 'the eternal combat between the conscious and the subconscious [and] the extremely private instinctive impulses' of his characters and thereby of his spectators. Horváth too, singles out the bourgeois, not to dismiss them, but to expose to them the contradictions between their 'jargon of culture' and 'the authentic agonies of repressed psychological impulses' as well as their repression of an unjust socioeconomic system. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – a new theatre by the people View of Theatre: functional	form	contradiction	playwrighting - new drama Showing: the depiction of the concerns of the people; the conflict between conscious and subconscious
'Tatsachenroman' und Form-experiment: Eine Entgegnung an Georg Lukács' (1932) ⁴⁸	Ernst Ottwalt (1901-c1936) German novelist	A Brechtian response to Lukács criticisms of 1932 (1911): it was 'not the duty of our literature to stabilize the reader's consciousness but to alter it'. ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – political theatre View of Theatre: functional		Instigation of change	Doing: to alter the spectator's (reader's) consciousness
1933: Hitler seized power in Germany. The Communist Party in Germany disappeared, and with it the debate within Marxist literary and theatre criticism between Lukács' position and the Brechtian view. Lukács escaped to Russia where he found support for his views in Russian socialist realism. Brecht escaped first to Denmark and then to America, where 'he found the familiar Lukács controversy awaiting him, played out between Mordecai Gorelik (1940) for Brecht and John Howard Lawson (q.v 1936) for Lukács'. ⁵⁰
'Plays' (1935) ⁵¹	Gertrude Stein (1874-1946) American-born poet, playwright, author and feminist	Although 'the business of art' should be 'to completely express the complete actual present', time in a play rarely harmonized with the emotional present of the spectator, which was always 'syncopated'. In theatre 'the emotion of the one seeing and the emotion of the thing seen do not progress together'. Rather, 'the emotion of the one seeing is always ahead or behind the play'. In particular the excitement of crisis and climax and the abrupt development of character were profoundly different from that experienced in real life. In exciting moments in real life, a crisis continued until emotion and action come together completely. ⁵² This never happened in the theatre. One anticipated and was therefore nervous from the beginning or rethought what had	A place or space for looking	Creating an image; to express the 'complete actual present'; to generate an experience; to become	Doing: playwrighting ; art (as landscape) Showing: an image of the complete actual present, the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		happened afterwards. A playwright should then aim to create a ‘timeless’ or ‘perpetually present’ theatre by rejecting concerns with crisis and climax, beginning, middle and end, foreshadowing, character development and intrigue – the staples of the dramatic form – in favour of ‘a flow of existence’, which the spectator would merely observe as he would a landscape, the relationship between stage and spectator only being important at the moment of observation. [This is an idea which was to be taken up by Robert Wilson]. Although ‘Plays’ considers in fine detail the differences between being spectators to a real, exciting event, a reader of an exciting book and a spectator at a theatrical event, Stein refused to ‘dissect the aesthetic experience’. When she was asked what she liked about Picasso’s paintings, she was said to have replied ‘that she liked to look at them’.⁵³ Looking was the key to aesthetic experience. Stein ‘tried to live her life in looking ... She always preferred looking to remembering’ because ‘the intensity of experience is what occupied her’.⁵⁴ It was the writer’s job to try and make that as immediate and as integrated as possible. According to Marranca, Stein shared with John Cage ‘an absolute devotion to the idea that a work exists beyond its status as an object, that it is experienced in a cultural space’.⁵⁵ Stein was always concerned about the relationship between looking and reading and looking and hearing. Her comparisons make it clear why looking in the theatre can never be reading. Looking is a continual attempt to keep up, without the benefit of going back. This is why we have programmes and cast lists, because, unlike in a book, or in real life, the people we meet are suddenly already there before you know them, and you have to get ‘acquainted’ very quickly. There is no process of ‘familiarization’ like there is in real life or in a read character. They are ‘completely in the actual present’.⁵⁶ Marranca says that ‘a grand theme of her work and life’ was ‘making acquaintance’. It was not meaning that counted but ‘what happens and how’.⁵⁷ Like Diderot, Stein was concerned about the different impacts of seeing and hearing and whether or not hearing affected seeing. Diderot preferred to block his ears and just watch, for he saw words and the physical embodiments of acting a distraction from seeing. Stein, in the other hand, believed that visual impact always came first and the problem with hearing was that it lagged behind seeing, and therefore constantly interfered with it. Theatre was thus a process of continual interferences and this is what produced the excitement. There was a lot ‘to do’ for the spectator, it all had to be done at once, and yet there were constant interferences to this process. This kind of		acquainted	flow of existence; plays as landscapes (spatial) Watching: spectator as a tourist in a landscape: observation creates the moment of relationship between stage and spectator; looking as the key to aesthetic experience; looking as aesthetics is always out of sync with the spectator’s feelings. The spectator had ‘a lot to do’ during a performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		immediacy of experience could also, apparently, be exhausting. Stein has not been the first to have had enough of theatre at some stage in their lives and find that they can stay away from it for years at a time, but she may be one of the first to think about why this might be the case, especially for someone who wrote plays, as she did, and for whom ‘the creation of an experience was more important than the representation of an event’.⁵⁸ ‘In every sense, the perceiving intelligence took precedence over the art object ... the observer and the art object were ... interdependent’ and her major concern was not with ‘creating a drama’ but with creating ‘an image’. She utterly rejected Aristotelian catharsis and the idea of theatre as some kind of ‘communitas’. Her plays were ‘experiential and formal’, concerned with perception and its relationship to emotion and time: ‘what you see is what you know, sight is insight’. Memory prevented or interfered with the immediacy of experiencing, and her life and her work aimed at ‘a freeing of the mind from memory in order to let the immediacy of experience take over’.⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Aristotelian theatre View of Theatre: positive
‘Characteristics of Negro Expression’ (1934) ⁶⁰	Zora Neale Hurston (1891-1960) African American writer	Hurston was prominent during the 1930s and 40s, primarily as a novelist, although she worked in theatre as well as taught drama. She saw ‘real’ Negro theatre as being ‘regional, particular and endemic to the working class’, to be found in the road-side shack bars, work camps and front porches of the rural south. She challenged her colleagues to represent the essence of black Southern culture, arguing that they were ignorant of working class life. She also argued that ‘Negro expression’ was a communal art which combined everyday experience with self-conscious creation.⁶¹ Negro expression was characterized by a number of qualities. It was permeated with drama. Drama permeated the entire Negro self: ‘Every phase of Negro life is highly dramatic ... No little moment passes unadorned’ and ‘[e]verything is illustrated’ in the posings of their bodies. Their homes, their clothes and even their language were ‘adorned’: ‘Whatever the Negro does of his own volition he embellishes’ including his religious services, generally with ‘angularity’ and ‘asymmetry’ and ‘abrupt and unexpected changes’. His dancing is ‘restrained, but succeeds in gripping the beholder by forcing him to finish the action the performer suggests’ rather than expressing it fully for him as a western dancer attempts to do. They continually produce ‘folklore’ as a thing in the making, drawing on anything to hand: ‘nothing is too old or too new’ to be used. He reinterprets ‘everything he touches ... for his own use ... He has modified the language, mode of food preparation, practice	A space where drama is performed before spectators; a social institution	The embellishment of life	Doing: playwrighting - ‘real’ Negro drama has the characteristics of real Negro expression; it is a communal art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of medicine and most certainly the religion of his new country', modes of haircut and whites' musical instruments. Negroes are renowned as mimics – 'an art in itself' – but it is done for the love of it. As 'an outdoor people accustomed to communal life' there is no concept of privacy: 'The community is given the benefit of a good fight as well as a good wedding. An audience is a necessary part of any drama'. Negro theatre is simply a reflection of Negro life in this respect. The Negro theatre 'is already established. It is lacking in wealth, so it is not seen in the high places. A creature with a white head and Negro feet struts the Metropolitan boards. The real Negro theatre is in the jooks and the cabarets' not in the 'bleached' choruses and black-face seen in New York.⁶² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – genuine Negro theatre View of Theatre: positive
'The Prophecy of Lorca' (1934) ⁶³	Federico García Lorca (1899-1936) Spanish poet and dramatist	Lorca believed in a politically motivated theatre. He described himself 'as an ardent lover of the theatre of social action ... A theatre which in every branch, from tragedy to vaudeville, is sensitive and well oriented, can in a few years change the sensibility of a people ... a broken-down theatre, where wings have given way to cloven hoofs, can coarsen and benumb a whole nation'.⁶⁴ His plays attempted to advance his belief in socialism and human rights.⁶⁵ 'The theatres are full of deceiving sirens, garlanded with hothouse roses, and the public is content, and applauds dummy hearts and superficial dialogue; but the dramatic poet who wishes to save himself from oblivion must not forget the open fields with their wild roses, fields moistened by the dawn where peasants toil, and the pigeon, wounded by a mysterious hunter, which is dying amongst the rushes with no one to hear its grief'. Theatre should 'explain with living examples the eternal norms of the heart and feelings of man [but] the theatre which does not feel the social pulse, the historical pulse, the drama of its people, and catch the genuine color of its landscape and its spirit, with laughter or with tears, has no right to call itself a theatre, but an amusement hall, or a place for doing that dreadful thing known as "killing time"'. Commercialization in particular is to blame for this. The remedy: 'the theatre must impose itself on the public, not the public on the theatre. To do this, authors and actors must, whatever the cost, assume great authority, because the theatre-going public is like a school child; it reverts the stern, severe teacher who demands justice and sees justice done; and puts pins on the chairs of the timid and flattering ones who neither teach themselves nor allow anyone else to teach'. Consequently, '[t]he public ... can be taught [and] [t]his has to be done for the good of the theatre and for the glory and status of its	Theatre as a vehicle for political change; a 'rostrum' and 'a school of weeping and of laughter'. ⁶⁸	Political change; education; emotional release. Theatre should 'explain with living examples the eternal norms of the heart and feelings of man'. ⁶⁹	Doing: drama – always an art Showing: examples Watching: the theatre-going public is like a school child; it reveres the stern, severe teacher who demands justice and sees justice done; and puts pins on the chairs of the timid and flattering ones who

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		interpreters ... To do otherwise is to tremble behind the flies, and kill the fantasies, imagination, and charm of the theatre, which is always, always an art' even though it sometimes seems to be 'a refuge for thieves'. '[T]hose people who say, "Now, now, now," with their eyes fixed on the small jaws of the box office are not right, but those who say, "Tomorrow, tomorrow, tomorrow," and feel the approach of the new life which is hovering over the world'.⁶⁶ Lorca was executed by the Fascist Falangist militia at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War.⁶⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – political theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional			neither teach themselves nor allow anyone else to teach'.
An Actor Prepares (1936); Building a Character (1949); Creating a Role (1961).	Constantin Stanislavski (1863-1938) Russian theatrical producer	Although Stanislavski had published My Life in Art in 1923, and an article on 'Direction and Acting' in 1929 in which there were some hints of his theories, An Actor Prepares was his first theoretical publication. His method was designed to come to terms with the facticity of the actor's body: "My God!" I cried to myself. Is it possible that we the artists of the stage are fated, due to the materiality of our bodies, to the eternal service and expression of coarse realism and nothing else? Are we not called to go any farther than the realist in painting went in their times? Can it be that we are only forerunners in scenic art?' (My Life in Art).⁷⁰ Stanislavski argued that acting realistically onstage was artificial and difficult:⁷¹ 'All of our acts, even the simplest, which are so familiar to us in everyday life, become strained when we appear behind the foot lights before a public ... That it is why it is necessary to correct ourselves and learn again how to walk, sit, or lie down. It is essential to re-educate ourselves to look and see, on the stage, to listen and to hear'.⁷² Stanislavski's initial method emphasises the development of inner resources and the freeing of the mind and body so as to respond to the demands of the script, and the need for a 'consistent guiding purpose throughout the play',⁷³ but he later developed what he called psychological action, in which action becomes the key to the psychological,⁷⁴ an idea which had first been proposed by Mikhail Chekhov (1891-1955).⁷⁵ His 1949 book deals with techniques in body expression, diction, speech rhythm etc, whilst the last book stresses a study of the text and its required physical actions as a way into a text's psychological life. Nevertheless, in all this, 'an actor must speak to the eye, not to the ear'.⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A place where actors appear before spectators	To appear natural	Doing: acting – requires technique to manage the strain of appearing on stage before spectators Showing: 'an actor must speak to the eye, not to the ear'.⁷⁷
Theory and Technique of	John Howard Lawson	Lawson was associated with the Group Theatre. His book was an attempt to harmonize the drama of social engagement with the Freytag-Sarcey-Archer tradition of theory as	A social institution	Social engagement	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Playwriting (1936); Rebuttal (1936).	(1894-) American leftist playwright	well as Brunetière. Conflict must always be social, and generated by the conscious will. Lawson objected to Gorelik's publication of Brecht's ideas in Theatre Workshop in 1939, taking a similar position to Lukács and calling Brecht's ideas 'discredited and thoroughly un-Marxist'. ⁷⁸ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional			Showing: a representation of the social
'Principles of Directing' (1937)	Boris Zakhava (1896-1976) Russian director	Theatre was a collective art. The creative work was not complete with the text. The creativity of the actor, stimulated and encouraged by the director, completed the creative task. (Used by workers' theatres in America, and especially the Group Theatre). ⁷⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text dominance View of Theatre: positive	A collective art	Creative completion of the text	Doing: directing and acting as

¹ Michel 1928, 'Physiognomie der Zeit und Theater der Zeit' [Physiognomy of the Times and the Theatre of the Times], Masken Vol. 22, pp. 6-8; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 352.

² Carlson 1984: 352

³ Kharms et al, 1971, 'The Oberiu Manifesto', trans. George Gibian, in Russia's Lost Literature of the Absurd, Ithaca, New York, p. 194; in Carlson 1984: 361.

⁴ Published in Benjamin 1999/1936, Illuminations, Edited by Hannah Arendt, translated by Harry Zorn, Pimlico, pp. 211-244.

⁵ Published in Benjamin, W. 1968, Illuminations, H/ Arendt (ed), NY, Schocken; reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 223-233.

⁶ Benjamin, Walter. 1999/1936. 'The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction'. In Illuminations, edited by H. Arendt: Pimlico, pp. 211-244. 230-3

⁷ Carlson 1984: 366-7

⁸ Benjamin 1973, Understanding Brecht, trans. Anna Bostock, London.

⁹ Benjamin 1999/1936: 234

¹⁰ Benjamin 1999/1936: 218

¹¹ Benjamin 1999/1936: 228

¹² Benjamin 1999/1936: 234

¹³ Benjamin 1999/1936: 227. Benjamin suggests that the development of new kinds of perception occur at the same time as increases in population (Benjamin 1999/1936: 216), implying that something about the presence of large number of people requires a shift in the way one can look at something.

¹⁴ Benjamin 1999/1936: 222

¹⁵ Benjamin 1999/1936: 224

¹⁶ Benjamin 1999/1936: 232

¹⁷ Benjamin 1999/1936

¹⁸ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. 13

-
- ¹⁹ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.222
- ²⁰ Benjamin 2008/1939: 224-7
- ²¹ Benjamin 1999/1936: 217
- ²² Thèses: Travaux du cercle linguistique de Prague, Prague, 1929, p. 14; in Carlson 1984: 407.
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 368
- ²⁴ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.ix
- ²⁵ Alfred Polgar, 1930, 'Krach in Leipzig: Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny', in Tage-Buch 11.12, 22 March; reprinted in Blackadder 2003: ix.
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 377
- ²⁷ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.470
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 378
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 386; Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 469
- ³⁰ Published in Tulane Drama Review Vol 10(4), Summer 1966, pp. 54-63; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 352-359.
- ³¹ Burke 1931, Counter-Statement, New York, p. 200; in Carlson 1984: 400.
- ³² Burke 1941, The Philosophy of Literary Form, New York, p. 310; in Carlson 1984: 401.
- ³³ Puchner, Martin. 2006. 'Kenneth Burke: Theater, Philosophy, and the Limits of Performance'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 41-56.46
- ³⁴ The Philosophy of Literary Forms, 1973, Berkeley, University of California Press, p. 89; cited in Krasner 2008: 352.
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 487
- ³⁶ Burke, Kenneth. 2008/1966. 'Dramatic Form - And: Tracking Down Implications'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 352-359.357-9
- ³⁷ Burke 2008/1966: 353.
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 372, 487
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 377-8, 381
- ⁴⁰ Flanagan 1931, 'A Theatre is Born', Theatre Arts Vol. 15, p. 915; in Carlson 1984: 378.
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 408
- ⁴² Carlson 1984: 408
- ⁴³ Mukařovský 1978, Structure, Sign, and Function, trans. John Burbank and Peter Steiner, New Haven, p. 203; in Carlson 1984: 410.
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 410
- ⁴⁵ Harris 1932, The Case for Tragedy, New York, p. xv; in Carlson 1984: 400.
- ⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 400
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 387
- ⁴⁸ Published in Die Linkskurve Vol 4(10), October 1932; in Carlson 1984: 387-8
- ⁴⁹ Ottwalt 1932: 22-24 in Carlson 1984: 387-8
- ⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 391

-
- ⁵¹ Published in Stein, G. 1995, Last Operas and Plays, Carl Van Vechten (ed), Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, pp. xxix-lit.
- ⁵² Stein 1995/1935: xxix-xxxiii
- ⁵³ Peter McCallum 2007, 'Exquisite voices capture listeners in a web of serenity', The Sydney Morning Herald, 12th February, p. 14.
- ⁵⁴ Marranca, Bonnie. 1995. 'Introduction'. In Last Operas and Plays, by Gertrude Stein, edited by C. Van Vechten. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, vii-xxvii.xix
- ⁵⁵ Stein 1995/1935: xxiv
- ⁵⁶ Stein 1995/1935: xxxvi
- ⁵⁷ Marranca 1995: xii
- ⁵⁸ Marranca 1995: ix
- ⁵⁹ Marranca 1995: x-xxv
- ⁶⁰ Published in Cunard, Nancy (ed) 1934, The Negro, Frederick Ungar Publishing Co and republished by Hugh Ford (ed) for Continuum; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 196-202
- ⁶¹ Krasner 2008: 196
- ⁶² Hurston 2008/1934: 196-202
- ⁶³ Published in Theatre Arts 34(10), October 1950: pp. 38-9; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 203-5.
- ⁶⁴ Lorca 2008/1934: 204
- ⁶⁵ Krasner 2008: 203
- ⁶⁶ Lorca 2008/1934: 204-5
- ⁶⁷ Krasner 2008: 203
- ⁶⁸ Lorca 2008/1934: 204
- ⁶⁹ Lorca 2008/1934: 204
- ⁷⁰ Cited in Krasner 2008: 36
- ⁷¹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 415
- ⁷² Stanislavski 1948, An Actor Prepares, New York, Theatre Arts, p. 73; cited in Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 415.
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 379
- ⁷⁴ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 418
- ⁷⁵ Chekhov, who was the nephew of the great playwright, developed a system of acting based on what he called psychological gesture. A performer, by finding a physical characteristic for a role, could generate internal responses which would produce a realistic stage portrayal (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 430).
- ⁷⁶ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.144
- ⁷⁷ Styan 1975: 144
- ⁷⁸ Quoted in Carlson 1984: 392
- ⁷⁹ Carlson 1984: 380

Table 29/51 Theories of Theatre 1938-1940

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Réflexions du comédien (1938)	Louis Jouvet (1887-1851) member of the Cartel des Quatre	The Cartel dominated the 1930s French stage. Jouvet (and his associates Georges Pitoëff and Charles Dullin) rejected theory as ‘abominable in itself, a system of damnation, a condemnation, a sterilization of the spirit’. The theatre should ‘elevate the rights of the spiritual over those of the material, the word over the action, the text over the spectacle’. The text is the basis of the performance; the director is the servant of the author – he must ‘find the tone, the climate, the state of soul which ruled the poet at the conception’ and call that up in the spectator. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theory View of Theatre: positive	A practice	To express the poet’s soul	Doing: directing: the director is the servant of the author
The Summing-up (1938)	Somerset Maugham (1874-1965) English playwright and novelist	‘The emotion of the audience, its interest, its laughter, are part of the action’. Because of this, the drama must appeal ‘not to this type of man or to that type, but to all men ... the only ideas that can affect the spectators, when they are welded together in that unity which is an audience, are those commonplace fundamental ideas that are almost feelings’. ² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional		To appeal to all men in order to create a unity	Doing: drama Watching: spectators and their responses are part of the action; theatre is therefore conventional
‘Semiotics in the Folk Theatre’ (1938); ‘Forms and Functions of Folk Theatre’ (1940)	Petr Bogatyrev (1893-1970) Moravian/ Slovakian writer	The central feature of theatre is transformation : all aspects of material reality, especially the actor, become something different. Nevertheless, there is some transparency. The spectator is aware of the actor both as a person and as a character, as both ‘a living person and ... a system of visual and aural signs’. This ‘special artistic duplexity’ is theatre’s greatest artistic potential. [NB: in folk theatre, long dismissed by theatre theorists as beneath consideration and suitable only for the inferior kind of mass spectator who were almost unanimously taken to be gullible, Bogatyrev finds that essential awareness of ‘ duplexity ’. This appears to be the first theoretical interest in such theatre]. Bogatyrev disagreed with Zich’s claim that there was a ‘uniform stylization of theatrical performances in different periods’, ³ pointing to the variety and mixture of styles used by folk theatre, something which he believed could ‘enrich the potential vocabulary of signs’ for semiotic analysis. In folk theatre, the real and the abstract frequently	A place of transformation	Transformation through performance	Showing: theatre has a double , semiotic character which is complex and able to appeal to a variety of spectators on a range of levels

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		changed place. Every new performance explored these transformational possibilities anew as it struggled ‘against traditional signs and strive[d] to put new signs in their place’. The unusually dense sign system in the theatre also allowed it to appeal to a large and diffuse audience, since the same action could be comprehended simultaneously but by means of different signs ‘by spectators of various tastes’ and aesthetic standards.⁴ [Bogatyrev’s analysis suggests that semiotics represented a significant, and valuable, challenge to the prevailing view that drama was first and foremost literature. It allowed theatre to appear in its externality; as what it showed, rather than what it contained]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive			Watching: the spectator is aware of the actor both as a person and as a character, as both ‘a living person and ... a system of visual and aural signs’ [which are ‘read’]
The Principles of Art (1938)	R.G. Collingwood (1889-1943) British philosopher and historian	Sidnell calls Collingwood’s book ‘theory remote from practice’ (and therefore ‘suspect’).⁵ Aesthetic theory was not ‘an attempt to investigate and expound eternal verities concerning the nature of an eternal object called Art, but ... an attempt to reach, by thinking, the solution of certain problems arising out of the situation in which artists find themselves here and now’.⁶ He saw his book as being primarily ‘of “use” to artists’ in a way similar to Horace’s Art of Poetry or as in Renaissance texts which contained ‘a theory of the subject with explicit practical applications’, something which Corneille, d’Aubignac and even Brecht also attempted to do. Sidnell sees this as paradoxical, given that Collingwood was an academic philosopher rather than an artist.⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: aesthetic		Aesthetic	Doing: art (a practical concern for artists)
‘Signs in the Chinese Theatre’ (1939) ⁸	Karel Brušák (1913-2004) Prague linguist and teacher; member of the Prague Linguistic Circle	Brušák’s essay made two vital contributions to theatre theory: it ‘opened the way to a general study of semiotics during the twentieth century and it stressed the importance of performance over text’.⁹ It recognized that, although theatre tended to be ‘examined almost exclusively from the angle of literature’, the stage ‘has its own language equal in importance to the written text’ in its spatial and temporal settings, gestures and use of sound. ‘The Chinese play’ was ‘of little significance from the literary point of view; performance is paramount’. The elements of a performance also ‘carry numerous obligatory signs standing for referents that are often very complex’. This allows for	A culturally specific place of performance - a culturally specific and conventional art of	Signification	Showing: signs Watching: spectators ‘read’ stage signs through convention

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		simplicity of staging because the spectator recognises the significance of particular signs, e.g. if a performer both enters and leaves the stage by the opening on the left, the spectator who knows these conventions, 'knows he is going back to the same place'. Visual dramatic space is created by the presence of the performers on an arbitrary space (the stage) as well as their change and movement (and the changes and movement of light) within it (the scene). It is therefore both static and kinetic.¹⁰ Signs in Chinese theatre are both visual and acoustic. Individual interpretation is a bias of Western criticism, a result of a theatre which came about through 'numerous chance-shaping factors ranging from a producer's conception to an actor's diction'. Chinese theatre, by contrast, offers a 'generally homogeneous' structure which uses stock signs which can be decoded reasonably precisely according to convention.¹¹ [Here Brušák's comments point to a particular difficulty with semiotic analysis: the arbitrariness of interpretation. The possibility of a semiotic interpretation of Chinese theatre which could be considered generalized is likely to come about because of the use of long-standing and well known conventions. Whether or not all Chinese spectators would stick to these, of course, is another matter. An arbitrary interpretation could be made by any individual, once again, confronting theatre with the unknowability of its spectator]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: conventional	signification
'The Essence of Tragedy' (1939) ¹²	Maxwell Anderson (1888-1959) American playwright and theorist	Anderson's discussion of tragedy was 'one of the first attempts by an American author to grapple with the meaning of tragedy'.¹³ According to Anderson, 'theorists have been hunting for the essence of tragedy since Aristotle without entire success.' No-one had managed to explain why tragedy had a cathartic effect or why spectators were willing to subject themselves to tragedy. Anderson had written some successful plays, but also some failures and, although he had generally not found theory useful, had decided that he needed some help to 'take some of the gamble out of playwriting'. The rule he came up with, based on Aristotle's discussion of the device of 'recognition' in the Poetics, was that 'A play should lead up to and away from a central crisis, and this crisis should consist in a discovery by the leading character which has an indelible effect on his thought and emotion and completely alters his course of action. The leading character ... must make the discovery; it must affect him emotionally; and it must alter his direction in the play'. Almost any play worth studying follows this formula, and any subject to be used to create a play must be capable of containing such an episode of discovery or it will		Serious: an expression of a doctrine of faith in man's ability to better himself; affirmation; reassurance	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		be a poor subject for the theatre. The discovery must be central (or made central), and the whole action must revolve around it and ‘everything else in the play should be subordinated to this one episode’. What is more, the ‘hero who is to make the central discovery ... must not be a perfect man’. He must have a ‘tragic fault’, otherwise he cannot change for the better, which he must do for the play to be a tragedy: ‘the essence of a tragedy, or even of a serious play, is the spiritual awakening, or regeneration, of [the] hero’, although what standards of good and evil are used will change over time. Any attempt to reverse the formula (the hero makes a discovery which has an evil effect) the play ‘is inevitably a failure on the stage’. Finally, why do spectators want to see a tragedy in which ‘an imaginary hero is put to an imaginary trial and comes out of it with credit to the race and to himself?’ the question which prompted the essay. Anderson finds the answer in the supposed origins of Greek drama in ‘two complementary religious ceremonies, one celebrating the animal in man, and one celebrating the god’, what Nietzsche designated the Dionysian and the Apollonian. Greek tragedy was dedicated to man’s kinship with the gods. Spectators expect when they come to the theatre an ‘exaltation of the human spirit’ because basically it wants to know that ‘despicable though we are in many ways, there is in all of us some divine, incalculable fire that urges us to be better than we are’. In particular, ‘what the audience wants to believe is that men have a desire to break the moulds of earth which encase them and claim a kinship with a higher morality than that which hems them in’. Theatre ‘at its best, is a religious affirmation ... restating and reassuring man’s belief in his own destiny and ultimate hope’, a doctrine of evolution with faith ‘in the reaching and the climb of men toward distant goals’.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
1939 : Meyerhold was sent to a labour camp for criticising Soviet interference in the arts (Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 427), and eventually executed
New Theatre for Old (1940)	Mordecai Gorelik (1899-) American Designer, member of the Group Theatre	The purpose of drama is ‘to influence life by theatrical means’.¹⁵ He supported the idea of a ‘tribunal’ theatre, a ‘theatre of inquiry’, which presented evidence of and impartial verdicts on its times. The aim was neither art for art’s sake or propaganda, but ‘a useful and practical knowledge of the world’.¹⁶ In 1939, he had published the first statement in America of the theories of Bertold Brecht, instigating a debate with John Howard Lawson (1936) Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-‘new’ theatre View of Theatre: functional	A place of inquiry; a practice	To influence life; to provide useful and practical knowledge of the world	Doing: drama Showing: evidence about the world

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Dynamics of Sign in the Theatre’ (1940); ¹⁷ ‘The Hierarchy of Dramatic Devices’ (1943)	Jindřich Honzl (1894-1953) Czech director of the avant-garde Liberated Theatre, Prague, Member of the Prague School of Semiotic Theory, later head of Prague’s National Theatre	Unites Zich’s structuralist approach with Bogatyrev’s emphasis on transformation. ‘Everything that makes up reality on the stage – the playwright’s text, the actor’s acting, the stage lighting – all these things in every case stand for other things ... dramatic performance is a set of signs ... The stage has no other function than to stand for something else, and it ceases to be the stage if it does not represent something ... it is not its constructional nature that makes it a stage but the fact that it represents a dramatic place’. Similarly, ‘the fundamental nature of an actor does not consist in the fact that he is a person speaking and moving about the stage but that he represents someone, that he signifies a role in a play . Hence it does not matter whether he is a human being; an actor could be a piece of wood as well. If the wood moves about and its movements are accompanied by words, then such a piece of wood can represent a character in a play, and the wood becomes an actor’. Such a representation does not even have to be seen: it may be heard or even merely referred to, as when the sounds of axes chopping represent the ‘presence’ of the cherry orchard in Chekhov’s The Cherry Orchard . It is representation which turns things into theatre . Consequently, ‘we discover the theatre of the street [or] the theatricality of a sports field’ etc. The theatre is essentially a complex of signs, all easily transformable, although when stable, it allows ‘a wealth of meanings and associations’ to accrue. The rejection of such stable conventions can free up enormous possibilities of meaning but come at a cost: ‘When the foundations of theatrical structure are shaken ... measures must immediately be taken to adapt to new modes of operation ... to locate a play spatially’ for the spectator. ‘Signs whose function it is to promote the spectators’ understanding always involved the designation of a space’. Other than that, ‘signs retain the greatest possible dynamics’. However, ‘It is in the changeability of the theatrical sign that the main difficulty of defining theatrical art lies’, either narrowing it down to conventional theatre or expanding it to the point where it becomes meaningless, ¹⁸ and causing ‘so much confusion in defining dramatic art or locating its essence’. ¹⁹ Honzl believed Wagner’s theory of theatre as a collective art was incorrect, since there is no evidence that it is possible to make perception a uniform experience . Nearly all theatre-goers experience one effect at one time and another at another time, although they may move from place to place at much the same time. The essence of the theatrical art still lies ‘in acting , in action , as Aristotle argued. Action is	A place of ‘actualization’; an artistic form made up of a complex of signs which the spectator interprets, usually through convention ;	Representation - to stand for something else – through action	Doing: the stage as a practice and performance Showing: the complex semiotic character of theatre; signification Watching: spectator as interpreter; the power of the spectator comes from the disjunct between what is imagined and reality

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the unifying force in theatre. It ‘unifies word, actor, costume, scenery and music in the sense that we could then recognize them as different conductors of a single current that either passes from one to another or flows through several at one time’. The changes in this ‘current’ reflect different performances, styles or periods: ‘there are no permanent laws or invariable rules for the unification of dramatic devices via the flow of dramatic action ... the theatre actualizes different aspects of theatricality at different times ... Theatre ... is one and many like the Triune God of Saint Augustine’.²⁰ In ‘The Hierarchy’, Honzl focused on one particular kind of transformation: of poetic reference into action which is not shown but is imagined by the spectator. This device was common in classic theatre but was relatively rare in realist theatre. Honzl consider it a ‘major source of theatrical power, since theatrical perception was based upon ‘an opposition between mental representation and reality’ synthesized into an emotionally charged ‘seeing’ by the spectator’s act of interpretation.²¹ Honzl influenced C20th semioticians such as Kowzan, Ubersfeld, Pavis and Fischer-Lichte.²² Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: conventional
‘Man and Object in the Theatre’ (1940); ‘Notes Regarding Bogatyrev’s Book on Folk Theatre’ (1942)	Jiří Veltruský Prague linguist	Agreed with Honzl that ‘the transformability of theatrical signs and the flexibility of the flow of action through different sign systems’ were central. It was this flexibility which made the theatre particularly effective as a process of defamiliarization. Shifting signs ‘can be used to link together unconventionally various aspects of reality’, allowing theatre to develop powerful social statements by showing ‘new ways of perceiving and understanding the world’.²³ Veltrusky, however, warned that Honzl’s concept of action shifting from sign to sign like a flowing current could suggest a conflation of different sign systems. However, ‘Words cannot be fully translated into gestures, pictures, music, the meaning of a picture cannot be fully conveyed by language, music, the play of facial muscles, etc.’ No one sign captured the same reality in its entirety. Theatre should be considered a laboratory of ‘contrastive semiotics’.²⁴ ‘[A]ll that is on the stage is a sign’.²⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive	A semiotic place; a laboratory	Defamiliarization through signification	Doing: placing signs on the stage Showing: new ways of perception

¹ Jouvett 1951, Témoignages sur le théâtre, Paris, pp. 14, 190-191; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.373.

-
- ² Maugham 1938, The Summing Up, Garden City Publishing Coy, p. 127, 76; quoted in Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34.7, 20.
- ³ Carlson 1984: 408
- ⁴ Bogatryev 1976, 'Forms and Functions of Folk Theatre', trans. Bruce Kochis, in Semiotics of Art: Prague School Contributions, eds. Ladislav Matejka and Irwin Titunik, Cambridge Mass., pp. 44-48; in Carlson 1984: 408-9.
- ⁵ Sidnell, Michael ed. 1991. Sources of Dramatic Theory. 2 vols. Vol. 1: Plato to Congreve. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press.³
- ⁶ Collingwood 1938: vi, cited in Sidnell
- ⁷ Sidnell 1991: 3-4
- ⁸ Reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 235-244.
- ⁹ Krasner 2008: 234
- ¹⁰ Brušák 2008/1939: 235-6
- ¹¹ Brušák 2008/1939: 244
- ¹² Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 228-233.
- ¹³ Krasner 2008: 228
- ¹⁴ Anderson 2008/1939: 228
- ¹⁵ Gorelik 1948: 5; in Carlson 1984: 381.
- ¹⁶ Gorelik 1948: 471.
- ¹⁷ Excerpts reprinted in Krasner 2008: 249-257 and Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 269-278.
- ¹⁸ Honzl 2008/1940: 249-250-3
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 409
- ²⁰ Honzl 2008/1940: 256
- ²¹ Honzl 1976, 'The Hierarchy of Dramatic Devices', trans. Susan Larson, in Ladislav Matejka and Irwin Titunik (eds.) Semiotics of Art: Prague School Contributions, Cambridge Mass., p. 123; in Carlson 1984: 409.
- ²² Krasner 2008: 249
- ²³ Veltruský 1955, 'Man and Object in the Theatre', trans. Paul Garvin, A Prague School Reader on Esthetics, Literary Structure, and Style, Washington, pp. 106-7; in Carlson 1984: 410.
- ²⁴ Veltruský 1976, 'Notes Regarding Bogatyrev's Book on Folk Theatre', trans. Ladislav Matejka, in Ladislav Matejka and Irwin Titunik (eds.) Semiotics of Art: Prague School Contributions, Cambridge Mass., p. 281-282; in Carlson 1984: 410.
- ²⁵ Veltruský 1940, in States, Bert O. 2008/1985. 'The World on Stage'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 441-447. 441 and Aston, Elaine. 1996. 'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 56-69. 57

Table 30/51 Theories of Theatre 1941-1945

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1940s to 1960s: this period saw a concern with tragedy and absurdity as a result of the rise of Existentialism , itself a response to the horrors of war and atrocity. The emphasis came to be on ‘the here and now’, on the ‘temporality of being’ and, as a result of life’s essential futility, on man’s inner life. ¹ There was a renewed attempt by theorists to ‘flesh out the meaning of tragedy’, and to see if modern forms of tragedy were possible. [These concerns seem bizarre in the face of the events and aftermaths of the war but it was not just in theatre that people seemed to turn away from an unbearable reality into some esoteric realm].
‘Acting and the Training of the Actor’ (1941)	Lee Strasburg (1901-1982) American actor	The art of acting had evolved from declamation to an ability to relate to the entire world of the play, not through any system but the development of a method , by which the actor could ‘evolve for himself the proper results’ through the use of his own resources. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-technical acting View of Theatre: positive		Expression	Doing: acting as technique
‘Some Thoughts on Playwriting’ (1941) ³	Thornton Wilder (1897-1975) American playwright and novelist	[At last, someone who is talking about theatre even if he does call it drama!] Advances ‘four fundamental conditions of the drama’ [the theatre] which separate it from the other arts’: 1. ‘The theater is an art which reposes upon the work of many collaborators; 2. It is addressed to the group mind ; 3. It is based upon a pretense and its very nature calls out a multiplication of pretenses; and 4. Its action takes place in a perpetual present time’. In order to deal with collaboration, the dramatist must ‘organize the play in such a way that its strength lies not in appearances beyond his control, but in the succession of events and in the unfolding of an idea, in narration ... the theatre is unfolding action and in the disposition of events the authors may exercise a governance so complete that the distortions effected by the physical appearance of actors, by the fancies of scene painters and the misunderstandings of directors, fall into relative insignificance ... The dramatist must be by instinct a storyteller’ because the theatre ‘is an art of many collaborators’. The ‘chief’ of the collaborators of the theatre are the actors. Acting is ‘one of the most difficult and cruel of the artistic activities’ and only the best fully combine the ‘three separate faculties or endowments’ necessary to be great: observation, imagination and physical coordination: ‘An actor must know the appearances and the mental states; he must apply his knowledge to the role; and he must physically express his knowledge’ and he must do all this with enough concentration to overcome the disparity between on-stage and back-stage and the presence of fellow-actors. A characterization in a play is a kind of more or less ‘blank check’ for the actor to fill in. Wilder believed that ‘a play presupposes a crowd’: ‘the pretense, the fiction, on the stage would fall to pieces and absurdity without the support accorded to it by a crowd’ and the kind of excitement	A collaborative art which takes place before a crowd and which relies on conventions for its effect	To address a group; to enable the move from the particular to the general through pretense	Doing: playwrighting – a collaboration with the performer; acting - one of the most difficult and cruel of the artistic activities Showing: the perpetual present in unfolding action Watching: audiences are a group mind which recognizes

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		produced by theatre ‘requires a throng’, as does the box-office and ‘the temperament of the actors’. This is no different to ‘the fiction that royal personages are of a mysteriously different nature from other people [which also] requires audiences, levees, and processions for its maintenance ... the prerogatives of royalty become absurd when the crowd is not present to extend to them the enhancement of an imaginative awe’. The theatre ‘partakes of the nature of festival’ and requires a crowd. However, the ‘group-mind’ imposes two limitations on the dramatist: ‘a broadening of the fields of interest’ (‘detailed representations’ which require specialized knowledge of the audience do not succeed); the need for ‘forward movement’: ‘Drama on the stage is inseparable from forward movement, from action’ (which is why attempts to dramatize Plato’s dialogues have failed). The stage ‘is fundamental pretense and it thrives on the acceptance of that fact and in the multiplication of additional pretenses’. Spectators interpret ‘a series of signs’ which they ‘reassemble’ in their own minds. They do not need theatre to be ‘life-like’ in order to be moved by what they see. If anything, the insistence on realism ‘loses rather than gains credibility’. Theatre employs convention, which has two functions: to provoke ‘the collaborative activity of the spectator’s imagination’ and to raise ‘the action from the specific to the general’. The second function is more important than the first. Again, realism cuts across this function. By placing characters in ‘real’ places, it prevents the move from this particular character to such characters everywhere: ‘The stage continually strains to tell this generalized truth and it is the element of pretense that reinforces it. Out of the lie, the pretense, of the theatre proceeds a [compelling and timeless] truth. ‘The novel is a past reported in the present. On the stage it is always now’. This is the source of the theatre’s vitality and brings with it the sense that ‘a play visibly represents pure existing’: A play is what takes place./ A novel is what one person tells us took place. ‘The theatre offers to imaginative narration [storytelling] its highest possibilities. It has many pitfalls and its very vitality betrays it into service as mere diversion and the enhancement of insignificant matter; but it is well to remember that it was the theatre that rose to the highest place during ... “great ages”’.⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism; prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional; functional			the conventions used and ‘reassembles’ them in their imagination; excitement is generated by being part of a ‘throng’.
The aftermath of World War II saw a turn away from the ‘subjective mode’ so prevalent in preceding years towards a focus on the temporality of being, and a ‘more dynamic paradigm of human interaction and the potential for violence’. This turn was epitomised by the rise of existentialist philosophy, particularly through the work of Jean Paul

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Sartre. Existentialism recognized that ‘no essence of life exists; each of us must forge meaning through active choices and commitment to the world’. This way of thinking led to a focus on ‘practical understanding and everyday existence’, the understanding that truth was contingent and particular. There was also a renewed attempt by theorists to ‘flesh out the meaning of tragedy’. This led to the rise of characters who were tragic by virtue of their insistence on or inability to be ‘authentic’. Waiting became significant, as did a renewed interest in symbolism. ⁵
Philosophy in a New Key (1942); Feeling and Form (1953)	Susanne Langer (1895-1985) American philosopher of Aesthetics ⁶	Also concerned with identifying the universal features of aesthetic experience. Concerned with the application of the philosophy of symbolic forms to the arts, in particular, the symbolic, communicative aspect of feelings. Also considered man as essentially ‘a maker of symbols’. ⁷ There were two types of symbols: the discursive (deals with logical processes; its major expression is language) and the non-discursive (deals with emotional states; its major expression is art). Art is not the expression of emotions – it is about emotions (in the way that language is not the expression of concepts but is about concepts). Discursive language brings order to intellectual life. Symbolic realms bring order to perceptual life. Art’s symbols (unlike language) work simultaneously rather than serially, and are shifting and multiple rather than specific. They can nevertheless be studied because they are not arbitrary. Music is the purest expression of nondiscursive symbols. Art (including drama) creates a ‘virtual’ or symbolic realm of its own for the portrayal of some aspect of feeling in order to ‘educate us’ in feeling. The debates over verisimilitude, emotional identification and the moral function of drama are all based on a misunderstanding of what drama does. The essential product of all poetic art (including drama) is an illusion of the processes of human life, what Langer calls a virtual history , devised specifically for the portrayal of some aspect of feeling. Drama presents this virtual history in the mode of enactment : as a series of actions working toward a completed pattern. It is a form of destiny [destining]. It begins as a ‘form in suspense’: the dramatist creates this form in outline so clearly that it stimulates and forms a ‘poetic core’ for actors and designers, who add their own contributions. It is not real history which is being created, but virtual history. An actor ‘does not undergo and vent emotions; he conceives them, to the smallest detail, and enacts them’. ⁸ Forgetting this distinction is what leads to misunderstandings about verisimilitude, emotional identification and the moral purposes of drama, and has clouded theoretical speculation of the great dramatic forms of comedy and tragedy. Both are created forms , artistic or symbolic expressions of human destiny, not depictions of the real world. ⁹ Seeking philosophical or ethical significance in great dramas leads inevitably to confusion, since		Instruction in feeling through symbolic forms; communication; to bring order to perceptual life; to create a pattern of felt life	Doing: drama (art) Showing: an illusion of the processes of human life through enactment; a virtual history

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		their ultimate aim is neither philosophical nor ethical but symbolic. The primary goal of the art of drama is to create a ‘pattern of felt life’. Dramatic art is an ‘organic process’. It is also particular: ‘Art does not generalize and classify; art sets forth the individuality of forms which discourse, being essentially general, has to suppress’.¹⁰ Comedy ‘expresses the continuous balance of sheer vitality that belongs to society’. ‘The guiding principle [of drama] is the making of an appearance, not under normal circumstances, like a pretence or social convention, but under the circumstances of the play’.¹¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (aesthetic) View of Theatre: positive; functional
L’essence du théâtre (1943); Antonin Artaud et l’essence du théâtre (1974)	Henri Gouhier (1898- French director	Contained four brief testimonials by the members of the Cartel, reaffirming the dominance of the text-oriented tradition associated with Copeau and Jouvet. For Gouhier, the text is ‘not all of the play’ but it is its ‘germ’. Staging must always remain faithful to the text. Theatre cannot be judged as a literary genre. It is a separate art, based on the ‘exteriorization of the will’ and the ‘making present’ which occurs because of the presence of actors and scenery. ‘This creation of stage reality is the nearest man comes to divine creation, and is thus his spirit’s most ambitious effort to overcome the weakness of the human condition’. At this stage, the work of Artaud was ignored, not just by Gouhier, but in France in general, although by 1974, Gouhier was to place him ‘center stage’.¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-text-based theatre practice View of Theatre: positive	An art form	Making present through the presence of actors and scenery as a way of overcoming the human condition	Doing: directing – presenting a text
‘On Dramatic Style’ (1944); ¹³ ‘Forger des mythes’ (1946); The Psychology of Imagination (1948); ‘For a Theatre of Situations’ (1947); ¹⁴ ‘Beyond Bourgeois	Jean-Paul Sartre (1905-1980) French existentialist writer, dramatist, activist and philosopher	Gesture was the basis of drama. Gestures were ‘the image of action’ and dramatic action was ‘the action of characters’ (i.e. objects or images not men).¹⁶ Theatre language should always be directed towards action, not realism or psychological expression. Every character ‘acts because he is engaged in a venture [which he] justifies by reasons [because he] believes he is right to undertake it’. Theatre must be relevant to the audience’s own concerns, but also be distanced, to give perspective. The essence of theatre is a combination of objective distance and the presentation of situations relevant to the spectator’s concerns (as in Brecht), and in which the freedom of the character confronts limitations.¹⁷ However, Sartre rejected Brecht’s understanding of distance, particularly the device of having the actor directly address the audience: ‘What is wrong with addressing an audience is that it causes the imaginary character to vanish and to be replaced by the presence of the real person’.¹⁸ This prevents the necessary distance which allows identification and empathy in which the spectator projects onto the character their own feelings and thoughts, and therefore interferes with the ability of the dramatist	A seeing place; an institution; an artistic practice	Creating distance in order to act on the spectator indirectly through the characters: teaching the spectator something about themselves through the	Doing: drama Showing: the consequence of choice through gesture Watching: ‘there is theatre only if all the spectators are united’. ²⁸ Distance allows

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Theatre' (1960); ¹⁵ Imagination (1962)		to use this to teach the spectator something about himself. Distance allows vulnerability , unlike real confrontations, which create the need for the individual to protect themselves. Sartre's theatre theory is then consistent with his existential philosophy, in which the self needs to continually protect itself from the gaze (and presence) of others in order to sustain its world. Theatre creates the conditions which allow this guard to be dropped – distance protects the spectator (so he thinks, at any rate) from being acted upon by the other. Sartre thinks this vulnerability should be exploited by the dramatist to in fact act on the spectator – and this can be done because the spectator has been induced to identify with the character. By acting on the character, the dramatist is acting on the spectator. This might be the only way one can act on others, and perhaps explains Sartre's fascination with the theatre. Sartre suggests a 'theatre of situations' as a successor to the 'theatre of character', a new form of tragedy for modern man which shows 'a man who is free within the circle of his own situation, who chooses, whether he wishes to or not, for everyone else when he chooses for himself'. ¹⁹ This existentialist situation, of choice in the face of the world's absurdity, involves fundamental questions about how man views and defines himself, and is thus appropriate for tragedy. Sartre's view of tragedy was Hegelian, according to Carlson. ²⁰ Sartre's plays also came to be defined as 'absurd', although he protested at the term. In 'Beyond Bourgeois Theatre' (1960) he called for a different kind of drama, one which did not merely reflect a bourgeois audience to itself but which created the experience of a direct relation 'between the subject experiencing and the object experienced' ²¹ but was not epic theatre, which he saw as being only possible in a non-Marxist society. ²² Sartre wanted a phenomenological or existential theatre 'that presents a quasi-objectivity' which would draw 'the observer outward toward a genuine experience of the nonself'. ²³ He believed that the bourgeoisie had taken control of theatre partly by turning it into a profit-making venture dependent on the costs of land and tickets, but also through their critics. Critics simply reflected their public, telling them what they want to hear. As a consequence, a bourgeois critic could 'scuttle a play' which was not bourgeois by reflecting a bourgeois disdain for it: 'It is an error to contrast the newspaper critic with the public. The critic is the mirror of his public. If he writes nonsense, it is because the public which reads the newspaper will speak nonsense, too; therefore, it would be futile to oppose one to the other'. A critic was simply a spokesperson for his public. The problem of Brecht's theatre was that Brecht had not		provision of perspective and an image of reality	spectators to identify and empathise with characters; this provides the dramatist with the opportunity to teach spectators something about themselves

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		come to terms with subjectivity. This is why he needed distancing, but this basically made his theatre 'demonstrative', just a vehicle for simplistic Marxist views, which depended on the society not being a socialist one. On the other hand, bourgeois theatre leant too far in the direction of subjectivity – all it wanted to do was reflect itself to itself. In doing this, it was in fact destroying theatre, which was based on action. What was needed was something in between. Theatre simply provides an image of reality, not reality itself. 'Reality cannot be put into perspective because it is not in perspective ... a man is a man, whatever he be, and there are no men who must be conceived more or less fully'. Men have a passion for images because they are unable to fully see themselves as objects for themselves: 'as soon as you recognize yourself, you are no longer an object'. Even men as a group cannot see themselves 'from the outside' without loss: 'a being who is uniquely comprehensible, or at least explicable by the order of things' is 'lost' as a man. Instead you end up with an 'insect'. 'There is no place for men to know one another completely, as objects. One might be a total object for the ants or for the angels, but not as a man for men'.²⁴ The fascination of theatre is that it presents us with images which allow us to imagine we are seeing other men as objects, but in fact we are merely seeing images: 'the image of action' and the image of 'the action of characters', not men, and these images are always of ourselves. 'No matter how long we may look at the image, we will never find anything there that we did not put there'.²⁵ The theatre represents only the acts of bodies. When we go to the theatre we are attempting to 'recover ourselves as we act'²⁶ – to see ourselves objectively. Nevertheless, 'there is theatre only if all the spectators are united', which is why 'situations must be found which are so general that they are common to all': 'only in this way that [the theatre] will succeed in unifying the diversified audiences who are going to it in our time'.²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Brechtian View of Theatre: functional
'The Culture Industry: Enlightenment as Mass Deception' (1944); 'Elements of	Theodor Adorno (1903-1969) German theorist; member of the Frankfurt School	'Erpresste' was a review of Lukács' book Wider den missverstandenen Realismus. Adorno accused Lukács of 'confounding art and life by focusing upon content to the exclusion of style and form'. Art is always implicated to some degree in the total system of rationality of its own time. To defy that totality, the artist 'must do so within the process of creation itself, not simply in the subject matter but [also] in the way the subject matter is treated'.³¹ This conception of authentic art representing the society in which it is embedded through its very structure is also the basis of his sociology of music, in	A social and cultural practice	The creative process: to represent society in the form of a negation or critique; to	Doing: drama (art) (literature): the contradictions of society were apparent

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Anti-Semitism' (1944); ²⁹ 'Erpresste Versöhnung' [Extorting Conciliation] (1958); 'Versuch, das Endspiel zu verstehen' (1961); 'Engagement' (1962); 'Offener Brief an Rolf Hochhuth' (1967); Aesthetic Theory (1970) ³⁰		particular, the singling out of the work of Schönberg as both authentic and exemplary.³² Similarly, Adorno defended Beckett as 'perhaps the most successful creator of truly engaged theatre'.³³ He argued that a play had three levels of meaning (the meaning of the dialogue, the overall meaning, and the metaphysical meaning). Traditional drama tended to operate at one of these levels at a time. Beckett not only used all three levels within a play, but set them in opposition to one another so that no meaning could be found.³⁴ Thus Beckett, like Schönberg, 'explodes' art 'from within ... compelling' rather than simply calling for 'a change of attitude',³⁵ by producing in the actual construction of his plays a reflection of the 'subjective-objective struggle' and a genuine portrayal of the 'anonymity of post-industrial man and the helplessness of post atomic man'.³⁶ Adorno's tone of cultural despair, resignation and hopelessness was attacked by a number of playwrights in a survey of 11 contemporary dramatists by the journal Theater Heute in 1963, particularly Hochhuth and Peter Weiss. Adorno denied Hochhuth's claim of the necessity of the individual in drama, since, as Marx and Hegel had both argued, individualism was not a natural category but an historically produced one 'arising from labor'. In any case, in the modern industrial world, the individual has given way to 'anonymous configurations which can no longer be understood by the person unacquainted with theory, and which in their infernal coldness can no longer be tolerated by the anxious consciousness.' Dramatists are tempted to falsely personalize these objective circumstances, producing a 'phoney' approach (an adjective he applied to Hochhuth's plays). It was more honest to create a form that reflects 'the absurdity of the real', which realism could not do. Although Brecht had attempted to do this, he could not escape an individualist bias, but Adorno believed that Beckett had managed to do this.³⁷ Adorno was particularly concerned with the effects of what he called the 'culture industry' on art in general, especially with the development of mechanical means of reproduction such as radio, film and television. Radio had turned all participants into listeners, who were then subjected to what producers claimed were what the public wanted but were in fact what producers thought they wanted based on statistics which allowed the classification, organization and labelling of consumers. These same techniques were used in the production of film and television, so that audiences were 'robbed' of their function, defined by Kant, of schematizing or classifying what they were experiencing. The producers do it all for them.³⁸ Because of this, there is no space for the exercise of		teach spectators to take their own punishment; catharsis	in the form the art work took Watching: audiences of authentic art have the space to exercise sustained thought and imagination; audiences are constructed by art works; they have been constructed as consumers by the Culture Industry, which also has an interest in subsuming authentic art as just a 'species' of commodity; Brecht tries to construct

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		sustained thought or imagination by the audience, and so the world presented by the culture industry becomes equated directly with reality. The difference between culture and practical life collapses into an illusion of freedom.³⁹ Audiences become ‘victims’:⁴⁰ ‘Donald Duck in the cartoons and the unfortunate in real life get their thrashing so that the audience can learn to take their own punishment’. In this way, ‘the enjoyment of the violence suffered by the movie character turns into violence against the spectator’. The aim is catharsis, the release of emotions in controlled ways designed to ‘defend society’.⁴¹ A major tool in this form of control is the very monotony of mass culture: ‘Anyone who doubts the power of monotony is a fool’,⁴² for monotony has the ability to take on a sense of ‘healthy’ naturalism, like the natural cycles of motherhood. Tragedy, which was once about the struggle of the exemplary but flawed individual against society, is now used as a form of legitimization of society in which the individual is abolished in favour of the illusion of individuality, a pseudo-individuality based on some accidental detail (a moustache, an accent, a curl over the forehead). As always, culture here is playing its part in ‘taming revolutionary and barbaric instincts’⁴³ and advocating a form of institutionalized moral improvement. Thus ‘the art produced for the masses ... is quite other than an art of the masses’.⁴⁴ Television would, Adorno predicted, be able to achieve what Wagner had hoped to achieve in his operas: ‘the fusion of all the arts in one work’,⁴⁵ but it would achieve this by integrating them simply as elements in the same technical process. The merging of the techniques of the culture industry with those of advertising, would, in turn become psychotechnology – ‘a procedure for manipulating men’ who are conceived of as ‘absent-minded or resistant on the basis of statistics’.⁴⁶ Although Adorno’s critique of modern culture is relentless, he seems to imply two things which are central to both theatre and politics: that ‘Putting on a show means showing everybody what there is, and what can be achieved ... it is a fair’⁴⁷ and that spectators are not inherently passive, but can be trained as well as constructed that way, to the extent that they can vanish as a public. These two aspects of his thought perhaps account in some part for his ‘break’ with Brecht, and the subsequent strained relations with Benjamin, who was caught between the two.⁴⁸ Buck-Morss argues that Adorno rejected the use of Marxism to develop ‘a program of action’,⁴⁹ as both Lukács and Brecht were trying to do, seeing it as propaganda. He defended the conception of both thinkers and artists as workers themselves. Intellectual work could be ‘viewed as a series of trial			them as activists

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		experiments or “attempts” rather than the construction of holistic systems’ which were not to be forced to submit to practical imperatives such as a proletarian revolution. Thus, while both Adorno and Brecht believed that ‘the goal of intellectual work was critical enlightenment’, they were divided over whose consciousness was to be enlightened: the theorists and artists or the proletariat. Adorno ‘insisted that the criterion for art could not be its political effect on the audience’,⁵⁰ especially since that spectator was itself constructed by the art form and its historical context, but its capacity to draw out the contradictions within the society which it represented. He was supported in this view by the fact that the ‘most technically innovative artists were often ... aloof from politics’, understood by neither the bourgeois nor the proletariat. Schonberg’s music became the paradigm for Adorno’s dilemma: ‘It had no conscious political content, and absolutely no appeal for a working-class audience’⁵¹ yet Adorno saw in its innovative and challenging form, a representation of the contradictions of bourgeois society, one which could enlighten an audience prepared to take the time to exercise ‘sustained thought’ and imagination.⁵² It was this ability of the artist to capture society in the way the musical or artistic material available was structured which not only produced authentic or serious art, but was in itself a valuable critique or negation of the society, thereby representing in itself an impetus for change: ‘[Art] fulfils its social function more accurately when, within its own material and according to its own rules of form, it brings to articulation the social problems which it contains all the way to the inmost cells of its technique. In this sense, the job of ... art bears a specific analogy to that of social theory’,⁵³ and can potentially be a form of enlightenment because art is not just ‘pure expression’, but also ‘a mode of cognition through which we can understand things about the world’.⁵⁴ To use art for political ends destroys this potential. Rather, intellectuals and artists ‘act in concert with the proletariat by revolutionizing their own production process’,⁵⁵ in the process, ‘robbing the present of its ideological justifications’ and exploding reification, thereby allowing society to begin to change itself.⁵⁶ Authentic or serious art is not necessarily elitist, but is likely to be seen that way because of its dependence on financial support and because artists ‘must inevitably orient themselves to a pre-existing system of musical expression’.⁵⁷ This is particularly the case with regard to music. Mimesis was not specifically tied to art, but was ‘the way an organism adapts itself to its environment’. It was originally ‘a physiological response to danger ... a primordial form

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of rationality' which had been degraded and instrumentalised by the dominance of rationality in modernity. Mimesis was not a distancing phenomenon but, like smell, it 'forges a bridge' between the self and the other , but by instrumentalising it, modernity had turned it into a tool for affecting the world, as indicated by consumerism and the 'identical uniforms and repeated chants of fascist mobs – these are repressed and mutilated forms of mimesis. ⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (aesthetic); polemic – anti-political art; anti-the culture industry View of Theatre: functional
Understanding Drama (1945); The Well-Wrought Urn (1947)	Cleanth Brooks (1906- American literary critic	Leading champion of the textually oriented American school of New Criticism. A dramatistic view of all poetry. 'Dramatic' was defined as 'presented by means of characters in action and marked by the tension of conflict'. ⁵⁹ As a genre, drama was closer to poetry than prose fiction because they shared a high concentration of effect in language and both were controlled by the restrictions of their form. All poetry was a synthesis of opposites, a pattern of resolved stresses. Tragedy was the highest form of poetry because 'the tension between attraction and repulsion' was most powerful. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/a		To represent in action	Doing: drama (poetry)
The Frontiers of Drama (1945)	Una Ellis-Fermor (1894-1958) Literary theorist	Usual features of drama: a conflict of strong passions, a clearly shaped series of related deeds coordinated by one 'grand' and simple idea. Tragedy depends upon the maintenance of 'a strict and limiting balance between two contrary readings of life and their subsequent emotions at work in the poet's mind'. This balance between good and evil is always available to the superior artist, so a modern tragedy is possible. The drama of social concern differs from tragedy. It deals with remedial ills, or shows human misery with no hope of release. It does not have the same balance as tragedy. ⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		Different genres have different ends	Doing: drama (tragedy)
Wesen und Formen des Dramas Vol. I (1945)	Robert Petsch (1875-1945) German theorist	Analysis of drama as literature. ⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (literary) View of Theatre: n/a			Doing: drama (literature)

¹ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.245-6

² Strasburg, in John Gassner 1953, Producing the Play, New York, p. 141; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.381.

³ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 258-265.

⁴ Wilder 2008/1941: 258-265

⁵ Krasner 2008: 246

⁶ As recently as 1996, Langer receives no entry in major philosophy dictionaries such as The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy (although she is mentioned briefly in the entry on Cassirer, where it is claimed that she was heavily influenced by Cassirer (Audi, Robert, ed. 1996. The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.). This could be more a reflection of the lack of attention given to Aesthetics during the 20th, and the argument that Aesthetics should not constitute a separate field of study, but be subsumed under more general considerations of the part played by images in general, as well as sounds, narrative and three-dimensional structures (from sculpture to architecture) in shaping human attitudes and experience (Susan Feagin, 'Aesthetics', in Audi 1996, The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy p. 10-11).

⁷ Carlson 1984: 435

⁸ Langer 1953, Feeling and Form, New York, p. 307; in Carlson 1984: 435.

⁹ Langer's argument brings to mind the efforts by Henry James to insist that his story 'The Turn of the Screw' was just that – a story. Despite the use of multiple frames to distance the reader from the core story, it was such a powerful story that a virtual industry devoted to investigating both story and characters as if they were real has arisen in literary criticism. A number of films have also been made (the most recent being Ben Bolt's 2000 version with Jodhi May) of the inner story, all of which have ignored the external frames with which it begins. Drama too appears to be able to have this effect – perhaps especially when treated as literature rather than seen performed, a phenomenon pointed to by the many theorists who prefer to read a drama than to see it on stage.

¹⁰ Langer 1953, Feeling and Form, New York, pp. 312, 327; in Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.30, 32.

¹¹ Langer 1953: 332-3

¹² Carlson 1984: 396-7

¹³ Reprinted in Sartre 1976, Sartre on Theatre, Frank Jellinek (trans.), Michel Contat and Michel Rybalka (eds), New York, Pantheon Books.

¹⁴ Excerpt reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.42-44

¹⁵ Published in Robert W. Corrigan 1963, Theatre in the Twentieth Century, New York, Grove Press, pp. 131-140; quoted in Pearce 1980: 50. Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 318-323.

¹⁶ Sartre 2008/1960: 319

¹⁷ Sartre 1998/1947: 43

¹⁸ Sartre 1976/1944: 18

¹⁹ Jean-Paul Sartre 1976, Sartre on Theatre, trans. Frank Jellinek, New York, p. 12-14, 26, 36; in Carlson 1984: 398.

²⁰ Carlson 1984: 398

²¹ Pearce, Howard D. 1980. 'A Phenomenological Approach to the Theatrum Mundi Metaphor'. PMLA 95 (1) pp. 42-57. 50

²² Sartre 2008/1960: 322-3

²³ Pearce 1980: 50

²⁴ Sartre 2008/1960: 318-323

-
- ²⁵ Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press.14
- ²⁶ Sartre 2008/1960: 319
- ²⁷ Sartre 1998/1947: 43-4
- ²⁸ Sartre 1998/1947: 43
- ²⁹ Both these essays are published in Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer 1997/1944, Dialectic of Enlightenment, translated by John Cumming, London and New York, Verso. Although they are presented in the Dialectic as the work of both authors, they are generally spoken about as Adorno's in discussions of Adorno's work (see, for instance, Potolsky, Matthew. 2006. Mimesis. Edited by J. Drakakis, The New Critical Idiom. New York and London: Routledge.144-5; Martin, Peter J. 1995. Sounds and Society: Themes in the Sociology of Music. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press., and Max Paddison 1997, Adorno's Aesthetics of Music, Cambridge University Press).
- ³⁰ Adorno 1970, Aesthetic Theory, Vol 8, Collected Writings, 1970-1986, Rolf Tiedemann (ed), Suhrkamp Verlag.
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 425; Adorno 1958, 'Erpresste Versöhnung', Monat Vol 122, p. 44; in Carlson 1984: 425.
- ³² Martin 1995: 90-98
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 426
- ³⁴ Adorno 1961, Noten zur Literatur, Frankfurt, Vol 2, pp. 86-87; in Carlson 1984: 426.
- ³⁵ Adorno 1974, 'Commitment', trans. Francis McDonagh, New Left Review, Vol 87-88, pp. 78, 86-87; in Carlson 1984: 426.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 426
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 427
- ³⁸ Adorno 1997: 124
- ³⁹ This claim by Adorno is said by Bernstein to be ironic, considering that the collapse of art into life is 'what the avant-garde always wanted' (Bernstein, J.M. 2001, The Culture Industry, Routledge Classics).
- ⁴⁰ Adorno 1997: 126
- ⁴¹ Adorno 1997: 138-144
- ⁴² Adorno 1997: 148
- ⁴³ Adorno 1997: 152
- ⁴⁴ Bernstein 2001: 7
- ⁴⁵ Adorno 1997: 124
- ⁴⁶ Adorno 1997: 163
- ⁴⁷ Adorno 1997: 156
- ⁴⁸ Buck-Morss 1977: 30
- ⁴⁹ Buck-Morss 1977: 26
- ⁵⁰ Buck-Morss 1977: 33-4
- ⁵¹ Brecht compared it to 'the neighing of a horse about to be butchered and processed for bockwurst' (Buck-Morss, Susan. 1977. The Origin of Negative Dialectics: Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Benjamin, and the Frankfurt Institute. New York and London: The Free Press (Collier Macmillan).34).

⁵² For Adorno, the ‘artistic experience in general is by no means as immediate as suggested by the official art religion. Experience of an art work always involves experience of the latter’s ambience, its place and function in the environment’ (Adorno 1970: 480; quoted by Paddison 1997: 63).

⁵³ Adorno 1932, ‘Zur gesellschaftlichen Lage der Musik’, part 1, Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung Vol 1(1/2), p. 105; in Buck-Morss 1977: 35n80.

⁵⁴ Paddison 1997:57

⁵⁵ Buck-Morss 1977: 42

⁵⁶ Buck-Morss 1977: 36. Buck-Morss says that in this respect, Adorno, for all his Marxist leanings, was content ‘to continue to interpret the world’ rather than to change it (Buck-Morss 1977: 42), but there is a sense in which this blames Adorno for what is in fact a paradox in Marx: that capitalism would eventually be overthrown through its own contradictions becoming apparent (i.e. through immanent critique such as Adorno believed critical theory and Schönberg’s music were engaged in) and that some form of consciousness-raising was required so that the proletariat could be brought to realise those contradictions (i.e. an external critique). Of the two positions, Adorno’s is the most democratic, as Buck-Morss acknowledges, since it does not try to impose the consciousness of one strata of society on that of another.

⁵⁷ Martin 1995: 90

⁵⁸ Potolsky 2006: 144-5

⁵⁹ Brooks and Robert B. Heilman 1945, Understanding Drama, New York, p. 500; in Carlson 1984: 403.

⁶⁰ Carlson 1984: 403-4, 446

⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 441-2

Table 31/51 Theories of Theatre 1946-1950

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
A continuing concern with tragedy and absurdity.
Grundbegriffe der Poetik (1946)	Emil Staiger (1908- German critic	Influenced by Heidegger. Attempted to apply Heidegger's three modes of Dasein (being-in-the world) to an analysis of literature types, which he divides into the traditional epic , lyric and dramatic . The dramatic mode is the 'third and highest stage of poetic expression'. ¹ It is specifically concerned with 'ultimate meanings and destinations': 'Everything depends ... upon the end'. This idea is similar to Langer's idea of 'destiny'. The style of the dramatic is, therefore, suspense . Staiger explains some of the conventions and practices of drama in philosophical terms. There are two basic dramatic styles: pathetic (in which a protagonist absorbs the public into his passionate experience) and problematic (which focuses not on understanding, but on the solution to the problem and the fulfillment of destiny). The traditional unities aid in the concentration of this focus. ² Purpose of Theorist: analysis (philosophical) View of Theatre: n/a		To generate suspense	Doing: poetry (drama as a stage of poetry)
'Le metteur en scène et l'oeuvre dramatique' (1946); De la tradition théâtrale (1955)	Jean Vilar (1912-1971) French man of the theatre; founded the Avignon Theatre Festival	Great drama was only possible in privileged ages when some belief inspires the poet and brings him into harmony with a people who share it. The contemporary fragmentation of society and commercialization of art made this impossible. Hence the artist must deal with social concerns: 'We must first construct a society, and then perhaps we can construct a worthy theatre'. Although Vilar was a supporter of Artaud, he stressed social rather than metaphysical solutions for man's problems. Vilar expresses astonishment at the 'longevity' of 'realism': ' Art is a certain way of ordering or reordering nature. What then can the world 'realism' signify in this connection? Is Rimbaud a realist? And Corneille? And Kleist? ... I don't see any realism in Molière's Don Juan , in the apparition of the Commander, in the irrational wisdom of Sganarelle, in Harpagon's monologue, in the magnificent stanzas of the Cid ...'. True realism lies in 'cadences and words ... realism in the theatre is achieved by language and the movements of the human body'. ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: functional	A place; an activity	Social solutions through the 'ordering or reordering' of nature, achieved through language and the movements of the human body	Doing: drama (poetry) – a performed art
The Playwright as Thinker	Eric Bentley (1916- English theatre	Bentley 'consistently probed the meaning of theatre, challenging its aims and reactions ... gaining the respect and admiration, if not always the approval, of the theatre community'. ⁶ He also defended modern tragedy, created in modern terms. Bentley	A place; a practice	To suggest ideas; to entertain; to	Doing: drama Watching: critics do not

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1946); 'More than a Play' (1950); What Is Theatre? A Point of View (1956); ⁴ 'The Psychology of Farce' (1958); The Life of the Drama (1964) ⁵	critic, scholar and playwright	advocated a 'theatre of ideas, opposed equally to the light entertainment of the commercial stage and to the non-verbal theatricalism of Craig and the symbolists', as well as expressionism (essence without content) or surrealism (content without essence).⁷ Tragedy should be 'a broad and deep account of the life of the individual [in which] neither man's problems nor his ability to cope with them are belittled'. The basic dramatic tension of modern times was the tension between society and the individual.⁸ He claimed that contemporary French theatre displayed 'a strong religious element' (something which Carlson says appeared elsewhere in Europe at the same time, notably in the work of Eliot in England (1919) and Betti in Italy (1953)).⁹ The only serious rival to this kind of drama was Brecht's, which sought a political rather than a magical goal. Contemporary theatre was thus split between politics and magic, but both ran the risk of compromising theatre because both sought an 'extratheatrical end'. Bentley attempted to define the elusive art of theatre in What Is Theatre? The goal of the dramatist was the same as that of any author: to 'search for the human essence'. The successful playwright, however, had to have 'audacity', which is why artists were 'disturbing, unsettling people ... The greater the artist the greater the upset' and 'air of menace'. Theatricality 'by definition' was 'audacious'. This was what makes the artist useful to society. Theatre was 'the realm of the sudden, the astonishing, the extravagant ... the place for ... anyone but the anarchist to throw his bomb ... Audacity has no place in the arts until it is brought under iron control ... The man of the theatre must not merely bring the explosives in his bag; he must know exactly how to prepare the explosions and how to handle their subsidence.' It was 'the interplay between audacity and control' which produced 'the supreme artistic effects'. (Bentley believed that Brecht was the only modern dramatist who combined this audacity with control – but 'not in the theory and practices of propaganda', but by virtue of his freedom as a bourgeois artist!). Bentley referred back to the Apollonian/Dionysian (reason/passion) split of Nietzsche, and argued that drama should lead us in search of our highest sense of humanity with 'the audacity of Dionysus and the controlling hand of Apollo'. 'All art is a challenge to despair'.¹⁰ Bentley believed that contemporary theatre was demoralized and argued for 'a sense of where it all came from' as a way of reinvigorating 'the task of continuing'.¹¹ With regard to farce, he pointed out that although it was amoral, it relied upon and presupposed accepted social and moral standards in order for its humour to emerge. The recurring element in all farce		challenge despair; to 'search for the human essence'	influence the creative act, they influence public opinion; audiences of mainstream theatre are voyeurs – their involvement 'is not innocent' and 'if one took from theatre the element of voyeurism, the occasion would lose much of its appeal'. ¹⁵

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		and accentuated comedy was speed. Farce had the speed of fantasy. This rapid pace was more than a technicality. It was a psychological necessity, which marked ‘the nature of the experience’.¹² With regard to the critic, Bentley argued that ‘ages of great theatre’ did not come about ‘through the critics’ explaining how to write plays, or even how not to write them. The critic’s influence is not directly on the creative act but on public opinion ... What the critic influences is morale’.¹³ Despite his concern with tragedy, he defended melodrama, which he saw as ‘more natural’ than Naturalism, albeit not ‘mature’. It was more like child’s play and designed to produce fear or pity, especially self-pity – ‘the poor man’s catharsis’. There was nothing wrong with self-pity, it was functional, ‘a weapon in the struggle for existence ... a very present help in time of trouble’. It was only in modern times when any expression of emotion was frowned on that self-pity was seen as objectionable: ‘Ours is, after all, a thin-lipped, thin-blooded culture’ which fears emotion, whereas the ‘melodramatic vision is ... simply normal’ and corresponds to ‘an important aspect of realism ... as one can see from the play-acting of any child ... There is a melodrama in every tragedy, just as there is a child in every adult’.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts’ (1946)	Elmer Edgar Stoll American theorist and literary critic	Stoll argues that the spectator has either been forgotten or has come to be despised in both oratory and the arts, especially since the 1940’s. He considers much avant-garde art theory to be a last ditch attempt by an aristocracy to retain some position, if not of power and affluence, at least of intellectuality and taste, via a ‘cult of the esoteric and unintelligible’.¹⁶ This, however, has led to an extreme ‘indifference to the pleasure or enlightenment of the ordinary public’. In particular, the function of both as forms of communication is being ignored. As a consequence, ordinary people are beginning to hold both oratory (the forensic arts) and the dramatic arts in low repute. This is a vicious circle, because artists then come to despise their audiences and ‘the common man is ... further forgotten and flouted’¹⁷ as his experience of the arts becomes a burden rather than a pleasure.¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – dramatic art as a form of communication like oratory View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional		The pleasure and enlightenment of its public	Doing: dramatic art (a form of communication) Watching: audiences who are treated with disdain will turn their backs on theatre
Democracy and the Arts	Rupert Brooke (1887-1915)	The coming of democracy will not mean the end of Art – it will simply change it, perhaps for the better. However, a democratic government needs to recognize the importance of		An expression	Doing: art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1946)	English poet	the Arts in the national life and find ways to support artists. ¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-art as valuable to a state View of Theatre: positive		and reflection of society
Preface to Les bonnes (1947); ‘A Note on Theatre’ (1963)	Jean Genet (1910-1986) French avant-garde playwright	Genet drew close analogies between theatre and ritual. He considered the celebration of the Mass ‘the greatest drama available to Western man’. ²⁰ Theatre should be ‘a profound web of active symbols capable of speaking to the audience a language in which nothing is said but everything portended’. Like Artaud, he thought Eastern theatre offered a model of this. In Western theatre, the actor ‘does not seek to become a sign charged with signs. He merely wishes to identify himself with a character’. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-character driven drama View of Theatre: ambivalent	A web of active symbols	Speaking through the symbolic	Doing: drama
1946: Influenced by the work of Brecht, Judith Malina and Julian Beck formed the Living Theater Collective, destined to become probably ‘the best known experimental group of the 1960s’.²² whose transformations ‘reflected changes in American society and experimental theatre’, moving from the early presentation of avant-garde material and production techniques to improvisational work in which performers portrayed themselves confronting social institutions and norms, a production style for which it became famous.²³ The aim was to establish a permanent repertory of ‘moving and meaningful plays’ in order ‘to enhance the blossoming forth of poetry in the theatre, while preserving a certain realism, of course’, according to Beck.²⁴ Influenced by the avant-garde musician John Cage, Beck and Malina ‘sought to open up the creative process [a focus on doing], to encourage their actors to seek their own style and break free from the authority of the director’.²⁵ They were initially attracted to Brecht, but decided that Brecht’s works were based on the ‘fatal error’ of assuming that one could not speak directly to an audience about human problems (hence the use of ‘theatrical diversion’ in Brecht). The group ‘discovered’ Artaud in 1958, seeing in him ‘the ultimate revolutionary, who recognized that the ‘steel world of law and order’ created to protect us from barbarism also cut us off from all our deepest impulses and sensations, turning us into the heartless monsters who wage wars and oppress and exploit our fellows’.²⁶ The aim then became to ‘release our trapped feelings’ so that we would come to find this heartlessness intolerable, and come to feel instead ‘the joy of everything else, of loving, of creating, of being at peace, and of being ourselves’.²⁷ [A kind of anarchy?]. The group went into exile in Europe, during which it achieved an almost mythic status. It returned to America in 1968-69 for a tour, arousing controversy and critical debate. In particular, it was seen to be ‘out of harmony’ with the political theatre which had since developed in America. It split in 1970, dividing into separate ‘cells’ to struggle once more outside the existing order for ‘a new art and a new society’.²⁸ During the 1968 strike in France, the theatre became involved on the side of the students, since they shared the aspiration of tying art and life more closely together in a ‘society of artists’ who would work in cooperation and without authority as a model for the world, and the provision of theatre for everyone rather than just to those who could pay for it’.²⁹ The group dropped from sight during the 1970s but continued to produce works involving audience participation.³⁰ The group reorganized itself after Julian Beck’s death in the late 1980s, working out of a shopfront space in New York. When its premises were condemned, the group moved to Italy, from which it continues to tour its productions.³¹
Von der Wahrheit (1947); Tragedy is	Karl Jaspers (1883-1969) German existentialist	Tragedy remains relevant. The tragic man calls into question the established political, social, moral or religious order, exposing both its limitations and his own. Tragedy is not an end in itself but a process that points toward an unattainable complete truth, a positive aspect which can be easily lost, making the ‘tragic end of life’ an end in itself – leading to		Calls into question the established political,	Doing: drama (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Not Enough (1952)	theologian	nihilism. ³² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		social, moral or religious order, exposing limitations
Aesthetics (1949)	James Feibleman (1904-) Philosopher	An analysis of both tragedy and comedy as ‘explorations of the disjuncture between the actual and the possible’. ³³ Comedy is an indirect treatment of what tragedy treats directly, but is more intellectual than emotional. Tragedy preaches acceptance; comedy preaches action; tragedy is concerned with values as values; comedy is concerned with limitations on values. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: aesthetic		Aesthetic	Doing: tragedy/ comedy (art)
The Idea of a Theatre (1949); ‘The Notion of “Action”’ (1964) ³⁴	Francis Fergusson (1904-1986) American academic and critic; theorist of drama	Both the creation and the enjoyment of drama requires a ‘histrionic sensibility’ similar to having an ear for music. Tragedy is underlain by a ritual pattern. Modern drama has been seriously flawed by a loss of cultural wholeness, which may one day again be accessible. ³⁵ Fergusson studied acting under Russian émigré teachers Richard Boleslavsky and Maria Ouspenskaya (disciples of Stanislavski). Like Sartre, he remained committed to action as ‘the most basic’ theatre technique. ³⁶ ‘All action ... aims at some “objective”, and if you can see what that is, you can understand the action’ of both the characters and the play as a whole. Action was the spine of both. As Aristotle had first said, ‘the movement of the psyche toward the object of its desire’ was ‘what the dramatist was imitating in plot, character, and language, and what the actor imitates in the medium of his own feeling and perception’. ³⁷ Crane argues that Fergusson has a ‘Platonic’ view of theatre. Drama is devoted to ‘the “imitation” of human life and action in its most comprehensive sense’ and provides us with ‘bearings’. ³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		The imitation of human life in action in order to generate cultural wholeness	Doing: drama
‘Tragedy and the Common Man’ (1949); ³⁹ ‘The Nature of Tragedy’ (1949);	Arthur Miller (1915- American dramatist	In response to Bentley’s criticism of Death of a Salesman as neither tragedy nor social drama, Miller defended tragedy as a modern genre, but proposed a rethinking of the genre in the light of contemporary concerns. ⁴¹ Any stage work must involve conflict. This conflict is internal in drama and tragedy. What distinguishes tragedy from pathos is that tragedy ‘brings us not only sadness, sympathy, identification and even fear; it also brings us knowledge or enlightenment’ thereby showing us ‘the right way of living in the world’. ⁴² Miller defends ‘the common man’ as tragic hero against the traditional high-		To bring order and meaning to chaos; affect enlightenment – the right way of living	Doing: drama/tragedy Showing: the ‘truth’ as the playwright sees it at the time

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
' Death of a Salesman: A Modern Tragedy? (1958) ⁴⁰		born hero: if the exaltation of tragic action were truly a property of the high-bred character alone, it is inconceivable that the mass of mankind should cherish tragedy above all other forms, let alone be capable of understanding it'. All that was required for a tragic hero was that a person have 'total compulsion to evaluate himself justly', to totally question everything that had previously been unquestioned, to be prepared to engage in a total struggle, 'without reservation' for what he believes to be his right. Tragedy is driven by indignation. The reason why there were no tragedies being written was not because there were no more tragic heroes, or because it was a pessimistic form of drama but because of modernity's pre-occupation with the 'purely psychiatric' or 'purely sociological' view of life, both of which deny man's ability to will to act: 'If all our miseries, our indignities, are born and bred within our minds' or as a result of society 'cramping ... our lives', then 'action, let alone heroic action, is obviously impossible'. What tragedy does is demonstrate and celebrate 'the indestructible will of man to achieve his humanity'.⁴³ In his introduction to The Collected Plays, published in 1958, Miller also defended Death of a Salesman against the many interpretations and speculations about the play: he wasn't interested in the selling profession particularly, and neither extolled it nor condemned it; he was largely ignorant of Freud's teachings when he wrote the play and certainly didn't see Biff's stolen pen as a phallic symbol;⁴⁴ the play was not an attempt to bring down, or raise the "American edifice", nor was it an attempt to show up family relations or cure the ills which afflicted modern families. Rather the play grew from 'simple images' – the image of aging, the image of people 'turning into strangers who only evaluate one another' and especially the image of 'the need to leave a thumbprint ... on the world'. The play simply showed 'the truth as I saw it'. Miller believed that any art which set out to be a political programme was diminished. Writing 'springs from an inner chaos crying out for order, for meaning'. It is the process of writing which reveals the meaning: 'To speak ... of a play as though it were the objective work of a propagandist is an almost biological kind of nonsense'.⁴⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-modern tragedy View of Theatre: positive; functional		in the world
Forewords to La parodie and	Arthur Adamov (1908-1971) French avant-	Adamov pleaded for 'a living theatre, that is, a theatre where gestures, attitudes, the true life of the body have the right to free themselves from the convention of language, to pass beyond psychological conventions, in a word to pursue to the ultimate their deepest	A place of living performance	Signification through gesture	Doing: playwrighting (theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
L'invasion (1950); 'Théâtre, argent et politique' (1956); Program note to Paoli Paoli (1957); 'Qui êtes-vous Arthur Adamov' (1960); L'homme et l'enfant (1968)	garde playwright	signification'. He claimed to be inspired by Artaud, as well as the phenomenological philosophers Husserl and Merleau-Ponty. Situation was the focus of his plays, not psychological development. Although his plays were grouped under the term 'theatre of the absurd', especially by English critics such as Martin Esslin (1961), Adamov rejected this label, claiming life was not absurd, just very difficult.⁴⁶ [A similar concept to Gertrude Stein's]. Adamov was profoundly influenced by the visit of Brecht's Berliner Ensemble to Paris in 1954. He had been in the process of moving towards a more socially engaged theatre, and renounced his early work 'for its indifference to political matters'. Brecht became his new 'model'. Historical drama had traditionally sought to create a 'fallacious identification' between spectator and hero. Brecht, by creating a 'critical distance', had allowed the spectator to 'consider the historical process more objectively, to become aware of the continual 'antagonism of classes, one of which is always oppressed by another'.⁴⁷ Brecht showed that social conditions were alterable. Paoli Paoli was the result of Adamov's discovery that 'a work of art, and especially a theatre piece, acquires reality only if placed in a defined social context [and] in the service of an ideology'.⁴⁸ In 'Who are you Arthur Adamov', Adamov suggested that the theatre must show 'both the curable and incurable aspects of things'. The incurable aspect is the inevitability of death, the curable aspect is the social aspect. Carlson considers that much of the theatre of the period followed either of these two paths, led by Beckett (the incurable) or by Brecht (the curable).⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-performance- oriented drama; socially engaged theatre View of Theatre: functional			pieces) Showing: the curable and the incurable aspects of things
'Palabra final' to Historia de una escalera (1950); Hoy es Fiesta (1957); 'La tragedia' (1958); 'Sobre la tragedia'	Antonio Buero Vallejo (1916- Spanish dramatist	'A play is not a treatise or even an essay. Its mission is to reflect life, and life is usually stronger than ideas'.⁵⁰ The character of human life is 'a problem whose solution can never be fully attained'. Vallejo had a 'romantic' view of tragedy: it demonstrated 'man's desire to free himself from the bonds – external or internal, social or individual – which enslave him'. Through the presentation of both despair and hope, the tragic dramatist creates reconciliation, 'something great and unchangeable which lies beyond tragedy but which can be reached only through it'.		To reflect life	Doing: plays Showing: possible ways of reconciliation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1963)		Purpose of Theorist: polemic - anti-ideas drama View of Theatre: positive
Preface to The Rose Tattoo (1950); 'The Timeless World of a Play' (1951); ⁵¹ 'Afterword' to Camino Real	Tennessee Williams (1911-1983) American playwright	Also defended tragedy as a modern genre, although he, like Miller, thought the genre should be rethought. 'The distancing of the dramatic world, its existence 'outside of time', was according to Williams, the source of both its lasting strength and its current weakness'. ⁵² Theatre arrested time . ⁵³ The theatre offered a completeness which freed us from our 'haunting sense of impermanence' and our self-consciousness, which enabled us to see human actions and emotions more clearly. In tragedy, we were thus able to 'recognize and pity' individuals who attempted to assert their dignity by choosing 'certain moral values by which to live': 'suppose there had been no wrist watch or office clock ... suppose, in other words, that the meeting with Willy Loman had somehow occurred in a world outside of time. Then I think we should receive him with concern and kindness and even with respect' The 'world of a play' offered us an occasion 'to view its characters under that special condition of a world without time ', and this enabled us to see them as worthy of our attention: 'the created world of a play is removed from that element which makes people little and their emotions fairly inconsequential'. This, in modern, more emotionally guarded times, might only be a temporary effect, although the modern dramatist might be able to force his spectators to recognize the relationship between its world of temporality and the timeless world of drama by 'a certain foolery, a certain distortion toward the grotesque'. If it doesn't somehow account for time, his play will fail because spectators know the world is 'ravaged by time'. ⁵⁴ Williams, and his fellow American playwright Arthur Miller, developed a form of selective realism in which in which certain realistic elements were heightened into symbolic significance, or theatrical devices were used within a recognizable, realistic world. ⁵⁵ Williams argued that 'a play in a book is only the shadow of a play and not even a clear shadow of it ... hardly more than an architect's blueprint of a house not built or built and destroyed'. ⁵⁶ Spectators were a particular kind of participant, removed enough from what was going on to see properly and thus understand and experience the moral values contained in a tragedy. They were able to do this because they did not need to be concerned about themselves: 'plays in the tragic tradition offer us a view of certain moral values in violent juxtaposition. Because we do not participate, except as spectators, we can view them clearly, within the limits of our emotional equipment. These people on the stage do not return our looks. We do not have to answer their questions nor make any sign of being in	A seeing place	To force the audience to recognize the relationships in the play; to arrest time	Doing: drama (tragedy) Showing: selective realism Watching: spectators were able to see more clearly precisely because they were not active participants ; the darkness of the auditorium enhanced this because it relieved self-consciousness company with them, nor do we have to compete with their virtues nor resist their offences. All at once, for this reason, we are able to see them! Our hearts are wrung by recognition and pity, so that the dusky shell of the auditorium where we are gathered anonymously together is flooded with an almost liquid warmth of unchecked human sympathies, relieved of self-consciousness, allowed to function'. ⁵⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-the possibility of modern tragedy View of Theatre: positive

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Les deux cent mille situations dramatiques (1950)	Etienne Souriau (1892-1979) French philosopher	A proposal to analyze dramatic plots based on the possible functional arrangement of various elements. Souriau's ideas influenced semiotic studies of the theatre during the 1970's, as well as the more general theory of Ginestier (1961). ⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical			Doing: drama
Shakespeare's Tragedies (1950)	Clifford Leech (1909- English academic	Tragedy was still a relevant genre but the tragic world was 'not merely devoid of meaning'. It was actively malevolent. Evil usually predominated, occasionally temporarily balanced by the strength of a hero. Endurance rather than pride is the balance to terror in a terrible universe in which man must justify his existence. ⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent		To show endurance	Doing: tragedy (a genre of dramatic literature)
Homo Ludens: A Study of the Play-Element in Culture (1950)	Johan Huizinga (1872-1945) Dutch academic and historian	Drama is but one form of human (social) play, a sense it retains in performance. Tragedy and comedy 'both derive from play', and the acting out of myth which eventually became formalised. This form of play was originally also competitive, much like a modern football match. ⁶⁰ Purpose of Theorist: historical analysis View of Theatre: positive		Play	Doing: drama (a form of play)

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 439

² Carlson 1984: 440

³ Vilar 1955: 170-171 in Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers.213

⁴ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.298-301.

⁵ Excerpt reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 35-41.

⁶ Krasner 2008: 298

⁷ Carlson 1984: 400

-
- ⁸ Bentley 1946, The Playwright as Thinker, New York, 1946, p. 33; in Carlson 1984: 400.
- ⁹ Carlson 1984: 417
- ¹⁰ Bentley 2008/1956: 298-301; Bentley 1964, The Life of the Drama, New York, p. 353; in Carlson 1984: 453.
- ¹¹ Bentley 2008/1956: 301
- ¹² Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.84
- ¹³ Bentley 2008/1956: 301
- ¹⁴ Bentley 1998/1966:36
- ¹⁵ Bentley 2008/1964: 156
- ¹⁶ Stoll, Elmer Edgar. 1946. 'The Downfall of Oratory: Our Undemocratic Arts'. Journal of the History of Ideas 7 (1) pp. 3-34.19. In art as in politics, according to Stoll, 'aristocracy ... often enough takes to outlawry', especially if conservatism is aligned with the bourgeoisie (Stoll 1946: 28).
- ¹⁷ Stoll 1946: 21
- ¹⁸ Stoll 1936: 34
- ¹⁹ Brooke, Rupert 1946, Democracy and the Arts, Geoffrey Keynes (ed), London, Rupert Hart-David.
- ²⁰ Carlson 1984: 413
- ²¹ Genet 1963, 'A Note on Theatre', trans. Bernard Frechtman, Tulane Drama Review Vol. 7(3), p. 37; in Carlson 1984: 413.
- ²² Carlson 1984: 419
- ²³ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 510-511
- ²⁴ Julian Beck, in Pierre Biner 1972, The Living Theatre, trans. Anon, New York, p. 20; in Carlson 1984: 419.
- ²⁵ Carlson 1984: 420
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 420
- ²⁷ Kenneth H. Brown 1965, The Brig, New York, p. 25; in Carlson 1984: 420.
- ²⁸ Carlson 1984: 469
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 472
- ³⁰ A 1979 production in London of Prometheus invited audience members to help enact the communist revolution. After the performance, participating audience members were then invited to join the company on a protest march to a nearby prison (Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.512).
- ³¹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 512
- ³² Carlson 1984: 447
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 404
- ³⁴ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 345-347.
- ³⁵ Carlson 1984: 402-3
- ³⁶ Krasner 2008: 345
- ³⁷ Fergusson 2008/1964: 346

-
- ³⁸ Cited in Crane, R.S. 1967. 'Varieties of Dramatic Criticism'. In The Idea of the Humanities and other Essays Critical and Historical. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, pp. 215-235. 220-221
- ³⁹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 267-9.
- ⁴⁰ Reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 106-112.
- ⁴¹ Brandt 1998: 106
- ⁴² Miller 1978, 'The Nature of Tragedy', The Theatre Essays, ed. Robert Martin, New York, p. 11; in Carlson 1984: 405.
- ⁴³ Miller 2008/1949: 267
- ⁴⁴ Miller 1958 in Brandt 1998: 107
- ⁴⁵ Miller 1958 in Brandt 1998: 107
- ⁴⁶ Adamov 1968, L'homme et l'enfant, p. 111; in Carlson 1984: 411.
- ⁴⁷ Adamov 1968, Ici et maintenant, Paris, p. 42; in Carlson 1984: 412.
- ⁴⁸ Adamov 1968, Ici et maintenant, Paris, p. 93; in Carlson 1984: 414.
- ⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 415
- ⁵⁰ Vallejo 1950, Historia de una escalera, Barcelona, p. 155; in Carlson 1984: 419
- ⁵¹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 274-277.
- ⁵² Carlson 1984: 405
- ⁵³ Williams 2008/1951: 274
- ⁵⁴ Williams 2008/1951: 275
- ⁵⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 495
- ⁵⁶ Williams, 'Afterword', Camino Real, in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 299.
- ⁵⁷ Williams 2008/1951: 276
- ⁵⁸ Carlson 1984: 438, 494, 500
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 446
- ⁶⁰ Huizinga, J. 1950. Homo Ludens: A Study of the Play-Elements in Culture: Routledge, 144

Table 32/51: Theories of Theatre 1951-1954

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Reflections on the Theatre (1951)	Jean-Louis Barrault (1910-) Head of the Théâtre France from 1959	Theatre was ‘a total physical and psychical experience’. He drew on Artaud’s work on breathing to analyse the vocal mechanism of the actor. He proposed a ‘spectrum of theatre’ which had ‘pure gesture’ at one end, ‘pure speech’ at the other, and Shakespeare and Molière at the centre. ¹ Dramatic style began with breathing, gesture was implied in language. [In the past this discussion would come under ‘stage-craft’] Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A physical experience (for the actor)	The experience of performance	Doing: acting
Ostend Interviews 1951	Michel de Ghelderode (1898-1962) Flemish dramatist	Expressed a similar attitude towards drama as Ionesco (1953). His plays arose ‘not from an intellectual emotion but from a visual emotion. Theatre begins always with the eyes ’. ² Ghelderode shared a similar interest in marionettes as the symbolists: ‘he found in them theatre in its ‘pure, savage, and original state’, a theatre of magic, of symbolic sounds, colors, and objects’. ‘Objects are signs, and the visionary arrangement of such signs is the function of theatre’. This theatre was ‘irrational and visionary’, not discursive. ³ Ghelderode considered Brecht a ‘misguided’ genius, and condemned engaged and thesis plays. Theatre was ‘an art of instinct and not of reason’. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-discursive drama View of Theatre: positive	A seeing place (for the artist); a practice	To see; to arrange signs visually	Doing: drama (an art of instinct)
‘El teatro revolucionario’ (1952); ‘Teología del drama’ (1953); ‘Tragedia’ (1953); Drama y sociedad (1956); ‘Teatro épico, teatro dramático, teatro de	Alfonso Sastre (1926-) Spanish dramatist	Like Betti, Sastre was seeking for a way to make theatre more deeply relevant to human needs. He proposed as a theme ‘the tragedy of a world without Christ, the tragedy of a world with its back turned on the truth’. ⁵ Influenced by Sartre, he later broadened his concern to a more generally humanistic ‘engaged’ theatre, although he was suspicious of commitment to any specific political program. He believed that political engagement tended to blind one to the truths in the adversary’s position. Engagement must be based on ‘an objective vision of sociopolitical realities’. An a priori commitment to any social or political position was ‘unacceptable, not only for the theatre, but for any social activity, artistic or otherwise’. ⁶ A dramatist could write engaged drama without openly espousing any particular doctrine by stimulating ‘prepolitical states of emotion and awareness – states which frequently encourage a purifying political action’. ⁷ Tragedy in particular could arouse in the spectator ‘fundamental questions about the meaning’ of events and ‘the possibility of reducing their effect by human effort’. The pity and fear stimulated the spectator [always the spectator] ‘to make meaningful social decisions, ranging from individual assistance to revolution’, while catharsis consisted of two phases:	A social activity	A stimulus to engagement with the world through its engagement	Doing: drama Showing: the tragic quality of individual human existence Watching: (pity and fear stimulate the spectator to make meaningful social decisions.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
vanguardia' (1963); Anatomía del realismo (1965)		'immediate or personal purification and social purification'. ⁸ Sastre considered that both Brecht and Beckett offered only a partial perspective. Sastre suggested a realismo profundo which would combine both views, balance Beckett's pessimism with Brecht's 'naïve optimism', and show 'the tragic quality of individual human existence as well as the perspective of historical development'. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive
Grundlagen der Dramaturgie (1952)	Arnulf Perger (1883- Literary scholar	Analysis of drama as literature; influenced by Walzel's general approach but rejecting the categories 'open' and 'closed' as too vague for drama. Suggests instead a distinction between drama set in a single place (Einortsdrama) and drama of motion (Bewegungsdrama). Thus the question of setting (das Raumproblem) becomes the major concern of the dramatist. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: n/a			Doing: drama (literature)
'Anmerkung zur Komödie' (1952); 'Theaterprobleme' (1954) ('Problems of the Theatre' 1955); ¹⁰ 'Friedrich Schiller' (1959)	Friedrich Dürrenmatt (1921-1990) Swiss writer, playwright, illustrator, journalist and television director	Comedy was the only proper artistic response to the horrors of world wars and atomic bombs, a way of rubbing 'salt' into the wounds. Drama must depict the subjective world of which it is a part. The modern world offers neither representatives figures nor heroes – only victims. Pure tragedy is not longer possible, although 'the tragic element' is. This can be generated out of comedy 'as a frightening moment, as an abyss that opens suddenly'. Tragedy 'overcomes distance ... [b]ut comedy creates distance' ¹¹ 'through the use of 'flashes of inspiration'. ¹² Both are 'but formal concepts, dramatic attitudes, figments of the aesthetic imagination which can embrace one and the same thing. Only the conditions under which each is created are different'. Tragedy did not use 'conceits' but comedy did, as a way of creating distance. It is through the use of the conceit 'that the anonymous audience becomes possible as an audience, becomes a reality to be counted on, and, also, one to be taken into account. The conceit easily transforms the crowd of theatregoers into a mass which can be attacked, deceived, outsmarted into listening to things it would otherwise not so readily listen to. Comedy is a mousetrap in which the public is easily caught and in which it will get caught over and over again. Tragedy, on the other hand, predicates a true community, a kind of community whose existence in our day is but an embarrassing fiction'. According to Dürrenmatt, 'the tragic figure is one who must display personal power' and a sense of responsibility, ¹³ but 'power today becomes visible and takes shape perhaps only when it explodes'. Otherwise it is 'impenetrable to view, anonymous, bureaucratic' so that 'genuinely representative figures	A seeing-place	To create distance	Doing: drama (comedy as a response to the horrors of a post-war world); playwrighting Showing: a depiction of the playwright's world Watching: 'If one could but stand outside the world, it would no longer be threatening';

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		are absent, and the tragic heroes are without names.¹⁴ ‘Recalling Schiller’s distinction between the naïve and the sentimental, Dürrenmatt suggests that the naïve poet accepts the world as it exists, while the sentimental or reflective poet calls it into question, thus becoming a rebel. If he is to remain morally consistent, then, he will not stop at questioning but begin to urge change; that is he will move from rebel to revolutionary’.¹⁵ However, since the revolutionary doctrine that a man ‘can and must change the world’ is unrealizable for the individual, it can serve only as a political slogan to incite the mob. Thus the modern poet is confronted by a world which is both unacceptable and, through his individual efforts at any rate, unchangeable. Schiller’s solution to this problem remains the answer: to accept necessity in the external realm of nature, but to assert freedom within the individual. This answer should remind us that ‘man is only in part a political being’. His destiny will be fulfilled not politically but in what ‘lies beyond politics and comes after it’.¹⁶ His views were echoed in the works of Harold Pinter. Dürrenmatt took ‘a dim view of the swirling theories of his time’, preferring to seek practical solutions to the problems of playwriting and theatre practice:¹⁷ ‘For me, the stage is not a battlefield for theories, philosophies, and manifestos, but rather an instrument whose possibilities I seek to know by playing with it ... I speak [as a ‘tailor’] only to those who fall asleep listening to Heidegger. ... Literary scholarship looks on the theatre as an object; for the dramatist it is never something purely objective, something separate from himself’.¹⁸ He creates an object only to ‘scorn it’ and make something new. Scholarship comes after the artist, and makes laws; the artist ‘has no need of scholarship’ because he ‘can not accept a law he has not discovered for himself’. Scholarship ‘stands behind the artist like a threatening ogre, ready to leap forth’ at the artist who ‘wants to talk about art’, especially when he argues that the laws produced by scholarship do not exist.¹⁹ ‘Art is something personal, and something personal should never be explained in generalities. The value of a work of art does not depend on whether more or less good reasons for its existence can be found ... The artist always represents his world and himself’.²⁰ Aristotle’s unities did not make Greek theatre possible; Greek theatre made Aristotelian unities possible. Scholarship always comes after the fact, yet hems in the artist. ‘Dramatic craftsmanship is an optical illusion’, a product of the critic’s own prejudices.²¹ The ‘task of art ... is the creation of form, of that which is concrete’.²² Every stage play seeks to make an ‘immediate impact’ – it seeks to transform itself into			consequently the playwright must use ‘conceits’ to trap the theatregoer into becoming an audience who will listen to things it would otherwise not listen to;²⁴ darkening the auditorium has been ‘the most disastrous innovation’ because it has resulted in ‘the reverential mood ... in which our theatres are being stifled’ and has turned the stage into a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		visibility, and in doing so, ‘takes for granted audience, theatre and stage’. Nevertheless, he thinks that darkening the auditorium has been ‘the most disastrous innovation’ because it has resulted in ‘the reverential mood ... in which our theatres are being stifled’ and has turned the stage into a ‘peep-show’. This has contributed to theatre today becoming largely ‘a museum [to which] visiting professors or independent scholars ... take their turn to appear ... or arrange exhibitions’.²³ Although this is problematic, it nevertheless frees the artist to experiment, since scholarship has determined a vast number of styles, so any style can become possible. Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive			‘peep-show’.
1953: the appearance of Samuel Beckett’s Waiting for Godot had an international impact [on theatre practitioners, critics and theorists if not on spectators], and focused attention on ‘a new style of anti-realist drama in France that would become the most successful avant-garde theatre the century had ever produced’. Beckett’s work was grouped with the plays of Eugene Ionesco and Adamov under the fashionable title of ‘theatre of the absurd’. Adamov objected strongly to his plays being placed under this genre. However, Martin Esslin’s influential book Theatre of the Absurd (1961) established the term in English criticism. The French, in an attempt to distinguish between the work of Sartre and Camus, and the work of Beckett and Ionesco, tended to define the new works under the term suggested by Ionesco: théâtre de dérision. Nevertheless, what did unite these new works was a rejection of the accepted conventions of the traditional French theatre with its emphasis on the word and linkage between cause and effect, its bias towards realism and the psychological development of character. Beckett, Ionesco and Adamov were all influenced by the work of the phenomenologists Husserl and Merleau-Ponty, particularly by their focus on the structures which organized ‘reflexes’ rather than reflexes themselves, and emphasised situation rather than plot, character development or psychological insight.²⁵ Esslin also included the work of Jean Genet under this genre, although it did not share the same general vision of the human condition (isolation, meaninglessness, the inadequacy of language) which united Beckett, Ionesco and Adamov. During the same period, many continental theorists of tragedy came to consider that the genre was no longer relevant, looking instead to dark comedy or tragi-comedy as a more suitable genre for modern consciousness.²⁶ Dürrenmatt’s 1954 essay ‘Theaterprobleme’ (1952) is an example of this move. A continuing concern for modern theorists was the debate over whether the theatre should be viewed primarily ‘as an engaged social phenomenon’ or ‘as a politically indifferent aesthetic artifact’.²⁷ The autonomous view drew firstly on Artaud to support its claims, then on Grotowski. Ionesco argued for the latter on the grounds of artistic freedom since only under conditions of freedom could the artist create a work of art. This was bound to be out of step with the mainstream until people became familiar with it.
‘Cerisy-la-Salle’ (1953); ‘Notes sur le théâtre’ (1953); ‘The Playwright’s Role’ (1958); ²⁸ ‘La	Eugene Ionesco (1912-1994) French avant-garde playwright	In ‘Cerisy’, Ionesco claimed that the term absurd was ‘vague enough to mean nothing any more and to be an easy definition of anything’. ³⁰ He considered the world ‘irrational’ ³¹ rather than absurd. He preferred théâtre de dérision to describe his plays. La cantatrice chauve (1951) was ‘abstract theatre. Pure drama. Anti-thematic, anti-ideological, anti-social-realist, anti-philosophic, anti-boulevard-psychology, anti-bourgeois, the rediscovery of a new free theatre’. ³² It was based on an English primer he was using to teach himself English. ³³ Les chaises was ‘an attempt to push beyond the present frontiers of drama’. ³⁴ He was aiming to strip dramatic action of ‘all that is	A place of communication	Communication; to reveal what was usually hidden in discursive drama using words,	Doing: playwrighting Showing: life as ridiculous, even entertaining Watching: unpopular

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Coeur n'est pas sur la main' (1959); 'The Avant-Garde Theatre' (1960); ²⁹ Notes and Counter Notes (1964)		particular to it' in order to achieve an abstract conflict 'without psychological motivation'. Freed from all external abstractions, theatre could become 'theatre from within', about 'man's most deeply repressed desires, his most essential needs, his myths, his indisputable anguish, his most secret reality and his dreams', all of which are normally hidden by 'social crust and discursive thought'. Consequently, words were not necessarily the best medium for the dramatist. Nor were they essential: 'Everything is language in the theatre ... words, gestures, objects, action'. The author should 'make actors of his props ... bring objects to life ... animate the scenery and give symbols form'.³⁵ Ionesco's conception of theatre has much in common with the Prague semioticians. In 1958, Ionesco became engaged in a debate with the critic Kenneth Tynan (1958), in which he defended his conception of theatre against the charge of being 'devoid of any humanistic values', merely 'a funfair ride on a ghost train, all skulls and hooting waxworks ... a diversion'.³⁶ The role of the playwright was not to 'deliver a message to the world ... to direct its course, to save it' but to simply write plays 'in which he can offer only a testimony ... a personal, affective testimony of his anguish and the anguish of others or ... of his happiness ... or ... express his feelings ... about life ... A work of art has nothing to do with doctrine'.³⁷ Ionesco drew a distinction between the merely 'social' and 'true society', which was 'revealed by our common anxieties, our desires, our secret nostalgias', of which political concerns were 'merely pale reflections: 'it is the human condition that directs the social condition, not vice versa'. Drama therefore must deal with these basic realities: 'the pain of living, the fear of dying, our thirst for the absolute'. The purpose of art was not to teach, but to testify about existence by means of its structure or inner logic. Art was 'a way of knowing that involves the emotions' and was tied to no 'ideology or closed system of thought' – 'it was not Sophocles who was inspired by Freud but obviously the other way round'.³⁸ Ideology is not the source of art. A work of art is the source and raw material of ideologies to come'. A work of art 'is the expression of an incommunicable reality that one tries to communicate' [why else write plays – 'the very act of writing and presenting plays is surely incompatible' with a belief that 'words have no meaning and ... all language is incommunicable'?].³⁹ Its purpose was to present 'a vision of life that is enlightening, entertaining, or both',⁴⁰ and it should be judged on whether 'it is true to its own nature'.⁴¹ Like Dürrenmatt, Ionesco saw himself as a kind of mason, knowing certain laws of		gestures, objects and action; a way of knowing that involves the emotions	plays are merely unfamiliar plays; the spectator becomes used to anything in the end, and good avant-garde plays will become both popular and mainstream

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		dramatic construction, but in an empirical or instinctive manner, and springing ‘from my own creative experience’ and which were ‘provisional and mobile’, coming ‘after, not before, artistic creation’ and as likely to be dropped for the next play. He accepted the ‘official’ description of his work as ‘avant-garde’ in the general sense of ‘an artistic and cultural phenomenon of a precursory nature’ which pointed to a change of direction for a whole society: ‘one can only see that there has been an avant-garde when it no longer exists as such’. What was constant was the sense that ‘the revolutionary playwright feels he is running counter to his time’ because he is ‘the opponent of an existing system ... a critic of ... what exists now’. However, ‘a thing once spoken is already dead, reality lies somewhere beyond it and the thought has become petrified’ and eventually ‘every good avant-gardist’ is ‘merged into the theatrical tradition. Before then, it can only be ‘the theatre of a minority’, unpopular and hated by critics. The aim of the artist can never be to please either critics or public but ‘to discover truths’ whatever they may be at the time ‘and to state them’. Unfamiliar works were always unpopular but could become popular in time. The dramatist was ‘not a pedagogue’ peddling ‘second-hand truths’ and ‘neither is he a demagogue’. He is simply trying to satisfy ‘a mental need’. A work of art (like a tree) was ‘sufficient in itself and I can easily imagine theatre without a public. The public will come by itself, and will recognize this theatre as it recognizes a tree as a tree’. The artist should not/perhaps cannot write with the spectator in mind. In any case, theatre was a basic human need which ‘like bodily functions’ is ‘as natural, necessary and instinctive as breathing’ and will always be discovered or rediscovered, although he believed that the avant-garde movement in France had been ‘arrested’ because of ‘wars, revolutions, Nazism ... tyranny, dogmatism and ... bourgeois inertia’ creating a theatre which was simply a ‘submission to dogmatism’. Ionesco distinguished between two views of what was generally considered popular theatre, one of which was erroneous. This was the view that popular theatre was ‘for those who are lacking in intellect’. The other was theatre which was ‘intended to instruct, a theatre for our edification, the tool of a political creed, of some ideology of which it is the duplicate – a useless and “conformist” repetition’. Against this there was the ‘work of art’ – always ahead of its time, a ‘flowering of the imagination’ in which ‘meanings emerge by themselves ... eloquent for some and less so for others’ at least at first. This kind of work was only ‘unpopular’ ‘because of its unfamiliarity’ but could in fact be considered popular in a different, more genuine sense

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		in that it ‘springs from men’s hearts, through a man’s heart; it is the only thing which really expresses the people’. Genuine popular theatre is ‘one of communion in the same agony’. So-called popular theatre, however, ‘is actually far more unpopular. It is a theatre which is arrogantly imposed throughout by a ruling aristocracy, a special class of initiates who know or think they know in advance what the public needs. They even say to the public: “You must only need what we want you to need and you must only think in the way we think”’. Theatre needed ‘places of experiment ... protected from the superficiality of the general public’ or those who presumed to speak on its behalf (such as commercial theatre managers). It was necessary for the artist to ‘wage war against or else to ignore’ both. Dramatists ‘should have the same opportunities as scientists for making experiments’ without having to concern themselves with ‘popularity’. No-one asked scientists to justify their work on the basis of popularity.⁴² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-commercial theatre which imposes on the public what it thinks they need View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘Teatro e religione’ (1953)	Ugo Betti (1892-1953) Italian playwright	Argued for serious and passionately involved theatre to deal with needs which were ‘essentially religious’ in their search for universal values. Dramatists must therefore ‘enter into the spiritual desert where many live’⁴³ and ‘prove again certain things to everyone’, especially the universal desire for ‘mercy, harmony, solidarity, immortality, trust, forgiveness, and, above all, for love’. By expressing and exploring this need, the dramatist established ‘one side of a perimeter’ which, when complete, would reveal God.⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist View of Theatre: positive; functional		To express and explore the human need for love and solidarity	Doing: drama Watching: a religious experience
Phénoménologie de l’expérience esthétique (1953)	Mikel Dufrenne French philosopher of Aesthetics	Seeking to identify the universal features of aesthetic experience. Emphasized feeling in relation to perception: ‘The very height of aesthetic perception is found in the feeling which reveals the expressiveness of the work. ... The aesthetic object moves me to do nothing but perceive’.⁴⁵ At its deepest level, perception involves both reflection and feeling, which Dufrenne calls ‘the reciprocity of two depths’, that of the expressed world within the work of art, and that of the spectator. Art is not a reflection of reality, but a reflection of feeling. The question of the reality of art is misplaced: ‘The affective quality of the world matters more than its geography’. ‘Man and reality both belong to something more basic – to being itself – which exists prior to the object in which it is manifested and to the subject which perceives the manifestation. Neither subject nor object is		Aesthetic affect	Doing: art (an aesthetic object) Watching: spectators achieve a consciousness of being when they contemplate

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		necessary for being , but both are necessary for a consciousness of being, which is what the spectator achieves by contemplation of the art object'. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (aesthetic) View of Theatre: aesthetic			an art object such as theatre
Tragedy and the Paradox of the Fortunate Fall (1953)	Herbert Weisinger (1913-Academic; critic	The power of tragedy arises from recognition of the primal archetype of death and rebirth. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Recognition of death and rebirth	Doing: tragedy
'The Tragic Form' (1954)	Richard B. Sewall (1908-2003) American academic and author	Tragedy depicts the paradoxical nature of man and the universe. ⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Depicts the paradoxical nature of man and the universe	Doing: tragedy
“‘Enlightenment” and Modern Drama’ (1954) ⁴⁹	John Gassner (1903-1967) American drama critic	Gassner shared the post-war pre-occupation with ‘searching for a mode to express the tragic form’. ⁵⁰ By using the term ‘Enlightenment’, he intended ‘to assert the possibility of facing reality in the context of a real, rather than legendary or romanticized and sentimentalized world ... a play can be, in its time , both social drama and tragedy’. Enlightenment refers to the driving force and outcome of tragedy but ‘Enlightenment is dramatically ineffective without the collaboration of “pity” and “fear” in an intense complication of dramatic events’. It should not be ‘confused with a simple prescription for action, or a mere realization on the part of the tragic character that he was right or wrong. Tragic enlightenment is an experience not a moral tag’ to be used by Sunday School teachers. Enlightenment is ‘knowledge won ’, not knowledge imposed. We have an exalted idea of tragedy these days which perhaps even the ancient tragedies could not measure up to. Spiritual awakening has become a ‘fetish’ and ‘confusion’ is caused by the assumption ‘that a tragedy must have “universality”’ in the form of an escape from reality. According to Aristotle, who introduced the term to criticism, ‘By the universal I mean how a person or a certain type will on occasion speak or act according to the law of probability or necessity’. [We seem to have turned this definition around to mean that how a person speaks must accord to laws of general application] so that plays which		To generate the tensions and empathy which produce catharsis, which in turn brings enlightenment	Doing: drama (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		claim universality disappear into the mist, producing ‘an academic kind of playwriting that no one can produce’ of ‘moral and spiritual elephantiasis’ (universality marked by ‘grandeur’) and ‘overproduction’. The ‘theatre of our time cannot subsist on a diet of “universals” untranslated into recognizably contemporary manners, sensibility, and events’. In any case, ‘an absolute distinction between the particular and the universal experience is, in fact, impossible. Immediate realities contain and imply universal ones ... anything we call universal is only a generalization of immediate and specific concerns ... everything we designate as universal was at one time, and in one sense or another, immediate – socially and personally. It couldn’t have been universal, indeed, if it couldn’t possibly have any immediacy for the playgoer’. [Again, in this concern with playwriting, is an implicit theory about spectatorship: the fact that an experience can be shared between performers and spectators is in itself proof of the universal appeal within the drama. Only something which has some sense of universal appeal can be shared.] The reason why contemporary attempts at tragedy fail is because the plays do not ‘effectuate’ pity and fear, i.e. they do not generate the tensions and empathy which produce catharsis, at the same time as they are aiming at enlightenment. They are too busy trying to convert the character or preach to the spectator and consequently end up being ‘statements’ rather than a dramatic process’.⁵¹ Pity and fear have to form a ‘triad’ with enlightenment for us to care enough about the character for catharsis to occur. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional
1954: Brecht’s Berliner Ensemble appeared for the first time in Paris, making ‘a profound impression’ especially on critics such as Roland Barthes, and the dramatist Adamov. It brought out the pessimism of the existentialists and absurdists. Brecht offered optimism in his belief that not only could things change, but that the theatre could be a vehicle for promoting that change. This realisation not only prompted a change in direction for Adamov, but also prompted critics to reconsider the popularity of a drama ‘seemingly devoid of any positive humanistic values’ and exhibiting no faith in either logic or communication. Kenneth Tynan (1958) was one of those critics. This debate raised once again the purpose of art: was it to exist for its own sake, or for external purpose – generally social. It echoed the debate between Marxist critics and those they called formalists in C19th: ‘the socially engaged realists ... against the proponents of art for art’s sake. For Ionesco, art’s purpose was simply to be what it was – indeed, this was what he thought was all that could be said about anything. The business of existence was to exist. This debate was played out in America through the Living Theatre and the Open Theatre, as well as in England (in a more muted form) from about 1956, when the influence of Brecht and of French experimentation began to be felt there. ‘Characteristically, the English dramatists ... were less extreme ... in experimentation and less inclined to theoretical pronouncements’. However, in the conflict between the theatre of political engagement and that of metaphysical speculation, the political side was more evident. In Germany, as ‘the proper role and form of an engaged theatre’ had always been a central concern of Marxist aesthetics, the debate produced some heated exchanges. Official East German policy since the 1950s was to encourage ‘social realism’ and discourage ‘decadent’ and ‘experimental’ forms (essentially the position of Lukács with regard to expressionism). However, this official position also held that East German

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
society could solve all social conflicts. Consequently, it was considered that drama which portrayed such conflicts misrepresented reality. This led to a debate within the ‘engaged’ camp as to what realist drama should be showing. ⁵² This debate was largely led by Peter Hacks (1957). Lukács himself became involved in this debate. As before, his intolerance of experimentalism aroused protest, expressed in similar terms to the previous debate over expressionism. This time his major opponent was Theodor Adorno (1958).
Das Prinzip Hoffnung (1954)	Ernst Bloch (1885-1977) German Marxist philosopher	Bloch applied his interpretation of Marxism to a variety of cultural phenomenon, including theatre. The purpose of theatre (echoing Brecht and Schiller) was ‘to influence the desires of the world towards real possibilities – as a paradigmatic institution’. ⁵³ Art is ‘a laboratory and at the same time a festival of real possibilities’. The theatrical performance ‘is an anticipatory appearance (Vor-Schein) of material that is not yet in existence’ [hence art is not a mirror of life] but ‘toward which human consciousness is striving’. ⁵⁴ Art therefore prefigures the ‘concrete utopia’ that exists ‘at the horizon of every reality’. Estrangement in the theatre rises not from the spectators becoming aware of the contradictions in present social reality, but from the glimpses they catch of the ‘beautiful strange’ – the utopia of fulfillment to which their inner vision responds while still embedded in the contemporary reality where such fulfillment can not yet be achieved. ⁵⁵ Bloch drew a distinction between art and ‘escapism, mere entertainment, spiritualized abstraction and ‘self-contained artifact’ (suggesting that the work of non-socially engaged dramatists such as Ionesco was not in fact art). Purpose of Theorist: polemic – art as a vehicle for utopian vision View of Theatre: positive		To provide an anticipatory appearance (Vor-Schein) of material that is not yet in existence’	Doing: theatrical performance (art) Showing: possibilities Watching: awareness of the gap between reality and utopia produces estrangement

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 397

² De Ghelderode 1960, Seven Plays, trans. George Hauger, New York, pp. 15-16, 23; in Carlson 1984: 416.

³ Carlson 1984: 416

⁴ In Samuel Draper 1963, ‘An Interview with Michel de Ghelderode’, Tulane Drama Review Vol 8(1), pp. 46-7; in Carlson 1984: 416.

⁵ Sastre 1953, ‘Teología del drama’, Correo literario Vol. 85., December 1953, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 418.

⁶ Sastre 1952, ‘El teatro revolucionario’, Guía August 1952, p. 22; in Carlson 1984: 418.

⁷ Sastre 1956, Drama y sociedad, Madrid, p. 71; in Carlson 1984: 418.

⁸ Sastre 1953, ‘Tragedia’, Correo literario Vol. 70, April 1953, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 418.

⁹ Sastre 1965, Anatomía del realismo, Madrid, p. 129; in Carlson 1984: 419.

-
- ¹⁰ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 287-292 and in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 45-54.
- ¹¹ Dürrenmatt 2008/1955: 290-1
- ¹² Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 53
- ¹³ Dürrenmatt 2008/1955: 291-2
- ¹⁴ Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 51-2
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 448
- ¹⁶ Dürrenmatt 1976, Writings on Theatre and Drama, trans. H.M. Waidson, London, pp. 58, 81, 107-111; in Carlson 1984: 448.
- ¹⁷ Krasner 2008: 287
- ¹⁸ Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 46
- ¹⁹ Dürrenmatt 2008/1955: 288-9
- ²⁰ Dürrenmatt 2008/1955: 292
- ²¹ Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 50
- ²² Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 52
- ²³ Dürrenmatt 1998/1955: 48-9
- ²⁴ Dürrenmatt 2008/1955: 291-2
- ²⁵ Carlson 1984: 411-2
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 447
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 454
- ²⁸ Ionesco's response to Tynan in the Observer, 29 June 1958, reprinted in Brandt 1998: 210-212.
- ²⁹ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 309-316.
- ³⁰ Ionesco 1964, Notes and Counter Notes, trans. Donald Watson, New York, pp. 216-7; in Carlson 1984: 411.
- ³¹ Ionesco 2008/1960: 313
- ³² Ionesco, Notes p. 181 in Carlson 1984: 411
- ³³ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 489
- ³⁴ Ionesco, Notes p. 190 in Carlson 1984: 412-3
- ³⁵ Ionesco 1964, Notes and Counter Notes, trans. Donald Watson, New York, pp. 29, 217-8, 223-4; in Carlson 1984: 412-3.
- ³⁶ Tynan, 1958 'Ionesco: Man of Destiny?', Observer, 22 June 1958; reprinted in Brandt 1998: 209-210.
- ³⁷ Ionesco 1998/1958: 210
- ³⁸ Ionesco, Notes p. 91-102 in Carlson 1984: 412-3
- ³⁹ Ionesco 1998/1958: 210-212
- ⁴⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 490
- ⁴¹ Ionesco 1998/1958: 212
- ⁴² Ionesco 2008/1960: 309-316

⁴³ Carlson 1984: 417

⁴⁴ Betti 1960, 'Religion and the Theatre', trans. Gino Rizzo and William Meriwether, Tulane Drama Review Vol 5(2), p. 4-12; in Carlson 1984: 417.

⁴⁵ Dufrenne 1973, The Phenomenology of the Aesthetic Experience, trans. Edward Casey, Evanston, p. 49, 86, 179; in Carlson 1984: 436.

⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 436

⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 448-9

⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 449

⁴⁹ Excerpt from his book The Theatre in Our Times (1954); reprinted in Krasner 2008: 278-286)

⁵⁰ Krasner 2008: 278

⁵¹ Gassner 2008/1954: 279-284

⁵² Carlson 1984: 413-424

⁵³ Bloch 1959, Gesamtausgabe [Total Outlay], Frankfurt, Vol 5, p. 249, 492; in Carlson 1984: 423.

⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 423

⁵⁵ Bloch 1959, Gesamtausgabe [Total Outlay], Frankfurt, Vol 5, p. 430; in Carlson 1984: 424.

Table 33/51: Theories of Theatre 1955-1959

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Myth and Drama' (1955)	Harold H. Watts (1906- Literary critic	Comedy and tragedy are secular versions of the two basic mythic views of existence, the cyclical view (offering the continual re-establishment of order and harmony) and the linear view (a relentless move toward the unknown, where choices are irreversible and consequences both unforeseen and inevitable). ¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: n/a		The playing out of the two myths of existence (order and chaos)	Doing: playwrighting
How Not to Write a Play (1955)	Walter Kerr (1913-1996) American critic and playwright	Kerr considered that artists and spectators were 'contenders, making the play and the evening and the emotion together ... playmates, building a structure'. ² He blamed declining spectators of the time on the 'poor and unentertaining fare being put before the public by both commercial and institutional producers' . ³ No thriving theatre had ever been built by the 'intelligentsia'. Plays would always be more successful if they were entertaining. Entertainment could be both 'enjoyable and artistically sophisticated'. He advocated the creation of believable, active characters in interesting stories over structure or intellectual or political content. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A place of play	Building a structure with the artists and spectator; entertainment	Doing: playwrighting Showing: believable, active characters in interesting stories Watching: spectators do not come to the theatre to be bored but to engage in a collaborative activity
'Sur l'avenir de la tragédie' (1955) [On the future of tragedy];	Albert Camus (1913-1960) French existentialist dramatist and author	Unlike Sartre, Camus' view of tragedy harked back to Hebbel (1843). A 'tragic age' in history always coincided with a period in which man had broken loose from 'an older form of civilization' without yet finding a satisfactory new form. Both Greek and the Renaissance tragedy portrayed heroic individuals in conflict with the order of the world. When reason and the rights of the individual became triumphant, tragedy disappeared. Once again, the individual was seeking freedom from a god – this time the god of human intellect, science and history – which should give rise to a modern form of tragic expression. ⁴ After his Myth of Sisyphus the term absurd became a 'fashionable literary		To portray human conflicts	Doing: playwrighting (tragedy)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		catchword', used to group French avant-garde theatre. Camus always rejected this label. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealist View of Theatre: positive
'La révolution Brechtienne' (1955); 'Mère Courage aveugle' (1955); 'Les maladies du costume de théâtre' (1955); 'Les tâches de la critique Brechtienne' [The tasks of Brechtian criticism] (1956); ⁶ Sur Racine (1960; 1964); 'Littérature et signification' (1963); 'Theatre and Signification' (1963); ⁷ 'Essay on Wrestling'; 'Theatre and Signification' (1979). ⁸	Roland Barthes (1915-1980) French literary and cultural critic; semiologist	Barthes was a keen theatre-goer and participant when young, but later 'lost interest in the theatre and in theatrical debates' as he became more absorbed in semiological theory, somewhat ironically enlisting Brechtian theatre in support of this endeavour. ⁹ Barthes argued that Brecht posed a challenge to 'our habits, our tastes, our reflexes, the very 'laws' of the theatre which we live' ¹⁰ by challenging the long-held dominance of character (psychology) and analogy, Brecht did not aim to represent 'the natural' but to signify the real. ¹¹ According to Barthes, Brecht's theatre took up 'the great progressive themes of our times – that art can and must intervene in history, dealing not with aesthetic universals but with social and political needs, explaining rather than expressing, insisting that the world can be other than it is. Mother Courage , in which Brecht renounced participation, had restored theatre to its original purpose as civic ritual , according to Barthes. Brecht had 'revealed traditional dramaturgies as radically false', offering instead a drama of 'maieutic [Socratic investigative] power' which 'represents and brings to judgment' in a way which is simultaneously 'overwhelming and isolating'. ¹² Brecht's production of Mother Courage also demonstrated that costume could be gestus : an 'argument', based on a 'precise vestimentary code' and selected to communicate 'ideas, information, or sentiments'. As such, costume related 'organically' to other components of the production, 'a sign working with and relating to other signs. (Barthes was to take this up again in the 1960s). In 'Les tâches', Barthes proposed four levels of analysis for considering this new theatre: 1. sociology 2. ideology 3. semiology and 4. morality. Sociological analysis was the means which contemporary public attempted to deal with Brecht. Ideological analysis would consider not the 'message' of the plays, but the general method of explanation as a form of ideology. Semiological analysis would be especially interesting because of the distance Brecht puts between signifier and signified in his rejection of illusion. Moral analysis would involve an analysis of a historical situation in the light of Brecht's belief in the potential for change, for Brecht's theatre is essentially 'a morality of discovery'. ¹³ Barthes reveals his own ideological leanings in this defence of Brecht, whose work for him is 'exemplary' and destined to become 'increasingly important', especially as contemporary theatre was a 'desert' . ¹⁴ 'Anyone who wants to consider theatre and revolution will inevitably encounter Brecht' and to	A place to see drama performed; a practice of representation; a civic ritual; a means of communication ('a kind of cybernetic machine' which sent out 'a variety of simultaneous messages');	Representation: to 'calculate the place of things as they are observed'; to mask; to play on the illusions it provides; to produce a 'text' to be 'read'.	Showing: theatre has a semiotic character; a density of signs; it presents the world as an object to be deciphered. Where things are placed determines what can be seen (and what can be hidden) Watching: the spectator sees according to how things are placed, but creates his own representation. The distance which is allowed by

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Diderot, Brecht, Eisenstein' (1986);		consider Brecht 'is by definition to cover the basic issues of our time'. Unfortunately it was not Brechtian theatre which was being endorsed here. One didn't need to see Brecht performed because it didn't need to be seen to be understood.¹⁵ Brecht as a 'text' was what was significant to Barthes. It was for this reason that 'the systematic writings of Brecht must be affirmed'. Barthes defends Brecht against critics as far apart as the Extreme Right and a thinly veiled Sartre on the four grounds he lists above. In Sur Racine, Barthes argues for the performance of historical drama which does not try to disguise its strangeness for contemporary spectators. Yet, at the same time, he also raises questions about what we know of the spectators who watched Racine's work: 'On Racine's public ... there are many incidental remarks ... but .. the heart of the matter remains quite mysterious. Who went to the performance? According to Racinian criticism, Corneille (crouching in a loge) and Mme de Sevigné. But who else? The court, the town – exactly who? And still more than the social configuration of this public, it is the very function of the theatre in the public's eye that would interest us: diversion? dream? identification? distance? snobbery? What was the proportion of all these elements'?'¹⁶ All modes of interpretation are both subjective and historical. In 1963, the French journal Tel Quel asked Barthes how he would relate his interest in semiology to the theatre in general, and to Brecht in particular. Barthes responded by calling theatre 'a kind of cybernetic machine' which sent out 'a variety of simultaneous messages (from setting, costume, and lighting as well as the positions, words, and gestures of the actors), some of which remain (the setting), while others constantly change (words and gestures)'. This created a 'density of signs' or 'informational polyphony' which was characteristic of theatre, making it an enormous challenge to semiotic analysis.¹⁷ 'At every point in a performance, you are receiving (at the same second) six or seven items of information (from the actors, their gestures, their mode of playing, their language), but some of these items remain fixed (this is true of scenery) while others change (speech, gesture)'.¹⁸ Barthes claimed that Brecht attempted to 'hold in suspense' the move from signifier into signified, an 'audacious' and difficult dramatic strategy: he did not wish 'to transmit a positive message ... but to show that the world is an object to be deciphered'.¹⁹ Barthes recognized the crucial element of observation in the theatre: '[T]he theater ... is that practice which calculates the observed place of things: if I put the spectacle here, the spectator will see this; if I put it elsewhere, he won't see it and I can take advantage			the performance helps to determine the response of the spectator. (Bourgeois theatre has found a 'safe, minimum distance' for the spectator which Brechtian theatre has attempted to break up). But what do we really know about who goes to the theatre and why?

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of that concealment to profit by the illusion: the stage is just that line which intersects the optic beam, tracing its end point and, in a sense, the interception of its development: here would be instituted ... representation. Representation is not defined directly by imitation: even if we were to get rid of the notions of “reality” and “verisimilitude” and “copy”, there would still be “representation,” so long as a subject (author, reader, spectator, or observer) directed his gaze toward a horizon and there projected the base of a triangle of which his eye (or his mind) would be the apex’: ‘things are always seen from somewhere’.²⁰ In his ‘Essay on Wrestling’, Barthes declared that actors were ‘signs, not personalities’.²¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive
Le dieu caché (1955); Jean Racine: Dramaturge (1956)	Lucien Goldmann (1913- Marxist literary theorist)	Goldmann drew on both Lukács and Marxist tradition for his interest in social realism and his conviction that form and content were inseparably related and both conditioned by social forces. The study of literary works thus inevitably involves a study of the social and political sources of these works. There were three possible approaches to a text: positivistic (textual analysis [what’s there]), intuitive (personal feelings [what you feel is there]), and dialectic (which sought to fit the work into a larger and more complete context [what the context indicates might be there]).²² ‘Goldmann cites Dilthey’s (1911) concept of world view as a move toward this third approach, elaborated and made more accurate and scientific by Lukács (1911). The critic using this approach should consider a work in the light of ‘the whole complex of ideas, aspirations, and feelings which links together the members of a social group [usually a social class] ... and which opposes them to members of other social groups’. Goldmann analyses the tragedies of Racine [as literature!] and the philosophy of Pascal ‘in the light of the conflict between the coherent world view of C17th rationalism and the concept of a God of transcendent being and values’.²³ This analysis then leads to a general theory of tragedy. Goldmann elaborates this theory more fully in his 1956 book. He defines tragedy as ‘a spectacle under the permanent regard of God’.²⁴ God never intervenes but nonetheless requires adherence to absolute values in a world of compromise, contingency, and circumscribed existence. All tragedy reflects this conflict. In Greek tragedy, the hero set himself against both the world and the human community (represented by the chorus). By Racine, the authentic community has been lost, so the chorus has disappeared. The isolated hero brings about his own destruction either by refusing to accept the flawed world or by attempting to		To represent life under the gaze of God	Doing: drama (literature) Showing: conflict Watching: a God’s eye view

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		impose upon the world his own desires ²⁵ [a religious version of Szondi (see below)?]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: n/a
'A Theory of Play and Fantasy' (1955) ²⁶	Gregory Bateson (1904-1980) British-American Anthropologist and psychologist	Uses the idea of 'frame' to explore whether a performance is play or the real thing'. ²⁷ Bateson claimed he based his idea on Epimenides' Paradox (596BCE): 'All Cretans are liars ... One of their own poets has said so'. ²⁸ Bateson's conception of frame formed the basis of Goffman's work on frame analysis, in particular the problem of an accomplished performance being seen as reality rather than performance. Play and performance share a confusion between what is real and what is illusion but we know we are watching a theatrical event because of the 'meta- communicative message: 'this is play''. ²⁹ If we take the theatrical for real life, the unique experience which theatre offers gets lost as actions become consequential: 'The theatrical event is theatre only because it is framed as theatre'. ³⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: conventional	A conventional practice	Play	Watching: we know we are the theatre because of the conventions which frame a performance
Theory of the Modern Drama (1956) ³¹	Peter Szondi (1929-1971) Roumanian critic and philologist; Marxist theorist	A central work of post-war German dramatic theory, which (like Lukács, Benjamin and Adorno) draws on the Hegelian idea (as reflected in Marx) that form and content are inseparably bound in a dialectic relationship, ³² a position he shared with Lucien Goldmann (above). Interested in hermeneutics, Szondi provided an historical view of the development of modern drama which refuted the 'traditional' (Marxist) view associated with Lukács that emphasised content and treated form as 'historically indifferent'. Modern drama was a creation of the Renaissance, ³³ 'fully synthesised' in C17th France. It abandoned devices such as the prologue, epilogue and chorus in favour of dialogue, as human interaction became its central concern: 'The Drama is possible only when dialogue is possible' because Drama is dialectic. ³⁴ This created a closed 'absolute' form which denied both the author and the spectator. The spectator was not permitted to participate as spectator but only as an imaginary sharer in the stage action. The only positions offered the spectator were either 'total separation or total identification': 'The theatre-goer is an observer – silent, with hands tied, lamed by the impact of this other world. This total passivity will (and therein lies the dramatic experience), be converted into irrational activity. He who was the spectator is pulled into the dramatic event, becomes the person speaking (through the mouths of all the characters, of course). The spectator-Drama relationship is one of complete separation or complete identity , not one in which the spectator invades the Drama or is addressed through the Drama'. ³⁵ The		The dialogue of modern drama forced the spectator into either complete identification or complete isolation; the new drama broke open this restrictive process	Doing: Drama, a performance art: a 'modern' phenomenon, dialectic in nature Watching: modern drama created a hermetically sealed form which locked out the actual spectator by creating imaginary

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		distinctive features of this drama all contributed to enforcing this self-contained world.³⁶ The Drama was ‘primary’ (self-sufficient); ‘the actor and character’ united ‘to create a single personage’; and ‘internal time is always the present’. A crisis occurred in this form of drama towards the end of C19th because its content began to change. This produced an instability during which a number of different kinds of drama appeared, some attempting to ‘save’ the tradition form (naturalism, the well-made (contentless) play, ‘situational’ drama, some form of classicism) while others were trying to evolve new forms. The new forms all introduced into drama in some way a subject-object relationship which recognized the presence of both creator and public, and thus broke open the closed form of the traditional modern drama. The most successful of these new kinds of drama was the ‘epic’ (of which Brecht was but one example). These works pointed outside themselves, presenting a ‘microcosm representing a macrocosm’ which is explained and set forth by an ‘epic I’,³⁷ a creative presence that acknowledges an audience to whom this demonstration is directed’.³⁸ These characteristics can be seen in Brecht (1926), expressionism, in Piscator’s ‘political reviews’ (1919), in Eisenstein’s montage (1923), in Pirandello (1918), O’Neill (1924), Wilder (1941) and Miller (1949). [What is interesting about these examples is the wide range of both writing, and geographical spread: although exposure to experimental work from overseas spread quickly, there was still a time lag – Szondi’s list suggests that a common concern was at work in these dramatists, although the manifestation of this concern varied enormously]. Krasner suggests that this may have come out of the chaos and disorder of the world wars and their horrors. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive			spectator positions within the drama; this left actual theatregoers ‘silent, with hands tied, lamed by the impact of this other world’ and faced with a choice between either total identification or estrangement; contemporary drama (Brecht, Pirandello etc) has tried to break up this relationship and acknowledge the actual spectator.
The Marxist interest in the historical and socio-political dimensions of theatre pointed the way to a more general study of theatre as a sociological phenomenon. Very quickly, theatre moved from being an entity in its own right to being a sociological entity, to being a metaphor for society. This move was first outlined by George Gurvitch in

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1956. This theoretical approach steadily increased in importance during the C20th, and represented a serious elision between theatre and life such that at times it was difficult to distinguish between the two. This elision has recently come under some scrutiny and challenge. ³⁹ Gurvitch's observations on the 'theatricalism' of social life were explored in some detail by sociologists and anthropologists in the late 1950's but, with the exception of Jean Duvignaud (1965), theorists of the theatre did not take up Gurvitch's suggestions until much later. ⁴⁰
'Sociologie du théâtre' (1956)	Georges Gurvitch (1894-1965) Russian born French sociologist	A summary of the proceedings of a 1955 conference on the relationship between theatre and sociology. Carlson considers it 'a remarkably prescient article' which anticipates the work of Goffman and Turner.⁴¹ The 'profound affinities of the theatre with society' opens up possibilities of sociological investigation in both directions: the examination of 'theatricality' in society, and of social organization in theatre.⁴² Gurvitch calls attention to the theatrical element in all social ceremonies, even in 'a simple reception or a gathering of friends'.⁴³ Moreover, 'each individual plays several social roles', those of class, profession, political orientation etc. As for the theatre, it is composed of a set group of performers, portraying a social action, encased in another social dynamic made up of performance and public. In relation to theatre as an entity in itself, Gurvitch suggests six possibilities for sociological research in theatre: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. the public (particularly its degrees of diversity and cohesion), 2. the relationship between the play and its style, its interpretation, and its particular social setting; 3. the internal organization of the acting profession, and its relationship to other professions and to society as a whole;⁴⁴ 4. the relationship between the content of plays and their society; 5. the changes in the interpretation of this content and the relationship of these changes to changing social configurations; 6. the social functions of theatre itself in different societies. He then considers theatre as an instrument of social experimentation. Anticipating the experimentation of 'guerilla theatres' and directors such as Boal, Pörtner and Schechner, he proposes 'theatrical representations camouflaged in real life, without the members of the group suspecting what is happening' or representations designed 'to stimulate collective actions, freeing the public from precise and structured social cadres and inciting them to participate in the play of the actors and to extend it into real life'.⁴⁵ [This suggestion indicates a elision between theatre as a practice and the representations which theatre creates, undermining the usefulness of Gurvitch's endeavour: is it to investigate a	A sociological phenomenon - an instrument of social experimentation	Social action; social experimentation	Doing: theatre as an activity involving the performance of roles; a watching public, issues of style and presentation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		particular activity of life which warrants sociological investigation or a tool by which life can be manipulated as if it were theatre? This is a problem which besets dramaturgical analyses because it requires theatre to be both a part of social life and apart from social life]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (sociological) View of Theatre: functional
‘Green Goddess of Realism’ (1956) ⁴⁶	Sean O’Casey (1880-1964) Irish dramatist	O’Casey ‘was noted for setting the standard of realism on the world stage’⁴⁷ as a result of his spirited attacks on what was being taken for realism by critics He considered realism ‘the totem pole of the dramatic critics ... What the dramatic critics mean by the various terms they use for Realism is the yearly ton of rubbish that falls on the English stage and is swiftly swept away into the dustbins’. They welcome these plays because they are ‘so easy to understand’ and they can continue to feel superior to the dramatist. This kind of realism had ‘had its day and has earned a rest’. All it has done is produce platitudes such as that a play ‘is a real play about real people’ (O’Casey quoting G. B. Shaw). All plays were ‘real’, but some were good and some were bad, and ‘no real character can be put in a play unless some of the reality is taken out of him’. ‘[W]hat has the word “play” got to do with reality? ... a room [on stage] can never be a room, a tree a tree, or a death a death. These must take the nature of a child’s toys and a child’s play’. O’Casey believed that this ‘rage for real, real life on the stage’ had ‘taken all the life out of the drama ... The beauty, fire, and poetry of drama have perished in the storm of fake realism ... A house on a stage can never be a house, and that which represents it must always be a symbol. A room in a realistic play must always be a symbol for a room ... the closer we move to actual life, the further we move away from the drama. Drama purely imitative of life isn’t drama at all’. This desire on the part of critics to see drama as life has led them to distinguish drama from theatre, so that theatre is disparaged. For example, critic Ivor Brown said of a play that “‘the play is not life, it is theatre and might be allowed to wear its flamboyant colors’”. O’Casey was indignant at the “‘might be allowed’”, claiming the critic obviously wasn’t sure whether the play was ‘theatre’ or not, let alone what kind of theatre it was.⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-prescriptive theory View of Theatre: positive	A practice of artifice; a game	Play; artifice; representation through symbols	Doing: playwrighting ; drama – a performed art Watching: critics were growing ‘fat and lazy; on the ‘totem’ of realism which allowed them to maintain their superiority over the dramatist.⁴⁹
‘They Call it Cricket’ in Declaration	John Osborne (1929- English	Although not a united group, the ‘Angry Young Men’ shared an indignation with contemporary society and values and sought to change them. Osborne’s play Look Back in Anger (1956) is still seen as a land-mark statement ushering in this concern. Osborne		To provide a lesson in feeling; to	Doing: drama/ playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1957)	dramatist, one of the 'Angry Young Men' of British theatre	claimed that his aim was to give his spectators 'lessons in feeling. They can think afterwards'.⁵⁰ Osborne condemned 'the arrogance and folly of contemporary British society'. It was the dramatist's task to raise 'the proper questions: the meaning of human work, the value of life, the expectations, hopes, and fears'.⁵¹ Drama should demonstrate the proper values, not try 'to discover the best ways of implementing them'. This was the task of economists, sociologists, psychologists and legislators. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – new social drama View of Theatre: positive; functional		demonstrate proper values; to raise questions	Showing: proper values
'Theatre and Living' in Declaration (1957) 'Ionesco: Man of Destiny?' (1958); 'Ionesco and the Phantom' (1958)⁵²	Kenneth Tynan (1927-1980) English critic, one of the 'Angry Young Men'	Tynan claimed that there were 'only three attitudes toward life open to the dramatist: the faithfully mirroring of it, good or evil; the attempt to change it; or the denial of it by withdrawal into private fantasy'.⁵³ Tynan was committed to the second: art 'must go on record; it must commit itself'. Drama must be 'vocal in protest'.⁵⁴ He expressed concern over the popularity of a drama 'seemingly devoid of any positive humanistic values' and without faith in communication or logic. This belief instigated a debate in the London Observer between Tynan and Ionesco (1953). Tynan considered that Ionesco was attempting to isolate art from life, and thus from any value outside itself, something he considered 'an impossible and morally questionable goal'.⁵⁵ 'Every human activity, even buying a packet of cigarettes, has social and political repercussions'.⁵⁶ To deny this was an abdication of moral responsibility: 'If a man tells me something I believe to be an untruth, am I forbidden to do more than congratulate him on the brilliance of his lying?'.⁵⁷ Art was not 'something different from and independent of everything else in the world'.⁵⁸ Nor was it independent of ideology: 'the plain fact is that they both spring from a common source. Both draw on human experience to explain mankind to itself; both attempt ... to assemble coherence from seemingly unrelated phenomena; both stand guard for us against chaos. They are brothers, not child and parent. To say ... that Freud was inspired by Sophocles is the direct nonsense. Freud merely found in Sophocles confirmation of a theory he had formed on the basis of empirical evidence' i.e. 'a pleasing instance of fraternal corroboration'. To demand that a play be assessed only on whether it was true to its own nature is akin to allowing a cancer to be left alone to run its course and forfeits 'our right to a hearing as conscious, sentient beings ... every play worth serious consideration is a statement ... addressed in the first person singular to the first person plural; and the latter must retain the right of dissent'.⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic-socially responsible drama View of Theatre: positive;		A record of an attempt to change life; to act as an agent for social change; to protect us against chaos; a form of explanation	Doing: playwrighting Showing: a point of view which should be challengeable

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		functional
‘Das Theater der Gegenwart’ (1957); ‘Das realistische Theaterstück’ (1957); ‘Versuch über das Theaterstück von Morgen’ (1960); ‘Das Poetische’ (1966)	Peter Hacks (1928- East German Marxist dramatist	Argued for a more ‘dialectic’ view of realism which recognized the inevitability of conflict in all phenomena, and regarded the spectator as someone ‘involved in change’. The proletarian hero should possess ‘the typical contradictions of his society’ and be placed in ‘the typical contradictory situations of his period ... [both] hero and non-hero at the same time’.⁶⁰ Under this view, Hacks produced a number of ‘epic-sociological’ dramas. In the 1960s, he proposed a second ‘classical’ approach to socialist drama: an anticipation of ‘the fulfilled pattern of history’, requiring a ‘poeticizing’ of the dramatist’s material. This shift was justified because spectators had already ‘liberated themselves’ from oppressive social conditions and were now embarking on upon a quest for self-fulfillment within a free humanist society. Plays should be ‘in harmony with the perspective of the viewer’. Hacks described spectator reactions in two ways: identification and openness to the ‘unreal’. The identification factor (Identifikationswert) created an emotional sympathy with the play’s hero, while the unreal factor (Unwirklichkeitswert) opened the spectator to the play’s poetic vision of an as yet unachieved utopia. His early dramas did the first while his later dramas attempted to do the second. In the future, drama would need to find ways of combining these two reactions if it wanted to be successful.⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - utopian View of Theatre: positive; functional		A dialectic relationship with the spectator	Doing: drama (socially embedded art) Showing: socialist drama; utopia Watching: idealised spectator on a quest for self-fulfilment who responded in two ways: via sympathetic identification with the hero and via an opening up to utopian possibilities
The Art of Drama (1957)	Ronald Peacock (1907-1993) Scholar of German and of literature	The images produced by ‘drama’ are generally thought of as symbolic. However, Peacock thinks that a better way of thinking about them is as metaphors. This allows for much more complexity in the representations which theatre produces, including the stimulation of the imagination in the spectator: ‘every good play is an elaborate metaphor’, communicated through the medium of the actors. The meaning of all art is ‘beyond the sensuous imagery but the only way into it is through the imagery ... what moves us is ... the whole situation’.⁶² All images constitute a metaphorical process. We enjoy ‘going to the play’ for a variety of reasons. We enjoy the story, the character drawing, taking a sympathetic interest in characters, observing the unfolding of an idea,	A social institution	Representation through performance (which involves judgment over what will work as drama), for	Doing: drama – a performed art Showing: representations which are constituted as metaphors Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		The ‘primitive idea of drama’ was to ‘present a powerful sensational focus for a community’. These kinds of dramas (ancient tragedies, mediaeval passion plays) ‘present to the audience a myth already familiar to and significant for that audience, and ... are designed to remind the audience of their communal possession of this myth’. However, in ‘a controversial atmosphere’ such as the modern day, this drama ‘disappears, as it cannot deal with controversial issues unless it selects its audience’.⁶⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			is what makes words dramatic. Watching: the ancient (‘primitive’) dramas were for selected spectators, who knew the background to the stories
‘Let Battle Commence’ (1958); ‘Art – Therapy or Experience?’ (1964)	Arnold Wesker (1932- British dramatist	Called for a teaching theatre. Spectators were to be given ‘an insight into an aspect of life which they may not have had before’.⁷⁰ ‘New audiences should be sought among the working classes, who have traditionally considered the theatre the domain of bourgeois intellectuals and irrelevant to their own experience. Doing so will be difficult, for the dramatist must address this new public on its own terms and in its own language, while they must deal with a totally new set of values, requiring a change as significant as religious conversion’.⁷¹ [one of the few recognitions that theatre had always been preaching to its own kind!]. Wesker argued that ‘the entire British cultural and educational system’ considered art a leisure activity for the upper and middle classes, instead of the answer to a ‘burning need’ and the compelling curiosity to understand ‘the marvelous nature and complexity’ of human lives. Education in the arts was impossible as long as educators failed to realize that the work of art is ‘a battle field, where ideas are fought and values affirmed’.⁷² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro working-class theatre View of Theatre: functional	An educational institution not a leisure activity for the upper and middle-classes	To teach by addressing the public on its own terms and through its own language; an answer to the need or desire to understand the complexity of human life	Doing: playwrighting Showing: new insights into an aspect of life Watching: spectators have values and languages of their own, which the dramatist must acknowledge if he wishes to show them something new.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Interview (1959); Interview (1965); Interview (1967); 'Entretien' (1971); 'Armand Gatti on Time, Place, and the Theatrical Event' (1982)	Armand Gatti (1924- French experimental dramatist	The dramatist most closely associated with the politically oriented anti-institutional theatre of post-1968 France. ⁷³ 'The theatre is for me a means of combat. Later, when there is no longer anything to combat, the theatre may become at last what it ought to be – a universal festival'. ⁷⁴ Gatti devised a theory of time-possibility , which he contrasted with what he called the time-duration of traditional bourgeois theatre (an opposition suggestive of Brecht's epic versus Aristotelian drama). Embedded in the very 'grammar' of traditional theatre and the society it reflects , is a fixed and fallacious system of past, present and future. However, the mind actually moves easily and freely among these three. By emphasizing possibility rather than duration , the theatre can show an action from many perspectives and without a sense of closure, encouraging the spectator to see the world as open to change. ⁷⁵ During the late 1960s, Gatti became 'increasingly concerned with the specific spectator to which modern theatre should be addressed. He argued that the function of today's theatre should be to allow 'the most disinherited classes to gain an understanding of themselves and their potential'. ⁷⁶ The best way this could be achieved was by allowing members of these classes to participate with actor and author in the creation of the drama. Gatti then worked with culturally deprived groups, sometimes with a small band of actors and sometimes alone, to help them create dramatic statements reflecting their concerns (similar to the work of the San Francisco Mime and the Campesino). From this experimental work came 'a completely new aesthetic, a new style, a new kind of theatre' which Gatti called mini-pièces . ⁷⁷ These were created out of 'a complete lack of means' and without an author, 'since they always depend primarily on the performers and their context'. The goal was not simple participation in the spectacle but 'reflection on the problems that are posed', which may lead to the resolution of these problems 'one day, later, in contact with reality'. ⁷⁸ Gatti placed the foundations of his theatre 'in the eternal association which can exist between history and Utopia'. ⁷⁹ 'Since both traditional theatre space and the language of the prevailing system of social reality block any attempt to deal honestly with either history or Utopia, theatre must be taken 'out of the theatre' and new locations must be found for performance as well as a new language developed which is suitable to these new locations and the people who inhabit them. ⁸⁰ Like Kroetz, Gatti sees the victims of political, social and economic repression as 'deprived even of a language in which to understand their social reality'. It was the 'mission' of theatre to help them find their language.	A space for showing action ; a means of social and political action; an event	Combat; to help the disinherited locate their voice; traditional drama reflects its society; anti--institutional theatre fights for its society	Doing: playwrighting Showing: the possibility of change; self-understanding ; action from a variety of perspectives Watching: the ' idéal spectateur '; the disinherited classes as participators; reflective participation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic - anti-institutional theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
A Life In The Theatre (1959); 'Directing A Play' (1962)	Tyrone Guthrie (1900-1971) British Director; founder of Canada's Stratford Theatre (1953); founder of the Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis (1963)	There is no such thing as an 'ideal' performance of any play. Any work of art will always be a partial perspective of that observer at that historical moment. 'Every performance can only be that performing group's comment on the play, their interpretation of an open-ended score, to which the spectator will add yet another level of interpretation'. ⁸¹ A director has only two choices: to try to 'make the play' what he thinks the dramatist was after according to the impression he has made on him, or to copy some other production. The latter is 'no service' to the dramatist, to the theatre or to one's work in general. 'I believe that the theatre makes its effect not by means of illusion, but by ritual. People do not believe that what they see or hear on the stage is 'really' happening. Action on the stage is a stylized re-enactment of real action, which is then imagined by the spectator. The re-enactment is not merely an imitation but a symbol of the real thing'. It is similar to the situation of the Mass: the spectator [congregation] participates 'to the extent that it shares the emotion ... It completes the circle of action and reaction; its function is not passive but active'. ⁸² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	Theatre as ritual; as symbolic; as religious experience	The stylized re-enactment of real action; symbolic creation of ritual	Doing: directing Watching: participatory and ritualistic as in a congregation, completes 'the circle of action and reaction' i.e. the spectator is within the performance; they are active
'The Cultural Apparatus' (1959) ⁸³	C.Wright Mills (1916-1962) American Sociologist	'Our images of this world and of ourselves are given to us by crowds of witnesses we have never met and never shall meet. Yet for each of us these images – provided by strangers and dead men – are the very basis of our life as a human being. None of us stands alone directly confronting a world of solid fact. No such world is available'. ⁸⁴ What we see is provided for us by 'the cultural apparatus', which 'is the lens of mankind through which men see, the medium through which they interpret and report what they see'. ⁸⁵ The cultural apparatus includes 'all those organizations and milieu in which artistic, intellectual and scientific work goes on [as well as] all the means by which such work is made available to small circles, wider publics, and to great masses ... It is the semi-organized source of [our] very identities and of [our] aspirations', although it 'tends to be part of some national 'establishment''. ⁸⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (sociological) View of Theatre: positive; functional	A cultural apparatus for the generation of images	Creating images of the society for society	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: images by which we know the world Watching: we see through the images provided for us

Alexander, Jeffrey C. 1990. 'Analytic debates: Understanding the relative autonomy of culture'. In Culture and Society: Contemporary Debates, edited by J. Alexander and S. Seidman. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 1-27.

Barthes, Roland. 1986. 'Diderot, Brecht, Eisenstein'. In The Responsibility of Forms: Critical Essays on Music, Art, and Representation: Basil Blackwell, pp. 89-97.

Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.

Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).

Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.

Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.

Schlossman, David A. 2002. Actors and Activists: Politics, Performance, and Exchange Among Social Worlds. New York and London: Routledge.

Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press.

Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006. 'Introduction to Theatre--the online course'. Northern Virginia Community College

<http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm> (accessed 2/3/2007).

Wilshire, Bruce. 1982. Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.

¹ (Carlson 1984)449

² (Trumbull 1998-2006)

³ Wikipedia 2007, 'Walter Kerr' accessed 2007.

⁴ Camus 1967, Lyrical and Critical, trans. Philip Thody, London, p. 179, 185; in Carlson 1984: 399.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 411

⁶ Reprinted in (Krasner 2008)336-9.

⁷ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 340-1.

⁸ Barthes 1979, published in Theatre Quarterly 9, pp. 29-30; discussed in (Bennett 1997) 50.

⁹ Michael Moriarty 1994, 'Barthes on Theatre', in Giddens et al (eds), The Polity Reader in Cultural Theory, UK, Polity Press, pp. 268-276, p. 268.

¹⁰ Barthes 1972, Critical Essays, trans. Richard Howard, Evanston Ill., p. 38; in Carlson 1984: 413.

¹¹ Moriarty 1994: 271

¹² Carlson 1984: 413

¹³ Barthes 2008/1956: 339

¹⁴ Barthes 2008/1956: 336

-
- ¹⁵ Barthes 2008/1956: 337-8
¹⁶ Barthes 1964: 157 in Bennett 1997: 67
¹⁷ Barthes 2008/1963: 340
¹⁸ Barthes 1979: 29
¹⁹ Barthes 2008/1963: 341
²⁰ (Barthes 1986) 89-90
²¹ (Alexander 1990)12
²² Goldmann 1964, The Hidden God, trans. Philip Thody, New York, pp. 8-12
²³ Carlson 1984: 430
²⁴ Goldmann 1956, Paris, p. 17; in Carlson 1984: 430.
²⁵ Carlson 1984: 431
²⁶ In Psychiatric Research Reports, II, 1955, pp. 39-51; reprinted in Bateson 1972, Steps to an Ecology of Mind, San Francisco, Chandler; cited in Boje, Luhman and Cunliffe 2003.
²⁷ (Boje, Luhman, and Cunliffe 2003)
²⁸ Boje et al 2003
²⁹ Bateson 1972/1955
³⁰ Schechner, Richard 1983, End of Humanism: Writings on Performance by Richard Schechner, Paj Publications: 207
³¹ An excerpt of Theory of the Modern Drama, reprinted in Krasner 2008: 349-351.
³² Carlson 1984: 429
³³ Szondi 2008/1956: 349
³⁴ Szondi 2008/1956: 351
³⁵ Szondi 2008/1956: 349-50
³⁶ Carlson 1984: 429
³⁷ Szondi 2008/1965: 350
³⁸ Szondi 1956, Frankfurt, p. 141; in Carlson 1984: 430.
³⁹ See (Wilshire 1982)
⁴⁰ Carlson 1984: 432
⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 431
⁴² Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 197; in Carlson 1984: 431.
⁴³ Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 202-4; in Carlson 1984: 431.
⁴⁴ Going by Schlossman, not much activity seems to have occurred in this area (see (Schlossman 2002)).
⁴⁵ Gurvitch 1956, 'Sociologie du théâtre', Les lettres nouvelles 34-36, p. 2028-9; in Carlson 1984: 432.
⁴⁶ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 293-297.
⁴⁷ Krasner 2008: 293

-
- ⁴⁸ O'Casey 2008/1956: 293-7
⁴⁹ O'Casey 2008/1956: 294
⁵⁰ Osborne 1957, 'They Call it Cricket, in Tom Maschler (ed), Declaration, London, p. 83; in Carlson 1984: 422.
⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 422
⁵² Tynan's response to Ionesco, published in the Observer 22 June 1958 and 6 July 1958, reprinted in (Brandt 1998) 209-210 and 212-214.
⁵³ Carlson 1984: 422
⁵⁴ Tynan 1957, 'Theatre and Living' in Tom Maschler (ed), Declaration, London, p. 65; in Carlson 1984: 422.
⁵⁵ Carlson 1984: 415
⁵⁶ Tynan 1964, in Ionesco, Notes and Counter Notes, trans. Donald Watson, New York, p. 91; in Carlson 1984: 415.
⁵⁷ Tynan 1964, in Ionesco, Notes and Counter Notes, trans. Donald Watson, New York, p. 100; in Carlson 1984: 415.
⁵⁸ Tynan 1998/1958: 213
⁵⁹ Tynan 1998/1958: 213
⁶⁰ Hacks 1957, 'Das realistische Theaterstück', Neue Deutsche Literatur Vol 5(10), p. 104; in Carlson 1984: 424.
⁶¹ Hacks 1972, Das Poetische, Frankfurt, p. 29, 36, 121-126; in Carlson 1984: 424-5.
⁶² Peacock, Ronald 1974/1957, The Art of Drama, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers; 243-5
⁶³ Peacock 1974/1957: 159-160
⁶⁴ Peacock 1974/1957: 160-169
⁶⁵ Peacock 1974/1957: 189
⁶⁶ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 302-308.
⁶⁷ Carlson 1984: 437
⁶⁸ (Styan 1975)vii
⁶⁹ Frye 2008/1957: 302-3
⁷⁰ Wesker 1958, 'Let Battle Commence', Encore Vol 5(4), p. 19; in Carlson 1984: 423.
⁷¹ Carlson 1984: 423
⁷² Wesker 1964, 'Art – Therapy or Experience', Views Vol 4, p. 47; in Carlson 1984: 423.
⁷³ Carlson 1984: 472
⁷⁴ In Jacqueline Atrusseau 1959, 'Le mythe de la grandeur au petit T.N.P.', Les lettres françaises, October 15, 1959, p. 9; in Carlson 1984: 472.
⁷⁵ In Jean-Louis Pays 1965, 'Entretien avec Armand Gatti', Les lettres françaises, August 19, 1965, p. 1; in Carlson 1984: 473.
⁷⁶ In Jean Michaud-Mailland 1967, 'Notes au spectateur idéal', Les lettres françaises, June 15, 1967, p. 22; in Carlson 1984: 473.
⁷⁷ In Helmut Bauer 1969, 'Das Theater und die Revolution', Die Zeit July 22, 1969, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 473.
⁷⁸ Gatti 1971, 'Entretien', Travail théâtrale Vol 3, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 473.
⁷⁹ Gatti 1982, 'Armand Gatti on Time, Place, and the Theatrical Event', trans. Nancy Oakes, Modern Drama Vol 25(1), pp. 70-71; in Carlson 1984: 473.
⁸⁰ Carlson 1984: 473
⁸¹ Carlson 1984: 445

⁸² Guthrie 1959, A Life in the Theatre, London, p. 313; in Styan 1975: 182.

⁸³ Originally published in The Listener, March 26, 1959; reprinted in Mill C.W. 1967, Power, Politics and People: The Collected Essays of C. Wright Mills, Irving Horowitz (Ed), Oxford University Press, pp. 405-421.

⁸⁴ Mills 1967/1959: 375

⁸⁵ Mills 1967/1959: 406

⁸⁶ Mills 1967/1959: 376-409

Table 34/51: Theories of Theatre 1960-1962

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1960s: ‘the widely-held assumption that each play calls for a certain more or less predictable production interpretation began to be seriously challenged’ in favour of a more relativistic approach to historical material. The period saw a revival of the debate over whether theatre was an engaged social phenomenon or an aesthetic artefact and essentially apolitical. This latter view was articulated by Artaud and then by Grotowski. Important in this debate was the rise of a new theatre journal, the Tulane Drama Review (TDR), in 1955. The journal served as a kind of ‘clearing-house’ of new ideas, introducing the ideas of Brecht, Artaud, Dürrenmatt, Frisch, Ionesco, Genet, Adamov, Ghelderode, Vilar, Betti and Sastre to America. Initially (with the exception of Artaud) the emphasis was on dramatic literature, but after 1964, attention moved to contemporary production, and introduced the work of Grotowski, thereby bringing about yet another ‘rediscovery’ of the spectator, this time not as the target of a retheatricalized and socially and politically conscious theatre, but as an essential component of theatre (as part of the recognition of performance as essential to theatre). Fundamental to the work of Grotowski was the attempt to break free of what he called ‘literary theatre’ in which the text was the fundamental and dominating element. Instead, he proposed an ‘autonomous’ theatre in which the text was to be just one element among many, ‘raw material to be freely cut and transformed’.¹ Grotowski also reintroduced the idea of theatre as ritual, which was to have a profound effect on the work of Schechner (1966). Common to all experimental work during this period was the rejection of the dominance of the text, even to the point of rejecting the use of words at all. Driving this work was an implicit concern to differentiate theatre from film and television, to draw out what was unique about it as an art form. Few theorists articulated this concern, but it can be seen lurking in the background, especially in the efforts to engage the spectator as a participant of some kind, something which was clearly thought to mark a distinct difference between theatre and other dramatic forms such as cinema and television. Claus Bremer (1969) and Grotowski (1968) seem to have been the only two theorists of the period who explicitly stated this problem of theatre needing to locate what was unique about itself in the face of other forms of representation and performance. However, the concern can be detected in the turn, after 1970 (especially in American theory) toward a consideration of the theatre as a live ‘performed art’,² an approach of which Styan’s Elements of Drama (1963) could be taken as ‘the first modern manifestation’, although early moves in this direction can be seen in the work of Granville-Barker, Freytag, Sarcey, Archer and Kenneth Burke:³ ‘the dramatic activity of the twentieth century betrays a desperate search for new forms of playwrighting and staging, in the uncertain hope of accommodating the fragmented nature of contemporary theatre-going’ [in opposition to cinema (more in common with the art of painting than with the stage) and television].⁴ Paradoxically, at the same time some theorists continued to worry about tragedy, whether or not it was dead, whether or not it remained viable as a genre.⁵ Their focus was almost exclusively on drama as literature. The developing debate on performativity seems to have completely passed them by. The appearance of a mass culture, generated by television, film etc brought a new concern with the aesthetics of theatre, producing ‘medi-theoretical’ theory about what was special or distinctive about theatre in comparison to other image making mediums⁶ and a turn towards the aesthetics of theatre rather than its utility, perhaps epitomised by avant-garde performances which deliberately broke up the performance experiences (creating Goethe’s ‘nightmare’ of ‘a reading of a Goethe novel and the performance of a Beethoven symphony taking place in an art gallery among various statues’.⁷ Fischer-Lichte argues that since the 1960s (postmodernism), the aim of avant-garde theatre in particular has been to liberate the actor’s body by ‘desemiotization’ (Robert Wilson’s work in which the body doesn’t mean anything) or ‘re-sensualizing’ (Living Theatre),⁸ although, according to Fortier, ‘Theatre per se is a somewhat marginal cultural activity in the post-modern world’,⁹ something which one would be hard-pressed to realise from all the theoretical activity. Rarely does anyone give a thought to how one might get more people into the theatre. Since postmodernism involves ‘a certain emotional distance’ in itself, the need for theatre may be less. As well, life, perhaps because of this distancing, is itself seen as theatrical, which again leads to theatre seeming irrelevant.¹⁰ The 1960s also saw the rise of ‘reception theory’ and reader-response theories in the field of literary analysis, which were to be applied to theatre in the 1990s, although this application continued to see spectators as ‘readers’. After the 1960s, German dramatists came

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
to see their work in more distinctly political terms, even though, after 1970, Brecht became a less central figure. In America, at least until the late 1960s when the Cold War, the arms race and then the Vietnam war revived it, politically oriented drama and theatrical theory were relatively uncommon. Blau's criticism of American theatre as a 'stronghold of non-ideas' in The Impossible Theatre: A Manifesto ¹¹ marked the beginning of a renewed interest in engaged theatre, although his calls for a general humanist commitment were quickly overshadowed by calls for theatre to undertake more immediate and specific social tasks as it came to be adopted as a forum for political statement, 'even as a weapon' ¹² (see Gottlieb 1966 and R.C. Davis 1966). A strike by migrant workers in California in 1965 also led to the formation of a number of politically oriented Chicano theatre groups (see Valdez 1967). Also rising to notice was the political and social use of the theatre by American black writers such as LeRoi Jones (1996).
Theatre: The Rediscovery of Style (1960)	Michel Saint-Denis (1897-1971) French actor, director	No artist can avoid reflecting his own place and time. Historical drama needs to be 'brought to life in contemporary terms', not by ignoring historical style, but by understanding and attempting to recreate the aims of the dramatist for a contemporary spectator. (A similar view was held by Barthes 1955). ¹³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-historical reproduction View of Theatre: positive	An art	To reflect its own time and place	Doing: drama
Le destin des grandes oeuvres dramatiques (1960)	Aurélien Weiss (1893-1962)	Changes in customs and manners change the way we view great works, even though they may contain some 'permanent human truth'. These works remain alive and relevant to us through 'inevitable adaptation', largely through the efforts of actors. Actors do not 'reproduce', but transform the work of the author. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – actors as creators View of Theatre: positive		To transform the text	Doing: drama – acting is a creative task
Les grandes problèmes de l'esthétique théâtrale (1960)	Etienne Souriau French philosopher and aesthetician	Theatre offers 'a microcosmos in process , working out the internal focuses contained within ... Theatre ... symbolises, in utter completeness and utter totality, the vast expanse of the human condition'. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional	A microcosm of life	To expose and debate what is problematic in life	Doing: the art of theatre
'Telling a True Tale' (1960); 'Letter' (1964) ¹⁶	John Arden (1930-) English dramatist; an 'Angry Young Man'	Theatre must address social matters – but in its own terms. Pure social criticism was 'dangerously ephemeral,' something the theatre must counter by expressing such criticism 'within the framework of the traditional poetic truths'. ¹⁷ Drama should not give easy or obvious answers, 'mere placebos to moral and social questions'. 'The audience must be presented with an honest view of the ambiguous and contradictory situation life offers, and its instruction must be by indirection and implication'. It should show choices and the effects of choices, so that the spectator will consider 'the root causes that made each choice occur'. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – socially engaged drama View of Theatre: functional	A social and political practice	Social criticism within poetic truth; instruction	Doing: playwrighting Showing: choices and their effects
'The Case for Comedy'	James Thurber (1894-1961)	Tragicomedy was 'the true balance of life and art, the saving of the human mind as well as of the theatre'. ¹⁹	A social institution; a	To 'save the human mind'	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1960)	American playwright, author and cartoonist	Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	practice
‘Erlanger Rede über das absurde Theater’ (1960)	Wolfgang Hildesheimer (1916-) German dramatist	Supported Ionesco’s view of contemporary (absurd) drama. Ionesco’s theatre was neither Aristotelian nor Brechtian (epic). Instead, it showed ‘a universe in which questions are asked, but no answers are given or even implied’. ²⁰ In this kind of theatre, drama acts as a ‘symbolic ceremonial, in which the spectator assumes the role of the man who questions, while the play represents the world that gives no reasonable response’. Plays simply reflect the world of the dramatist. Absurd plays therefore, simply exist, without purpose or cause or effect. Hildesheimer claims that this kind of drama posed a new challenge to actors because they must express an even more radical alienation than Brecht’s epic theatre required. ²¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A place in which drama is enacted	As a symbolic ceremonial representation of the world	Doing: drama-playwrighting ; acting – particular styles of drama require particular styles of acting Showing: a reflection of the world of the dramatist
Interview (1960); Interview (1970) ²²	Julian Beck (1925-1985) American theatre director; Founder of the Living Theatre	‘We believe in the theatre as a place of intense experience, half dream, half ritual, in which the spectator approaches something of a vision of self-understanding, going past the conscious to the unconscious, to an understanding of the nature of things’. The proper vehicle for this was poetry, or at least a language ‘laden with symbols and far removed from our daily speech’. ²³ Beck established a workshop headed by Joseph Chaikin (founder of the Open Theatre 1963-1971; 1972) to explore techniques in non-naturalist acting. Both believed that ‘a better theatre and a better society should be sought, in America at least, not by stimulating the spectator to Marxist class consciousness but by freeing the individual consciousness’ ²⁴ [an implicit recognition of theatre as a reflection of its society]. To do this, actors ‘must open up again, become naïve again, innocent, and cultivate our deeper climates – our dread, for example’. ²⁵ In 1970, Beck maintained that the theatre desired to ‘free the individual to feel and to create’, ²⁶ an aim which was at odds with the politically oriented theatre of the time in America. The theatre should, according to Beck, attempt ‘some kind of communication of feeling and idea that push’	Theatre as a place of experience and communication; an institution	Creating an intense experience for performer and spectator using poetic or symbolic language; to free the individual to feel and to create; to confront in order to break	Doing: drama (poetry); acting – requires a willingness to be vulnerable Watching: the achievement of self-understanding

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		beyond words, not to destroy language but to ‘deepen it and amplify it and to make the communication real rather than a series of lies’. ²⁷ This concern with language was more in tune with contemporary European concerns than American concerns. The work of the Living Theatre could be confrontational. During their production of Paradise Now , actors mingled with the spectator, urging them to remove their clothes, and spitting on them if they didn’t. ²⁸ The critic Charles Marowitz wrote ‘An Open Letter to the Becks’ arguing that such aggressive antagonism of their spectator was not only at odds with their professed belief in non-violence, but was counter-productive because it mustered ‘intellectual resistance’ amongst people who would otherwise have supported their work, and thus prevented what they were trying to achieve – the obliteration of ‘that impregnable line that separates life and art’. ²⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – confrontational theatre View of Theatre: functional		down the gap between art and life
1960: Geschlossene und offene Form im Drama (1960) by Volker Klotz was an attempt to draw together a number of studies of drama using Walzel’s categories, concluding that different historical periods tend to favour different types of drama.
The Tragic Vision (1960)	Murray Krieger (1923-2000) American literary theorist and critic	It is no longer possible to create the tragic hero in modern theatre. The Apollonian balance has been lost, leaving only Dionysian terror. Instead of being pitted against universals, the modern hero faces only parochial and limited ethical practicality ³⁰ [distinction between tragedy and drama as genres] Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent		To find a balance between enlightenment and terror (Nietzschean)	Doing: tragedy
Truth and Method (1960)	Hans-Georg Gadamer (1900-2002) German Philosopher	Gadamer’s central concern was with how we experience art, rather than aesthetic judgments about it. Gadamer attempted to describe catharsis as follows: ‘What is experienced in such an excess of tragic suffering is something truly common. The spectator recognizes himself and his finiteness in the face of the power of fate. What happens to the great ones of the earth has exemplary significance. . . .To see that “this is how it is” is a kind of self-knowledge for the spectator, who emerges with new insight from the illusions in which he, like everyone else, lives’. ³¹ Lathan considers that this definition serves both as a working definition of the elusive concept of catharsis and ‘an introduction into the problem of establishing any determinate definition’. ³² For Gadamer, the work of art itself was the ‘pivot’ of the spectator’s experience, and could be considered as ‘play’ in the sense of a game, although artworks nevertheless also make ‘truth’ claims. Works of art were not isolated from the world, and the experience of art	A living social and cultural institution through which we experience art as a game	Affect through play	Watching: the experience of art changes us; we have a living relationship towards art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		changed people. An ‘authentic experience’ of an artwork was not confined to an historical reconstruction, but involved a ‘living relationship’ towards it, thus affecting the present.³³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
‘Von den Funktionen der Sprache im Theater-schauspiel’ (1960)	Roman Ingarden (1893-1970) Polish philosopher	Theorists concerned with the form of drama (e.g. Klotz, Staiger and Petsch) ignore the question of how language is used in drama. Staged drama is a ‘borderline case’ of a literary work because ‘staging adds certain nonlinguistic but meaningful elements ... and reinterprets other elements in the original’.³⁴ He stresses the complexity of the theatrical world. It consists of three different domains: one that is actually represented; one that is both represented and discussed, and one that is only discussed. Language serves four functions in this complex world: representation (supplementing the concrete world offered by the staging); expression (of the experiences and emotions of the characters); communication (with other characters) and influencing (the actions of others). This is a performative view of language, anticipating Austin, whose speech-act theory provided one of the sources for recent semiotic theories of theatre. Could also be said to be a cross-over or collision point between theatre and performativity. Theatre requires a special attitude towards language from the spectator: The spectator must apprehend each utterance as an act, a link in the ‘chain of human vicissitudes developing through the conversations’ which make up any drama. This requirement is common to all drama. Particular periods and particular styles of drama require other levels of awareness on the part of the spectator e.g. the acceptance of highly mannered speech in poetic drama.³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (language) View of Theatre: positive		The representation of a complex world through language	Doing: drama Watching: the spectator must adopt an attitude towards language which sees it as performative i.e. each utterance is an act
The Paradox of Tragedy (1960)	D.D. Raphael (1916- English philosopher	Looks at tragedy as a more general human phenomenon. Takes up the old question of tragic pleasure, suggesting it arises from our sympathy for the hero for being like ourselves and our admiration for his greatness of spirit (as in Corneille 1660).³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional		To instigate sympathy	Doing: tragedy Watching: sympathy arises from empathy and admiration
The Theatre of the Absurd (1961); ³⁷ The	Martin Esslin (1918-2002) Austrian born	Esslin coined the term ‘Theatre of the Absurd’ to describe a new form of drama which attempted to express a sense of ‘out of harmony’ with the world. Although his definition was broad, he excluded playwrights such as Sartre and Camus whose theatre was ‘less	A collaborative signifying	Expression of the world at the time	Doing: drama: the practice of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Field of Drama (1987) ³⁸	critic, translator, scholar, producer and playwright working in England and America	adequate as an expression' of their philosophy, because it tended to use traditional conventions, whereas the theatre of the absurd went 'a step further in trying to achieve a unity between its basic assumptions [about the absurdity of the world] and the form in which these [were] expressed'. Absurdist theatre 'strives to express its sense of the senselessness of the human condition and the inadequacy of the rational approach by the open abandonment of rational devices and discursive thought'. It 'has renounced arguing about the absurdity of the human condition; it merely presents it in being ... in terms of concrete stage images. This is what makes it different from Existentialist theatre as well as other avant-garde theatre. In particular, absurdist theatre features 'a radical devaluation of language ... what happens on the stage transcends, and often contradicts, the words spoken '. ³⁹ In his 1987 book, Esslin explores the signifying practices of theatre. Theatre signifies on a number of levels, each of which can convey 'the message': framing, the actor, visual elements, textual elements, aural elements: 'A dramatic performance ... is never the work of a single individual, mirroring a single individual's intention to communicate. Neither the author, nor the director ... can ever be wholly in control of the total product, the ultimate meaning of the "message" that reaches the spectator. Deliberately, or unintentionally, the work, say of the costume designer, might be in dialectical conflict with, say the creator of the make-up. And the resultant consonance or dissonance of these elements must necessarily vibrate in different ways in the consciousness, or subliminal perception, of individual spectators'. ⁴⁰ Theatre frames 'an image of Life' , which draws attention to it 'as something to be looked at and scrutinised for what it means'. ⁴¹ Hence the need to understand the signifying practices of theatre. While drama 'is a mimesis of real life', the theatre 'is a simulacrum – at its highest level, ordered and elevated to the status of art – of the real world and real life'. However, 'on the highest plane ... a dramatic performance transcends any attempts at being reduced to anything so mundane as a single definable and generally valid meaning'. Rather 'it may be able to give its audience, each individual in it, differently, an experience , on both the emotional and intellectual planes'. ⁴² The only 'truly distinctive feature' of 'live' theatre 'is its ability to establish an immediate interaction between performers and audience, a continuous feed-back of reactions' which actors use to 'immediately modify and adapt their performance'. The 'unforeseen inspiration as well as mistakes' which might occur as a result adds to the excitement for both performers and spectator.	practice which aims at the communication of a message; a framing practice; an interactive art	through framing an image of life, making it watchable; signification	theatre Watching: perception of 'message' transmitted by performance; looking at life through a frame; a continual process of reaction and interaction both between spectator and performers and between spectator members; performances are experienced as a mass experience, and as an event for which one has made an effort

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	literature	forces which can neither be fully understood nor overcome by rational prudence ... Tragedy is [also] irreparable ... unrelenting and absurd. ⁴⁸ Tragedy 'is a terrible, stark insight into human life'. Modern drama, by contrast offers us tragic drama. Things are reparable either by the individual or by society. This misses the point of tragedy. Tragedy is a re-enactment of 'private anguish on a public stage' in which we are 'punished far in excess of our guilt' but are nonetheless ennobled by our suffering. [Critics always focus on doing !] Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional	contingent
Tragedy and the Theory of Drama (1961)	Elder Olson (1909- Dramatist	Challenged the 'death of tragedy' concept. The 'loss' of elevated characters is trivial, and the argument that universal beliefs are no longer available is unproven. The fact that we can still be affected by tragedy indicates that the genre is still healthy. The lack of modern tragedies arises not from any crisis in belief but from the fact that tragedy 'fell into the hands of poets who were not dramatists and thus came into disrepute'. ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent			Doing: playwrighting
Gallows Humour (1961)	Jack Richardson (1935- American playwright	Comedy is an essential part of life and cannot be separated from tragedy. True comedy has much in common with tragedy. ⁵⁰ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			Doing: playwrighting
Le théâtre contemporain dans le monde (1961)	Paul Ginestier Critical Aesthetics	An attempt to develop Souriau's insights into a more general theory of theatre: seems to have come up with a kind of 'three-dimensional' analysis of what still is treated like a text. ⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: aesthetic			Doing: drama (literature)
The Seven Ages of Theatre (1961)	Richard Southern (1912-2000) English Mediaeval scholar	'[T]he secret of the theatre does not lie in the thing done but rather in something that arises from the manner of doing. Drama may be the thing done , but theatre is doing . Theatre is an act. ... The essence of theatre does not lie in what is performed. It does not lie even in the way it is performed. The essence of theatre lies in the impression made on the spectator by the manner in which you perform. Theatre is essentially a reactive art '. ⁵² Southern drew a distinction between the creative arts and the performing arts . The first required no contact between creator and spectator whereas in the second, contact was essential: 'You can enjoy Picasso at an exhibition in Stockholm while Picasso himself is on the coast of the Mediterranean, but you can only enjoy Sir Laurence	An act of communication in the present; a reactive art	Affect: to make an impression on the spectator through performance	Doing: theatre (a practice) Watching: personal contact is the essence of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Olivier [as an actor] when Sir Laurence himself performs in your presence, before you and an assembled spectator in the self-same building. This coming into direct personal contact is part of the player's art and, with the relentless element of the One Occasion, must be appreciated for any true understanding of the essence of the theatre'.⁵³ Southern essentially defines all art as a form of communication. For his history, he divided theatre basically into pre-Christian ('the age of the people's theater') and Christian ('the age of people in the theater'). The former was characterized by community participation, outdoor performance and interdisciplinary activities. Communication had a symbolic meaning and was open to interpretation and was dialogic. The latter is focused on the actor, with the community reduced to a passive role; it is usually held indoors and is dominated by words. Communication is tightly defined, specific in meaning and monologic in form.⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as communication View of Theatre: positive
'Notes sur un théâtre matérialiste' (1962)	Louis Althusser (1918-1990) French Marxist philosopher	Noted for dismissing the early work of Marx in favour of the later emphasis on dialectical materialism, seen through a structuralist filter, making the 'true' Marx anti-humanist, anti-empiricist and anti-historicist. The active subject is 'nothing more than the locus of conflicting social forces'. This view has been condemned, but remains influential.⁵⁵ Materialist theatre features 'internal dissociation' and 'unresolved alterity' (as in Brecht's Mother Courage). It has a different relationship with the spectator. Classical theories of drama consider the audience as either psychologically identifying with the characters, or consciously remaining outside the drama, viewing it objectively from the perspective of a 'clear consciousness of self'. However, although the spectator is inevitably involved in the drama, it is on a more basic level than that of psychological identification. The spectator is 'the brother of the characters, caught in the spontaneous myths of ideology, in its illusions and privileged forms'. This suggests both identification, emotional involvement, cultural and ideological identification and some distance (something akin to Herzfeld's conception of cultural intimacy).⁵⁶ Traditional drama uses this identification to reaffirm and deepen cultural myths. Materialist drama such as Brecht's attempt to 'escape' from this identification by creating a tension between the 'spontaneous ideology' depicted and the real conditions of the characters' existence, invisible to them but visible to the spectator. The perception of this tension is created, not by the 'trappings' of Brechtian theatre, but by the internal dynamic	A social institution	To exploit the relationship with the spectator	Doing: drama Watching: different kinds of drama require different responses from spectators (a theory of spectatorship); most drama involves identification and emotional involvement

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of the play itself: ‘at once criticizing the illusions of consciousness and unravelling its real conditions’. ⁵⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
‘Die Bühne ist der absolute Ort’ (1962)	Tankred Dorst (1925- German dramatist	The proper theatre [drama] for the modern world is not tragedy but farces, grotesques and parables, because spectators were ‘unsure, skeptical, perhaps even a bit suspicious’. They come to the theatre with questions but expect no answers from the dramatist, ‘who has no more great material or metaphysical world plan than they do’. ⁵⁸ The new ‘postpsychological’ era demands a new ‘negative’ dramaturgy. Devices such as masks, disguises and plays within plays draw attention to the indeterminacy of the stage world, thus reflecting the parallel indeterminacy of values, morals and social norms in the world of the spectator. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-tragedy View of Theatre: positive	A place to experience drama; a performed art	To reflect the indeterminacy of the world	Doing: playwrighting Watching: spectators come with questions but don’t expect answers
The Dark Comedy (1962); The Elements of Drama (1963); Drama, Stage and Audience (1975)	J.L. Styan (1923- Theatre critic	The Elements of Drama (1963) was the first significant modern manifestation of an approach to theatre theory which considered theatre as a performed art, according to Carlson, ⁵⁹ despite the use of drama in the titles! A concern with the process by which meaning is created in the theatre and an attempt to chart the largely unexplored middle ground between literature and performance. Using the metaphor of an orchestral score, Styan argues that the text is a collection of elements designed to produce ‘animation – not of actors acting and speaking out, but of our imaginative impressions’. ⁶⁰ Spectators are ‘led to compare the play’ with their own experience of life, ‘to judge its quality and its ordering of impressions along with the quality of his own interest, and to reach a judgment on the value of the fulfilled intention of the performance’. ⁶¹ (This is a similar position to that taken by Hume: the spectator is capable of judging not just the content but also the presentation). The spectator is also a creative artist, whose participation requires both skill and discipline. (Styan anticipates an important element of more recent theatre theory: the aesthetics of reception): the play ‘is not on the stage but in the mind’. ⁶² A mixture of tragedy and comedy can encompass the greatest range of human experience and arouse the spectator to the highest degree, a view which Carlson considers ‘romantic’. ⁶³ Styan’s 1975 book argues that any ‘power in a play derives from the activity of perception in its audience . Drama is made up of ‘sights and sounds, stillness and motion, noise and silence, relationships and responses ... between actor and audience. ... The script on the page is not the drama any more than a clod of earth is a	A form of communication; the medium which turns a script into a drama	Communication through performance in a circuit which goes from play to performer to spectator and back: this creates the play, its effects and its meaning	Doing: drama Watching: the spectator as imaginative participant and judge; style is the key to the communication between stage and spectator: the spectator permits theatre; anxiety appears to be the key to the dramatic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		field of corn: it is essential constantly to return to this':⁶⁴ 'the study of drama must be pursued in its own medium, the theatre, where an audience makes its perceptions and has social experience ... criticism which ignores the theatrical experience is peripheral, even irresponsible'.⁶⁵ The 'primacy of the occasion' is what is paramount. Live theatre is particular. Drama is a collective act of creation, the harnessing of human imagination for community experience. 'The virtue and energy of a play must be tested upon an audience ... Perceptual criticism is finally performance criticism'.⁶⁶ A play 'must communicate or it is not a play at all'.⁶⁷ The task is to locate and examine 'the lines of communication, the transmission of signals between stage and audience'.⁶⁸ Styan uses Marshall McLuhan's 'the medium is the message'⁶⁹ as a 'springboard' into understanding the theatre because essential to perception in the theatre is form.⁷⁰ In the theatre experience 'it is not so much the elements of drama on the stage or the perceptions of the audience which are important, as the relationships between them. In the mesh of every successful performance, the signals from the script to the actor, and from the actor to the spectator and back again, complete a dramatic circuit of which the audience is an indispensable part. Drama needs an audience to throw the switch: no audience, no circuit; no circuit, no play..... The critic [must start] by measuring the current'.⁷¹ Styan was against semiotic approaches to theatre: 'There are so many variables simultaneously working to create meaning on the stage that it is impertinent to identify it in terms other than its own. The experience is the meaning'.⁷² Styan considered that style was '[p]robably the most elusive and most neglected, but also the most essential, element of a play'. Style is the sine qua non [the indispensable condition] of successful communication in the theatre, and therefore of the drama's affective meaning [although] 'any style can be deceptive and treacherous'. 'There is no true value judgment that can be appropriately made about a play before it is rendered in the style it calls for. Not only is style the basis of meaning, as any regular literary criticism of verse or prose would insist, but in drama content and style are inseparably related by what we may call 'the audience equation'. Every play's style, in kind of speech and movement or degree of thought and feeling, is measured from the norm of the intended spectator's actual behaviour, an extension of real life'.⁷³ Crucially, it is the spectator which seems to determine the use of style, and for whom style is a key element in the act of communication: '[b]oth the problem and the solution lie in the degree of unreality an audience permits its stage'.⁷⁴			response

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Styan considers that this is most evident in farce, a form of ‘pure comedy’ usually ignored by theorists because it defies analysis.⁷⁵ Style is always a way of seeing ... the history of style is therefore the history of human perception. Nevertheless, ‘the comic view is as necessary to our social well-being as the tragic view is to our spiritual life’.⁷⁶ Styan produces a ‘theory of dramatic response’ in the last chapter of his 1975 book: ‘Any theory of dramatic response must take into account the stretch and strain of mind and feeling which keeps the spectator receptive and perceptive. The element of anxiety which comes of uncertainty and ambivalence produces a most serviceable tension and is the likely source of most interplay between stage and spectator.’⁷⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: conventional

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 444-5

² Carlson 1984: 486

³ Carlson 1984: 487

⁴ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 122

⁵ Orrin Klapp claimed that Americans (and possibly some other societies) ‘do not know what tragedy is’ (Klapp 1964: 93n32). They mistake it for melodrama.

⁶ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 94

⁷ Goethe 1887-8, quoted in Fischer-Lichte 1997: 234

⁸ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 39

⁹ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 179

¹⁰ Fortier 2002: 179

¹¹ 1965: 7 in Carlson 466, 513-5

¹² Carlson 1984: 466

¹³ Carlson 1984: 444-5

¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 445

¹⁵ Cited in Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman. 144-5

¹⁶ Published in Encore Vol 11(5), 1964.

¹⁷ Arden 1960, ‘Telling a True Tale’, Encore Vol 7(3), p. 25; in Carlson 1984: 422.

¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 422-3

¹⁹ Thurber 1960, ‘The Case for Comedy’, Atlantic Vol. 206, p. 98; in Carlson 1984: 451.

²⁰ Carlson 1984: 416

-
- ²¹ Hildesheimer 1960, 'Erlanger Rede über das absurde Theater', Akzente Vol 7, p. 548-556; in Carlson 1984: 416.
- ²² Both cited in Carlson 1984: 420.
- ²³ Julian Beck, in William Glover 1961, 'The Living Theatre', Theatre Arts Vol 45(12), December, p. 63; in Carlson 1984: 420.
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 420
- ²⁵ Chaikin, quoted in Robert Pasolli 1970, A Book on the Open Theatre, p. 95; in Carlson 1984: 420.
- ²⁶ Carlson 1984: 469
- ²⁷ Beck 1970, in Renfreur Neff, The Living Theatre: USA, New York, p. 235; in Carlson 1984: 469.
- ²⁸ Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 228
- ²⁹ Brockett and Ball 2004: 229. Marowitz blamed the aggression on 'the more psychopathic members' of the company, suggesting that it is not just spectators which can get carried away by a theatrical activity.
- ³⁰ Carlson 1984: 450
- ³¹ Gadamer, Hans-Georg. 1984. Truth and Method. New York: Crossroad.132
- ³² Lathan, Peter. 2000. 'Greek Theatre'. British Theatre Guide www.britishtheatreguide.info/articles accessed 2006.
- ³³ Inwood, M.J. 1995. 'Hans-Georg Gadamer'. In The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, edited by T. Honderich. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, p. 303.
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 443
- ³⁵ Ingarden 1973, The Literary Work of Art, trans. George Grabowicz, Evanston Ill., p. 322, 379, 391-5; in Carlson 1984: 443.
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 449
- ³⁷ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.329-332.
- ³⁸ The chapter 'The Signs of Stage and Screen' from The Field of Drama is reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.299-306
- ³⁹ Esslin 2008/1961: 331-2
- ⁴⁰ Esslin, Martin. 1987. The Field of Drama: How the signs of drama create meaning on stage and screen. London: Methuen Drama.16
- ⁴¹ Esslin 1987: 154
- ⁴² Esslin 1987: 176-7
- ⁴³ Esslin 1987: 91
- ⁴⁴ Esslin 1998/1987: 301-6
- ⁴⁵ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner 2008: 333-335.
- ⁴⁶ Steiner 2008: 1961: 334
- ⁴⁷ Cited in Carlson 1984: 450
- ⁴⁸ Steiner 2008: 1961: 335
- ⁴⁹ Olson 1961, Tragedy and the Theory of Drama, New York, p. 2, 256; in Carlson 1984: 452.
- ⁵⁰ Carlson 1984: 451
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 438-9, 494-5
- ⁵² Southern 1964, The Seven Ages of the Theatre, New York, p.22, 26; in Styran 1975: 25, 144.

-
- ⁵³ Southern 1961: 23
- ⁵⁴ Lovelace, Alice. 1996. 'A Brief History of Theater Forms (from Aristotle to Brecht, Baraka, O'Neal, and Boal)'. In Motion Magazine February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27/02/2007.
- ⁵⁵ Blackburn, Simon. 1994. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press. 13
- ⁵⁶ Herzfeld, Michael. 1997. Cultural Intimacy: Social Poetics in the Nation-State. New York, London: Routledge.
- ⁵⁷ Althusser 1977, For Marx, trans. Ben Brewster, London, p. 142, 146-8; in Carlson 1984: 433-4.
- ⁵⁸ Dorst 1962, Grosse Schmärede an der Stadtmaue, Cologne, p. 113-115; in Carlson 1984: 451.
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 487
- ⁶⁰ Styan 1963, The Elements of Drama, Cambridge, p. 64; in Carlson 1984: 446.
- ⁶¹ Carlson 1984: 445-6
- ⁶² Styan 1963, The Elements of Drama, Cambridge, p. 288; in Carlson 1984: 446.
- ⁶³ Carlson 1984: 451
- ⁶⁴ Styan 1975: vii
- ⁶⁵ Styan 1975: 241
- ⁶⁶ Styan 1975: 239
- ⁶⁷ Styan 1975: 1
- ⁶⁸ Styan 1975: 1
- ⁶⁹ Marshall McLuhan 1964, Understanding Media: the Extensions of Man, New York.
- ⁷⁰ Styan 1975: 5
- ⁷¹ Styan 1975: 24
- ⁷² Styan 1975: 27
- ⁷³ Styan 1975: 68-9
- ⁷⁴ Styan 1975: 78
- ⁷⁵ Styan 1975: 77
- ⁷⁶ Styan 1975: 107
- ⁷⁷ Styan 1975: 229

Table 35/51: Theories of Theatre 1963-1964

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'On Forms of Music and Forms of Society' (1963) ¹	Paul Honigsheim Sociologist of Music	'Throughout the major portion of human history, the theater meant exactly the opposite of what it means today to the average theatergoer ... a search for a new experience' of some kind or degree.² Historically, theatres were generally sponsored by major social institutions (the city, the state, religion) and were concerned with the sharing of known traditions or customs. Attendance was expected and at times even coerced. Now, attending the theatre is just one of many possible activities available to the free individual. Honigsheim saw theatre as historically developed, both constrained and enabled by its political, religious and social contexts. Opera, for instance, a special case within the development of theatre, grew directly out of a combination of ignorance and tradition. Its development was a direct result of the rediscovery of Greek tragedy in the Italian renaissance. Greek tragedy was known to have used music, but musical scholars did not know how, so they drew on the one formal musical tradition with which they were familiar which combined words with music - church music, producing the idea of Greek tragedy as musical rather than spoken drama. The Catholic Counter-Reformation provided the necessary spurt to development by condemning acting but not singing, leading performers to taking up opera in lieu of spoken drama. Opera also proved adept at avoiding themes which attracted censure, initially hanging its music on flimsy plots about love rather than political or religious revolution. Comic operas combined aspects of commedia with opera seria, spreading initially to Catholic countries, reaching Protestant countries and Russia by C19th. Operetta on the other hand, first arose amongst the middle classes in Vienna who had ample leisure time. Its plots were almost exclusively concerned with overcoming social obstacles to marriage, an issue of great concern to a wealthy and upwardly mobile bourgeoisie.³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place to go to search for a new experience; one of many activities, but one which is historical in nature	The sharing of known traditions or customs (past); an activity or amenity available to anyone	Doing: theatre as an historical practice: the form of theatre is both constrained and enabled by its social and political context Watching: historically contingent
The Voice of Tragedy (1963)	Mitchell Leaska (1934- English academic	Tragedy is not the expression of a common faith but is that faith, 'its performance [is] a liturgy of a humanist religion'. Tragedy appears when a spirit of freedom and individualism encounters a spirit of humanism, and the demands of the individual must be adjusted to the needs of society, such as is occurring in modern America.⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		The performance of religion	Doing: tragedy
'Des Autor	Max Frisch	It is inevitable that drama should have a political dimension, since it was produced by and	A place to	To stress the	Doing: drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
und das Theater' (1964);	(1911- German playwright	witnessed by persons participating in society. Nevertheless, a play should be created 'out of love of theatre, nothing else', and should be governed by the rules of art, not politics. ⁵ There was little evidence that any of the millions of spectators who had seen Brecht's plays had in fact changed their political opinions as a result. Indeed, Frisch called his 1958 play Biedermann und die Brandstifter a 'lehrstück ohne Lehre' (a teaching play with nothing taught) in response to Brecht's work. Art stresses the importance of the individual. For this reason, it is naturally subversive, but it cannot effectively engage in direct political action. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-didacticism View of Theatre: positive	see drama	importance of the individual	(an art)
'The Theatre's New Testament' (1964); ⁷ 'Towards the Poor Theatre' (1966); ⁸ Towards a Poor Theatre (1968; 1975); 'External Order/Internal Intimacy' (1969); 'From the Theater Company to Art as a Vehicle' (1995). ⁹	Jerzy Grotowski (1933-1999) Polish director; founder of the Polish Laboratory Theatre (1959-1984)	Towards A Poor Theatre is a collection of Grotowski's articles, interviews, speeches and introductory notes to productions in which he attempted to answer the question: What is theatre? ¹⁰ The 'average' theatregoer thought of theatre as 'first and foremost a place of entertainment' although more culturally aspiring theatre-goers might see theatre in moral terms. Theatre practitioners themselves 'do not usually have an altogether clear conception of the theatre' and their conceptions vary according to their position: actor, designer, critic, producer. What producers thought of theatre was doubly suspect since producers tended to be those who had failed at or become weary of some other aspect of theatre. Grotowski argued that the only things indispensable to theatre were actors and spectator: 'at least one spectator is needed to make ... a performance'. Theatre was therefore 'what takes place between spectator and actor' upon some pre-existing common ground which can either be dismissed or jointly worshipped. ¹¹ It was nothing other than the 'detailed investigation of the actor-spectator relationship'. He claimed that he came to his beliefs about theatre through 'long-term practical investigations' not through theory, although theory could be used for analysis. ¹² He rejected what he called 'Rich Theatre' – theatre which depended on 'artistic kleptomania' in its attempt to create 'total theatre' in the face of the technical superiority of film and cinema ¹³ and strived to strip theatre back to its essentials, to an 'ascetic' theatre. ¹⁴ The only two essential elements for theatre to exist were the actor and the spectator: the essence of theatre lay in the relationship between actor and spectator . These were the only things which were distinctive about theatre: 'theatre can exist without make-up, without autonomic costume and scenography, without a separate performance area (stage), without lighting and sound effects, etc. It cannot exist without the actor-spectator relationship of perceptual, direct, "live"	Theatre is a relationship between actor and spectator which occurs upon some pre-existing common ground which may or may not be recognized; an encounter	A confrontation or provocation in which the actor sacrifices himself before/for the spectator : this is therapeutic for the actor, allowing him to respond to the challenge of life in a way which unites body and soul	Doing: the practice of theatre: building the relationship between performer and spectator Watching: an encounter (by a very small number of special spectators); spectators are organized by the actors/production

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		communion'.¹⁵ The players 'are one ensemble, the audience another: when the two are integrated, a play has begun'. Thus, theatre is an encounter ... something growing and organic.¹⁶ Poor theatre focuses on this relationship, downgrading or eliminating script, scenery and other elements, in contrast to synthetic rich theatre, which 'betrays this essence' by vainly attempting to unite literature, painting, sculpture, architecture, lighting and acting in a 'total theatre' [Wagnerian] experience. Such efforts produce at best only a hybrid which is technically inferior to film and television. Nevertheless, it is a very particular kind of 'actor' which is to have this special relationship, one capable of virtually disappearing into 'a series of visible impulses'. The 'annihilation of the actor's body' is to be a kind of sacrifice, an atonement by which a 'secular holiness' is achieved. It is through this sacrifice that the 'lost ritual power of theatre' can be restored. To this end, actors were to undergo a rigorous process of 'rebirth',¹⁷ through the use of a distillation of European and oriental training techniques, not to produce a 'bag of tricks' but for the 'eradication of blocks'. This would produce a theatre which utterly depended on the actor and depended on 'finding the proper spectator-actor relationship for each type of show and embodying the decision in physical arrangements'. For example, actors could 'play among the spectators, directly contacting the spectator and giving it a passive role ... or ... play among the spectators and ignore them, looking through them. The spectator may be separated from the actors [so that they] look down on the actors ... like medical students watching an operation ... or the entire hall is used as a concrete place [in which] spectators are ... guests [of the characters]' or spectators may be 'illuminated ... as a functional part of the performance'.¹⁸ This kind of theatre is not for everyone, only for those 'members of the public who feel a true need for psychic self-examination and are willing to use the confrontation with the performance and the self-penetration of the actor as a means of unlocking their own inner selves'. Small numbers of spectators are to be addressed by 'totally open actors' in an intimate 'confrontation':¹⁹ 'the actor must not act for the spectator, he must act vis-à-vis with the spectators':²⁰ 'One must not think of the spectator while acting ... If the actor has the spectator as his point of orientation, he ... will be offering himself for sale ... A sort of prostitution ... at the same time, he must not neglect the fact of the public ... he must act vis-à-vis with the spectators ... he must ... do an act of extreme yet disciplined sincerity and authenticity. He must give himself and not hold himself back, open up and not close in on himself in a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		narcissistic way ... The most important thing for me ... is to rediscover the elements of the actor's art'.²¹ To this end, Grotowski experimented with various different kinds of spatial arrangements that would intertwine performers and spectators, though he clearly did not advocate the total annihilation of the barrier between them,²² and retained control of how the spectators were to be incorporated into this 'essential' relationship. Grotowski's theories and the works he staged between 1959 and 1970 provided the guiding principles for Schechner's environmental theatre: the specific arrangement of the relationship between performers and spectator according to the needs of each play, the radical modification of scripts, an emphasis on the control of the body and voice, which in turn has led to an obsession with performance on the side of the performers. In 1969, a group of American participants in a Grotowski training course in Denmark condemned Grotowski for his apparent indifference to social questions.²³ Grotowski responded by arguing that man's primary duty was not of a social order, His duty was 'to respond to the challenge of life and to answer it in the manner of nature'. Action was required, but not social or political action but the action of self-understanding, which would lead to the unity of body and soul.²⁴ Grotowski's company also undertook a series of 'paratheatrical' experiments between 1970 and 1973 in which the company and outside participants organized communal events which lasted for an extended period of time,²⁵ an idea which was condemned by some critics as a form of religion or therapy such as sociodrama or psychodrama rather than theatre, but was taken up in Australia by the experimental group Pageant Theatre in Education in some of their work with children.²⁶ These kinds of intensive explorations using theatrical techniques 'dispense with audiences altogether'.²⁷ He travelled to America in the 1960s and later lived in both California and Italy. His theories had a direct influence on the work of Richard Schechner. Whilst he claimed that 'the essential concern [regarding the stage-auditorium dichotomy] is finding the proper spectator-actor relationship for each type of performance and embodying the decision in physical arrangements',²⁸ it seems he was essentially anti-spectator (and perhaps even anti-theatre): 'When I speak of Art as vehicle, I refer to a montage whose seat is not in the perception of the spectator but in the doers... The performance is like a big elevator of which the actor is the operator. The spectators are in this elevator, the performance transports them from one event to another. .. Art as a vehicle is like a very primitive elevator ... the doer lifts himself toward a more subtle energy ... If Art as a vehicle

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		functions, this objectivity exists and the basket moves for those who do the Action²⁹ (and, only as a consequence, for those who are watching). The point of art for Grotowski was ‘to cross our frontiers, exceed our limitations, fill our emptiness – fulfil ourselves’.³⁰ This made theatre ‘a place of provocation ... capable of challenging itself and its audience by violating accepted stereotypes of vision, feeling, and judgment’, something which was inherently ‘transgressive’.³¹ Grotowski’s ideas continually surface in contemporary minority or ‘avant-garde’ theatre which invariably sees itself as transgressive, although some practitioners also see their work as political in a way which Grotowski rejected. Although Grotowski acknowledged the relationship between performers and spectators, he also seemed to deny it because he continually strove to collapse it. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conventional theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent
The Hyacinth Room (1964)	Cyrus Hoy (1926- Contemporary literary scholar and editor)	Both comedy and tragedy arise from a juxtaposition of the finite and the infinite. Comedy and tragedy become blended in irony, when the hero becomes conscious of the conflict and brings this consciousness to the spectator, which then sees simultaneously ‘the grandeur to which man aspires, and the degradation to which he is perversely driven’.³² Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive		To make the spectator aware through action	Doing: comedy and tragedy Showing: the grandeur to which man aspires, and the degradation to which he is ‘perversely driven’
The Act of Creation (1964)	Arthur Koestler Aesthetics	Two planes of activity exist when spectating: ‘the spectator knows in one part of his mind that the people onstage are actors; yet in another part he experiences hope, fear, and pity, all of which are induced by events the viewer knows to be make-believe’.³³ ‘the distinction between fact and fiction is a late acquisition of rational thought – unknown to the unconscious, and largely ignored by the emotions’.³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		To induce experience through action	Watching: involves two planes of activity: fact and fiction
Symbolic Leaders:	Orrin E. Klapp American	Klapp’s work on symbolic leadership reveals an implicit theory of drama which is worth considering because of its take on what is meant by ‘drama’. Drama is public action , a	An art form which has	Public action to create an	Showing: seeing public

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
the Extensions of Man (1964)	(1911-1980) Canadian educator, philosopher and media and communication theorist	distinguishes between two kinds of medium. A cool medium 'is one in which the audience is encouraged to participate'. McLuhan considers television such a medium. A hot medium is one of such 'high definition' that the spectator is denied the chance to participate'. McLuhan considers cinema the medium which requires least effort of completion . ⁴¹ [Styan applies this distinction to theatre, considering it to be 'icy cold, since participation is essential for its existence', although there are degrees of coldness depending on the staging]. According to McLuhan, 'the effect of the form [of the medium] is not necessarily related to its content ... but will alter patterns of perception': ⁴² 'Each form of transport not only carries, but translates and transforms, the sender, the receiver, and the message. The use of any kind of medium or extension of man alters the patterns of interdependence among people, as it alters the ratios among our senses': ⁴³ '[a] work of art has no existence or function apart from its effects on human observers'. ⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conduit views of communication in which the vehicle is supposed to be neutral View of Theatre: n/r	communication	relies on the participation of the receiver	kinds of media encourage different levels of participation
'The Theatre in Society: Society in the Theatre' (1965) ⁴⁵	Jean Duvignaud French Historian	'The lights go up; the actors appear; the performance begins. It is a multiple creation – the outcome of the dramatist's purpose, the producer's style, the actors' performances and the spectator's participation. But first and foremost it is a ceremony . Everything contributes to the ceremonial aspect of the theatre – the solemnity of the place, the separation between a secular spectator and a group of actors isolated in a restricted, illuminated world, the actors' costumes, their precise gestures and the specificity of a poetic language which proclaims a basic distinction between the language of the theatre and everyday conversation'. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - ceremonial View of Theatre: positive	A place of ceremony	To create a ceremony	Doing: the practice of theatre; a collaborative art

¹ Honigsheim's writings were left largely as notes when he died in 1963. Some of the material dates from as early as 1938 and was used extensively throughout his teaching career. The writings considered here are in a compilation introduced and edited by K. Peter Etzkorn 1973, entitled Music and Society: the Later Writings of Paul Honigsheim, New York, John Wiley and Sons, pp. 201-230.

² Honigsheim 1973: 215

³ Honigsheim 1973: 225

⁴ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 452-3

⁵ Frisch 1956, Gesammelte Werke, Frankfurt, Vol 5, pt 2, p. 349; in Carlson 1984: 428.

-
- ⁶ Carlson 1984: 429
- ⁷ Excerpt reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 200-204.
- ⁸ Published in Tulane Drama Review Vol 11(3); reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 367-372.
- ⁹ In At Work with Grotowski on Physical Actions, New York, Routledge; cited in Magnat, Virginie. 2002. 'Theatricality from the Performative Perspective'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 147-166. 163.
- ¹⁰ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 494
- ¹¹ Grotowski 1998/1964: 202
- ¹² Grotowski 2008/1966: 371
- ¹³ Grotowski 2008/1966: 369
- ¹⁴ Grotowski 1998/1964: 204
- ¹⁵ Grotowski 2008/1966: 369
- ¹⁶ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 150
- ¹⁷ Grotowski 2008/1966: 372
- ¹⁸ Grotowski 2008/1966: 367-9
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 457
- ²⁰ Grotowski 1968, in Styan 1975: 150
- ²¹ Cited in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 355
- ²² Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 494
- ²³ Carlson 1984: 469; Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 493
- ²⁴ Grotowski 1969, 'External Order/Internal Intimacy', trans. George Reavez, Drama Review Vol 14(1), pp. 172-4; in Carlson 1984: 469.
- ²⁵ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 493
- ²⁶ Pageant staged a number of 'circuses' at schools in Sydney and Perth which continued over three days and involved children in a variety of experimental activities.
- ²⁷ Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 200
- ²⁸ Grotowski 2008/1966: 369
- ²⁹ Grotowski 1995 in Magnat 2002: 163
- ³⁰ Grotowski 2008/1966: 370
- ³¹ Grotowski 2008/1966: 370
- ³² Cited in Carlson 1984: 452
- ³³ Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. 74
- ³⁴ Koestler 1964: 350 cited in Ben Chaim
- ³⁵ Klapp, Orin. 1964. Symbolic Leaders: Public Dramas and Public Men. Chicago: Aldine. 8
- ³⁶ Klapp 1964: 34

³⁷ Klapp 1964: 68-75

³⁸ Klapp 1964: 254.

³⁹ Klapp 1964: 255

⁴⁰ Klapp 1964: 250

⁴¹ Styan 1975: 3

⁴² Styan 1975: 5

⁴³ McLuhan 1964, Understanding Media: the Extensions of Man, New York.91

⁴⁴ McLuhan, quoted in Beckerman, Bernard. 1979/1970. 'The Nature of Theatrical Response'. In Dynamics of Drama: Theory and Method of Analysis. New York: Drama Book Specialists, pp. 130-144.131.

⁴⁵ Reprinted in Burns and Burns 1973.

⁴⁶ Duvignaud 1973/1965: 82

Table 36/51: Theories of Theatre 1965

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
This period through to the present could be considered in terms of ‘the revenge of the performer’. Not only was ‘performance’ rediscovered, and embodiment seen to be a characteristic of theatre, but there was the rise of an overwhelming concentration on doing theatre from the point of view of the performer. Avant-garde theatre, almost always disparaging of all other forms of theatre, attempted to break down the separation of function which had become characteristic of realist theatre (and continues to be of mainstream popular theatre). Directors became performers or performers became their own writers and directors; there was a rise of ‘one-man’ shows etc. Developing alongside this was a concern with training the actor, often in ways which pushed them to risky limits which were supposed to provide them with some sense of contact with their ‘inner energies’ (there was a lot of this kind of talk about in the west in the ‘60s, and it seems to have persisted into the new century. Most of these ideas came from western understandings of eastern traditions of bodily training, so it is somewhat alarming to see them return to the east in the guise of ‘the ‘heretics’ of theatre and reappear in the experimental work of the Indian theatre group Kalakshetra Manipur.¹ Much of this experimental work and performance art thrived (at least temporarily) because of ‘soft spots’² in counter-cultures which provided a supportive environment for their experimentation. (Troyano describes one of her teachers of stand-up comedy, a ‘professional who had played comedy clubs and was hardened by the experience of hearing nightly routines full of dumb dick jokes’ as insisting that she focus on ‘how to make it to mainstream and get on [David] Letterman, rather than be contented with the ‘soft spot’ of the queer counter-culture: ‘The teacher was right – WOW [Women’s One World] was a soft spot embracing gender discourse and that was not the rest of the world. I found that out when I got a gig at the Limelight for a modelling show ... The reaction I got [as a ‘butch’ woman] ... was icy ... and left me out ... My teacher was right. She didn’t promise me a butch garden. This was the real world’³, and work like Troyano’s was not destined to succeed in it. Much of this kind of theatre plays only to its own (limited) audience. The use of the word ‘theatre’ also explodes at this point, becoming a convenient short-hand for almost anything to do with any kind of performance activity as well as its long-term use in lieu of drama.
‘Theatre Laboratory 13 Rzedow’ (1965); ‘A Sectarian Theatre’ (1969); ‘Eurasian Theatre’ (1988); ⁴ ‘Four Spectators’ (1990); The Secret Art of the Performer: A	Eugenio Barba (1936- Italian born theatre director and theorist; student of Grotowski; founder of the International School of Theatre Anthropology	Barba, a student of Grotowski, introduced the ideas of Grotowski to America. Grotowski was attempting ‘to build a new aesthetic for the theatre, to restore ... its original purity’ through the creation of a ‘modern secular ritual’ which would have nothing in common with ‘literary theatre’ (the restatement of a text which seeks to illustrate the author’s ideas). ⁵ In ‘autonomous’ theatre, the text was just one element among many, raw material to be cut and transformed. This also required a new kind of actor, the archetypical actor , who used technique to express images drawn from the collective unconscious. This meant rigorous training physically and vocally in an antinaturalistic style which forced the body to a transcendent expressiveness similar to Craig’s über-marionettes. The kind of stage required for this type of theatre was also different: smaller and more intimate, so that the spectator was made more deeply aware of the physicality and presence of the actor and forced to confront the world of the archetype ⁶ [Again, the spectator seems to frustrate the theatre practitioner so that they have to be forced to experience something!]. When Grotowski was condemned by a group of American participants in a training course in his methods for his indifference to social questions, Barba sprang to his	A social structure with traditions, conventions, institutions, habits and routines; an artistic form; a method for eliciting, channelling and disciplining reactions; a	To compose a performance in such a way that it will arouse the attention of spectators; to make the spectator experience a performing body-in-life – to generate an ‘encounter’	Doing: theatre as an activity and craft; training the artist; the director; both are spectators of a kind; performance Watching: different kinds of spectatorship require different

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology (1991); A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer (2005).		defence. The theatre could not save society, but could play a significant role in society when it is ‘an integral part of a firmly cemented social structure’, as it was in classic Greece. Modern theatre is not in this position. It should therefore explore ‘behaviour patterns’. These are neither social, political, nor religious but ‘biological reactions that spring up in extreme situations’ and theatre is a way of eliciting, channelling and disciplining these reactions.⁷ In ‘Four Spectators’, Barba argues that it is only the performance which is ephemeral, not the theatre, which has traditions, conventions, institutions, habits and routines. But performance is transformed from an ephemeral experience to a lasting one through the memory of individual spectators. Barba draws a distinction between ‘the public’ and ‘spectators’ in an attempt to account for how a performance can produce common or unanimous reactions but not ‘communion’.⁸ The public determines the success or failure of a performance (the ‘breadth’), but spectators determine the ‘depth’ of performance – enabling it to ‘take root’, thereby overcoming ephemerality. Spectators do not consume a performance; they have a dialog with the memories of it. This is an intense relationship with a performance, but it is also one of estrangement. This indicates that performances speak with many voices, and operate on many levels. A director can exploit this, producing performances which contain ‘knots’ of images so that, overall, a performance will ‘arouse the attention of every spectator’.⁹ Performance is an ‘extra-daily use of the body’ which involves technique.¹⁰ The aim of technique is to develop the capacity ‘to make the spectator experience a performing body-in-life. The actor’s main task is not to be organic, but to appear organic to the eyes and senses of the spectator For the actors, the real problem concerns the directions and methods they choose in order to build a persuasive scenic presence. If they lose the point of reference constituted by the perception of someone looking on from the outside, and only use their own sensations as a measure of judgment, they will probably soon experience their own organic quality as illusory for themselves as well’. There is ‘no direct correlation between what the actor feels and does, and what the spectator experiences ... but there can be an encounter. The efficacy of this encounter determines the meaning and the value of the theatre’.¹¹ It is only western spectators who are ‘not accustomed to leaping from one character to another in the company of the same actor’.¹² Theatre is thus conventional, and can always change. [Theatre anthropology is particularly concerned with the techniques of theatre. Shevtsova claims that theatrical	craft; a conventional art form; an encounter with a ‘performing body-in-life’		kinds of ‘conditions of meaning’; spectators do not consume a performance, they have a dialogue with the memory of it, and may experience it on at least one of three possible levels (naive; technical appreciation; knowledgeableThe audience determines the meaning of a performance. There is ‘no direct correlation between what the actor feels and does, and what the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		anthropology sees theatre as ‘the prototype of society’).¹³ For any performance, there are at least three different kinds of spectators: the audience, the actors and the director. The last two compose the performance but are not ‘masters’ of its meaning. The audience determines the meaning of a performance. The director’s role is to work with the actors to create the conditions which will allow the audience to do this. Barba identifies four different levels of spectatorship which must be satisfied in order for a performance to overcome ephemerality and gain some permanence beyond the theatre. The first level of spectatorship is childlike: the performance is taken literally. What is presented is what is seen, not what is represented. The second kind of spectatorship is a kind of instinctive seeing which Barba calls ‘kinesthetic’ and encompasses ‘the spectator who thinks s/he doesn’t understand but who, in spite of her/himself, dances’. This kind of spectator recognizes when a work is done well and is touched and energized by the craftsmanship of the performance. The third form is directorial, a knowledgeable spectatorship, one which knows the work intimately and requires the performance to generate new questions each time, otherwise it becomes bored. The director must ‘weave and tune’ these ‘basic’ spectators in the same way that the actions of the actors are woven and tuned. If this process is successful, a fourth form of spectatorship is generated: the perceptive spectator who becomes a collaborator who sees through the performance and gives it a more enduring life beyond the theatre¹⁴ [perhaps one such as Barba himself, given his interest in anthropology?]. Asian and Western theatre have a long history of influencing each other, to the extent that we should recognize a ‘Eurasian’ theatre: ‘seduction, imitation, and exchange are reciprocal’. However, ‘[e]very ethnocentricity has its eccentric pole, which reinforces it and compensates for it’. In the western tradition, the actor has become specialized both in what they do and how they do it, and there is an insistence that the meanings of the words used be understood. It is a theatre ‘sustained by logos’. The International School of Theatre Anthropology, however, allows both eastern and western theatre to locate their ‘similar principles’ as well as explore their different ways of expressing them, freeing up both – the eastern from being locked into known stories, and the west from its specialization and focus on the word. This kind of theatre ‘is necessary today’ for ‘those few [‘specific’] spectators capable of following or accompanying the actor in the dance of thought-in-action’ and for whom ‘theatre can become a necessity’. These leaves out many spectators in both east and west since ‘even the complex codes			spectator experiences ... but there can be an encounter. The efficacy of this encounter determines the meaning and the value of the theatre’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		which seem to make sense of many Oriental traditions remain unknown or little known to the majority of spectators' in Asia while 'the Western public ... is not accustomed to leaping from one character to another in the company of the same actor; ... is not accustomed to entering into a relationship with someone whose language it cannot easily decipher; ... is not used to a form of physical expression that is neither mimetic nor falls into the conventions of dance'.¹⁵ [One wonders what kind of western theatre he is talking about here. It neither seems to be the 'theatre of the minority' (avant-garde work) or popular, mainstream theatre such as The Lion King or Les Miserables – or any of the big musicals]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anthropological view of theatre View of Theatre: conventional
'The New Theatre' (1965); Happenings: An Illustrated Anthology (1965); 'An Interview with John Cage' (1965); The Art of Time: Essays on the Avant-Garde (1969); 'Manifesto of Structuralism' (1975);¹⁶ 'Structural Analysis/ Structural Theory'	Michael Kirby (1931- Editor, theorist and academic	Kirby 'was concerned with defining the structures of theatre', and using this analysis to produce theatre in which structure dominated. The aim was to design an experience for spectators which could continue to influence them after they left the theatre. Repetition was a feature of this kind of work, carried out by Kirby's group, The Structuralist Workshop. His work helped to establish the study of performance in academia.¹⁷ He defined performance as 'non-matrixed': the performer 'never behaves as if he were anyone other than himself. He never represents elements of character. He merely carries out certain actions' unlike in 'matrixed acting',¹⁸ in which the actor 'incorporates a representation aspect of a character'.¹⁹ He introduced a so-called 'New Theatre', which was meant to correspond to the abstract and objective in painting, and incorporated 'happenings', events and chance theatre. The happening was 'a new form of theatre' analogical with collage in the visual arts, a 'purposefully composed form of theatre in which diverse alogical elements, including nonmatrixed performing, are organized in a compartmental structure'.²⁰ It differed from chance theatre in that the elements of a happening were arranged in an intentional manner. Both, however, were 'brought together according to a private structural scheme of the artist' in which each unit is discrete²¹ and which virtually ignores the spectator. This kind of theatre claimed to have been influenced by the dadaists and Artaud, and had the composer John Cage, with his interest in the environment of performance and his desire to extent the boundaries of art, as its 'backbone'. The 'Manifesto' attempted to distinguish 'structuralist theatre' (which made structure dominant) from the structuralism of other types of theatre (although he	An artistic activity involving different forms which structures time	Aesthetic - the structuring of time through action and the relationships within the structure of the performance	Doing: the practice of performance Watching: The spectator experience was 'primarily sensory, dealing with relationships on the perceptual continuum of vision and hearing'. Spectators don't just 'decode'; they may interpret, or

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1976); 'Intervento' (1978); 'Nonsemiotic Performance' (1982); A Formalist Theatre (1987)		rejected any relationship between his use of the term and the work of Freud, Jung or Levi-Strauss): 'Nothing exists without structure ... There is no such thing as "structureless" theatre. There are only people who are not aware of perceiving structure'. Contrary to what the structuralists argue, '[i]n most theatre, structure is subservient' not dominant and it is aimed at making a work of art.²² In theatre what was structured most of all was time. What he was designating as structural was the kind of theatre that used 'certain structural principles' to seek its concepts and emotions.²³ These principles were elaborated in his 1976 essay. Traditional theatre emphasizes content and neglects form (manifest in visual continuity, momentum, and shape). Consequently, 'semantic elements' have tended to dominate both theory and practice. In structuralist theatre, it is 'the pure workings of the mind rather than the informational context that is significant'.²⁴ [Note: this is a very different idea of structuralism to that of Hornby 1978]. In 1978, Kirby also argued that a semiotics of theatre 'must learn to deal with actual performance'. The analysis of scripts belonged to the semiotics of literature not theatre. Meaning in performance was 'self-sufficient and does not depend on or exist in relation to a script' and just as codes may be created, they may also be consciously 'destroyed, made unspecific' or rendered meaningless in a 'nonsemiotic performance' such as that described under his idea of 'structuralist theatre'.²⁵ A communication model lies behind all semiotic analysis. Structuralist performances were inaccessible to this approach because they were not about meanings or information but about the relationships among them. Meanings and information in this kind of theatre are 'raw material', like the sound and images. The spectator experience was 'primarily sensory, dealing with relationships on the perceptual continuum of vision and hearing. The spectator did not 'decode' but engaged at most in the more open-ended process of interpretation.²⁶ This thinking is akin to deconstructionism, which was beginning to be applied by French critics in the early 1980s.²⁷ Kirby categorised spectator involvement as figurative, token, and processional participation. In the first, 'the audience is acknowledged and forms part of the mise-en-scene'. In the second, spectators are given token involvement by being asked to perform certain unimportant activities which belong to the performance. The third limits the role to procession or parade or 'passive walking'.²⁸ Controlled verbal reaction, which is very close to non-participation but frequently proves sufficient for some critics to classify a show as a participatory event, involves prescribed responses			simply experience; they may take up different forms of participation according to what is offered to them, some of which are illusory

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		from the auditorium with an anticipated content allowing for the undisturbed continuation of a performance. It represents the most treacherous case of illegitimate participation as it deludes the spectators into believing that they are involved in an artistic activity. Although partly subverting the spectator's passive voyeurism, such involvement is primarily illusory and manipulative. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – ‘New Theatre’ View of Theatre: aesthetic
‘An Interview with John Cage’ (1965)	John Cage (1912-1992) American avant-garde composer, author and critic	Theatre should resist intentionality because it represents an attempt to impose an idea on the public, and leads to the control and focus of traditional theatre. The artist must aim ‘outside himself, at an experience as open and undirected’ as possible.²⁹ Theatre should be seen simply as ‘something which engages both the eye and the ear’ so that one can ‘view everyday life itself as theatre’. The only exemption is the totally private experience, since theatre must always be a ‘public occasion’.³⁰ [Life is theatre] ‘Theatre takes place all the time wherever one is, and art simply facilitates persuading one this is the case’.³¹ Cage defines theatre as ‘something which engages both the eye and the ear. The two public senses are seeing and hearing ... The reason I want to make my definition of theatre that simple is so that one could view everyday life itself as theatre I think of theatre as an occasion involving any number of people, but not just one’.³² A theatrical occasion should be as unstructured as possible in order to stimulate the spectator into structuring their own experience of the occasion.³³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - anti-conventional art View of Theatre: positive	A public occasion, which ‘engages’ eye and ear so that everyday public life comes to be seen as theatre	To engage the eye and the ear: to allow each spectator to generate their own unique experience	Doing: the practice of theatre
The New American Arts (1965); The Theatre of Mixed Means (1968)	Richard Kostelanetz (1940- American artist, author and critic	In 1965, Kostelanetz considered the kind of experimentation going on in The New Theatre and elsewhere was ‘already exhausted’. However, by 1968, he felt a new movement which was moving beyond happenings in a more general and significant way was in progress. Here, drama and other related arts were no longer being integrated in a traditional manner, but being allowed to develop independently, each being ‘used for its own possibilities’. He proposed a kind of continuum of spectatorship, ranging from full participation to mere observation. Happenings were the most open form of this new kind of theatre, featuring a vague script allowing flexibility of space and time and full participation by all present. Kinetic environments were more restrictive, with space more specifically defined and the behaviour of participants or components more precisely planned. Staged happenings defined the space still more and made a clear division between spectator and performers, encouraging observation rather than participation.	A practice; a movement	Flexibility; full participation	Doing: the practice of theatre Watching: spectatorship on a continuum ranging from full participant to mere observer

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Finally, staged performances were completely planned and carried out before and observing spectator. They were close to traditional theatre, but rejected its emphasis on the spoken word, thoroughly mixing ‘the media of communication’, and often featuring no words at all. The performers also did not assume characters; they either remained themselves or acted as ‘neutral agents’ of the performance.³⁴ The emphasis was on experience rather than ideas, and on spatial perception rather than linear perception and the process of creation rather than a final product. This approach requires new questions to be asked by the critic, for example: ‘how well a particular piece articulates and enhances the situation – time, space, and elements – it chooses for itself’. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
The Impossible Theatre: A Manifesto (1965); Blooded Thought (1982); ‘Universals of Performance; or, Amortizing Play’ (1983/1989); ‘Ideology and Performance’ (1983); ‘The Audition of Dream and Events’ (1987);³⁵ The Eye of Prey:	Herbert Blau (1926- American playwright, director and scholar of performance theory	Blau condemned all contemporary American theatre (mainstream, commercial and experimental) as essentially ‘a strong-hold of non-ideas’³⁷ which evaded or minimised the dangers and conflicts of the period, and thus failed to fulfil its true role as the ‘Public Art of Crisis’ (something he was still doing in 2001). In particular it should be a forum for the suppressed or ignored civic and civil side of man.³⁸ Theatre should ‘pit its imagination, courage, and joy against the outrages humanity commits upon itself, looking beyond the immediate divisions and popular causes to the often less immediate goals of universal humanity and brotherhood. The same aspect of the theatre that constantly tempts it to compromise [its publicness] is also the cause of its greatest potential power: that it is the most public of all the arts, the art which must therefore function ‘at the dead center of community.’³⁹ The 1980s writings of Blau represent the most thorough development of postmodern thinking on the theatre, ‘begin[ning] where Féral ends’.⁴⁰ His previous concern with drama as a socially relevant ensemble art is replaced by a concern ‘with the basic process of theatre and of performance and its relation to the consciousness of the individual actor and spectator’. He also sees performance as ‘the realm of displacement, libidinal flows, and desire’, but he does not accept Artaud’s and Féral’s suggestion that performance offered ‘the opportunity for experience uncontaminated by the signification and codification of “theatre”’:⁴¹ ‘There is nothing more illusory in performance than the illusion of the unmediated. It is a very powerful illusion in the theatre, but it is theatre, and it is theatre, the truth of illusion, which haunts all performance, whether or not it occurs in the theatre’.⁴² Blau argues that the pursuit of unmediated experience has led to a rejection of theatre in favour of performance, but has still been a failure because there is	A seeing place; a ‘Public Art of Crisis’; a forum for the civic and civil side of man; a social humanistic commitment to the dangers and conflicts of the time	The creation of an illusion through representation	Doing: the practice of theatre - Showing: theatre shows an infinite chain of representation ; an illusion Watching: the spectator is essential to theatre and performance whether in the head of the performer or external to the performer (although Blau’s writings tend

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Subversions of the Postmodern (1987); The Audience (1990); 'Limits of Performance: The Insane Root' (2001) ³⁶		something in the nature of both theatre and performance which 'implies no first time, no origin, but only recurrence and reproduction'.⁴³ Yet, 'there is something in the nature of theatre which from the very beginning of theatre has always resisted being theatre',⁴⁴ and which encourages the never-to-be-realized dream of a realized original experience instead of the re-presentation of performance'.⁴⁵ 'Performance is a testament to what separates', with the performer 'on the site of the Other'.⁴⁶ This is the only aspect of performance which 'crosses' cultures. 'Theatre makes present, but makes what present?' is, according to Blau, the central question of performance,⁴⁷ but the one question which cannot be answered. The most theory can do is to try and capture 'the dynamics of that creative instant when what is not becomes what is, born into reality with a memory of what it was before'.⁴⁸ 'The theatre is the place where nothing is being transacted except ... an infinite chain of representation',⁴⁹ something Artaud went mad trying to overcome, and the extremes of performance art are still striving for.⁵⁰ 'There is something in the very nature of performance which ... implies ... only recurrence and reproduction ... what is universal in performance is the consciousness of performance',⁵¹ and this is why theatre underlies all performance. There is always, in any performance, 'the universal question, spoken or unspoken, of what are we performing for?' Current ideas about performance as opposed to theatre are 'anti-theatrical'.⁵² Despite the current desire of performance to 'efface' itself of anything theatrical you cannot collapse the distance between performer and spectator without destroying theatre itself: 'it is of the nature of performance to be seen'.⁵³ ... 'even when appearance is imagined as absent, it is appearance that dominates the idea of performance'. There is nothing which can cross the gap which makes the performer 'the Other',⁵⁴ which is why one can 'always want to see' what the actors are going to do, even if you know that they are out of control, no longer acting, and that it is your role as director to stop it before somebody gets hurt. [Blau demonstrates that there is a kind of scopophilia involved in directing actors in that you are encouraging them to push themselves to the limit so you can see what will happen – and then you want them to do it again, whatever it is].⁵⁵ Blau complains about 'the bewildering plenitude of performance',⁵⁶ which sees theatre everywhere. The 'valorization of play in the postmodern' has led us to take 'with considerable seriousness the theatrical notion that all the space of the world is a stage. All this does is 'thin theatre out, so that it has had to learn again how to be theatre, in the right proportions with performance'. What			to suggest the privileged spectator of the director: 'I really wanted to see it, you always want to see it';⁷¹ watching is a form of cruelty, however, spectators are always subject to power, because 'given a chance' they will always 'be wrong'.⁷² Audiences are constructed through the performance but the characteristic predicament of theatre is that it may be

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		we lose is any possibility of performance being exemplary partly because we have lost the ability to discriminate between what is performance and what is not. This is a discrimination which we learn culturally ‘through performance’.⁵⁷ However, at the extreme end of performance there is the same question which arises in contact sports like football – the question of who is in control ‘now’. The point of performance (any performance, but especially the more extreme kinds of performance art) is the ‘dubious peril just this side of a loss of control’.⁵⁸ At the limit of performance ‘doing the impossible, or nearly so, remains a constant dream’ of both actors and director. Generally this is seen as an overcoming of the body: in theatre this dream ‘always returns to the susceptible thing itself, the unaccommodated body that at any performative moment may really lose control, as in something so elemental as a case of stage fright ... the latency of any performance’. While part of the training of the actor is to find ways to manage this, it is also clear from Blau that there is a thrill for observers in seeing actors tread this fine line at the limits of their control: ‘the vicissitudes of control are endemic to the art of acting’. ‘You’ (the director, the observer) ‘always want more, more, but how far do you go ... before somebody does get hurt’, especially when ‘I really wanted to see it, you always want to see it’ that moment just before control is lost.⁵⁹ [That this is a perennial concern for directors can be seen as far back as the Romans! And the question must be why anyone should think that they ought to see it just because they want to and get a thrill from the danger to others. What Blau is demonstrating is the cruelty which can be involved in watching. He is aware of this, as his reflections in The Eye of Prey indicate. Blau, like so many, works against a theatre which he sees as moribund – ‘woeful ... institutionally, aesthetically, in every conceivable way’.⁶⁰ The form of risk-taking he wants to encourage in his actors is designed to overcome this]. Although he sees ‘a virtually irremediable split between art and politics’,⁶¹ he remains ‘messianic about the theater ... in it to create the possibility of a valid public life, to save the world in fact’.⁶² In The Audience, Blau ‘uses the concept of the audience as an “heuristic principle” to reflect “upon recent cultural history in relation to performance as an activity of cognition”⁶³ because ‘how we think about an audience is a function of how we think about ourselves, social institutions, epistemological processes, what is knowable, what not, and how, if at all, we may accommodate the urge for collective experience’.⁶⁴ For Blau, spectators are ‘unreliable’ – ‘neither as singular, nor as single-minded, as a swarm			both seen and heard’ ⁷³ and that how these will be taken by an audience cannot really be controlled

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of bees’ – but constitute ‘the characteristic predicament of theatre – that it may be both seen and heard’⁶⁵ and that how these will be taken by an audience cannot really be controlled. Audiences are not an entity ‘to begin with but a consciousness constructed’ as ‘a body of thought and desire’ in the course of the performance.⁶⁶ An audience is ‘what happens’ in theatre.⁶⁷ In tackling the ‘participation mystique’ and its relation to criticisms and concerns over representation which has developed since the 1960s, Blau suggests ‘that whatever the virtues of participation, the virtue of theater remains in the activity of perception, where participation is kept at a distance and – though it has come to be thought a vice – representation has its rites’.⁶⁸ Part of this recognition involves raising questions of power. We need to ‘ask ourselves who is deciding, for whom, where, with what information, acquired how’ so that ‘an important aspect of postmodern performance [can] become the determination of degrees of identity, access and drift the spectator is allowed’.⁶⁹ It may well be that theory too, is ‘a masque’, but ‘the image of the face torn with trying to get [the mask] off – one of the heroic mimes of modernism – is preferable as an illusion to the postmodern one that takes the mask for granted and thinks it can laugh it off’ by reducing everything to mere appearance. ‘That illusion is attached to a certain negligence of thought’ which forgets that play can be ‘just about as deadly as the ideological habits it replaces’, and which ignores ‘the degree to which [postmodern theory] displaces the militancy [of radical activism] into theory’.⁷⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-postmodern theories View of Theatre: positive
‘Theatre and Reality’ (1965) ⁷⁴	Eric Capon English director	All theatre is about ‘recognizable reality’ in some way, but it ‘see-saws between an established convention both in acting and setting’ and ‘a sudden return to more recognizable reality’.⁷⁵ This is what Aristotle meant by imitation: theatre displayed some aspect of life which spectators of the time recognized as a statement about reality. This could be surface reality in which recognition operates at the level of things such as clothing and door handles, or inner reality. In modern theatre, there have been/are three kinds of inner reality on display: psychological reality (Stanislawski), sociological reality (Brecht) and metaphysical reality (Artaud). Some of the nominated theorists would of course reject the realism label, but Capon argues that ‘reality’ can take many forms, from the ritualistic, presentational forms of early theatre, to the intellectual experiences of French neo-classicism or Brecht’s sociological realism to Artaud’s deeply emotional and metaphysical ‘Theatre of Cruelty’: ‘It is possible ... to consider theatrical reality as an	A composite art form	Creating a recognizable reality via imitation using the living human body	Doing: the practice of theatre (a primitive art) Showing: a recognizable reality

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		embracing concept including both a social and ... an unconscious reality [with] psychological reality' somewhere in the middle. '[T]he raw material of theatre is the live human being'. Theatre is 'a very primitive art ... because it is so primitive it frequently demonstrates unmistakably general aesthetic principles which become shadowy in the other arts'. '[T]he true reality of the theatre is clearly one that in embracing every art can cover the greatest range of experience. It may lack subtlety but not breadth'. ⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: conventional
'Vers l'éphémère panique' (1965)	Alexandro Jodorowsky (1930- Mexican dramatist and co-founder of théâtre panique)	Ephemerality was always considered a problem for theatre, but is in fact its essence. The misguided attempt to force theatre to become permanent had led to an emphasis on text rather than on life, on mechanical repetition rather than improvisation and on fixed settings and architectural spaces. The panique actor 'improvises and immerses himself in the perishable'. Words are subordinated to gestures, and arise only as spontaneous expression of experience. The actor neither loses himself in a character nor shows himself beneath the character but instead seeks his own 'true mode of expression' becoming not a 'lying exhibitionist' but a 'poet in a state of trance', a 'creative athlete'. ⁷⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –performance as an art View of Theatre: ambivalent	An ephemeral art	Artistic expression	Doing: improvised self-expression by the actor/artist
'Art as Technique' (1965)	Victor Shklovsky Russian Formalist	'Art exists that one may recover the sensation of life; it exists to make one feel things, to make the stone stony : The purpose of art is to impart the sensation of things as they are perceived and not as they are known. The technique of art is to make objects "unfamiliar", to make forms difficult, to increase the difficulty and length of perception because the process of perception is an aesthetic end in itself and must be prolonged. Art is a way of experiencing the artfulness of an object; the object is not important '. ⁷⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - formalism View of Theatre: functional	An art form	To make something seem unfamiliar	Doing: art is a process

¹ See Kanhailal, Heisnam 2004, 'Ritual Theatre (Theatre of Transition)', Theatre India: National School of Drama's Theatre India, 10(Nov), pp. 3-16; reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 550-4 (in Table 49).

² Troyano, Alina 2008/2000, 'I, Carmelita Tropicana', in Krasner 2008: 525

³ Troyano 2008/2000: 525

⁴ Published in TDR Vol 32(3); reprinted in Krasner 2008: 455-459

⁵ Barba 1965, in Tulane Drama Review Vol 9(3), p. 154; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 455.

-
- ⁶ Carlson 1984: 456
- ⁷ Barba 1969, 'A Sectarian Theatre', Drama Review Vol 14(1), p. 57; in Carlson 1984: 469.
- ⁸ Barba, Eugenio. 1990. 'Four Spectators'. TDR (1988-) 34 (1) pp. 96-101.97
- ⁹ Barba 1990: 97
- ¹⁰ Barba, Eugenio, and Nicola Savarese. 2005. A Dictionary of Theatre Anthology: The Secret Art of the Performer. Translated by R. Fowler. London and New York: Routledge. 5
- ¹¹ Barba, Eugenio, and Nicola Savarese. 2005: 206-7
- ¹² Barba, Eugenio, and Nicola Savarese. 2005: 104
- ¹³ Maria Shevtsova 1989, 'The Sociology of the Theatre, Part Two: Theoretical Achievements', New Theatre Quarterly 5, pp. 180-194.
- ¹⁴ Barba 1990: 100
- ¹⁵ Barba, Eugenio, and Nicola Savarese. 2005:457-9
- ¹⁶ Reprinted in Krasner 2008: 400.
- ¹⁷ Krasner 2008: 399
- ¹⁸ Kirby, Michael 1987, A Formalist Theatre, University of Pennsylvania Press: 5
- ¹⁹ Krasner 2008: 399
- ²⁰ Kirby 1965, Happenings, New York, pp. 11-13, 21; in Carlson 1984: 457.
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 457
- ²² Kirby 2008/1975: 400; 1976: 61
- ²³ Kirby 1975, 'Manifesto of Structuralism', Drama Review Vol 19(4); in Carlson 1984: 490.
- ²⁴ Kirby 1976, 'Structural Analysis/Structural Theory', Drama Review Vol 20(4), in Carlson 1984: 490.
- ²⁵ Kirby 1978, 'Invervento', Versus Vol 21, p. 38; in Carlson 1984: 503. This was the first of two special editions of Versus edited by De Marinis and devoted to a consideration of the semiotics of theatre.
- ²⁶ Kirby 1982, in Modern Drama Vol. 21, p. 110.
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 503
- ²⁸ Lorek-Jezinska, Edyta 2002. 'Audience activating techniques and their educational efficacy'. Applied Theatre Research 3 (4 Article 6) www.gu.edu.au/centre/cpci/atr/journal/number4_article6.htm.
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 458
- ³⁰ Kirby and Richard Schechner 1965, 'An Interview with John Cage', Tulane Drama Review Vol 10(2), p. 51; in Carlson 1984: 458.
- ³¹ John Cage, cited in Gilman, Richard 1969, The Confusion of Realms, New York, Vantage Books.
- ³² Cage 1965: 50-51 in Schechner 1994: xxii
- ³³ Cage quoted in Schechner 1994: 66
- ³⁴ Kostelanetz 1968, The Theatre of Mixed Means, New York, pp. 4,7, 281; in Carlson 1984: 461.
- ³⁵ Published in Drama Review Vol 31(3) 1987, pp. 59-73; discussed in Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.79.
- ³⁶ Originally published in P. Campbell and A. Kear (eds) 2001, Psychoanalysis and Performance, London, Routledge; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 533-538.

-
- ³⁷ Blau, Herbert 1965, The Impossible Theatre: A Manifesto, New York, p.7 in Carlson 1984: 513
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 466
- ³⁹ Blau 1965: 309 in Carlson 1984: 513
- ⁴⁰ Carlson 1984: 513
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 513
- ⁴² Blau 1989, 'Universals of Performance; or, Amortizing Play', in Richard Schechner and Willa Appel (eds), By Means of Performance: Intercultural Studies of Theatre and Ritual, Cambridge UK., Cambridge University Press, pp. 253.
- ⁴³ Blau 1989: 258
- ⁴⁴ Blau 1989: 253
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 514
- ⁴⁶ Blau 1989: 261
- ⁴⁷ Blau 1982, 'Look What Thy Memory Cannot Contain', in Blooded Thought, New York, p. 93; in Carlson 1984: 515.
- ⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 515
- ⁴⁹ Blau 2008/2001: 537
- ⁵⁰ Blau 2008/2001
- ⁵¹ Blau 1989: 259
- ⁵² Blau 1989: 262-3
- ⁵³ Blau 1989: 255
- ⁵⁴ Blau 1989: 268
- ⁵⁵ Blau 2008/2001: 536-7
- ⁵⁶ Blau 1989: 266
- ⁵⁷ Blau 1989: 265-71
- ⁵⁸ Blau 2008/2001: 534
- ⁵⁹ Blau 2008/2001: 536-7
- ⁶⁰ Blau 2008/2001: 534
- ⁶¹ Blau, Herbert. 1987. The Eye of Prey: Subversions of the Postmodern. Edited by K. Woodward. Vol. 9, Theories in Contemporary Culture. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 68
- ⁶² Blau 1982: 31; 1987: 205; also in Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 79
- ⁶³ Blau 1990: 28 in Gingrich-Philbrook, Craig. 1997. 'The Unnatural Performative: Resisting Phenomenal Closure (Review Essay)'. Text and Performance Quarterly 17 123-133. 90
- ⁶⁴ Blau, Herbert. 1990. The Audience. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 28
- ⁶⁵ Gingrich-Philbrook 1992: 90
- ⁶⁶ Blau 1990: 25
- ⁶⁷ Blau 1990: 221

⁶⁸ Blau 1990: 381

⁶⁹ Blau 1990: 333

⁷⁰ Blau 1987: 203-4

⁷¹ Blau 2008/2001: 537

⁷² Blau 1987: 189

⁷³ Blau 1987: 190

⁷⁴ Capon, Eric. 1965. 'Theatre and Reality'. British Journal of Aesthetics 5 (3) pp. 261-269.

⁷⁵ Capon 1965: 263

⁷⁶ Capon 1965: 267-9

⁷⁷ Carlson 1984: 459

⁷⁸ Shklovsky 1965: 12, quoted in States, Bert O. 2008/1985. 'The World on Stage'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 441-447.442; originally published in Russian Formalist Criticism: Four Essays, University of Nebraska Press.

Table 37/51: Theories of Theatre 1966-1967

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'The Theatre of the Ridiculous' (1966)	Ronald Tavel (1941- Playwright and member of the American Theatre of the Ridiculous	The Theatre of the Ridiculous shared with théâtre panique a 'fascination with the outrageous and the extreme and with sexual and artistic perversity'. ¹ Its proponents rejected theory, claiming it was the only 'non-academic' avant-garde theatre. It also emphasised a focus on 'the antiesthetic products of mass and popular culture' [a kind of back-hand recognition of the elite basis of most theatre, particularly avant-garde theatre). It was influenced by art nouveau , pop, camp and psychedelic art [despite its claim to mass and popular culture]. It rejected naturalism and absurdity, seeking to build 'word and emotive associations' from the detritus of the contemporary world, while emphasising the nonverbal and 'the emancipation of subliminal impulses' (an influence of Artaud) in order to release the consciousness from the 'trap of words' and from the limitations imposed on it by politics and religion. Purpose of theorist: polemic – anti-text/anti-theory View of Theatre: positive	A performed art	To break through the limitations imposed on man by art's competitors, politics and religion	Doing: performance released from the dominance of words Showing: the outrageous and the extreme
'The Living Theatre in Exile' (1966) ²	Saul Gottlieb Founder, San Francisco Mime Troupe	Noted that theatre had begun to be considered as a forum for political statement, possibly even a political weapon, stimulated by the growing uneasiness with American involvement in Vietnam. ³ Purpose of theorist: polemic – anti-establishment View of Theatre: functional	A forum	Political dissent	Doing: theatre as a practice
'Guerilla Theatre' (1966) ⁴	R.C. Davis Director, San Francisco Mime Troupe	Entirely concerned with drama as political action. Reiterated Brecht's claim that the only way for art not to be political is for it to support the ruling powers [a claim which overlooks the way the political nature of such theatre becomes invisible rather than disappears!]. Theatre was challenged on both social and artistic grounds to 'teach, direct toward change, and be itself an example of change'. The way to do this is analogous to guerilla warfare: align the theatre with the populace, struggle always for a more just new order, choose the fighting ground carefully and never engage the enemy head on. While Brecht provided a useful guide, American theatre must find its own way of political action. In one example of political action Mime Troupe members called themselves 'Art and Propaganda' teams, and moved out among the populace in the parks and streets [a merging of theatre and political activity]. ⁵ Purpose of theorist: polemic – political action View of Theatre: functional	A social and political practice	Teaching, directing toward change	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: an example of change
'The Revolutionary	Le Roi Jones aka Amiri Baraka	Wilson and Goldfarb describe Baraka as 'possibly the most controversial African American playwright of the 1960's'. ⁶ His work was prolific, provocative, and	A vehicle for political	Political dissent	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Theatre' (1966); The Motion of History (1978)	(1934- Black American playwright, poet, novelist, musicologist, essayist, critic, editor; founder of the Spirit House Movers and Players	experimental in style (allegorical, lyrical, ritualistic). Baraka was greatly influenced by the work of Brecht. ⁷ All theatre has a political and/or social message, though the dominant classes that control the establishment theatre always deny this. Broadway is 'a theatre of reaction whose ethics, like its aesthetics, reflect the spiritual values of this unholy society'. The new Revolutionary Theatre is to be a Theatre of Victims. It must be anti-Western, and expose the real horror and oppression which is hidden by traditional theatre. Its purpose is to destroy the white establishment and 'whatever they believe is real'. ⁸ This revolutionary impetus suffered a sharp decline in the 1970's, something Baraka attributed to 'the willingness of many to avoid the challenge and to be assimilated instead into the established socioeconomic mainstream'. ⁹ [As always, spectators are a disappointing lot for revolutionaries which raises the possibility that one can only get them to rise up collectively through the use of sustained manipulation]. Baraka turned to Mao Tse-tung's demand for the unity of politics and art, arguing for a change in the entire class structure of America. Plays written with this Marxist-Leninist revolutionary theme, however, proved less successful and harder to get published than his earlier radical plays which merely challenged white racism. ¹⁰ Purpose of theorist: polemic – anti-traditional theatre View of Theatre: functional	dissent		Watching: (spectators could become disaffected; not necessarily interested in revolution)
Modern Tragicomedy (1966)	Karl Guthke (1933- Professor of German art and cultural history	The blend of tragedy and comedy is a new, distinct genre, since the two blend to create a unified if contradictory mood. ¹¹ [He seems oblivious to the experimental work going on around him!] Purpose of theorist: literary analysis View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: tragicomedy (literature)
Modern Tragedy (1966); Drama from Ibsen to Brecht (1968); ¹² Marxism and Literature (1977)	Raymond Williams (1921-1988) British Marxist cultural theorist and literary critic	Dismisses as narrow and historically biased the belief that modern dramatists cannot produce tragedy because the modern view of order and disorder is no longer defined in religious or institutional terms. 'Contemporary life may not hold fate in the same regard, but our fears warrant tragic consequences [and] the issue of instability remains'. ¹³ Modern drama was conventional, although this is often difficult to see the closer we are to it. Convention 'is basic to any understanding of drama as a form'. ¹⁴ We judge a convention in relation to art 'not by its abstract usefulness' and 'not by referring it to some ultimate criterion of probability, but rather by what it manages ... to get done'. All works begin from 'that age's tradition' – 'absolute freedom of choice is not available: a dramatist must win the consent of his audience to any particular means that he wishes to	A conventional art form; an institution	Persuasion	Doing: drama (literature); playwrighting Watching: dramatist and spectator (or at least some spectators) must share a 'structure of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		employ ... even if the audience is sympathetic, too great a consciousness of the novelty or strangeness of the means may as effectively hamper the full communication of a play as would open hostility'. Effective changes to conventions take place 'when there [is] already a latent willingness to accept them, at least among certain groups in society', although this 'structure of feeling', which is what allows for the relationship between individual achievement and social context, may not be apparent at the time.¹⁵ At any one time there will be three influences at work in interpretation: the dominant, the residual and the emergent. The dominant represents 'the hegemonic forces of capitalism which are strongest at any one time',¹⁶ and will have the most influence at the time. The residual are forces which were dominant in the past but have weakened, although still influential and the emergent represents the those forces which are emerging but are not yet full strength. Any work of culture will combine all three influences.¹⁷ Fortier considers this a more nuanced Marxist approach.¹⁸ Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: conventional			feeling' for the 'full communication' of a play. Generally this takes the form of shared conventions but may include a 'latent willingness' to accept something different.
Publikums- besch- impfung (1966); 'Horváth ist besser' (1968); 'Strassentheater und Theatertheater' ['Street- theatre and Theatre- theatre'] (1968);	Peter Handke (1942 German experimental dramatist	Unlike most contemporary experimental work, Handke foregrounded the text, influenced by Wittgenstein's view of language as the basis of reality. He rejected illusion and empathy, and insisted on the experience of immediate reality, as in John Cage, although this experiential awareness was to come through words rather than images. His speaking-plays subjected its spectators to harangues, insults and philosophic speculation in an attempt to make the spectator 'conscious that they are there, that they exist'.¹⁹ He told his performers that the audience could not be taken for granted because it did not yet exist – it had to be created/create itself through the performance.²⁰ Handke considered Brecht's work as 'trivial': the presentation of clear problems with simple solutions which bore no relationship to the complexity of real life: 'Not one settled soul did he unsettle, to however many he surely provided a couple of beautiful hours'.²¹ Brecht also confused the nature of theatre with that of political action. 'A politically engaged theatre cannot remain in the theatre but must confront real life – in the streets, the factories, the schools – with disruptive actions that reveal the falsity and idyllicism of that life. This attack was echoed by other dramatists of the time such as Kroetz (1971). When theatre remains in the	A place for experiment- ation and play; a form of play	To make the spectator conscious that they exist; discovery; play; to encourage sensitivity and self- awareness	Doing: drama Watching: subjection to an imposed experience; play

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Interview (1969); Note to Der Ritt über den Bodensee (1970)		theatre, it is in the domain of play and self-discovery but not of social change. The function of theatre in the theatre is to develop ‘the inner, hidden rooms of play in the spectator’, and, through the encouragement of greater sensitivity and self-awareness, to aid the spectator’s ‘coming into the world’.²² What made Handke’s theatre different from that of the past was that it sought to make the spectator ‘aware of the theatre world, not of the world outside the theatre’. Theatrical objects have a special mode of existence, whose function is to demonstrate the wide range of practical, symbolic and scenic functions they can be ‘good for’. Drama seeks to prove nothing. Actors, objects and language are presented as a ‘free play of powers’.²³ Purpose of theorist: polemic – theatricality View of Theatre: conventional
‘Manifeste’ (1966); ‘Entretien’ (1971); ‘Le petit héros populaire’ (1975)	André Benedetto Director of the Nouvelle Compagnie d’Avignon	The French director most prominently associated with the convergence of theatre and political action in the late 1960s.²⁴ Contemporary theatre was an instrument ‘to put consciousness to sleep’ so that the world seemed to be unalterable. Hence ‘traditional culture and the classics’, in supporting the prevailing ideology, ‘make up the most formidable enterprise of alienation, degradation, and reconciliation of irreconcilables ever conceived by any society up to the present’.²⁵ Reform is impossible in such a situation, so ‘meaningful’ theatre must become subversive and revolutionary, not in direct political action but by drawing together the divergent elements in the revolutionary process and focusing them on ‘the common enemy, the dominant ideology’.²⁶ Benedetto, like Gatti, renounced traditional theatre spaces, language and characterization. He formed a fairly stable group of actors, each of whom were working to ‘reveal himself to his utmost possible limit’ rather than create characters. Benedetto claimed that the popular spectator (Le petit héros populaire) liked this approach. They were a more critical spectator than the traditional spectator. They did not project themselves onto characters, but observed and judged, demanding to know ‘why things go the way they are shown, why actions are thus and not otherwise’.²⁷	A place; a tool of the prevailing ideology	Political action	Doing: theatre practice Showing: possible ways of subversion and revolution Watching: spectators differed according to the kind of theatre they were watching: traditional audiences identified with characters; popular

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of theorist: polemic – anti-traditional theatre View of Theatre: functional			spectators observed, judged and questioned what they saw
‘The Theatre of Cruelty and the Closure of Representation’ (1966); ²⁸ ‘La parole soufflée’ (1967)	Jacques Derrida (1930-2004) Literary and cultural critic; philosopher	Deconstruction is ‘a sceptical approach to the possibility of coherent meaning’. ²⁹ It was initiated by Derrida in the Introduction to his 1962 translation of Husserl’s Origin of Geometry . The process of deconstruction aims to show how an author’s ostensible message is undermined by other aspects of its presentation. ³⁰ It tries to avoid the tendency of structuralism and semiotics ‘to settle upon stable, self-authenticating, definitive meanings or systems of meanings’. Derrida specifically challenges the Saussurian assumption that a system of primary reality, a signifying system, lies behind individual manifestations of speech or writing. Primary reality is itself derived, conditioned by prior structures. Derrida applies deconstruction in two essays on Artaud. For Derrida, Artaud’s vision is ‘paradoxical’ because its achievement would not mean the fulfillment of theatre but its erasure. The theatre of cruelty is an attempt to capture ‘pure presence’ but such a thing is not possible in theatre, which has always been a repetition, albeit ‘an endless and impossible attempt to recapture a lost and endlessly deferred presence’. ³¹ ‘To create a theatre without representation is to situate the theatre outside consciousness. Representation is the doubling (reflecting, mimesis, repetition) that Artaud seeks to overcome. Yet, in circumventing representation, theatre loses its moorings as a spatio-temporal event, becoming a concept solely of the mind’. ³² Derrida claimed that ‘so many directors wish to be acknowledged as Artaud’s heirs’ without actually understanding what Artaud was trying to do, or acknowledging that what he was trying to do was paradoxical. Essentially the theatre of cruelty was attempting to expel God in the form of the author-creator of the text on which the theatrical representation was to be based from the stage. It was an attempt to overcome the ‘tyranny of the text’ which caused the director to ‘play second fiddle to the author’. ³³ This was ‘a stage which does nothing but illustrate a discourse’ and was a perversion of theatre, which was a reality in its own right (like Plato’s Forms) and of which man was just a pale imitation. [Rather than collapsing theatre into life, then, perhaps Artaud was trying to collapse life into theatre.	An artistic form; a spatio-temporal event; a reality in its own right	Representation through repetition	Doing: theatre practice (especially Theatre of Cruelty)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Unfortunately his ideas have generated a desire to collapse theatre into life in his 'heirs' who have misunderstood this idea of theatre as the pure form which men imitate. What Artaud seemed to be trying to achieve was the kind of theatre (the mise-en-scene) which offered a glimpse of this purity, which seemed to be to do with 'presence': in theatre we could be in the 'pure presence' of ourselves?]. Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
'Approaches to Theory/ Criticism' (1966); 'The Politics of Ecstasy' (1968); Public Domain (1968); '6 Axioms for Environmental Theatre' (1968);³⁴ 'Performance and the Social Sciences' (1973); 'Drama, Script, Theatre and Performance' (1973); 'From Ritual to Theatre and Back' (1974)	Richard Schechner (1934- American theorist, director and educator, founder of The Performance Group (1968-1980)	In 1966, Schechner called for 'a reexamination of the theories of the Cambridge anthropologists' because their work, although 'brilliant and insightful'³⁷ was 'no longer suited to our perceptions of theatre'.³⁸ What was needed was an extension of this work, a 'broader anthropological view of the interrelationship of all of man's public performance activities ... play, games, sport, theatre and ritual'.³⁹ He recommended the inclusion into theatre studies of the work of social scientists such as Huizinga (play), Martin Shubik (mathematical game analysis), Eric Berne (transactional game analysis 1967) and Erving Goffman (performance in everyday life) [turning the metaphor back on itself]. In particular, Berne's transactional analysis suggested a new approach to acting: acting as transformation. Art in its original and 'proper' form is communal, socially constructive, and transcendent or ecstatic [as in ritual]. Unfortunately it has become individualistic and commercialized, practiced by artists who – like workers – sell their talent 'by the piece or by the hour'.⁴⁰ 'Since we cannot simply re-create the traditional theatre of societies unlike our own, we must seek ritual roots accessible to all cultures'. These roots express 'the essential sense of community' and require dedicated groups such as his Performance Group to discover them [a community rediscovering community!]. The overlap between theatre and life continued to absorb Schechner, particularly through the influence of anthropologist Victor Turner. In '6 Axioms' he proposed that theatrical events should be ranged along a 'continuum', ranging 'from public occasions and demonstrations, through happenings and environmental theatre, to traditional theatre. Each overlaps others and weaves together social transactions, creating ... a network of expectations and obligations'. He argued for an openness in approach, and 'the freedom of production elements to speak for themselves', a rejection of traditional space and a predetermined text, as well as 'the moving of the performers into the real world and space of the spectator':⁴¹ 'What if the audience and the actors were to enter through the same door at the same time? What if all the equipment of the theatre ...	A specific event enacted by performers which is relational – it entails relations among performers; among spectators; between performers and spectators; the set of gestures used by the performers.	Theatre – the performance of a specific set of repeatable, doubled gestures; inclusion; to teach through experience rather than precept; to disillusion⁶¹	Doing: performance Watching: the division between performers and spectators is artificial and should be collapsed

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
in Ritual, Play and Performance (1976); 'Towards a Poetics of Performance' (1975) in Essays on Performance Theory 1970-1976 (1977);³⁵ Performative Circumstances from the Avant Garde to Ramlila (1983); Between Theater and Anthropology (1985); Performance Theory (1988); Environmental Theater (1994); 'What is		were available to public view at all times? What if we eliminated the distinctions between backstage and onstage, house and stage, stage door and theatre door? No theatre that I know of has done this, not absolutely'.⁴² Viewing theatre as a set of transactions expanded theoretical approaches beyond the traditional concerns with text, acting and directing. It allowed consideration of the relationships and transactions between performers, among audience members, between performers and spectator, between production elements and performers and/or spectators and between production and space (hence environmental theatre). In this way, Schechner incorporated many of the politically oriented theory of the time, but without its political edge. His concern was directed more to 'opening up theatre and theory to a fuller relationship with the complexities of the modern consciousness'⁴³ [which he doesn't define.] [See also Halprin 1968 for a similar approach]. Theatre becomes performance. In a special editions of TDR (September 1973), Schechner called for more work on performance theory involving the study of sports, ritual, play and other daily life performance in humans, as well as play and ritualized behaviour in animals. This work should 'analyze nonverbal communication, consider the implications of psychotherapy for theatre, investigate the ritualized forms of ancient and alien cultures; and seek unified theories of performance related to theories of behaviour'.⁴⁴ Schechner drew a distinction between drama (the original text), script (that which can be transmitted from this text into a new situation), theatre (the specific event enacted by performers) and performance (the entire constellation of human activity surrounding this [theatre] event. Where traditional theatre attempted to weld all these together in an illusion, modern experimental theatre aimed to call attention to the 'seams' between them: 'the drama is what the writer writes; the script is the interior map of a particular production; the theater is the specific set of gestures performed by the performers in any given performance; the performance is the whole event, including spectator and performers (technicians, too, anyone who is there)'.⁴⁵ [His distinctions, however, are rooted in the assumption that theatre began as religious ritual]. In his 1974 essay, he argues that Western theatre's greatest periods occurred when 'ritual and theatre were most nearly in balance'.⁴⁶ Both are performance, but 'theatre emphasizes entertainment, audience separation and the present world, while ritual emphasizes efficacy, audience participation and an absent Other'.⁴⁷ 'Towards a Poetics of Performance' considers the use of theatre and performance by Erving Goffman

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Performance Studies Anyway?’ (1998) ³⁶		and Victor Turner in their sociological and anthropological work. Schechner argued that Turner’s four steps for analysing ‘social dramas’ were applicable to the basic pattern of traditional drama itself. Drama, for Schechner, was ‘an expression of the necessary ceremonial adjustments that a society must make in order to survive’.⁴⁸ Schechner coined the term environmental theatre to describe the idea that the entire theatre space is performance space – ‘a concept which implies that the division between performers and spectators is artificial’⁴⁹ and should be collapsed. In a performance of Mother Courage in 1975, the audience was required to move from time to time and to continually reconfigure its relationship to the stage action.⁵⁰ The major influence on Schechner has been Grotowski. According to Schechner, participation constitutes the most significant technique for the development of contemporary theatre.⁵¹ Despite his efforts to articulate performance in a broad sense, Schechner continually collapses performance into theatre. In 2003, he listed some ‘basic qualities of performance’ which indicate this collapse: ‘a special ordering of time’; ‘a special value attached to objects’; ‘non-productivity in terms of goods’; ‘rules’ and usually ‘special places for performance’.⁵² Performance itself was defined ‘as an activity done by an individual or group in the presence of and for another individual or group’.⁵³ Turner complained that Schechner misunderstood his theory of process – in particular in his insistence that Turner was using theatre as a metaphor.⁵⁴ Dolan was extremely critical of Schechner in relation to an apparent gender and race blindness in his work and theory.⁵⁵ Nevertheless, Krasner considers that Schechner has ‘advanced the science of performance studies by examining the idea of performance in terms of its repeatability, doubling ... and the connection between “acting” and “being”’ with one of his principal contributions being the concept of ‘restored behavior’ as ‘the main characteristic of performance: behavior that can be ‘stored, transmitted, manipulated, transformed’.⁵⁶ ‘Performance means: never for the first time. It means: for the second to the nth time’.⁵⁷ Performance is therefore ‘twice-behaved behavior’. Schechner compared Performance Studies to a ‘sidewinder snake’, which never goes in the direction in which it is pointing, but moves with a sideways motion (Schechner 2008/1998: 518), something some people found infuriating about the field. ‘Performances mark identities, bend and remake time, adorn and reshape the body, tell stories, and allow people to play with behavior that is “twice-behaved”, not-for-the-first-time, rehearsed, cooked, prepared ... every genre of performance, even every particular instance of a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		genre, is concrete, specific, and different from every other'.⁵⁸ 'Any event, action, item, or behavior may be examined "as" performance', and this offers certain advantages: 'one can consider things as provisional, in-process, existing and changing over time, in rehearsal, as it were'. The performative 'engages performance in places and situations not traditionally marked as "performing arts", from dress-up to certain kinds of writing or speaking'. Both performance and performativity deal with the actuality of appearance.⁵⁹ Participation 'should generally be in the service of disillusion'.⁶⁰ Purpose of theorist: polemic – performance, not theatre, as the over-arching phenomenon designed to bring theatre closer to life; prescription View of Theatre: positive; functional
'Die theatrale Schaulust im Lichte der Informations-theorie' (1966) ⁶²	Edward Balcerzan & Zbigniew Osinski Polish Information Theorists	Theatre communication involves two 'ensembles': A-ensemble (the agents or creators of the performance; and P-ensemble (the percipients or spectator). The 'message' consists of both what the creators (A) transmit and how the spectator (P) reacts. The message is 'the result of the co-operation of both ensembles'.⁶³ Creators transmit information, watchers respond and the combination produces the 'message'.⁶⁴ Purpose of theorist: analysis (Information Theory) View of Theatre: functional	A medium of communication	Communication	Doing: the creation of the message Watching: spectators respond to information
Interview (1967); Guerilla Theater: Scenarios for a Revolution (1973) ⁶⁵	Luis Valdez (1940-) Director and chief playwright for the Chicano El Teatro Campesino	El Teatro Campesino was formed in 1965 following the strikes by migrant workers in California. Valdez predicted that America was 'entering an increasingly political period' and that theatre would have to become 'a theatre of political change'. Influenced by the work of Brecht, Valdez championed a symbolic and emblematic form of realism: '[The] dramatic situation, the thing you're trying to portray on the stage, must be very close to the reality that is on the stage'. An example of this kind of 'theatrical reality' stripped to an essential emblematic is a figure standing on the backs of two workers to represent a ranch owner.⁶⁶ Valdéz wrote short agitprop pieces called actos which dramatized the lives of workers, before moving on to larger works. His plays (such as Zoot Suit 1978) use popular techniques such as song and dance to engage spectators, as well as the episodic approach associated with Brecht, in order to make political statements. The aim of this theatre was to turn spectators into active participants in a rehearsal for revolutionary change outside the theatre. At its best, this kind of theatre was 'religion', an 'affirmation of life and spectator participation is 'no cute trick' but 'a pre-established, pre-assumed privilege'. All theatre should be like this but most theatre is 'antiseptic ...	A vehicle for political change, agitation and propaganda; a religious institution; a seeing place	To turn spectators into participants to bring about change outside the theatrical space; political statement; the reflection of a society; agitation and propaganda	Doing: actos ; plays Showing: symbolic and emblematic realism

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		anti-biotic (anti-life)'.⁶⁷ Campesino became a model for other Chicano theatres,⁶⁸ while Valdez argued for a truly Mexican theatre for Mexicans ('Raza'), a theatre which always had room for 'the palomia [the people] sitting there, laughing, crying, and sharing whatever is onstage'.⁶⁹ (The palomia was a working class audience which included children and grandparents 'all sitting in the audience and enjoying their reflections on stage'.⁷⁰ But it was vital that the distinction was made between 'what is theater and what is reality' whether it was on stage or not. 'A demonstration with a thousand Chicanos, all carrying flags and picket signs ... is not the revolution. It is theater about revolution. The people must act in reality, not on stage (which could be anywhere, even on a sidewalk) in order to achieve real change ... unless the demonstration evolves into a street battle ... it is basically a lot of emotion with very little political power... Such guerrilla theater passing as a demonstration has its uses, of course. It is agitprop theater ... agitation and propaganda. It helps stimulate and sustain the mass strength of a crowd. Hitler was very effective with this kind of theater ... [at one end of the spectrum]. On the other end of the political spectrum ... [guerrilla theater's] emotional impact [can be] irrefutable [although its] actual political impact [is] somewhat less'.⁷¹ This is why it is important to not mistake theatre for reality. Purpose of theorist: polemic – political theatre View of Theatre: functional
Introduction to Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author (1967)	Lionel Trilling (1905-1975) American literary critic, author and teacher	'The word illusion comes from the Latin word meaning "to mock" (illudere), which in turn comes from the word meaning "to play" (ludere), and a favourite activity of the theatre is to play with the idea of illusion itself, to mock the very thing it most tries to create – and the audience that accepts it'.⁷² Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A place for play	To play; to mock the spectator	Doing: plays
'Notes on Games and Theatre' (1967)	Eric Berne Social scientist	Main interest was transactional game analysis, but he applied this approach to theatre: acting did not involve 'playing a character' so much as 'dealing with a series of specific interpersonal transactions'.⁷³ Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A place for games	Interpersonal transaction	Doing: acting as a game
'Theatre and Cinema' ⁷⁴ (1967)	André Bazin Film theorist	The spectator's experience of theatre and film differ significantly (a) because theatre requires spectators to will to overcome the physical factivity of the actors and settings in order to identify with the characters and (b) because theatre has conventions which are	A place; an art form with specific	The creation of an illusion through	Doing: theatre Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		designed to help spectators to do this:⁷⁵ ‘characters on the screen are quite naturally objects of identification, while those on the stage are ... objects of mental opposition because their real presence gives them an objective reality and to transpose them into beings in an imaginary world the will of the spectator has to intervene actively ... to will to transform their physical reality into and abstraction. This abstraction being the result of a process of the intelligence that we can only ask of a person who is fully conscious’.⁷⁶ The spectators of theatre are, by default, active, intelligent and fully conscious [which does not say much for the cinema spectator]. Theatre is always in opposition to the real world, and spectators know this: ‘Theatre of its very essence must not be confused with nature under penalty of being absorbed by her and ceasing to be. Founded on the reciprocal awareness of those taking part and present to one another, it must be in contrast to the rest of the world in the same way the play and reality are opposed ... Costume, mask, or make-up, the style of the language, the footlights, all contribute to the stage, the architecture of which has varied from time to time without ever ceasing to mark out a privileged spot actually or virtually distinct from nature. It is precisely in virtue of this locus dramaticus that décor exists. It serves in greater or less degree to set the place apart, to specify’.⁷⁷ Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: conventional	character-istic and limitations	interaction with spectators	watching theatre requires an act of will on the part of the spectator to allow disbelief to be suspended; theatre has conventions to enable the spectator to do this.

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.459

² Published in the Tulane Drama Review Vol 10(4), 1966.

³ Carlson 1984: 466

⁴ Published in Tulane Drama Review Vol 10(4), 1966.

⁵ Davis 1966

⁶ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 516

⁷ Lovelace, Alice. 1996. 'A Brief History of Theater Forms (from Aristotle to Brecht, Baraka, O'Neal, and Boal)'. In Motion Magazine February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27/02/2007.

⁸ Amiri Baraka 1979, Selected Plays and Prose, New York, p. 131; in Carlson 1984: 470.

⁹ Carlson 1984: 470

¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 471

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 452

-
- ¹² Introduction reprinted as 'Drama from Ibsen to Brecht' in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 371-377.
- ¹³ Krasner 2008: 373
- ¹⁴ Williams 2008/1968: 374
- ¹⁵ Williams 2008/1968: 375-6
- ¹⁶ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 156
- ¹⁷ Williams, Raymond 1977, Marxism and Literature, Oxford UK, Oxford Paperbacks, 121-7
- ¹⁸ Fortier 2002: 156
- ¹⁹ Cited in Carlson 1984: 462
- ²⁰ Blau, Herbert. 1985. 'Odd, Anonymous Needs: The Audience in a Dramatized Society (part one)'. Performing Arts Journal 9 (2/3 10th Anniversary Issue: The American Theatre Condition) pp. 199-212. 204
- ²¹ Handke 1968 quoted in Hans Mayer 1972, 'Culture, Property and Theatre', in Baxandall, Lee (ed) 1973, Radical Perspectives in the Arts, Pelican.
- ²² Handke 1969, in Artur Joseph, Theater unter vier Augen, Cologne, p. 7, 34; in Carlson 1984: 463.
- ²³ Handke 1973, Stücke 2, Frankfurt, p. 57; in Carlson 1984: 463.
- ²⁴ Carlson 1984: 474
- ²⁵ Benedetto 1971, 'Manifeste', Travail théâtre Vol 5, p. 28; in Carlson 1984: 474.
- ²⁶ Benedetto 1971, 'Entretien', Travail théâtre Vol 5, p. 8; in Carlson 1984: 474.
- ²⁷ Benedetto 1975, 'Le petit héros populaire', Travail théâtre Vol 21 p. 46; in Carlson 1984: 474.
- ²⁸ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner 2008: 361-365.
- ²⁹ Blackburn, Simon. 1994. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press. 95
- ³⁰ Blackburn 1994: 100
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 505-6
- ³² Krasner 2008: 361
- ³³ Derrida 2008/1966: 362-3
- ³⁴ Published in Drama Review Vol 12(3), 1968.
- ³⁵ These two publications were collections of essays, the first, coedited by Schechner, including essays by ethnologists Konrad Lorenz and Jane van Lawick-Goodall and sociologist Erving Goffman and anthropologist Victor Turner and communication scientist Ray Birdwhistell. The second were all essays by Schechner.
- ³⁶ Published in The Ends of Performance (ed. Peggy Phelan and Jill Lane); reprinted in Krasner 2008: 517-521.
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 478
- ³⁸ Schechner 1966, in Tulane Drama Review Vol 10(4), p. 26; in Carlson 1984: 478.
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 478
- ⁴⁰ Cited in Carlson 1984: 468
- ⁴¹ Carlson 1984: 479
- ⁴² Schechner, Richard 1983, Performative Circumstances from the Avant Garde to Ramlila, Seagull Books, 82

-
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 479
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 483
- ⁴⁵ Schechner, Richard. 1988. Performance Theory. revised ed. New York: Routledge. 85
- ⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 484
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 484
- ⁴⁸ Carlson 1984: 484
- ⁴⁹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 493
- ⁵⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 548
- ⁵¹ Schechner, Richard. 1994. Environmental Theater: An Expanded New Edition including "Six Axioms for Environmental Theater". New York, London: Applause. 60
- ⁵² Schechner, Richard. 2003. Performance Theory. London: Routledge. 8
- ⁵³ Schechner 2003: 22n10
- ⁵⁴ Turner, Victor. 1988. 'The Anthropology of Performance'. In The Anthropology of Performance. New York: PAJ Publications, 72-98.
- ⁵⁵ Dolan, Jill. 1993. 'Geographies of learning: theatre studies, performance, and the "performative"'. Theatre Journal 45 (4) 417-442.
- ⁵⁶ Krasner 2008: 517
- ⁵⁷ Schechner, Richard 1985, Between Theater and Anthropology, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 36
- ⁵⁸ Schechner 2008/1998: 521
- ⁵⁹ Schechner 2008/1998: 521
- ⁶⁰ Schechner 1994: 69
- ⁶¹ Schechner 1994: 64
- ⁶² Excerpt translated, quoted and discussed in Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254. 237.
- ⁶³ Balcerzan and Osinski 1966: 73 in Passow.
- ⁶⁴ Passow 1981: 237
- ⁶⁵ Excerpt entitled 'Notes on Chicano Theater' (1973) reprinted in Krasner 2008: 390-393.
- ⁶⁶ Carlson 1984: 467
- ⁶⁷ Valdez 2008/1973: 390-1
- ⁶⁸ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 530-534
- ⁶⁹ Valdez 2008/1973: 393
- ⁷⁰ Krasner 2008: 393n3
- ⁷¹ Valdez 2008/1973: 392
- ⁷² Trilling 1967, The Experience of Literature, New York; in Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 180.
- ⁷³ Berne 1967, in Tulane Drama Review Vol 11(4), p. 90; in Carlson 1984: 479.
- ⁷⁴ In Bazin 1967, What is Cinema? Hugh Gray (trans), Berkeley and Los Angeles, University of California Press. Discussed at length in Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. 51-67.
- ⁷⁵ Ben Chaim 1984: 54

⁷⁶ Bazin 1967: 99

⁷⁷ Bazin 1967: 104

Table 38/51 Theories of Theatre 1968-1970

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Nos fêtes (1968); Interview (1970)	Jerome Savary Director	Directed Arrabal's Le labyrinthe in 1967. Reflected a number of the ideas of the théâtre panique . He called for productions which rejected the text, and which sought new means of physical expression and more flexible technical ways 'to restore to the theatre its true dignity'. ¹ He recommended that theatre no longer be tied to literary expression, but seen as a 'feast, a celebration, in which everyone feels free to participate'. ² He criticized Grotowski and The Living Theatre for 'placing themselves spiritually above their spectator, thus discouraging any sense of unity or desire for participation'. ³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Grotowski/anti-text View of Theatre: positive	An art form; an event	Communion with the spectator through physical performance	Doing: theatre (an event) Watching: communion (participation)
'Interview' (1968); 'Ridiculous Theatre, Scourge of Human Folly' (1975) ⁴	Charles Ludlam (1943-1987) Ridiculous actor and playwright	Theatre of the Ridiculous united Artaud's 'pure physical theatre' with a 'verbal sound source', creating from both 'total theatre and life experience'. ⁵ 'The world is our work'. ⁶ Axioms for a theatre of ridicule include stressing paradox and self-mockery, and seeking themes that threaten 'to destroy one's whole value system', to be treated 'in a madly farcical manner without losing the seriousness of the theme. Scare yourself a bit along the way'. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text-based theatre View of Theatre: positive	A physical art form	Ridicule	Doing: performing the self without taking oneself seriously
'Planchon on Brecht' (1968)	Roger Planchon (1931- French director	A strong supporter of Brecht. Saw the influence of Artaud and Grotowski as problematic, leading to an alogical, irrational and ahistorical approach to theatre. He credited Grotowski with achieving 'very striking effects, but only within a narrow and largely irrelevant type of theatre'. ⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Grotowski and Artaud View of Theatre: functional	An agent of social change	Social change	Doing: directing
'The Sign in the Theatre' (1968); Littérature et spectacle dans leurs rapport esthétiques, thématiques et	Tadeusz Kowsan (1922- Semiotician	An attempt at a preliminary codification of theatrical sign systems which suggests 13 systems of auditive, visual, spatial and temporal theatrical signs: word, tone, mime, gesture, movement, makeup, hairstyle, costume, accessory, décor, lighting, music and sound effects. Signs were interchangeable between systems, and could have several meanings. Several signs could have the same signified, one sign might have several signifieds, and several signs might work together to produce a single signified. Connotation was useful in simple cases but was inefficient in complex ones. To deal with the problem of determining a means of segmenting a spectacle for analysis, he suggests 'a slice containing all the signs emitted simultaneously, a slice the duration of which is	A signifying practice	Communication	Doing: the practice of theatre (a semiotic practice)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
sémiologiques (1970; 1975)		equal to the sign that lasts least'. ⁹ [Not quite a photographic still, but not much more]. In 1970, Kowsan published the first book-length consideration of semiotics and theatre. He subdivided spectacle ('a work of art necessarily communicated in both space and time') into eight groups, depending on the presence or absence of plot, man and language. Dramatic literature overlapped spectacle when it was performed, but existed purely in the field of temporal arts when only read. What united literature and spectacle was the fable or plot. Theatre's function was not the creation of new fables but the treatment of known fables in a new manner, 'in the virtual mode of space and time'. ¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: semiotic analysis View of Theatre: positive
'Equisse d'une théorie de la forme dramatique' (1968)	Steen Jansen Semiotics	Claims to be a semiotic approach to drama but is more a structuralist approach. Divides the dramatic form into two 'perspectives': the dramatic text (the basis of all 'realizations' of the work, emphasises situation) and the dramatic work (the ensemble of the means that unite the elements of the text into a coherent whole, emphasises structure). The dramatic text can be analysed either at the level of dialogue or of scene, while the dramatic work can be analysed either through the linkage of elements (linear) or through the ensemble of elements (retrospective). ¹¹ Purpose of Theorist: semiotic analysis View of Theatre: n/r	A signifying practice	Communication	Showing: signification (in the text)
'On the Impression of Reality in Cinema' (1968) ¹²	Christian Metz Film theorist	Metz defined cinema against theatre, providing a theoretical position on theatre at the same time. Theatre was 'too real' to allow real identification. Its facticity got in the way: 'The actor's bodily presence contradicts the temptation one always experiences during the show to perceive him as a protagonist in a fictional universe, and the theatre can only be a freely accepted game played among accomplices . Because the theatre is too real, theatrical fictions yield only a weak impression of reality ... The impression of reality we get from a film does not depend at all on the strong presence of an actor but rather on the low degree of existence possessed by those ghostly creatures moving on the screen, and they are, therefore, unable to resist our constant impulse to invest them with the "reality" of fiction ... a reality that comes only from within us, from the projections and identifications that are mixed in our perception of film. The film spectacle produces a strong impression of reality because it corresponds to a "vacuum", which dreams readily fill'. ¹³ In other words, there are 'obstacles to the imaginative engagement of the spectator' in theatre ¹⁴ – including the physical presence of scenery, stage effects etc. 'The "real" in theatre disrupts the fictional universe ... the spectator is not able to experience the	A game played among accomplices present to each other; a real event	Play	Doing: theatre as a physical practice Watching: requires complicity

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		“illusion” because reality impinges:¹⁵ ‘the element that is more powerful in the theatre is not the illusion of reality but reality itself ... [in the form of the physical presence of the actor and his equipment]. The spectator no longer has the illusion of reality; he has the perception of reality – he is a witness to real events’.¹⁶ The real is what is most powerful in the theatre, not the illusory, because ‘[t]he means of representation ... overpowers the imagination’.¹⁷ For Metz, fiction equals absence; real equals presence: ‘At the theatre ... I should see Sarah Bernhardt [irrespective of the character she was playing] ... At the cinema ... it would be her shadow’.¹⁸ [Metz clearly has C19th realist theatre in mind here]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: ambivalent
1968: the student and worker uprisings in France ‘stimulated a fresh consideration of the relationship between theatre and the social order’.¹⁹ The Living Theatre participated in the student occupation of the National Theatre, becoming a somewhat reluctant symbol of the defiance of the old order. Young theatre radicals in Paris wrote an open letter (‘Treize questions aux organisateurs et aux participants du festival d’Avignon’) condemning as ‘repressive and authoritarian’ any idea of culture as ‘a domain reserved for paying specialists’. They called for a theatre of ‘collective creation’ with no schism between artistic activities and ‘political, social, and everyday events’, a ‘theatre of political and psychological liberation, [of] direct rather than represented action’ in which the spectator would no longer be placed in ‘an alienated and underdeveloped situation’.²⁰ The Living Theatre had been invited to participate at the Avignon festival. It attempted to act as a mediator between the festival organisers and the young radicals, requesting the right to present free performances. They were forbidden from doing this by the organisers. They joined with the students and departed Avignon. Late 1960s also saw a renewed and serious interest in the application of semiotics to theatre, despite Eric Buyssens’ warning in 1943 that theatre posed enormous methodological problems for semiotics because of its complexity and its ephemerality. Semiotic analysis of theatre would not only have to deal with ‘words, music, gesture, dance, costumes, scenery and lighting, but spectator reactions, social relationships, and even the personnel of the theatre’.²¹ 1968: American avant-garde director Robert Wilson founded his Byrd Hoffman School of Byrds, a place where artists could come to collaborate and train in theatrical techniques and practices aimed at pushing the boundaries of what constituted theatre. He made a direct assault on language, declaring it a barrier to imagination, although later collaborations with autistic poet Christopher Knowles encouraged him to use language in multiple ways.²²
The Empty Space (1968); ²³ The Shifting Point	Peter Brook (1925- English director; founder of the Theatre Research Center in Paris (1971))	Brook was ‘one of the most important directors of the twentieth century’. The Empty Space has ‘attained near biblical status for the avant-garde’.²⁴ Like Artaud, Brook wanted to eliminate representation which he saw as intermediary, lying between the actor and the spectator (the essential relationship of the theatre): ‘I can take any empty space and call it a bare stage. A man walks across this empty space while someone else is watching him, and this is all that is needed for an act of theatre to be engaged’.²⁵ Brook discusses a range of contemporary approaches to the art of theatre. A director must deal with a play according to the demands of his own time and his own spectator [an implication that one knows one’s spectator], a view similar to that of Guthrie (1962) and Barthes (1955).	An arena where a living confrontation can take place; an art form;	To tell stories not ‘to propose messages’; to provide a picture of the world that is complete; to challenge the	Doing: Directing - the director is an ‘innocent observer’, although Happenings are based on the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		A play cannot ‘speak for itself’; one must ‘conjure its sound from it’.²⁶ To do otherwise (as many modern production of classics do) is to produce deadly theatre. (He considers commercial theatre, which does not allow for experimentation, as particularly ‘deadly’).²⁷ As alternatives, Brook distinguishes holy theatre (visionary works which aim to make the invisible visible, exemplified by Artaud and Grotowski, but which could also include good Happenings – bad Happenings were ‘sad’ and muddled and simply assaulted a willing spectator into apathy),²⁸ rough theatre (exemplified by Elizabethan theatre and now Brecht, it aims to renew the theatre by returning to the popular sources of real life) and finally immediate theatre, a more all-encompassing form which aims to unite spectator and performance ‘in a communal celebration of experience, briefly achieving a totality that may leave a permanent image in the mind of its participants’.²⁹ Rough theatre, in particular was free of the ‘tyrannous unity of style’.³⁰ ‘A popular audience usually has no difficulty in accepting inconsistencies of accent and dress, or in darting between mime and dialogue, realism and suggestion. They follow the line of story, unaware in fact that somewhere there is a set of standards which are being broken’.³¹ A good play provides opportunities for this because it sends out a ‘rich texture of messages’ which stirs ‘the intelligence, the emotions, and the memory’ whereas ‘a poor play has a much thinner texture, leaving gaps where inattention creeps in’. Theatre is particular: ‘through the concrete we recognize the abstract’.³² Brook also experimented with Happenings, although he was alive to the problems of ‘unbridled irrationalism in performance’ as some exhibited.³³ Behind the Happening was ‘the shout ‘Wake up’’,³⁴ but Happenings more than any other theatre reflected the limitations of their inventors and a bad Happening was ‘sad’, ‘no more than a series of mild shocks followed by let-downs’ which ‘assaulted’ the spectator ‘into apathy’. ‘Give a child a paintbox, and if he mixes all the colours together, the result is always the same muddy brownish grey’.³⁵ Happenings, like anything else require selection and direction. Brook was responsible for introducing the plays of Jean Cocteau and Jean-Paul Sartre to England, and was influenced by Artaud’s theatre of cruelty, Meyerhold’s experiments with biomechanics and circus arts and Grotowski’s poor theatre.³⁶ According to Brook, ‘[t]he theatre [can] do something that no politician can do – make a radical transformation so that for a moment the world is seen complete, with all its difficulties, all its riches, and all its potentialities’.³⁷ The ‘basic function of theatre is to be anti-government, anti-		status quo	‘irresistible urge to assault [the spectator] – to shoot first and ask questions later’.⁴² Watching: a communal experience; however, different kinds of theatre produced different kinds of spectators. Willing spectators could be bludgeoned into apathy (deadly spectators) by poor theatre. Being in a crowd has a powerful impact: the focus of a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		establishment and anti-social. What we all recognize as feeble theatre is the theatre that enters into the public lie of pretending that everything's okay'. In 1963-4, Brook set up a group of actors to work through Artaud's ideas. Although the group deviated from Artaud in many respects, Brook's production of Peter Weiss' Marat/Sade brought Artaud's ideas to public attention and led to the equation of Artaud's ideas with Brook's work.³⁸ Brook sees acting as 'unique in its difficulties because the artist has to use the treacherous, changeable and mysterious material of himself as his medium. He is called upon to be completely involved while distanced – detached without detachment. He must be sincere, he must be insincere; he must practice how to be insincere with sincerity and how to lie truthfully'.³⁹ The stage was 'a reflection of life' but theatre was 'like a magnifying glass, and also like a reducing lens'. It 'narrows life down ... It is always hard for anyone to have one single aim in life – in the theatre, however, the goal is clear' as is the time-frame in which it must be achieved.⁴⁰ Unlike cinema, theatre 'always asserts itself in the present ... This ... is what can make it so disturbing' and powerful. We can see the power of theatre in the way it has been censored throughout its history. 'Governments know that the living event could create a dangerous electricity ... The theatre is the arena where a living confrontation can take place. The focus of a large group of people creates a unique intensity ... forces that operate at all times and rule each person's daily life can be isolated and perceived more clearly'.⁴¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			large group of people creates a unique intensity
'Mutual Creation' (1968)	Ann Halprin Organizer of the San Francisco Dance Workshop	Because the modern world 'contains too much for one mind to master, the theatre should no longer depend upon one mind to determine "everything for everybody"'.⁴³ Things should just be allowed to happen as everyone participated. This was not only 'more enjoyable and more unpredictable', it also demonstrated 'what is possible and not just what you think should be'.⁴⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – indeterminacy View of Theatre: positive	A creative event	To allow things to happen	Doing: dance (a practice of theatre) Watching: participatory
'Structures linguistiques probabilistes issues de l'étude du théâtre'	Mihai Dinu (1942- French linguist	A student of Solomon Marcus (1970). Attempted to develop the implications of Marcus' mathematical analysis of theatre texts. Such an analysis could reveal 'the sentiments of sympathy and antipathy of the characters [and trace] with extreme precision the phases of a conflict' even when the content is unknown and dialogue is ignored.⁴⁵ Probability theory and information theory could also be used to study theatre using Marcus' configurations. This analysis could be used to analyse how scenes were linked in terms of	An art form	Coherence	Doing: drama (texts)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1968); L'interdépendance syntagmatique des scènes dans une pièce de théâtre' (1972); 'Continuité et changement dans la stratégie des personnages dramatiques' (1973)		character relationships, or how classic dramatists evolved changing configurations and came to stress the importance of particular characters and relationships. ⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: textual analysis View of Theatre: n/r
Thema Theater (1969)	Claus Bremer (1924- German theorist	Also advocated 'a modern theatre of indeterminacy'. Contemporary theatre needed to 'pursue the consequences of the lack of an absolute, and must present each individual point of view as equally valid' and author, actor and spectator must each 'assume the functions' of the other. This kind of theatre needed a proper space, one with 'no fixed boundary between auditorium and stage' because this is where theatre had a particular advantage over film, radio and television: it could open itself to its audience, and admit all perspectives'. This made its spectator more likely to be that of 'sports, jazz and the tavern' than that of film or television. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – indeterminacy View of Theatre: positive	A place requiring space for a relationship to occur	The creation of a relationship between artists and spectators	Doing: theatre Watching: involves a relationship with artists
Theatre Double Game (1969)	Samuel Selden (1899- Writer on theatre-craft	Theatre is 'a place where an effect is produced on an audience'. ⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical	A place	Affect	Doing: theatre
Das Raumproblem im modernen	Joachim Hintze German theorist	Explores the implications of a series of C20th views of theatre space. Distinguishes between three types of contemporary experimental spaces: Gerichtsraum , used for courtroom drama (such as those by Weiss (1963), and which confronts the spectator as	A space of performance	Performance before spectators	Doing: drama Watching: spectator as

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
deutschen Drama und Theater (1969)		an unacknowledged jury; Modellraum which involves elements from real life abstracted for the stage ‘in order to serve a didactic purpose and influence the relationship between stage and auditorium’ as in Brechtian drama; and the theatrically autonomous room , a space which may or may not include the spectator but nevertheless recognizes theatre as a world of its own, not as a slice of life. This last use of space became important in contemporary German theatre theory and practice, especially in the work of the designer and theorist Wilfried Minks (1970), known as the Minksbühne . ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical			jury, as student, as part of life
The Poetics of Space (1969)	Gaston Bachelard (1884-1962) French philosopher	Images carry their own exaggeration , ‘which imagination “seizes” and carries, sensationally, to its “ultimate extreme”’. ⁵⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: can’t say	A seeing place	To generate images	Showing: poetics Watching: images are seized by the imagination
Dramatic Structure: The Shaping of Experience (1970)	Jackson Barry (1926- American academic of English literature	A commitment to the analysis of theatre as a performative art and a concern with works of theatre as functioning systems, and as structured. Temporality is the essential quality of theatre. Theatre ‘shapes the materials of experience’ to give ‘an image of man’s interaction with time’. Drama begins with a ‘basic pattern of events’ which reflects the assumptions spectators make about the way life is structured. Each period of history has different assumptions and these are reflected in the kind of drama it produces. The C20th produces drama that is random and unstructured. All dramatic structure reflects a tension between two basic patterns of time: the improvisational (future oriented) and the retrospective. An action becomes dramatic ‘when it is performed with a sense of purpose under the influence of time, place and situation’. ⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A temporal performative art; an institution	To shape the materials of experience	Doing: drama Showing: man’s interaction with time
Shapes of Our Theatres (1970) ⁵²	Jo Mielziner (1901-1976) American scenic designer	‘All theatre interiors consist of two essential areas: one is ‘the auditorium’ which is designed specifically for the audience; the other, designed for the production, we know as ‘the stage’ ... independently they have no life; together they produce a living theatre’. ⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical	A building for staging productions before spectators	To bring to life	Doing: design
Dynamics of Drama:	Bernard Beckerman	A structuralist approach to theatre which argues for a qualitative (participant observer) rather than a quantitative approach to the study of theatre. ⁵⁴ Attempts to establish a	A place of wonder; a	Presentation in Action; a	Doing: drama – the practice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Theory and Method of Analysis (1970; 1979)	(1921-1985) Sociologist	modern method of analysing and discussing theatre as a performative art, particularly in terms of spectator response. Beckerman defines theatre as ‘something happening’ before others. ‘Theater occurs when one or more human beings, isolated in time and space , present themselves to another or others. ⁵⁵ Theatre is ‘dependent upon human presence. Eliminate the actuality of man and eliminate theater ... Theater allows room for communal interplay ... the human presence is felt throughout the presentation ... the performers are the media being manipulated for expressive purposes’ and the purpose of theatre ‘is to affect spectators’. ⁵⁶ The ‘archetypal form of theater is the ritual in which God is the spectator. Theatre is ‘potpourri’ – ‘anything that man offers to others in his person’. Beckerman divides ‘the dramatic experience’ into two ‘phases’: the theatrical experience (the sustained ‘point-to-point contact of audience and performer during presentation’) and the memorial experience (the unified way the spectator remembers the presentation). He claims that western theatre is generally studied in terms of the memorial experiences rather than the theatrical experience, possibly because the latter is harder to study: ‘The twin weapons of social science – the questionnaire and the interview – do not seem to have produced significant insight into the experience’ and the application of group psychology theories have failed to account ‘for the peculiar nature of the artistic experience’, yet ‘the skilled performer’ appears to know ‘how to maintain and develop rapport with an audience’, ⁵⁷ suggesting that sociologists have not yet found the ‘correct orientation’ towards the subject. Theatre ‘occurs when one or more human beings isolated in time and/or space present themselves to another or others’. Drama occurs when one or more humans isolated in time and/or space present themselves ‘in imagined acts’ to another or others. ⁵⁸ Theatre is a temporal art. Consequently, this presentation must occur in the form of an activity. All theatrical action is made up of ‘vertical’ segments of time. Drama adds levels of symbolic meaning to each segment, creating build-ups to the crux followed by a subsequent relaxation. These elements are varied to maintain interest. For example, a basic variation might be between active and reactive elements, based on resistance and confrontation ; or emotional release might be more sustained by focusing more on the experience rather than the goal of the drama. Other variations include changes in intensity, different types of crux, and variations in ‘the external activity that contains the internal action’. While spectators might not be specifically aware of these patterns of action, they may experience them ‘isomorphically	performed art; a ritual	mirror of life; the manipulation of crises and tension to help the spectator achieve and maintain interest against a shared background, in ‘dialogue’ with the spectator	of theatre Showing: a pot-pourri Watching: involves a predisposition towards empathetic participation; the spectator sees both illusion and referent simultaneously – this creates mental tension, a ‘tug’ between belief and disbelief. ⁷⁰

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		as a kind of psychic echo'. Their empathetic response will be determined by associated factors, including meaning. Meaning appears in four aspects: descriptive or literal; participational (always central in theatre); referential (looks to external experience); and conceptual or imaginative. 'Only the full course of the action will establish these meanings, since they, like character, are built up out of the sequence of segments, whose arrangements and interplay are determined by the dramatist on the basis of such concerns as causation, repetition, and emphasis'.⁵⁹ Drama is not about words but activities: 'dramatic theory has not sufficiently addressed itself to a close analysis of theatrical activity primarily because it has seen theatre as a composition of words rather than of activities ... a serious error [which ignores] the foundation of theatrical art'.⁶⁰ The medium of a play is not language but human presence'.⁶¹ When the spectator watches an actor performing, they see both illusion and referent 'simultaneously' in their imaginations: 'the presence of both images creates the kind of contrasting gap that sparks mental tension'.⁶² Theatre is thus 'double' in relation to the spectator response as well as the performer's art: 'an audience lives within two overlapping circles of experience, that of the fiction and that of its own actuality'. The play urges us to 'submerge ourselves fully in its life, while 'the larger world we inhabit' restrains us. The play too, has a doubleness. It projects 'to each member of the audience as an individual, sparking his or her private memories, and to the audience as a whole, in that distinctive configuration that it has assumed for a particular occasion'. Our imagination harmonizes this doubleness, 'producing a sense of heightened living where the paradox is resolved' and our emotional and intellectual needs are satisfied. This harmonization and resolution can be of such 'high intensity' that the effects 'remain with us'.⁶³ Thus the theatrical experience 'is a dialogue between presenter and audience' in which the spectator is predisposed toward a theatrical experience. Some of the conditions which will affect that predisposition include personal comfort, the desire to socialize, the connections which can be forged between the spectator and the circumstances in which a play is embedded (the ground or 'original precipitating context of the play'),⁶⁴ and whether spectators are communal or random in type, although every audience is 'a hastily assembled community of roughly similar outlook' simply because of economic factors or intellectual appeal.⁶⁵ 'A play doesn't have time to create a world of its own; it relies on signs and symbols that suggest the world').⁶⁶ A 'communal form' of audience must be created in order for the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		performance to produce a dramatic experience, but random spectators are more difficult to play to and ‘some writers and performers have come to regard them ‘balefully’ and to ‘characterize them as petty bourgeois or establishment’. They then set out to ‘insult or shock their political or sexual mores’ in order to alienate them into a community. ‘In every play, the writer presumes a background which he shocks or reconfirms’. This background can be shaped in a variety of ways but is always ‘a mediating element between the world of the audience’ and the world of the play, and between ‘the familiar and the unfamiliar’: ‘These two diametrically opposed properties, united in a single presentation, contribute to that psychic energy so tightly compacted in the very best of drama’.⁶⁷ [Towards the end of this chapter, Beckerman seems to lose sight of his subject, the spectator, to rhapsodize about what the director must do in order to put on an historical play]. Nevertheless, the theatrical experience commences ‘from the moment a spectator approaches and then enters the place of presentation’, usually with the view of being entertained or ‘held between’, an attitude which is the necessary ‘precondition’ for ‘other specific responses’: ‘Something must be held between the presenter and the receiver’ for any theatrical experience to occur.⁶⁸ A central feature of theatre is that performers and spectators must be separated from each other so that the spectators can observe what is happening. ‘Demarcation is crucial ... if the oscillation of stimulus and response between presenter and presentee is to occur’, although the degree of isolation varies and can be played with by both performers and spectators. The control of time is also an essential component: ‘Only through the knowledge and power to conclude a showing do the performers have the capacity to begin one ... without isolation and temporal control, presentation is merely life’.⁶⁹ In real life, people are not isolated in space or in time. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘Bühnenräume sollten die Selbstverständlichkeit von Landschaften haben’ (1970)	Wilfried Minks German designer and theorist	A proponent of the theatrically autonomous room (see Hintze 1969); Minks designed theatrical spaces which were neither realistic nor abstract but ‘matter-of-fact, just as a natural landscape is’, but created for the theatre world and contributing ‘not only optically, but sensually’ to the total theatre experience for both actors and spectator.⁷¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A space	The integration of performer and spectator	Doing: design of performance space
Poetica	Solomon	Another structural-semiotic approach to theatre (confined to the analysis of the written		Signification	Doing: poetry

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
matematică (1970); 'Editorial Notes' (1977) ⁷²	Marcus (1925- Romanian mathematician	text), this time in terms of mathematics and based on 'the most primitive and objective data contained in a theatrical play': characters and scenes, for which he devised mathematical formulae based on presence (1) or absence (0). ⁷³ [See also Dinu in 1968]. Purpose of Theorist: semiotic analysis View of Theatre: n/r
Introduction à la sémiologie (1970)	Georges Mounin Semiologist	The first general text on semiology to devote a section to theatre. Mounin warned against an a priori view of theatre as a language with 'theatrical signifiers and signifieds [and] scenographic 'codes' and so on'. ⁷⁴ This communication model falsified the nature of theatre , which was not communication. Communication in the normal linguistic sense of the word did not exist between the public and any part of the theatre because the spectator, except in a very limited way, was unable to respond to the emitter of messages. Theatre was more like that of a 'very complex type of [basic] stimulus response'. The goal of a semiology of the theatre should be to find out how the theatre selects and organizes the various stimuli in order to lead the spectators towards the process of interpretation known as the aesthetic experience. [It was about leading horses to water and making them drink]. Most semiologists rejected this denial of theatrical communication and continued to view theatre according to a linguistic model. ⁷⁵ Mounin became the favourite 'straw man of theatre semiotics'. ⁷⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-communication model View of Theatre: positive	A space of signification	To lead spectators towards an aesthetic experience (not about communication)	Showing: communication Watching: being led to an aesthetic experience
Literaturgeschichte als Provokation (1970); Aesthetische Erfahrung und literarische Hermeneutik (1977); Towards an Aesthetic of Reception	Hans Robert Jauss Reception theorist	A theorist of reception, Jauss' book is directed towards literary texts and readers, but provides assumptions and methodologies which other theorists of reception have been able to apply to theatre. ⁷⁷ Jauss insists on the open-endedness of the text, the 'concretization' of which is 'the product of a constantly varying dialectic between the work's "horizon of expectations" and the varying "horizon of expectations" of the reader'. ⁷⁸ Avant-garde texts, for instance, were 'never completely new' otherwise they would be incomprehensible, but they do 'contain instructions ... which demand revision of the horizon of expectations of earlier texts'. ⁷⁹ Jauss suggested that spectator response could be mapped along a continuum from spontaneous success, rejection or shock, scattered approval, gradual or belated understanding. This would allow new work to be measured aesthetically. The closer the work was to the dominant horizon of expectation, the more likely it was to be 'low, pulp, or 'culinary' art. Bennett claims the idea has limited appeal because it doesn't allow for diversity or change in status. ⁸⁰	A 'reading' place	To engage with a 'reader'	Watching: reception theory: watching as reading

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1982)		Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: can't say
Imagination in the Theory and Process of Theatre as a Craft (1970) ⁸¹	Dietrich Steinbeck German theorist	Theatre is 'created' imaginatively with the co-authorship of spectators: Theater is dependent on the spectator and his presence and intentional collaboration'. It is not 'a 'thing' with a fixed locus'. Rather theatre exists 'as a progression with the character of an event'. ⁸² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-participatory theatre View of Theatre: positive	A collaborative practice; an event	Creating an event	Watching: spectators collaborate imaginatively in the process

¹ Savary 1968, Nos fêtes, Paris, p. 161.

² Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 459

³ Savary, in Bettina Knapp 1970, 'Sounding the Drum', Drama Review Vol 15(1), p. 92; Carlson 1984: 459.

⁴ Reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 397-8; published in Drama Review Vol 19(4), p. 70.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 460

⁶ Ludlam in Dan Isaac 1968, 'Interview', in Drama Review Vol 13(1), p. 116; in Carlson 1984: 460.

⁷ Ludlam 2008/1975: 398

⁸ Carlson 1984: 471

⁹ Kowsan 1968, in Diogenes Vol 61, 1968, pp. 73-9; in Carlson 1984: 494.

¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 497

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 494, 501, 503

¹² In Metz 1968, Film Language: A Semiotics of the Cinema, Michael Taylor (trans), New York, Oxford University Press. Discussed at length in Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. 51-67.

¹³ Metz 1968: 9-10

¹⁴ Ben Chaim 1984: 52

¹⁵ Ben Chaim 1984: 52

¹⁶ Metz 1968: 12

¹⁷ Ben Chaim 1984: 53

¹⁸ Metz 1968: 47

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 471

²⁰ In Emile Copfermann 1972, La mise en crise théâtrale, Paris, p. 105; in Carlson 1984: 471.

-
- ²¹ Carlson 1984: 493
- ²² A film of Wilson and his work, Absolute Wilson was produced by Katharina Otto-Berstein in 2006. In it Wilson is quoted as saying that language is a barrier to the imagination. His productions are very stylized, mesmerizingly slow and often extend over large blocks of time (24 hours; seven days etc).
- ²³ Excerpt entitled 'The Immediate Theatre' (1968) reprinted in Krasner 2008: 378-380; excerpt entitled 'The Holy Theatre: Happenings' reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 205-207.
- ²⁴ Krasner 2008: 378
- ²⁵ Brook, Peter 1968, The Empty Space, New York A Touchstone Book, Simon and Schuster, 9
- ²⁶ Brook 1968: 38; also in Carlson 1984: 464.
- ²⁷ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 503
- ²⁸ Brook 1998/1968: 206
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 464
- ³⁰ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 148
- ³¹ Brook 1968: 60
- ³² Cited in Styan 1975: 31
- ³³ Brandt 1998: 205
- ³⁴ Brook 1998/1968: 206
- ³⁵ Brook 1998/1968: 206
- ³⁶ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 503; Krasner 2008: 378
- ³⁷ Cited in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 18
- ³⁸ Brockett and Ball 2004: 191
- ³⁹ Brook, The Shifting Point, in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 343.
- ⁴⁰ Brook 2008/1968: 379
- ⁴¹ Brook 2008/1968: 379
- ⁴² Brook 1998/1968: 205; also quoted in Seymour, Anna. 1996. 'Culture and political change: British radical theatre in recent history'. Theatre Research International 21 (1) pp. 8-17.8; Brook was speaking at a forum in Manchester in March 1994. Seymour agreed with Brook on the matter of the audience but disagreed profoundly with the idea of theatre-makers being 'innocent observers'. Theatre productions are devised through the continual decision making of the producers: 'There is no neutral territory on the stage' (Seymour 1996: 8).
- ⁴³ Carlson 1984: 480
- ⁴⁴ Halprin 1968, in Drama Review Vol 13(1), p. 174; in Carlson 1984: 480.
- ⁴⁵ Dinu 1968, in Cahiers de linguistique théoretique et appliquée Vol 5, p. 39-45; in Carlson 1984: 495.
- ⁴⁶ Carlson 1984: 495
- ⁴⁷ Carlson 1984: 480
- ⁴⁸ Selden, Samuel 1969, Theatre Double Game, University of North Carolina Press 3
- ⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 481

-
- ⁵⁰ States, Bert O. 2008/1985. 'The World on Stage'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 441-447.443
- ⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 487
- ⁵² Published by Clarkson N. Potter, New York; quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 289.
- ⁵³ Mielziner 1970, quoted in Brockett and Ball 2004: 289
- ⁵⁴ Beckerman, Bernard. 1979/1970. Dynamics of Drama: Theory and Method of Analysis. New York: Drama Book Specialists.132-3
- ⁵⁵ Beckerman 1979/1970: 6
- ⁵⁶ Beckerman 1979/1970: 5
- ⁵⁷ Beckerman 1979/1970: 130-132
- ⁵⁸ Beckerman 1979/1970: 10, 20; also in Carlson 1984: 488.
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 488
- ⁶⁰ Beckerman 1979/1970: 13; also in Styan 1975: 109.
- ⁶¹ Styan 1975: 109
- ⁶² Beckerman 1979/1970: 57
- ⁶³ Beckerman 1979/1970: 133-4
- ⁶⁴ Beckerman 1979/1970: 139
- ⁶⁵ Beckerman 1979/1970: 135
- ⁶⁶ Beckerman 1979/1970: 139
- ⁶⁷ Beckerman 1979/1970: 141-2
- ⁶⁸ Beckerman 1979/1970: 145
- ⁶⁹ Beckerman 1979/1970: 6-7
- ⁷⁰ Beckerman 1979/1970: 133
- ⁷¹ Minks 1970, in Theater Heute Vol 11(9); in Carlson 1984: 481.
- ⁷² Published in a special issue of Poetics devoted to theatrical theory, entitled 'The Formal Study of Drama' (Vol 6(3/4) December 1977). In this issue, nine Romanian mathematicians and aestheticians considered the study of drama using linguistics, mathematics, probability and game theory and formal language (Carlson 1984: 496).
- ⁷³ Carlson 1984: 495
- ⁷⁴ Mounin 1970, Introduction à la sémiologie, Paris, p. 87; in Carlson 1984: 496.
- ⁷⁵ See Ruffini in 1974 and Kowsan in 1968
- ⁷⁶ Carlson 1984: 505
- ⁷⁷ See Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 33-49
- ⁷⁸ Carlson 1984: 509
- ⁷⁹ Bennett 1997: 48-9
- ⁸⁰ Bennett 1997: 50
- ⁸¹ Excerpt translated and discussed in Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254. 237-8.

⁸² Steinbeck 1970: 1 in Passow 1981: 237-8

Table 39/51: Theories of Theatre 1971-1972

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1970s: Fischer-Lichte claims that the 1960s experimentation in spectator participation, which was designed to overcome a perceived 'lethargic acceptance' and 'passive consumption' in the spectator, revealed that in fact 'the act of spectating was a form of active doing'.¹ This discovery occurred in Europe with the rise of the application of semiotics to theatre. American spectators continued to be treated as if they needed activating. In Britain, a debate occurred between playwright David Edgar and writer/director Bruce Birchall over the proper position of theatre, centred around the influence of government funding of theatre. Birchall argued that 'revolutionary' theatre was autonomous of society while Edgar claimed it was a direct reflection of the movement of social forces: 'the politics of production was endlessly discussed [in various left journals such as Wedge and Socialist Review] as the role of theatre in the struggle for change was constantly redefined' and the question of 'is the theatre practitioner 'inside' or 'outside' the struggle' debated.² Both positions were demonstrated, on the one hand by workers developing their own theatre and on the other hand by student intellectuals taking upon themselves the task of explaining to workers that they were exploited.
'Entretien' (1971); Esprit (1975)	Ariane Mnouchkine (1939- Director, Théâtre de Soleil	Agreed with Gatti and Benedetto on the revolutionary essence of theatre. She considered Hegel's idea of tragedy to be flawed since it suggested that the enemy was invincible. Theatre should demonstrate that 'the enemy can be conquered, that the world can be changed'.³ However, she did not believe that a critically aware spectator already existed – a popular public had to be created. She also did not agree with the idea of putting theatre into the hands of people so that they could express their concerns. The theatre should, instead, seek to establish a rapport between the public and the performance ensemble, seeking public comments on productions, and modifying the productions accordingly. Thus the public provides 'raw material' for the performers in 'the most elementary, the most direct possible form'. Her work was strongly influenced by Copeau, Brecht, Artaud, Meyerhold and the dramatic techniques of Japan and India.⁴ By 2004, Mnouchkine enjoyed 'almost unequalled status as a living cultural treasure thanks to a repertoire of landmark productions which explore aspects of the human condition through myth, legend, movement and music', as well as issues such as the fate of refugees and asylum seekers across the world. Her approach combines classical theatre as well as Eastern theatrical traditions, producing works which 'cross all barriers'. Mnouchkine has a tradition 'of greeting audience members personally with a handshake before every show', and brings special visitors, such as the Norwegian tanker Tampa's captain Arne Rinnan up on stage to receive acclaim.⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – dialogic theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art; a practice	To show how the world could be changed; to establish a rapport between the public and the performers	Doing: direction - theatre as dialogic not participatory Watching: critical spectators did not naturally exist; they had to be created
'Liegt der Dummheit auf	Franz Xaver Kroetz	Initially a supporter of realism (à la Horváth) against Brecht, with a particular focus on language as a key to meaning and a path to revolution. The loss of language was 'a	An agent of change	Social engagement;	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
der Hand? (1971); 'Horváth von heute für heute' (1971); 'Zu Bertolt Brechts 20. Todestag' (1977)	(1946- German dramatist	striking example of the degradation of the people in capitalist culture'. Brecht's characters were 'fluent', with a 'fund of language'. It was this which created Brecht's distance from reality. Krotz subsequently came to look upon Brecht more favourably. Utopianism was 'a significant part of engaged theatre': ⁶ 'In the best sense art can suggest a believable, possible better reality; at its best the criticism of society is the vision of a better society'. ⁷ Theatre which only offered sympathy, which only presented 'what one observes' was inadequate because it left the spectator to work out on his own the means of changing society. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – socially engaged theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional		utopianism	Showing: a believable, possible, better reality; a vision of a better society
'Teatro di situazione uguale teatro popolare' (1971); Interview (1974)	Dario Fo (1926- Italian communist dramatist, founder of La Commune (1970)	Favoured highly theatrical expression, using traditional devices drawn from popular theatre: farce, slapstick and commedia del arte. Fo insisted upon a theatre of 'precise documentation', but one which was not 'cold and didactic'. His work, like documentary theatre, was painstakingly researched, but unlike the documentary theatre of Hochhuth (1963) and Weiss (1963), Fo argued that it should be 'fully realized by theatrical means', so that the 'didactic information is acquired not as a lesson but as a spectacle', albeit with a 'minimum of technical means'. ⁸ Traditional bourgeois theatre was alien to the worker, so this kind of theatre had to find its own space, so that it could 'advance certain democratic appeals, to form public opinion, to stimulate, to create moments of dialectical conflict', accompanied by the expressive means of popular theatre and gesture. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-bourgeois theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A space of performance and spectacle; a practice	To teach using theatrical techniques especially spectacle; to advance democracy; to stimulate thinking	Doing: playwrighting ; directing
'The Writer's Theatre' (1971); Preface to Bingo (1974); Notes to We Came to the River (1976); Interview with John	Edward Bond (1934- English playwright	Argued that modern drama had an obligation to create an 'image and consciousness' for the working class, which had in the past been systematically excluded 'from culture' and therefore from the means of developing its 'human image'. ¹¹ The job of the writer was 'to analyze and explain our society'. Any legitimate art challenges society with necessary truths, which 'express the justice and order that are necessary to sanity but are usually destroyed by society'. ¹² Art is important to all suffering humanity. It is theatre's major responsibility to express 'the conviction that we can have a rational relationship with the world and with each other' and to bring its spectators 'to recognize a common, shared humanity', despite being shattered by the class structure of society. ¹³ There are two important aspects to life: the absolute material and metaphor: 'we live metaphors'. It is	A place people go to to explore through drama and to take a stand	To explore; to analyse and to explain society, especially why it is possible to be inhuman	Doing: playwrighting Showing: possible ways of creating humanness and their problems and consequences Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Tusa (2005) ¹⁰		how we create our humanness. People go to the theatre to explore the ways we do this. Drama has to deal with three areas: birth, death and community: 'it's the attempt to create a community [of humans] which ... is what drama in the end should be about ... what it means to be human'. Drama 'puts people in extreme situations, and [takes] the audience into those situations [so that] they have to come to some judgement', a judgement which is not intellectual, but 'an enactment', a way of saying 'here I stand'. Drama is necessary because one has to perform one's humanity, and sometimes people do this in inhuman ways. Drama allows us to take a stand: 'everybody has the right to be human'. ¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – engaged theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional			the spectator stands in the centre of the play: it is for them an enactment of judgment; a form of witnessing
A Structural Approach to the Analysis of Drama (1971)	Paul M. Levitt (1935- Writer; academic	The basic building block of drama is the scene . Structure is 'the place, relation, and function of scenes in episodes and in the whole play'. ¹⁵ Like Beckerman, he also points to variation as the means of retaining spectator interest Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: practical		To retain the spectator's interest	Doing: playwrighting
Irony and Drama: A Poetics (1971); Great Reckonings in Little Rooms: On the Phenomenology of Theater (1985); ¹⁶ The Pleasure of the Play (1994)	Bert States (1929- American theatre scholar and theoretician	States' interests include 'the semiotics of theatre, its phenomenological sign system and its transmutation to the public', building on Saussurian linguistics and Brechtian estrangement. ¹⁷ He takes a structuralist approach closer to the continental structuralists than is usual in most American theorists of the time. A major source for State's analysis of the recurring functions and relationships in drama is Kenneth Burke's Grammar of Motives : 'the essence of drama lies in a basic pattern of irony and dialectic, concentrating on the moment of peripety' [sudden change]. ¹⁸ Drama 'does not simply imitate action but imitates it in an habitual way, reflecting the manner in which dialectical man, in the face of the variety of nature, endows the events of nature "with a certain radical, and therefore comforting form". In this form acts do not merely produce further acts but tend to produce counteracts'. ¹⁹ Drama seeks 'the mastered moment' of synthesis which will convince the spectator that 'all that can be said on the subject has been said'. ²⁰ [another theory of spectator response using dialectic]. States proposes a spectrum of drama on the basis of synthesis, ranging from tragedy to the 'lyric-descriptive'. This spectrum provides 'a model of strategies by which the playwright (or poet) may express experience'. ²¹ States' Great Reckonings explores the relationship between semiotics, phenomenology and theatre, in particular the idea put forward by Guarini that spectatorship involved a double action: in the theatre, as in the world, semiotics and phenomenology provided ²²	A seeing place; an artistic practice; a semiotic and phenomenological practice	To make things unfamiliar using a range of strategies; to express experience; to affect the spectator; using representation	Doing: drama is a dialectic Showing: drama takes recognizable forms Watching: spectatorship involves a double action: binocular vision; spectators are victims – they catch the 'disease' of the image;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘complementary perspectives’ resulting in a ‘kind of binocular vision: one eye enables us to see the world phenomenally; the other eye enables us to see it significantly’.²³ If one approached the theatre semiotically, then certainly anything on the stage can be considered a sign. However, a phenomenological approach reveals that ‘there is more to be said’. The signs in the theatre point to more than their simple meaning as signs. They combine in ways which may ‘produce a real pregnancy’. All studies are perspectival: ‘workers in the same field’ will harvest ‘different kinds of crops’. Phenomenology is concerned with image, semiology with sign. Phenomenology allows one ‘to abridge the process of signification and throw the emphasis onto the empathic response’. Watching theatre is like catching a disease: ‘In the image ... we swallow the semiotic process whole and imagination catches its disease’. It is also a form of appropriation: ‘In reading, the eye is an anesthetized organ ... In the theater, however, the eye awakens and confiscates the image’. A semiotics of the theatre needs to be ‘rounded out’ with ‘a phenomenology of its imagery’ because plays can be ‘extremely “difficult” or inefficient, taken as a sign’ since they may do ‘far more than is necessary in order to mean whatever it may mean’, when signs are reductive – they incline towards efficiency.²⁴ A play also offers a sensory experience ‘that cannot be accounted for by semiotic systems’. States uses as an example the lines from Macbeth (I, vii, 1-2): ‘If it were done when ‘tis done, then ‘twere well/It were done quickly’. The done has a sound which functions like the tolling of a bell, a sound which is outside its meaning as a word: ‘sound is not consumed in its sense’ but ‘pushes its way’ into the body. It is visceral. Theatre thus has an ‘affective corporeality’ which cannot be grasped semiotically. There is also theatre’s artificiality: ‘a theatrical presentation ... is precisely marked by the limits of artifice: the frontal rigidity of our view, the positional determination of everything on stage, the condensation of [a character] into a real form, the fact that the play has already passed through the screen of an interpretation by director and actors’. This artifice can be missed by literary critics who ‘read’ theatre as a text, or only in text form: ‘Literary critics ... study assiduously ... their own dreamed text of the play’. Consequently, ‘their interpretations have a way of treating [characters such as Macbeth] as a once [and still] real man whose life, thanks to [the author] is an open book’.²⁵ In The Pleasure of the Play, States defends the need for representation, and in the process, reverse the long-standing image of theatre as a seeing-place. Instead, it becomes a seeing-place – a non-existent place between ourselves and			they are also appropriators: they ‘confiscate’ the images they see.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the world akin to the space taken up by a hologram – which allows us to see something as if it were a discrete object: '[m]ental images must be brought outside to this unspecifiable noplace between the self and the empirical world, where they are given duration and spectator – where they serve, as it were, as arbitrators of the enigma. For without external representation our subjective understanding of the world remains fleeting and ephemeral, bottled up in the ether of thought, without extension or concrete being – and this is apparently an intolerable loss'.²⁶ For States, theatre's 'primary accomplishment is not to represent the world but to be part of it, to effect a 'transaction between consciousness and the thickness of existence' – which day to day living tends to deny.²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – phenomenological approach View of Theatre: positive; functional
The Nature of Theatre (1971)	Vera Mowry Roberts	Theatre is 'that performing, or occurrent, art whose basis is the act, through which are perceived both the character and the range of human experience in the semblance of virtual life ... that art form which most vividly explores and represents what is meant by the state of being human'.²⁸ Theatre is governed by conventions, 'illusion-making devices which the spectator accepts for the sake of the illusion'. These include (a) the convention of impersonation ('we agree that x is Hamlet for the duration of the play'); (b) the acceptance that the passage of time will be whatever the playwright says it is and relative to the action; (c) the acceptance of 'stage speech': speech which is of a volume to be heard by the spectator irrespective of its function on stage; the direction of speech to or towards the spectator; (d) the acceptance of 'stage gesture' which are expected to be 'chosen and meaningful' within the context of the play and appropriate for the genre; (e) the acceptance of 'unnatural positioning' for effect, visibility or audibility; (f) the acceptance that the scene is what is suggested/represented either in scenery or in words including the acceptance of men as women, 'a handful of people as an army', that a private letter would be read aloud as it is written. 'Theatre conventions are a game which the audience agrees to play with the actors and their acting space'. Some of these conventions disappear e.g. the convention of the Elizabethan stage that a character wrapped in a cloak was invisible, however, 'so long as any convention is suitable to the occasion for which it is put to use, the audience will accept it and imaginatively make it into whatever it needs to be'.²⁹ Only 19 of 486 pages of Roberts' book is devoted to	A game involving rules or conventions; an art	Performance	Doing: the art of theatre Watching: the spectator plays the game of theatre according to the rules; they go to the theatre for the experience of 'living together' with the performers

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘seeing’ and ‘play’, even though spectators are apparently an essential part of theatre: ‘theatre happens wherever a live actor confronts and communicates with a live audience, and the transaction that takes place between them is the essence of theatre’; ‘[t]here is no theatre without an audience’; ‘... it is the mutually enjoyed experience of performers and audience which constitutes theatre the living together of an ordered existence’. People go to the theatre for this experience.³⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
‘Theatre History’ (1971) ³¹	F. Arnott Historian	Theatre is a performing art: an ephemeral art which is presented to an audience by a performer and in which the actor offers himself in order to show the stage hero’s imaginary daring i.e. the actor impersonates. This is a defining element of theatre. The arts of the theatre include acting, architecture (from C18th), scenery and lighting and directing (from late C19th).³² A play ‘only exists [as such] when it is acted before an audience’.³³ Otherwise it is a genre of literature. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-text View of Theatre: can’t say	An ephemeral performing art	Impersonation	Doing: a performing art Showing: the character
The Edge of Impossibility: Tragic Forms in Literature (1972) ³⁴	Joyce Carol Oates (1938- American novelist, critic, playwright, poet and essayist	Oates takes up the issue of tragedy from Steiner and Lionel Abel. ‘The art of tragedy grows out of a break between self and community, a sense of isolation. At its base is fear.... The drama begins only when a unique human reality asserts its passion against the totality of passion ... risking loss of self in an attempt to realize self’ and turning a ‘domestic landscape into wilderness’. When we watch a tragedy we ‘adjust ourselves to the spectacle of an art form [and] paralyse our skepticism’ so that we can witness redemption, a ‘therapy of the soul’ which makes up for having to ‘live out lives that are never works of art’. We both love art and resent it for this ... ‘the triumph over nothing that art represents ‘allows us to ‘acclaim the marvellous in ourselves’. Tragedy deals with ‘the limitations of the human world ... The abyss will always open for us’.³⁵	An art form and practice	The therapeutic expression of our fear	Doing: playwrighting - tragedy (always a possibility) Watching: We are attracted to watching tragedy (and perhaps all theatre) because it offers us redemption from lives which are not works of art

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			but simply continue
‘Ontological-Hysteric Manifestos’ (1972, 1974, 1975); ‘Foundations for a Theater’ (1992) ³⁶	Richard Foreman (1937- American avant-garde director and playwright, founder of the Ontological-Hysteric Theatre	Foreman is ‘a leading figure of alternative theatre ‘who rejects Aristotelian notions of narrative and catharsis in favour of ‘the immediacy of the visual and oral experience’. His plays ‘express life’s absurdities, folly, and chaos through the visual spectacle of bizarre and compelling images’. ³⁷ Like Handke (1966), Foreman stressed the phenomenological fact of the theatre experience. All traditional theatre, including the experimentation of Brook, Grotowski and Chaikin, is based on the same premise: ‘that a spectator is to be ‘trapped’ into some sort of emotional commitment’. ³⁸ His work is autobiographical and self-reflexive, always attempting to make the spectator aware that it is watching a theatrical work which is commenting on itself. ³⁹ Citing Wittgenstein and Gertrude Stein (1934), Foreman proposed a theatre which called attention to ‘moment-by-moment existence and the ‘intersecting process’ that is the ‘perpetual constituting and reconstituting of the self’. The goal is not to place some imagined idea or emotion before an audience but to lead the spectator to question its assumptions. The artwork should encourage the spectator to see what is there, and to see himself seeing; it should ‘ground us in what-it-is-to-be-living’. ⁴⁰ The goal of art is to provide a ‘spark’, an ‘instant of vision’. Foreman stressed sense impression, the development of the spectator’s consciousness of ‘being there’ in the theatre, and expanding ‘the audience’s capacity to perceive’. ⁴¹ Foreman claimed that the aim of his theatre was ‘to spotlight the most elusive aspects of the experience of being human’ because ‘ Human beings are to a great extent unknowable to themselves ’. ⁴² because of the way we were socially and culturally regulated. His theatre was an attempt to suggest that life could be lived or seen differently, by showing ‘a specific aspect of a chosen moment that suggests how the mind and emotions can juggle, like an acrobat, all we perceive’. The aim was to free spectators from the ‘straitjackets’ of character, empathy and narrative which simply reassured the spectator by frustrating ‘our habitual way of seeing, and by so doing’ freeing ‘inner human energies’ and the ‘vibrating, lively thing that you really are’, the way we feel our lives to be beneath its conditioning. His plays were ‘an hour and a half in which you see the world through a special pair of eyeglasses’ which magnified other aspects of experience in order to ‘speak to man’s spiritual condition, his relationship with the universe’. He explicitly rejected criticisms that his plays for not accurately representing	A defined space which is watched (if only by an invisible god); a seeing place; a company of theatre practitioners	To trap, baffle and frustrate spectators, leading them to question their assumptions; casting a spotlight which generates knowledge about ourselves; to provide a spark, and instant of vision; revelation; affect	Doing: playwrighting ; the art and practice of theatre Showing: moment by moment existence as spectacle; alternatives Watching: the experience of ‘being there’ is the basis for an expansion of the capacity to perceive

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘what they refer to as “real people” with “real” interpersonal, psychological, humanistic concerns’ [whatever that might mean!] but these things were mere accidents of birth. They were not about ‘the deeper ground of being’. ‘No work of art is absolutely truthful about life, but is a strategic maneuver performed on coagulated consciousness. ... art is a lie that tells the truth ... because it’s a chosen, strategic maneuver, which is not the truth. No art could ever be “the truth”, because it has to leave out ninety percent of life ... Art is a perspective; all perspectives are lies about the total truth; so art is a lie that, if it is strategically chosen, wakes people up. Art is a lever to affect the mind. The truth of art is in the audience’s, the individual’s awakened perceptions. It is not in the work of art’. One strategy Foreman uses to separate ‘the impulse from the object that seems to evoke it’ is to overdetermine each impulse [by offering] several reasons ... not just one’ so that the spectator doesn’t think he knows the answer and focus on that instead of the impulse or desire itself. ‘[B]afflement can clarify. Bafflement can force you to refocus your vision [so that] you see the delicate flower you’ve never observed before’. Other strategies include interruption, deflection, use of ‘double-binds’ (contradictory signals) – all to ‘frustrate the spectator’s expectations, including his tendency to identify with the performance of a powerful actor [and the] habitual identification with the goals, values, and mind-sets received from our social and cultural system... To frustrate habit is to uncover ways our impulses might be freed for use in more inventive behavior... I try to build frustration into the very structure of my performances’. Theater is ‘presence and absence. Someone or something is either onstage, or offstage’. ‘To make theater, all you need is a defined space and things that enter and leave that space ... A jar could be thrown out into an empty space, and a minute later a stick from offstage could push that jar one inch forward. That would function as theater’. ‘The deeply metaphysical concerns of the playwright poet should include: who is offstage; who is onstage; who will be coming onstage; when they will come onstage; how can an entrance or an exit have real weight. “Offstage” is a term used only in a specifically theatrical context. There is no equivalent term relevant to the consideration of a painting or a poem. ‘Most people claim that theater requires an audience. I disagree. I can imagine an entire audience walking out of a performance while the play continues to the end, and yet it remains a powerful piece of theater’ [for whom?]. I can imagine every member of an audience falling asleep and the play continuing to the end, turning into an objectification of the dream of that

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		audience. Art, conceived as a revelatory process, can indeed spin its web in the void. Who knows who is really watching? When a huge audience seems to be watching, it may be only a mass collection of habitual responses planted in the seats of the theater. When nobody seems to be watching, perhaps an invisible god has his eyes on the performance. This may well be a different kind of theater than any that has ever existed. So be it.’⁴³ [Bizarre: he is hardly conceiving of theatre without an audience here, simply conceiving it as not paying attention – the space of the audience is still there]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Aristotelian theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
Spontanes Theater (1972)	Paul Pörtner (1925- German experimental dramatist)	The leading experimenter in Germany in the 1970s engaged in enlarging the creative role of the spectator. He divides modern theatre into two general types, which equate to Grotowski’s rich and poor theatre: total and autonomous. Total theatre creates distance between itself and its spectators. Autonomous theatre, begun by Evreinov, interpenetrates theatre and life. Pörtner argues that the work of Evreinov, Artaud and Moreno ‘revealed a great deal about the process of eliciting theatrical creation from spectators, as does the more recent work of Piscator, the Living Theatre, Arrabal and Gatti. Pörtner’s work moved from improvisational theatre (built on suggestions from the spectator) to variable theatre (in which the spectator selected one of several alternative developments) to the Mitspiel, where the author provided a beginning situation, then allowed spectators ‘not only to select one of several lines of development but to actually participate in the evolving action’.⁴⁴ [This form of participatory theatre was developed with children by the Australian experimental group, Pageant Theatre in Education, during the early 1970s]. Pörtner saw Mitspiel as political theatre, not because of its content, but because of its structure and the way it worked. Unlike traditional theatre, which was authoritarian, controlled by dramatists, directors and actors, the Mitspiel allowed the public to ‘say something themselves, determine for themselves what shall be played and how’. The goal was ‘to bring into being communication among all the participants’.⁴⁵ [what is astonishing is how quickly these ideas spread, even as far as Australia] Purpose of Theorist: polemic – communication as the basis of theatre View of Theatre: positive	A vehicle for the generation of communication among all participants	To generate a relationship with the spectator (according to the kind of theatre)	Doing: playwrighting as a practice
The Presence of the Actor	Joseph Chaikin (1935-2003)	Acting is a demonstration of the self, clarified by imagination: ‘Because we live on a level drastically reduced from what we can imagine, acting promises to represent a		To demonstrate	Doing: acting;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1972)	American actor and director	dynamic expression of the intense life'. ⁴⁶ A similar idea is also expressed by Goldman (1975). Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		the self; an expression of the intense life	directing
Theatricality (1972); Sociology of Literature and Drama (1973) ⁴⁷	Elizabeth Burns Sociologist	Explored a sociological approach to theatrical theory, similar to that proposed by Schechner. The concern of the book is with theatricality rather than theatre per se , 'as it is manifested in theatre and social life'. ⁴⁸ Accepts the theory that theatre originated in religious ritual but argues that it developed its own set of 'language conventions'. Theatre both borrows from life and gives back models for the theatrical aspects of social behaviour: it is an entity in its own right, and a metaphor. Ritualization and patterning permeate all our activities. ⁴⁹ Theatre idealizes and stylizes this process. The essence of drama is the constant 'feed in and feed-back' of theatricality between stage and spectator. ⁵⁰ Drama itself is a composed product of creative work: 'The fictive worlds of the novel and drama are not mirrors of action. They are compositions ... The resemblance the fictive world has with the "real" world gives it authenticity' but does not make it the same: 'drama is a special kind of activity which consists in composing a plausible semblance of human action of an important or consequential kind'. It is one of many ways we engage in objectification as we live our lives: 'in living our lives we are engaged in a continuous process of objectification.' We produce 'deeds and things' for ourselves and for others. ⁵¹ Theatre performs a service for society by producing models of behaviour tied to consequential action. ⁵² The actor 'is an interloper between playwright and audience ... He acts [to] enact ... a confidence trick, but one in which deceit is neutralised ... by the visibly theatrical frame in which it is worked ... he acts a lie ... but a lie circumscribed and exposed ... by the relationship of trust established by theatrical tradition and conventions between players and audience'. Theatre thus operates in a relationship of trust that 'one knows all one needs to know to keep the relationship [between spectator and performer] in safe hands'. ⁵³ Theatre spectators must display the same tact and discretion that Goffman says is extended to others in social situations. For Burns, performance takes place simultaneously on two levels: the 'interaction between performers and spectators and interaction between characters in a play'. ⁵⁴ This is similar to the approach by Schechner and Hilton (1987). She distinguished between two conventions which governed a spectator's reading of a performance in relation to these	An interactive, composite art form; a model for life; an event (both real and not real); conventional	Objectification- to produce models of behaviour in relation to consequential action	Doing: the practices of theatre; acting; performance Showing: conventions; how life borrows from theatre and vice versa; ritualizing and patterning Watching: reciprocal; involves trust and tact according to two conventions: rhetorical and authenticating . We know acting is lying but we accept it as such because of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		interactions: a rhetorical convention and an authenticating convention. In the first: '[b]etween actors and spectators there is an implicit agreement that the actors will be allowed to conjure up a fictitious world ... This agreement underwrites the devices of exposition that enable the audience to understand the play. These conventions ... can be described as rhetorical. They are the means by which the audience is persuaded to accept characters and situations whose validity is ephemeral and bound to the theatre'.⁵⁵ For instance, they allow us to distinguish between genres and forms; they also 'structure the gathering and dispersal phases of performance'. They provide the 'horizons of expectation' or 'ideological framing' for the event.⁵⁶ Authenticating conventions 'model' social conventions in use at a specific time and in a specific place and milieu. The modes of speech, demeanour and action that are explicit in the play ... have to imply a connection to the world of human action of which the theatre is only a part. These conventions suggest a total and external code of values and norms of conduct from which the speech and action of the play is drawn. Their function is, therefore, to authenticate the play'.⁵⁷ These conventions connect the theatrical sign to the 'extra-theatrical' real world. Kershaw says that these distinctions offer 'a very useful protosemiotic analysis of theatrical duality',⁵⁸ which allows him to argue for the social efficacy of performance because they recognize the spectator's relationship to both 'possible worlds' and real world so that the interactions of the spectator can be seen as occurring in both theatre-as-theatre and theatre-as-social event, in both 'not real' and 'real' dimensions of a performance. Purpose of Theorist: sociological analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			the conventions which surround it.
Theater und Wissenschaft (1972)	Manfred Wekewerth German director	Wekewerth believed that 'the primary player in theater ... is not the actor but the spectator'. Spectators read into a performance 'an immense amount ... a great variety of things',⁵⁹ including things which were not there or were not intended by the performer. 'The mere appearance of a person on the stage ... leads the spectators to consider him as a sign',⁶⁰ although not necessarily any sign intended by the performer. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – primacy of the spectator View of Theatre: positive	A seeing (reading) place; a practice	Performance	Watching: spectators (the primary player) read a performance
'Theaterwissenschaft als Lehre vom theatralischen	Arno Paul German director	'[T]hat which is specifically theatrical ... is not to be found in drama. Neither does it result through 'staging', but only when this 'staging' meets spectators who are prepared to consider it as such, for that is what really counts. However much is 'played' on the side of the stage, if, on the other side, no-one correspondingly 'joins in', then such a thing as	A co-operative relationship between	To encourage the co-operation of the spectator;	Doing: directing Watching: requires co-

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Handeln ⁷ (1972) ⁶¹		theater has never existed'. ⁶² Theatre requires the co-operation of the spectator. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – centrality of the spectator ; anti-Foreman View of Theatre: positive	stage and spectator	to bring a drama to life	operation in order to create theatre

¹ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 98

² Seymour, Anna. 1996. 'Culture and political change: British radical theatre in recent history'. Theatre Research International 21 (1) pp. 8-17.9

³ Cited in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.474

⁴ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.572

⁵ 'J'Accuse', interview with Ariane Mnouchkine by Caroline Baum, for The Bulletin, October c2003-4, pp. 62-4.

⁶ Carlson 1984: 465

⁷ Cited in Carlson 1984: 465

⁸ Fo 1971, in Sipario 300, May, p. 43; in Carlson 1984: 477.

⁹ Lanfranco Binni 1975, 'Intervista con Dario Fo', in Attento te ...!, Verona, pp. 388-9; in Carlson 1984: 477.

¹⁰ One of a number of interviews with writers and director by John Tusa as part of his series Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, <http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/> accessed 2nd April 2007.

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 477

¹² In M. Hay and P. Roberts (eds), Edward Bond: A Companion to the Plays, London, 1978, pp. 45, 70; in Carlson 1984: 477.

¹³ Edward Bond 1975, Bingo and the Sea, New York, p. xi; in Carlson 1984: 477.

¹⁴ Edward Bond 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/bond_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.

¹⁵ Levitt, Paul 1971, A Structural Approach to the Analysis of Drama, Walter de Gruyter. 66

¹⁶ An excerpt entitled 'The World on Stage' is reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 441-447.

¹⁷ Krasner 2008: 441

¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 489

¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 489

²⁰ States, Bert 1971, Irony and Drama: A Poetic, NY, Ithaca, 141, cited in Carlson 1984: 489

²¹ States 1971: 228

²² Carlson 1992: 102

²³ States, Bert 1985, Great Reckonings in Little Rooms: On the Phenomenology of Theater, Berkeley, University of California Press, 8

²⁴ States 2008/1985: 441-5

-
- ²⁵ States 2008/1985: 444-5
- ²⁶ States, Bert O. 1994. The Pleasure of the Play. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.20
- ²⁷ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 43
- ²⁸ Roberts, Vera Mowry. 1971. The Nature of Theatre. New York, Evanston, San Francisco and London: Harper and Row.43
- ²⁹ Roberts 1971: 117-228
- ³⁰ Roberts 1971: 27-30
- ³¹ In John Russell Brown (ed) 1971, Drama and the Theatre: with Radio, Film and Television: an outline for the student, London, Routledge and Kegan Paul
- ³² Arnott, F. 1971. 'Theatre History'. In Drama and the Theatre: with Radio, Film and Television: an outline for the student, edited by J. R. Brown. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 13-44. 33
- ³³ Arnott 1971: 27
- ³⁴ Excerpt in Krasner 2008: 387-389.
- ³⁵ Oates 2008/1972: 387-9
- ³⁶ Excerpt from Unbalancing Acts: Foundations for a Theater, reprinted in Krasner 2008: 489-493.
- ³⁷ Krasner 2008: 489
- ³⁸ Carlson 1984: 463
- ³⁹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 553
- ⁴⁰ Foreman 1976, Plays and Manifestos, ed. Kate Davy, New York, pp. 70-74, 145, 189; in Carlson 1984: 463.
- ⁴¹ Bonnie Marranca 1977, The Theatre of Images, New York, p. xv; in Carlson 1984: 464. These characteristics were also to be seen in the work of 1970s avant-garde directors such as Robert Wilson and Lee Breuer, according to Marranca.
- ⁴² Quoted in Krasner 2008: 489
- ⁴³ Quoted in Krasner 2008: 490-3
- ⁴⁴ Carlson 1984: 481
- ⁴⁵ Pörtner 1972, Spontanes Theater, Cologne, pp. 82, 93; in Carlson 1984: 482.
- ⁴⁶ Cited in Carlson 1984: 492
- ⁴⁷ A compilation edited by Burns and her husband Tom Burns.
- ⁴⁸ Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman.6
- ⁴⁹ Carlson 1984: 483
- ⁵⁰ Burns 1972: 231-2
- ⁵¹ Burns, Elizabeth, and Tom Burns. 1973. 'Introduction'. In Sociology of Literature and Drama, edited by E. Burns and T. Burns. London: Penguin Books. 18-24
- ⁵² Burns 1972: 35
- ⁵³ Burns 1972: 146-7
- ⁵⁴ Burns 1972: 31
- ⁵⁵ Burns 1972: 31
- ⁵⁶ Kershaw, Baz. 1992. The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention. London: Routledge. 26

⁵⁷ Burns 1972: 32

⁵⁸ Kershaw 1992: 25

⁵⁹ Wekewerth 1972: 46-8 in Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254.238

⁶⁰ Passow 1981: 241

⁶¹ See Passow 1981: 238.

⁶² Paul 1972: 34, in Passow 1981: 238

Table 40/51: Theories of Theatre 1973-1974

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Handeln und Zuschauen (1973)	Uri Rapp Sociologist	Considers theatre both as a social situation and as the embodiment of social interrelations. The keys to drama are ‘action and observation’. These take place both inside and outside the theatre in ‘role-playing, arrangement of situation, presentation, observation of self and others’ etc. ¹ The unity of social man in ‘an open-ended aggregate of played, playable, fantastical, and anticipated roles’. Human society ‘created the theatre as a model, a copy in which society’s own signification could be symbolized’. ² Purpose of Theorist: sociological analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional	A social situation; a model of social interaction	Social play which symbolically represents society	Doing: drama Showing: models for life
‘Literature as Act’ (1973)	Richard Ohmann American academic and writer	The ‘movement of the characters and changes in their relations to one another within the social world of the play appear most clearly in their illocutionary acts’. ³ (Taken up by Elam 1980). Purpose of Theorist: literary analysis View of Theatre: positive		Representation through action	Doing: plays (literature)
‘La dent, la paume’ (1973)	Jean-François Lyotard (1924-1998) Postmodern theorist	Lyotard was a participant at a festival in Venice in 1972 in which semioticians subjected the work of Japanese actors to semiotic analysis. Lyotard denounced this activity as ‘perpetuating the Occidental view of the Japanese as lifeless “objects” for intellectual analysis’ ⁴ [although it could be argued that they applied this to their own culture as well]. In 1973 he questioned the general validity of a theatre theory based on semiotics, based on philosophical grounds. Semiotic analysis was based on absence (nihilisme) – an assumption that there was something behind the sign. Instead, theatre should be analysed based on what is there. He proposed a ‘theatre of energies’ rather than signs, built on ‘libidinal displacements’ rather than ‘representative substitutions’. ⁵ He defined theatre as: ‘A theatre involves three limits or divisions or closures. First, the outside walls of the building itself. The ‘real’ world is outside, the theatre inside ... Within the theatre comes a second limit or division, separating the stage from the audience, marking off the place observed and the place from which it is observed ... A third essential limit separates the stage from the wings or back-stage’. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis/polemic-anti-semiotic analysis View of Theatre: positive	A building in which observation takes place; a division of space; a dividing practice	Performance before spectators	Showing: libidinal displacements not representations
The Iceman, the Arsonist,	Robert Heilman (1906-2004)	Refused to acknowledge ‘the obituaries posted to commemorate the death of tragedy’. ⁷ The tragic sense persisted. It was tenacious and it existed in modern drama as a		To provide a perspective	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
and the Troubled Agent: Tragedy and Melodrama on the Modern Stage (1973)	American educator and writer	‘tendency’. In trying to identify this tendency, Heilman redefined melodrama, which came to take on a radically different meaning from its Victorian sense: it ‘is now no longer the harlot among the genres’.⁸ Although Styan believes Heilman is mistaken in seeing tragedy as still an active genre, he thinks the reformulation of melodrama, and the distinctions Heilman drew between it and tragedy has been useful to theatre theory. Melodrama, now ‘a drama of pathos centred on sick characters’, offers a different perspective on the catastrophe that follows from human evil than tragedy. Styan considers that this ‘squares’ theory with practice with regard to melodrama.⁹ According to Heilman, ‘In tragedy, dividedness is inner; in melodrama, it is outer. In tragedy, one potentiality in man is pitted against another; in melodrama, man is pitted against another man, or against certain other men, or a social group or order, or a condition, or even against events and phenomena. In melodrama, one attacks or is attacked ... In tragedy, good and evil are a private matter, whatever their public repercussions; in melodrama, they are a public matter, whatever their private repercussions. In tragedy, two alternative but incompatible goods may struggle for the soul; in melodrama, they struggle in society or in the world [a struggle] we tend to conceive of as between good and evil’.¹⁰ Melodramatic elements can exist with tragic elements, as in Macbeth,¹¹ [although Styan still refutes the existence of tragedy in the modern age]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (literary) View of Theatre: positive; functional		on catastrophe	- tragedy and melodrama (genres of drama)
‘On Marcus’ Methods for the Analysis of the Strategy of a Play’ (1974)	Barron Brainerd (1928- Mathematics of language; Victoria Neufeldt (1939- Canadian lexicographer	Warned about the limits of Marcus’ mathematical analyses. They were ‘a useful tool for bringing out nuances of plot structure [but could not be] relied upon by itself to yield an explication of play structure unaided by other critical considerations’ including the thematic features of the play.¹² Purpose of Theorist: analysis (literary) View of Theatre: n/r			Doing: plays (literature)
‘Semiotica del teatro: ricognizione degli studi’	Franco Ruffini Italian Semiologist	The codes of sender and receiver [the elements of the linguistic model of communication] differ in the theatre, but communication requires only that each knows the other’s codes, not that ‘the two codes coincide nor that they translate each other’s messages exactly, nor that the two-way communication occur along the same channel’.¹³	A form of communication	Communication	Doing: the practice of theatre: sending codes

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1974)		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – communication model View of Theatre: positive			Watching: receiving codes
‘Creusets’ (1974); ‘Le code théâtrale’ in Sémiologie de la représentation (1975); ‘Le discours théâtrale’ (1980) ‘The Semiology of Theater: Or, Communications Swamped’ (1981) ¹⁴	André Helbo Semiotician	Founded the review Degrés in 1972, for the interdisciplinary study of semiotics. Warned against too literal an application of the language communication model to theatre research. Stressed the importance of code over message in the theatre. The spectator was rarely offered a single message but was rather ‘called upon to recognize the workings of and to play with a variety of interpretive possibilities in a complex system of codes’. ¹⁵ Helbo’s 1980 essay, published in Durand’s collection La relation théâtrale , is a preliminary exploration of the dynamic which he proposes as basic to the creation of the theatrical object: the dialectic between discourse and theatre, between the ‘theatricality inherent in the signifying practice of language [and the] act of theatrical discourse where the stage creates language’. ¹⁶ Theatre can be considered a species of communication because it is ‘comprised, among other things, of intentional signs: it postulates a reversible relationship between the sender and the receiver; and it accentuates the phatic, connative, and emotive functions ... Semiological reading is in itself creative within a circularity, an “act” in which all the interlocutors participate’. ¹⁷ [Helbo was arguing against the claim by Mounin that semiologists tended to assume that theatre was a species of communication rather than demonstrate it, and that there were aspects of theatre which did not fit into definitions of communications which required reversibility. Helbo argues that Mounin thinks this because he thinks of theatre solely in terms of spectacle]. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – communication model View of Theatre: positive	A place of representation which is semiotic in character; a species of communication	Representation	Doing: communicating Showing: intentional signs Watching: a dialectic process of reading and decoding complex systems of codes; communication through intentional signs is an interactive process
‘Three Day Human Circus’ (1973)	Derek Nicholson New Zealand designer and director	Developed participatory children’s theatre along the lines of Pörtner’s theories. Essentially base on Horace’s idea that theatre should both instruct and delight, with the twist that whatever delighted was likely to teach more effectively (a motto taken up by Pageant Theatre with whom Nicholson worked). ¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – participatory theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A tool of education	Teaching	Doing: participatory theatre as a practice
Teatro do oprimido [The Theatre of the Oppressed]	Augusto Boal (1931- Brazilian	Essential theorist. A searching exploration of the political implications of the performance-spectator relationship, much of Boal’s work ‘represents political theatre at its most direct and committed’, accompanied by ‘ an attempt to abolish the gap between	‘[A] pedagogical instrument	Education; a rehearsal for revolution ,	Doing: participatory theatre;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Oppressed] (1974); ²⁰ Legislative Theatre: Using Performance to Make Politics (1998)	director, politician and founder and artistic director of Arena Theatre of São Paulo (1956-1971), 'Newspaper Theatre', 'Invisible Theatre' ²¹ and 'Forum Theatre'; member of the Brazil national legislature 1992	performers and spectators to the greatest extent possible '. ²² Like Brecht, Boal rejected 'Aristotelian' drama as an instrument of the established class structure. He provides an historical analysis of the origins of theatre, seeing theatre as originally 'a celebration of an entire people' which was later taken over by the aristocracy and turned to their own ends, which were essentially propagandistic and coercive, and politically motivated. According to Boal, Aristotle constructed 'the first, extremely powerful poetic-political system for intimidation of the spectator, for elimination of the 'bad' or illegal tendencies of the audience'. ²³ Dividing actors from the public converted the public into spectators who were unable to influence the course of the action, whereas audiences for popular theatre were 'interested in experimenting, in rehearsing, and ... abhor the 'closed' spectacles. In those cases, they try to enter into a dialogue with the actors, to interrupt the action, to ask for explanations without waiting politely for the end of the play. Contrary to the bourgeois code of manners, the people's code allows and encourages the spectator to ask questions, to dialogue, to participate' in what Boal designates 'rehearsal-theatre' to distinguish it from the bourgeois 'spectacle-theatre'. ²⁴ Drawing a distinction between the protagonists (aristocrats) and the chorus (the people) also led the spectators to identify with the protagonist, the basis of catharsis. Bourgeois theatre retained these divisions, but made the hero a product of his environment. In Ionesco, finally, man became 'completely dehumanized and abstract'. The history of theatre has thus been a history of dehumanization. The proletariat must now create a new and radically different theatre. In the 'theatre of the oppressed', spectators would no longer delegate power to actors but assume 'the protagonistic role' themselves, change the dramatic action, try out solutions and discuss plans for change. Thus the theatre would become a 'rehearsal for revolution'. ²⁵ Boal proposed experiments which were similar to those of Gatti (1959), the most famous of which was Joker , an attempt to present simultaneously a performance and its analysis. The Joker stands between the play and the spectator, 'commenting, guiding, creating and breaking the illusion' and urging the spectator to view the play critically. ²⁶ According to Lovelace, Boal 'looked to theater as an instrument of education, rejecting the popular idea of theater as only spectacle and entertainment. His objective was to increase the capacity to confront internal and external factors in deeply rooted conflict by increasing the capacity to conceive of change'. ²⁷ The process called The Joker allowed the spectator to see a situation from different angles,	for social change'; historically, a ritual or celebration; a rehearsal for revolution; a form of coercion	for action; offering a way of exploring alternatives	rehearsing for life; politics Watching: participatory (including the possibility of 'duped' participation through invisible theatre)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		which was meant to enable them to come to understand why something had occurred and to imagine what might come next. This approach involved seven stages: dedication, explanation, episode, scenes, commentary, interview and exhortation. Dedication involved paying homage to some individual who had enabled the production in some way. ‘Thus education of the audience begins’.²⁸ Explanation operated as a form of intervention, imposed by The Joker if it was thought more information was needed to enable the production to proceed. Episodes were the groupings of interdependent scenes, although each scene was taken to be complete in itself, a demonstration of change. Commentary connected one scene to another, usually through the device of a chorus singing in rhymed verse. If it was felt that a particular character needed to provide more information, The Joker could call for an interview in which the character spoke directly about what they believed to be true and why. Exhortation involved The Joker making an appeal to the spectator in prose or song in accordance with the theme.²⁹ [These kinds of techniques, which would be familiar strategies used with actors by most theatre directors were directed at the spectator, in effect turning them into performers at a rehearsal in which a certain amount of improvisation was being used. It is questionable as to whether this kind of activity could in fact be called theatre, since the element of showing was largely subsumed under doing]. Boal used a number of techniques designed to challenge stereotypes and ‘rigid perception’, including the introduction of multiple images designed to invoke ‘multiple perceptions’ of a situation or characteristic. Boal basically believed that theatre ‘should function in the life of the receiver, resonating their values and aspirations’.³⁰ It should not ‘show the correct path, but only ... offer the means by which all possible paths may be examined’.³¹ He totally rejected the separation of art from politics, something he accused Aristotle of promoting. According to Boal, Aristotle had seen theatre as ‘one of the controls to teach and reinforce the inferior role of those deemed unequal’ and to promote the idea that happiness consisted in obeying the laws. Aristotle had actually constructed a powerful political system designed to intimidate the spectator and eliminate their bad or illegal tendencies,³² and his idea of purgation was actually a purgation of the spectators’ ‘tragic flaw’ – the urge and capability of ‘changing society: ‘A catharsis of the revolutionary impetus is produced! Dramatic action substitutes for real action’.³³ Boal rejected this passive role for the spectator, proposing an ‘aesthetics of the oppressed’ which would transform the spectator into a ‘spect-actor’.³⁴

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘The spectator is less than a man and it is necessary to humanize him, to restore him to his capacity for action in all its fullness. He too must be a subject, an actor on an equal place with those generally accepted as actors, who must also be spectators. All these experiments of a people’s theatre have the same objective – the liberation of the spectator, on whom the [bourgeois] theatre has imposed finished visions of the world ... The spectators in the people’s theatre (i.e. the people themselves) cannot go on being the passive victims of those images ... The spectator frees himself; he thinks and acts for himself! Theatre is action ... a rehearsal of revolution’.³⁵ Boal’s work has become ‘a manifesto for revolutionary and socially conscious theatre’ throughout the world.³⁶ His techniques, exercises and games have been applied to a variety of cultures and situations all over the world and his work is seen as ‘psycho-therapeutic as well as political in its orientation and impact’.³⁷ It is widely used in contemporary ‘community theatre’. According to Boal, Aristotle ‘tells us that poetry, tragedy, theater have nothing to do with politics. But reality tells us something else ... all of man’s activities ... especially theater – are political. And theater is the most perfect artistic form of coercion’. Aristotle’s coercive system of tragedy worked through the establishment of a relationship called empathy in which the spectator – ‘feeling as if he himself is acting – enjoys the pleasures and suffers the misfortunes of the character’.³⁸ This system ‘survives to this day [for example in Westerns, television, the movies, the circus and the theatre], thanks to its great efficacy. It is, in effect, a powerful system of intimidation’ aimed at ‘the purgation of all antisocial elements. ... This system functions to diminish, placate, satisfy, eliminate all that can break the balance’. Now, however, the spectator is starting ‘to act again ... The people reassume their protagonistic function in the theater and in society’ (471). Boal, unlike many theatre theorists, does not berate popular spectators: ‘Popular audiences are interested in experimenting, in rehearsing, and they abhor the “closed” spectacles’. Boal believed that “spectator” had become ‘a bad word’; all the experiments he undertook were designed to liberate the spectator ‘on whom the theater has imposed finished visions of the world ... and [d]ramatic action ... for real action’. In this way it goes further than Brecht, who encouraged spectators to think for themselves but to delegate power to characters to ‘act’ in their place. In the poetics of the oppressed, ‘the spectator no longer delegates power to the characters either to think or to act in his place’.³⁹ Boal advocated a number of ‘techniques’ for popular theatre: newspaper theatre-

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		a variety of ways of reading and improvising on news items;⁴⁰ invisible theatre - the point of which is 'to bring the off stage and the beneath the stage up front and personal onto the center stage. It is to get people on the street to enter into a self-reflective debate about taken-for-granted oppressions all around them'.⁴¹ Invisible theatre 'consists of the presentation of a scene in an environment other than the theatre, before people who are not spectators' but are 'there by chance' and who 'must not have the slightest idea that it is a 'spectacle', for this would make them 'spectators''. It 'erupts in a location chosen as a place where the public congregates. All the people who are near become involved in the eruption' so that the effects last long after the skit (which had been well-rehearsed to enable the actors to incorporate whatever people might do) is ended; photo-romance (using cliché plots for improvisation); breaking the repression - 'asking a participant to remember a particular moment' of repression and then attempt to generalise from it; myth theatre - improvisations around well-known myths to explore their 'hidden truths'; analytical theatre - improvisations and analysis around a story told by one of the participants; rituals and masks -to reveal how the 'relations of production ... determine the culture of a society'.⁴² Boal considered empathy to be 'the emotional relationship which is established between the character and the spectator and which provokes, fundamentally, a delegation of power on the part of the spectator, who becomes an object in relation to the character; whatever happens to the latter, happens vicariously to the spectator'.⁴³ Boje et al claim that Invisibility Theatre 'seduces spectators into becoming accompanying actors in the drama', which suggests a rather insidious exercise of power on the part of the actors.⁴⁴ With his election to the Brazil legislature, Boal began developing a 'new mode of theatre' which he called Legislative Theatre, which involved developing his techniques of theatre for application to the parliament.⁴⁵ The aim was to foster participatory, interactive democracy, to transform citizens into legislators: 'We do not accept that the elector should be a mere spectator to the actions of the parliamentarian, even when these actions are right: we want the electors to give their opinions, to discuss the issues, to put counter-arguments, we want them to share the responsibility for what the parliamentarian does'.⁴⁶ As an example of this work, Fortier describes 'The Chamber in the Square': 'a mock-parliament in which there is a public discussion and debate of a very precise legislative question, so that 'participants not only vote but must also explain their positions'.⁴⁷ These public debates then influenced Boal's

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		vote in the national legislature; in this way theatre becomes ‘one of the ways in which political activity can be conducted’.⁴⁸ [It is hard to see the difference between this and the various forms of direct democracy already being used in Australia e.g. mock parliaments; mock United Nations etc which encourage role-play, as well as events like the Constitutional Convention – all are staged, including Boal’s theatre based democracy. Is this a solution to the so-called passivity of Western politics? Some, like Coco Fusco, argue that it is only relevant to particular places, and in any case, can act as a ‘straitjacket’ for performers who do not engage in politics in this Habermasian and dialogic way⁴⁹]. Boal was imprisoned and tortured for his radical views in Brazil in 1971, and subsequently spent many years exiled in Argentina, Peru and France. He returned to Brazil in 1986.⁵⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-politically engaged theatrical activity; anti-Aristotelian theatre View of Theatre: functional
Understanding Playscripts (1974)	Roger Gross (1931- Actor and writer	Distinguishes between drama (an artistic genre and a species of literature), a play (a kind of occurrence) and the playscript (a symbolic notation on which a certain kind of play is based), possibly in an effort to draw away from the focus on literature which has always beset theatre theory. Proposes a theory of interpretation. Artists (director, in particular, and actors) [I would add designers as well] must understand the process of signification, the ‘influence of all of the sign-field’. They must also become expert in the knowledge of the ‘internal and external relationships that create the apprehensible structure of the work’.⁵¹ This knowledge then has to be turned toward the public in a way which allows them to comprehend the work. The ambiguity of each sign has to be reduced by attributing to it a meaning ‘which integrates that sign with all other signs in the work in one meaning-structure’.⁵² This is ‘an open-ended process, since understanding is always tentative and provisional, but the goal is a performance with the greatest possible degree of apprehensible relevance, continuity, coherence, and congruity’. Gross’s work has a close affinity with European theorists who were developing a modern semiotics of the theatre at the time.⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive	A form of communication	Signification through performance	Doing: the practice of theatre requires an awareness of signification Showing: what theatre does

¹ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.483

-
- ² Rapp 1973, Handeln und Zuschauen, Zurich, p. 168; in Carlson 1984: 483.
- ³ Ohmann 1973 in Seymour Chatman (ed), Approaches to Poetics, New York, p. 83; in Carlson 1984: 505.
- ⁴ Carlson 1984: 506
- ⁵ Lyotard 1973, Les dispositifs pulsionnels, Paris, pp. 95-6; in Carlson 1984: 506.
- ⁶ Quoted in Geoffrey Bennington 1988, Lyotard: Writing the Event, New York, pp. 10-11; cited in Parker, Andrew, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick. 1995. 'Introduction'. In Performativity and Performance, edited by A. Parker and E. K. Sedgwick. New York: Routledge, pp. 1-18.17n3.
- ⁷ Styan, J.L. 1975. Drama, Stage and Audience. London: Cambridge University Press. 71
- ⁸ Styan 1975: 71
- ⁹ Styan 1975: 71
- ¹⁰ Heilman, 1973, The Iceman, the Arsonist, and the Troubled Agent: Tragedy and Melodrama on the Modern Stage, Seattle, p. 46; in Styan 1975: 72.
- ¹¹ Styan 1975: 73
- ¹² Brainerd and Neufeldt 1974, in Poetics Vol 10, p. 73; in Carlson 1984: 496.
- ¹³ Ruffini 1974 in Biblioteca teatrale, Vol 9, p. 40; in Carlson 1984: 497.
- ¹⁴ In Poetics Today Vol 2(3), Drama, Theater, Performance: A Semiotic Perspective, pp. 105-111.
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 498
- ¹⁶ Helbo 1980: 104
- ¹⁷ Helbo 1981: 111
- ¹⁸ Helbo 1981: 160
- ¹⁹ Personal communication: the 'Three Day Human Circus' was conducted at a number of Sydney public schools, including Greenwich Primary School, during 1973.
- ²⁰ Boal, Augusto. 1979/1974. Theatre of the Oppressed. London: Pluto Press. 'Empathy or What? Emotion or Reason?' and an excerpt from 'Experiments with the People's Theatre in Peru' from Theatre of the Oppressed are reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 394-6 and referenced as Boal 2008/1974; excerpts also reprinted in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. Excerpts from the chapter 'Poetics of the Oppressed' from the same book are reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 254-260.
- ²¹ Invisible theater 'consists of the presentation of a scene in an environment other than the theater before people who are not spectators', for example in a restaurant, a sidewalk, a market, a train, a line of people. 'The people who witness the scene are those who are there by chance. During the spectacle, these people must not have the slightest idea that it is a "spectacle" for this would make them "spectators"'. The scenes are rehearsed sufficiently to allow the actors to incorporate the interventions of the spectators into the scene (Boal 1979, excerpt in Gerould 2000: 466-473, p. 472-3). The form was developed and used by Boal in order to resist detection by police (Gerould 2000: 462), but has since become a feature of street theatre of various kinds. Although Augusto Boal insisted that invisible theatre was theatre, that it 'contains all the ingredients of theatre and is performed as theatre' (Boal cited in Lorek-Jezinska), how it was received remains controversial according to Lorek-Jezinska: '[p]erformed as it is without theatrical frameworks or signals, invisible theatre is always double-edged; it encourages authentic participation on the part of the spectator on the one hand, yet on the other, it is based on ultimate deception. If the cause to which an invisible theatre project is devoted is not serious enough the spect-actors may find themselves very uncomfortably duped. The rationale for invisible theatre is to prepare its witnesses for active intervention in the case of similar occurrences in everyday life - in other words, to train people in social and political activities. Invisible theatre increases people's awareness of certain problems, familiarises them with certain situations and encourages them to formulate independent opinions. However, the deception on which invisible theatre is based can prove counter-productive. Once involved in such a deceptive event, spect-actors may become distrustful whenever a similar occurrence happens to them (Lorek-Jezinska, Edyta 2002. 'Audience activating techniques and their educational efficacy'. Applied Theatre Research 3 (4 Article 6) www.gu.edu.au/centre/cpci/atr/journal/number4_article6.htm). The term invisible theatre has been taken up in an entirely different way by The Invisible Theater (IT) of Tucson. This organization is dedicated 'to producing quality theatre and arts education experiences for all facets of the community in an intimate setting that showcases local professional talent and guest artists'. The invisible refers to 'the invisible energy that flows between a performer and audience, creating the magic of theatre'. The group began in 1971 as an arena for local playwrights, but has expanded its programs to include adaptations of classics and recent Off-Broadway plays and musicals, while continuing to encourage new playwrights through both full productions and stage readings (Invisible Theater 2007: www.invisibletheatre.com/html/about_us.html accessed 19/4/2007). This apolitical form of invisible theatre acknowledges the form of theatre advocated by Boal, but, especially in celebrating its venue and 'Main Season' would seem to be not just its polar opposite, but a complete misunderstanding.

²² Brandt 1998: 254

²³ Boal 1979, The Theatre of the Oppressed, trans. C.A. and M. McBride, New York, p. xiv; in Carlson 1984: 475.

²⁴ Boal 1998/1974: 254-5

²⁵ Boal 2008/1974: 396

²⁶ Carlson 1984: 476; Gerould 2000: 463

²⁷ Lovelace, Alice. 1996. 'A Brief History of Theater Forms (from Aristotle to Brecht, Baraka, O'Neal, and Boal)'. In Motion Magazine February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27/02/2007.

²⁸ Lovelace 1996

²⁹ Lovelace 1996

³⁰ Lovelace 1996

³¹ Boal 2000/1974: 472

³² Lovelace 1996

³³ Boal 1998/1974: 260

³⁴ Gerould 2000: 463

³⁵ Boal 1998/1974: 260

³⁶ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 582

³⁷ Gerould 2000: 463

³⁸ Boal 2000/1974: 465

³⁹ Boal 2000/1974: 472-3

⁴⁰ Boal 1998/1974: 255

⁴¹ Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).

⁴² Boal 1998/1974: 256-9

⁴³ Boal, Augusto. 1979/1974. Theatre of the Oppressed. London: Pluto Press. 102

⁴⁴ Boje et al 2003

⁴⁵ Boal, Augusto. 1998. Legislative Theatre: Using performance to make politics. Translated by A. Jackson. London and New York: Routledge. 5

⁴⁶ Boal 1998: 20

⁴⁷ Boal 1998: 93

⁴⁸ Boal 1998: 20. See also Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.212

⁴⁹ Fusco, Coco. 2000. Corpus Delecti: Performance Art of the Americas. London: Routledge.

⁵⁰ Brandt 1998: 254

⁵¹ Carlson 1984: 489

⁵² Gross 1974: 121 cited in Carlson 1984: 489-90

⁵³ Carlson 1984: 490

Table 41/51: Theories of Theatre 1975-1977

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Essay in Sémiologie de la représentation (1975); 'Semiotics of Theatrical Performance' (1977); ¹ The Limits of Interpretation (1994)	Umberto Eco (1932 - Italian semiotician and novelist	Discusses the complexity and variability of the theatrical sign, and the strategies spectators bring to the decoding of a performance. Looks to recent research in kinesics, proxemics and paralinguistics for aids in reading the signals emitted. In the 1977 English version of this essay, Eco introduced the idea of ostentation as the fundamental sign-producing process in the theatre: ostended signs are not 'actively produced [but] picked up among the existing physical bodies and shown or ostended ... de-realiz[ed] ... in order to make it stand for an entire class'. ² Ostentation is 'the most basic instance of performing', a form of showing . ³ Since (as Chekov pointed out) 'everything on stage is a sign, the mere placing of an object on stage is a process of ostentation '. ⁴ In theatre, however, 'there is a 'square semiosis' ... an object, first recognized as a real object, is then assumed as a sign in order to refer back to another object (or to a class of objects) whose constitutive stuff is the same as that of the representing object' [as drunks can be represented by a single 'drunk']), and at the moment that a spectator accepts a representation, every element of that representation 'becomes significant' even if its presence is accidental [the representative drunk has black teeth]. Life is [semiotically] performative. 'It is not theatre that is able to imitate life; it is social life that is designed as a continuous performance [which may or may not be intentional] and, because of this, there is a link between theatre and life'. One can get from a matrix of ambiguous signs 'all the basic plots of Western comedy and tragedy, from Menander to Pirandello, or from Chaplin to Antonioni'. 'In a certain sense every dramatic performance ... is composed by two speech acts. The first one is performed by the actor who is making a performative [and truthful] statement – 'I am acting ... The second one is represented by a pseudo-statement where the subject of the statement is already the character, not the actor' which we agree to believe is truthful for the time being because the representation 'has been framed within a sort of performative situation that established that it has to be taken as a sign'. ⁵ Eco 'later came around to the view that there was an inherent hard core of meaning and that interpretation had been given too much theoretical scope'. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive	A semiotic activity	Representation through ostentation	Showing: extended signs which are performed Watching: spectatorship as decoding
Essay in Sémiologie de	Pavel Campeanu	Anticipates the increased interest in theatre spectators by semioticians after 1980. Draws a distinction between theatre and more 'open' forms like sports: theatre 'has always an	A formal activity	Communication; affect	Doing: a signifying

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
la représentation (1975)	Semiotician	obligatory program for the protagonists whom the spectators are called upon to discover'. However, this is not a straightforward communication process because theatre combines signs (which have a generally circumscribed relation to everyday experience) and symbols (which are open to creative elaboration). Theatre is not concerned with 'informational density but with emotional density'. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive; functional			practice Showing: representation - a combination of signs and symbols Watching: a process of discovery
'Problemi e aspetti di un approccio semiotico al teatro' (1975); 'Lo spettacolo come testo' (1979); Semiotica del teatro: L'analisi dello spettacolo (1982); 'Dramaturgy of the spectator' (1987); ⁸ The Semiotics of Performance (1993) ⁹	Marco de Marinis Semiotics of Theatre	A summary of the available research on theatre semiotics to 1975, which concluded that 'the application of informational and cybernetic methodologies to theatre had not yet produced the anticipated results'. ¹⁰ This was because of a methodological emphasis on the written text and a tendency to regard 'the concrete dimensions of the spectacle [as] marginal or irrelevant'. Despite the difficulties, any effective semiotic approach to theatre had to consider it as 'a complex set of interrelations or heterogeneous models, reducible only with difficulty (or not reducible at all) to a homogeneous higher model'. ¹¹ Took issue with Ubersfeld's (1977) approach: a true semiotics of theatre 'must move away from a consideration of the (written) text as spectacle to one of the spectacle [itself] as (semiotic) text'. The 'most obvious feature of the spectacle is its absence. A performance once completed is unrecapturable'. ¹² The 'spectacle text' is not only unrecapturable, it is multicode, multidimensional and pluralistic in material. Its beginning and end can be marked in a variety of ways and it may or may not have an internal coherence. Each spectacle creates a new textual system. The spectator is encouraged to attempt plural readings, some pertinent and some not, and must work both inductively and deductively. There are not 'general' minimal units or theatrical codes. Each production evolves its own segmentation in terms of its individual codes and subcodes. Meaning is created 'within the spectacle, not by means of any external systems'. ¹³ Stage performance always involves communication on at least two levels: infrascenic (between characters) and extrascenic (between stage and spectator). The most neglected area of theatre semiotics [and of theatre theory in general] is the analysis of the spectator's role in the spectacle, both their decoding of the performance signs, and the vastly more complex process of	A semiotic activity; a medium of communication	Communication between artist and spectator	Doing: performance – a concrete spectacle Showing: signs to be interpreted (spectacle as text) Watching: the spectator is encouraged to attempt plural readings from which to draw an interpretation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		interpretation. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive; functional
Drama und Mitspiel (1975)	Ulrich Pfaendler German academic	Attempted to relate Pörtner's experiments to Walzel's concepts of open and closed drama. Closed drama 'poses, develops, and concludes a defined problem during the performance, with a solution provided by the author'. ¹⁴ Identification is the only form of spectator participation allowed. Open drama presents a problem from real life which is developed by analogy, and which stimulates 'a process within the spectator, who is then responsible for a solution outside the theatre'. However, Mitspiel reconstructs a real problem in the theatre, which it then develops and solves by experimentation which involves the active participation of the spectator. Here the 'emotional identification of the closed form and the rational analysis of the open are ... fused into something close to a life situation'. Thus Mitspiel approaches real life more closely than either open or closed drama. ¹⁵ Time and place of performance are identical with reality; even in the controlled opening sections, the actors remain close to reality so that spectators can relate to them subsequently and speech is natural. Pfaendler argued that the actors should be cast 'as closely as possible to the roles they play' in age, appearance, beliefs and socio-political orientation in order to facilitate improvisation, but the work of Pageant Theatre indicates that this was not a necessity. More important was flexibility and a transparency of role adoption, so that it was clear when actors were adopting a persona. Pfaendler claimed that Mitspiel was the theatrical 'embodiment of the democratic process'. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A place in which drama is performed	To encourage different kinds of participation from the spectator	Doing: drama Showing: problems Watching: level of participation will depend on whether the drama is open or closed or a combination (mitspiel)
The Theatrical Event: A "Mythos", A Vocabulary, A Perspective (1975)	David Cole (1939- American theorist and playwright	Theatre is 'an opportunity to experience imaginative life as physical presence'. ¹⁷ Its elements include: the script ('the home' or 'source'), the actor, the spectator, the scenic and the language. A focus on theatre as 'a quasi-magical space, created primarily by the shamanistic figure of the actor'. Theatre's function, like ritual, is the re-creation of a mythical time of origins. All elements of the theatre (actor, stage space, scenery, visual configurations and lighting) exist in a double world, both as reality and as ideogram. The only true concern of the theatre is to bring into being an Image . All other concerns are political i.e. they are extraneous and an attempt to force theatre to serve other ends. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre as instrument for other purposes View of Theatre: positive	A ritualistic space created by the actor	The re-creation of a mythical time of origins; the creation of an image	Doing: performance Showing: an Image
The Actor's	Michael	The essence of drama is the confrontation between actor and spectator, which makes	A practice	Confrontation	Doing: acting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Freedom (1975)	Goldsmith (1936-Actor)	acting ‘terrific, uncanny, simultaneously exciting and terrible, dangerous and attractive’. ¹⁹ The goal of theatre is self-identification , achieved through the actor. The actor is ‘a representative of freedom’, a representative of ‘all that freedom threatens and is threatened by’. ²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – the actor’s task View of Theatre: positive; functional		; representation	Showing: freedom via representations
Book Review: The Theater and the Dream: From Metaphor to Form in Renaissance Drama (1975) ²¹	Bruce Wardropper Literature and History	Theatre is about how we know: ‘Our age-old flirtation with theater is essentially epistemological’. ²² It encapsulates the three ways we learn: through spectatorship, through imitation and through imagination. Life and theatre feed into each other so that ‘the theatricality of life and the vitality of theater are two sides of the same coin’. ²³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: functional	A way of learning through watching	To teach through imitation and imagination	Doing: theatre Watching: learning through seeing;
Rezeptions-aesthetik (1975); ‘On the Alterity of Medieval Religious Drama’ (1979)	Rainer Warning German historian and theorist	The first major analysis of the Rezeptionsaesthetik approach being developed in Germany during the 1970s by Hans Robert Jauss (1970) and Wolfgang Iser and others. Warning traces this approach back to the Prague school and Mukařovský’s insistence on a certain ‘indeterminacy in the specific referentiality of the work of art [because the individual perceiving it] by no means respond with only a common reaction but with all the momentum of his position in the world and in reality’. ²⁴ Modern drama [unlike medieval drama] is ‘absolute’ in its ‘separation between the internal situation of performance and the external one of reception’. ²⁵ Purpose of Theorist: historical analysis View of Theatre: positive	An art form	Affect through signification	Watching: spectators respond in both common and in particular ways; involves separation
The Mirror of Production (1975); For A Critique of the Political Economy of the Sign (1981);	Jean Baudrillard French philosopher and cultural critic	Baudrillard believes that theatre has lost its place as the dominant art form in early modern Europe and become a relative minor art form in the postmodern world ‘where everything is theatricalised ... but where the theatrical is more commonly presented through television, computer, film and other technological and easily transmitted media’. Theatre is largely irrelevant, other than as a cultural form appropriated by capitalism in order to make money e.g. through the ‘rebirth of extravagantly spectacular musical theatre’. ²⁶	An art form (now irrelevant); a cultural form	A cultural form	Doing: the practice of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Simulations (1983); Forget Foucault (1987)		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-capitalist theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent
In the late 1970s, a ‘new orientation’ toward the semiotic study of the theatre began to appear as structural and linguistic approaches came under challenge from approaches which were directed towards performance, the performance/text synthesis within the theatre, and the dynamic of spectator reception.²⁷ (See, for instance: Hinkle (1979), Eschbach (1979), Warning (1975) and essays edited by Durand in 1981 and the contribution by Coppieters and Pavis to the special issue of Poetics Today entitled ‘Drama, Theater, Performance: A Semiotic Perspective’ (1981)). This was slow in developing, as Elam’s 1980 book, which gives very little attention to this aspect of theatre, indicates. However, Carlson argued that as the 1980s continued, spectator reception was beginning to appear as if it would become a major area of theoretical investigation for semiotics. Certainly De Marinis’ 1993 book attempted to tackle the issue, however, he was forced to concede that there remained a ‘glaring “black hole”’ in studies of theatrical spectatorship’.²⁸ The 1980s also suggested that there may be a challenge to semiotic analyses of theatre from post-structuralism. Indeed, scattered comments by Derrida and Lyotard, Pontbriand (1982) and Féral (1982) indicate the beginnings of an interest from this direction as an extension of its challenge to semiotics and structuralism in literary theory.²⁹ However, as Baudrillard suggests, theatre became more and more marginalized (as was much of this analytical activity). Both Burns and Nicolls suggests that the increasing use of the dramaturgical metaphor at least added to this devaluation and marginalization – if all the world is a stage, there is, after all, hardly any need to go to the theatre.³⁰
Problèmes de sémiologie théâtrale (1976); Pour une esthétique de la réception théâtrale’ (1980); ‘Problems of a Semiology of Theatrical Gesture’ (1981); ³¹ Languages of the Stage:	Patrice Pavis (1947 - Leading French theorist of drama and performance, especially theatre semiotics	Pavis sought to establish the theoretical bases for a semiology of theatre. He argued that the nature and function of the theatrical sign included four primary relations (semantic, referential, syntactic and pragmatic [all language terms]) and three fundamental functions (icon, index and symbol). Icon was ‘the privileged domain’ in theatre because actors, setting, properties, costumes and language are all literal or mimetic representatives of real things. Index attracted and focused the receiver’s attention. Symbols were ‘free figures’ which operated on several levels, as icon and index or as message and code. The process of theatrical understanding was basically circular : the spectator received the complex messages of the stage and began to construct provisional codes, assigned stable signifiers to the various icons, which are then reconstructed according to further messages in a continual operation. Pavis suggests that the question of segmentation for analysis be on the basis of related ‘connotations and groups of connotation’. In his 1980 essay, published in Durand’s collection entitled La relation théâtrale , he applies this to theatre of different periods and cultures, arguing that even the most ‘realistic’ theatre does not imitate reality but signifies it ‘by presenting it as a codifiable system’. ³³ The essay also suggested and illustrated a variety of strategies for the analysis of the spectator	A form of circular (linguistic) communication; a temporal event; a subject of anthropological study	The signifying of reality	Doing: the practices of theatre; directing as ‘stage-writing’ Showing: signifying reality using icons Watching: spectators process/decode complex messages

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Essays in the Semiology of the Theatre (1982), including 'Towards a Semiology of the Mise en Scène?' (1982) and 'Avant-Garde Theatre and Semiology: A Few Practices and the Theory Behind Them' (1982);³² 'The State of Current Theatre Research' (1997)		contribution to a performance experience: reception, reading, hermeneutics and perspective.³⁴ An attempt to apply this to gesture however, led to the conclusion that gestural language could not be broken down into minimal units and then recombined into global units of analysis. Rather, gestures had to be described on a global level, which he called 'gesturality': 'it is quite clear that the sketch – even the dream – of [the actor's] very first gesture is still beyond our reach'.³⁵ Although the 1982 book reflects a change in perspective both for Pavis and for the field as a whole, the drawback of his analyses is that it is not always clear whether he is speaking of text, performance or a combination of the two when he speaks of a 'theatrical sign'.³⁶ In 'Towards a Semiology', he suggests that the creation of a performance text from a dramatic text be seen as a process of stage writing: the director, as both reader and writer, 'develops a metatext which generates the stage enunciation' which is in turn presented for the pragmatic reception of the public, the final member of the semiological 'theatrical team'.³⁷ In 'Avant-Garde Theatre ...' (1982) he considers 'how the avant-garde uses or disqualifies certain semiotic practices in its creative work'³⁸ in order to see how and whether 'an artistic movement and a theory have met and enriched each other', particularly given that the controlling role of the 'spectator-director' is now under question and avant-garde theatre has been engaged in a drive toward either improvisation or over-coding as means of escaping from tyranny of 'the sign', bringing about 'a crisis in the semiotic and referential relationship of the sign with the world' and consequently a crisis 'in the mimetic reproduction of reality by the theatre'. Early efforts to resolve this crisis, though, led to an over-emphasis on theatre's spatial aspects (as in Artaud). Now, however, avant-garde theatre seems to be engaged in an effort to free 'repressed components of the stage: voice, rhythm, inner duration, the absence of hierarchy between sign systems, the Semiological creativity of the spectator, the part played by chance ... in any theatrical performance', suggesting that there might be two 'semiotics' at work in theatre: a semiology of space (as in the work of Weiss and Brook) and a semiology of time (as in the work of Handke). The semiology of time can be seen in the present interest of performance as a 'rediscovery of the temporal 'event' aspect unique to the theatre: 'Today one could take these two tendencies as the standard-bearers of two kinds of theatre', the 'theatrical' and the 'aural', although this would be reductive. What is clear is that 'the avant-garde plays with semiology and [consequently] its theoretical position is far from certain'.³⁹ In 1997 in his review of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		theatre research, Pavis suggested that the theatre theory fold could be divided historically into two main forms: reporting analysis (which he claims began with Lessing and Diderot) and reconstruction analysis (instigated through the influence of the work of Saussure and apparent in Artaud and Barthes). He suggests that this latter approach, although fruitful, had come to a crisis because of the inadequacies of semiological theory, and proposes a third approach based on anthropological approaches to the subject⁴⁰ [suggesting a move towards theory along the lines being developed by Barba]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive
Portrait of Dora (1976); ‘Aller a La Mer’ (1984);⁴¹ The Newly Born Woman (1986); ‘The Path of Legend’ (1986); ‘The Incarnation’ (1987); The Name of Oedipus: Song of the Forbidden Body (1994)	Hélène Cixous French philosopher and playwright	Notions of theatre and theatricality ‘occupy a crucial position’ in Cixous’ aesthetic and political work on difference.⁴² Theatre is a ‘site par excellence of alterity, a textual and physical space in which writer, actor and spectator can engage in an unproblematic relationship to the other’.⁴³ Although theatre has become ‘a residual form’ it remains ‘useful and attractive because it goes against the grain of our technological and simulated culture, promising ... an encounter with real time, lived experience and death’.⁴⁴ Although Cixous’ initial response to mainstream theatre was such that she felt she was watching her own funeral’ and had to stay away,⁴⁵ she turned to writing theatre for herself. Her development as a playwright has been in parallel with her development as a philosopher, although she has been writing with increasing confidence since the 1980s, in particular in collaboration with Ariane Mnouchkine. From a beginning of attempting to change theatre, in particular its patriarchal make-up, Cixous’ writing has itself been changed by her engagement with theatre (and Mnouchkine). Now theatre is a means ‘of giving voice to subjectivity and of giving voices to others’.⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conventional theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A site of encounter	The exploration of difference; a means of giving voice through a relationship between writer, performer and spectators	Doing: the art of theatre (a residual art form) Watching: an encounter (with difference/ otherness)
Six Viewpoints: a deconstructive approach to theater (1976)⁴⁷	Mary Overlie American choreographer, performer and teacher	Overlie’s concept of the six viewpoints (space, shape, time, emotion, movement and story) is based on the ideas of Grotowski and the choreographer Merce Cunningham, and has been incorporated into performance training at the Experimental Theatre Wing of New York State University/Tisch School of the Arts, a school which Overlie helped found. It is based ‘on the simple act of standing in space’ and is a way of training which ‘does not have a pre-existing idea of what theater is, how it should be created, what it	A space of communication through performance	The use of space by the actor, who is an observer/ participant who aims to	Doing: performance Watching: the actor watches himself;

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		should say or how it should say it'. The focus on the body and physical training aims to develop the body's 'availability to the senses'. Overlie says that it is necessary to understand postmodernism in order to get the most out of the six viewpoints, which draw on ideas about deconstruction. Overlie's theory claims to 'turn the concept of creativity inside out' by replacing the 'creator/originator' conception of the artist with the artist as an observer/participant. This is to allow 'more openness to communicate' with the materials which are to be expressed.⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – physical theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional		communicate	spectators are the recipients of the actor's expression
'Drama and the African World-View' (1976) ⁴⁹	Wole Soyinka (1934- Nigerian social activist, artist and performer	Essential theorist. Gerould considers Soyinka 'a consummate performer', and a proponent of 'two seemingly incompatible tendencies in modern theatre: mythopoetic drama and revolutionary agit-prop' whose work fuses techniques of traditional folk theatre with modern media.⁵⁰ Art, for Soyinka, 'will try to contain and control power', which makes it feared by despots. Soyinka's use of art has led to censorship, imprisonment and exile. According to Soyinka, theatre, from its roots in ritual drama, is about the demarcation of space, and it is 'necessary always to look for the essence of the play among [its] roofs and spaces', not in a printed text. Theatre is an arena 'in which man has attempted to come to terms with the spatial phenomenon of his being'. Initially this spatial vision was as 'a symbolic arena for metaphysical contests'. It was a medium of totality, which enveloped both performers and spectator, which contributed 'spiritual strength' to the performers. Modern theatre has, however, 'become steadily contracted into purely physical acting areas on a stage'. It is no longer 'a paradigm for the cosmic human condition' in which anxiety for the welfare of the performer was also an anxiety for the welfare of the community. Now, spectators still feel anxiety for performers, but it is an anxiety which is based on purely technical performance issues: 'has he forgotten his line? ... will she make that upper register?' However, theatre remains singular in its simultaneity – its ability to forge 'a single human experience' in its spectator. At its very roots, remains an 'affirmation of the communal self'.⁵¹ Soyinka sees intercultural performance as a 'survival strategy' for theatre.⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as communion View of Theatre: functional	A way of controlling power through the demarcation of space as in ritual; an arena	Demarcating space; forging an experience of community in conjunction with the spectator; containing power	Doing: playwrighting ; performance Showing: the human relationship to the cosmos; an affirmation of the communal self Watching: entails anxiety but results in an experience of community
Lire le théâtre (1977); Essay in Durand's	Anne Ubersfeld French academic of	In her 1977 book, Ubersfeld explicitly restricts herself to the semiotic [linguistic] examination of the dramatic text, and the application of language theory, though always in view of its relationship to performance. The dramatic text is troué , marked with holes ,	A mode of communication	To act on the spectator in order to	Doing: drama (text + performance)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
La relation théâtrale (1980); L'école du spectateur (1981; 1982)	literature and semiotician	which in performance are filled in by another 'text' that of the staging or mise en scène. Ubersfeld draws on the Russian linguist Jakobson and his expansion of communicative functions to argue (against Mounin) that both 'texts' make up 'an ensemble of signs' which compose the message in a process of communication. Dramatic discourse is a rapport among four 'voices' – 'the author, the character sender, the character receiver, and the audience'.⁵³ In her 1980 essay, Ubersfeld explored the Freudian concept of repression 'in its possible relation to the complex patterns of belief, illusion, and contradiction in the theatre experience'.⁵⁴ Her 1982 book offers a 'summary but synthetic view of representation' from a Lacanian perspective which she has designed to aid the spectator in 'sharpening his eyes and ears, stimulating his reflection and increasing his pleasure' in the theatre.⁵⁵ She considers what occurs in filling the 'holes' in the dramatic text and how this relates to text, actors and spectator and argues that spectators derive pleasure from doing this: 'Theatrical pleasure, properly speaking, is the pleasure of the sign; it is the most semiotic of all pleasures ... the act of filling the gap [by a sign standing for an absence] is the very source of theatrical pleasure'.⁵⁶ Her final two chapters are devoted to the spectator. The spectator is not only 'the object of the verbal and scenic discourse, the receiver in the process of communication, the king of the feast [but also] the subject of a doing, the craftsman of a praxis which is continually developed only with the praxis of the stage'.⁵⁷ 'Ubersfeld identifies the various ways in which the spectator performs this activity – generally [but not always] with reference to instructions given by the text, the performance, or the performance situation – and the various sources of spectator pleasure': the pleasures of discovery, analysis, invention, identification, experiencing the forbidden or the impossible and the total pleasure and subsequent 'peace' generated 'by all affective elements' in unison. She thus equates theatrical pleasure with 'the pleasure of the sign'.⁵⁸ Ultimately, however, the spectator must experience the absence of theatre as total presence: to accept the role of spectator, one must accept this condition of unfulfilled desire.⁵⁹ And, if 'the female spectator colludes in the 'co-production' of male desire (disguised as universal desire), as she must given Ubersfeld's belief that individual spectators are unlikely 'to swim against the current of his/her neighbours' reception',⁶⁰ 'then she complies with her own victimisation and self-annihilation'.⁶¹ [It is all a bit heavy going given that it is supposed to be about pleasure – and requires the spectator to turn up expecting to be dissatisfied].	involving four 'voices' – author, actor, character and spectator	communicate	Watching: spectator as both object and receiver; spectatorship involves the acceptance of the condition of unfulfilled desire; spectators derive pleasure from filling in the holes in a text following instruction from the performer: spectators perform this process

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis (psychological/semiotic) View of Theatre: positive
The Theatre of Images (1977)	Bonnie Marranca Performer and writer	A discussion of the work of 1970s American avant-garde directors Robert Wilson and Lee Breuer who were influenced by Foreman, and demonstrated a strong orientation towards the visual. The aim of this kind of theatre was to create ‘a new stage language, a visual grammar ‘written’ in sophisticated perceptual codes’. ⁶² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A practice	To develop a visual language to appeal to perception	Doing: directing Showing: images
Unmaking Mimesis: Essays on Feminism and Theater (1977)	Elin Diamond Feminist academic of English literature	A trenchant critique of realism in the theatre which ‘more than any other form of theater representation, mystifies the process of theatrical signification’ ⁶³ because it disguises or ‘levels the relationship between character and performer’. ⁶⁴ As a result, realism ‘surreptitiously reinforces (even if it argues with) the arrangements of that world’. ⁶⁵ Krasner sees Diamond’s critique as evidence of the continuing influence of Plato’s anti-theatricality. ⁶⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-realism View of Theatre: ambivalent	A signifying activity	Representation through signification	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: realism creates the illusion of reality and is subject to ideology
Das Theater und sein Publikum (1977)	Klaus Lazarowicz Semiotician	Theatre is a communication event which involves a ‘contrat théâtral’ between the spectator and the actors/directors regarding the work of the author. This creates a ‘triadic collusion’ between author, actors and spectator in order to create the work as theatre as it progresses. Playgoing is sensory, imaginative and rational, and the spectator colludes in all three dimensions in the process of creation. Theatre involves a ‘contractual agreement’ between actors and spectator that what they will be seeing/experiencing is theatre, not reality. ⁶⁷ ‘Actors, authors and playgoers all participate in their own way in creating the fictional world on the stage. The author drafts a unique system of literary signs, namely a play, which is not addressed to readers, but to playgoers and actors. The actors , normally under the guidance and supervision of a director, transpose this system of literary signs into a system of theater-signs, which comprise verbal and non-verbal elements. The playgoers ’ activity, however, consists in their observing the dramatic information in an attitude of ‘external concentration’ ..., of making it part of their personal fund of aesthetic knowledge. Such sensory, imaginative and rational playgoing activities are an essential part of what constitutes theater. They are understood as a specific manifestation of ‘work in progress’ - that is, a triadic collusion’. ⁶⁸	A place people go to to experience plays; a triadic; interactive communication event	Creation through collusion with the spectator	Doing: creating an event (collaboratively) Watching: involves a contractual agreement that what will be seen will not be ‘real’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional
'Theatrum Analyticum' (1977) ⁶⁹	Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe (1940-2007) French philosopher, literary critic and translator	Rejects the 'simplistic' views of catharsis of early psychoanalytic theory. The two principles considered responsible for catharsis by this theory (the pleasure principle and the reality principle) are underpinned by a more fundamental principle which fosters 'the communal belief in the symbolic' such that it can be enshrined in language: the fact of death, and with it, the 'cessation of desire'. 'The theatrical cannot help but show this disruption at the heart of drama, so that the effect is not simply an exorcism of anger, fear and resentment, but a recognition of the risk [constantly deferred] that is at the heart of all play'. ⁷⁰ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive		Catharsis; play	Watching: catharsis as a result of the recognition of 'the risk that is at the heart of all play'
'The Theatre as Interaction and as Interaction Space' (1977) ⁷¹	Lenelis Kruse & Carl Graumann Psychologists and theorists	Theatre is a communication event which involves a relationship between three aspects: (a) between actor and actor on stage; (b) between actors and spectator and (c) between spectator and spectator. Passow argues that this definition concentrates too much on the 'make-believe' world of the stage and ignores the fact that 'theatrical events do, and indeed must, have a real basis', not least in the relationship between the actors and their characters but also between the spectator and the character: the spectator 'does not ... forget that an actor is facing him on the stage'. ⁷² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	An interactive communication event	Interactive communication	Doing: generating an event Watching: involves communication both with performers and with other spectators

¹ An augmented English version of the essay in Helbo, published in Drama Review Vol 30(1), 1977 (see Helbo, André. 1983. Les mots et les gestes. Lille: Presses Universitaires de Lille.); reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.280-287.

² Eco 1998/1977: 281

³ Eco 1998/1977: 281

⁴ Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.502

⁵ Eco 1998/1977: 283-7

-
- ⁶ Brandt 1998: 279
- ⁷ In Helbo (ed.) 1975, Sémiologie de la représentation, Brussels, p. 105-6; in Carlson 1984: 498.
- ⁸ De Marinis, Marco, and Paul Dwyer. 1987. 'Dramaturgy of the Spectator'. The Drama Review: TDR 31 (2) pp. 100-114.
- ⁹ De Marinis, Marco. 1993. The Semiotics of Performance. Translated by A. O'Healy. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- ¹⁰ Carlson 1984: 498
- ¹¹ De Marinis 1975, 'Problemi e aspetti di un approccio semiotico al teatro', Lingua e stile Vol. 10(2), p. 355; in Carlson 1984: 498.
- ¹² Carlson 1984: 501
- ¹³ De Marinis 1979, in Versus Vol 22, pp. 23-28; in Carlson 1984: 502.
- ¹⁴ Carlson 1984: 482
- ¹⁵ Carlson 1984: 482
- ¹⁶ Pfaendler 1975, Drama und Mispiel, Basel, pp. 203-208; in Carlson 1984: 482.
- ¹⁷ Cole, David. 1975. The Theatrical Event: a Mythos, a Vocabulary, a Perspective. Middletown Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press. x
- ¹⁸ Carlson 1984: 491-2
- ¹⁹ Carlson 1984: 492
- ²⁰ Goldman 1975, The Actor's Freedom, New York, p. 110; in Carlson 1984: 492.
- ²¹ Published in Comparative Literature Vol 27(2), 1975, pp. 166-168.
- ²² Wardropper, Bruce. 1975. 'Book Review: The Theater and the Dream: From Metaphor to Form in Renaissance Drama. By Jackson I. Cope. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press, 1973, ix, 331 p.' Comparative Literature 27 (2) pp. 166-168.166
- ²³ Wardropper 1975: 166
- ²⁴ Jan Mukařovský 1976, Kapital aus der Ästhetik, Frankfurt, p. 97, quoted in Warning (Munich), p. 14; in Carlson 1984: 509.
- ²⁵ Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.181n93
- ²⁶ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.180
- ²⁷ Carlson 1984: 507
- ²⁸ De Marinis 1993: 159
- ²⁹ Carlson 1984: 512
- ³⁰ Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman. Nicoll, Allardyce. 1962. The Theatre and Dramatic Theory. Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, Publishers.
- ³¹ In Poetics Today Vol 2(3), pp. 65-93.
- ³² Reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.307-315.
- ³³ Pavis 1976, Problèmes de sémiologie théâtrale, Montreal, pp. 127-8; in Carlson 1984: 500.
- ³⁴ Carlson 1984: 509
- ³⁵ Pavis, Patrice. 1981. 'The Interplay Between Avant-Garde Theatre and Semiology'. Performing Arts Journal 15 pp. 75-85.91
- ³⁶ Carlson 1984: 500
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 511

-
- ³⁸ Pavis 1998/1982: 307
- ³⁹ Pavis 1998/1982: 308-14
- ⁴⁰ Pavis 1997, 'The State of Current Theatre Research', AS/SA No 3 (1997.05), www.chass.utoronto.ca/french/as-sa/ASSA-No3/Vol1.No3.Pavis.pdf, accessed December 2006.
- ⁴¹ Published in Modern Drama Vol. 4; translated by B. Kerslake.
- ⁴² Lavery, Carl 2002, Book Review: Julia Dobson, Hélène Cixous and the Theatre: The Scene of Writing (2002), in Consciousness, Literature and the Arts Vol 3(3), December.
- ⁴³ Dobson, Julia 2002, Hélène Cixous and the Theatre: The Scene of Writing, Oxford, Peter Lang, p. 49.
- ⁴⁴ Fortier 2002: 180
- ⁴⁵ Cixous 1984
- ⁴⁶ Dobson 2002: 51.
- ⁴⁷ Published on the website www.sixviewpoints.com, undated, but accessed 2nd April 2007; although the website indicates that it may have initially been 'formalized' sometime in 1976, was taught in workshops in 1978 and published in 1998.
- ⁴⁸ Overlie, Mary. 2007. Six Viewpoints: a deconstruction Approach to Theater Overlie www.sixviewpoints.com, 2007 [cited 2nd April 2007].
- ⁴⁹ In Soyinka, 1976, Myth, Literature and the African World, Cambridge University Press; excerpt in Gerould 2000: 477-482.
- ⁵⁰ Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 474
- ⁵¹ Soyinka 1976, in Gerould 2000: 478-480.
- ⁵² Fortier 2002: 200
- ⁵³ Carlson 1984: 501
- ⁵⁴ Carlson 1984: 509
- ⁵⁵ Ubersfeld 1982, L'école du spectateur, Paris, p. 7; in Carlson 1984: 511.
- ⁵⁶ Ubersfeld 1982: 129
- ⁵⁷ Ubersfeld 1982: 303
- ⁵⁸ Aston, Elaine. 1996. 'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 56-69. 60
- ⁵⁹ Carlson 1984: 511
- ⁶⁰ Ubersfeld 1981: 306 in Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 71
- ⁶¹ Aston 1966: 60
- ⁶² Marranca, B and Dasgupta, G 1977, The Theatre of Images, Baltimore, PAJ Books, The Johns Hopkins University Press, xv
- ⁶³ Diamond, Elin 1977, Unmaking Mimesis: Essays on Feminism and Theater, NY, Routledge, 4-5
- ⁶⁴ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 6
- ⁶⁵ Diamond 1977: 4-5
- ⁶⁶ Krasner 2008: 6

⁶⁷ Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254.239

⁶⁸ Lazarowicz 1977: 58 in Passow 1981: 238

⁶⁹ Published in Glyph 2, pp. 122-143; discussed in Wright 1996: 178 (see n69 below).

⁷⁰ Wright, Elizabeth 1996: 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance' in Patrick Campbell (ed), Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, Manchester and New York, Manchester University Press, pp. 175-199, p. 178.

⁷¹ Published in Arnott et al (eds) 1977, Theatre Space, Munchen, pp. 149-157.

⁷² Passow 1981: 239

Table 42/51: Theories of Theatre 1978-1981(a)

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Interview (1978) ¹	Howard Brenton (1943- Dramatist	Wrote his plays ‘unreservedly in the cause of socialism’. The true test of drama is not originality but the ability to articulate ‘common concerns, hopes or fears’ and to ‘provide an answer or the ghost of the possibility of an answer’ to these concerns. ² A play is a failure and worthless unless it enters the ‘arena of public action’ in this way. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – politically engaged theatre View of Theatre: functional		To articulate common concerns, hopes and fears	Doing: playwrighting
Script into Performance: A Structuralist View of Play Production (1978)	Richard Hornby (1938- American academic	A very different view of structuralism from both ‘traditional notions of dramatic structuralists and from the concepts of many contemporary structuralists’ including Kirby (1965). ³ The playscript is ‘an intrinsic pattern of complex relationships’ which come to be revealed in performance. The structuralist method for Hornby has five aspects. It ‘1. reveals something hidden, 2. is intrinsic, 3. incorporates complexity and ambiguity, 4. suspends judgment, and 5. is wholistic’. ⁴ Hornby condemns Stanislavski, Brecht, Artaud and Schechner for downgrading the significance of the playwright. He urged a return to Aristotle’s emphasis on plot (the arrangement of incidents) and a concentration by theorists on the dynamics of this arrangement in terms of choice, sequence, progression, duration, rhythm and tempo. Form is ‘the articulation of content’. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: ambivalent		To reveal complex relationships through performance	Doing: playwrighting / production
L’univers du théâtre (1978)	Gilles Girard Réal Ouellet & Claude Rigault French theorists	An overview of theatrical research, with a strong emphasis on the developing field of semiotics. Reflects the contemporary interest in performance . Theatre is defined firstly as a ‘ social place where something transpires for people voluntarily assembled’ and secondly and ‘by reduction’ as a ‘dramatic text read by an individual’. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A social place in which people voluntarily assemble	Performance	Doing: performance
‘Ipotesi teorica di segmentazione del teso teatrale’ (1978)	Alessandro Serpieri Italian semiotician	The stylistic and semiotic functions of drama derive from words or expressions whose meaning is dependent on the context in which they are used. (Taken up by Elam 1980). Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: n/r		Signification	Doing: drama (text)
“Answers” by Squat	Members of Squat Theatre	Squat Theatre was originally formed in Budapest. Their work was banned as obscene and political. They now work in exile. They derive their name from their status in New York	A signifying activity; an	Turning facts into pseudo-	Doing: the practice of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Theatre' (1978) ⁷		City as squatters. ⁸ Theatre is 'multiple fiction, since it is prewritten [and] turns familiar facts into pseudo-facts ... The impossible ... is accepted as history and experienced as daily events'. The theatre 'shows what might be shown about [things like love and death]'. It does not 'gossip' about them. Because of what it shows, theatre is used by 'professional hope-raisers' (artists and politicians). ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as purposeful View of Theatre: functional	art of multiple fiction susceptible to appropriation for other purposes	facts	theatre Showing: 'what might be'
Art as Event (1979)	Gerald Hinkle Semiotician	A new orientation for semiotic studies of theatre directed towards performance. Critical understanding of the performing arts had been hampered by the application of strategies evolved in literature [and other areas] where performance is not essential. We should look at theatre as an 'event-full' process: 'more an event than an object in perception, .. more an enactment than an episode in experience, and ... more the point-of-departure for participation than for reflection'. ¹⁰ The 'theatrical event' is made up of six combined loci : text, director, cast, crew, spectator and actuality created by the actors' dual consciousness of self and character. ¹¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive	An event-full process	To entice participation	Doing: enactment
Pragmasemiotik und Theater (1979)	Achim Eschbach Semiotician	Action (Handlung) is the basis for theatre semiotics, but essential to understanding action is the process of reception . This aspect has been ignored by semiotic analysis based on Saussure, whose signifier/signified model ignored the 'necessary third element in signification: the interpretant '. ¹² The model developed by Peirce is more appropriate because reception is built into the definition of a sign: 'something which stands to somebody for something in some respect or capacity', the interpretant being 'the equivalent sign created in the mind of that person'. ¹³ Including the interpretant opens theatre, in particular, to infinite signification since 'the realization of verbal and nonverbal signifying acts refers always to the shifting universe of action in which author, actors, and spectators are implicated'. The written text is 'semiotically unfulfilled'. Its completion in performance necessarily brings in the historical context of the interpretant, producing a performance which is itself a text. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: n/r	A signifying activity	The completion of a text by performance	Watching: semiotics necessarily implies spectatorship (and hence performance)
'Reflections on Post-	Heiner Müller East German	Müller reflected 'a complex and contradictory' attitude to postmodernism, informed largely by his ability to straddle both East and West before the fall of the Berlin Wall. ¹⁴	An art form	Polemic	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
modernism' (1979); Hamletmachine and Other Texts for the Stage (1984)	playwright	He believed that culture in the West had been depoliticized. However, his play Hamletmachine , a radical adaption of Shakespeare's play, was stylistically 'typically postmodern in its fragmentation, complex irony, overlaying of cultural quotations and mixing of traditional and current cultural images'. As such it was 'a very bleak work', ¹⁵ not helped by Robert Wilson's production, which, according to Birringer, sucked the political life out of it in favour of 'a cool, architectonic and technological brilliance' in the setting ¹⁶ – and example of much that Birringer found wrong with postmodern theatre. Since reunification, Müller has accused the theatre of selling out to capitalism. His work has become increasingly pessimistic, 'a theatre of exhaustion' ¹⁷ [for the spectator as well as the playwright, since his last production of Hamlet went seven and a half hours!]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-depoliticized/western theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent
The Tragic Effect: The Oedipus Complex in Tragedy (1979)	A. Green Psychoanalytic analyst and critic	Green provides a 'sophisticated' version of Freud's psychoanalytic spectator theory. ¹⁸ Theatre is 'the best embodiment of that "other scene", the unconscious'. ¹⁹ As in life, the spectator 'is confronted by an enigma: every theatrical work is a riddle for the spectator and the invitation to solve it leads her/him to take up certain positions. The barrier of the edge of the stage sends the spectator's gaze back to her/himself as source of that enigma, thus establishing a relation between subject and object and stimulating the hope 'that the secret behind the moment of disappearance of the repressed objects will be revealed'' rather than repressed. 'Art offers a lure, setting up a new category of object in the field of illusion, whereby the desired objects remain occult, available only in masked distorted form, to be appropriated in a way that does not disturb either the creator's or the spectator's narcissistic idealisation'. This fantasy 'helps the creator/spectator couple to form a narcissistic pact: the objects are ejected and disappropriated by the artist in the hope that [each] spectator will appropriate and process them '. 'The enjoyment gained is surreptitious' because it is effected through displacement which negates 'the action of repression' and provides pleasure. The moment of catharsis 'is pleasure tinged with pain, involving the spectator's identification with the hero (pity) and his masochistic movement (terror) in bringing punishment upon himself', ²⁰ and involves 'the assuaging of unsatisfied desires' [to kill the father]. Tragic recognition 'involves a passing from ignorance to knowledge', as in Aristotle (an understanding which is rejected by Artaud, Brecht and Boal).	An art of embodiment - an objectifying activity; in particular an embodiment of the unconscious	The embodiment of the unconscious and a 'safety valve for repressed wishes' (catharsis)	Doing: embodiment Showing: repressed material Watching: spectators get lured into taking up certain positions so that they can appropriate what the artist offers and enjoy them surreptitiously

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis (psychological) View of Theatre: positive; functional
The Semiotics of Theatre and Drama (1980); 'Much Ado About Doing Things with Words (and Other Means)' (1988) ²¹	Keir Elam Theatre Semiotics	Elam's 1980 book provides an overview of theatrical research, with a direct (but not exclusive) focus on semiotics. It begins by drawing a distinction between drama (the written text) which may be approached linguistically by various theories of discourse and narration) and theatre (which has to do 'with the production and communication of meaning in the performance itself') . ²² Despite this distinction, his analysis is biased towards text-oriented analysis (drawing on Serpieri 1978 and Ohmann 1973). He considers both drama and theatre in the light of communication and codes , extending into nontheatrical communication research such as kinesics and proxemics: ' All that is on stage is a sign '. ²³ He pays particular attention to the importance of deixis – the gesture and language which establishes the actor's relationships to the stage space and to others, and the performative quality of language. This leads him to propose as the 'segmentation' for semiotic analysis shifts in deictic orientation. Drawing on Austin's theory of the performativity of language, he characterizes dramatic discourse as 'a network of complementary and conflicting illocutions [the act performed in saying something e.g. I promise] and perlocutions [the act performed by means of saying something e.g. I persuade]. Dramatic dialogue is a mode of praxis 'which sets in opposition the different personal, social, and ethical forces of the dramatic world'. Despite producing 'elaborate charts to account for signification', Elam gave relatively little attention to the spectator's contribution to the semiotic understanding of theatre (a mere 9 of 210 pages). This was typical of the first generation of modern theatre semioticians, who in general concentrated on making what was on stage 'eminently analysable and understandable, eminently readable'. ²⁴ In his 1988 text he distinguishes between two kinds of spectator response: the studium (a response characterised by 'cool interest', such as that shown by the semiotically aware spectator/analyst) and the punctum (spectator passion or pathos): that 'compulsion which ... motivates the receiver's active participation in the artistic practice', and claims that theatre semiotics not only addresses the first and 'resists' the second, but models the coolly interested spectator on the semiotically aware analyst such that 'the semiotics of theatrical communication [seems] to be a studium of the studium '. ²⁵ Studying the punctum however was difficult 'the reactions of the real spectator ... exceed the analytical frame in a way which brings its authority into question'. ²⁶ Perhaps this was why he devoted so little of his 1980 book to the spectator: spectators operated within	A signifying practice	The production and communication of meaning through signification	Doing: theatre and drama are both signifying practices Showing: 'all that's on stage is a sign' Watching: 'It is with the spectator ... that theatrical communication begins and ends'; ²⁸ the spectator's job is to ' recognize the performance as such ' ²⁹ by 'reading' the signs and codes.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		an horizon of expectation which allowed them to tolerate ‘disattendance factors’ – external noises unrelated to the performance, visible stage hands etc.²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: conventional; functional
‘Présentation’ (1980)	Jeannette Savona Semiotics	Savona was special editor of an issue of Etudes littéraires entitled ‘Théâtre et théâtralité: essais d’études sémiotiques’ and devoted to the elucidation of ‘the notion of theatricality’ and the understanding ‘of the specificity of theatrical discourse’.³⁰ Savona’s article explored Austin’s ‘illocutionary’ discourse in the theatre.³¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional	A place	Communication through performance	Doing: performativity – acting as signifying
‘La masque et le miroir’ (1980) ³²	Ross Chambers Semiotics	Chambers was dissatisfied with the ‘illocutionary’ approach to theatre discourse. He found it ‘limited and imprecise’. Theatre was an act of enunciation. As such it must be approached by a ‘relational theory [which] takes into account the relationship between the stage and the auditorium’. As a ‘performative’ art, theatre addresses its constantly changing receivers, inviting them to interpret it:³³ ‘the special vocation of the theatre is to explore the consequences of this intuition that ‘doing is saying’ and ‘saying is doing’’.³⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: positive	A performative art	Enunciation	Doing: performativity – acting as saying Watching; involves being invited to interpret what is enunciated
‘La voix et le dispositif théâtral’ (1980); ³⁵ La relation théâtrale (1980) ³⁶	Régis Durand Semiotics	Introduced concepts and attitudes drawn from deconstruction to theatre analysis (Derrida 1967 and Lyotard 1973). It was from Lyotard that Durand drew his major inspiration. However, he disagreed with Lyotard’s view that semiotic analysis was a form of intellectual imperialism. He thought that theatre could be productively viewed from both perspectives: as a place of tension between displacement and substitution, a machine of ‘impulses’. In the 1980 collection of essays, Durand also proposed the semiotic analysis of theatre as focused ‘not so much on the different elements ... as on the complex system of relations that unites and transforms them’. Each of the essays in the collection in fact focused in some way on the spectator-text relationship.³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional	A place of tension; a semiotic practice	Communication; the generation of complex relations	Watching: reading
‘Blurred Genres: The Figuration of Social	Clifford Geertz (1926-2006) Anthropologist	Warned against too close an identification of theatre processes with sociological or anthropological phenomena, claiming it had an homogenising effect. He recommends a synthesis between Turner’s pattern and the work of theorists of symbolic action such as Kenneth Burke, Frye and Langer, who focus on the rhetoric of drama: what it says. This	A complex phenomenon	Symbolic action	Doing: the processes of theatre; drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Thought' (1980)		would provide a richer model for both anthropological study and theatre theory. ³⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-reductionist/anthropological theory View of Theatre: positive
'Performance and Perception' (1981) ³⁹	Frank Coppieters Belgian Performance Analyst	Points out that the little research done in England and America on theatre spectators has relied almost exclusively on 'mass methods and statistical analysis.' This approach was inadequate: 'the study of people and their everyday social world requires methods which are different, and especially more refined, than those narrowly or blindly borrowed from the scientific study of things '. ⁴⁰ Coppieters suggests using the ethnogenic developed by Rom Harré and his associates at Oxford and urges detailed studies of individual spectator members as 'typical members of social collectives' and of particular occasions as 'typical kinds of social events'. He also suggests that there should be more interaction and co-operation between performance producers (who had to date shown little interest in the findings of this kind of spectator research) and performance analysts, especially during rehearsal, where semiotics could be used as an analytical tool. Coupled with spectator interviews and participant observation etc, this should allow us to begin to understand the theatrical experience as a form of interaction , which can be facilitated or inhibited by forms of staging. Coppieters' research to date indicates that, as in attempting to understand literary texts, understanding in theatre 'proceeds usually through guesses and approximations; it is not a final act and does not usually exhaust all possible meanings ... Understanding is based on a process of linking elements ... and combining, readjusting and specifying their ... potentials into complex ... chains of meanings.' ⁴¹ Spectators use previous experience and information to propose some provisional expectations. When these have to be rejected, and they cannot make new sense-making links, they become frustrated. Where they have been unable to make sense of what they have seen, they tend to forget or confuse what they have experienced. How the spectator is lit has a significant impact on how they react. Where the boundaries between performers and spectator are blurred, especially where spectators are as visible as the performers, spectators also attempt to interact with other spectators in order to work out what they are supposed to do. While performers see this blurring as a way of encouraging participation, and the work of Grotowski has indicated that when people are 'lit' they see themselves as performers and begin to act, in the absence of clear indications of what to do it can actually inhibit spectator response, especially in people who are not generally	A part of the social world; an interactive activity; a place of performance	Performers use a variety of techniques to encourage or discourage spectator participation (often instinctively)	Showing: performances provide clues by which the spectator attempts to work out what is going on Watching: spectators engage in a continual process of 'guesses and approximations' in order to work out what is going on and what is expected of them; they do this in relation to other spectators as well as the performance; their

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘performative’ because spectators will watch other spectators as well as becoming self-conscious. Performers are inclined to see this response as ‘passive’ when it is in fact embarrassment at uncertainty. One general conclusion which Coppieters draws from his work to date is that one’s attitude toward/perception of/relationship with the rest of the public is an important factor in one’s theatrical experience. Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive			behaviour will be affected by the way they are lit and positioned.
‘Semiotics and Theater: By Way of Introduction’ (1981)	Ruth Amossy Semiotics of Theatre	A semiotics of theatre was ‘still a challenge to the investigator’ because theatre is a ‘pluricodified, multilevel system ... a global system integrating in its own ways a series of semiotic subsystems’ which are difficult to account for.⁴² Part of the problem was defining theatre. In order for theatre to be considered ‘an adequate object of semiotic inquiry’ it must first ‘be conceived of as a specific mode of communication’,⁴³ a conception which was contested (e.g. by Mounin 1970). It also had to be conceived of as a signifying practice ‘made up of discrete subsystems’, something which was also proving difficult to come to grips with. Nevertheless, semioticians of theatre were keen to find different approaches, generally by focusing on particular objects of analysis (e.g. gesture). From a semiotics point of view, ‘Text and stage ... are the main components of the “theatrical relation.” The semiotics of theatre aims to illuminate ‘the interrelation of the textual and the visual’⁴⁴ [largely by ignoring their own position as spectators!]. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional	A mode of communication; a signifying practice; an object of semiotic inquiry	Communication	Doing: a relationship between codes Showing: signification
A Good Night Out: Popular Theatre: Audience, Class and Form (1981); ‘Theatre and Democracy’ (2002) ⁴⁵	John McGrath English playwright	Many aspects bear on the reception of a performance: ‘there are elements in the language of the theatre beyond the text, even beyond the production, which are often more decisive, more central to one’s experience of the event than the text or the production ... notably the choice of venue, audience, performers, and the relationship between audience and performer’.⁴⁶ ‘How the audience gathers for a performance, and disperses when it is over, may be as important to its ideological reception of the show as, say, the style of performing itself’.⁴⁷ Theatre is ‘the most thrilling and important social event ever invented by humanity’, although theatre today has generally lost both its nerve and its dignity in the face of corporate power, market economies and ‘fawning, flattering’ citizens seeking escape. However, it has the potential to ‘regain its role, dignity and audience if it were to take as its project the responsible drive towards what Castoriadis calls ‘authentic’ democracy’. Particularly in a democracy, theatre, like politics has a role in dealing with hubris, and the problems of self-limitation. Theatre ‘of all the arts, surely	A place; a social event; a dialectic art; an invention	To contribute to social debate; to help deal with hubris	Doing: performance; playwrighting Showing: a society to itself Watching: affected by a number of factors external to the actual text or

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		works at the interface between the creative and the political, calling together audiences of citizens to contemplate their society or its ways'. ⁴⁸ In doing so it can contribute to the 'dialectic' between citizen and state. It is in a particularly strong position to give voice to the marginal. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – socially engaged View of Theatre: functional			production; spectators contemplate their society through theatre
'From Text to Performance: Semiotics of Theatricality' (1981); A Sociosemiotic Theory of Theatre (1990)	Jean Alter Theatre Semiotics	A new approach to semiotic analysis of theatre which attempts to take into consideration post-structuralist and phenomenological criticisms of semiotics' focus on the text. Picks up on Helbo and States' idea of 'a basic duality in the theatre experience', but orients the approach more towards the specifically theatrical nature of theatre. Alter distinguishes between the traditional semiotic view of theatre or its referential function and its performative function , wherein it seeks 'to please or amaze an audience by a display of exceptional achievement'. These two functions interact to 'produce the particular effect of theatre'. ⁴⁹ The pleasure of the spectator is generated not just by an appreciation of technical mastery (as was suggested by Aristotle) but also by more general aesthetic considerations: beauty, sex appeal of the performers etc. The spectator experience is thus a complex experience which is both specific and general, based on theatre's iconicity as well as the cultural readings which are possible. Theatre thus operates as 'a series of transformations' rather than interpretations, a process which is continuous, and circular for both performers and spectator, because the transformations which occur in one performance are carried with performers and spectators to future performances. Alter suggests that semiotic analysis of such a process would be 'Herculean', but this should not prevent the recognition of the how theatrical transformation operates. ⁵⁰ He coined the term theatricality , which he defined as 'those processes by which theater can be defined as a unique artistic form', ⁵¹ and which he preferred to the term theatricality because of the connotations attached to the latter term. Theatricality, unlike theatricality, 'is specific to theater'. ⁵² A semiotic approach to theatre entailed two categories of sign: 'text and performance'. Text included all verbal signs , while performance included staging signs or 'common theatrical and cultural codes'. In performance verbal signs 'operate as staging signs' but can be separated 'for the purposes of clarity' and analysis. The operationalizing of both these categories is aimed at overcoming the 'literary fallacy' which assimilates theatre 'to the text only, and results in its reduction to the status of a	A signifying activity; an art form which is manifested in performance through a series of transformations	To please or amaze spectators; to communicate through signification	Doing: theatricality – a constant process of recreation and transformation Showing: exceptional achievement; iconicity Watching: the spectator is interested in a number of things during a performance; the process of watching is interactive with performers both present and future.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		particular genre of literature’ as well as the ‘performance fallacy’ which sees theatre as performance only: ‘Total theater needs both text and performance, i.e. a relatively permanent form without which it cannot be an art, and a concrete manifestation which embodies it’.⁵³ Note: art must possess a ‘quality of performance’ to be considered art; art ‘is produced to last’.⁵⁴ The uniqueness of theatre ‘lies in the historical autonomy that the text has achieved’, a situation which has arisen simply because verbal signs in the text ‘are repeated as verbal signs in the performance’ and which is ‘not purely fortuitous’ because it precipitates the literary fallacy that ‘reading may be substituted for hearing and seeing’. Theatre in fact can be ‘most clearly defined’ by ‘this tension between the text and the performance’. Theatre has a ‘phoenix-like quality’ with its ‘constant process of re-creation through transformation which revives old texts in new performances’. Semiotics can account for these recreations, as well as the historical factors which influence or even dictate them,⁵⁵ and can be articulated as a kind of algebraic formula. However, ‘only performances which ... transform the text, and vary transformations so as to project ever new referents, both capture the spirit of theatricality and make genuine contributions to the theatrical art. Texts with a low theatricality index ... turn into period pieces which survive for archaeological reasons’ rather than as art.⁵⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – total theatre View of Theatre: positive			Reading cannot substitute for hearing and seeing

¹ Malcolm Hay and Philip Roberts 1979, ‘Howard Brenton: Introduction and Interview’, Performing Arts Journal Vol 3(3); in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press.478.

² Carlson 1984: 478

³ Hornby 1978, Script into Performance, Austin, Texas, p. x; in Carlson 1984: 491.

⁴ Hornby 1978:24; in Carlson 1984: 491.

⁵ Carlson 1984: 491

⁶ Girard et al 1978, Paris, p. 10; in Carlson 1984: 503.

⁷ In The Drama Review/TDR Vol 22(3) 1978, pp. 3-10.

⁸ Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 219n14

⁹ Squat 1978: 6-8

¹⁰ Hinkle 1979, Art as Event, Washington, p. 40; in Carlson 1984: 507.

¹¹ Carlson 1984: 507

-
- ¹² Carlson 1984: 507
- ¹³ Charles Peirce 1931-58, Collected Papers, Cambridge Mass., Vol 2: 135, para. 228; in Carlson 1984: 508. Eschbach's book was published in Tübingen. Comments are taken from pp. 146-150; in Carlson 1984: 508.
- ¹⁴ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 186
- ¹⁵ Fortier 2002: 187
- ¹⁶ Birringer, Johannes 1991. Theatre, Theory, Postmodernism. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 187
- ¹⁷ Fortier 2002: 187
- ¹⁸ Wright, Elizabeth 1996, 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance' in Patrick Campbell (ed), Analysing Performance: A critical reader, Manchester and New York, Manchester University Press, pp. 175-190, p. 175-6.
- ¹⁹ Green 1979: 1 in Wright 1996: 176
- ²⁰ Wright 1996: 176-77
- ²¹ Published in Issacharoff, M. and R.F. Jones (Eds) 1988, Performing Texts, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press.
- ²² Elam, Keir. 1980. The Semiotics of Theatre and Drama. London: Methuen. 2, 141-5, 159, London; also in Carlson 1984: 504.
- ²³ Elam 1980: 7
- ²⁴ Fortier 2002: 24-5
- ²⁵ Elam 1988: 49
- ²⁶ Aston, Elaine. 1996. 'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 56-69.58
- ²⁷ Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 67
- ²⁸ Elam 1980: 97
- ²⁹ Elam 1980: 87
- ³⁰ Savona 1980: 383, in Etudes littéraires Vol 13(3); in Carlson 1984: 505.
- ³¹ Carlson 1984: 505
- ³² Published in Etudes littéraires Vol 13(3).
- ³³ Carlson 1984: 508
- ³⁴ Chambers 1980: 401-2 in Carlson 1984: 508
- ³⁵ Published in Etudes littéraires Vol 13(3).
- ³⁶ Durant was editor for this collection of essays, which was published in Lille. His comments are on page 7, and quoted by Carlson 1984: 509.
- ³⁷ Carlson 1984: 506
- ³⁸ Geertz, Clifford. 1980. 'Blurred Genres: The Refiguration of Social Thought'. The American Scholar 49 165-179. Also in Carlson 1984: 485
- ³⁹ Coppieters 1981: 35-6, in a special edition of Poetics Today 1981, Vol 2(3) devoted to a consideration of contemporary theatre semiotics.
- ⁴⁰ Coppieters, Frank. 1981. 'Performance and Perception'. Poetics Today 2 (3: Drama, Theater, Performance: A Semiotic Perspective) pp. 35-48.35
- ⁴¹ Coppieters 1981: 43
- ⁴² Amossy, Ruth. 1981. 'Semiotics and Theater: By Way of Introduction'. Poetics Today 2 (3: Drama, Theater, Performance: A Semiotic Perspective) pp. 5-10.5-6

-
- ⁴³ Amossy 1981: 5
- ⁴⁴ Amossy 1981: 7-9
- ⁴⁵ Published in New Theatre Quarterly Vol 18(1), pp. 133-139.
- ⁴⁶ McGrath, John. 1981. A Good Night Out: Popular Theatre: Audiences, Class and Form. London: Eyre Methuen.7; cited in Kershaw, Baz. 1992. The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention. London: Routledge. 23
- ⁴⁷ Kershaw 1992: 24
- ⁴⁸ McGrath 2002: 138-9
- ⁴⁹ Carlson, Marvin. 1992. 'Theatre and performance'. Semiotica 92 (1/2) 99-105. 102
- ⁵⁰ Alter, Jean. 1990. A Sociosemiotic Theory of Theatre. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.150
- ⁵¹ Alter 1981: 113
- ⁵² Alter 1981: 115
- ⁵³ Alter 1981: 113-4
- ⁵⁴ Alter 1981: 114n3
- ⁵⁵ Alter 1981: 115
- ⁵⁶ Alter 1981: 128

Table 43/51: Theories of Theatre 1981(b)-1985

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
According to Krasner a ‘seismological shift’ occurred in western theatre with the advent of the 1980s and postmodernism. This shift involved a different understanding of the relationship of art and everyday life, and a loss of the distinctions between commercial and fine art which had been a feature of theatre theory since C15th. Theatre also became recognized as an analytical tool as much as a reality in its own right. With the development of theories of embodiment which saw identity as performative and performance as ‘a buzzword’ outside theatre (e.g. in the influential work of Judith Butler)¹ came a renewed interest in performance as such, leading to new ideas about representation, originality and the autonomy and free agency of the human being.² The focus on performance allowed a wider variety of activities to be included in theatre, paradoxically leading to confusion over what constituted theatre.³ The recognition of the performative nature of oral cultures, non-western ritualistic theatre and gender and identity formation all impacted on ideas about theatre and what it entailed. Feminist and queer theatre and performance art in particular highlighted the effects of ‘the gaze’, the dominant and dominating spectatorship of privileged groups over others. The spectator was rediscovered, but only as a threat to the performer. All of this has led to a marginalization of theatre,⁴ something which Blau has been particularly concerned about.⁵
‘Da Dorat a Diderot, da Diderot a Dorat: un’indagine sulla questione dell’attore nel settecento’ (1981);⁶ ‘Views: The view of the performer and the view of the spectator’ (2005)⁷	Ferdinando Taviani Italian theorist	Taviani comments on the absence of the spectator in C18th writing on the theatre: ‘The spectator is absent from prescriptive manuals as well as scientific and philosophical works on delivery and actors ... The spectator is envisioned no differently from the reader of a book: a book exists independently of its reader, can be read and reread; one can reconsider one’s impressions, confront them; in fact, one can arrive at a supposedly objective standpoint in which there is a clear distinction between the object under inquiry and the subject performing the inquiry. The concrete persistence of the book in spite of the flux of different readings gives rise to the awareness – or the illusion – that a work exists independently of its effects on a user’.⁸ In ‘Views’, Taviani claimed that theatre is like a Rorschach test: what happens is not an accident. Like the test, theatre is designed to elicit ‘personal and unforeseen meanings’ while setting up strategies which will create ‘a certain probability of meaning’.⁹ Performers do this best not by trying to impose meaning on spectators, which is impossible to do, or by allowing spectators to make any meaning they like, which would deny the performer any skill or responsibility, but by paying attention to the meaning they elicit from the material they are to perform (the performer’s view) and attempting to explicitly convey that meaning,¹⁰ while accepting that spectators will have a different view. Performers ‘design and construct embankments along which the spectators’ attention will navigate’ letting ‘a minute, multiform and unforeseen life grow’ so that spectator can ‘make their own discoveries’.¹¹ This means that from the performer’s point of view, meaning ‘must be given, known beforehand, right from the beginning’, which is why semiotic analyses of theatre do not provide much value to	An art	To elicit ‘personal and unforeseen meanings’ while setting up strategies which will create ‘a certain probability of meaning’	Doing: theatre (performance): the performers’ view of the meaning of the material is different to the spectators’ view and cannot be conflated without damaging the experience Showing: what a performer thinks he is

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		performers, since these analyses assume that meaning comes at the end of the process i.e. it can only offer one aspect: the spectator's view, which is not the same as the performers: 'The results of the analyses made by those who seek to understand how a performance is seen by the spectators are not very helpful to those who must make the performance live',¹² because what makes a performance live is precisely the divergence between the performer's view and the spectator's view: i.e. 'the interplay between reality and appearances': 'it is the divergence, the non-coincidence or even the lack of mutual awareness between the spectator's view of the performance and the performers' view of the same which makes theatre an art, and not just an imitation or a replica of the known [and] the more the performance links them together without obliging them to agree, the richer is the performance'.¹³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – spectator as a necessary element/anti-semiotic analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional			showing is not necessarily what a spectator sees: this divergence creates theatre Watching: spectators navigate the performance according to guidelines to 'make their own discoveries'.¹⁴
The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (1981); Rabelais and his world (1984).	Mikhail Bakhtin (1895-1975) Russian philosopher, semiotician, literary critic and scholar	Carnival is 'a theatrics of rant and madness ... a temporary liberation from the established order'.¹⁵ 'Carnival is not a spectacle seen by the people; they live in it, and everyone participates because its very idea embraces all the people. While carnival lasts, there is no other life outside it. During carnival time life is subject only to its laws, that is, the laws of its own Freedom'.¹⁶ The carnivalesque has 'four themes: the tumultuous crowd, the world turned upside-down, the comic mask and the grotesque body'.¹⁷ It thus theatricalizes life and renders it whole. Purpose of Theorist: polemic - carnival View of Theatre: positive; functional	A practice	To render life whole	Doing: the practice of theatre
The Social Role of Art (1981/1977)	Donald Brook (1927- Australian socialist critic and aesthetician	'[A]rt is not craft. Most art work consumes craft skills, both mental and manual, but it is nevertheless fundamentally different from craft work. Craft activities have clearly statable objectives; crafts can be taught and learnt; people get better at them with practice; the excellence of a craft work is relatively easy to assess. None of these things is true ... about art. Art works are not essentially solutions to a problem, and a fortiori they	An art which uses craft and skills	Producing models	Doing: art not craft Watching: the interrogation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		can not be skilful solutions'.¹⁸ However, the main difference between the two lies in their 'social function', which may be either 'social affirmation' or to 'interrogate the world'. Craft activities 'and pseudo-arts are dedicated principally to the affirmation of the status quo ... while art activities properly so-called are interrogative, unexpected in context and relatively extremely rich in potential meaning as models for change'. Consequently, 'it is positively in the interest of the rich and the powerful (who ... determine what shall be the status quo in our society) to support and to be supported by the affirmation of the crafts and the pseudo-arts. No deliberate, artificially, calculated public support is necessary' although it is generally provided. Art, however, 'needs – but usually does not get – the support of a public arts policy precisely because it lacks every natural basis of support except the drive of the artists themselves'. This is because 'Art properly so-called is unnatural, unpopular, and quite often unpleasant' while at the same time being 'the entry point into human consciousness of imagery ... on which new attitudes and a continuously emerging future might be projected for critical scrutiny'. Art, therefore, 'must be deliberately fostered' by 'a public rationale independent of interests and market forces, and ... constantly open to public engagement on the question of the validity of its own rationale' because it 'interrogates the present and opens up possible futures through its acts of imagination'. This requires 'first and necessarily' the crucial distinction drawn here between art and craft, however, that distinction must also be continually debated by the society as a whole (not by elites). Art 'distinguishes human beings from other animals ... by giving us the power to invent ourselves, constructively, through the use and criticism of projective models.'¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – difference between art and craft View of Theatre: functional			of the models offered in order to reinvent ourselves, and distance ourselves from other animals
'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art' (1981) ²⁰	Wilfried Passow German semiotician	It has only recently been recognized by theorists that a performance is 'a collaboration between actors and audience',²¹ a contract made for each performance, although it is the spectator who actually 'creates' theatre from what the actor performs. Prior to the 1970s, although Goethe had recognized this essential relationship with spectators, theatre theory was essentially literary theory. A number of theorists began to recognize the spectator from the 1960s. Their views ranged from spectators being recipients of messages to spectators being the 'primary player'. The truth lay somewhere in between, and semiotics needed to come to terms with this, and with the problem of signs not being	A representational form created by spectators during performance	Representation (which may produce art, or just pleasure)	Doing: performance – a collaboration with spectators which creates theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		straightforward, although they are conventional: ‘it is not a question of merely communicating meanings’: spectators wait for further information, take context into account, will attempt to read signs but will also recognize that not all signs are meaningful because signs hold the possibility of meaning, not meaning itself; they integrate into their reading affective and emotional responses. While theatre theory had begun to concentrate on ‘the function of the audience in the theatrical event’²² [basically since the interest in semiotics had brought them into focus as readers], it was still ignoring actual performance. Passow believed semiotics offered a way of analysing performance, but only with some modification to prevailing views. Not all objects on the stage are read as signs by spectators. Some are simply recognized as what they are until the context of the play tells them otherwise. ‘It cannot really be the purpose of theatre to put the spectator into the position of a person puzzling [over objects and behaviour] without being able to fathom their meaning. What is fatal for a really sick person ... is also dangerous for the theater ... A sign which is too inaccurate will promptly be given up by the normal theatregoer’.²³ It is also ‘erroneous’ to equate theatre with art. Not all theatre is art, although the best may be. Rather, ‘theater is to be considered as a representational form within which poetic works [of art] can also be created’. This means that semiotics should be applied to all kinds of theatre, not just those forms of presentation which are justified according to some ideology which makes them ‘art’. This denies ‘the right of existence’ to ‘theaters which wish to serve simply as “pleasurable stimuli”’. When theatre is defined ‘nearly all definitions ... do not refer to the form of presentation’ but to the ‘ideological goals which [it is thought] theater should strive to attain’.²⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic)/polemic – theatre is a performed art View of Theatre: Positive			Watching: a contractual process involving collaboration with the performers; ‘reading’ signs is a selective and interactive process which may involve waiting for further information; enjoyment
‘The eye finds no fixed point on which to rest ...’ (1982)	Chantal Pontbriand French poststructuralist	Insisted on an understanding of the difference between theatre and performance. Pontbriand calls performance ‘a process, an inchoative breaking up’.²⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic- relationship between theatre and performance View of Theatre: positive	A representational form which uses performance	Performance	Doing: the practice of theatre, which uses performance
‘Performance and	Josette Féral French	Insisted on an understanding of the difference between theatre and performance. Theatricality is composed of two different parts: the theatrical and the performance. The	A representational form	Play	Doing: a practice

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Theatricality: The Subject Demystified' (1982)	poststructuralist	theatrical part inscribes the subject in the symbolic; the performance undoes these codes and 'competencies', allowing the subject's 'flows of desire to speak' i.e. the first builds structures which the second deconstructs [performance as deconstruction of the text rather than a construction]. Performance is 'desystemizing theatre', which is 'always narrative, always representational, and always involved with signification and the codification of meanings, whereas performance works without narrativity, with 'pieces of body' and 'pieces of meaning'. The actor neither 'plays' nor 'represents' himself, but is a source of 'production and displacement, the point of passage for energy flows ... that traverse him [and which he] plays at putting ... to work and seizing networks'. Theatricality is the bonding of this dynamic of performance with theatre in 'endless play' and in 'continuous displacements of the position of desire'.²⁶ Féral's use of desire indicates the influence of Lacan.²⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – relationship between theatre and performance View of Theatre: positive	which uses performance		which uses performance to create representations
Art Worlds (1982)	Howard Becker (1928-) American sociologist	Becker divides spectators into 'occasional', 'student' and 'serious' audience members. Occasional spectators are generally comfortable with the existing conventions, although they may subject themselves to more radical work if it has survived the scrutiny of the 'student' spectator. The student audience is made up of students of the arts. Becker points out that millions of people undergo some form of training in the arts without ever becoming committed artists. They provide an understanding and empathetic audience for innovative work, and are prepared to find value in failures as well as successes. This audience provides a useful 'weeding-out' function for both artists and other spectators. Serious spectators are more knowledgeable about the forms and conventions, history and struggles which have brought an art form to its present place. They respond (like Barba's fourth spectator) as 'collaborators' who 'belong in the art world', although their knowledge is not as extensive as that of the 'professionalized participants',²⁸ or perhaps some of the student spectator. Central to Becker's view of spectators is the conviction that conventions underpin all art forms. Conventions are 'the one language everyone knows'.²⁹ They define the 'perimeter' of an art form, and provide a resource which is shared by artist and spectator. Some art forms work within their conventions so as to appeal to the widest possible spectator. Other art tries to work against conventions, to break them up and destroy their formalizing tendencies. Becker argues that while	A complex collaborative art defined by conventions which make it possible	The production of art within a framework of conventions which make it explicable (if only to some)	Doing: art - a collaborative and co-operative process Watching: spectators bring their knowledge to their watching; more knowledgeable spectators become collaborators in the 'art world';

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘student’ spectators are sympathetic to the effort involved in this kind of work, ‘serious’ spectators recognize the irony involved in innovative artists’ attempts to break up the formalizations which distance art from the things of everyday life, and are prepared to accept everyday things (e.g. stumbling and falling over as dance steps) as art. While Becker admits that ‘we know little about how critical assessments of art are passed around among various audience segments’,³⁰ spectators appear to be able to learn unfamiliar conventions, usually ‘by experiencing them, or interacting with the work and, frequently, with other people in relation to the work’.³¹ Even conventional works offer something new, no matter how small, to their spectator. Thus spectators can be trained.³² Some of them can come to form a particular kind of spectator ‘group’, one which is prepared to engage ‘in an action that demands something more of them’ than ‘simply choosing among known reputations’ and which results in the establishment and dissemination of new conventions.³³ Production conventions (those which create the basis for co-operative activities amongst artists within the art world) are different to those conventions which govern the artists’ relationship with spectators. They tend to be ‘simple forms of standardization’ which allow practitioners to co-operate and work intelligibly,³⁴ and which come to provide a technical base for an activity. ‘Even when you don’t want to do what is conventional, what you want to do can best be described in the language that comes from the conventions’. Complex art forms (such as drama) develop systems for ‘quickly developing and transmitting new conventions’ of production in order to maximise co-operation.³⁵ Terms such as blocking, beats and focus are conventional, methodological terms used in the rehearsal of plays to deal with interpretative issues such as positioning, movement, timing and attention. The combinations of conventions which are invoked make up a ‘cooperative web of activity’ which makes an art world possible, and characterizes its existence.³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (sociological) View of Theatre: positive			conventions are a shared resource which enable both collaboration and co-operation; spectators appear to be able to learn unfamiliar conventions, usually ‘by experiencing them, or interacting with the work and, frequently, with other people in relation to the work
From Ritual to Theatre (1982); ‘Images and Reflections: Ritual,	Victor Turner (1920-1983) Anthropologist	Turner used drama as a metaphor to discuss the dramaturgical pattern in the development and resolution of social crises within a society. He proposed that such ‘social dramas’ followed four steps: a breach of regular norm-governed social relations, the subsequent crisis caused by the breach, redressive action and finally either reintegration or recognition of an irreparable schism. Unlike Schechner, he did not think that traditional drama echoed this pattern. Rather it exaggerated one phase, the third, the ritualized action	A seeing place (‘the eye by which culture sees itself’)	To challenge or endorse; to play; to reflect the society through a	Doing: drama; performance Showing: society to itself

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Drama, Carnival, Film and Spectacle in Cultural Performance' (1987); ³⁷ 'Are There Universals of Performance in Myth, Ritual, and Drama' (1989) ³⁸		of redress. It did this in order to express experience to other members of the culture or society for their observation and reflection. Both art and ritual were generated in areas of liminality, 'where normally fixed conditions were open to flux and change' and reorganization was possible. In a modern society, consensus was not likely to be reached in order to resolve crises, and theatre provided the opportunity to consider a multitude of possible models and interpretive meanings for events through an 'open-ended liminoid playfulness'.³⁹ Liminality has to do with the way a society used space to manage rites of passage or breaches in the social order. The performance genres in all cultures utilized this space. They did not merely reflect or express their social or cultural systems but were 'reciprocal and reflexive'. Performance was 'often a critique, direct or veiled, of the social life it grows out of, an evaluation ... of the way society handles history'.⁴⁰ They were not so much mirrors but 'magic mirrors' 'which make ugly or beautiful events or relationships which cannot be recognized as such in the continuous flow of quotidian life in which we are embedded'. They are a 'discontinuum' of action – so that people 'become conscious, through witnessing and often participating ... of the nature, texture, style, and given meanings of their own lives as members of a sociocultural community'. Cultural performance however, are also 'active agencies of change, representing the eye by which culture sees itself' in terms of its possibilities so that it can act on itself 'as though it were another'. Drama 'tends to become a way of scrutinizing the quotidian world'.⁴¹ It is valuable precisely because it isn't 'reality'. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (anthropological) View of Theatre: positive; functional		'discontinuum of action' in order to scrutinize the everyday world
Role Playing and Identity (1982)	Bruce Wilshire (1932- Sociologist	Theatre 'reveals life ... it is life-like' which operates through an 'aesthetic detachment' which allows it to reveal that it is an imitation.⁴² Wilshire is concerned with the extension of theatrical metaphor into the analysis of life situations outside the theatre. Used a phenomenological approach. Considered firstly, the manner in which theatre mimicked life. The 'essential theatrical theme' was a process of 'standing in' and 'authorization': the actor 'stands in' for a recognizable human being, and we [?the spectator?] 'authorize' him to do so. At the same time, the actor 'authorizes' us as 'potential mimics, since we stand in with the character through him'.⁴³ This process teaches us about the conditions of our own self-identity. Thus it extends beyond imitation and empathy into a 'perceptually induced mimetic phenomenon of participation'.⁴⁴ The 'enactments of theatre shared the same universal conditions of life posited by Heidegger: language, being with other,	A place of revelation	To rehearse life	Doing: performance (performing roles) Showing: ways of defining the self Watching: we identify with the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		projection of personality and mood'.⁴⁵ Wilshire's theory of identity argues that theatre provides a way to explore the definition of the self by demonstrating examples of 'mimetic fusion with others, disruptions from them, and attendant transformation of personality'.⁴⁶ Nevertheless, theatre and life are different. A condition of identity in real life is an inescapable ethical responsibility for one's roles and actions. To ignore this condition (as he believes Goffman does) 'blurs fundamental distinctions between off and onstage'.⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (sociological) View of Theatre: functional			character through mimetic fusion and use this identification to rehearse for life; this produces participation
'Native American Theatre' (1983) ⁴⁸	Jeffrey E. Huntsman American academic	Native American drama was as varied as the different nations, and it 'differs in several profound ways from recent Euro-American drama'. 'The fundamental embedding of dramatic events ... in the metaphysical substratum of the society gives them an immediate power and importance that Western ... drama [and Western religion] cannot command'.⁴⁹ Nevertheless, 'the impulse for the dramatic is universal in the societies of human beings'. Dramatic events 'may serve to define a community' and will therefore vary according to history and culture. North American drama ranges 'from the structured improvisations of shamans to hundred-hour-long, multidimensional celebrations like the great Navajo chantways, in which every costume, word, gesture, movement, and song are planned'. Until recently, this drama has only been considered as an 'ethnographical curiosity' rather than drama, although observers had described it historically in dramatic terms. 'These observers were too interested in finding support for preconceived notions about "primitive" theatre or the "origin" of drama and often too unwilling to attribute the art they sometimes recognized to anything more than "primitive intuition"'. In general, unlike European artists, 'the artistic self is typically unobtrusive, and the dramatic work in effect proclaims the artist's involvement with the community, not his or her distance from it' in traditional societies such as Native American societies. Training in the practice of the arts occurs in the same way that training occurs in other activities: through extended observation and careful practice. Traditional art is therefore 'a fundamental aspect of the culture, its practices, and its values ... firmly embedded in the community, temporally, spatially, and emotionally'. As a result 'Few artists are competent philosophers of art'. There is no need for them to be, although there is evidence that they	An event; an aspect of the culture which makes it	A treatment of time and space with variable degrees of interaction with spectators	Doing: drama – a universal impulse Watching: culturally distinct; participatory; generates community

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		think about their art in ways comparable to the European way, and different groups do adopt the dramas of other nations, moulding them into community norms, thus bringing about change. All Native American dramas, even very modern ones, exhibit a ‘centering in sacred time and place’ as a characteristic, although these spatial and temporal arrangements may be permanent or temporary. Also characteristic is the blurring of the distinction between actor and spectator: the presence of observers is considered to be a contribution to the drama at hand, recognition that ‘all are affected by what the central participants do. The community, the audience, is an integral part of the creative process before, during, and after the fact of the performance, because the performance realizes an aesthetic and metaphysical immanence of the society’. ‘Indian events assert a present and eternal reality; Western ones celebrate past realities or seek to invoke realities-to-be’.⁵⁰ The treatment of time and space is therefore a crucial difference between the two forms of drama. [This still begs the question of what is considered theatre, since Huntsman elides theatre and drama. Does anyone really dispute that drama is common to all cultures? In effect, his description defines (negatively) what is uniquely European about theatre: the separation between performer and spectator]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – culturally specific art View of Theatre: functional
This Stage-Play World (1983)	Julia Briggs (1943-2007) English literary scholar and writer	‘[T]he theatre was uniquely placed to voice more relative ways of thinking and feeling, as well as the consciousness of simulation and dissimulation, both within the self and in others’.⁵¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional	An activity	To give voice to ways of thinking and feeling	Doing: simulation and dissimulation
Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response (1984)	Daphna Ben Chaim American educator and theorist of aesthetics	‘Most theorists agree that the spectator’s involvement is a crucial dimension of theatrical art’ but they cannot agree on how this works.⁵² Ben Chaim argues that distance offers some clues in working this out. Distance ‘is intrinsic to the art experience’. It is a ‘species’ or ‘form’ of imagination, one which is specifically involved in responsiveness: distance is concerned with ‘the responsive imagination’. It involves an awareness of fiction and a willingness to ‘seeing as’. This willingness has long been recognized as an essential condition of the theatrical experience. ‘The spectator’s awareness that the theatrical event is fiction fundamentally determines the viewer’s experience’ because imaginative identification is affected by the degree of distance invoked by the event. An awareness of fiction is the most basic principle of distance. Distance ‘seems to involve	An art form which involves distance ; a place; an event	Pleasure	Watching: involves an awareness of the theatrical event as fiction, which provides a protective distance and a willingness to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		three distinguishable but inter-related components: (1) tacit knowing (2) volition and (3) perception as unreal. To see something as art (theatre) is an act of will based on the understanding that what it being seen is fictional. The ‘tacit awareness of the fictionality of the images provides ... psychological protection’ for the spectator, allowing them to place themselves in a more vulnerable position that they might otherwise have done. ‘It is precisely because the viewer remains tacitly aware that the theatrical production is fiction that he or she can experience emotions without danger ... protection from our tacit awareness of fiction allows for more intense emotions’. [We neither have to act on these emotions nor consider the consequences of feeling them. Indeed, they need not be consequential at all]. However, ‘[i]f the key to distance is fictionality, it rests on the prior condition of a willingness to engage ourselves with an unreality. We cannot will to accept or reject what we believe to be real, we can only become inattentive toward it ... The basis for distance is that we choose to act mentally toward an acknowledged unreality in some crucial ways as if it were reality. That we are free not to do so but that we choose to do so implicates us in its creation: it is a voluntary commitment to participate in the creation of an alternative universe’. The pay off is that we are free to imagine without worrying about ‘the constraints of the world’. We can project our emotions onto the object without worrying about the consequences for either ourselves or the object. Therefore, although the spectator has a ‘role’ in ‘the creation of the fictional universe ... we are never deluded in the theatre’, but ‘[t]he intensity of our imaginative engagement determines our pleasure’.⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – distance is necessary to theatre View of Theatre: positive			pretend that it is real. The consequence is that our imagination is freed from any truth/reality criterion. Watching theatre is pleasurable.
Noise: The Political Economy of Music (1985)	Jacques Attali Economist, historian and cultural critic	Art (music especially) is a way of imposing order on the world. This can be seen in efforts by those in power to regulate music, and the central position (the orchestra) given to music in Greek theatre. Rousseau argued in favour of natural rather than contrived music as a means of preserving political order. Opera is ‘the supreme form of the representation by the bourgeoisie of its own order and enactment of the political’.⁵⁴ Through Opera, the bourgeoisie ‘finessed one of its most ingenious ideological productions: creating an aesthetic and theoretical base for its necessary order, making people believe [in order] by shaping what they hear’. Music makes harmony ‘audible’.⁵⁵ Observing music can provide an early indication of impending political change: ‘we must	A representational art form which has a political aim	Representation in order to impose order on the world	Doing: art – a way of imposing order on the world

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		learn to judge a society more by its sounds, by its art and by its festivals, than by statistics'. ⁵⁶ Music is used by power to create order. It is used in different ways at different times. Attali proposed four strategic networks created by power using music. The use of music in ritual is designed to make people 'forget general violence'. The use of music in representation (modernity to early C20th) is designed to make them believe in the harmony of their world. The use of music as repetition (as in the C20th) is designed to silence and control. ⁵⁷ The next form of strategic use will be composition , in which music will be used as a form of extreme individualism and self-reference. This will focus people's attention on themselves rather than the world. Music is 'prophetic': 'Janis Joplin, Bob Dylan and Jimi Hendrix say more about the libratry dreams of the 1960s than any theory of crisis'. ⁵⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – art as purposeful View of Theatre: ambivalent
'Is There a Text on this Stage? Theatre/ Authorship/ Interpretation' (1985)	Gerald Rabkin American theatre scholar	Rabkin uses Derrida, Barthes and Foucault as well as reader-response theory 'to undermine the traditional important of the author /playwright and written text ... and to stress the importance of open and radical interpretation often at odds with the author's intentions': ⁵⁹ 'we have in theatre two sets of readers – the theatre artists who traditionally "read", interpret, the written text, and the audience who read the new theatrical text created by the mediated reading'. ⁶⁰ The intentions of the playwright are thus perceived 'within a complex matrix of interpretation'. ⁶¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre allows multiple reader positions View of Theatre: positive	A place; a practice	The expression of an interpretation (of a text) to other readers	Doing: theatre (a reading activity) Watching: spectators overlay their own interpretative readings on those of the artists
Comment in Wall Street Journal March 6, 1985	Sylvaine Gold American critic	'For years, going to the theatre was about questions and answers ... In the new theatre, however, questions are neither asked nor answered. Going to the theatre becomes an abstract experience, like going to a symphony, or a Balanchine ballet, or a show of modern art. The audience is offered not thought, but sensation'. ⁶² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – aesthetics View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place	Depends on the kind of theatre	Doing: art Watching: an aesthetic experience

-
- ¹ Butler, Judith. 1990. Gender trouble: Feminism and the subversion of identity. New York: Routledge, Butler, Judith. 1993. Bodies that Matter: On the discursive limits of sex. New York and London: Routledge, Butler, Judith. 1999. 'Performativity's Social Magic'. In Bourdieu: A Critical Reader, edited by R. Shusterman. Oxford: Blackwell, p. 113ff.
- ² Butler, Judith. 1988. 'Performative Acts and Gender Constitution: An Essay in Phenomenology and Feminist Theory'. Theatre Journal 40 (4) pp. 519-531.
- ³ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 428
- ⁴ Blau, Herbert. 1989. 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play'. In By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, edited by R. Schechner and W. Appel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272.
- ⁵ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 179
- ⁶ See Blau 1989
- ⁷ Taviani, Ferdinando. 1981. 'Da Dorat a Diderot, da Diderot a Dorat, un'indagine sulla questione dell'attore nel settecento'. Quaderni di teatro 11 pp. 73-106. discussed in De Marinis, Marco. 1993. The Semiotics of Performance. Translated by A. O'Healy. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 229n2.
- ⁸ In Barba & Savarese 2005, A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer (2005), pp. 288-299.
- ⁹ Taviani 1981: 102-3 in De Marinis 1993: 229n2
- ¹⁰ Taviani, Ferdinando. 2005. 'Views: The view of the performer and the view of the spectator'. In A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer, edited by E. Barba and N. Savarese. London: Routledge, pp. 288-299. 299
- ¹¹ Taviani 2005: 292
- ¹² Taviani 2005: 288
- ¹³ Taviani 2005: 291-2
- ¹⁴ Taviani 2005: 288
- ¹⁵ Taviani 2005: 288
- ¹⁶ Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).
- ¹⁷ Bakhtin 1981: 7 in Boje et al 2003.
- ¹⁸ Boje et al 203
- ¹⁹ Brook, Donald 1981, The Social Role of Art, Adelaide, Experimental Art Foundation: 28 (Brook's underlining).
- ²⁰ Brook 1981: 29-31
- ²¹ Passow, Wilfried. 1981. 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art'. Poetics Today 2 (3) pp. 237-254. Translated by R. Strauss.
- ²² Passow 1981: 237
- ²³ Passow 1981: 233-7
- ²⁴ Passow 1981: 241
- ²⁵ Passow 1981: 250-1
- ²⁶ Pontbriand 1982, in Modern Drama Vol 25(1), p. 157; in Carlson, Marvin. 1984. Theories of the Theatre: A Historical and Critical Survey from the Greeks to the Present. Ithaca, London: Cornell University Press. 513.
- ²⁷ Féral, Josette. 1982. 'Performance and Theatricality: The Subject Demystified'. Modern Drama 25 (March) pp. 170-181. Also cited in Carlson 1984: 512-3.
- ²⁸ Féral's work is summarised in the Performance/Performativity Tables.

-
- ²⁸ Becker, Howard. 1982. 'Conventions'. In Art Worlds. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press, pp. 40-67. 48
- ²⁹ Becker 1982: 57
- ³⁰ Becker 1982: 55
- ³¹ Becker 1982: 64
- ³² Becker 1982: 66
- ³³ Becker 1982: 67
- ³⁴ Becker 1982: 55-6
- ³⁵ Becker 1982: 57-9
- ³⁶ Becker 1982: 61, 67
- ³⁷ Excerpt from The Anthropology of Performance (1987), reprinted in Krasner 2008: 448-454.
- ³⁸ Published in Schechner and Appel (Eds) 1990, By Means of Performance, pp. 8-18; reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 62-68.
- ³⁹ Carlson 1984: 484-5
- ⁴⁰ Turner 2008/1987: 449
- ⁴¹ Turner 2008/1987: 449-454
- ⁴² Wilshire, Bruce. 1982. Role Playing and Identity: The Limits of Theatre as a Metaphor. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. ix
- ⁴³ Wilshire 1982: 6-7
- ⁴⁴ Wilshire 1982: 26
- ⁴⁵ Carlson 1984: 486
- ⁴⁶ Wilshire 1982: 228-232
- ⁴⁷ Wilshire 1982: 280
- ⁴⁸ Excerpts reprinted in Krasner 2008: 434-440
- ⁴⁹ Huntsman 2008/1983: 439
- ⁵⁰ Huntsman 2008/1983: 434-9
- ⁵¹ Briggs, Julia 1983, This Stage-Play World, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 163
- ⁵² Ben Chaim, Daphna. 1984. Distance in the Theatre: The Aesthetics of Audience Response. Edited by B. Beckerman. Vol. 17, Theater and Dramatic Studies. Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press. x
- ⁵³ Ben Chaim 1984: 73-6
- ⁵⁴ Attali, Jacques. 1985. Noise: The Political Economy of Music. Translated by B. Massumi. Vol. 16, Theory and History of Literature. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 60
- ⁵⁵ Attali 1985: 61
- ⁵⁶ Attali 1985: 3
- ⁵⁷ Bottomley, Gillian. 1992. 'Dance, music and relations of power'. In From Another Place: Migration and the politics of culture. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 71-88.74

⁵⁸ Attali 1985: 6

⁵⁹ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 137

⁶⁰ Rabkin 1985: 157 in Fortier 2002: 137

⁶¹ Fortier 2002: 137

⁶² Quoted in Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.200.

Table 44/51: Theories of Theatre 1986-1989

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
‘Writing for the Stage’ (1986);¹ ‘Politics and Theatre’ (1996a);² Address on the ‘Acceptance of an Honorary Degree from the Academy of Performing Arts’ (1996b)³	Václav Havel (1936- spectator, playwright, dramaturg, politician (President of the Czech Republic)	Essential theorist. Theatre ‘is always a sensitive seismograph of an era, perhaps the most sensitive one there is; it’s a sponge that quickly soaks up important ingredients in the atmosphere around it’. It is also ‘an area of freedom, an instrument of human liberation’.⁴ In particular, experimental work such as that carried out in the ‘small’ theatres could create a ‘conspiracy of togetherness between actors and audiences’ leading to social self-awareness and collective liberation from fear, partly because it was ‘more like a game’: ‘[w]e didn’t try to explain the world; we weren’t interested in theses, and we had no intention of instructing anybody’ It was ‘an example of l’art pour l’art’. ‘The small theatres simply wanted to show something, so they showed it ... in all kinds of ways, as it occurred to them, randomly, according to the law of ideas ... People .. played with the audience; they did not present stories but, rather, posed questions or opened up themes. And ... they manifested the experience of absurdity’. Absurdity was ‘the most significant theatrical phenomenon of the twentieth century because it demonstrates modern humanity in a “state of crisis”. Absurd theatre ‘reminds us of how we are living: without hope’. It gives form ‘to something we all suffer from’. ‘Theatre has always been the first to alert us’ to activity under the surface. Nevertheless, Havel objected to the transformation of plays into sociological theses – each play had its own secrets. And ‘theatre should be done well ... but it mustn’t take itself too seriously’ (something he believed the theatre of the 1980s was tending to do).⁵ Havel privileged the position of the spectator. The ‘positive hero’ of his plays was always the spectator. He saw active spectatorship as an ‘antidote to totalitarianism.⁶ ‘[B]eing in an audience gives everything another dimension’. It is liberating because everything, even the worst evil, is ‘out of the bag, the truth has finally been articulated out loud and in public’. Thus horror is wedded to delight – ‘the ambivalence of this experience’ is what brings catharsis. It is through the collective efforts of this positive hero that catharsis is ‘cocreated’: ‘sharing with others the liberating delight in evil exposed’.⁷ Theatre for Havel was ‘one of the ways of expressing the human ability to generalize and comprehend the invisible order of things’.⁸ Action on stage ‘radiates a broader message ... a fragment of life organized ... as a whole’. Theatre is ‘an attempt to grasp the world in a focused way by grasping its spatio-temporal logic’.⁹ Sharing was an important part of the experience.¹⁰	An instrument of human liberation; a warning device; a form of generalization or ordering	To find ways to evoke hope; to warn; to play; to radiate a message; an attempt to grasp the world in a focused way	Doing: playwrighting ; the practice of theatre (performance) Showing: ideas, themes, questions; to show the invisible order of things Watching: spectators are played with by performers; being in a crowd adds another dimension to the performance, one in which catharsis is ‘co-created’ with other spectators. Sharing is an

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – exposition View of Theatre: positive; functional			important part of the experience: any kind of theatre can create a ‘conspiracy of togetherness’
Carry on, Understudies (1986); ¹¹ Look Back in Gender (1987)	Michelene Wandor (1940 -) British feminist poet, critic and playwright	‘There is no simple way in which neat correlations between politics and art (feminism and theatre) can be made’, and a play by women about women and women’s issues need not be ‘sympathetic to feminism’ – which in any case is a plural concept. Wandor identifies three major kinds of feminism: radical - direct challenge to anything male with the aim of changing everything; bourgeois or emancipationist - ‘simply seeks a larger share of social power ... [it] accepts the world as it is’ and sees the main challenge as ‘equalling up’; and socialist feminist which ‘aims to analyse and understand’ the intersections between class and gender. In practice these overlap. Feminist ideas are also complex so ‘one must ... approach the evaluation of plays from a political point of view with caution ... yet the political analysis is absolutely essential, if we are to understand what it is that writers have been doing in the 1970s and 1980s’. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – feminist theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form	Need not be sympathetic or political	Doing: playwrighting - feminist Showing: may or may not set out to show power relations
‘Constructing the Spectator: Reception, Context, and Address in Lesbian Performance’ (1986) ¹³	Kate Davy American academic writer	Spectators are readers who ‘construct the text’ according to the intentions of the text, which performance ‘concretizes’, and based on previously assimilated and learned conventions which use representations as a means of intelligibility: ‘the means by which we understand ourselves and communicate that understanding to each other ... representation is responsible for reality as well as a reflection of it’. ¹⁴ Lesbian performances must resist dominant readings as well as attempt to break up the training that leads us to accept without question dominant readings of representations. Playwrights/performers, including lesbian performers, have an image of their spectator in mind when they prepare a production, which allows them to make choices about how they will represent certain ideas, including way in which to disrupt representation. As in all theatre, assumptions are made about what the playwright/performer shares with the	An cultural activity involving performance before spectators who ‘read’ the play	The concretization of a text to be decoded by the spectator	Doing: playwrighting (lesbian) Showing: representation Watching: decoding (reading) according to learnt

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		spectator, but some assumptions allow more freedom to challenge stereotypes than others, although the spectators to whom these challenges are issued are also more likely to be already onside. The role of the spectator in all this is as a decoder/reader i.e. essentially passive. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – feminist/lesbian theatre View of Theatre: positive			conventions
‘Toward a Concept of the Political in Postmodern Theatre’ (1987);¹⁵ Presence and Resistance: Postmodernism and Cultural Politics in Contemporary American Performance (1992); Liveness (1999/2008).	Philip Auslander American Theatre Theorist	Auslander argues that in postmodern times a political theatre is still possible because postmodernism provides critical distance,¹⁶ however, it must now be about resistance rather than transgression because it has been realised that ‘presence is the matrix of power’. Therefore, ‘a postmodern theatre of resistance must ... both expose the collusion of presence with authority and resist such collusion by refusing to establish itself as the charismatic Other’.¹⁷ To do otherwise ‘raises the question of what constitutes a potentially counterhegemonic appropriation of an image and what merely restates that image’,¹⁸ a problem encountered by the performance art of Fusco and Gómez-Peña when spectators deeply inculturated by colonialism failed to see the irony of the performance and saw their performance as a reinstatement of the genre of colonial exhibition.¹⁹ Postmodern work can be political because it raises uncertainties. Liveness continues Auslander’s concern with presence: the rhetoric of ‘live’ performance fosters assumptions about the specialness of liveness versus mediation, turning liveness into a form of mythology about theatre which limits theatre’s capacity to develop. For Auslander, live performances ‘are not in essence different’ from mediated performances.²⁰ Ideas like ‘the magic of live theatre’ and ‘the ‘energy’ that supposedly exists between performers and events in a live event, and the ‘community’ that live performance is often said to create among performers and spectators’ are ‘clichés and mystifications’ which have no place in the modern mediated world.²¹ However, ‘theatre ... and the mass media are rivals, not partners. Neither are they equal rivals’. Liveness has value for performers and ‘partisans of live performance ... But ... they yield a reductive binary opposition of the live and the mediated’ which is not supported by close investigation.²² The binary live/mediated exhibits a number of sub-binaries: real/reproduced; lively/‘petrified’;²³ pure/contaminated; one-off/repeatable; special/banal; ephemeral/permanent.²⁴ None of these are entirely true for either theatre or mediated performance. For instance, all recorded material deteriorates so in a very real sense, each playing is slightly different than the last. ‘Thinking about the relationship live and	An art form which is now mediated	Political - engaging in political theatre involves engaging in resistance to dominant cultural processes and apparatuses of control through images	Doing: theatre as a political practice; performance Showing: images Watching: spectators appropriate the images offered and can use them in ways unintended by performers

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		mediated form in terms of ontological oppositions is not especially productive, because there are few grounds on which to make significant ontological distinctions. Like live performance, electronic and photographic media can be described meaningfully ... as ephemeral [and] be used to provide an experience of evanescence'.²⁵ Rather, as theatre has become to incorporate other media, what had seemed a 'secure opposition is now a site of anxiety' for many performers' (e.g. Phelan, Pavis).²⁶ [This anxiety is paradoxical anyway since they also insist that performances need spectators in order to be 'completed' and that condition still applies, although there is a time lapse between the two]. According to Auslander, the idea of 'live' only became an issue – and a recognized term in relation to performance – in 1934 when questions arose about how to tell the difference between a live performance and a recorded one on radio – which had for some time been using both. It arises within an anxiety about truth. Auslander goes on to consider what are called 'chatterbots' – virtual entities which 'perform' interactively on the computer for computer users. These fulfil a number of the criteria for 'liveness' – but are not alive – anymore than Craig's uber-marionettes were. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-liveness as a defining characteristic of theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
Performance (1987)	Julian Hilton English academic and playwright	The book is generally focused on a discussion of acting, however it also elaborates on aspects of reception theory, offering an interactionist understanding of the spectator and what it does. Hilton argues that the spectator's role in theatre is exceptional, and 'it produces what he calls 'performance consciousness' ... a collective imaginative capacity to engage in the construction of 'potential worlds' through the interaction of performer and spectator'.²⁷ This interaction occurs on two levels simultaneously: the engagement between character and character and the engagement between performer and spectator: 'There is the on-stage conflict of forces which constitutes the plot of the drama, and there is the engagement with the audience in an imaginative act of constructing a possible world ... Performers state by their actions that what they are performing is both real and not real, is in effect simply 'possible'. The audience ... test the validity of the perceived meanings [of the performance] within the wider context of culture as a whole'.²⁸ This idea is similar to Burns' two conventions: the rhetorical and the authenticating. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – interactionist understanding of theatre View of	An interactive art form	Acting creates a possible world in interaction with spectators	Doing: performance – an interactive process; acting Watching: spectators test this possible world for validity against their wider context

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Theatre: positive; functional
Feminist Spectator as Critic (1988); ‘Desire Cloaked in a Trenchcoat’ (1989a); ²⁹ ‘Bending Gender to Fit the Canon: The Politics of Production’ (1989b); ³⁰ ‘Performance, Utopia, and the “Utopian Performative”’ (2001); ‘Rehearsing Democracy: Advocacy, Public Intellectuals, and Civic Engagement in Theatre and Performance Studies’ (2001)	Jill Dolan American performer, director, educator and feminist	Dolan is ‘one of the leading feminist scholars in theatre’, ³¹ who argues that ‘mainstream critical response to plays written by women continues to reveal deep-seated gender biases’. ³² Her book Feminist Spectator as Critic transposes the idea of the ‘resistant reader’ to the theatrical (metaphorical) context of ‘resistant spectator’, allowing her to introduce the idea of the feminist spectator as critic. The move from a language metaphor to a visual metaphor allows feminist critique to be applied to visual media, including theatre, and ‘revolutionized perceptions of the theatre and performance by reevaluating the way in which theatre is viewed and critiqued’. ³³ ‘The feminist spectator takes a critical look at how she is imaged on the mainstream stage’, ³⁴ and refuses to endorse this imaging. Instead she ‘leaves the theatre while the audience applauds ... the curtain calls and goes off to develop a theory of feminist performance criticism’ ³⁵ – perhaps an account of how Dolan has shaped her subsequent work (and arguably Cixous and many other feminists who have responded by generating a critical language by which to draw attention to the concept of gender). In taking this ‘critical look’, Dolan assumes the position of the Gender-Aware Spectator/Critic who engages in efforts to make the spectators of mainstream theatre, especially the women, also gender-aware. ‘Desire’ considers the spectre of pornography, the male gaze, and the voyeuristic theatre: ‘the man sitting alone in a darkened theater masturbating under his coat while staring at the screen is an image engraved on our collective imagination. Male arousal by pictures is an accepted part of dominant cultural discourse’ [and arguably has been since Diderot]. ‘Feminist film and performance critics argue that representation is addressed to the gaze of the male spectator [who] shares in the pleasure of the hero’s quest to fulfil his desire for the story’s passively situated female’. If this is the case, then ‘[a]ny representation can be seen as essentially pornographic since the structure of gendered relationships through which it operates is based on granting men subjectivity while denying it to women’. Sexuality ‘is as large a part of spectator response as gender and ... by altering the assumed sexuality of spectators, the representational exchange can also be changed’. ³⁶ Theatre offers the potential of a location for communication, healing and renewal because theatre and performance, which Dolan sees as going together, work as a kind of public sphere in which ideas about a better future can be tried out: ‘[T]heatre and performance create citizens and engage democracy as a participatory forum ... [they are]	A seeing place; a living, shared, utopian space; a space for advocacy; a location for communication, healing and renewal; a public sphere	To offer glimpses of utopia as a contribution to the public sphere (which includes affect as well as debate): performance which makes the utopian view appear.	Doing: playwrighting ; the practices of theatre Showing: what is seen as significant reveals deep-seated gender biases. Watching: spectatorship is gendered; but male spectatorship is generally culturally assumed and sanctioned; the Feminist Spectator as Critic aims to make spectators gender-aware, and to encourage the development of a gender-aware theatre by adopting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		transformational cultural practices [which] might offer us consistent glimpses of utopia'.³⁷ They therefore offer a model. People go to the theatre to build cultural capital, but they also go through a desire for transformation: to 'reach for something better' and for new ideas about how to be and how to be with each other.³⁸ Performance is 'an action that makes it appear'.³⁹ 'Theatre remains, for me, a space of desire, of longing, of loss, in which I'm moved, by a gesture, a word, a glance, in which I'm startled by a confrontation with mortality (my own and others'). I go to theatre and performance to hear stories that order, for a moment, my incoherent longings, that engage the complexity of personal and cultural relationships, and that critique the assumptions of a social system I find sorely lacking. I want a lot from theatre and performance'.⁴⁰ It is not just 'liveness' which is important about theatre and performance, it is the possibility that something could go wrong. The 'confrontation with mortality' occurs because both performance and spectator are living in the same moment, they are sharing their lives in the same time and space. The performance depends on the actor staying alive as much as it depends on the spectator staying alive, yet both could die during the performance. This gives performance an edge, a 'willing vulnerability' which is not available in mediated performances. 'Rehearsing Democracy' is an 'argument for academic advocacy'.⁴¹ Artists, and those that teach in the arts, are 'public intellectuals with an expertise in performance',⁴² who should take their position seriously. In particular, 'performance, in its liveness, in the commitment of bodies we bring to it, challenges the alienation of the media' in ways which make it ideal for advocacy, 'as a tool for participating in democracy, as an expressive mode of being heard, seen, encountered, contended with as someone ... who has something to say in our current systems of power and representation'.⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-patriarchal/conventional/non-political theatre; pro-liveness View of Theatre: positive; functional			the position of 'the lesbian subject' because it 'offers the most radical position from which to subvert representation [because] personally, artistically and spectatorially, hers is closest to the view from elsewhere', ⁴⁴ [at least in respect to gender!].
'Theatre Audiences and the Reading of Performance' (1989) ⁴⁵	Marvin Carlson Theatre scholar	Carlson discusses audiences in relation to 'role'. Audiences have a 'role' to play in the theatre. This role can be thought of as 'readers', as in reception theory, although reception theory has limitations in understanding what audiences for live theatre are doing, particularly when they reject a performance.⁴⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	A place of performance	Performance	Watching: to describe the relationship of audiences to performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The Audience as Actor and Character: The Modern Theater of Beckett, Brecht, Genet, Ionesco, Pinter, Stoppard and Williams (1989)	Sidney Homan American actor and director	‘Neither actor nor audience can resist the stage, for the very notion of theater is ingrained in us, is part of our human make-up. We cannot avoid the need to play roles, the self-fashioning by which we consciously mold and adjust whatever basic personality has been handed us at birth. Yet such acting, our need to be on the stage of the polis ... only subjects us to the existential complexities and ... terrors of an audience ... we are caught between our comfort of our inner self, and our human, communicative need to express that self before others’.⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive/analytical View of Theatre: ambivalent	A place where one acts	To express ourselves	Doing: playing roles
‘Aristotle’s Poetics and Zeami’s Teachings on Style and the Flower ’ (1989) ⁴⁸	Megumi Sata Japanese academic of drama and English	‘Two great classic theatres of East and West, Japanese nō and Greek tragedy, are said to share common characteristics and elements – use of masks, the presence of a chorus, universality of themes, and a profound understanding of the human psyche ... [but] ... there are major difference between the two forms: spectacular productions, sweeping stone amphitheatres, and vast public audiences in Greece and small-cast performances, simple wooden stages, and invited court audiences in Japan [and] They are almost two millennia apart in time’.⁴⁹ However, both produced a key theorist who dealt ‘comprehensively and conclusively with the theory of the art form’: Aristotle and Zeami Motokiyo.⁵⁰ Sata’s article is a comparison of the two theories in terms of ‘imitation, play structure, effects, and definition of success’. While it doesn’t deal with theatre per se, it offers insight into two different kinds of performance and their theoretical underpinnings. Imitation: a key word for both theorists: ‘tragedy is the imitation of an action’ (Aristotle); ‘Role-playing involves an imitation’ (Zeami). Both thought imitation should be ‘beautiful’ i.e. it should enhance. However, Aristotle addressed his theory to the poet or dramatist, while Zeami addressed the actor-poet. For Aristotle, imitation was what the drama did: ‘tragedy is the imitation of an action’. The poet was the imitator, imitation was his art, and the object of the imitation was the action of a character type. Imitation was divided into 6 elements: plot, character, thought, diction, song and spectacle (i.e. playwrighting was a separate activity altogether). Plot, character and thought were the objects of imitation; diction and song were the media of imitation and spectacle was the	A cultural form which is both distinctive and universal; a craft	Affect	Doing: the an art and craft of performance Watching: a culturally specific relationship with its spectator

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		manner of imitation (and therefore the least important). [indicating that Aristotle ignored theatre as a ‘seeing-place’, focusing like all ‘good theorists’ on the text rather than the performance!]. Greek tragedy shows how a person of a certain type will act on occasions. Nō shows an essential emotion of a certain character type. For Zeami, imitation ‘always refers to the actor’s role-playing’. It was always about character, and it was an art of the actor (not the poet). The imitator is the actor, and the object of imitation is a character type. Structure: another key term for both theorists. Both stressed the important of wholeness and a sense of unity: every play should have a sense of completion. Both divide a play into three sections: beginning, middle and end (Aristotle); jo (introduction), ha (breaking) and kyū (rapid). For Aristotle, a ‘well-constructed plot ... must neither begin nor end at haphazard, but conform to these principles’ (Poetics 37-38). For Zeami, ‘The proper sequence of jo, ha and kyū provides the sense of Fulfillment’ (Zeami). But – Aristotle is talking about ‘the unity of a written plot within which an action starts and concludes’ i.e. unity comes from the ‘textual frame’ and is based on cause and effect. Zeami is talking about the dynamics of live performance: unity comes from the internal coherence of the performance, based on the use of rhythmic effects. Effect: both theorists argue that the effect of a play is achieved through imitation within a certain structure, and for both, the concept of effect involves a relationship with a spectator. However, for Aristotle, the proper effect of tragedy is catharsis). [Sata notes that this concept, which Aristotle mentions only once, is not well understood and the subject of argument. She plumps for Gerald Else’s controversial interpretation that catharsis is not so much what an audience itself feels, as it is generally thought, for something it grants to the hero by way of absolution: ‘catharsis is a purgation of the tragic hero’s actions through the spectator’s full understanding. The spectator acts as a judge [something it was used to doing in Athens] in whose sight the hero’s actions are purified. The catharsis brought about by the plot proves that the hero was blameless, and this knowledge allows the audience to have pity on him’, and thereby exonerate him.⁵¹ Note that this is not a spectator experience, but an experience granted by the spectator to a character. Nor is it volunteered by the spectator in the course of the play. The degree of effectiveness is brought about by the quality of the play. The effectiveness of the play is not determined by the spectator. The relationship between poet and spectator is strictly one way. Spectators are forced to grant catharsis to the character because of the quality of the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		writing. [Again, a conclusion Aristotle can only come to because he is engaging in literary analysis rather acknowledging the play as a performance: he starts his analysis from the point of view of literature]. For Zeami, on the other hand, the proper effects of the play as ‘mysterious beauty’ (yūgen) and novelty. Novelty depends on the spectator knowledge and experience because it involves a comparison between the present performance and previously experienced performance. The spectator grants the effects but here, ‘only the audience can decide whether it has felt a sense of surprise: ‘When the audience can express its astonishment as one with a gasp, the moment of Fulfillment has come’ (Zeami, Finding Gems). [Again, the emphasis is on the performance rather than the text – Zeami was an actor, and starts his analysis from the point of view of performance] Success: for Aristotle, a successful tragedy was ‘a properly written work with a well composed plot i.e. ‘his main concern’ was playwriting and he was addressing the poet. ‘Not being involved in actual dramatic production himself, he easily concludes that, as a matter of course, the best-plotted plays will be successful on stage’: ‘The best proof is that on the stage in dramatic competitions such plays, if well worked out, are the most tragic in effect’ (Poetics 42). He also claimed that such a play would be praised by readers, even if not performed. Tragedy is defined by analysing the nature of the text. For Zeami, however, ‘a successful play of the first rank is based on an authentic source, reveals something unusual in aesthetic qualities, has an appropriate climax, and shows Grace (yūgen)’ (Teachings on Style). i.e. success is related to performance: ‘Most spectators assume that if a good play is given a fine performance, the results will be successful, yet surprisingly enough such a performance may not succeed’ (Teachings on Style). ‘Being an actor and not a philosopher, he believes success to be very conditional’. Success can only be judged in relation to performance because a successful performance is one ‘which is accepted and praised by the audience’. Audience: As a professional actor, Zeami knew that ‘communicating with the audience is difficult and unpredictable’ – hence his great emphasis on acting skills. Nō is a performing art, and Zeami ‘wrote as an actor striving to gain the audience’s respect and approval’. His writings are read today by performers of all kinds because of this. Aristotle, on the other hand, ‘shows condescension towards both actors and audience’: it was an indication of how uncultivated spectators were that they required gesture (acting) in order to comprehend tragedy, and ‘the fact that such acting was not of aesthetic interest to Aristotle’, writing

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘unluckily late for his topic’, was ‘decisive ‘ for the history of drama in the west, for it was he who established the criteria on which drama was to be judged for centuries to come: drama ‘as a unidirectional process wherein the artistic achievements of the playwright are presented to spectators through the medium of language with the help of acting (gesture). Although the spectator is the object of the tragic aim of catharsis, the catharsis does not depend on the nature of the spectator. Aristotle’s guiding concept that the poet-playwright’s goal is achievement of an ideal work of art (his ideal tragedy) causes him to ignore the taste of the audience’. [This same disregard can be seen in countless western theories of drama to this day]. For Zeami, on the other hand, ‘Success with the audience’ was ‘everything’. Pleasing the spectator was ‘an integral component’ of the art of performance. The ultimate achievement of the artist lay in the ability ‘to see and grasp the audience and adjust one’s way of presentation accordingly’. Zeami thus solves the conflict between the artist’s ideal and the spectator’s desire by seeing it as part of the art of the artist to deal with. The Aristotelian dramatist, on the other hand, must struggle with this conflict even today. [He generally does this by recognizing the spectator only as a mass, largely unknowable and generally despicable!] whereas Zeami recognized the variation in spectators and made it part of his art to cater for all: ‘In the case of those spectators who have real knowledge and understanding of the nō, there will be an implicit understanding between them and an actor who has himself reached his own level of Magnitude. Yet in the case of a dull-witted audience, or the vulgar audiences in the countryside or in the far-off provinces, spectators will have difficulty in reaching a proper level of accomplishment. How should an actor behave in such a case? ... When the location or occasion demands, and the level of the audience is low, the actor should strive to bring happiness to them by performing in a style which they truly can appreciate. When one thinks over the real purposes of our art, a player who truly can bring happiness to his audiences is one who can without censure bring his art to all ... However gifted a player, if he does not win the love and respect of his audiences, he can hardly be said to be an actor who brings prosperity to his troupe. ... The Flower ... must differ depending on the spirit of the audience’ (Teachings on Style). This attitude makes Zeami’s manual ‘a practical manual of theatre survival’ as well as a manual on the art of performance. Aristotle’s influence on later generations has been ‘incalculable and unquestioned’. Sata suggests that his insistence on the text has influenced the historical development of

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		theatre in the west [as is clearly shown in this historical table]. Unlike Greek tragedy, which was already on the wane when Aristotle was writing, Nō is still performed before appreciative spectators as a living theatre. She suggests this is because it has always been directed to a present-day spectator, underpinned by a dramatic theory based on performance in which 'the relationship between performer and spectator' is considered to be 'of the greatest value'. 'In this Japanese experience we can see an alternative to the art-versus-pandering schism which the impractical idealism of Aristotle introduced into Western theatre'.⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Aristotelian drama View of Theatre: ambivalent

¹ Havel 1986, 'Writing for the Stage', in Disturbing the Peace: A Conversation with Karel Hvizdala, trans. Paul Wilson, N.Y., Vintage, 1991; excerpt in Gerould, Daniel, ed. 2000. Theatre/Theory/Theatre: The Major Critical Texts from Aristotle and Zeami to Soyinka and Havel. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books. 485-490.

² Havel, Vaclav. 1996a. 'Politics and Theatre'. Project Syndicate www.project-syndicate.org accessed 23/05/2006.

³ Havel, Vaclav. 1996b. 'Acceptance of an Honorary Degree from the Academy of Performing Arts'. Prague: Prague Castle http://old.hrad.cz/president/Havel/speeches/index_uk.html accessed 4th October 2007.

⁴ Gerould 2000: 483

⁵ Havel 1986, in Gerould 2000: 485-488.

⁶ Gerould 2000: 483

⁷ Havel 1986, in Gerould 2000: 488-490.

⁸ Havel 1996a

⁹ Havel 1996b

¹⁰ Havel 1996a

¹¹ Excerpt 'Political Dynamics: The Feminisms' reprinted in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 261-265.

¹² Wandor 1998/1986: 262-5

¹³ Davy, Kate. 1986. 'Constructing the Spectator: Reception, Context, and Address in Lesbian Performance'. Performing Arts Journal 10 (2) pp. 43-52

¹⁴ Davy 1986: 44

¹⁵ Published in Theatre Journal 39(1), 1987, pp. 20-34.

¹⁶ Auslander, Philip 1992, Presence and Resistance: Postmodernism and Cultural Politics in Contemporary American Performance, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 4

¹⁷ Auslander 1987: 26

-
- ¹⁸ Auslander 1987: 27
- ¹⁹ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.230
- ²⁰ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 44
- ²¹ Auslander, Philip. 2008. Liveness: performance in a mediatized culture. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 2
- ²² Auslander 2008: 1-2
- ²³ Molderings, Herbert. 1984. 'Life is No Performance: performance by Jochen Gerz'. In The Art of Performance: A Critical Anthology, edited by G. Battock and R. Nickas. New York: E.P. Dutton, pp. 166-180.
- ²⁴ Auslander 2008: 46-9
- ²⁵ Auslander 2008: 55
- ²⁶ Auslander 2008: 44
- ²⁷ Kershaw, Baz. 1992. The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention. London: Routledge.24
- ²⁸ Hilton, Julian. 1987. Performance. Basingstoke, Hants: Macmillan.132-3
- ²⁹ Published in TDR 33(1); excerpts reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.470-475.
- ³⁰ Dolan 1989b, published in Hart, Lynda (ed), 1989, Making a Spectacle: Feminist Essays on Contemporary Women's Theatre , Ann Arbor, The University of Michigan Press, pp. 318-345
- ³¹ Krasner 2008: 469
- ³² Dolan 1989b: 318
- ³³ Krasner 2008: 469
- ³⁴ Aston, Elaine. 1996. 'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 56-69.56
- ³⁵ Dolan, Jill. 1988. The Feminist Spectator as Critic. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press. 2-3
- ³⁶ Krasner 2008: 469-72
- ³⁷ Dolan, Jill. 2001a. 'Performance, Utopia, and the "Utopian Performative"'. Theatre Journal 53 (3) pp. 455-479. 455
- ³⁸ Dolan 2001a: 455
- ³⁹ Dolan 2001a: 470
- ⁴⁰ Dolan 2001a: 455
- ⁴¹ Dolan, Jill. 2001b. 'Rehearsing Democracy: Advocacy, Public Intellects, and Civic Engagement in Theatre and Performance Studies'. Theatre Topics 11 (1) pp. 1-17.1
- ⁴² Dolan 2001b: 1
- ⁴³ Dolan 2001b: 13-14
- ⁴⁴ Dolan 1988: 119
- ⁴⁵ Carlson, Marvin. 1989. 'Theatre Audiences and the Reading of Performance'. In Interpreting the Theatrical Past: Essays in the Historiography of Performance, edited by T. Postlewait and B. McConachie. Iowa: University of Iowa Press.
- ⁴⁶ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger. xiv

-
- ⁴⁷ Homan, Sidney. 1989. The Audience as Actor and Character: The Modern Theater of Beckett, Brecht, Genet, Ionesco, Pinter, Stoppard and Williams. Lewisburg; London and Toronto: Bucknell University Press; Associated University Presses.149
- ⁴⁸ Sata, Megumi. 1989. 'Aristotle's Poetics and Zeami's Teachings on Style and the Flower'. Asian Theatre Journal 6 (1) pp. 47-56. Also reprinted in Krasner 2008: 460-468.
- ⁴⁹ Sata 2008/1989: 460-1
- ⁵⁰ Sata 2008/1989: 461
- ⁵¹ Sata 2008/1989: 461-4. See G. Else 1963, Aristotle's Poetics: The Argument, Cambridge MA, Harvard University Press.
- ⁵² Sata 2008/1989: 464-7

Table 45/51: Theories of Theatre 1990-1992

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
1990s: saw the reader-response theories and reception theories of Derrida, Barthes and Foucault, Jauss (1982) and Stanley Fish (1980), and of semiotics, into theatre theory in particular in the work of Carlson, Bennett and Rabkin. Generally the ‘major thrust’ of this work was to ‘downplay the centrality of the author in artistic production’,¹ and a number of major contemporary or avant-garde productions by Brook, Grotowski, Blau and others featured radical re-readings or adaptations of famous texts (Shakespearean or Greek). Although it was recognized that ‘in performance, the audience ultimately becomes the true master of the situation’, and that ‘the generation of meaning is more complex and involves more kinds of participants than literary practice does’² most of this theorising was (a) thought of as reading rather than seeing, and (b) was directed towards superior or privileged readers such as theatre directors or performers. Susan Bennett called for the ‘emancipation of the spectator’³ but it was the theatre practitioner who was to do this, not the spectator. This theorising about spectators, such as it is, draws on post-structuralism’s belief that ‘fidelity to the author’s intention is impossible’ anyway and on Marxist and feminist concerns with political struggle rather than ‘allegiance to the work of art’.⁴ Theatre practice, however, could be said to be way ahead of such theorising in that it had ‘already long decentralized the playwright in favour of the producer, director and actors’, and in any case, the ‘generation of meaning in theatre is more complex and involves more kinds of participants’ that this use of what is essentially literary theory suggests.⁵
‘From Parody to Politics’ (1990) ⁶	Judith Butler (1956- Feminist scholar and philosopher	Krasner includes Butler in his anthology of theatre theory because of her significant impact on feminist theatre scholars such as Dolan, Reinelt and Phelan and others, rather than for her use of the term performativity, which she derived from linguistics. Butler ‘pioneered the study of queer theory and the notion of gender and sexual identity as socially constructed and ‘performed’, a normalising process which used regulations and reiterative practices:⁷ ‘the “doer” is variably constructed in and through the deed’.⁸ ‘Signification is not a founding act but rather a regulated process of repetition’. ‘Construction is not opposed to agency; it is the necessary scene of agency, the very terms in which agency is articulated and becomes culturally intelligible ... The critical task is to locate strategies of subversive repetition’⁹ e.g. in parody. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – gender as performative View of Theatre: functional	A conventional practice	We perform our gender, sexual and other identities according to set social guidelines using the repetition of signs which are for the most part conventional	Doing: performance (a reiterative practice) Showing: an identity
Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception (1990; 1997)	Susan Bennett English Studies	A ‘material analysis of spectatorship’ ¹⁰ [although she calls spectators ‘audience’] through a focus on the cultural conditions that make theatre and an audience’s experience of it possible. According to Bennett, the spectators ‘exists ... at the nexus of production and reception’, ¹¹ although it is not really clear what this means because of the conflation of spectators and audiences. Audiences have a role to play. They arrive at the theatre ‘well-disposed’ to accept this role, which is carried out within two frames, an outer frame	A place for watching performance - a ‘complex form of communic-	Representatio n- signification for the purpose of communic-	Doing: the practice of theatre (perform- ance) Showing: a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		which ‘contains all those cultural elements which create an inform the theatrical event’ and an inner frame which ‘contains the dramatic production ion a particular playing space ... It is the interactive relations between audience and stage, spectator and spectator which constitute production and reception, and which cause the inner and outer frames to converge for the creation of a particular experience’.¹² Bennett ‘analyses the role of the audience in theatre from a number of recent theoretical perspectives’ (semiotics, post-structuralism, reader-response theory). Spectators in traditional theatre enter into a ‘social contract’: audience members agree to be passive in their behaviour but open, eager and active in their acceptance and decoding of the signs presented to them’. She clearly sees this contract as a straitjacket for spectators because she ‘calls for the ‘emancipation of the spectator’ evident in non-traditional and often marginalized theatre practices, which allow for a more active role for the audience’.¹³ Bennett’s social contract appears to be an unequal one, since it is the theatre practitioner, who, it appears, must ‘emancipate’ the spectator. Martin Barker describes Bennett’s book as having ‘belatedly seized the Althusserian/theoreticist phase of cultural studies’ interest in spectators and applied them’ not to actual audiences but ‘to the idea of theatre audiences’.¹⁴ Blackadder claims it ‘typically ... assumes a basically passive, well-disposed audience’.¹⁵ Nevertheless, her book has been hugely influential amongst the few theorists who do consider spectators, possibly because of the paucity of other studies.	ation’ which requires the co-presence of performer and spectators and uses conventions to guide interaction	ation and/or emancipation	theatre performance is made up of signs to be decoded by the spectator, which they do according to their social and political situation Watching: spectators agree to watch in a particular way: a ‘role’ which they understand both through convention and from cues offered from the performance; they have a ‘social contract’ with the performance which enabled

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – idealised audience View of Theatre: positive; functional			performers to use certain conventions in order to communicate; ‘audiences for ‘traditional’ theatre need to be emancipated.
‘Theatre without a Conscience’ (1990); ¹⁶ Arguments for a Theatre (1993)	Howard Barker (1946-) Black English author & playwright, created of the Theatre of Catastrophe	The Theatre of Catastrophe is ‘an aggressively black viewpoint’ which Barker defends in his book. ¹⁷ Barker completely reverses/undoes the major trends/complaints of contemporary theatre theorists. The darkened theatre is an indication that the spectator is to be trusted individually with their own responses rather than controlled by the gaze of their neighbours. A response of silence is not a sign of passivity but the only possible response to the burden of witnessing: it indicates pain. Contemporary theatre/street theatre/community theatre are all based on the desire of the elite to teach ‘others’ – this turns theatre into school and spectators into students, making theatre an instrument of social conformity. Theatre has an ‘insatiable appetite for improving other people’ and a ‘passion to enlighten’ – to get people ‘to understand’ or ‘to know’ something; to ‘heighten perceptions’, to ‘improve the quality’ of their lives – which Barker calls ‘shamelessly ambitious’ – a ‘paternalistic benefice ... from the one who knows to the many who do not’. An example of ‘the gifted aching to illuminate the ungifted’ as a form of ‘the artist instructing the herd’. This kind of theatre begins with the question ‘What do the people need?’ long before the process of writing or rehearsal begins. Theatre is not about truth, teaching or any other of the ‘platitudes’ theorists trot out to justify what they do (usually in the fear they will be considered self-indulgent otherwise). Theatre is ‘play’ – a realm of the imagination in response to the question ‘What if ...?’ It has no conscience. Rather, it is a place where ‘the unspeakable’ can be spoken. This is its power – which is why it has been the subject of censorship and bans throughout its history. ‘The theatre is not true, it is not a true action, its very power, its	An amoral space or realm in which the undoable becomes doable	Play	Doing: playwrighting ; performance Showing: the undoable Watching: spectators give the actors permission to do the undoable, which they witnesses in the silence of pain

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		whole authority comes from the fact that it is not true ... The moment that an action on the stage asserts its veracity by reference to known and proven action elsewhere, theatre is overwhelmed by the world, the world reclaims it'. Avoidance of theatre as play indicates a distrust of the spectator. Spectators come to the theatre 'for what it cannot obtain elsewhere in any other forum ... it comes for the false ... for the speculative and the unproven' where 'there is no burden of proof at any moment'. Lighting the spectator goes along with the desire to enlighten them. It places spectators under the gaze of their neighbours, which inhibits imagination: [i]n all collective culture your neighbour controls you by his gaze'.¹⁸ In the darkness, your neighbour is 'eliminated ... you are alone with the actor' and free to use your imagination. Contemporary theatre in particular is about control. This is evident in writers 'smitten with the idea of themselves as advocates' and who aim to subordinate actors to their wishes. This leads to a 'theatre of morals almost as rigid as the medieval stage', contributing to 'a new style of social conformism'. Theatre is not a moral place. 'Great art lives outside the moral system, and its audience, consciously or unconsciously, demands it, particularly in theatres whose very darkness is the condition of a secret pact between actor and audience [in which] the actor is licensed to do the undoable [and take us] out of ourselves' like dogs let off the lead. Inside 'the black box' of the darkened theatre, 'the audience [is] trusted with the full burden of what it has witnessed and liberated from the ideology of redemption, it witnesses in silence, a silence of pain, the terrible ambitions of the human spirit'.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-didactic theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
Yet another discovery of the spectator, this time by the application of semiotics to theatre, semiotics being a 'spectator sport' par excellence. Also a continued concern to distinguish theatre from not just other media and other forms of image generation, but also from the burgeoning field of performance.
Sociocritique de la traduction: Théâtre et altérité au Québec (1968-1988) (1990)²⁰	Annie Brisset Canadian academic and translator	'[T]heatre as a social art is an enunciation addressing a group in a particular time and place'. Therefore 'it must conform more closely to the values of the collectivity and so is linked more directly with the social imaginary and its symbolic representations than other genres'.²¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional	A social art dependent on convention	To address through representation ; to communicate	Doing: theatre practice must acknowledge convention if it is to communicate

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Actors and Onlookers: Theater and Twentieth Century Scientific Views of Nature (1990)	Natalie Crohn Schmitt	A comparison of Aristotle and John Cage on the basis of their understandings of nature, on which Schmitt claims they pin their respective ideas of theatre. Schmitt argues that Cage's aesthetic represents a radically new departure for theatre with its concern with the interaction between performer and role and performer and observer, but Plato was also deeply concerned about this as well. She seems to see Aristotle's account of the Greek theatre as prescriptive (as so many have throughout the history of theatre theory) and his absence of concern with spectators as an indication that Greek theatre did not see the relationship between performer and spectator as interactive. ²² Purpose of theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive	An imitation of life affected by historical understandings of nature	Imitation	Doing: the practice of theatre
1991-2: a 'massive revival of New Writing' for the theatre in Britain, with the production of controversial work which has come to be known as 'In-Yer-Face' theatre, and an increase in spectators. IYF theatre was blatantly aggressive and provocative, featured the breaking of taboos and was experiential, intense, cruel and impositional. It was a rebellion against the classic well-made play and aimed to 'wake up' spectators and let them know what human beings were capable of, especially in terms of perpetrators and victims.²³ IYF theatre 'saved British theatre', which had always 'put the writer at the centre of the theatrical process' and which had been suffering waning spectators. IYF theatre was precipitated by a wider perception that masculinity was 'in crisis.' It was a short-lived aesthetic style, already apparently over by 2002, although Sierz considered that it had probably 'done its job' in breaking through moribund traditional approaches to theatre and theatre writing. It was also a feature of a time where theatres were not being subsidised and also could be seen as a kind of 'do-it-yourself' theatre. Theatre subsidies subsequently had increased, which may also have had a hand in IYF theatre's demise. It was based on a rage at conditions which were no longer present. Also spectators may have become used to or even bored with the constant aggression and provocation, and the bleakness of such theatre.
Theatre, Theory, Postmodernism (1991); 'Dance and Media Technologies' (2002); ²⁴ 'Performance and Science' (2007) ²⁵	Johannes Birringer German born performance and media choreographer; artistic director of Alienation Co.	Birringer 'laments the marginalization of theatre in postmodern culture'. ²⁶ It might be 'charming' for theatre to resist being 'the cutting edge' ²⁷ but it is also incapacitating for theatre. Theatre should have 'a critical connection to postmodern culture' which he sees as dehumanizing the 'dispossessed body' and generating 'pervasive social and economic displacements'. ²⁸ The solution to this and to theatre's marginalization does not lie in appeals to its 'liveness' but in its ability to explore representation and its limits, and its ability to disrupt 'the indifference of contemporary culture'. ²⁹ Complex interactions between theatrical and digital performance are already happening, ³⁰ suggesting that 'Dancing across distances' may be an alternative form of choreography, not the death of it. ³¹ 'The "intelligent stage" of the future will not be a theatre but the network itself' and audiences will become 'users and interface participants'. ³² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre's marginalization in postmodernity View of Theatre: functional	An art form which needs to be critical to survive	Exploring the limits of representation	Doing: the practice of theatre
'Introduction	Ronald Willis	'The attitudes that characterise a discerning audience member are remarkably like those	A place; a	To explore	Doing: the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
to Theatre – Who Does it Serve? What Does it Contain? (1991)	Educator	we associate with a liberally educated human being. At the least we expect a viewer to set aside inhibiting prejudices in order to facilitate empathetic involvement ... One implicit goal is to enable the student to access alternate paradigms, to expand the canon of experiences deemed worthy of consideration ... An ongoing strategy seeks ways to keep students open to “otherness” ³³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – purposeful theatre View of Theatre: functional	practice	alternative paradigms	practices of theatre Watching: education produces a discerning spectator
‘The Dramatic Basis of Role Theory’ (1991) ³⁴	Robert J. Landy Drama therapist	In discussing the basis of Role Theory as it is used by drama therapists, Landy advances a theory of ‘role’ and its historical development. Roles allow the connection of the particular (and personal) with the ‘universal and global’ through the idea of ‘types’. The concept of role is ‘a dramatic one, deriving ... from the wooden scroll on which the early actor’s lines were written’. ³⁵ Although the types of roles available ‘have remained somewhat constant throughout the centuries’, they have changed in number and complexity. During the C20th, they became so realistic that they virtually merged with reality in the ‘extreme forms of identity’ practised in the Strasberg acting method. This provoked a reaction towards more stylized or ‘truncated’ ideas of role, where roles became simply ‘presentational’ signs or images. Role is based on ‘the principle of impersonation’. Its aim is ‘to assert power over that which all human beings feel powerless’, including the self. Role-playing (by the self or by another) allows humans to come to know themselves ‘as an object’ and thereby achieve self-knowledge, and power over the self. It also allows the personal and particular to be linked with ‘the universal and global’ and vice versa. Theatre is thus a means of bridging the gap between the self and others, something which makes it valuable as a model for ‘dramatic forms of healing’. Role is what ‘holds two realities, the everyday and the imaginative, in a paradoxical relationship to one another. Without role there can be no drama’. ³⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - therapeutic drama View of Theatre: functional	An activity involving role-play which allows objectification (which makes it useful)	Impersonation; bridging the gap between the particular and the universal	Doing: drama
The Secret of Theatrical Space (1992)	Josef Svoboda (1920-2002) Czech designer	Svoboda’s experiments with new technologies and multimedia have influenced much contemporary theatre design. His work centres on the concept of kinetics . Because a play exists only in performance, its setting must be dynamic. He developed a technique he called laterna magika which combined performers with projected images in complex ways, and experimented with plastics in order to change settings easily and fluidly. He worked extensively in Europe and the United States and received many awards for	A setting for plays	To generate a play	Doing: performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		technical innovation. ³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – dynamism in performance View of Theatre: positive
The Semiotics of Theatre (1992); The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective (1997)	Erika Fischer-Lichte German critic, scholar, theatre historian and performance analyst (semiotics)	Fischer-Lichte is considered to be one of Germany's leading theorists and historians of theatre. She argues that approaches to the study of theatre have largely been historical, and therefore theoretical in perspective rather than aesthetic. This has meant the neglect of performance analysis, since performance 'exists only in the brief moment of its creation'. Consequently 'literary theory has consistently neglected the dimension of performance'. ³⁸ Performance itself 'can never be handed down to us ... A performance does not exist as a material artefact'. ³⁹ Modern recording equipment has overcome some of the difficulties of performance analysis, but still leaves the problem of the inevitable subjectivity of analysis, since 'I can only describe what I have seen', ⁴⁰ which may be different from what another sees. The other problem is that of segmentation: different ways of breaking up the performance in order to describe it can lead to different kinds of analyses. [Fischer-Lichte analyses a performance of Don Giovanni , which, while rich in detail regarding setting, gesture, costume, lighting etc, in no way manages to impart the experience of the performance]. Historically, theatre has provided spectators with a number of conventions by which they can readily identify that they watching theatre rather than real life (e.g. the use of the curtain; use of on-stage 'spectators'). Periodically, theatre becomes self-reflective (during the Baroque and in the postmodern world) and uses these conventions theatrically. For example, the red curtain may be used as part of the production's set in order to convey the idea of a theatre within the theatre. In self-reflective theatre, 'looking on' is as much 'a theatrical activity' as a real experience for the spectator, and spectators on stage may both replace and stand in for the spectator in the auditorium. This reveals that the gaze of others is 'the origin and also the condition of the possibility of theatre and of theatricality'. ⁴¹ Self-reflection 'on the conditions of its own potential can be seen as a predominant characterization of contemporary theatre'. ⁴² Fischer-Lichte thus links theatre with theatricality through the gaze of the spectator. Fundamentally, theatre is a site of cultural exchange, like a market; ⁴³ influences move both ways, and have consequences e.g. the introduction of perspective to theatre positioned and limited spectatorship in fundamental ways. Theatre is affected by, reflects and expresses its social and political context. Therefore theatre will be different for each historical era. During the Baroque, the body was a product of artifice; the aim was self-	An immediate experience, occurring under the gaze of the spectator; a site of cultural exchange (a market); a model; a form of (semiotic) communication	To express its social and political context; to contribute to a civilizing process through an exchange with spectators	Showing: the actor's body as a sign system Watching: theatre and theatricality both originate and continue to exist because of the gaze of spectators: 'the gaze of the other is ... the origin and also the condition of the possibility of theatre', ⁵³ as it is of the possibility of both history and performance analysis. ⁵⁴

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		control. The aim of acting was to represent controlled emotion; actors provided a model of self-control. During the C18th, the representation of naturalness became the aim of acting, as the body came to be thought of as a natural product, and sensuality was accented. The C20th saw the body as a tabula rasa, as ‘raw material for sign processing’; gestures were ‘abstract articulations’ and the body was raw material to be ‘reshaped according to artistic intentions’ part of a general approach to the body as a site of reshaping.⁴⁴ Since the 1960s (postmodernism), the aim has been to liberate the actor’s body by ‘desemiotization’ (Robert Wilson’s work in which the body doesn’t mean anything) or ‘re-sensualizing’ (Living Theatre), while also restoring the spectator to ‘their right to spectate’.⁴⁵ Theatre ‘has contributed to the civilizing process by employing and interpreting the actor’s body as a sign system’ for changing cultural systems. There is ‘a close connection between the civilizing process [in the culture at large] and the art of acting [at any one time] although it is impossible to prove ... that acting initiated the social conventions or ... the social conventions influenced acting’.⁴⁶ However, there is enough of a connection to argue that theatre history cannot be examined without regarding social history because theatre history is social history. Essentially, Fischer-Lichte sees theatre as a form of communication i.e. she has a linguistic understanding of theatre. Language signifies (semiotics) and therefore theatre can be read semiotically; therefore theatre is a form of communication (see Pateman for a critique of this idea).⁴⁷ Her book is also an attempt to articulate a methodology for analysing performances semiotically: analysis is necessarily subjective and can only be on the basis of plausibility; segmentation is problematic.⁴⁸ Despite her general recognition of spectatorship, Fischer-Lichte does not tie this in with the semiotic method or with herself as a privileged spectator qua analyst, largely because she still sees semiotics in linguistic terms: ‘The quest for meaning has always been one of the most crucial problem of literary scholarship’,⁴⁹ and four main approaches have been used: the mimetic: art copies life; the expressive: art expresses the individual subjectivity of the artist; the rhetorical or aesthetic: the work of art is a reality of its own; and the cathartic: the meaning of the work is revealed in the effect it has on the recipient. Each approach brings its own assumptions: there is an objective view of life available and the meaning of a work is conveyed through mimicry; the subjectivity of the artist is expressed in the work of art and this is its meaning; the meaning of the work of art lies exclusively in the symbolic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		systems it used or the internal relations within it; the meaning of the work lies in the effect it has on the recipient. Each approach reveals only one aspect of the work of art: its semantic dimension; its pragmatic dimension as a relationship to its producer; its syntactic dimension; or its pragmatic dimension as a relationship to the recipient. Semiotics is a better approach because it focuses on all four aspects. However, all five approaches are challenged by postmodern works which profess to have no meaning, and which actively thwart interpretation. This is not, however, a catastrophe, because the search for meaning can simply be transferred from the product or result of the work of art to the process of making the work of art. The process is the meaning.⁵⁰ We now have ‘a new paradigm of literary scholarship’ for semiotic analysis, one which looks at both interpretation (results) and process. The value of this kind of analysis is hard to see for anyone other than an historian of theatre or a director planning to put on another production because, as she herself says, it is a ‘meaning-making system that is practically inexhaustable’.⁵¹ Not only can it produce unlimited meaning, but it is about producing meaning. Her conclusion are so general as to be questionable (the postmodern avant-garde theatre of Robert Wilson is a bit like the avant-garde theatre of the 1930s). She constantly muddles theatre, theatre theory, theatre history and the theatre metaphor so that it is difficult to know what she is talking about. For instance she talks about contemporary western society putting itself ‘onstage’⁵² but what she means is that it ‘exhibits’ itself in public – which she sees as ‘a culture of theatricalizations’. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical); polemic - semiotic View of Theatre: positive; functional
The Language of the Theatre (1992); ‘Acting: The Quintessence of Theatricality’ (2002)	Eli Rozik Semiotics	A semiotic view of theatre. Theatre is ‘an iconic medium’⁵⁵ and ‘it is acting or enacting a fictional entity coupled with similarity on the material level, that constitutes the essential quality of theater or theatricality’. Theatre = theatricality. ‘Whatever happens on stage is not a world, but a description of a world’. In theatre ‘the principle of acting is more widely materialized than usually thought, and includes human and non-human actors, ready-made objects and even conventional signs’.⁵⁶ Acting is a tripartite activity: ‘actor (who produces the signs), text (the set of images inscribed on his body) and character (who exists only in the imagination of the spectator); ‘a real table on stage always enacts a table which is not itself, i.e., a table in a fictional world’. Actors do the same but the coupling of image producer, ‘text’ and fictional character is more complex and subtle.	An iconic medium; a place of enjoyment for spectators	To provide a description of the world through sign	Doing: acting (as enacting) is the essence of theatre Showing: icons

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Nevertheless there is a clear distinction ‘between action and “enacting an action” which applies to theatre and is the essence of theatricality.⁵⁷ Fischer-Lichte’s account of theatre is relentlessly semiotic in that it assumes from the outset that theatre is a form of communication, that this communication is coded and that these codes are interpreted by spectators. Although semiotics is a theory of reception, the interest in theatre for Fischer-Lichte does not lie in reception but in the identification and interpretation of signs. In the welter of codes and signs to be observed and interpreted by the semiotically aware spectator (such as Fischer-Lichte) we lose any sense of theatre as a place of enjoyment for spectators. Enjoyment is clearly not enough. Theatre has to mean something, even if that meaning is that there is no meaning. The constant theme of ‘crisis’ – even ‘virulent’ crisis⁵⁸ becomes tedious and one begins to wonder if the crisis lay in the minds of the theatre theorist rather than in the spectator. She also wants to argue for theatre as a ‘universal language’ since it is clearly inter-cultural, borrowing widely from other cultures. Brecht, for instance, is widely used by non-Western cultures, and often spear-heads the use of other Western theatre conventions.⁵⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-semiotic analyses of theatre which privilege decoding over enjoyment View of Theatre: positive; functional
The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention (1992); ‘Oh for unruly audiences! Or, patterns of participation in twentieth-century theatre’ (2001) ⁶⁰	Baz Kershaw British writer, director and teacher	A performance (which ‘encompasses all elements of theatre’ ‘is ‘about’ the transaction of meaning’ through ‘a continuous negotiation between stage and auditorium’.⁶¹ The totally passive audience is a figment of the imagination, a practical impossibility; and, as any actor will tell you, the reactions of audiences influence the nature of a performance’. The nature of the performance ‘enables the members of an audience to arrive at collective ‘readings’ of performance ‘texts’.⁶² Difference spectators will impact on their society in different ways, and this impact will be affected by aspects of theatre-going outside the actual text or production e.g. ‘how the audience gathers ... and disperses’.⁶³ These observations are relevant to all kinds of theatre, but are most clearly seen at work in oppositional theatre, particularly as this kind of theatre generally has to construct its audience and its performance space: ‘audiences for alternative theatre did not come ready-made’. The efficacy of any theatre, especially alternative theatre which aims to ‘refashion’ its society, depends on its relationship with its audience. When alternative theatre also wants to be popular as well as subversive, it must devise ‘complex theatrical methods ... in order to circumvent outright rejection’. Performances are	A cultural activity which produces a cultural product (a performance) and operates within a wider context which it either supports or	Encoding signifiers as part of an ideological transaction with spectators which either supports or challenges its social context; meaning is passed to the spectators via	Doing: performance – includes all the elements of theatre Watching: decoding signifiers; spectators have been subject to discipline so that applause is now their only

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		encoded and decoded via a shared ideology, which Kershaw defines as ‘any system of more or less coherent values which enables people to live together in groups, communities and societies’. Irrespective of performance type, ‘to the extent that performance deals in the value of its particular society, it is dealing with ideology’.⁶⁴ While Kershaw recognizes that any society will contain a plurality of ideologies in conflict, he maintains that there are some which become dominant and can be said to characterize a society (e.g. patriarchy, heterosexuality), and ‘theatre and performance are major arenas for the reinforcement and/or the uncovering of [such] hegemony’. All performance, not just alternative theatre, has ‘ideological designs on their audiences ... their over-riding purpose was to achieve ideological efficacy’,⁶⁵ engaging them in ‘the paradox of rule-breaking-within-rule-keeping’⁶⁶ as they attempt to re-structure their audience within and as an ideological community. Nevertheless long term efficacy is ‘notoriously difficult to determine’,⁶⁷ although the documented responses to some performances and the ubiquity of censorship indicates that, at the very least, challenges to the status quo are widely seen as something to be feared, and the economic success of some theatre as well as the general willingness of governments to spend on theatre also indicate that performances are also recognized as having value of some kind (even if only economic or entertainment): ‘arguments for the ‘economic importance of the arts’ assume the efficacy of theatre as an institution of cultural production’ if nothing else.⁶⁸ Spectators ‘always have a choice as to whether or not the performance may be efficacious for them’, as to whether they want to see the performance as consequential or ‘only a ‘possible world’, with no bearing on the real one’. The decision to see it as consequential, which operates as a commitment, is ‘the source of the efficacy of performance for the future’. This is more likely to have an impact on a society or community level if the whole audience responds in this way, because it will change ‘the networks of the community’.⁶⁹ It is the concept of ‘community’ which links the experiences of individual audience members to changes in the wider society, allowing a broader challenge to the status quo. However, in the end it is the context of performance [which] directly affects its perceived ideological meaning’, particularly in relation to the intertextuality brought to it by its audience. Kershaw argues that Western spectators have become ‘particularly skilled in inter-textual reading’ as a result of the mass media, and this has made them ‘more active in the creation of meaning’. Although some argue that this has led to a profound	challenges; a commodity; an ecological system	a continuous negotiation	mechanism for expressing themselves, however they come to understand the meaning of the performance through negotiation with the performers – as this occurs they are constructed as an audience

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		individualization of interpretation, nevertheless, both drama and theatre ‘quintessentially assume the possibility of a collective response based on the achievement of shared readings’. Kershaw argues that this is shaped ‘by the ideological identity of the audiences’ communities’ which are ‘the very foundation of performance efficacy. [Understandings of interpretation as entirely individual are steeped within an ideology of individualism]. Spectators are embedded within communities (of location and/or interest) as well as within cultures or ‘signifying systems’. Alternative and community theatre movements can be seen as ‘a cultural formation’, part of a broader ‘oppositional cultural movement’ which emerged in Western countries ‘in the post-war period’.⁷⁰ Individual alternative performance must be seen in this context as well, in order to consider their efficacy and especially, their popularity. [Efficacy cannot be measured in a vacuum]. Spectators have been subjected to discipline since World War II. This has changed them from patrons (who had to be pleased) to clients (of artist/experts) to consumers of theatre as a commodity. This has disempowered them to the point where they use applause to reaffirm themselves rather than to express approval or disapproval of what they are consuming. Spectator pleasure now is measured by whether or not they buy a ticket, not by whether or not they appreciate what they see. Kershaw suggests taking Boal’s approach to theatre could re-empower spectators and restore theatre’s democratic potentials, but at the cost of still not understanding ‘the nature of those elements that are poisoning ... contemporary theatre’.⁷¹ According to Kershaw’s analysis of the Mark Ravenhill play Shopping and Fucking those elements consist of a loss of a sense of public life, leading to a narrow narcissism in the spectator. He thinks that this loss should have been challenged by the play which had the opportunity to reveal it but backed away from it rather than risk spectator outrage, although one wonders whether he would have been happy to take responsibility for the consequences of his proposal. It seems not because he retreats to a theoretical position: ‘Remember, I am still dealing in theatre and performance as an ecological system, so the marginality of these suggestions might be more apparent than real’.⁷² Kershaw suggests using devices to induce ‘more selective inattention’ in spectators, perhaps by reintroducing clagues of various kinds. The theatre needs ‘unruly audiences’. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – re-empowerment of spectators View of Theatre: functional

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Los Angeles' (1992) ⁷³	Reza Abdoh (1963-1995) Iranian-born artist, director, playwright, choreographer and gay and lesbian rights activist	Abdoh's work 'examined images that inhibit the imagination, seeking to liberate preconceived notions of reality and power'. ⁷⁴ His work was clearly political, and prolific given his short life. [It is hard to know why Krasner included Abdoh in an anthology of theatre theory , because 'Los Angeles' is more a description of theatrical techniques]. An 'unpredictable' environment such as Los Angeles allowed Abdoh 'creativity ... a way to create work that resonates every aspect of one's personal and universal self'. This was important because 'Art today needs to have a holistic nature'. The most important question in theatre was how to 'manifest the invisible and the unknown without making it into a property'. The only way to do this was to have the performers 'become primary creators. It is essential to think of the performer as a primary creator' rather than 'becoming another person'. ⁷⁵ In passing, Abdoh compares the theatre scene in New York to that of Los Angeles. New York has a well-established theatre tradition 'of dialogue between an audience and a creator which is lacking in California, and that dialogue between the creator and the viewer determines how a work is perceived and the direction that it takes ... in New York there is a preformed set of rules, expectations, a norm or paradigm that you either try to uphold or try to break. When people go to see something they are always referring back to that model'. ⁷⁶ He prefers to freer environment of Los Angeles where he can do as he likes. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – performer are creative View of Theatre: positive	A socially embedded cultural practice	To manifest the invisible and the unknown	Doing: performance (art); performers were 'primary creators' not role-players
The short paragraph from Abdoh above epitomises the contrast between Aristotle and Zeami which Sata was drawing, ⁷⁷ with the added acknowledgement that the poet-tragedian was likely to be quite happy to hear Aristotle's version of things, since it gave him not just primacy, but a license to create, albeit within structural guidelines – but without having to consider the spectator. This suggests that it was not so much the insistence on the primacy of the text which has been the problem for the western tradition but the insistence on artistic freedom, and which the worship of the text symbolises. Consequently, the shift to performance in the west in recent years may not be an acknowledgment of Zeami's understanding of theatre, but another quest for artistic freedom , this time on the part of the actor. That performance is being driven by 'performance artists' rather than spectators indicates that we are still within the Aristotelian tradition, no matter how way out a performance is, as long as it is seen as a one-way process].
Only Entertainment (1992)	Richard Dyer (1945 – Film Studies	Entertainment is rarely looked at for its own sake. Instead '[e]ntertainment, especially preceded by 'just', is often used as a term to deny or discount something's aesthetic and ideological qualities, just as the 'art' label often prevents people from seeing how enjoyable something is ... art: entertainment is a dubious and often deadly distinction'. ⁷⁸ Yet, 'entertainment offers certain pleasures not others, proposes that we find such and such delightful, teaches us enjoyment – including the enjoyment of unruly delight. It	A form of entertainment	Providing visions of utopia for teaching, pleasure and the	Doing: the practices of theatre Watching: enjoyment

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		works with the desires that circulate in a given society at a given time, neither wholly constructing those desires nor merely reflecting desires produced elsewhere; it plays a major role in the social construction of happiness',⁷⁹ and is 'part of the professional ideology' and purposes of cultural producers.⁸⁰ Therefore we should make efforts to understand it for itself, rather than 'take it as given' or 'assume that behind it lies something more important'.⁸¹ Entertainment is 'an attitude towards things' rather than a category of things, and is not simply something devised 'to stave of boredom'. Moliere severed the connection between art and entertainment when he refused to toe the classical line, saying his purpose was to 'provide pleasure'; entertainment then became identified with what was not art. This distinction 'is harmful, false to the best in both' art and entertainment'.⁸² Entertainment, often in the form of musicals, is 'utopian' – offering a glimpse of something better. It is true that this can be tied to the dominant culture and capitalism, but dismissing entertainment as mere prevents us from challenging this, as well as denying the way 'art' can be the same. Purpose of Theorist: polemic –anti-discrimination against entertainment View of Theatre: positive; functional		construction of happiness

¹ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.142

² Fortier 2002: 143

³ Bennett, Susan. 1990. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 1st ed. London and New York: Routledge.

⁴ Fortier 2002: 143

⁵ Fortier 2002: 143

⁶ An excerpt from Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, printed in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing 477-482.

⁷ Krasner 2008: 476

⁸ Butler 2008/1990: 477

⁹ Butler 2008/1990: 477, 480-1

¹⁰ Bennett, Susan. 1997. Theatre Audiences: A Theory of Production and Reception. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. ix

¹¹ Bennett 1997: viii

¹² Bennett 1990: 149

¹³ Fortier 2002: 137

-
- ¹⁴ Barker, Martin. 2004. 'Reviews by Martin Barker'. Particip@tions 1 (2).
- ¹⁵ Blackadder, Neil. 2003. Performing Opposition: Modern Theater and the Scandalized Audience. Westport, Connecticut, London: Praeger.xiii
- ¹⁶ Reprinted in Arguments for a Theatre, and in Brandt, George, ed. 1998. Modern Theories of Drama: A Selection of Writings on Drama and Theatre 1850-1990. Oxford: Clarendon Press.55-61.
- ¹⁷ Brandt 1998: 55
- ¹⁸ Barker 1998/1990: 55-7
- ¹⁹ Barker 1998/1990: 59-61
- ²⁰ Discussed by Godard, Barbara 2000, 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context', Modern Drama 43, 2000, pp. 327-358.
- ²¹ Godard 2000:Godard, Barbara. 2000. 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context'. Modern Drama 43 (Fall) pp. 327-358. 333
- ²² Schmitt, Natalie Crohn. 1990. Actors and Onlookers: Theater and Twentieth-Century Scientific Views of Nature. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press.
- ²³ Sierz, Aleks 2002, 'Still In-Yer-Face? Towards a Critique and a Summation', in New Theatre Quarterly 18(1), pp. 17-24. 18-20
- ²⁴ Published in PAJ: A Journal of Performance and Art 24(1), pp. 84-93.
- ²⁵ Published in PAJ: A Journal of Performance and Art 29(1), pp. 21-35.
- ²⁶ Fortier 2002: 180
- ²⁷ Birringer 1991: x-xi
- ²⁸ Birringer 1991: xii-xiii
- ²⁹ Fortier 2002: 180
- ³⁰ Birringer 2007
- ³¹ Birringer 2002: 92
- ³² Birringer 2002: 87, 89
- ³³ Willis, Ronald 1991, 'Introduction to Theatre – Who Does it Serve? What Does it Contain?', Theatre Topics 1(2) 1991, pp. 143-149, 146; cited in Lee 1999: 157n11.
- ³⁴ Landy, Robert J. 1991. 'The Dramatic Basis of Role Theory'. The Arts in Psychotherapy 18 pp. 29-41..
- ³⁵ Landy 1991: 29
- ³⁶ Landy 1991: 29-32
- ³⁷ Svodboda, Josef 1992, The Secret of Theatrical Space New York: Applause Theatre Books.
- ³⁸ Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.319
- ³⁹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 187
- ⁴⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 188
- ⁴¹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 190
- ⁴² Fischer-Lichte 1997: 199
- ⁴³ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 1
- ⁴⁴ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 34-7

-
- ⁴⁵ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 56
- ⁴⁶ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 39-40
- ⁴⁷ Pateman, Trevor. c1995. 'Art is not a Message'. www.selectedworks.co.uk accessed September 2008.
- ⁴⁸ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 187-9
- ⁴⁹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 303
- ⁵⁰ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 317
- ⁵¹ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 337
- ⁵² Fischer-Lichte 1997: 218
- ⁵³ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 190
- ⁵⁴ Fischer-Lichte 1997: 343
- ⁵⁵ Rozik, Eli. 2002. 'Acting: The Quintessence of Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 110-124.111
- ⁵⁶ Rozik 2002: 123
- ⁵⁷ Rozik 2002: 113
- ⁵⁸ Rozik 2002: 119
- ⁵⁹ Rozik 2002: 148
- ⁶⁰ Kershaw, Baz. 2001. 'Oh for unruly audiences! Or, patterns of participation in twentieth-century theatre'. Modern Drama 44 (2) pp. 133-156.
- ⁶¹ Kershaw, Baz. 1992. The Politics of Performance: Radical Theatre as Cultural Intervention. London: Routledge.17
- ⁶² Kershaw 1992: 16
- ⁶³ Kershaw 1992: 24
- ⁶⁴ Kershaw 1992: 15-18
- ⁶⁵ Kershaw 1992: 21
- ⁶⁶ Kershaw 1992: 28
- ⁶⁷ Kershaw 1992: 21
- ⁶⁸ Kershaw 1992: 23
- ⁶⁹ Kershaw 1992: 28-9
- ⁷⁰ Kershaw 1992: 33-6
- ⁷¹ Kershaw 2001
- ⁷² Kershaw 2001
- ⁷³ Published in Mime Journal 1991/1992; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 483-488.
- ⁷⁴ Krasner 2008: 483
- ⁷⁵ Abdoh 2008/1992: 484-5
- ⁷⁶ Abdoh 2008/1992: 484
- ⁷⁷ Sata, Megumi. 1989. 'Aristotle's Poetics and Zeami's Teachings on Style and the Flower'. Asian Theatre Journal 6 (1) pp. 47-56.
- ⁷⁸ Dyer, Richard. 1992. Only Entertainment. New York: Routledge. 3

⁷⁹ Dyer 1992: 7

⁸⁰ Dyer 1992: 8n1

⁸¹ Dyer 1992: 7

⁸² Dyer 1992: 12-13

Table 46/51: Theories of Theatre 1993-1996

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Unmarked: The Politics of Performance (1993); Mourning Sex: Performing Public Memories (1997) ¹	Peggy Phelan (1959- American feminist cultural theorist and performance studies scholar	Phelan is a leader in new concepts of performance theory, investigating ‘the political efficacies of performance for social change. Unmarked examines the invisibility of the marginalized. Mourning Sex examines the complexities of loss and grieving in art and society. ² For Phelan, performance is irrevocably live: ‘Performance cannot be saved, recorded, documented, or otherwise participate in the circulation of representations of representation.’ ³ This offers freedom. ‘Performance and theatre are instances of enactments predicated on their own disappearance’. ‘The enactment of invocation and disappearance undertaken by performance and theatre is precisely the drama of corporeality itself’. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic - invisibility View of Theatre: positive; functional	A seeing place	Making visible through enactments	Doing: performance
The Theatre and Everyday Life (1993)	Alan Read English theorist of the ethics of performance	‘Theatre is worthwhile because it is antagonistic to official views of reality’. ⁵ It is through performance that we can challenge ‘social and cultural “givens”’. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – performance as ethical View of Theatre: positive	An art form	Challenging hegemony	Doing: the practice of theatre
Theatre and the World: Performance and the Politics of Culture (1993); The Politics of Cultural Practice (2000)	Rustom Bharucha Indian-based writer, director and dramaturge	Theatre is ‘a laboratory of the world’ through which we can ‘see the global and communal realities of our times’ ⁷ and, following Brecht, ‘[t]o seek the familiar in the unfamiliar, the unfamiliar in the familiar’. ⁸ Bharucha, however, rejects Soyinka’s interculturalism in performance, especially where Western directors such as Brook incorporate elements from other cultures in an exchange which is never ‘fair and balanced’. This ‘two-way street [is] more accurately described as a ‘dead-end’, ⁹ especially as this kind of interculturalism ‘always displaces traditions from where they really mean something’. ¹⁰ ‘Nothing could be more disrespectful to theatre than to reduce its act of celebration to a repository of techniques and theories’. ¹¹ The same can be said for traditional culture. Fortier says that this purist position ‘may be good for certain isolated, rural forms of traditional performance’ but does not help people in urban ‘hybrid conditions’. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-inter-culturalist theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place of experimentation; a laboratory; an act of celebration	Experimenting - celebration	Doing: the practices of theatre Showing: alternative realities
‘Seize the Moment’ (1994) ¹³	Peter Zeisler (1924-2005) Theatre	Good theatre provides ‘forums to communities’.	An activity	The creation of forums for communities	Doing: the practices of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	advocate, director and producer; founder of the Guthrie Theater	Purpose of Theorist: polemic – dialogic theatre View of Theatre: functional
‘The Dramaturgy of the Tabloid: Climax and Novelty in a Theory of Condensed Forms’ (1994) ¹⁴	John Osburn Theatre Studies	Dramatic structure consists of ‘the resolution of an action through the mechanism of the climax’. ¹⁵ This structure can be and is being applied to situations outside theatre. Dramatic structure works as a form of condensation (like ‘tabloids’). However, the condensation engaged in by tabloid newspapers loses its connection with dramatic structure because it provides an instantaneous climax. Understanding dramatic structure can help remedy the increasing lack of structure used by tabloid forms. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (dramaturgical) View of Theatre: n/r		The resolution of conflict	Doing: drama - playwrighting
Directing Postmodern Theater (1994)	Jon Whitmore American director and writer	An introduction to directing using semiotic theory. Theatre is about meaning: ‘[t]he reason for creating and presenting theater is to communicate meanings’. ¹⁶ People go to the theatre for a variety of reasons – excitement, illumination, fulfilment. Spectators constitute ‘a sign system for both performers and other spectators: ‘each spectator serves as a signifier for performers and other spectators to read’. ¹⁷ These signs include physical features, socio-economic traits, movement, proximity, aural discourses such as laughing, talking, coughing, social interactions such as eating or drinking. The director understands these various desires and behaviours, although he cannot control the spectators. However ‘it is critical that he know what he wants them to take away from the encounter’ because this helps him make choices when preparing the performance. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as communication View of Theatre: positive; functional	A form of communication; a social event; an encounter	Communication - the communication of meanings through sign, taking into account spectator behaviour	Doing: directing Watching: the spectators emit and read their own signifiers
‘Elements of Style’ (1994) ¹⁹	Suzan-Lori Parks (1964- African-American	Parks offers some advice about how to write plays and appear on opening night: ‘Don’t be shy about looking gorgeous. I suggest black’. ²⁰ The job of the playwright is ‘to write good plays’ and to defend dramatic literature ‘against becoming “Theatre of Schmaltz” and theatre which is ‘uninterested in the marvel of live bodies on stage’. A few of her hints: you should know why it has to be a play and not some other form; form and	An activity; an art form	Performance of words	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	playwright and screenwriter	content are interdependent: 'the form is an active participant in the sort of play which ultimately inhabits it'. ²¹ Repetition and revision are central elements in her 'drama of accumulation', which is rhythmic, like jazz. Don't take established shapes for granted (e.g. time) and realise that 'Words are spells in our mouths ... Language is a physical act ... Words are spells which an actor consumes and digests' in order to perform, and the 'action goes in the line of dialogue' (not 'in a pissy set of parentheses'). ²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – good plays View of Theatre: positive
To Act, to Do, to Perform: Drama and the Phenomenology of Action (c1994)	Alice Rayner American academic of Dramatic Literature and Critical Theory	A philosophical enquiry into how action is constituted by language, materiality and performance, which uses dramatic texts by Shakespeare, Chekhov and Beckett to examine the problems of action. Rayner uses a phenomenological approach to theatre in order to 'get at the 'thickness' of action, its 'phenomenal complexity''. Action is a larger potential field which theatre actualizes in particular circumstances. Works of dramatic art are 'ways of seeing' which 'allow us to think through our relation to action and reality'. ²³ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place in which drama is actualized as action	To allow us to think through our relationship to action	Doing: performance Showing: representations through action
Converging Realities: Feminism in Australian Theatre (1994); Body Show/s: Australian viewings of live performance (2000)	Peta Tait Feminism and Queer theatre and performance	Through the work of feminist practitioners, 'theatre is shown as a social space in which the performative nature of cultural and individual identity is explored'. ²⁴ [An account of theatre which completely ignores the inability of performer or director to control what the spectator makes of what is shown. Includes the discussion of a production of The Currency Lass at the Q Theatre in 1989 in which Justine Saunders played the part of a white man because she was a 'professional performer' and therefore 'eligible to be cast in non-Aboriginal roles'. ²⁵ Tait as well as the director and performers of this production, seem to completely overlook the relationships between the roles in the play and interpret the puzzlement of the spectator as an inability or unwillingness to deal with the racial implications of the play which were supposedly being brought out by the transgressive casting]. In Body Show/s , Tait distinguishes between two kinds of spectators : the specialist viewer, who has some knowledge and technical ability in relation to what they are seeing and non-specialist spectators (the general spectator). In physical performances such as circuses, non-specialist spectators 'watch the moving body' and see 'ease, daring action and joyful exuberance'. The specialist viewer is aware that the performer may be experiencing 'muscular pain'. This means that they are better able to analyse performance. They can also pay attention to the background of the performance. ²⁶ Tait	A social space	To challenge the social and political status quo by 'foregrounding ... alternative ways of conceptualising subjectivity'. ²⁷	Doing: performance Watching: specialist viewers are more able to analyse what they see (and are justified in doing so)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		thus justifies her spectatorship on elitist grounds, making it clear she is not speaking as the general spectator. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – embodiment View of Theatre: positive; functional
Bodied Spaces: Phenomenology and Performance in Contemporary Drama (1994)	Stanton B. Garner Jr Phenomenologist	‘Theatrical space is phenomenal space, governed by the body and its spatial concerns’, ²⁸ and ‘theatrical watching’ is about ‘the spatial conjunction of bodies, objects and other performance elements that constitute at once the object of such watching’. ²⁹ [NB: Peta Tait says this is not the case with physical theatre (circus, dance) – people watch the moving body. ³⁰ Work by Tim Fitzpatrick indicates that when watching a drama spectators overwhelmingly look at the faces of the actors, although they do frequent, split-second sweeps of the surroundings to check that nothing had changed. ³¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis: embodied performance View of Theatre: positive	A phenomenal space	The government of space using the body	Doing: performance Showing: the body governs the way space is used in theatre Watching: spectators constructs the object they are watching as they watch
‘The Other History of Intercultural Performance’ (1994); ³² Corpus Delecti: Performance Art of the Americas (2000)	Coco Fusco Latin American performance artist	Fusco was critical both of intercultural performance and of Boal’s work, which she saw as creating ‘a restrictive straitjacket for Latin American artists’: ‘Too many Latin Americans have suffered at the hands of authoritarian systems that reduce all forms of expression - public, private, religious or aesthetic – to a certain political value of meaning for there not to be an enormous amount of scepticism about such approaches to culture’, ³³ not least because now, in the United States where Fusco worked, there was ‘an insistence that all ‘authentically’ Latino artists perform this function ‘of politicizing the underprivileged’ – ‘even though the reality is that many Latin American artists’ primary spectator consists of their peers, other intellectuals, and spectators that do not respond receptively to what they perceive as outdated and dogmatic paradigms’. ³⁴ Fusco’s performance with Guillermo Gómez-Peña of Two Undiscovered Amerindians Visit... (1990s) gives a clear indication that what spectators see is not under the control of artists . They expected their ‘use of satiric spectacle’ to critique the European ethnological practices of putting native people on display to be readily apparent to		The expression of the political can take various forms	Doing: performance art Watching: spectators read into performance aspects of their own cultural and social life and context, especially its ideology

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		spectators. However, many people took their performance piece to be a real example of such ethnography, to the point of making complaints to the Human Society about its treatment of the natives. One audience member ‘remembered having read about the island in National Geographic’.³⁵ Responses were ‘complex and unexpected ... museum directors were bewildered to find that viewers took the performance in the same way they took their own ‘scientific’ displays. The performers expected that their performance would show that viewers had not moved past cultural stereotypes in their thinking and hoped to confront viewers with their own stereotypical reactions’.³⁶ Instead, the performance was taken to be real and the performers were accused of ‘misinforming the public’.³⁷ Such reactions are both an indication of what spectators bring to performances, and also perhaps, the explanation for the disciplining of spectators which took place during the C19th: spectators were not only not passive in their responses but were likely to act in completely unexpected ways. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-prescriptive theory (even when radical) View of Theatre: positive; functional
25 Years of Performance Art in Australia (1994)	The Sydney Front (1986-1993) Performance group	The Sydney Front featured performances which manipulated and attempted to ‘seduce’ spectators into ‘making themselves’ the spectacle, although from the description of the performance of Don Juan (1991-2), it is clear that spectators were manoeuvred into positions where they found themselves as spectacles, generally through the manipulation of space and the use of spectator ‘costuming’ such as masks. Their manifesto reads: ‘Our work is about excess, about a gesturing that goes far beyond that necessary for any reasonable discourse. The superabundance of our work has the paradoxical aim of releasing the spectator from false complicatedness. We continually collapse our own rhetoric and bring the focus back to the body’s fleshy organs. By thus returning to where meaning is embodied, we aim to protect ourselves and the spectator from the terrorism of grand abstractions that cannot be lived out’.³⁸ Their performance generally attempted to confront the spectators with embodiment. Spectators were invited to feel the naked performer, and some spectator members were induced to strip, only to find themselves being felt by the performers (and possibly other spectators). The aim was ‘to be most unsettling or agonising for the spectator’.³⁹ Spectators were ‘corralled’, asked to wear masks and carry wine, singled out for focused attention and ‘salacious questions’ and physical contact.⁴⁰		Manipulation and seduction of spectators into recognizing the physical aspect of performance	Doing: performance art Showing: the fine line between spectator and performer and the susceptibility of spectators to seduction or coercion Watching: an unsettling

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – embodiment View of Theatre: positive; functional			or agonising experience as they were continually threatened with being the spectacle
‘Utopia Sustained’ (1995) ⁴¹	Dragan Klaic Theatre scholar and cultural analyst	Theatre ‘is always based on conflict, opposition, and contradiction, or at least tension ... Theatre succeeds when it presents its utopian arguments as a blueprint, open to opposition, rather than depicting the consequences of their implementation’. ⁴² Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: functional	A place of representation	To present views of utopia	Doing: the art of theatre Showing: representations
‘Systems of Lights’ (1995)	Anna Deavere Smith American performer and playwright	Theatre is a mode of communication ‘requiring human beings to be in the same room at the same time’. ⁴³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – liveness; co-presence View of Theatre: functional	A mode of communication in a shared space	Communication	Doing: the practices of theatre
Key Concepts: A guide to Aesthetics, Criticism and the Arts in Education (1991); ‘Art is not a Message’ (1995); ⁴⁴ ‘Mimesis and Katharsis/Catharsis’ (2004) ⁴⁵	Trevor Pateman Aesthetics	Works of art are not ‘acts of communication’ or messages. A work of art is an expression or representation which invites us to or provides the opportunity for ‘feeling and reflection’. Art works ‘are demonstrative – they show. But showing is always in principle and potentially, showing some-one’. This is a ‘risky business’ for the artist because they cannot control the response of the spectator. Nevertheless, art that tries to convey a message invariably fails as art (but may succeed as propaganda). Viewing art also entails a personal relationship: ‘there can be no second-hand engagement with the art object ... when we engage with a medium, whether as spectator or artist, we have to do so ‘in and of ourselves’’. No-one else can do it for us. ⁴⁶ Pateman defines catharsis as the experience of simultaneously feeling both pity (for the sufferer) and fear (for ourselves). It is not about emotional release or the release of pathological feelings (Nietzsche) but ‘a powerful emotional experience’ which leads to the rightful functioning of both pity and fear in life. He bases this reading on Aristotle’s Poetics . It is essential that art is representation or mimetic (i.e. fictional) for this experience to occur. ⁴⁷	A viewing-place	The artist works with a medium which can best show what he wishes to express or represent or imitate, although he may not know what that is until the work is	Doing: art Showing: all art is demonstrative Watching: an experience of art must be first-hand. The spectator’s response cannot be controlled

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-communication model View of Theatre: positive; aesthetic		finished. The aim is to invite feeling (affect) and reflection in the spectator	even though the spectator is viewing the art first hand
‘The crystal of acting’ (1996)	Janne Risum Theatre theorist	An analysis of the way theatre has ‘borrowed from the other arts and from life’ in order to define itself, sometimes sharply, sometimes indeterminately. Drawing on Artaud, she claims that acting is a form of cutting crystal. ‘There is an infinite number of ways to cut your own crystal, and some pieces of basic advice. There is only one condition: you have to cut one’. ⁴⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – risk-taking View of Theatre: positive	An art form	To take risks	Doing: acting
A Brief History of Theater Forms (1996)	Alice Lovelace American performance poet, playwright and essayist	Theatre has three historical forms: communal (pre-Christian and based on ritual), Aristotelian (theatre to the spectator) and Brechtian (an attempt to regain communal theatre). ⁴⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-Aristotelian (non-participatory) theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent	An historical art form	Forging a relationship with the spectator	Doing: the practice of theatre - different kinds of theatre have different kinds of relationships with their spectator
Clit Notes: A Sapphic Sampler (1996); ‘From “Fab!” to “Fuck!”’ (2001)	Holly Hughes American performance artist/actor	‘Theater tends to happen in theaters, whereas performance art tends to happen in spaces. A theater will be designed ... as somewhere with a stage, some lights, a box office, a dressing room, head shots, and people who know how to run these things. A theater is a place that has been designed for theater, whereas a space has been designed for some other purpose: it’s a gas station, an art gallery, somebody’s living room, a church basement, and it’s always better suited for pancake suppers and giving oil changes than for performing’. ⁵⁰ Performance, for Hughes, is a ‘space apart, but it is ‘an active space, one tied to a public sphere in which the mutual agency of performer and spectator might have meaning’. ⁵¹ Both sides of politics have a problem with politically engaged art	A space for the activity of theatre; a marginal, expensive activity	Active engagement with the spectator	Doing: performance art Showing: challenging the stereotypes shown in traditional

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of any kind, although the right at least recognizes ‘that art has power, that art is an agent of social change’. The ‘standard leftist take on art: art is decadent, bourgeois, just another commodity’. What we end up with is ‘a lot of artists who are politically engaged ... critical, central, thick as thieves’ but not much thinking by artists of the connections between art and ‘the conditions under which it’s made and viewed’. Consequently, it is difficult to organize artists as activists, while, at the other end, the exorbitant cost of theatre tickets leads to theatre which ‘caters to an audience that can either blow fifty bucks without blinking or to someone of more modest means who sees theater as an occasional indulgence’ which they don’t want spoiled by politics. Teachers of acting contribute to the problem too, by reinforcing ‘social diseases’ such as racism, sexism and gender conformity through their attention to how a performer looks rather than what they can do.⁵² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-conventional theatre and its rules View of Theatre: ambivalent			(orthodox) theatre Watching: is affected by factors such as cost
‘Culture and political change: British radical theatre in recent history’ (1996)	Anna Seymour English director	Artistic expression has become ‘part of the leisure industry’ under the domination of the market and an enterprise culture, but theatre ‘can be used for cultural activism as well as for mere entertainment’. This is because ‘there is no neutral territory on the stage [and so] it is impossible for messages not to be transmitted’ and theatre is made in order to ‘expose ideas’ as well as to ‘create a theatrical experience’. Consequently, theatre makers ‘cannot claim to be innocent observers’ or mere story-tellers (as Peter Brook claimed to be). Too many decisions occur before the play is seen by spectators: the ‘size of the space, positioning of the spectator, spatial relationships between actors and set, textures and colours, and when to turn the lights on and off’, underpinned ‘by the intentions of the play’s producers’: ‘conscious choices and material decisions are made about the construction of theatrical ‘product’. Theatre has a ‘materialistic basis’ whether the times recognize that basis or not. Spectators are neither ‘controllable automata’ nor ‘so diverse in their ‘subjectivities’ as to be indescribable’. Spectators are interpreters. A spectator ‘will always make up its own mind, whether we like it or not’.⁵³ However, activist theatre cannot be judged according to some ‘universal’ or abstract conception of what is ‘art’ or what is ‘professional’ because it must, more than any other kind of theatre, adapt itself to its spectator: grieving when it is grieving and celebrating when it is celebratory. The standards of judgment applied by funding agencies tend to be abstract	A constructed experience; a practice; an art form	To expose ideas; to create an experience for the spectators by creating a relationship with them	Doing: directing; the practices of theatre Showing: all theatrical products contain ‘messages’ of some kind (practitioners are not ‘innocent’). Watching: spectators are interpreters,

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		and theoretical and miss what the theatre is doing, in particular the imperative of connecting with its spectator: 'To try to detach an understanding of the work from its constituent audience, to judge it in terms of some abstract notions of 'art' is of itself a political statement, implying universal standards or 'good' and 'bad' art and insinuating the power of those privileged to judge. Having said that it would be naïve to suggest that what the audience wants is necessarily 'good''.⁵⁴ It is up to theatre practitioners to try and make theatre of a high standard, whatever kind of theatre it is. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-aesthetic view of theatre/pro-responsibility View of Theatre: positive; functional			who make up their own minds
'Performing Emergency: Witnessing, Popular Theatre, and The Lie of the Literal' (1996)	Julie Salverson Canadian playwright and arts educator	Salverson works in 'community-based popular theatre' which she says has, since the 1980s become 'a named genre' with 'a large degree of acceptability and wide public interest'.⁵⁵ Popular theatre projects which allow people to 'tell their stories' are generally seen to be vital, engaging and having 'indisputable learning' opportunities for both performers and spectators, however, there are particular problems associated with such theatre which can make 'telling stories ... not always an empowering experience': 'Thoughtlessly soliciting autobiography may reproduce a form of cultural colonialism that is at the very least voyeuristic'⁵⁶ and may involve danger and re-traumatisation for the teller. Salverson thinks through this problem by drawing a distinction between watching and witnessing, which she defines as 'an act through which an incident of violence is understood as significant and is responded to by someone other than the direct victim of that violence, an act ultimately perceivable by the survivor as actual changed conditions in the world around him or her, e.g. the conditions that encourage people to drink and drive become conditions that discourage such behavior'.⁵⁷ Witnessing then requires a change in the spectators to accommodate the experience of the victim. In this way, a victim is restored to their community, which has changed to accommodate the person's experience. In other words, when working in popular theatre, especially that which focuses on trauma or violence, 'we need to take seriously what it means to speak and listen to difficult histories' by providing a space which not only invites the telling of the story but also provides the means by which the spectator for that story can take in what is being told. What Salverson is pointing out is the problematic nature of conflating theatre with ritual. Although both create a space for story-telling, only ritual includes provision for witnessing. Salverson wants to hang on to the form or container which can	A communal space for story-telling	Therapeutic, pedagogical but with the potential to be voyeuristic; to effect change	Doing: communal ritual Showing: portraying traumatic events (can be positive but can also be harmful) Watching: can be cathartic; may be voyeuristic or merely empathetic

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		be created by theatre, but utilize it in the way ritual does. In this way she can prevent the 'lie of the literal' where authenticity of the story over-rides the form in which it is being told, either preventing witnessing, or collapsing witnessing into empathy ("just like me").⁵⁸ Neither of these adequately acknowledges the trauma which is being expressed because they do not allow externalisation, and can lead to re-traumatisation. They are also unlikely to achieve the aim of popular theatre, which is 'a public and distinctly pedagogical enterprise' which aims 'to set up conditions of reception' that will affect or change the spectator, as well as the performers. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – therapeutic theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance' (1996)	Elizabeth Wright Psychoanalysis	Psychoanalysis has always 'paid attention to' theatre, especially to the similarities between them. 'Theatricality' is 'the operative factor both in the consulting room and on the stage'.⁵⁹ However, post-Freudian psychoanalysis 'challenges any simple notion of mimesis, whether applied to the conscious or the unconscious.' Instead, 'postmodern performance theatre explores the world as theatrically constructed rather than the theatre as mirror of the world'.⁶⁰ the world is theatre because it is constructed. Postmodernism has 'betray[ed] the theatrical nature of reality: the subject is theatrical through and through'.⁶¹ Freud saw the mind as a metaphoric theatre, and believed that spectators at actual theatre received catharsis and consolation in the 'surreptitious,' observing representations of the aspects of themselves they were required to repress. However, postmodern performance no longer sees theatre as a form of consolation for the spectator. Rather 'the basic structure of postmodern performance' since Brecht and Artaud, involves 'subversively implicating the spectator with what is happening on stage and vice versa',⁶² for a variety of purposes: recognition of death (Lacoue-Labarthe), awakening of the self (Pina Bausch), confrontation (Müller; Wilson). 'The post-Freudian theatre, in the wake of Lacan, reveals theatricality as a necessary element in the construction of the subject. Its effect is to make the subject (artist and spectator) experience the gap between the body as a discursive construct and its felt embodiment in experience, between the representation and the real, and to expose it to continual risk of re-definition'. On the basis of this, Wright analyses the work of a number of 'postmodern' artists, seeing in it the same refusal of grand narratives that postmodernism rejects. However, this account of the historical development of psychoanalysis applied to the theatre slides inexorably from	A place	Exposing the workings of the unconscious through representations	Doing: performance Watching: Freudian: sublimation and consolation Post-Freudian: recognition of death; awakening of the self, confrontation

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Freud's account of what it means to be a spectator to an almost complete focus on the artist and what s/he produces, as Wright unproblematically adopts the position of the psychoanalytically aware Spectator/Analyst. The affinity between psychoanalysis and theatre, on which she bases her assessment that 'the subject is theatrical through and through'⁶³ on both stage and in reality is also problematic, given that Freud's account of the way the mind worked was largely based on the theatre metaphor. Is this theatre theory, or a metaphorical use of theatre? Still, her point that theatre was once conceived of as a form of consolation, but now refuses the offer this consolation points to a shift in the aims and intentions of artists and productions, albeit still leaving spectators unproblematically on the receiving end. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (psychoanalysis) View of Theatre: functional
'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject' (1996)	Elaine Aston Semiotics of theatre	Theatre semiotics provides a set of 'critical tools', a 'framework and a vocabulary for identifying, classifying and analysing the 'parts' which make up the whole' of a theatrical communication 'in which a series of coded messages are sent or enacted and their meaning/s received or decoded', to realise a feminist critique of theatre, although to date it has generally been 'gender-blind'. Focusing particularly on spectators, Aston argues that 'dramatic theories of spectator response' such as those by Brecht and Boal as well as the implied theories of mainstream theatre which generally assume the 'male gaze' as universal provide 'useful ways of identifying and analysing how a spectator is expected to behave' or respond,⁶⁴ but there is little information on 'real' spectators. Actual male and female spectators appear to experience theatre differently,⁶⁵ but 'the female spectator whose reactions are theatrically 'competent' generally finds herself ... laughing in spite of herself' as she is forced to adopt 'male drag' and accept being 'coerced into producing woman as object'. Theatre practitioners should be encouraged to 'make the sign feminist'.⁶⁶ One way of doing this is to develop a framework for semiotic analysis which takes account of gender, and to use it to draw attention to the ways theatre (and presumably other forms of representation) promote gender issues. Although she is committed to an understanding of theatre 'as a communication model' in which 'stage and audience co-produce the performance text', and she admits that spectator reaction 'is particularly difficult to analyse within the formal mode of semiotic analysis' because it provides no place for the affective responses of the spectator (laughter, tears, anger, passion etc), these problems have been overcome in feminist theatre because these	A form of communication which is gendered	Signification; representation : artists 'encode' performances	Showing: gender balances/imbalances Watching: is gendered: female spectators experience theatre differently to male spectators; theatre needs to become gender-aware rather than assuming the male

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		aspects are ‘central to the performance frame’ and the implied and real spectators in feminist theatre coincide because they are both female and gender aware. Feminist theatre thus ‘revisions theatrical communication’ in ways which can be analysed semiotically and then applied to mainstream theatre to undermine the universality of the ‘male gaze’.⁶⁷ Essential to this project is to rethink the process of performance so that, for the purposes of semiotic analysis, the spectator response ‘begins’ the communication, rather than being something which occurs at the end. She provides a brief demonstration of this in selective analysis of spectator responses to the work of Sarah Daniels. She compares the Responses of male critics (negative) with female critics (positive) (based on their written reports) and also surveys the responses of young female theatre students (very positive). What we end up with is not much more than (a) the recognition of spectators and some speculation about how they may interact with the performers and (b) the recognition that there are ‘different spectatorial positions’ among women (men are generally condemned to the universal response of the male gaze, despite the presence of men at feminist theatre) and that any analysis of female spectators needs to take account of gender, class, race, sexual orientation, etc.⁶⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic); polemic – feminist theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent			gaze as universal; spectators and performers ‘co-produce’ the performance text [which suggests that performers need to become gender aware as well]
‘Feminisms and theatres: cannon fodder and cultural change’ (1996); ‘The Politics of Performativity in the Age of Replay Culture’ (2000)	Lizbeth Goodman Feminist theatre theory	‘Feminism’ is ‘a form of cultural politics. “Theatre” is ‘a general category of art or performance’. Both are political and both are performative: ‘most theatre can be analysed in terms of the representation of gender and power’. ⁶⁹ ‘Feminist Theatre’ is a genre or form of theatre’ which is informed by feminist perspectives in its choice of ‘working method, topic, form and style’ and which is situated in the public domain by virtue of its politics’. It is ideal ‘cannon fodder’ for academic study because of its base in feminist theory, because it requires ‘knowledge of performance studies and drama, as well as ‘an awareness of social history, social policy, politics, economic and media studies, because it is routinely marginalised as a genre , because it is an art form which ‘is performed and shaped primarily in public’ outside academic institutions and which ‘takes the personal very seriously, and because it is a relatively recent phenomenon, appearing firstly as street theatre or agit-prop in the late 1960s, and then as specifically feminist companies in the late 1970s and early 1980s. This theatre has as its aim ‘to re-focus society’s way of seeing and depicting women’. It ‘takes many forms’ and ‘encompasses many different	A general category of art or performance which is ephemeral and has traditionally involved the key characteristic of distance	To bring about change; affect	Doing: performance Showing: different perspectives Watching: spectators for feminist theatre are not only different but potentially more available for

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		approaches to feminism.⁷⁰ For academic study, there are ‘two major theoretical concepts of frameworks which help to situate feminist theatre alongside other areas of cultural representation and academic study’: the concept of the ‘gendered gaze’ and the role of the spectator in feminist theatre. The concept of the gaze brought to attention the way spectators appropriated representations. However, spectator and performers are in a reciprocal relationship, especially in feminist theatre, which ‘conceptualises a new audience’ with its choice of themes, settings etc – both in the sense of bringing different women to the theatre and in changing the perceptions of spectators used to ‘traditional’ theatre. In particular, feminist theatre encourages the ‘feminist spectator as critic’ as part of the process of ‘redirecting the gaze’ to allow for differences of perspective. Theatre especially allows for this world changing activity because ‘the theatre space encourages immediate reactions from the spectator and permits a level of criticism which is not deemed appropriate in most forms of social interaction’.⁷¹ [This sounds a promising endorsement for seeing politics as theatre but Goodman goes on to say]: ‘Therefore, developing theories of self in performance must consider the unique qualities of the live theatre performance’ [which suggests a focus on doing rather than watching performance. Goodman also notes that despite this promising aspect of theatre, ‘real’ spectators, as revealed in the very limited numbers of surveys, do not seem to match up with theories about spectators. A survey carried out by Goodman of 300 theatre groups which could be considered ‘feminist’, asking which groups had carried out spectator surveys, yielded just 98 candidates. These surveys added little more than demographic information: ‘groups with mostly women members attracted higher proportions of female audience members than male; the majority of feminist groups recorded ‘a positive [woman to man] ratio [as do many mainstream theatres]. Ages and backgrounds of audience members for the Black Mime Theatre Women’s Troop ‘varied enormously’, as did reasons for attending. However, feminist theatre was a genre which occupied a precarious position in the theatre, and was particularly affected by lack of funding, inaccessible venues etc. Most mainstream theatre was not prepared to take the risk of putting on feminist productions; they preferred to pander to ‘the lowest common denominator of ‘entertainment value’’ apparently demanded by ‘middle-ground, middle-class audiences’ which favoured ‘musicals and revivals’.⁷² She saw the future of feminist theatre lying in a return to street theatre, political demonstrations, unscripted performance			analysis. Spectators appropriate representations- this can be affected by their relationship with the performers, which is reciprocal

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		work and multi-media presentations, although it was also likely to be taken up as part of teaching gender courses. With regard to liveness, the possibility of replay is affecting how we see theatre. Theatre is becoming performance – but performance which is losing its sense of place, perhaps even its embeddedness. This will have a profound effect on the way we do theatre, which until now has ephemerality and distance as its two key characteristics. Now, theatre may be simultaneously recorded as well as performed, may appeal to spectators both present and absent, and may be replayed continually. This turns theatre into performance, and it also turns it into reproduced art rather than produced art. Thus theatre becomes just one of many kinds of performance. It still requires sharing with an audience for completion, as any performance does, but it does not require presentation and is no longer ephemeral. It is also more susceptible to scrutiny.⁷³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – pro-feminist theatre/analysis – influence of media on theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent

¹ Excerpt reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 505-508.

² Krasner 2008: 505

³ Phelan, Peggy. 1993. Unmarked: The Politics of Performance. New York: Routledge. 6

⁴ Phelan 2008/1997: 506-7

⁵ Read, A. 1993. The Theatre and Everyday Life. London: Routledge.1

⁶ Carlson, Marvin. 2004. Performance: A critical introduction. 2nd ed. New York and London: Routledge. 45

⁷ Bharucha, Rustom. 2000. The Politics of Cultural Practice: Thinking Through Theatre in an Age of Globalization. London: The Athlone Press.17

⁸ Bharucha 2000: 19

⁹ Bharucha, Rustom 1993, Theatre and the World: Performance and the Politics of Culture, London and New York, Routledge, 2; also cited in Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.202

¹⁰ Fortier 2002: 202

¹¹ Bharucha 1993: 4-5

¹² Fortier 2002: 203

¹³ Published in American Theatre September, 1994; quoted in Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.195.

¹⁴ Osburn, John. 1994. 'The Dramaturgy of the Tabloid: Climax and Novelty in a Theory of Condensed Forms'. Theatre Journal 46 pp. 507-522.

¹⁵ Osburn 1994: 507

-
- ¹⁶ Whitmore, Jon 1994, Directing Postmodern Theater, University of Michigan Press. 1
- ¹⁷ Whitmore 1994: 56
- ¹⁸ Whitmore 1994: 58
- ¹⁹ Published in The American Play and Other Works; reprinted in Krasner 2008: 494-499
- ²⁰ Parks 2008/1994: 499
- ²¹ Parks 2008/1994: 495
- ²² Parks 2008/1994: 497-8
- ²³ Fortier 2002: 40
- ²⁴ Tait, Peta. 1994. Converging Realities: Feminism in Australian Theatre. Sydney: Currency Press. 2
- ²⁵ Tait 1994: 95
- ²⁶ Tait, Peta, ed. 2000. Body Show/s: Australian viewings of live performance. Edited by V. Kelly. Vol. 8, Australian Playwrights. Amsterdam-Atlanta: Rodopi.
- ²⁷ Tait 1994: 2
- ²⁸ Garner 1994: 4 in Fortier 2002: 38
- ²⁹ Garner 1994: 1 in Fortier 2002: 38
- ³⁰ Tait 2000: 66
- ³¹ Fitzpatrick, Tim. 1990. 'Models of visual and auditory interaction in performances'. Gestos 5 (9) pp. 27-40.
- ³² Published in The Drama Review 38(1), pp. 143-67.
- ³³ Fusco, Coco. 2000. Corpus Delecti: Performance Art of the Americas. London: Routledge. 4
- ³⁴ Fusco 2000: 4
- ³⁵ Fusco 1994: 160
- ³⁶ Fortier 2002: 214
- ³⁷ Fusco 1994: 143
- ³⁸ Published in 25 Years of Performance Art in Australia, Paddington, Ivan Dougherty Gallery, University of New South Wales College of Fine Arts, p. 54; quoted in Schaefer 2000.
- ³⁹ Schaefer 2000: 83
- ⁴⁰ Schaefer 2000: 88
- ⁴¹ Published in Theater 26(1/2); cited in Dolan, Jill. 2001. 'Performance, Utopia, and the "Utopian Performative"'. Theatre Journal 53 (3) pp. 455-479.459.
- ⁴² Klačic 1995: 61, cited in Dolan 2001: 459
- ⁴³ Deavere Smith, Anna. 1995. 'Systems of Lights'. Theater 26 (1/2).50-51; cited in Dolan 2001: 459
- ⁴⁴ Pateman, Trevor 1995, 'Art is not a Message', www.selectworks.co.uk, accessed September 2008.
- ⁴⁵ First published 1991 in Trevor Pateman, Key Concepts: A Guide to Aesthetics, Criticism and the Arts in Education London: Falmer Press pp 110 - 113. Revised for the website in 2004; available on www.selectedworks.co.uk, accessed September 2008.
- ⁴⁶ Pateman, Trevor. c1995. 'Art is not a Message'. www.selectedworks.co.uk accessed September 2008.
- ⁴⁷ Pateman 2004

-
- ⁴⁸ Risum, Janne 1996, 'The crystal of acting', New Theatre Quarterly, Vol 12(48), 1996, pp. 340-356.340
- ⁴⁹ Lovelace, Alice. 1996. 'A Brief History of Theater Forms (from Aristotle to Brecht, Baraka, O'Neal, and Boal)'. In Motion Magazine February 15, www.inmotion.magazine.com/theater.html accessed 27/02/2007.
- ⁵⁰ Hughes, Holly. 1996. Clit Notes: A Sapphic Sampler. New York: Grove Press.15
- ⁵¹ Dolan, Jill. 2001. 'Performance, Utopia, and the "Utopian Performative"'. Theatre Journal 53 (3) pp. 455-479. 468
- ⁵² Hughes, Holly 2001, 'From "Fab!" to "Fuck!"', one segment of 'How Do You Make Social Change?' in Theater, Vol 31(3), pp. 72-74: 73-4
- ⁵³ Seymour, Anna. 1996. 'Culture and political change: British radical theatre in recent history'. Theatre Research International 21 (1) pp. 8-17.
- ⁵⁴ Seymour 1996: 16
- ⁵⁵ Salverson, Julie. 1996. 'Performing Emergency: Witnessing, Popular Theatre, and the Lie of the Literal'. Theatre Topics 6 (2) pp. 181-191.181
- ⁵⁶ Salverson 1996: 181-2
- ⁵⁷ Salverson 1996: 188n2
- ⁵⁸ Salverson 1996: 184
- ⁵⁹ Wright, Elizabeth. 1996. 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 175-199.175
- ⁶⁰ Wright 1996: 180
- ⁶¹ Wright 1996: 189
- ⁶² Wright 1996: 177
- ⁶³ Wright 1996: 189
- ⁶⁴ Aston, Elaine. 1996. 'Gender as sign-system: the feminist spectator as subject'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 56-69. 56-7
- ⁶⁵ Aston 1996: 63
- ⁶⁶ Aston 1996: 60-1
- ⁶⁷ Aston 1996: 57-9
- ⁶⁸ Aston 1996: 64
- ⁶⁹ Goodman, Lizbeth. 1996. 'Feminisms and theatres: cannon fodder and cultural change'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 19-42.19
- ⁷⁰ Goodman 1996: 19-23
- ⁷¹ Goodman 1996: 30
- ⁷² Goodman 1996: 34
- ⁷³ Goodman, Lizbeth. 2000. 'The Politics of Performativity in the Age of Replay Culture'. In The Routledge Reader in Politics and Performance, edited by L. Goodman and J. De Gay. London: Routledge, pp. 288-294.

Table 47/51: Theories of Theatre 1997-2000

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Interview with the Editor [of AS/SA]' (1997)	Jean-Pierre Sarrazac playwright, academic, semiotics	Theatre 'is a citizen's forum for politicised discourse in which society's ills are examined in the "blinding brightness" of the stage's lighting'. Sarrazac's research work is concerned with how meaning is born in the theatre. He believes, perhaps as one would expect of a theorist who is also a practitioner, that semiosis in the theatre involves a movement of sense from author and director to the spectator , not, as most semiotic analyses believe, from text to stage. However it is done, 'exposition of 'the enigma' is the purpose of theatre'. It is 'a means of asking the "question of the Other"'. ¹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre is purposeful View of Theatre: functional	A citizens' forum	To convey meaning; to ask questions	Doing: the practice of theatre
'Drama in a Dramaturgical Society' (1997)	Lizzie Eldridge Scottish academic of Drama and Theatre Arts	Theatre 'provides artistic form and coherency to a reality which, at the level of immediate experience, frequently lacks such a coherent structure ... it is the theatre, perhaps more than any other artistic medium, that provides a space in which ideas can be discussed and developed; in which the nature and possibilities of human interaction can be explored and extended; in which notions of community can be dramatized, questioned and attempted; in which the past can be reassessed and possible futures depicted and actively explored. If we live in an increasingly dramaturgical society then the theatre becomes more , not less, important. In this context, the theatre can and should provide the necessary space and forum for our development'. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as a resource View of Theatre: functional	An artistic medium; a space; a forum; a structuring activity	To structure in order to educate	Doing: dramatization Showing: showing or rehearsing how/what to act
The Explicit Body in Performance (1997) ³	Rebecca Schneider (1959- American feminist and scholar of performance studies	Schneider's work is 'concerned with feminism as a bodily performance', as represented in performers who 'speak-back' to or turn the gaze back onto the spectator in an attempt to challenge 'the explicit determination of who is viewing whom'. ⁴ She coined the phrase 'the explicit body' as a means of addressing the ways in which work which draws attention to and parodies 'historically marked' bodies, makes the social nature of these identities explicit. For example, 'the explicit body in much feminist work interrogates socio-cultural understandings of the "appropriate" and/or the appropriately transgressive – particularly who gets to mark what is (in)appropriate where, and, who has the right to appropriate what where – keeping in mind the double meaning of the word "appropriate"'. ⁵ Schneider argued that a widespread belief that 'transgression' had been tamed by capitalism had led to a reformulation of avant-garde work as ' resistance ', although she suggests that it may not have been capitalism which led to the demise of		To challenge the spectator; to reveal the body as a stage	Doing: embodied performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		transgression as the avant-garde's raison d'être but the exposure of it as a male realm by female artists picking it up: 'After all, men transgress, women resist.'. However, the idea of resistance does have 'an important political dimension'. 'Looked at in this light, the politicized postmodern art world's claim that all transgression is defunct is in itself transgressive, disallowing the "transgression" upon which right-wing agendas depend. And yet the timing of this claim is suspiciously gender-, race-, and preference-marked, coming at a moment when the terms of transgression, the agents of transgressive art, had radically shifted'. Much feminist explicit body performance art is aimed at making apparent 'the link between ways of seeing the body and ways of structuring desire according to the logic of commodity capitalism ... Like a commodity, desire is produced ... nature designed, packaged, and sold ... we see her body everywhere, selling a dream of a future real to a present posited always as a "lack"'. What makes feminist performance art transgressive under these conditions is its refusal to relinquish its 'fullness' and presence. It renders the female body 'literal', making apparent 'the ways in which bodies are stages for social theatrics' and suggesting alternatives.⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – embodiment/the gaze View of Theatre: functional
Theory/ Theatre (1997, 2002)	Mark Fortier Canadian academic of English literature	The aim of the book is to introduce theatre students to 'a broad range of theory and to examine the application of theory to theatre'. It situates theatre theory within 'cultural theory', defined as 'the attempt to understand in a systematic way the nature of human cultural forms such as language, identity and art', a field which he claims to have been in existence since Plato and Aristotle, but which only came to dominance since the 1960s.⁷ The theories of theatre that he reviews, then, are not so much theories devised by theatre practitioners, but the application of cultural theories to theatre e.g. semiotics, phenomenology, post-structuralism, psychoanalytic and gender theory, postmodern, materialist and post-colonial theory, reader-response and reception theory: 'I am specifically concerned with theories that come from outside theatre' and date from the last 150 years or so.⁸ Drama refers to the 'literary, textual aspect of theatre'.⁹ Theatre, on the other hand, 'is performance ... and entails not only words but space, actions, props, audience and the complex relations among these elements'.¹⁰ Drawing on Schechner, he defines performance 'as a concept in theatre ... is the notion of theatre in its entirety'. Drama, theatre and performance 'are related activities ... drama [is] a part of theatre and theatre [is] a part of performance in the wide sense'.¹¹ A full study of theatre	A form of performance a cultural practice	Representation through the use of language, action and spectacle	Doing: performing drama

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		must therefore engage with drama and performance as well. Theory and theatre are connected in at least four ways: theatre can be analogous or equivalent to theoretical reflection (Checkhov, Artaud, Blau); theatre enacts a theoretical position (Cixous, Churchill, Boal); theatre can be explained/elucidated through theory (Derrida, Fortier) and theatre can ‘answer back’ to theory, calling its presuppositions into question and exposing limitations and blindness.¹² Theories such as those Fortier discusses in the book ‘allow us to understand some very basic aspects of theatre’,¹³ although each theory has a different answer to questions about theatre. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (theoretical) View of Theatre: positive
Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theatre (1998)	Jeanne Colleran & Jenny S. Spencer (eds) American theorists of English	Colleran and Spencer declare that ‘...nonpolitical art is impossible’: ‘Theatre performances, like other instances of cultural production, are ... “impure acts”, simultaneously socially implicated and socially critical, an apparatus for the construction of meaning rather than an index to it’.¹⁴ They nevertheless situate political theatre as oppositional and transgressive in relation to mainstream theatre. In political theatre, whilst theatre performances, as ‘apparatuses for the construction of meaning’ are socially implicated, they are also necessarily socially critical. Consequently, they divide ‘political theatre’ into two categories – ‘agitprop plays’, which they call putting ‘politics on stage’, that is, overt acts of political critique, and ‘cultural practices that self-consciously operate at the level of interrogation, critique and intervention’. Within this latter category there is a further division into three: ‘theatre as an act of political intervention taken on behalf of a designated population and having a specific political agenda’; ‘theatre that offers itself as a public forum through plays with overtly political content’; and ‘theater whose politics are covertly or unwittingly on display, inviting an actively critical stance from its audience’. Whilst it would seem possible to consider that mainstream, state sponsored cultural productions like the Opening Ceremony of the Sydney 2000 Olympics might fit into the first of these sub-categories, it is not what the authors mean by political theatre. This is a significant shortcoming of the book, and typical of most approaches to what is generally self-described as ‘political theatre’. None of the essays in the book see the promotion of ‘consensus-preserving ideas of nationhood’ as in fact constructing consensus. Typically, ‘political theatre’ urges its spectator to a ‘continual battle with authority’¹⁵ and believes that theatre may provide ‘cognitive maps’ to help spectators to ‘grasp [their] positioning as individual and collective subjects’. Theatre is relevant to the	A space; an cultural apparatus for the construction of meaning; a public forum	Political; a form of critique; imagining alternatives; the provision of ‘cognitive maps’ by which spectators can grasp their position as individuals and as part of the collective	Doing: performance – a cultural production Showing: ‘cognitive maps’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		social sphere ‘as a forum for public debate, a gauge of national aspirations, an enactment of social critique, and a space for imagining alternatives’. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – political theatre View of Theatre: functional
‘Playing the Fault Lines: Two Political Theater Interventions in the Australian Bicentenary Year 1988’ (1998)	Tom Burvill Australian academic	This essay is a contribution to the volume mentioned immediately above, and looks at two examples of ‘political’ theatre (both of which are transgressive). ‘One of the ways political theater can work is by opening up ... issues, by speaking some of the otherwise unspoken’. ¹⁷ Thus ‘[p]olitical theater practice can ... provide spaces for the experimental construction’ of the events of history in which cultures have collided, thereby producing a ‘disconcerting of certainties’ where ‘unsettling counterimagining’ can offer ‘alternatives to ideology’s “lived imaginary relation to the real” and provide new models for understanding’. ¹⁸ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (political theatre) View of Theatre: functional	A site of experiments in new imaginaries	Offering alternatives to unsettle certainties	Doing: the practice of theatre - transgressive Showing: new models of relationships to others
‘Notes for a Radical Democratic Theater: Productive Crises and the Challenge of Indeterminacy’ (1998); ‘Performing Europe: Identity Formation for a “New” Europe’ (2001); ‘The Politics of Discourse: Performativity	Janelle Reinelt American theatre theorist	In ‘Notes’, Reinelt argues that cultural practices such as theatre ‘perform the work of social imagination’ in one of two ways: imagination ‘may function to preserve order’ or is may ‘have a disruptive function’. ¹⁹ Theatre in particular does this because it constructs ‘an aesthetic community – an imaginary republic of citizens’ in much the same way as political participation is supposed to: ‘the activity of performing and spectating is itself an aspect of community formation’. Not only this, but theatre practitioners are not simply cultural producers, but may also be ‘citizens who take seriously their role in the democratic struggle to produce a just and free society’. Rather than sideline cultural production, politics should recognize both its role and the commitments of its practitioners as citizens as well as recognize the ability of theatre to ‘allow the deliberation on matters of state’, albeit in an aesthetic mode: ‘A person is no less a theorist about democracy because he/she stages romantic musicals rather than joins a political party ... they can be considered politically active when they self-consciously seek to promote democratic ideals in their work’. Performances can also be ‘sites ... of democratic engagement’. Reinelt recognizes that not all theatre will attempt to influence society for the better, but also defends ‘mere’ entertainment for its ability to form spectators into a community: ‘live theatre enacts one of the last available forms of direct democracy ... Spectators are, at the least, an implied community for the time of performance’ even in mass entertainment. Theatre should be valued for its	A social and cultural practice; an institution; an activity of performance and spectacle; a representational art	Performing the social imagination either to preserve order (through entertainment) or to disrupt it by constructing alternatives; a form of objectification	Doing: the practices of theatre Watching: even theatre for entertainment generates aesthetic communities

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
meets 'Theatricality' (2002)		contribution to the values of the society: 'Western theater, as an institution and as a social practice, is already deeply implicated in the heritage of Western democracy. The arts occupy a space in culture associated with the "free" expression of gifted individuals, the "enhancement" of national life, the production of entertainment for leisure consumption, the public representation of ... national character. Each of these functions is linked to an implicit set of values (liberty, equality, pluralism, sovereignty, individual rights) and presumes a group of "citizens" who form a symbolic community when they gather as an audience'.²⁰ In 'Performing Europe', Reinelt argues that theatre is a representational art which can influence as well as reflect 'the course of history' through the provision of 'imaginative mimesis, transformative models, and observant critique', although its function can be 'circumscribed by institutional structures and limited audiences'.²¹ There is also the problem of elitism. Even political theatre tends to be directed towards elite spectators, which may ignore the political message of the performance, while less verbal kinds of theatre which can be performed across class/language barriers offers less opportunity for the creators to control the interpretations made by spectator members. Theatre needs 'new ways of representation that can connect with ... other popular discourses' such as sport and popular music.²² One possibility lies in connecting with postmodern conceptions of performance. Theatre can never escape representation, but performance occurs in the gap between what is expected (iteration) and 'the non-commensurability of repetition',²³ and it is in this gap that the possibility of change lies. Purpose of theorist: polemic - theatre in its widest sense View of Theatre: functional
Introduction to Theatre (1998-2006)	Eric W. Trumbull American; director of Nova Woodbridge Theatre Group; Theorist of theatre and communication studies	An audience is 'aware of itself as a group', and has artistic self-awareness. The theatre appeals to spectators using sensory stimulation and appeals to human values and by offering artistic excellence and intellectual stimulation. Tools used by theatre in order to appeal to spectators include: the illusion of reality, fantasy, flashbacks, anachronisms, symbols and metaphors. However, 'performance values must succeed' in order for communication of ideas to occur. What spectators see depends on innovation, style, historical period, level of abstraction, social class and given circumstances. Spectators can differ in their 'group self-image, sanctity of time and place ... preparation for the event, interaction with each other and with the performance' and willingness 'to use imagination and remain open'. Theatre should be studied because (1) it is a 'Humanity/Liberal Art' which 'can help us understand the world and our place in it'; it	A performing art; a social and pedagogical force; an artefact; a medium of communication	To appeal to spectators using 'tools' which stimulate the senses as well as the imagination; teaching, reflecting society to	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: a distillation of life Watching: a communal process, despite individual

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘reflects and possibly affects its society’s view of the world: its history, philosophy, religious attitudes, social structure, theoretical assumptions, its way of thinking about humanity and the world and nature’; (2) it is ‘a social force’, one which has been ‘praised and damned throughout history’; (3) it is ‘a primary means of teaching’ both in defence of society and as a means of critique (agitprop); (4) it is ‘a personal force’ for those involved in producing theatre; and (4) it is ‘an art form – an object’ which can be broken down into its elements and analysed. Theatre is ‘a distillation of life’.²⁴ Purpose of theorist: analysis (pro-theatre) View of Theatre: positive		help us understand the world and our place in it; communication	differences
Exploring the Modern (1998)	John Jervis Sociology/ Anthropology/ Cultural Studies	Theatre ‘is never only the theatre; it may or may not be a ‘mirror of life’, but it certainly has implications for the spectator who watch it, and is itself a product of a particular kind of society. The significance of the theatre is that it draws on, and influences, a form of social life that is already theatrical’. Hence there is a ‘problematic separation’ between theatre and the wider world, which ‘raises the question of whether there is necessarily a clear distinction between audiences and performers’.²⁵ Purpose of theorist: polemic – postmodernity and the theatricalization of life View of Theatre: positive	A product of society	To draw on and influence its society	Showing: aspects of social life Watching: the separation between performer and spectator is artificial and can be collapsed
‘Theatre as a site of passage: Some reflections on the magic of acting’ (1998)	Kirsten Hastrup Anthropologist/ performer	Hastrup argues that although anthropology has used theatre as a metaphor, it has generally not studied theatre as a cultural phenomenon per se. This article is a reflection on theatre and creativity. She sees theatre ‘as a moving force in the world’ and wants to ‘reintroduce theatre into general anthropology, and to investigate the power of acting’ from the perspective of the ‘player’, in order to investigate ‘the potential of theatre’ for ‘the native’ (herself as player), although she doesn’t say for what. To do this, she intends to adopt an attitude of ‘methodological philistinism’: this consist of ‘taking an attitude of resolute indifference towards the aesthetic value’ of theatre as a work of art, although she then says that she is not going to consider theatre as art but ‘theatre as life’. The only thing which makes theatre different from life is ‘condensation’: ‘Theatre is a concentrate of action, which is what makes it so (potentially) powerful’. She conflates condensation into ‘magnitude’, which she sees as having to be ‘transformed to life by the actor’ by some kind of ‘power’ which she hopes to ‘ensnare’.²⁶ Theatre is a liminal space,	An art; a liminal space; a cultural phenomenon - an object of anthropological study	To generate a vicarious experience for spectators by using the stage as a liminal space, thereby empowering them	Doing: acting Showing: a ‘third’ world or ‘parallel space’ Watching: empowerment

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		‘a site of passage, and the stage [is] a sacred space’. The actor ‘practices the site and makes a passage possible for others by way of vicarious experience’. This idea harks back to the original word for actor, hypocrites which Hastrup says ‘allegedly meant ‘answerer’ ... the original actor was the composer, who answered the chorus on stage’. Acting is a form of ‘never-ending reflexivity’ which makes actors ‘double agents’ who are nevertheless able to form ‘one centre of attention’. The doubleness seems to be an awareness of themselves as aware of themselves as character, and is not related to any particular vein of theatre, as can be seen from the comments of an actor regarding a performance of Hamlet: ‘As the scene proceeds and Hamlet becomes even more violent towards her [Ophelia], Roger [the actor playing Hamlet] clasped my face, spitting out all his (Hamlet’s) accusations against women directly at her [Ophelia], implying that women, and particularly herself, are the direct cause of his troubled mind’ (Frances Baker on playing Ophelia to Roger Rees’ Hamlet in 1984). Hastrup sees the switching between third and first person as significant and an indication of this double agency in the actor²⁷ in which the performer ‘is not Hamlet, but also ... not not Hamlet’.²⁸ In other words, the actor is able ‘to work on ‘becoming’ and ‘being’ at the same time’ such that ‘the true subject of the work of art, or its efficacy in moving people, is the artistry not the artist’, but in the case of the actor, s/he ‘works within two ... horizons: the ethos of acting and the ethos of character. The former motivates professionalism, the latter legitimates the passions of the character’. Because theatre operates at the ‘site of passage’ it offers spectators a ‘third’ world or ‘parallel space’, which may be ‘the source of unprecedented empowerment’. This ‘kind of creativity is sited in the artistry rather than in the artist ... in the mastery of the actor’s technique’. It ‘moves people’ because it redirects their ‘own enquiries’ to the ‘space between the actors and the audience’ in which they can ‘see the possible ... beyond the obvious’. ‘In the void between the two, a surplus history is created. Therein lies the magic of acting’.²⁹ Purpose of theorist: polemic – acting View of Theatre: positive; functional
‘Peter Sellars -Cultural Activism in the new Century’	Peter Sellars American Director	‘The arts are about primary experience’, about providing information and experiences which will allow us to make proper, informed judgments about our world and its problems. A performance of Hamlet can tell us ‘please don’t do this’. It is a way of finding ways of doing things, of discovering what human beings are like under particular conditions, but in which no-one really gets hurt. In this sense, theatre has ‘a cultural	One of the arts; a cultural form; a laboratory	To provide information and experiences which will	Doing: the art of theatre Showing: presentation of problems

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(1999); Interview (2004)		obligation to participate in the lives of everyone'. Sellars refuses to draw the usual distinction between professional and non-professional theatre, arguing that some of the most interesting theatre is that being done by non-professionals (such as the Los Angeles Poverty Department group which is 'a theatre of and by homeless people'). The arts were providing information and experiences which would allow us to make proper, informed judgments about our world and its problems, not how we react to something. They require vision, which takes us beyond our immediate lives. Social justice lies at the heart of artistic practice. This is what makes it great. He also rejected judgments about 'excellence' (on which contemporary funding is made): '[w]e're talking about culture, culture is cultivation, culture is you've got to cultivate everything around you because you don't know where the next excellence ... will ever come from'. Culture is 'a continuous activity', 'our laboratory, the research and development wing'. The 'task of culture' is about 'learning to live with your nightmare as opposed to learning to run from it'. That is why all the great myths are about figures who have, in fact, failed (Oedipus, Socrates, Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, Martin Luther King, Ghandi). Sellars argues that we have been through a period he calls distraction culture where we let things go by, but now we need to move into a culture of focus. This is one reason why he has turned to the directing of festivals. Festivals are a form of 'indigenous culture', which began in the need to mark an occasion, to recognize a sacrifice made for us to live, and to help us to remember the skills which were involved.³⁰ In his 2004 interview, Sellars discussed the connection between art and theology, arguing that 'one of the things that artists can do is liberate theology from doctrine'. Sellars tries to do this by staging sacred works in secular contexts 'in a theater – in a secular society'.³¹ Purpose of theorist: polemic – theatre is theology for a secular society View of Theatre: functional		allow us to make proper, informed judgments about our world and its problems; moral instruction aimed at achieving social justice;	and their possible solutions Watching: rehearsing for life; inurment - learning to live with your nightmare as opposed to learning to run from it'
'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste' (2000)	Jason Gaiger English art historian and theorist of aesthetics	Gaiger draws on both Jean Du Bos' 'democratic' theory of the 'engaged spectator' and Hume's listing of the defects which prevent or distort everyday judgment to try and find a way out of 'the paradox of taste': the recognition that judgments of taste are highly subjective is accompanied by a recognition that distinctions can be drawn between works of different quality on the basis of some objective criteria. He considers that Hume's argument as it stands lead to a vicious circle. He proposes a way out of this by redescribing Hume's five defects as attributes which anyone can acquire. Hence, we	An art form	Aesthetic	Watching: we respond to and judge a work of art spontaneously, but we bring both

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		respond to art subjectively, but we also respond to and by rules and principles which we acquire through education, exposure and experience. Although we respond spontaneously, we continually revise our responses in the light of new knowledge. Looking then is a practice which is subject to learning, and '[e]xpert and non-expert are not categorically distinct types, but are distinguished by the degree of the knowledge and experience which they bring to bear in the appreciation of art ... [and] everyone can, in principle, given sufficient practice and exposure to art, be brought to recognise those features of the work on which valid critical judgments of the work must be based'. We all have 'the potential for appreciation and understanding', but judgments need not be considered solely subjective.³² Purpose of theorist: polemic – the practice of looking View of Theatre: n/r			knowledge and experience; we revise our reactions in the light of new knowledge and experience. Looking is a practice which is subject to learning
'I, Carmelita Tropicana' (2000) ³³	Alina Troyano Latin American feminist performance artist	Troyano 'dramatizes the conditions of queerness by employing non-traditional methods, performing in drag as a way of destabilizing subjectivity in ways characteristic of postmodern performance art.'³⁴ 'I'm like a short-order cook when I make a performance art piece, quickly whipping up a piece for a specific event and audience'.³⁵ 'Everything becomes grist for the mill' under the pressure to create, especially with deadlines, lack of money etc. The work is often collaborative, and Troyano takes classes in a variety of skills, often as they are needed or become available, and works within a network of critical but supportive talent. Aim of Troyano's work: to tug 'at your heartstrings', show you to yourself and provoke thoughts of a universal kind.³⁶ Purpose of theorist: polemic – performance art View of Theatre: positive; functional	A seeing place	To dramatize one's condition in order to destabilize subjectivity; affect: 'to tug at your heart-strings'	Doing: performance art Showing: you to yourself
Modern Czech Theatre: Reflector and Conscience of a Nation (2000)	Jarka Burian Czech-American actor, theatre theorist and historian	An examination of Czech theatre against a 20th-century backdrop of social, political, and historic change. Beginning in the late 19th century, the book examines theatre practices during World War I, the post-war period, during which the country re-established its independence, World War II, the Communist era and culminates with 1989's Velvet Revolution and its aftermath. According to Burian "“plays and the staging of them were often strong responses to the condition of the country, reactions to social, political, and even military events ... Playwrights and actors were not putting on plays solely to	A cultural form	Entertainment ; the exhibition of artistry; offering ways to manage oppression;	Doing: a cultural practice Showing: the spirit of the moment Watching:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		entertain or to exhibit their artistry. They were making statements that expressed the feelings of their audiences at critical times'. During the 1920s, 'the theatre was somewhat entertainment-oriented, but with the rise of Hitler in the '30s, Czech theatre demonstrated its awareness of the political situation and its alarm at the threat of fascism. People went to the theatre not only to admire the clever humor or the great acting, but to participate in a dramatic event which captured the spirit of the moment ... The same situation existed during the subsequent Communist era ... People were not allowed to criticize the Stalinist regime openly; they had to be very clever, subtle, and indirect. This stressful era sharpened their purpose. It was a challenge to express their resentment indirectly and metaphorically'. Czech performers and playwrights also played a key role in the fall of Communism, 'organizing outdoor demonstrations and offering the theatre as a forum'. While regular theatre performances were cancelled, theatre people continued to work by 'leading discussions on the events of the day', culminating in the election of Vaclav Havel as president of the new republic.³⁷ Purpose of theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive; functional			people go to the theatre to be entertained, to admire aesthetic practice and to participate in an expression of the moment, which may help them manage oppression

¹ Sarrazac 1997, 'Interview with the Editor', AS/SA No 3 (1997.05), www.chass.utoronto.ca/french/as-sa/ASSA-No3/Vol1.No3.Sarrazac.pdf accessed December 2006.

² Eldridge, Lizzie. 1997. 'Drama in a Dramaturgical Society'. In Raymond Williams Now: Knowledge, Limits and the Future, edited by J. Wallace, R. Jones and S. Nield. Houndmills, Basingstoke; New York: Macmillan; St Martin's Press, pp. 71-88. 85-6

³ Excerpts reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing. 500-504

⁴ Krasner 2008: 500

⁵ Schneider 1997: 501-2

⁶ Schneider 1997: 502-4

⁷ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 2

⁸ Fortier 2002: 7

⁹ Fortier 2002: 226

¹⁰ Fortier 2002: 4

¹¹ Fortier 2002: 11-12

¹² Fortier 2002: 7

-
- ¹³ Fortier 2002: 18
- ¹⁴ Colleran, Jeanne, and Jenny Spencer. 1998. Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theatre. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press. 1
- ¹⁵ Colleran and Spencer 1998: 8
- ¹⁶ Colleran and Spencer 1998: 9-10
- ¹⁷ Burvill, Tom 1998, 'Playing the Fault Lines: Two Political Theater Interventions in the Australian Bicentenary Year 1988' in Colleran and Spencer 1998, 231
- ¹⁸ Burvill 1998: 244
- ¹⁹ Reinelt, Janelle. 1998. 'Notes for a Radical Democratic Theater: Productive Crises and the Challenge of Indeterminacy'. In Staging Resistance: Essays on Political Theatre, edited by J. Colleran and J. S. Spencer. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 283-299. 294
- ²⁰ Reinelt 1998: 285-290
- ²¹ Reinelt, Janelle. 2001. 'Performing Europe: Identity Formation for a "New" Europe'. Theatre Journal 53 (3) pp. 365-387. 366
- ²² Reinelt 2001: 385-386
- ²³ Reinelt, Janelle. 2002. 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 201-215. 213
- ²⁴ Trumbull, Eric W. 1998-2006. 'Introduction to Theatre--the online course'. Northern Virginia Community College <http://novaonline.nvcc.edu/eli/spd130et/SPD130-F06-theatre-theory.htm> (accessed 2/3/2007).
- ²⁵ Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell. 24-5
- ²⁶ Hastrup, Kirsten. 1998. 'Theatre as a site of passage: Some reflections on the magic of acting'. In Ritual, Performance, Media, edited by F. Hughes-Freeland. NY and London: Routledge, pp. 29-45. 29-31
- ²⁷ Hastrup 1998: 37-40
- ²⁸ Schechner in Hastrup 1998: 40
- ²⁹ Schechner in Hastrup 1998: 40-43
- ³⁰ Sellars, Peter. 1999. 'Peter Sellars - Cultural Activism in the New Century'. ABCTV August 19, 1999 www.abc.net.au/arts/sellars/text.htm.
- ³¹ Sellars, Peter. 2004. 'Interview with Peter Sellars'. The Question of God WGBH Educational Foundation, PBS, www.pbs.org/wgbh/questionofgod/voices/sellars.html accessed 2/04/2007.
- ³² Gaiger, Jason. 2000. 'The True Judge of Beauty and the Paradox of Taste'. European Journal of Philosophy 8 (1) pp. 1-19. 16
- ³³ Excerpt from I, Carmelita Tropicana: PeRforMinG Between CultuRes (Boston, Beacon Press) printed in Krasner 2008: 523-532.
- ³⁴ Krasner 2008: 523
- ³⁵ Troyano 2008/2000: 528
- ³⁶ Troyano 2008/2000: 532
- ³⁷ Olechowski, Carol 2000, 'Jarka Burian Writes Book on Modern Czech Theatre', University Update Vol 24(2), September 20, University of Albany, State University of New York; www.albany.edu/pr/updates/sep20/tablefeatures.htm, accessed 14/10/2008.

Table 48/51: Theories of Theatre 2001-2002

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Drama, Play, and Game: English Festive Culture in the Medieval Period (2001)	Lawrence Clopper	‘Drama’ now means a script for enactment by persons assuming roles. ¹ Clopper was concerned with the problem of defining what was theatre: ‘My thesis is ... that we have applied modern senses of theatrical terms to medieval texts and documents with the result that we have ‘theatricalized’ – made into theater – activities that do not properly belong in that category as we understand it’. Therefore, when ‘we see the word ‘drama’ in a medieval text ... we should think of it as a formal and visual presentation of responding voices’. ² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-anachronistic definition View of Theatre: ambivalent	An activity; a category	A formal and visual presentation of responding voices (not theatre)	Doing: drama not theatre/ theatre not drama
‘In Praise of Contradiction and Conundrum’ (2001) ³	Tony Kushner American Playwright	‘ All art of every sort changes the world ’ whether it is overtly political or not. ‘Art is not merely contemplation, it is also action, and all action changes the world, at least a little’; ⁴ although critics ‘tend to protect their readers from explicitly political work by discounting politics as a proper subject for theater’ and by insisting that a work be judged on its ‘psychological or behavioral’ depths as the sole criterion. Plays that avoid the explicitly political can be good plays, from which we can learn as well as be entertained: ‘One should strive to be capable of being entertained by learning’. ‘What really changes the world is the consequence of thinking about the world’ and theatre which encourages that ‘matters’. ‘I do not believe that a steadfast refusal to be partisan is, finally, a particularly brave or a moral or even interesting choice’. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – socially and politically committed and engaged theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form	Entertainment which also teaches; attempting to achieve social change through the encouragement of thinking using action	Doing: playwrighting Watching: we should find entertainment in learning as well as the reverse
‘The TASC Is: Theater and Social Change’ (2001)	Doug Paterson American academic and founder of the Center for the Theater of the Oppressed-Omaha	[A]ll theater affects social change. By ignoring, celebrating, analysing, damning, reinforcing, representing, misrepresenting, advocating, resisting, encouraging, or being blind and deaf to social change, all theater has an impact on the flow of social movement and interaction, collectively and personally’; ⁶ even if this interaction and effect on social change is ‘rarely a conscious one’. However, progressive theatre work ‘must be a dialogue, not a monologue. It is coercive to require a kind of change in audiences as a measure of performance success ... I am adamantly opposed to theater that wants to change people. This strikes me as (1) coercive ... (2) creating some kind of church ... or (3) a public fascist ritual ... Theater that is progressive creates performance in which	A dialogic practice	Presenting information, emotions and ideas so as to create the conditions in which change seems possible and	Doing: (should be) a dialogic practice Watching: should be a dialogue not a monologue

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		the relation between theater and social change is clearly acknowledged. More important, it is a theater in which information, emotions, and ideas are presented so as to create a condition in which if people wanted to change their ideas or emotional orientations, they could ... the objective is not to change but to invite certain kinds of change'. ⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-coercive progressive theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional		desirable; to invite change
'How Participatory Theater Can Improve Deliberative Politics' (2001)	Archon Fung Government and Public Policy	Participatory theater can not only be 'a kind of political hearing aid' because it 'disposes participants to listen and understand one another, but 'Forum and Image Theater ... are useful tools for creating a foundation from which to begin a conversation or collaboration'. ⁸ Participation in such forms of theatre encourages and gives confidence to participants so that they feel more able to participate in forms of deliberative democracy. Purpose of Theorist: polemic- social and political value of theatre View of Theatre: functional	A tool; a practice which amplifies	Creating the foundation for a conversation or collaboration through amplification	Doing: participatory theatre Watching: theatre disposes people to listen making it a rehearsal for democratic participation
'Making It Better' (2001)	John O'Neal African American playwright, actor and director; artistic director of Junebug Productions	'The creation of art and artifacts is a fundamental and essential part of human life', part of the urge to 'make it better'. All art 'represents and serves the objectives and values of its creator. Some artists try to conceal their social views in the same way the dominant culture tries to. But this seems like a terribly short-sighted posture to me', one which is likely to make a work irrelevant. It is substance not form which is important, in art as well as in arts management. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – art is purposeful View of Theatre: functional	A way of changing things	To improve things	Doing: art
'Being Present: Theater and Social Change'	Roberta Uno American director and academic; artistic director	A 'formulaic approach can never result in inspiring art'. The 'most effective theater work ... is work that deeply engages a community ... The theater is often where we can most vividly experience cultural supremacy and exclusion; paradoxically, it also truly has the potential to model the world we want to live in. For me, creating my theater emanated from a desire not to wait for a social change to happen in order to live in a better world,	A place of experience; an art; a practice	Engaging the community; to model a better world in order to	Doing: the art of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
(2001)	of New WORLD Theater	but to live in it now'. ¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – socially engaged theatre View of Theatre: functional		generate social change
'Can Theater + Young People = Social Change? The Answer Must Be Yes' (2001)	Peter Brosius American director; artistic director of Children's Theatre Company	Theatre is a tool to change lives. It does so by allowing spectators 'to engage with the world and see themselves anew': 'our audience told us that in seeing ignorance, intolerance, and cruelty ... they saw themselves [and] promised that they would reach out to someone who had been shunned in their school or neighbourhood'. 'We make theater to help our audience see that the world is knowable, malleable, and demands critical thinking. We make theater so that young people will realize that there is tremendous power in their imagination. If they embrace that power, they can change the world' ¹¹ [the assumption being that they will change it for the better!]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as a tool for change View of Theatre: functional	A tool for social change	Showing the spectator to themselves in order to encourage them to change their society	Doing: the practice of theatre; directing Showing: other possibilities
'Walking the Talk' (2001)	Caron Atlas American director	'[C]ulture and creativity can be key components of a vibrant democracy' especially when 'those who have most at stake ... are active participants in the process. But thinking of theatre as a 'tool' is reductive and utilitarian , and likely to be as harmful as beneficial. Rather, theatre has the power 'to embrace multiple meanings and to resist, reframe and reconfigure' in ways that enable us 'to imagine the world differently'. In this way, theatre 'can provide a creative opportunity for dialogue and collaboration' through its 'willingness to tell the stories that aren't heard ... and to humanize those who have been demonized'. Theatre, by 'engaging the imagination ... can transform cynicism into action, despair into hope' but to do this, 'theater needs not only to talk about social change, it needs to live it as well'. ¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-utilitarian view of theatre (reductive) View of Theatre: positive	A cultural form	To stimulate the imagination (in the cause of democracy); to provide a creative opportunity for dialogue and collaboration; to enact social change	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: a different world through the way theatre engages with the world
'Visions of Possibility' (2001)	Dorinne Kondo Asian-American Anthropologist and playwright	'Theater has the power to unleash our imaginations' by staging new 'visions' of life and identity. But '[w]e need an array of strategies ... no single tactic can work for all audiences and venues at all moments in history. 'Authenticity' can be used to offer 'minoritarian subjects ... the luxury of being "realistically" represented' for instance: 'the simple presence of different kinds of bodies onstage remains a significant intervention'. Satire, parody and 'revolutionary comedy' can be used to expose 'the dominant culture's	A seeing place; an arena for enactment	To unleash the imagination in order to find new ways to	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: representations of emergent

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		ruses of power, and non-western forms can be used ‘to interrupt Eurocentric assumptions about theatrical practice’ (although care has to be taken to avoid imperialism or orientalism). ‘For minoritarian subjects, theater and performance are key arenas where we can ... enact emergent identities, mount institutional interventions, stage utopian possibilities, and construct political subjectivities that promote political change’ and allow ‘those at the margins to breathe more easily, if only for a moment ... Theater mobilizes the electrifying powers of acting, movement, lighting, music, design, and the body to articulate ... utopian “wish-images” for progressive change. For without refiguring the possible, there can be no social transformation’.¹³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as a mobilizing force View of Theatre: functional		provide new visions of life and identity; the exposition of power; mobilization	identities and utopian possibilities
‘Heightened Listening’ (2001)	Marty Pottenger American performer and director	Theatre offers ‘the real possibility of remembering what it’s like to be human’ because of its liveness. ‘In live performance, the risk and the reward are shared by all’. This ‘present-mindedness’ means that we all listen to each other. Theatre is a form of ‘heightened listening’: ‘we awaken as human beings in live performance, as actors and as audience, and when it’s working, we wait, as if for our first kiss, for what will happen next ... with the pricked ears of a hunter, we listen not only to what is happening onstage but to everyone present, listening even to their listening’.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – liveness View of Theatre: positive; functional	A performative activity	To create ‘present-mindedness’	Doing: performance Watching: a form of awakened listening
‘Out of the Box’ (2001)	Tim Miller American gay performer	Live performance creates a ‘group dynamic’, which allows theatre to become ‘a site for liberation stories and a sweaty laboratory in which to model possible strategies for empowerment’. Theatre has the power ‘to get an alarm bell ringing’.¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – liveness View of Theatre: functional	A site for story-telling; a laboratory	Experimenting- setting alarm bells ringing; generating a ‘group dynamic’	Doing: live performance
Fortier’s argument that under postmodernism, theatre has become increasingly marginalized seems to be borne out by the desire implicit in these theorists to argue for the relevance of theatre, nevertheless: ‘Looking through the index of Stuart Sim’s Critical Dictionary of Postmodern Thought (1998), one is struck by how few entries there are for anyone involved in theatre ... The theatre practitioner with the most references is, in a way that is both strange and familiar, Shakespeare’.¹⁶ While theatre has clearly become marginalized by 2002, performance has become ‘a primary postmodern mode’.¹⁷
‘The Structure of Theater: A	Mitsuya Mori Japanese theatre	Mori has a ‘triangular’ conception of theatre, similar to Meyerhold’s, which he uses to explicate ‘the semiotics’ of theatre. ¹⁸ Theatre has some basic structural characteristics	A place in which a	Play: to show actors at play	Doing: the art of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Japanese View of Theatricality' (2002)	director and academic; semiotician	which differentiate it as theater from 'other performing activities'. Mori's article is aimed at clarifying these in order to clarify theatricality which he says in Japanese is understood to mean 'the spectacular quality of theater, or the qualities unique to theater i.e. particular qualities that construct the kind of performance we could call theater'.¹⁹ The pejorative sense of theatricality used in the west has no Japanese equivalent. The theatre is 'play', a performing art, an 'art form of double productions. Its general structure is: Dramatist → Drama → Drama Reader ↓ Actor → Theater performance → Spectator . The arrows all go one-way (unlike Zeami's conception of theatre, described by Sata).²⁰ The break , signified in Mori as a step down, indicates that 'a theater performance onstage is quite different from a drama on paper , and what the spectator conceives is not at all the same as what the dramatist had in mind ... because a theater production is a combination of two different aspects: drama and play. Unlike in music, 'the diagram of theater structure cannot be shortened. The structure entails 'Actor plays Character for Audience',²¹ which Mori represents as an inverted triangle, with Actor and Character as the top two points and the Audience as the bottom point. 'In this way the whole theatrical event could be viewed, if not in its completeness, at least adequately enough'.²² Mori says some contemporary theatre challenges this formula, trying to omit at least one element [usually character], but 'no one has proposed more than these three as the primary agents composing a theatrical event'. 'Drama is not something Actor presents to Audience, but something formed between Audience and Character' through the Actor's 'playing' (suggesting that Drama here means something different to drama as the written play). The relationship between Actor and Audience is what 'transforms a physical place, where they simultaneously exist, into a theatrical space'.²³ Mori takes exception to Brook's reference to the 'empty space'. Empty space 'does not exist in this world. In both an open-air theater and a proscenium-arch theater, many things have been in existence before the man crosses over the space ... it is the man's crossing it that makes the place into the "empty space" for the one who watches' because the man's action brings about a change of focus which 'makes every pre-existing thing' unrelated to his action 'invisible	form of play involving performance takes place; a performing art	as characters; the development of a relationship with spectators through performance	Showing: characters are shown to the spectator Watching: a reception of the actors' 'play' – the end point of the one-way process

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		to the audience. The audience ceases to see the field or the architectural decorations of the space they are sharing with the actor and sees only the ‘theatrical space’ of the actor. It is the relationship between the actor and audience which creates the theatrical space. Performance (such as of rituals) which do not acknowledge this relationship are ‘cinematic’ rather than theatrical, and consist of a Player-Spectator relationship in which the performer ‘performs for him/herself, while the one who watches is reduced to a ‘mere bystander’. This distinction between audience and spectator (mere bystander) is based on the quality of the relationship between performer and watcher, and it is the performer who reduces watchers to mere bystanders by ignoring them. Here is the crucial distinction, then, between what constitutes theatre as opposed to what constitutes merely spectacular behaviour: acknowledgement of the audience as an audience to whom the performer is showing something (else). Mori suggests that the term or element he has named ‘Character’ can stand for that nameless presence which brings people into relationship with the performer. It need not be a ‘character’ in the Aristotelian sense of the word: ‘character is not a person but a conception that the audience conceives in the course of the performance’ as they also create the plot in their minds: ‘Character and plot are not separate elements but one and the same thing’. Both are what we end up with at the end of the play (although neither exists at the end of the play). This phenomenon is often lost or misunderstood because we do not remember that what we are watching is an actor ‘playing’ at being a character, rather than a character per se. ‘Audience builds up Character, which is identical to Plot’. The ‘identification of Character and Plot forms Drama’ – Drama as ‘an expression of a view of life [not ‘the drama the playwright writes’] ... Drama emerges from Plot and yet is a larger world than Plot ... Drama must be formed in theater – that is, from actual actions on the stage’.²⁴ Characters are not the same as Roles. Roles are ‘recognized in appearances and patterns or movements and behaviors’. They are like the stock roles in commedia dell’arte. Role is ‘an outer feature’ and Character is an ‘inner quality’. Role is ‘a physical appearance and Character is a conceptual idea’. Together (in life as well as on stage) they ‘give us the complete person’. One can play a Role without knowing the plot. Roles are perceived from the beginning, but when Role is the dominant factor, Plot tends to be fragmented because the important thing is the Role, not the story. Mori argues that his triangle actually has two ‘faces’ or planes (a) Player – Role – Spectator (reality plane) and (b) Actor – Character – Audience

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		(fictional plane). ‘Any theatrical performance must have both structural triangles together in order to be theatrical:  $\begin{array}{ccc} \text{Actor/Player} & \text{-----} & \text{Character/ Role} \\ & \backslash & / \\ & \text{Audience/Spectator} & \end{array}$  The (a) plane focuses on the points of the triangle (a triadic relationship); the (b) plane focuses on the lines between the points (tri-linear relationship). Theatre which is theatrical, which exhibits theatricality, is a combination of (a) and (b) overlaid. Theatre which is not theatrical but only spectacular is mostly (a) but to the extent that it is recognized as stylized we will recognize it as being theatrical. Theatre which is cinematic (i.e. entirely fictional in that the actors do not have a relationship with the audience) is mostly (b) – and loses the frisson of the overlap which occurs in performance. Where there is only Player and Spectator but no Role, we have sport or music; where we have Character and Audience but no Actor, we have a novel or narrative. The dropping of any element in either triangle will change the outcome so that the performance is not theatrical. ‘Being aware of the double triangle schemes of theater structure, we may be able to clear away confusions that sometimes occur in theater performance. When the Actor element is supposed to be emphasized, it may, in fact, be the Player aspect that comes forth because of the lack of Character. Or, when the Actor attempts to emphasize Plot, the emphasis may actually be on Role, not on Character at all’. Both Japanese and western experimental theatre confuse these relationships. Both ‘step out of the fictional plane (b), however Japanese experimental work maintains the triangular structure because it maintains the relationship with the audience/spectator while western experimental performances lose the triangular structure and therefore the relationship with the audience because it focuses on the performer. However, to the extent that they do share an overlap between fiction and reality, they can be considered theatrical, or to exhibit theatricality. Theatricality means ‘being theater-like’, a quality which is best expressed by the Japanese term geinoh which covers ‘the broader or narrower realm of performance arts, depending on the context. Theatricality ‘emerges when the (a) triangle breaks into, and yet does not destroy, the (b)’ and ‘the feeling of a larger world’ emerges. When we recognize theatricality in something, we are recognizing fictionality – although this fictionality might only extend to style (i.e. stylized behaviour or presentation) i.e. it needs

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		at least a hint of (b) to be theatrical. This is why some rituals strike us as theatrical, and why western experimental performances are problematic. They are geinoh – theatre-like, but not theatrical. There are two fundamental differences between western and Japanese theatre: (1) western drama is primarily the enactment of an action, which looks forward to the future. Noh drama is the enactment of a feeling, which evokes both past and present without distinction; and (2) while western theatre frequently ignores and even disparages its audience (and to this extent ceases to be theatrical or geinoh), even when Japanese theatre appears to ignore the audience (e.g. as in some Noh drama) the purpose of the drama is ‘the satisfaction of the audience... what ‘Zeami called “making hana (flower) bloom”’.²⁵ Even the most vulgar of spectators can be encouraged to ‘bloom’ and it is part of the art of the actor to accomplish this.²⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive
‘Audience activating techniques and their educational efficacy’ (2002)	Edyta Lorek-Jezinska Polish theatre researcher	Examines audience activating techniques in performance with the aim of testing the relationship between participation and audience education in such types of spectator involvement as ‘invisible theatre, community and creative participatory projects, and bartering, all of them exploring the liminal or rather the liminoid sphere between life and theatre’ as undertaken by a Polish theatre company, Akademia Ruchu (The Academy of Movement). ‘Environmental and invisible theatres require active spectators who contribute to and participate in activities located in the liminal sphere between life and art’.²⁷ The company uses various audience activating techniques in order to stimulate responses to different situations, in the process training spectators in active participation. These are analysed using Victor Turner’s concept of liminoid optation,²⁸ and Geertz’ notions of deep and shallow play. Lorek-Jezinska’s project shows ‘that a simple invitation to co-create a theatrical project is often insufficient. Under certain circumstances invisible theatre or bartering might prove effective as ice-breakers or provocations, although they limit authentic optation considerably. The limitations of invisible theatre based on deception make it unsuitable for a long-term cooperation with a community. Likewise, as bartering involves to some extent some kind of payment for the audience’s participation, it is mostly effective on single occasions’.²⁹ However, ‘both invisible theatre and bartering managed either to engage non-artists in creative activities or make passers-by aware of certain aspects of living in a non-democratic country during an economic crisis’, although the long-term effects of this awareness are unknown.	A technical practice; a creative activity	Activating spectators to participate	Doing: performance Watching: participation is activated by techniques used by performers

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis (technical) View of Theatre: functional
Metatheatre: Theory and Method (2002); 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor' (2003)	David Boje, John Luhman and Ann Cunliffe Organization Studies	The 2003 collaborative article draws up a contrast between 'premodern/modern' theatre and 'postmodern' theatre (of which Boal is considered the main exponent). Premodern/modern theatre has unified characters, storylines, involve a search for meaning, have a resolution and a narrative coherence which is reductive. 'Postmodern' theatre, on the other hand, features character fragments, resists closure, is resistant to meaning, offers no resolution, acts as a form of protest, is complex and heterogeneous, and offers a multiplicity of voices, meanings and stories. In particular, postmodern theatre aims to 'seduce' the spectator into becoming a 'spect-actor' – a participant in the drama. This is meant to be emancipatory. Postmodern theatre draws on the parody, laughter and participatory characteristics of carnival. ³⁰ According to Boje, 'the modern theatre has taken the postmodern turn: it is now Metatheatre'. Metatheatrics is made up of seven elements (septet): frames, themes, dialogs, characters, rhythms, plots and spectacles. ³¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: ambivalent	An historically contingent practice	Differs according to period: premodern/modern theatre is pacifying; postmodern theatre is activating, participatory and emancipatory	Doing: the practice of theatre
'Witnessing Woyzeck: Theatricality and the Empowerment of the Spectator' (2002)	Freddie Rokem Semiotics of theatre	The defining characteristic of theatre is 'the fact that it takes place in presence of spectators ... a live audience'. ³² Sometimes these include 'spectators' on the stage. Rokem calls this a form of witnessing (which he considers to be 'accidental' as opposed to the 'watching or eavesdropping' which are 'intentional'. He uses this distinction to examine the notion of witnessing as a device used in performance , which is easily isolated for semiotic analysis (thus overcoming one of the problems of semiotic analysis). He believes this device, by foregrounding the theatricality of the performance, 'invites' the viewer to become an 'active' spectator because it simultaneously focuses as well as divides the spectator's attention. There are three main forms of this device: (a) the play-within-a-play (b) the eavesdropper and (c) the metaphysical or omniscient externalised witness e.g. the ghost in Hamlet . Most complex plays involve all three. The first emphasises the aesthetic dimension of witnessing and invites the real spectator to respond accordingly. The second emphasises the psychological aspects of witnessing and the third emphasises the metaphysical aspects of viewing. Rokem proceeds to analyse three different productions of the same scene from Woyzeck . He argues that positioning witnesses to the event portrayed on the stage draws our attention to the 'inherent dependence [of the theatre] on watching' and establishes a mode of watching . He	A place for looking; an artistic form involving spectators	Setting up witnessing positions as focusing devices to encourage or seduce self-reflexivity in spectators	Watching: watching someone watching turns passive viewers into active spectators ; it establishes a mode of watching

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		believes this ‘empowers’ the spectator in some way by inviting or even seducing them into self-reflexivity.³³ [What it does do is divide the attention of the spectator so that they both experience the scene directly (if inattentively) and view it as mediated through the externalised ‘liminal’ watcher who is pretending to be neither one nor the other]. The article also demonstrates that at heart semiotics is little more than literary analysis applied to visual texts and suffers from the same subjectivity. It is a long way from saying that ‘all theater performances contain some form of direct or implicit witnessing, or transformations of witnessing’³⁴ to this fact being capable of transforming the so-called passive viewer (assumed rather than argued by Rokem) into an active spectator, especially if witnessing, which Rokem says is ‘accidental’³⁵ is ‘an expression of our ocularcentric culture, where vision as a source of knowledge has been privileged, drawing attention to the original meaning of the word theater as a place for looking’.³⁶ If witnessing has always been the case, then how can it account for changes in the mode of watching? The superficiality of Rokem’s analysis of witnessing is in stark contrast to the deep concern of writers such as Hesford and Salverson over the ethical implications of witnessing in relation to representations of victim testimonials or documentation.³⁷ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (semiotic) View of Theatre: functional

¹ Clopper, Lawrence. 2001. Drama, Play, and Game: English Festival Culture in the Medieval Period. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Cited in Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press. 181n93

² Clopper 2001: 9 cited in Egginton 2003: 181n93

³ This article, and the following ten are published under ‘How Do You Make Social Change?’, Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, pp. 62-93.

⁴ Kushner, Tony. 2001. ‘How Do You Make Social Change? In Praise of Contradiction and Conundrum’. Theater 31 (3) pp. 62-63.

⁵ Kushner 2001: 63-4

⁶ Paterson, Doug. 2001. ‘How Do You Make Social Change? The TASC Is: Theater and Social Change’. Theater 31 (3) pp. 66-68.65

⁷ Paterson 2001: 63. 66

⁸ Fong, Archon 2001, ‘How Participatory Theater Can Improve Deliberative Politics’, ‘How Do You Make Social Change?’, Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, 68

⁹ O’Neal, John 2001, ‘Making it Better’, ‘How Do You Make Social Change?’, Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, 69-71

¹⁰ Uno, Roberta 2001, ‘Being Present: Theater and Social Change’, ‘How Do You Make Social Change?’, Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, 72

-
- ¹¹ Brosius, Peter 2001, 'Can Theater + Young People = Social Change? The Answer Must be Yes', 'How Do You Make Social Change?', Theater Vol 31(3), 2001,75
- ¹² Atlas, Caron 2001, 'Walking the Talk', 'How Do You Make Social Change?', Theater Vol 31(3), 2001,76-7
- ¹³ Kondo, Dorinne 2001, 'Visions of Possibility', 'How Do You Make Social Change?', Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, 77-8
- ¹⁴ Pottenger, Marty. 2001. 'How Do You Make Social Change?' Theater 31 (3) pp. 62-93.
- ¹⁵ Miller, Tim 2001, 'Out of the Box', 'How Do You Make Social Change?', Theater Vol 31(3), 2001, 89-90
- ¹⁶ Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge.189
- ¹⁷ Kaye, Nick 1994, Postmodernism and Performance, Basingstoke, Macmillan, p. 23.
- ¹⁸ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.539
- ¹⁹ Mori, Mitsuya. 2002. 'The Structure of Theater: A Japanese View of Theatricality'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2&3) pp. 73-93. 73
- ²⁰ Sata, Megumi. 1989. 'Aristotle's Poetics and Zeami's Teachings on Style and the Flower'. Asian Theatre Journal 6 (1) pp. 47-56.
- ²¹ Mori 2002: 75-6
- ²² Mori 2002: 75
- ²³ Mori 2002: 77
- ²⁴ Mori 2002: 79-84
- ²⁵ Mori 2002: 87-9
- ²⁶ Sata 1989
- ²⁷ Lorek-Jezinska, Edyta 2002. 'Audience activating techniques and their educational efficacy'. Applied Theatre Research 3 (4 Article 6) www.gu.edu.au/centre/cpci/atr/journal/number4_article6.htm.
- ²⁸ Optation involves 'a genuine ability and right to make choices about the creative process and its outcome'. It can adopt various forms, 'ranging from creative choices in most environmental and community projects to the choice of perspective in street performance' but is 'always inscribed in the structure of the event itself' (Lorek-Jezinska 2002).
- ²⁹ Lorek-Jezinska 2002
- ³⁰ Boje, David M., John T. Luhman, and Ann L. Cunliffe. 2003. 'A Dialectic Perspective on the Organization Theatre Metaphor'. American Communication Journal 6 (2).
- ³¹ Boje, David M. 2002. 'Metatheatre: Theory and Method'. In Enron is Metatheatre: <http://cbae.nmsu.edu/~dboje/enron/metatheatre.htm> 24th July 2005.
- ³² Rokem, Freddie. 2002. 'Witnessing Woyzeck: Theatricality and the Empowerment of the Spectator'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2&3) pp. 167-183.167
- ³³ Rokem 2002: 171
- ³⁴ Rokem 2002: 180
- ³⁵ Rokem 2002: 168
- ³⁶ Rokem 2002: 182
- ³⁷ Hesford, Wendy. 2004. 'Documenting Violations: Rhetorical Witnessing and the Spectacle of Distant Suffering'. Biography 27 (1) pp. 104-142, Salverson, Julie. 1996. 'Performing Emergency: Witnessing, Popular Theatre, and the Lie of the Literal'. Theatre Topics 6 (2) pp. 181-191.

Table 49/51: Theories of Theatre 2003-2004

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Most wanted: antidote to an hour of awfulness' (2003)	Jill Sykes Australian theatre critic	'Democracy works perfectly only for some of the people at any one time': giving 'the people' (at least the 632 who responded to a survey) what they want does not necessarily produce watchable theatre. It is up to practitioners to at least demonstrate that their 'superior knowledge' is valuable, in this case in a 'serious choreographic demonstration' of why unpopular elements of dance might be worth considering. ¹ [Sykes does not take issue with the fact that the whole program is, in any case, engineered by the Chunky Move company and that the joke does in fact rebound on it]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-‘democratic’ art View of Theatre: ambivalent	An art	Demonstrating expertise (giving the spectator 'what they want' does not produce art (or even watchable theatre))	Doing: the practice of theatre
'Why Performance? Why Now? Textuality and the Rearticulation of Human Presence' (2003)	Julia Walker American academic, English Studies	On theatre's stage, 'we are presented with the ontological reality of an actor's body and asked to understand that body in terms of both fictional and social realms of meaning ... this oscillation between identities is a structural part of all theatre, even that which utilizes a Realist aesthetic ... Where the theatre derives its power to thrill ... is in its ability to shift its audience between fictional and social frames, simultaneously placing the actor inside and outside one or the other discursive field'. ² Theatre therefore offers a theory of agency which overcomes Judith Butler's limitations because it entails the shifting between inside and outside – performance as a metaphor does not do this but actual performance does. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – performance not performativity View of Theatre: positive	A conventional activity involving two levels of reality	To shift spectators between fictional and social realms of meaning simultaneously	Doing: performance Watching: conventional: involves the understanding that both fiction and reality are present Simultaneously
How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality, and the Question of	William Egginton Historian	A (modern) actor does not "resemble" his or her character; his or her character is an effect of the actor on the spectator members, on their imaginations. Actors are seen as taking part in the production of an imaginary reality that coexists or momentarily replaces social reality. There is a separation between the internal situation of performance and the external one of reception. The aim of a modern theatricality is to keep the spectator asking "What happens next?" rather than "What does it mean?" ³ This encourages the spectator to project itself into the world of the performance, even to 'run ahead' of the performance in its desire to know what will happen next. ⁴ There are two current	An historical phenomenon involving performance	To create an effect on the spectator through performance	Doing: acting – different styles in different cultures Watching: the spectator projects

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Modernity (2003)		techniques of acting, both aimed at making a character or situation appear viable, and both underpinned by a notion of theatricality . This notion is what marks the radical change between C15th and C17th theatre, manifested in a changed experience of character and a changed experience of imaginary space. The Method technique of acting (USA) relies on the dissolution of the self and its replacement with the self or persona of the character i.e. the collapse of the distance between actor and character; the Craft technique of acting (UK) relies on the maintenance of the distance between actor and character so that one's 'tools' or technique can help construct the character. ⁵ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive			themselves into the world of a performance; spectators 'run ahead'
The Audience and the Playwright (2003)	Mayo Simon American playwright	Spectators have a role to play. This role is constructed by the playwright. If he does his job well, spectators get to play detective, make commitments to characters, anticipate what will and/or should happen, fear or hope for those consequences, expect certain things and either get them or be satisfied with the playwright's substitutions. In this way, a spectator is created by the playwright during the course of the play, from the disparate and eclectic spectators who turn up for the show. The playwright can do this because of certain shared capacities (memory, anticipation, the desire to understand) as well as shared beliefs and customs. 'There is something special about a theatre ... Live performers up there, live audiences down there'. ⁶ Theatre 'put[s] you in a privileged place, give[s] you a unique role, and keep[s] you and the playwright locked in a creative embrace'. ⁷ [The implication is that Simon does not consider 'pieces' in which '[a]ctors mingle with audiences, attacking them, cursing them, making love to them ... treating them like members of an Italian wedding party' as theatre unless they involve this privileged position and unique role]. Theatre is not about reality, it is about what is believable. ⁸ Theatre (unlike cinema or television) liberates the imagination of the spectator. ⁹ A play is 'meant to be seen. Some plays deserve study, but almost any play will reveal holes if examined too closely'. ¹⁰ What theatre does is give the spectator 'a chance to see clearly. Theatre clarifies life' ¹¹ in a way which is not necessarily real, but is believable: 'theatre clarifies the world by placing people in a moving architecture that gives you [the spectator] the consolation (if not the proof) that life has design. But by adding the clarity of design, the playwright may be falsifying life in the very act of presenting it'. ¹² Theatre also creates an audience from disparate individuals, something 'all playwrights everywhere have had to deal with ... – how to keep [the spectator] in	A craft; a seeing place	The ordering and clarification of life in a believable way; the construction of a relationship with spectators which incorporates a role for them to play, thereby constructing them as 'an audience'; consolation; teaching ways to see through the	Doing: playwrighting (a craft) Showing: a clarified view of life Watching: spectators come with a desire to understand, to see differently, which requires them to be detectives and fill the privileged 'role' constructed for them by the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		their seats – which they have all solved the same way, by giving the audience a powerful role'.¹³ The spectator's role in the theatre is 'to become a good detective' using their 'privileged position' and the 'special knowledge' which comes from that position (usually given by the playwright) 'to question, to evaluate, and to anticipate'.¹⁴ The spectator's 'job': to be a good detective; to care about the innocent and vulnerable; to divide everyone into two worlds (which will inevitably collide); to choose a side; to be moved by the urgency, the threats, the hopes; to be ahead sometimes, behind sometimes but 'always in motion', anticipating; to be surprised; to see the new commitments and the tests of new and old commitments; to see the strokes and counter-strokes; to feel the power of the turn-around scene when illusion gives way to reality and the play changes course and finds its 'fate track'; to experience the deep impact of one life on another, as someone moves between worlds with consequences for many; to demand certain things from the stage; to feel powerful, godlike in understanding, and very wise; to leave with questions and a feeling that the world seems 'strange and off-centre, and even dangerous'.¹⁵ All of this happens if the playwright gets it right. Nevertheless, theatre 'is a great teacher, but not about issues or stagecraft' but about ways to see: 'the truth is, books are much better venues for raising questions about complicated matters' because the playwright steers the spectator 'into quick insights, quick judgments, and finally quick wisdom' which leaves the spectator with 'a slow aftertaste of doubts, uncertainties, questions'.¹⁶ People go to the theatre for any number of reasons: a girls' night out, a way to spend an evening in a foreign town, because you were given a ticket. Playwrights can construct an audience from an eclectic group because, as well as a variety of shared capacities (e.g. memory, anticipation), beliefs and customs, more than anything else, what spectators bring to the theatre is the desire to understand – what is going on, what drives the characters, why things happen the way they do. Consequently, they pay attention to the clues the playwright leaves for them (the way a hand indicates something, the significance of a prop etc). It is the playwright's job to leave enough clues for the spectator, because only the playwright knows more than the spectator. 'The strength of the audience's desire to understand can be measure by the playwright's use of the tactic of withholding. No matter how disparate they are, because of this desire to understand, the playwright can 'construct' an audience by constructing a role for it to play. This is not an easy task, but 'when the playwright gets it right' the spectator plays its part 'eagerly		use of common beliefs	playwright. This enables the play as well as constructs disparate spectators as an audience for the time of the play

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		and with great pleasure'.¹⁷ Everyone coming to the theatre brings with them 'the same human material': memory, anticipation, hopes, fears, beliefs and the desire to understand.¹⁸ The playwright's first task is to 'create memory' – to tell the spectator enough so that they will recognize when things start to go wrong: 'playwright instructs and entertains at the same time ... All playwrights – ancient, modern, serious and trivial – use memory, anticipation, and hopes and fears to help the audience play its part'. 'Memory is built into us. Anticipation we learn. Hopes and fears spring from our common beliefs about life. Most of us believe that life is precious [and] temporary ... Without these beliefs, there's not much in the way of drama'. The common beliefs on which a playwright builds are: 1. there are natural ties between humans that bind (family, friendships, ethnicity, nationality, teacher/student, God/man etc. - all but family vary over time/culture). 2. a belief in happiness (so that tragedy can be recognized); 3. a belief in success; 4. a belief in consequences; 5. a belief that one life can affect another deeply; 6. a belief in justice; 7. a belief in our ability to make commonsense judgments; 8. a belief in motivation: 'certain urges motivate people to action: sex, money, power, revenge, the urge to do good/evil'. 'These common beliefs are the foundations of most plays' but they are all driven by one thing: '[t]he desire of the audience ... to understand'.¹⁹ However, 'what works on a stage doesn't work (or doesn't work the same way) anywhere else'.²⁰ 'Part of the playwright's job is to make complicated things seem easy'.²¹ 'In the theatre every word, every gesture, every sound counts, because all the irrelevant words, gestures, and sounds are left out'²² in the effort to highlight 'precious moments' – moments which are rare in life because of the busy, unstructured nature of life: 'It's for moments of exquisite understanding ... that you go to the theatre', and to see something change. Change almost always happens because '[a]lmost every play contains two stories, one inner and one outer'²³ which come into collision in some way (Oedipus the king versus Oedipus the truth-seeker). Playwrighting is hard and full of failures, but 'there is something magical about getting an audience to respond – to laugh when you want them to laugh, cry when you want them to cry, imagine when you want them to imagine, even think when you want them to think. That never happens in real life. And I love it'.²⁴ Playwrights are not called wrights for nothing. Wrights 'shape hard material to fit designs [or] structures ... One can be a great playwright without being a good writer ... No matter how brilliant a writer is, if he/she cannot build a proper structure, he/she is

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		not a playwright'. A play is a structure; essentially 'a play is a structure in time' [although it also has a spatial dimension]. A play 'is a structure in time' meant to be grasped in one continuous viewing, no turning back, and no instant replay' ... 'ordinary people do it every night',²⁵ even though 'there is not a lot of time to think in the theatre' and 'quick judgments' have to be made,²⁶ usually helped by the playwright providing 'strong, clear contrasts'. Simon's book offers a number of strategies to be used by playwrights to keep spectators riveted: key scenes, 'turn-around' scenes, tests for characters, reversals of anticipated directions etc. 'The crucial writing issue 'is how to make the two stories [in every play – the inner and outer stories] meet in a test [which forces the character to make a choice]. This is the hardest part of structuring a play and can be 'torture' for the playwright [as well as the spectator if it isn't done well]. 'A play, taken as a whole, may be seen as an exercise in misdirection, as it moves from illusion to reality, from innocence to knowledge'.²⁷ Allowing the spectator 'godlike powers' makes it 'an active player rather than a passive observer' – it detects, anticipates, hopes for, desires, fears for ... and finally sees what the characters 'get'.²⁸ What finally satisfies the spectator is recognizing that 'it was just a play'.²⁹ Theatre does different things in different times, but at the heart of theatre, what is always there, is the relationship between the spectator and the playwright (or creator), a relationship in which the spectator is placed in a privileged ("seeing") position and then 'danced' through their role as privileged viewers – teased, cajoled, but finally given what they want – a resolution of some kind that rings true – i.e. it is plausible. If an audience turns off and 'slips out' of its dance, it is generally the fault of the playwright, not the spectator, which comes to the theatre with the desire to understand. There will always be some who understand quicker than others (for a variety of reasons) but unless some understanding is reached by all the audience, the playwright has failed. Basically we go to the theatre to enjoy our 'role' during the playing of which we end up observing change, and therefore changing (perhaps only momentarily) in some way. We go to the theatre to see differently. Purpose of Theorist: polemic –essential relationship between creator and spectator (expressed as 'role') View of Theatre: positive; functional
'Performing miracles' (2003)	Jody Enders Historian	'At the very least, theatre lights the way for those who seek enlightenment about how human beings judge the evidence before their eyes'.³⁰	A seeing place	Placing before the eyes	Doing: the practice of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive; functional			Watching: spectator judge what they see
‘Eyes wide open to rough and tumble’ (2003)	Jean-Frederic Messier Canadian director (interviewed by arts journalist Lyn Gardner)	Messier’s approach to theatre is spatial, reflecting that of Gertrude Stein and Robert Wilson: ‘Mostly when I am directing theatre, I think of it as sculpting time. But music does that by itself. So many decisions have already been made before you get into the rehearsal room. The distance between two lines is already fixed by the score, whereas in theatre you can all stand around for hours deciding how long a pause is going to be ... Finding a common language with a designer is critical. Sometimes on a production, it takes six weeks to find out that when you say ‘green’ to a designer they see red.’ ³¹ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (directing) View of Theatre: positive	A multi-faceted artistic activity	Sculpting time	Doing: directing
‘The Limits of Theory: Academic versus Professional Understanding of Theatre Problems’ (2003)	Julian Meyrick Australian Director	There has been a ‘radical move to theory’ in theatre since 1970s. Meyrick argues that these sophisticated ‘theoretical’ approaches to the theatre too often preclude or traduce the thinking of artists themselves, presenting practical concerns as epiphenomenal or untutored’. In failing to allow ‘for the ‘thick’ nature of theatre practice, they disempower practitioners in favour of theoretical ‘grand-standing’. ³² At the same time, theory is moving further and further away from any meaningful connection with theatre, especially as it has become more ‘performative’ itself: ‘Prior to the late 1970s, theatre theory meant theories of theatre and the leaders of the field were its ‘star’ practitioners. Since then theatre theory has largely come to mean theories about theatre, those publishing in this areas being mainly academics or practitioners with recognized academic personae [producing] a torrent of words – words of theories about theatre – a torrent that is at once a compensation, a critique, and a revenge’ against modernist theatre and theory as well as an effort to construct a ‘broad spectrum’ notion of culture in which life is seen as theatrical. Meyrick calls this ‘a familiar set of spectacles with the lenses reversed’. This is not an innocent act: ‘When the academy scrutinizes theatre, one industry instructs another’ . Theatre theory ‘is not a tool but a machine’ for constructing and criticizing theatre practice. ³³ Meyrick identifies six traits in academic theorising about the theatre: (1) the (over)use of technical terms (a form of gate-keeping); (2) the elision of metaphor and concept , which creates instability and makes it increasing difficult to see what is meant by a particular term, since it can mean anything to which it is applied; (3) the use	A cultural practice; an ‘industry’ involving skill; a profession	Representation through performance using skill	Doing: the profession of theatre

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		of word play, especially alliteration and paradox i.e. a ‘discursive strategy of suggestion rather than statement: writing as performance to be appreciated for its virtuosity rather than its truth-value which leads to a form of reasoning more apparent than real (the confusion of logic with reason); (4) eclecticism: any theory is grist to the mill (5) the autonomic escalation of claims in the drive for originality (6) the reification of academic discourse to the point where ‘there is no such thing as the real world; it is a text, subject to misreading’ (Lehmann in Meyrick). Meyrick blames these traits on two major problems: (1) the ubiquity of linguistic analysis, which makes it too easy to move from a world involved in systems of symbolic representation to an entirely symbolic world [in which] it is no longer important that theory be truthful in a scientific sense’.³⁴ The problem is particularly rife in performance theory, where a ‘wooden tongue is replaced by a wagging one’. (2) industrial: the pressure to publish under conditions of competition, leading to the production of ‘prose by the yard’ and many books saying the same thing. To overcome these problems, he suggests that theorists ‘might attend more directly to what artists themselves say about their own work’ rather than just throw theory around, to choose their examples with care and to take account of professional interactions within theatre: theatre is a ‘thick’ practice. Neither cultures nor academics produce theatre, ‘theatre practitioners do’. ‘There is a difference between a theoretical view of theatre, however elaborate, and a view which sees in the art form only the rehearsal of tensions primarily located elsewhere. The first treats theatre as a problem, the second as a surface’. Neither includes ‘artists’ lives’ in the cultural formula, although there ‘is no theatre without practitioners’. The academy ‘must focus on theatre as a professional whole, not just a bundle of culturally specific aesthetics ... no whole means nothing to be part of’.³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theoretical views of theatre which take no account of it as a practice View of Theatre: positive
Living Theatre: a History (2004) ³⁶	Edwin Wilson & Alvin Goldfarb Theatre Studies	Argues that three key issues have engaged theatre theorists from at least the Renaissance if not before: the nature of criticism (descriptive or prescriptive), the nature of drama (an art which exists for its own sake, or for didactic purposes) and the form of drama (must it have a recognizable form and conform to certain conventions to be considered theatre).³⁷ The book also discusses the debate over popular entertainment: whether or not it is theatre, whether or not it is worthy of theoretical attention, and argues that a history or	A cultural practice which is historically contingent	To reflect society at the time (ways of doing this change over time)	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: the political and social stresses

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		theory of theatre which does not take into account popular forms of entertainment does not provide an adequate account of theatre.³⁸ Nor does an account which ignores the often substantial contributions by women and minorities. Implicit (and sometimes explicit) in this account of theatre through history is the belief that theatre reflects the society in which it is embedded, although there is often a time lag between new ideas appear and theatre takes them up. For instance, ‘world wide upheavals have been reflected in modern theatre, which has been fragmented by numerous movements and trends’.³⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb see a significant difference in theatre after 1875. They describe the period from 1875 as distinctly modern, and consider Einstein’s relativity theory as a key to subsequent developments, for it epitomises the shift from a belief in the absolute and fixed to an acknowledgment of the relativity of all knowledge, a ‘radical transformation’ in western society which was reflected in the theatre.⁴⁰ This modern era was ushered in by realism, but soon gave birth to a variety of counter or anti-realist movements. The two trends have continued in an uneasy relationship throughout the modern period. Purpose of Theorist: analysis (historical) View of Theatre: positive; functional			of the time Watching: different historical periods and different styles of theatre have different kinds of spectators
The Essential Theatre (2004)	Oscar Brockett and Robert Ball Theatre Studies	Theatre has qualities which make it special and unlike other dramatic media: it has lifelikeness, it is ephemeral, it is ‘the most objective of the arts because ... it presents both outer and inner experience through speech and action ... [it is] objective in its presentation [but] demands a subjective response’; theatre is also like life because of its complexity of means, and because of its immediacy: theatre is ‘psychologically the most immediate of all arts ... the essence of theatre lies in the simultaneous presence of live actors and spectators in the same room’.⁴¹ Theatre also has several important attributes: it is a ‘three-dimensional’ experience, it involves an interactive relationship between performers and spectators and it requires and must stimulate the spectator’s imagination. As a form of art, theatre has the capacity improve the quality of our lives by bringing us pleasure, sharpening our perceptions and increasing our sensitivity to others and to our surroundings. Thus theatre is a ‘humanizing force’. It is also valuable as a form of cultural expression which tells us about the nature of its society. Like all arts, theatre is ‘a primary way of knowing the world and understanding oneself’.⁴² Spectators are essential to the theatre. ‘All types of theatrical performance require an audience because it is in the mind and imagination of the spectator that the final step in the creative	A form of art; a dramatic medium for the expression of culture in an interactive form which requires collaboration	Presentation in speech and action; the primary challenge (and skill) is to shape the performance to stimulate the spectators and arouse a desired response; to bring pleasure; to humanize; to	Doing: the practice of theatre Showing: only one interpretation is shown, but spectators may construct many different ones Watching: spectators are essential to the theatre; spectators

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		process occurs'. However, as '[t]here is no guarantee that a spectator's interpretation will accord with the playwright's or director's' or any other interpretation, the primary challenge for playwright, director and performers is to shape the theatrical medium to arouse the desired spectator response.⁴³ If done successfully, the spectators 'experience [the play] directly and immediately ... as they would events from real life'. They do this through 'watching and listening'.⁴⁴ Spectators vary across time and according to venue and type of performance. They behave according to conventions and can be trained in a variety of ways. However, most theatre spectators fall into one main group: educated middle-class. This raises ongoing questions for theatre with regard to financial support as well as programming.⁴⁵ Watching a performance requires a willingness to pay attention and a willingness to concentrate because theatre is both an immediate and a collaborative exercise, which is why most theatrical productions 'prepare' the spectator in a variety of ways: creating a sense of occasion, ushering them to their seats, offering programs, providing advance information and sometimes education. Spectators judge what they see, although the more effective the performance, the longer they suspend that judgment. If they have acquired a language by which to articulate their judgment, they will offer analysis. All spectators are in a sense 'critics', but the term is usually used to refer to those who have acquired a critical language and who disseminate their judgments. All critics have a responsibility to be open about the criteria they use for judging a performance, and be willing to reassess these criteria.⁴⁶ 'The essence of theatre lies in the interaction of performers and audience assembled in the same place at the same time'.⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: Analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional		teach	absorb a play as they do events in real life - through watching and listening, however to fully collaborate, spectators must have a willingness to participate ; they can be trained
Theatricality as Medium (2004)	Samuel Weber Theorist	In this book, Weber wants to advance a new theory of theatre 'in which the distinctively scenic medium [subordinated by Aristotle] is no longer merely a means to an end, but, rather, is the spatio-temporal condition of ... "the exposing of the present"' which also, simultaneously 'contributes to the definition of [its] audience' because it generates "groupings", generally by interests.⁴⁸ He draws on Walter Benjamin in particular to argue that theatre disrupts, and the medium for this disruption is theatricality by which he basically means all the staging mechanism which go into putting on a production, including spectacle, the element Aristotle downgraded in his attempts to defend theatre against Plato. The disruptive power of theatricality is not limited to theatre; it also	A place in which events take place; a locale	The management of disruption through staging techniques so as to maintain the spectator's	Doing: creating an event through performance Watching: spectator interaction changes according to

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		operates in the electronic media as well, although the way spectators interact changes from an interaction with the content of the performance to an interaction with the surrounds of the performance. Essential to this conception of theatre is that theatre is ‘a place ... in which events take place’⁴⁹ ... ‘a theater is a locale whose status as determined space depends upon external intervention, and thus upon a relation of forces that can never be “contained” within the place in question’. This is what is made clear by military uses of the term theatre. However, in military usage, not only is this intervention external but it also ‘must be undertaken from a relatively detached and secure position’. [There is no reason, though, why the same condition should not be seen to apply to theatrical uses of theatre – but Weber dismisses this idea because he collapses the place for seeing action into the place of action i.e. he confuses spectators and stage]. In military usage, a theatre is ‘secured’ in order for events to be seen; in aesthetic and representational genres of theatre, the place is taken as given, and the focus is on the process of placing, framing, situating.⁵⁰ Weber still sees theatre as essentially ‘here and now’, This creates a problem for him when he wants to argue for theatricality as a medium which also applies to electronic media – he does not resolve this dilemma, instead he draws on Debord to articulate how television spectators are ‘separated’ from themselves and from what they are watching.⁵¹ He sees himself as ‘political’ as a theorist, arguing that the idea of theory not being political enough is based on a [false] dichotomy between ‘thinking’ and ‘acting’, and the privileging of action by politics. It is also political to attempt to change the established ‘codes of articulation’⁵² because this kind of analysis tackles efforts to control meaning – ‘which is itself political’.⁵³ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theory as political action. View of Theatre: positive		interest or presence.	the kind of performance they are interested in.
Thoughts about Acting (2004)	Fiona Shaw British Actress	‘Literature ... is humanity’s dialogue with itself and an actor is the interpreter of the text of the writer, who is tapping the soul of who we all are. The best one does is to give it expression – the key being one’s own grief that reveals a very dark pool of basic grief that everybody has. In the end ... that dark pool is a very similar pool to everybody else’s pool’.⁵⁴ Purpose of Theorist: analysis (performance) View of Theatre: positive		To give expression through performance (acting as interpreting)	Doing: acting
‘Ritual Theatre (Theatre of	Heisnam Kanhailal (1941-	Kanhailal’s group has been working for 35 years ‘to create a theatre idiom based on physical rather than psychological language, driven by instinct and intuition, and exploring the specific powers of theatre in the context of Manipuri indigenous culture’. ⁵⁶	A space of performance	The generation of social rapport	Doing: performance as ritual

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Transition) ⁵⁵ (2004)	Indian performer; founder of the research theatre group Kalakshetra Manipur	The theatre ‘focuses on the experiential: understanding [by whom?] is approached not through the intellect but through the evocation of empathy in the performance. The company’s works attempt to ‘engage and overcome the racial biases and attitudes that exist in Manipuri’ through ‘nuanced physicality’. Both Kanhailal and his wife are highly acclaimed performers in India. Influenced by ‘heretics’ from both western and eastern theatre [the usual suspects: Stanislavski, Meyerhold, Craig, Copeau, Artaud, Brecht, Grotowski as well as Badal Sircar and Habib Tanvir], Kanhailal’s group aims to breath ‘new values into the empty shell of theatre’ by shattering ‘the ways of seeing and doing theatre’ through continually being ‘in transition’. This ‘culture’ of transition ‘creates for us an environment of continual exercises in learning the unknown in search of new possibilities’. Consequently, the finished product is not valued but what the process promises. ‘We cleaned the stage as an empty space where we began to unfold the autonomy of theatre ... accomplished by the bare body of the performer’, in order ‘to elicit the essence’ of their traditions. The performer is the spectator: ‘we grasp’ this essence ‘as the performer and ourselves as spectators’ [the revenge of the performer, indeed!!] in a way which recalls ‘The “ritual” spirit – the origin of our theatre’ [the current theatre simply ‘exhibits the mechanical “appearance” of attention without the slightest understanding of the inner action which makes any outer verity alive and credible’ [unlike Kalakshetra]. ‘Our theatre is an extremely localized theatre committed to identity, nationalism, difference, of finding an original outlet to channel the silent feelings and instinct of the oppressed ... Our theatre is therefore “new, edgy, shrill” and “does not appeal” to both traditional-revivalists, and sophisticated modern and westernized minds ... They do not want to see that the senses and ideas they have chosen and fallen for in their life style are deeply disturbed’. ‘We are antagonistic to the sophistication and vices of the great art because of the oppressive implications and cult atmosphere inherent in it’ which is dehumanizing and commodifying. The body is ‘the human resource of the performer who is supreme in the performance’. ‘In the sensorial environment of the body, what the performer does is to internalize the most intricate of details of the external world and absorb that information which, in turn, inspires the most intriguing forms of expression’. We ‘continue our “doing” in order to breathe a new life into the work as generated by love and cooperation in the core of family environment’. ⁵⁷ It is a form of ‘theatre sociology’ [with absolutely no thought of the spectator other than		(for the performers) in order to find an original outlet to channel the silent feelings and instinct of the oppressed (also performers)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		to disparage those who do not like their theatre; this is more like an alternative lifestyle than theatre]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as ritualised participation View of Theatre: positive
‘A laugh a line as Blair facts have audiences falling about’ (Interview) (2004) ⁵⁸	Nicolas Kent Director of the Tricycle Theatre, North London	(Interviewed by Peter Fray for The Sydney Morning Herald). Kent ‘pioneered’ what Fray calls ‘the hottest trend’: tribunal plays: ‘theatre wholly based on verbatim speech, often the proceedings of inquiries, court cases or direct interview’. ⁵⁹ According to Kent, ‘people are fed up with sound bites and very quick little bits of news items and want to go into issues in depth ... The news is riddled with speculation rather than actual facts, and I think people are interested in facts. They want to know about things... They are prepared to spend some time in the theatre, listening to something, wrestling with an argument, in communion with other people, celebrating that argument, celebrating their anger, their disbelief and also their sadness at some of the things that have happened’. ⁶⁰ In these kinds of plays (also written by David Hare) ‘the line between fact and fiction becomes irrelevant’ ⁶¹ – rather it is the sense of immediate history which appeals. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – tribunal plays View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place; an art form	Satisfying the needs of the particular spectator	Doing: playwrighting , directing Watching: modern spectators want to know ‘facts’ and are prepared to listen to arguments in communion with others
‘Introducing the Theatrical Event’ (2004)	William (Willmar) Sauter Theatre theorist and academic, Professor of Theatre Studies, Stockholm University	The book which Sauter introduces picks up on the idea of the ‘theatrical event’ as theorised by David Cole (1975) and used by French experimental dramatist Armand Gatti during the 1960s in his participatory work with the underprivileged. It is thus specifically concerned with what makes a piece of theatre an event, and the relationship it has with its spectators. This is a different angle on the event to that taken by semioticians of theatre such as Pavis. For them, the event provides a discrete moment (a single performance) which can be analysed, independently of its position within a season, or cultural or social context. The theatrical event as defined by Sauter then is part of a ‘playing’ culture rather than a ‘written’ culture, and predates the Greeks. ⁶² All events here take place within a social and political context and cannot be divorced from that context. Theatre of all kinds ‘always and everywhere takes place in the form of events ... past and present performances did and do exist as events during a certain time in a certain place.’ The event is established when ‘two partners engage in a playful relationship’ within a social and political context which recognizes the proceedings as different from the everyday: ‘someone [is] doing something ostentatiously enough to be distinguished from everyday	A culturally and socially embedded practice of play	Play	Watching: spectators can be analysed according to the multiple levels of context involved in a performance before spectators.

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		life'. ⁶³ There are four layers to any theatrical event: a playing culture, a cultural context (modes of presentation), a contextual theatricality (conventions), and theatrical playing (levels/kinds of communication). Each can be analysed. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional
'Introduction to Part 2' (2004)	Peter Eversmann Theatre theorist and academic	A theatrical event is made up of three elements: actor, character, and audience (as in Mori) but Eversmann places 'playing' in the centre of a triangular relationship, with the playing occurring between actor and character, between character and spectator and between actor and spectator. Playing is 'a kind of glue that holds the three elements ... together'. ⁶⁴ Spectators are 'playing' too – they 'play along' with what happens on stage, even as the actor 'plays' with or on the audience. As well, 'theatre-going in itself is a kind of social play with well-defined roles and behavioural norms'. Consequently both performers and spectators are 'doing things' to contribute to the event – 'playing it into existence'. ⁶⁵ The event paradigm thus allows for a better understanding of what goes on during a performance than other ways of looking at theatre. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional	A culturally and socially embedded practice of play	Play with the aim of generating an event	Doing: play Showing: characters Watching: playing with both actors and characters
'From Audience Research to the Study of Theatrical Events: A shift in Focus' (2004)	Henri Schoenmakers & John Tulloch Theorists and academics	Prior to the concept of the theatrical event, spectators were only studied marginally by theatre theorists. Generally they were described indirectly: 'theatre scholars and theatre makers ... acted as spokesmen for those unknown people. These have suggested what audiences should have seen in the theatre and which performances audiences should interpret as good, bad, joyful or meaningful'. ⁶⁶ The three alternative methods of studying audiences from outside theatre theory: sociological, psychological and social-psychological each has their disciplinary limitations. Sauter's 4-layer model of the theatrical event allows these limitations to be identified, allowing a better understanding of spectators. 'An essential aspect of the theatrical event is the gathering of live human beings, theatre makers and audiences, in more or less the same time and space', but each bring with them cultural expectations and understandings. ⁶⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional	A culturally and socially embedded practice of play	Play	Watching: spectators as well as theatre-makers are culturally embedded
'Rethinking Audience Participation: Audiences in Alternative	Anthony Jackson & Shulamith Lev-Aladgem Theorists and	Audience participation changes the nature of the theatrical event because it 'changes the nature of dramatic action and exploits the social, political and therapeutic potential of the event'. ⁶⁸ It thus enlarges the theatrical event, making it a mixture of the dramatic and the social. The aims of participatory theatre exponents such as Beck and Malina, Boal and Schechner were to 'democratize the theatre and put the audience for the first time on the	A culturally and socially embedded practice	Play – which walks a fine line between distress and security for	Doing: participatory theatre Showing: often

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
and Educational Theatre' (2004)	academics	same level of the actors' and the encourage spectators towards political activism. Participation also was to 'reinforce the new performative approach to theatre' – seen as 'a convergence of the aesthetic with the societal, the anthropological with the theatrical'. It also had a pedagogic aim: 'to promote an engagement with issues which would lead spectators to think anew about issues and their world'. However, things did not work out as planned. Audiences became confused about what was expected from them as the line between fiction and reality became blurred and either withdrew or thoroughly embraced the idea of participation. Spectators made mistakes about what to expect. Either they expected too much and were disappointed, they did not react as expected and disappointed the performers, or they became antagonistic, or antagonised performers: 'spectators who took the event's actions and messages too seriously irritated many of the performers, who found out that there was a big gap between the way they represented themselves and who they really were [theatre persons]. Unable to cope with audience desires, it was not long before 'most of the performers had had it with participation'.⁶⁹ One of the safeguards that hold the theatre frame in place is what Bateson (1955) identified as the 'meta-communicative message: 'this is play''. By taking the theatrical for real life, the unique experience which theatre offers gets lost as actions become consequential: 'The theatrical event is theatre only because it is framed as theatre'.⁷⁰ According to Scheff (1979), breaking down the distance between spectators and performers can produce pain for spectators because they become aware of how the performer 'tortures' himself in order to produce a performance. Too much distress is overwhelming for spectators. This proved to be the problem for participatory theatre: spectators either could not handle it and went quiet or stayed away, or could not handle it and tried to intervene as if what was happening was real. Recognizing the theatrical event still requires an understanding that the event is theatre. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: conventional		spectators	misunderstood by spectators Watching: could be distressing

¹ Sykes, Jill 2003, 'Most wanted: antidote to an hour of awfulness', The Sydney Morning Herald. 28 April, p. 13

² Walker, Julia A. 2003. 'Why Performance? Why Now? Textuality and the Rearticulation of Human Presence'. The Yale Journal of Criticism 16 (1) pp. 149-175. 167-8

³ Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press. 51

⁴ Egginton 2003: 51

-
- ⁵ Egginton 2003: 61-8
- ⁶ Simon, Mayo. 2003. The Audience and the Playwright: How to get the most out of live theatre. New York: Applause Theatre and Cinema Books.25
- ⁷ Simon 2003: 213
- ⁸ Simon 2003: 26
- ⁹ Simon 2003: 31
- ¹⁰ Simon 2003: 53
- ¹¹ Simon 2003: 23
- ¹² Simon 2003: 211
- ¹³ Simon 2003: 24
- ¹⁴ Simon 2003: 45
- ¹⁵ Simon 2003: 208-210
- ¹⁶ Simon 2003: 210
- ¹⁷ Simon 2003: 21-23
- ¹⁸ Simon 2003: 16
- ¹⁹ Simon 2003: 21-22
- ²⁰ Simon 2003: 26
- ²¹ Simon 2003: 63
- ²² Simon 2003: 75
- ²³ Simon 2003: 80-1
- ²⁴ Simon 2003: 85
- ²⁵ Simon 2003: 80, 89
- ²⁶ Simon 2003: 108
- ²⁷ Simon 2003: 129
- ²⁸ Simon 2003: 145-6
- ²⁹ Simon 2003: 213
- ³⁰ Enders, Jody. 2003. 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 40-64.45
- ³¹ Messier, interviewed by Gardner, Lyn 2003, 'Eyes wide open to rough and tumble', 'Metropolitan', The Sydney Morning Herald Friday 18 July, 2003, p. 12
- ³² Meyrick, Julian. 2003. 'The Limits of Theory: Academic versus Professional Understanding of Theatre Problems'. New Theatre Quarterly (NTQ) 19 (3) 230-242.230-1
- ³³ Meyrick 2003: 232-6
- ³⁴ Meyrick 2003: 237
- ³⁵ Meyrick 2003: 238-240
- ³⁶ Originally published in 1983, the 2004 edition has added a number of significant features, including the recognition of the important contributions to theatre by women and minority playwrights, actors and directors. The edition also contains a number of text boxes in which contemporary theoretical issues are discussed.

-
- ³⁷ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill.179-180.
- ³⁸ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 258
- ³⁹ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 399
- ⁴⁰ Wilson and Goldfarb 2004: 401
- ⁴¹ Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth.14-15
- ⁴² Brockett and Ball 2004: 16-17
- ⁴³ Brockett and Ball 2004: 16
- ⁴⁴ Brockett and Ball 2004: 21
- ⁴⁵ Brockett and Ball 2004: 25
- ⁴⁶ Brockett and Ball 2004: 32-3
- ⁴⁷ Brockett and Ball 2004: 283
- ⁴⁸ Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.103, 118-9
- ⁴⁹ Weber 2004: 97-8
- ⁵⁰ Weber 2004: 314-5
- ⁵¹ Weber 2004: 330-331
- ⁵² Weber 2004: 355
- ⁵³ Weber 2004: 359
- ⁵⁴ Fiona Shaw, quoted in 'Actors' Thoughts about Acting', in Brockett and Ball 2004: 346.
- ⁵⁵ Published in Theatre India: National School of Drama's Theatre India, Vol 10(Nov), 2004, pp. 3-16; reprinted in Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.550-554.
- ⁵⁶ Krasner 2008: 549
- ⁵⁷ Kanhailal 2008/2004: 549-554
- ⁵⁸ Fray, Peter 2004, in The Sydney Morning Herald 4th October 2004, p. 10.
- ⁵⁹ Fray 2004: 10
- ⁶⁰ Kent in Fray 2004: 10
- ⁶¹ Fray 2004: 10
- ⁶² Sauter, Willmar 2004, 'Introducing the Theatrical Event', in Cremona, Vicki Ann, Eversmann, Peter, van Maanen, Hans, Sauter, Willmar and Tulloch, John 2004, Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames, London, Amsterdam, International Federation for Theatre Research, pp. 1-14.4
- ⁶³ Sauter 2004: 11
- ⁶⁴ Eversmann, Peter 2004, 'Introduction to Part 2', Cremona, Vicki Ann, Eversmann, Peter, van Maanen, Hans, Sauter, Willmar and Tulloch, John 2004, Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames, London, Amsterdam, International Federation for Theatre Research, 133-138.133
- ⁶⁵ Eversmann 2004: 134

⁶⁶ Schoenmakers, Henri and Tulloch, John 2004, 'From Audience Research to the Study of Theatrical Events: A shift in Focus' in Cremona, Vicki Ann, Eversmann, Peter, van Maanen, Hans, Sauter, Willmar and Tulloch, John 2004, Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames, London, Amsterdam, International Federation for Theatre Research, p 15

⁶⁷ Schoenmaker and Tulloch 2004: 15

⁶⁸ Jackson, Anthony and Lev-Aladgem, Shulamith 2004, 'Rethinking Audience Participation: Audiences in Alternative and Educational Theatre' in Cremona, Vicki Ann, Eversmann, Peter, van Maanen, Hans, Sauter, Willmar and Tulloch, John 2004, Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames, London, Amsterdam, International Federation for Theatre Research, pp. 212-4, 212.

⁶⁹ Schechner, Richard. 1994. Environmental Theater: An Expanded New Edition including "Six Axioms for Environmental Theater". New York, London: Applause.44; cited in Jackson and Lev-Aladgem 2004: 213

⁷⁰ Schechner 1983: 207 in Jackson and Lev-Aladgem 2004: 213

Table 50/51 Theories of Theatre 2005-2006(a)

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
The Viewpoints Book (2005)	Anne Bogart (1951- American theatre director	Bogart has a theoretical approach to directing which she calls viewpoints , adapted from a dance and performance training technique developed by choreographer and performer Mary Overlie. The viewpoints approach is a deconstructive technique of actor training based around improvisation which combines elements of dance and stage movement with the concepts of time and space. The viewpoints approach mixes many different acting techniques, and considers each element is as significant as another. ¹ Initially the technique was composed of six elements on which performers, directors and teachers were to concentrate: space, time, shape, movement, story and emotion. Bogart has created further subdivisions for time (four separate segments) and for space (five subsections) but has eliminated emotion and story because these tend to dominate the thinking of most actors. Actors are invited to work outside of the narrative mindset assumed in most acting training. ² Bogart insists that her work is ‘rooted in history’, and sees the script as a ‘play within a play’. The question she poses of each production is ‘What metaphor can we find that relates to the play and also relates to the spectator?’ ³ Her work, especially her reworking of familiar plays, produces conflicting responses. According to critic Mel Gussow: [d]epending on the point of view, [Bogart] is either an innovator or a provocateur assaulting a script’. ⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive	A practice	Relating to the spectator	Doing: production and direction of performance
Interview with John Tusa (2005); ⁵ Obedience, Struggle and Revolt (2005)	David Hare English playwright	Theatre matters because drama illuminates society and politics . People will always go to the theatre although there are sometimes ideological moves against it (e.g. Thatcherite England). Most theatre is not serious (‘comedies and musicals and thrillers and old tat and rubbish that there’s always been’), but theatre should address social or political questions . ‘Thinking’ people come to serious theatre ‘to look at their own society’. Plays ‘show up the difference between the way we act and the way we speak’. This leads spectators to begin to make moral judgments, firstly about the characters in the play, then about themselves and finally about human beings in general. Spectators want to know what the purpose of the evening is, or they become restless. Some playwrights (Wilde, Beckett) can successfully insist that there is no purpose, but generally spectators require a purpose even if it is entertainment. Creative writing is not at the command of the will. It is at the command of the imagination. The playwright has to have an attitude towards	A place people go to to see drama	To illuminate the world; to give the audience a purpose	Doing: playwrighting Showing: the difference between what we say and what we do Watching: spectators require a purpose for the evening

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		his material. ⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – purposeful theatre View of Theatre: ambivalent; functional
Interview with John Tusa (2005)	Deborah Warner English director Founder of Kick Theatre (1980)	Directing is about the ‘enabling of actors’ in order to bring new experiences for spectators. It is also about ‘taste’, or aesthetics. Theatre ‘needs to be larger than life, or I see no point in its existence’. Theatre is a living thing and ‘has to live and breathe and grow up like any living form’. Theatre is a reciprocal process between actors and spectator, which only becomes apparent in performance. Spectators apply the emotions generated by the performance to their own lives. This creates a ‘collective consciousness’ which ‘starts to filter and bleed through into the performance’. It is not up to the director ‘to decide what something means’. Spectators ‘get frustrated if they are told too much or where the meaning lies ... audiences long for the freedom of meaning not to be ... hijacked or kidnapped, but to be provided by themselves’. For this reason, theatre has to work hard not to slide back into conventional forms. It ‘has to be different every time we visit it’. Spectators should feel excitement when they come into a theatre or performance space: ‘we forever have to make it anew’. Theatre ‘can be life-saving ... it can promote health. [It] is one of the most accessible of the art forms and ... has the power to change lives, but ... it also has the power to put people off its form forever’, generally by restricting their access through unaffordability or notions of prestige. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as an accessible force for good View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place where theatre as an artistic form is enacted through performance	Enabling a piece of theatre to grow through enabling the actors; to promote health	Doing: directing Showing: larger than life Watching: a reciprocal process: spectators apply the emotions generated by the performance to their own lives. This creates a ‘collective consciousness’ which ‘starts to filter and bleed through into the performance’
Interview with John Tusa (2005)	Simon McBurney English actor, founder of	Theatre is about ‘making something’ using the ‘muscle of the imagination’. The root of the life of the theatre is being involved with life itself. The body is the principal vehicle of theatrical expression, although acting involves ‘an imaginative leap into being someone else’. Making theatre is a collaborative process . ‘Theatre artists are essentially	An eclectic and collaborative art based on	Making something through the use of	Doing: making something – a collaborative

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
	Théâtre de Complicité	sort of charlatans and thieves ... I steal from here and I steal from there ... I think you can take anything and turn it into theatre ... the question is whether this piece of theatre is truly addressing something which is important, whether the meaning is really coming across ... whether when it ... gets up there it will do what you dream it ... can do'. All theatre is physical. 'Theatre is an act and an action ... at the centre of any piece there is an action, a physical action'. The theatre was [and still should be] something which was for everybody. Television has liberated theatre because 'it carries the majority of drama' freeing theatre up to do anything, including experimenting with theatrical forms and spaces: 'we are in a fantastic period of interrelationship between different art forms'. ⁸ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – contemporary theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	physical action	imagination expressed in performance; to address something important	process
Interview with John Tusa (2005)	Peter Hall (1930- English theatre and film director, founder Royal Shakespeare Company)	The arts enrich life. They develop the 'human spirit': 'it is a foolish, stupid government ... who doesn't realise that the arts feed into everything'. The arts are not elitist in terms of social class, but in terms of excellence. The arts 'are elitist, because they're the best, because they're extraordinary ... we owe it to ourselves to actually regard our culture as something extremely precious ... art is universal and eternal and needs protecting and needs disseminating. Culture is central'. ⁹ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as an art form View of Theatre: positive; functional	A cultural art form	Enriching the human spirit	Doing: directing
Interview with John Tusa (2005)	Robert Lepage Canadian director and playwright	Theatre is about storytelling, 'but most people don't come to the theatre for that... they come to the theatre to be seen, to find some kind of personal goal that has nothing to do with communicating or telling a story'. But theatre doesn't exist 'if there is not a ... community or a collective around it ... Theatre is all about people meeting ... Theatre does not exist if there's not a meeting ... theatre only exists if there's an audience ... a collectivity of actors and artists meeting another collectivity.... The real work [of playwrighting] starts on opening night ... when the audience comes in and there's a dialogue between actors, writers and the audience ... things are written with the audience ... it [is] an ephemeral thing' and the critics and the spectator 'take pleasure in seeing how the work evolves and how their personal input actually has an impact'. Unfortunately, 'we're in a world where artists and raconteurs believe that the ... audience is not intelligent ... not cultivated, but the audience is intelligent' but just as the spectator	A meeting place for communication	Story-telling	Doing: playwrighting ; directing – creating a dialogue with a 'collective' of spectators Showing: a story Watching: meeting and having a

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		comes to the theatre for many reasons, so they also look at different things: ‘the actors’ performances, dropping the ball, passing the ball ... that’s also part of the evening’. Spectators now have ‘a different narrative education ... they’re being told stories through rock videos and commercials ... people know what a jump cut is, what a flash forward is, they know what a completely discursive montage can be ... you have to embrace all of these ... otherwise you start the play and the audience [is] at the end of the play before you are’. And theatre is not just about text: ‘unfortunately because the literary people are the only people who really kept traces of theatre was, so they think they own theatre’. They are wrong.¹⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as practice rather than literature; relationship with spectators essential View of Theatre: positive			dialogue with the actors and writer; spectators are intelligent but may have a different agenda to the performers, and look at different things
Interview with John Tusa (2005)	Tom Stoppard English playwright	Theatre is a pragmatic art form ... adjustable at every point. There’s ... no point where theatre gets frozen unless you walk away from it’. Theatre involves a ‘reciprocal action between the writer and the director and the actors and the designer and the audience [which] ultimately is continuous’. Actors bring humanity to a play. Art is essential [otherwise] society becomes almost meaningless ... Art is ... a template ... a matrix of some kind for our morality, it’s always there as politics’ conscience’.¹¹ (Despite Stoppard’s indication that he sees theatre as a way of making things meaningful Fortier considers Stoppard’s work ‘elegant but trifling’, a sophisticated toying with postmodern themes but with no real critical edge).¹² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre – an essential art View of Theatre: positive; functional	A pragmatic art form	A continuous reciprocal process of meaning construction	Doing: playwrighting
Artistic Ways of Knowing: Expanded Opportunities for Teaching and Learning: New Directions for Adult and	Steven Noble Canadian community theatre practitioner	Popular theatre is ‘performances created by the people, for the people, with the people, about existential issues they face’ carried out ‘within informal environments, away from elitist control and censure’.¹³ Noble’s book documents a community theatre project carried out with a group of people with mental illness, based on the work of Boal, Grotowski, Barba and Filewood, with the aim of encouraging them to find ways to overcome their ‘unvisibility’ to ‘normal’ people who stigmatized them and therefore did not really ‘see’ them. His definition of ‘popular theater’ still leaves invisible the kind of theatre usually designated as popular because it appeals to mass spectators.	An environment for performance - a showing place	To make visible	Doing: popular or community theatre (performance)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Continuing Education (2005)		Purpose of Theorist: polemic – community theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional
“The Greatest Show on Earth”: Political Spectacle, Spectacular Politics, and the American Pacific’ (2005)	Margaret Werry Theatre Studies	Theatre as an art form acts globally as ‘a machine of circulation’ of symbolic experiences. This is most apparent in political spectacles which use theatre techniques to produce symbolic representations precisely for this circulation. The entertainment industry ‘is a particularly privileged site’ for the exercise of the social imagination: ‘Show business ... is both a powerful imag(in)ing technology and a system of circulation’. ¹⁴ This makes theatre production not reflective but contiguous with other political, economic, or social processes. This is particularly apparent in the production of the politically imbued spectacles at the New York Hippodrome in 1909. Theatre does not reflect here, it actively constitutes political reality. Werry defines spectacle as ‘the sense of visual exorbitancy lent to theatrical experience by the material, nonorganic, or prosthetic elements of theatre art’. It is ‘as intrinsic to theatre as any of its other dimensions’ despite its persistent critique. ¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – spectacle View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form; a machine of circulation of symbolic experiences through spectacle	To exercise the social imagination; to circulate symbolic experiences in a way which helps to construct them	Doing: show business/ spectacle Showing: current social, political and economic processes
‘Everyone’s a critic, and that includes the possums’ (2005)	John Gaden Australian actor and writer	‘What good drama does it to take reality and heighten it, by selection, by compressing time, by editing speech, by imagining the secret lives of the protagonists. The paradox is that in a good play you will, through this distortion, see reality in a sharper focus. You may even understand yourself and your world better. You may also be unsettled and troubled by what you see and hear’. (The title refers to ‘a small fusillade of steaming pellets’ which clattered down from the ceiling where some possums had been scampering ‘hitting some of the actors’ and filling the rehearsal room with ‘[t]he unmistakable, pungent smell of possum’. ¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: analysis View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place for seeing and hearing	To show a view of reality through performance	Doing: playwrighting ; acting Showing: society to itself
‘A Perfect Penn’ (2005)	Sean Penn American actor and director (interviewed by Craig Matheson)	‘The arts are not meant to be happy or unhappy ... they’re meant to be reflective of what’s going on in all our lives’. ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – art as a reflection of society View of Theatre: positive; functional		To reflect what is going on in all our lives	Doing: acting; directing Showing: society to itself
Theatre: A	Milly S.	An introductory text to all aspects of theatre, which quotes Brook on the ‘empty space’.	A seeing	Representatio	Doing: the

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
Way of Seeing (2005)	Barranger American theorist	Theatre is ‘an immediate art ... a form of art and entertainment that places actors before a group of people ... in a representation about life’.¹⁸ Theatre began in efforts by ‘great societies’ to ‘gather citizens together to celebrate civic accomplishments, warn of personal errors, or ridicule society’s fools’, i.e. it had a didactic and disciplinary purpose. Since the beginning ‘immediacy and presence have set theatrical art apart from other forms of art. For theatre to happen, actors and audiences must come together at a certain time and in a certain place Audiences are not passive observers. They engage as responders’. Theatre is ‘a way of seeing men and women in action, of observing what they do and why they do it ... theatre is an immediate way of experiencing what it means to be human’. Theatre has a ‘living quality’. It is immediate, and its ‘immediacy is its defining character and its liability’ because it imposes limits e.g. on the number of spectators at any one time, the size of its ‘market’, and its resistance to reproducibility.¹⁹ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive – theatre as a way of seeing View of Theatre: positive; functional	place; an immediate art	n through live performance; providing a way of seeing	practice and art of theatre Showing: men and women in action for effect Watching: spectators are ‘responders’ who experience some aspect of ‘what it means to be human’ through what they see.
‘Australian Rules’ (2006)	Neil Armfield Australian theatre director	‘Literature [including plays such as David Hare’s My Zinc Bed] enacts the multifaceted experience of life itself. It provides mirrors, dreams, contemplations on our fear, our sorrow, our desire. Through the uniquely human experience of empathy, we rehearse the great lessons of our life. ... [It is] the place where the truth can be told and learnt’.²⁰ Purpose of Theorist: polemic –theatre as efficacious View of Theatre: positive; functional	A place	Educative: re-enacting the experience of life	Doing: directing literature Watching: we rehearse life through empathy
‘Presence’ (2006)	Jon Erickson English Studies	Erickson defines ‘entertainment’ as that which, whatever form it takes, ‘reinforces already established beliefs and prejudices’.²¹ It takes the form of a ‘therapy’. He rejects theories which see ‘presence’ as a problem of theatre which has to be challenged in some way. Presence can be manipulative and seductive for bad ends, but it can also be a force for great good, as well as pleasure, and this need not be confined to mere entertainment. The sense of being present ‘absorbs our attention and has the ability [paradoxically] to take us out of ourselves for the moment’.²² Spectators enjoy and desire	A place of entertainment which involves the pleasure of experiencing ‘presence’	Making present (for good or bad ends)	Doing: live entertainment Watching: the desire for the experience of ‘presence’

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		this sense. One can never undermine presence altogether, one can only displace it to another level – usually ‘to the level of the one doing the alienating’ who becomes the new site of authority, even for deconstructionists. It is a ‘genetic fallacy’ of both genealogical analysis and deconstruction that ‘how’ meaning is produced can be separated from ‘meaning-as-use’ at any given point. Attempts to raise avant-garde micrology to the collective level have generally just brought out the worst side of the theories (futurism = fascism; Brechtianism = communism etc). The problem is not empathy or absorption but the uses to which these are encouraged to be put. Whether ‘pure presence’ is real or even possible or not, people go to the theatre to experience the pleasure of ‘presence’ and ‘there is something strangely perverse in trying to – and believing one can – frustrate [this desire]’.²³ If anything, we need more opportunities to experience presence in its collective and communal sense, rather than less. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-theatre/theory which is prescriptive in relation to spectators View of Theatre: ambivalent			which theatre offers is not necessarily a desire to be manipulated and deluded and ought not be purposely frustrated on abstract grounds
‘Infiction and Outfiction: The Role of Fiction in Theatrical Performance’ (2006)	David Saltz American philosopher of theatre	Saltz takes exception to standard dualistic views of theatre (including semiotics) which juxtapose it as ‘fiction’ to performance as ‘reality’ which suggest that spectators ‘looks past, or through’ the ‘reality’ of performance to some absent fictional world represented by the performers. He argues that this is back to front. Spectators actually come ‘to experience a real event, to see real, flesh-and-blood actors perform real actions’. Fiction ‘functions as a cognitive template’ which gives structure and meaning to the performers’ activities. ‘The fictional narrative is an integral aspect of the audience’s perception of the actual events that transpire on the stage’.²⁴ Saltz draws on Wittgenstein’s “seeing-as” to argue for a ‘non-dualistic’ understanding of representation. “Seeing as” is ‘simply a way of seeing. All seeing ‘is necessarily infused with imagination’. In theatre this infusion is doubled because the performers and director firstly see-as in their reading of the fictional narrative, which structures what they do. The spectator draws on this structure to make sense of what the performers are doing. It is only later that they come to interpret the fictional narrative (as a whole). Saltz calls the first infiction: the fictional scheme that structures the performance event ... the set of “prescriptions to imagine” that ... constitutes fictionality’. The infiction ‘governs the actors’ physical actions in the real world. Insofar as spectators use the narrative as an infiction, the primary focus of their attention is the performance itself. The fiction does not function as a third term that exists	A seeing place, an activity, an event	The portrayal of a narrative through the structuring of its elements, which gives it meaning	Doing: performance (a structuring activity to give meaning) Showing: involves strategies of structuring Watching: spectators come to the theatre to see real performers in action embodying

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		outside the performance; it inheres in the performance itself'. However, outfiction results when the spectator metaphorically redescribes these actions (e.g. by 'telling' the story of Hamlet from the performance we have seen), which produces the spectator experience of 'a performance of'.²⁵ Infiction is pre-semiotic. Outfiction is where semiotics begins. The process is similar to cognitive understandings of metaphor. Metaphor structures what we see and experience in a particular way – and we later interpret metaphor in the light of our experience. Saltz argues that most theories of theatre only focus on the latter part of this process, but we need to recognize 'the two way nature of the relationship between performance and narrative' and allow 'for the possibility that sometimes the fiction serves its most important function going in rather than coming out'.²⁶ 'The conventions of performance and the fictional narrative work together to create a structure within which the director and performers make their choices and perform their actions'.²⁷ This recognition means that what seem to be unanswerable questions about why certain things occur in art works and theatre (his examples are: the question of why all the apostles in Da Vinci's The Last Supper are seated on one side of the table – the answer is because Da Vinci placed them there as his way of structuring the narrative, not because of some mystical symbolism to be read from the absent event; and 'why do actors break into song in a musical – the answer is because the writers/directors/performers see and therefore structure the story they are telling as a musical): logical questions from a semiotic perspective ... typically do not worry spectators watching [a performance] suggesting that semiotics, whatever its value as a critical tool, is not a good model of the way spectators experience theater. Spectators do not always, or even usually, read theatrical performance as a text from which to extract details about a fictional [or absent] world. The focus of their attention is on the performance itself, and on the significance and force of the performers' actions within the world the performers have created on stage'. Infiction and outfiction work in terms of input/output and analysis. This makes theatre 'the actual embodiment of alternate structures of reality', which is why it is useful as a way of 'rehearsing new strategies' for life.²⁸ [Saltz is one of the few theatre theorists to address all three aspects of theatre]. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-semiotic understandings of viewing theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional			'alternate structures of reality' which are given during the performance in order to help the actions of the performers make sense. Spectators later analyse and interpret the fictional world which has been created as a whole (i.e. in retrospect) and in terms of the structures which were used to give the performance meaning.
'Understand-	James Hamilton	Theatre is a temporal art; we can only experience it sequentially in time. We follow a	A complex	Story-telling	Doing:

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		performances such as movies. These ‘are only, at best, recordings of dramatic performances – one which misses a fundamental aspect of dramatic performance – responsiveness to the audience such that each performance is unique’.³⁴ As an art form, drama ‘reaches us by way of mind’ while movies reach us ‘by way of matter’ – it is ‘mindless’.³⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive			interactive intellectual and imaginative activity which feeds back into and affects the performance
‘Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity’ (2006)	Michael Quinn (- 1995) American philosopher	Theatricality is ‘the shared consciousness of performance’ – we ‘agree’ that this is a performance, and therefore theatricality is in operation.³⁶ We agree because the performer signals to his spectator that he is engaged in a performance and the spectator, under the principle of charity, agrees to understand what the performer does as a performance, at least for the moment. The principle of charity is the only convention which is required for theatricality. We do not need to derive theatrical conventions from a complex set of pre-existing social conventions, as Burns suggests: a play does not have to be built ‘from the ground up’ every time. Deriving theatrical conventions in this way simply allows the use of theatre as a social metaphor, in particular in relation to spectatorship and authenticity: ‘the theater serves as a general criterion for judgments of authenticity’³⁷ because it involves the exercise of this principle of charity. Quinn bases his analysis on ‘the simple theory of truth’, derived from Alfred Tarski, a correspondence theory of truth based on ‘a sign’s claim to its object’ however constituted.³⁸ What the principle of charity allows is successful communication (something which Quinn says is being overlooked in the current fashion for focusing on unsuccessful communication): ‘Successful communication has not been a popular topic in the age of deconstruction, which is predicated on an argument about the failure of representations to be the things they represent ... it’s time now to pay some attention to the shadow side of the failure of representation, that is, to the concept that makes the very supposition of failure possible ... at some level of understanding deconstruction communicates to people in a convincing way [since] its arguments about the impossibility of representing truth have themselves been accepted as true’:³⁹ i.e. it still depends on an idea of truth: ‘Disagreement and agreement alike are intelligible only against a background of massive agreement’.⁴⁰	A communicative practice which is governed by conventions; particularly the convention of ‘ interpretive charity ’	Communication	Doing: performance Watching: spectators assume something is to be communicated when they recognize something as a performance; spectators ‘agree’ to accept what is offered as a performance, at least until further notice; this is the basis of successful

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		In fact we operate according to the principle of charity most of the time. [This principle is a bit like the ‘willing suspension of disbelief’ except that we apply it outside as well as inside the theatre: generally we assume people are telling us the truth [as they see it] and mean us to understand what they say, until further notice tells us otherwise. Without this trust in a generalised idea of truth, no communication would be possible – [which is why deconstruction can be seen as pernicious and dangerous]. This is a model of ‘interpretive charity’ which we even extend to animals under certain conditions, even though we know they do not know all the conventions of communication that we accept e.g. although animals display an interest in communication (i.e. they share the principle of interpretive charity), we cannot be sure they will behave appropriately if we put them on stage, because they don’t know the secondary conventions we might add, given the first. This principle is so widely shared that it gives rise to the illusion that we can be another, when in fact we are only imagining what it would be like for us to be the other. We can’t be another, but we can achieve some understanding of the other as a product of communication. This can even lead to love. We don’t need a complex theory of convention from which is derived theatrical convention in order to explain theatrical communication: ‘the shared consciousness of performance is too basic to communication to be derived from anything other than the shared, perhaps even tacit, conventional assumption that performance is the case’.⁴¹ The key to this is the recognition of an action as a performance: when we recognize an action as a performance, we assume it is intended to communicate. Purpose of Theorist: polemic –communication View of Theatre: positive; functional			communication; spectators are competent, and capable of learning a new ‘convention’ even during a single performance because they operate on a principle of ‘interpretive charity’; through this, authenticity can be tested
Mimesis (2006)	Matthew Potolsky American Literary Theorist	Theatrical mimesis differs from other applications of mimesis in that it entails a relationship with a spectator. Theatrical mimesis is ‘a representation for someone ... not only a representation of something else’. Mimesis is ‘performative’ in theatre, and arises ‘not from the distinction between a real original and an illusory copy but from a particular kind of action and attention’. Theatre ‘is not, strictly speaking, identical with mimesis. But theatre and theatricality have been so central to the theory since antiquity that it is nearly impossible to separate the two ideas’.⁴² Purpose of Theorist: analysis - mimesis View of Theatre: positive	A place in which representations are enacted	To represent for someone through action to draw attention to that action	Doing: enactment through imitation Showing: through action
“Way outside the comfort	Edward Albee (1928 –	The role of writers ‘is to hold a mirror to us, warts and all, and to inspire change if those warts are unsightly’. ⁴³ ‘I think maybe if nobody walks out of something, if you can’t	A seeing place; an art	To hold up a mirror to	Doing: playwrighting

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
zone' (2006)	American playwright (interviewed by Joel Gibson) Playwright	offend somebody, you've failed' (Albee). Art 'is not just a catalyst of change – it's also the only thing that separates us from the other animals' (Gibson). However, Albee believes the combination of 'economic control of the arts' so that theatre is now so expensive that both producers and spectators were afraid to take risks 'and our own passivity as a society, we are approaching a censorship which is more dangerous than any censorship imposed thoroughly from without', that imposed by economic interests and fear. 'It makes cowards of people' ⁴⁴ and makes theatre boring – which leads to bored spectators. Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-risk-averse theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	form	society in order to inspire change	; the practice of theatre Watching: boredom is a form of censorship
'And today's lesson is how to revive a theatre company' (2006) ⁴⁵	Nicholas Hytner English Director (interviewed by Gwyn Topham)	In 2003, Hytner was appointed artistic director of Britain's National Theatre. He programmed 'bold, eye-catching plays' such as Jerry Springer: The Opera , David Hare's Stuff Happens and Alan Bennett's The History Boys , and slashed the price of tickets: 'New audiences packed its auditoriums for everything'. ⁴⁶ According to Hytner, the public's appetite for political theatre is 'huge' because of a 'supine broadcast media ... obsessively hung up on what at the end is a very limited notion of balance' whereas 'There is something irreplaceable about watching something that's tough and passionately felt with a thousand other people' (Hytner). Hytner believed that people wanted a diverse theatre, and, barring the cost of tickets, were prepared to attend vastly different kinds of productions, including those which were 'deeply political'. ⁴⁷ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – anti-risk averse theatre View of Theatre: positive; functional	A seeing place; an art form	To generate a communal experience	Doing: directing 'genuine' theatre Watching: a powerful communal experience which is affected by cost!

¹ Wilson, Edwin, and Alvin Goldfarb. 2004. Living Theatre: a History. 4th Edition ed. Boston: McGraw Hill. 556

² Anne Bogart 2005, The Viewpoint Book, Theatre Communications Group; discussed in 'Viewpoints', Wikipedia 2007, www.wikipedia.com accessed 2nd April 2007.

³ Brockett, Oscar, and Robert J. Ball. 2004. The Essential Theatre. 8th Edition ed. Belmont CA: Thomson/Wadsworth. 335

⁴ Brockett and Ball 2004: 335

⁵ David Hare 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/hare_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.

⁶ Hare 2005

-
- ⁷ Deborah Warner 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/warner_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.
- ⁸ Simon McBurney 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/mcburney_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.
- ⁹ Peter Hall 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/hall_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.
- ¹⁰ Robert Lepage 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/lepage_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.
- ¹¹ Tom Stoppard 2005, 'Interview with John Tusa', Interviews exploring the creative process, The John Tusa Interview Archive, http://www.bbc.co.uk/radio3/johntusainterview/stoppard_transcript.shtml accessed 2nd April 2007.
- ¹² Fortier, Mark. 2002. Theory/Theatre: An Introduction. 2nd ed. London and New York: Routledge. 182
- ¹³ Noble, Steven 2005, Artistic Ways of Knowing: Expanded Opportunities for Teaching and Learning: New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education, Wiley, 47. See especially Noble, Steven E. 2005. 'Mental Illness Through Popular Theater: Performing (In)Sanely'. In Artistic Ways of Knowing: Expanded Opportunities for Teaching and Learning: New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education. www.josseybass.com/WileyCDA/WileyTitle/. A Print on Demand title from Jossey-Bass (John Wiley & Sons Inc).
- ¹⁴ Werry, Margaret. 2005. "'The Greatest Show on Earth": Political Spectacle, Spectacular Politics, and the American Pacific'. Theatre Journal 57 (3) pp. 355-382. 256
- ¹⁵ Werry 2005: 379
- ¹⁶ Gaden, John. 2005. 'Everyone's a critic, and that includes the possums'. The Sydney Morning Herald, August 6-7, 2005, 40.
- ¹⁷ Matheson, Craig. 2005. 'A Perfect Penn'. The Bulletin, 28th June, 2005, pp. 62-63.63
- ¹⁸ Barranger, Mill 2005, Theatre: A Way of Seeing, Belmont CA, Thomson Higher Education. 1
- ¹⁹ Barranger 2005: 1-3
- ²⁰ Armfield, Neil. 2006. 'Culture: Australian Rules'. The Bulletin August 8 pp. 62-64.64
- ²¹ Erickson, Jon. 2006. 'Presence'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 142-159. 144
- ²² Erickson 2006: 148
- ²³ Erickson 2006: 157
- ²⁴ Saltz, David. 2006. 'Infiction and Outfiction: The Role of Fiction in Theatrical Performance'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 203-220. 206
- ²⁵ Saltz 2006: 213-5
- ²⁶ Saltz 2006: 215
- ²⁷ Saltz 2006: 217
- ²⁸ Saltz 2006: 217-8
- ²⁹ Hamilton, James R. 2006. 'Understanding Plays'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, pp. 221-243. 232

³⁰ Hamilton 2006: 233, 235

³¹ Hamilton takes the idea of concatenation from Jerrold Levinson (1997) Music in the Moment, Ithaca, Cornell University Press. See also Levinson and Philip Alperson 1991, 'What is a Temporal Art?', Midwest Studies in Philosophy 16, pp. 439-450.

³² Carroll, Noël. 2006. 'Philosophy and Drama: Performance, Interpretation, and Intentionality'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 104-121.105

³³ Carroll 2006: 112

³⁴ Carroll 2006: 119

³⁵ Carroll 2006: 118

³⁶ Quinn, Michael. 2006. 'Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 301-316.312

³⁷ Quinn 2006: 313n4

³⁸ Quinn 2006: 307

³⁹ Quinn 2006: 306-7

⁴⁰ Quinn 2006: 309

⁴¹ Quinn 2006: 311-2

⁴² Potolsky, Matthew. 2006. Mimesis. Edited by J. Drakakis, The New Critical Idiom. New York and London: Routledge.72-4

⁴³ Gibson, Joel 2006, 'Way outside the comfort zone', The Sydney Morning Herald, 12th June 2006. 15

⁴⁴ Albee in Gibson 2006: 15

⁴⁵ Published in, p. 13.

⁴⁶ Topham, Gwyn 2006, 'And today's lesson is how to revive a theatre company', The Sydney Morning Herald 3rd June, 2006.13

⁴⁷ Hytner in Topham 2006: 13

Table 51/51 Theories of Theatre 2006(b)-2008

(Names in bold print also appear in the theatre metaphor table)

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
'Empathy and Theater' (2006); Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology (2008)	David Krasner American theatre theorist and teacher	A discussion of empathy in relation to spectator response, and in opposition to Brecht's view of empathy, which Krasner sees as misguided. ¹ Drawing on theories from psychology, aesthetics and philosophy (particularly phenomenology) Krasner argues that empathy 'allows us to transcend the limits of our own world' and consequently is 'a possible audience response, one which possesses 'cognitive function as well as emotional response'. Empathy is an activity which combines both emotion and reason; it is not in opposition to reason (as Brecht claimed). Reason and emotion cannot be separated in empathy because they each support the other, allowing spectators to both identify with 'objects' on stage and maintain a critical distance which allows judgment. Empathy has the potential to allow us 'to cross the boundaries between us' without losing our 'separate sense of self'. ² Empathy in the theatre is 'an affective response ... reflecting involvement, identification, understanding, or complicity of feelings'. ³ It only arises, however, under three conditions: (1) 'the audience must be made aware of whom, or where, attention must be placed'; (2) 'some substantial understanding of the action or character must take place; and (3) 'the audience must have a grasp of the narrative (even if it is disjointed, fragmented, or illogical)'. It does not entail a loss of the self: 'It allows one to admit the existence of another being or consciousness, within one's cognitive purview, without losing oneself in another'. Empathy is also functional – it helps human communication. ⁴ Empathy is not the same as sympathy. Krasner in fact suggests that sympathy is a subset of empathy, one of the four ways which spectators empathize in the theater (the remaining three are through identification, compassion and understanding – each may 'occur independently or overlap' and are 'interchangeable and fluid'. Identification involves believing I could find myself in a similar situation and would probably act the same way; compassion 'implies I feel that the character has been unfairly treated' and that this should be remedied; sympathy 'implies that I feel ... the pain of a character, which elicits a feeling or desire to help, assist or aid them' irrespective of fair play: 'My feelings are in line with the actor's, and his/her plight is what moves me'; ⁵ understanding 'implies comprehension of the actor's feelings or the character's situation' while retaining 'my critical judgment'. (The example he offers for understanding – a good chess player imagining themselves as their opponent in order to anticipate their moves –	A place in which a performance can be watched (a seeing place)	To generate empathy	Watching: spectators, through imagination, and when carefully prepared, experience empathy, a mixture of emotion and rationality, which allows them to both identify with the actor and/or character and to maintain a critical distance , not losing their sense of themselves as individual selves: an imaginative means of coming to terms with

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		however, suggests that empathy in this regard is a pre-emptive strategy which can be used to gain advantage over another – which brings this aspect of empathy at least closer to Brecht’s concern with the manipulative potential of empathy). Krasner’s position is that ‘empathy enhances our comprehension of social conditions, provides a greater awareness of others, and works in conjunction with reason to evoke social action’.⁶ His view is relentlessly individualistic, and fails to consider the mass aspect of spectator response which so troubled Brecht. He rejects the view first proposed by Lipps that in empathy, the observer projects onto the object his own feelings and thoughts, claiming that subsequent developments in the concept by Husserl, Merleau-Ponty and Levinas, indicate that it is rather an imaginative means of coming to terms with the existence of the other. It is higher-order response than sympathy, which aims at communion, or ‘an agreement in feelings’, produces ‘a desire to alleviate pain’ but is nevertheless passive, although ‘communal’. Empathy, in contrast, is an activity, both a way of knowing and a strategy for understanding which allows us to identify the feelings and thoughts of another without necessarily agreeing with them. It has as its aim accuracy or clarification via reason, rather than alleviation of suffering (Krasner tends to assume sympathy relates only to suffering). Empathy cannot be reduced to a simplistic dichotomy between reason and emotion; cannot be dismissed as a loss of the self leading to passivity; is ‘part of a complex, interactive theatrical experience that functions along with (and adds to) reason, understanding and analysis and that in turn assists in social awareness’: ‘social context devoid of empathy’ (as proposed by Brecht) ‘is little more than dull propaganda’.⁷ In what is basically an argument against Brecht, empathy is essential to rationality – it provides a focus and the possibility of caring and therefore action. Empathy is driven by imagination – it is the spectator’s imagination which triggers empathy (just as it is the actor’s imagination which triggers empathy with the character his/she is to play), although it is not clear whether the actor or the character (or both) are the triggering device. It is not much of an argument for the rationality of spectator response, given that a collective response is not accounted for. Also, given that spectators can only experience empathy under certain conditions, he has not answered Brecht’s claim that empathy can be manipulated. In addition, it is not altogether clear whether empathy is an effect, or involves some intentionality i.e. it is a facility or strategy used by the individual. He seems to be arguing for both. In his survey of theatre theory between 1900 and 2000,			the existence of the other. It is higher-order response than sympathy, which aims at communion, or ‘an agreement in feelings’, produces ‘a desire to alleviate pain’ but is nevertheless passive, although ‘communal’. Empathy, in contrast, is an activity, both a way of knowing and a strategy for understanding which allows us to identify the feelings and thoughts of another without necessarily agreeing with

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		although he includes excerpts from 82 theorists, he argues in the ‘Introduction’ that theatre theory today is largely a reflection of Plato and Aristotle, Kant, Hegel and Nietzsche: ‘I contend that both the Platonic and Aristotelian divide over theatre and representation and the tripartite influences of Kant, Hegel and Nietzsche establish the fundamental details over theatre in theory that extend throughout the twentieth century ... [and] provide much of the groundwork for things to come’.⁸ If this is the case, then it is no wonder that the spectator gets short-shrift in theatre theory, since only Plato seemed to be concerned about spectatorship, and even then, only as the recipient of the Truth (or lack of it) that the dramatist shows, while Aristotle completely ignores the spectator, focusing instead on how one can construct a well-made tragedy: ‘In his Poetics, Aristotle describes theatrical theory somewhat like an auto-mechanic might describe an automobile’.⁹ In Kant, although judgment is clearly something which is related to observation, the essential concern is with how something can be considered aesthetic, and therefore of value in itself, encouraging the development of the idea of art for art’s sake. While ‘Kant wanted to shift the aesthetic emphasis from the artist ... to the audience who, as critical judges, can make determination of art’s quality’¹⁰ what his ideas brought about was a justification of the role of the critic (someone whose judgment was special because it was universalised as taste) as well as the development of the idea of artistic autonomy which allowed theatre practitioners and theorists to detach themselves from ‘descriptive forms, narrative causality and the well-made play formula’¹¹ and from the need to consider the spectator. If theatre was ‘art’, then whatever they did as artists had validity irrespective of response to it. In this way, Kant’s theory fails to ‘point to any neutral, uncontested procedure of identifying successful work’.¹² While both Nietzsche and Hegel recognized the spectator, in both cases it was as a recipient of an address. For Nietzsche, tragedy forced humans to face the contingent and meaningless nature of life while for Hegel, tragedy demonstrated the limits of human control. The focus was on the purpose of the drama rather than spectatorship, and both generated ‘a plethora of abstract and surreal theatre theories that incorporated fate and the unknowable’¹³ to the extent that Krasner could divide subsequent theatre theory into either non-referential and therefore Nietzschean (Wilde, Bergson, Bryusov, Maeterlinck, Yeats, Marinetti, Pirandello, Witkiewicz, Appia, Kaiser, Locke, O’Neill, Stein, Artaud, Bentley, Grotowski and Brook) and mimetic or Hegelian (Rolland, Shaw, Lukács, Goldman, DuBois, Sartre,			them. It has as its aim accuracy or clarification via reason, rather than alleviation of suffering

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		Szondi, Derrida and Williams). [Brecht falls somewhat uneasily between the two]. Thus, despite recognition of the relationship of theatre to seeing, Krasner's selection and his discussion of them almost all concentrate on the doing of theatre. Krasner's invocation of the etymology of theatre in relation to theory seems to be purely for the purposes of demanding that theatre theory be recognized as a serious endeavour worthy of the attention of philosophers such as himself: the argument goes that theatre and theory both derive from the same etymological root, and therefore theatre is a concern we should take seriously, and we should take theory about theatre seriously as well. What gets lost is the sense of theatre Bert States was trying to articulate when he called theatre a noplace in which we see something through the interaction between performer and spectator i.e. theatre was not so much a seeing-place but a seeing-place in which spectators come to generate a larger conception of life through the activities of the performers, who play in this space in order to show something to the spectator.¹⁴ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive; polemic – theatre theory View of Theatre: positive; functional
'At the prime minister's pleasure' (2007)	John Carmody Australian commentator	'Art should inform life'¹⁵ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: functional		To inform life	Doing: art
Program Notes for The Game of Love and Chance (2007)	Aubrey Mellor Australian director	'Above all, a sense of joy in performance is required, and this is where the audience is crucial. We thank you for participating in this experience for our actors'.¹⁶ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – importance of spectators to performers View of Theatre: positive		Acting as an interactive experience producing joy (for the actor)	Doing: performance Watching: spectators are crucial in allowing the actor to experience the joy of performing
'It's just a stage' (2007)	Linda Lorenza Australia drama teacher	Theatre (drama) is a reflective process during which the performer refines and stylises their work. Performances should be underpinned by a 'rationale'. Since this work is designed to be 'communicated' to a spectator '[i]t is valuable to perform in front of other		A reflective process aimed at	Doing: performance

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		students to gauge audience response'. Collaborative performances require individuals to 'work as a team' in order to 'create a coherent performance'. ¹⁷ Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive View of Theatre: positive; functional		communication to , not with, spectators
'The Forum' (2007)	Stephen Sewell Australian director, writer	Theatre is innately democratic. It 'is a public forum, that most dangerous of social spaces regarded with deep suspicion by tyrants and would-be tyrants everywhere and deeply implicated in the struggle for freedom that is the core concern of democracy and the law'. Its core concern is 'human beings in their magnificence and their stupidity'. In focusing on 'thinking, speaking, acting human beings relating to one another in the myriad ways that we do' it teaches us 'to celebrate the rambunctious chaos of life', presenting an alternative picture 'to the timid fearful existence those above us would have us live'. ¹⁸ In other words, theatre offers alternatives . Purpose of Theorist: polemic – theatre as an inherently democratic practice View of Theatre: positive; functional	A public space which can demonstrate democracy	A demonstration of democracy: 'a commoner can play a king'; ¹⁹ experimentation and testing.	Doing: playwrighting; directing Showing: alternative possibilities
Interview: 'Trust me ...' (2007)	Darren O'Donnell (Canada) Founder, Mammalian Diving Reflex ²⁰	Mammalian Diving Reflex is a theatre company which performs 'social acupuncture'. This involves 'creating situations where strangers talk to one another, blurring the line between art and life'. The aim, through encounters which provoke anxiety and discomfort, is to prove 'that there's no reason to be afraid of people'. ²¹ Their performances generally have a political aim, e.g. Haircuts by Children is aimed at demonstrating to (untrusting) adults that civic engagement can and should start 'when you're a kid'. ²² Purpose of Theorist: polemic – confrontational performance View of Theatre: positive; functional	An art form	Confrontation to teach a lesson about survival; demonstrating leaps of faith and their rewards; a rehearsal for life.	Doing: performance art Showing: an extreme situation and its resolution
'Take it to the Street' (2007)	Bruce Gladwin Artistic Director of Back to Back Theatre (interviewed by Clare Morgan)	Theatre performed in public places such as streets and concourses require particular skills from the actors, and practice in maintaining cohesion in situations in which anything can happen (people walking through performances and taking exception to 'being watched'; people asking directions etc). Even in these conditions, where power 'is constantly fluctuating between the crowd and the audience', ²³ spectators can have a strong emotional reaction, although they can become confused about what they are supposed to be looking	A place; a focusing practice; a group engaged in such	To explore social issues through performance	Doing: street theatre -acting requires techniques to handle particular

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		at: ‘There’s something about the experience of going to the theatre, where you feel you are alone but together. It’s like that fable about being together in our aloneness’.²⁴ A play ‘takes place in an audience’s head’, although it is experienced in the company of others. Despite the insecurities which performance in a public space can cause the spectator, spectators are able to be open to the performance and respond enthusiastically. The Back to Back Theatre has a full-time ensemble of five actors with intellectual disabilities. Their work explores ‘the way society values people by the economic worth and rejects those perceived as less “productive”’.²⁵ Purpose of Theorist: polemic – street theatre (going to the spectators) View of Theatre: positive; functional	practice		situations Showing: social conditions Watching: a paradoxical experience - ‘aloneness’ in the company of others
The Necessity of Theater (2008)	Paul Woodruff American philosopher and playwright	A defence of the ‘art’ of theatre as an art of watching and being watched, which Woodruff bases in an ethics of caring for others: ‘A good watcher knows how to care’.²⁶ Not so much a theory of theatre as a philosophy which draws on theatre to illustrate its claim that watching and being watched involve an ethics of care which is made up of four virtues: reverence, compassion, courage and justice: ‘Good watchers respond virtuously to whatever it is they watch’.²⁷ Watching is basically about ‘paying attention to’. Theatre is necessary to humans psychologically, socially, ethically and politically for this reason. It is psychologically necessary because we all need the attention of others to thrive. It is socially necessary because attention to others helps build social cohesion. It is ethically necessary because caring for others is a virtue, and may spur us to action on behalf of others (good watching entails knowing when to act and when not to). Finally it is politically necessary because it ensures accountability. Good watching also involves acknowledging that both sides of a conflict can be right and that the path forward requires a dialogue and compromise, something which political opponents forget, instead blaming voters for being fickle: ‘The wisdom of dialogue is part of the wisdom of democracy. In the theatre of politics, as in the theatre of Antigone and Creon, we are invited to take sides ... this is fine, as long as partisanship does not block dialogue and lead to violence’ – theatre shows us the consequences of this.²⁸ Theatre is necessary to our lives as humans and, according to Woodruff, since it ‘aims at something that is truly rewarding’ – making human action worth watching – if we don’t find theatre ‘beneficial’ we need to change our lives so that we do, or find a form of theatre which can be seen that way.²⁹ The onus is with the spectator to make themselves better watchers, for instance by making	A universal cultural practice, historical and culturally specific in form ; an art – the art of making human action worth watching, in a measured time and space	The generation of healthy caring individuals and societies, and a functional democratic politics	Watching: an art – we learn to make things worth watching (and theatre professionals help us learn this) – and we learn to watch well – again theatre helps us do this by creating characters that we can care for. In caring for distant characters we come to some self-knowledge

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		themselves better informed about the aims of the particular kind of theatre. Woodruff divides the philosophy of theatre into two streams, one emanating from Plato, the other from the actual experience of theatre. Within this second stream, philosophy is either descriptive or prescriptive. Woodruff sees Aristotle as fitting into this prescriptive stream, and sees his book, which is a distillation of his 30 years experience both in and thinking about theatre, fitting there as well.³⁰ The style of the book is patronising, addressed to a collective ‘we’ whenever ‘we’ do what he considers to be theatre, but to ‘you’ whenever we do something which he considers is not – such as go to the cinema – and when he is prescribing what he considers to be good practice. Good practice seems to be conservative and elitist. Typically, his understanding of theatre does not include popular or mass theatre such as ‘musical productions that ape film in their use of sound, montage, and illusion’ to which only ‘tourists ... flock to’.³¹ But at the same time, he wants to argue that theatre is a very broad ‘cultural practice’ which encompasses Greek tragedy and American college football, ‘[w]eddings, funerals ... street dancing, church services’ because all are ‘powerful creators for community’.³² In other words, the point of the art of caring for others is to generate and maintain a sense of community. Theatre is more than ‘art theater’. It is basically anything where watching together is involved – except musical productions and film or TV: ‘Theater is immediate, its actions are present to participants and audience ... in the theatre you are part of a community of watchers, while in a cinema you are alone’.³³ It is apparently not possible to be part of a ‘community of watchers’ when watching a mediated spectacle – even if we think we are. Experiences such as gathering together in a bar to watch a sporting contest on television are ‘anomalies’ – not real theatre.³⁴ Nevertheless, ‘[t]heater is the art by which human beings make or find human action worth watching, in a measured time and place’,³⁵ usually by coming to care for the characters that are portrayed.³⁶ In this way we rehearse an ethics of care for others so that we can learn to practice this better way of watching in our everyday lives. The conditions for achieving this end fall on both performers and spectators: ‘[t]he art of theatre makes a pair of demands on us – for performers to present action to their audience, and for the audience to understand the behaviour that they see as arising from choice’.³⁷ Theatre thus described operates on a principle of human agency: characters/roles are assumed to choose their actions. These actions lead to consequences which are measured out and played out within the time period allocated – after which we

WORK	AUTHOR	HISTORY & THEMES	IDEA of THEATRE	PURPOSE of THEATRE	FOCUS
		all go home. Theatre is thus a finite activity in which the event portrayed is measured out in advance in order to maintain audience attention. This is what is artful about theatre: '[a] good plot ... is itself the measure of the time'.³⁸ It also gives life to conflict, which is what captivates our interest and makes whatever it is worth watching. Purpose of Theorist: prescriptive (Woodruff's description of his work) View of Theatre: positive; functional

¹ Krasner, David. 2006. 'Empathy and Theater'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 255-277. 260

² Krasner 2006: 255-6

³ Krasner 2006: 273

⁴ Krasner 2006: 257-8

⁵ Krasner 2006: 259

⁶ Krasner 2006: 262

⁷ Krasner 2006: 272

⁸ Krasner, David, ed. 2008. Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology. Malden MA, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.3

⁹ Krasner 2008: 8

¹⁰ Krasner 2008: 17

¹¹ Krasner 2008: 14

¹² Richard Eldridge 2003, The Philosophy of Art, Cambridge MA, Cambridge University Press, p. 55.

¹³ Krasner 2008: 21

¹⁴ States, Bert O. 2008/1985. 'The World on Stage'. In Theatre in Theory 1900-2000: An Anthology, edited by D. Krasner. Malden MA, Oxford UK: Blackwell Publishing, pp. 441-447.

, Mori, Mitsuya. 2002. 'The Structure of Theater: A Japanese View of Theatricality'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2&3) pp. 73-93.

¹⁵ Carmody, John 2007, 'At the prime minister's pleasure', The Sydney Morning Herald 15 January 2007. 11.

¹⁶ Aubrey Mellor 2007, Program Notes for the NIDA production of The Game of Love and Chance, Parade Playhouse, Sydney, 11-16April.

¹⁷ Lorenza, Linda 2007, 'It's just a stage', Official HSC Exam Guide, The Sydney Morning Herald, June. 36

¹⁸ Sewell, Stephen 2007, 'The Forum', Weekend Australian October 6-7, 2007.

¹⁹ Sewell 2007

²⁰ The group is named after the self-preservation technique triggered in mammals encountering extreme situations (Morgan 2007: 14 – see n21 below).

²¹ Morgan, Clare. 2007. 'Trust me, I've just tidied up the back'. The Sydney Morning Herald, Thursday 20th December, p. 14.14

-
- ²² O'Donnell in Morgan 2007: 14
- ²³ Gladwin in Morgan, Clare 2007, 'Take it to the Street', Interview with Bruce Gladwin, Summerherald, The Sydney Morning Herald January 1, 2007,21
- ²⁴ Gladwin in Morgan 2007: 21
- ²⁵ Morgan 2007: 21
- ²⁶ Woodruff, Paul. 2008. The Necessity of Theater: The Art of Watching and Being Watched. Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press.143
- ²⁷ Woodruff 2008: 204
- ²⁸ Woodruff 2008: 225
- ²⁹ Woodruff 2008: 68
- ³⁰ Woodruff 2008: xi
- ³¹ Woodruff 2008: 17
- ³² Woodruff 2008: 11, 17
- ³³ Woodruff 2008: 17
- ³⁴ Woodruff 2008: 18
- ³⁵ Woodruff 2008: 18
- ³⁶ Woodruff 2008: 22
- ³⁷ Woodruff 2008: 72
- ³⁸ Woodruff 2008: 72

Appendix E: Performance/Performativity Tables (CD files)

Table 1 ‘Universals of Performance’ – details

Table 2 Defining Performativity

The tables summarise the findings of a literature review of the fields in which the terms performance and performativity are used conducted in 2008. The purpose of the study was to try and establish whether or not the concepts should be considered theatre metaphors.

The elements identified by Blau as ‘universals of performance’ (Blau 1989) were used to analyse the ways in which the concepts were used in the literature. Although the concepts are widely used across a diversity of fields and there is some agreement over some of the elements across these fields, neither concept is clearly a theatre metaphor.

Referencing: Referencing system used for these tables is based on the Harvard name/year system. A full bibliography is provided at the end of each detailed table.

Appendix E Table 1: ‘Universals of Performance’ - details

UNIVERSALS OF PERFORMANCE¹
All conceptions of performance occur in a ‘performative atmosphere [made up] with the scents and sensibilities of other performance concepts’ (McKenzie 2001: 235)
PERFORMANCE IS:		Theorist	Field	From
An ‘ado’ (a complete/d entity) which is
Productive	‘[P]erformances exceed what goes into them [y]et successful performances promote the illusion that their fruits precede them’ (Crease 2003: 268)	Crease 1993, 2003 Ball 1995 McKenzie 2001 Meadmore et al 2004 Urban 2007 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Philosophy of Science Political Philosophy Performance Theory Education Business Health Sociology	Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/organizational theory/technology Performativity (Butler) Accounting/Auditing/Economics Performativity/Theatre/Sport
An accomplishment	Performance is an accomplishment, something achieved in the world (Schieffelin 1998: 198). ‘These tasks are carefully planned ... good and careful work is called for in their performance’ (Taylor 1911: 39). Performance ‘is the carrying out of a task or fulfillment of some promise or claim’ (CMIIF 1995: 5).	E. Burke (1729-1797) La Perouse 1799 Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 Taylor 1911 Austin 1955 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Parry 1967 Poirier 1971 Skinner 1971 Hymes 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 Schieffelin 1985,1998 Boyett & Conn 1988 Laclau 1989 Bourdieu 1990 Foster-Dixon 1993 Aiges 1995 CMIIF 1995 Denning 1996 Peiss 1996 States 1996	Politics Exploration Dramatic literature Scientific Management Speech Act Theory Sociology Political theory Literature Political philosophy Folk practices Oral interpretation Anthropology Organizational Theory Political theory Ethnography/Sociology Gender Studies Music Performance Measurement Anthropology Gender practices/history Theatre practice	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Public Achievement Oral performance Engineering Language theory Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Process (Turner) Auditing Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Speech Act Theory Performativity (Butler) Music performance Auditing/Public Administration Theatre as metaphor Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre

		Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Hinckley 1998 Worthen 1998 Fusco 1998 Fitzpatrick 1999 Godard 2000 MacGowan 2000 McKenzie 2001 Ahmed 2002 Crane 2002 Mackenzie 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Taviani 2005 Durant et al 2006 Radin 2006 Roche 2006 Dredge 2007 Maserati 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Lapinski 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008 Ausport 2008 TIS 2008 Reuters 2008 Lawton 2008 Pandaram 2008	Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Music Education English/Theatre/Dance Performance Art Shakespearean Studies Translation Anthropology Performance Theory Political History Theatre History Computer technology Theatre Anthropology Theatre practice Human Resources/Motivation Public Administration Performance training Sports journalism High performance Vehicles Public Administration Political Science Health Sociology Sport Performance Sport Performance Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism	Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Theatre/Dramaturgy Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Language theory/Social construction Theatre/organizational theory/technology Civility Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre practice Theatre Goal setting/auditing Accounting practices Theatre Human Capacity/Sports performance Technology Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Auditing/Accountability Performativity/Theatre/Sport Human capacity/Social participation Physiology/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity
and is conscious of itself as performance
Reflexive (conscious of itself as performance) - during preparation for performance - during performance itself - with regard to the self - with regard to others	Performance is always accompanied by 'the consciousness of performance' (Blau 1989: 259); this can make performance an educative process (Hinckley 1998). '[I]t is the ability of individuals to take	E. Burke (1729-1797) Turner 1957, 1974, 1984, 1988, 1990, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Brecht 1964 Poirier 1971	Politics Anthropology Sociology Theatre theory and practice Literature	Publicness/Aesthetics/Auditing Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Theatre Oral Communication

	the attitude of the other that allows them to become objects to themselves' (MacAloon 12). 'Public reflexivity takes the shape of performance' (Turner in Stoeltje 1978: 450).	Burns 1972 Long 1974 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Stoeltje 1978 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Robinson 1987 Bauman 1992 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Kao 1996 Denning 1996 Hinckley 1998 Papa 1999 Sanders 1999 Langellier 1999 Madison 1999 Kane 2000 Goodman 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Roms 2004 Khee 2004 Cheng 2004 Taviani 2005 Thompson 2006 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Reuters 2008	Sociology of theatre Oral interpretation Oral interpretation Performance Studies Ethnology Performance analysis Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Performance Art Ethnography Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Business Theory Anthropology Music Education Political Theatre Writing as performance Personal Narrative Performance Studies Personal Narrative Theatre/Gender Studies Anthropology Political theatre Performance Studies Performance Studies Theatre practice Drama Education Identity politics/journalism Performance training Sports journalism	Theatre/Goffman Goffman/Burke Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Anthropology (Turner) Theatre Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Auditing/Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre Queer Theory/Theatre as metaphor Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Communication Speech Act Theory/Theatre Theatre/Performativity Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Theatre Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Sport/Human capacity
or partially reflexive	'The notion of 'self-reflexivity'	Curtin 1994	Education	Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism

	... is not (quite) conceivable. We only act on our own biased interpretation of our practice' (Curtin 2005).	Cheng 2004	Performance Studies	Theatre
A separation	There is no performance without separation or division, even though performers have a 'recurring aspiration' to efface themselves (Blau 1989: 262): 'performance is a testament to what separates' (268). The performer is always the 'other' (268) both for themselves and for other spectators. ² This necessarily creates an "edge" of the stage' which cannot be eliminated, only reconstituted elsewhere (267). Performance has 'the look of something that is looked at (Blau 1989: 266); it is 'of its nature to be seen', therefore appearance dominates the idea of performance and 'what can look at itself is not one' (Derrida 1976: 36 in Blau 1989: 254). Performance is a 'frame' which 'encourages and intensifies a kind of decontextualization' (Langellier 1999: 134). Performativity has an 'estranging power' (Gingrich-Philbrook 1997: 124)	Brecht 1964 Hymes 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 Derrida 1976 Blau 1983, 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Carlson 2004/1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Sanders 1999 Langellier 1999 Sadono 1999 Madison 1999 Paget 2002 Alexander 2003, 2005 Cheng 2004 Taviani 2005	Theatre theory and practice Folk practices Oral interpretation Philosophy Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Theatre theory/history/practice Speech Communication Writing as performance Personal Narrative Dance Education Performance Studies Media Studies Cultural Sociology Performance Studies Theatre practice	Theatre Language competence (Chomsky) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Language as constitutive of reality Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre Austin/Butler Queer Theory/Theatre as metaphor Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Communication Theatre Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Theatre Theatre which is liminoid ('betwixt and between' – Turner)	[Performance] is a specific event with its liminoid nature foregrounded' (Carlson 1996:	Carlson 2004/1996 Schechner 1998 McKenzie 2001	Theatre theory/history/practice Performance studies Performance Theory	Theatre Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre/organizational theory/technology

	198-9). '[L]iminality remains one of the most frequently cited attributes of [cultural] performative efficacy' (McKenzie 2001: 49).
and involves the management of time
A process which has an end point or is complete		Taylor 1911 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Laclau 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 McLaren 1988 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995 Steadman 1992 Crease 1993, 2003 Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Williams 1998 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003. Goodman 2000 Giardinelli 2001 Crane 2002 Taviani 2005 Reed et al 2006 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007	Scientific Management Anthropology Political theory Anthropology Education Gender studies African theatre & politics Philosophy of Science Education Theatre research Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Organizational Theory Political Science Theatre/Gender Studies Political Science Theatre History Theatre practice Public administration Performance training Public Policy	Engineering Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Process (Turner) Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech Act Theory/Derrida/Foucault Theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Auditing Auditing Theatre/Performativity Auditing Theatre Theatre Evaluation/auditing Theatre Economics
Temporal		Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 States 1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997	Performance Studies Education Theatre research Theatre practice Theatre history/practice	Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Semiotics

		Fraser 1999 Roche 2006	Social Sciences Performance training	Performativity (Butler) Theatre and is purposeful/intentional
Deliberate/planned/ designed	“The most minimal performance is a differentiating act’ (Blau 1989: 250) and ‘there is nothing named performance which is not ... concerned with ... mastery’ (252). At the very least, all performance requires ‘concentration, focus and centering’ (269).	Taylor 1911 Blau 1983, 1989 Boyett & Conn 1988 Taylor & Felton 1993 Maserati 2007 Chapple 2008	Scientific Management Theatre theory/practice Organizational Theory Organizational Theory High Performance Vehicles Performance Art	Engineering Theatre Auditing Systems Theory Technology (mechanical) Theatre
Staged	‘[P]erformances are staged in front of an audience suitably prepared to recognise phenomena in it’ (Crease 2003: 268)	Brecht 1964 Sandifer 1971 Crease 1993, 2003 Fleche 1997 Paget 2002 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Theatre theory and practice Readers Theatre Philosophy of Science Psychology/Autism Media Studies Public Administration	Theatre Oral Interpretation/theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Prepared, rehearsed	It is an ‘ado’ rather than mere doing (Blau 1989: 250). ‘There is no performance without preformance’ MacAloon 1984: 9). Performance involves the determining of time (Blau 1989: 251).	Taylor 1911 Turner 1957, 1974, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Brecht 1964 Sandifer 1971 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Schiefflin 1985, 1989 Brenneis 1987 Butler 1990, 1993 Case & Reinelt 1991 Dolan 1993, 2001	Scientific Management Anthropology Sociology Theatre theory and practice Readers Theatre Oral interpretation Performance Studies Theatre Anthropology Anthropology Ethnology Gender Studies Feminist Studies Theatre Studies	Engineering Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Theatre Oral Interpretation/theatre Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre (theory and practice) Theatre as metaphor Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Performance Studies Theatre

		De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Pineau 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Fitzpatrick 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Goodman 2000 Giardinelli 2001 Gray 2001 McKenzie 2001 Scalmer 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Bleeker 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Taviani 2005 Radin 2006 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007 Sodhi 2008	Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science Education Theatre research Shakespearean Studies Political Science Theatre/Gender Studies Political Science Political Activism Performance Theory Political Activism Theatre theory/history Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre Anthropology Theatre practice Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Performance training Public Policy Public Administration	Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Dramaturgy Auditing Theatre/Performativity Auditing Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre Theatre practice Theatre practice Theatre practice Theatre Accounting practices Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Economics Auditing/Accountability
Goal-oriented/end-determined	‘The key concept [for performance-based regulation] is regulating for results’ (May 2008). The ends determine the means (Balu 1989: 271).	Taylor 1911 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Blau 1983, 1989 Boyett & Conn 1988 Williams 1998 Meadmore et al 2004 Noble 2005 Durant et al 2006 Radin 2006 Urban 2008 May 2008 TIS 2008 Ausport 2008	Scientific Management Anthropology Theatre theory/practice Organizational Theory Organizational Theory Education Mental Health Human Resources/Motivation Public Administration Business Public Administration Sports Performance Sports Performance	Engineering Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre Auditing Auditing Performativity (Butler) Theatre Goal Setting/Auditing Accounting practice Accounting/Auditing/Economics Auditing Physiology/Human Capacity Human Capacity/Social participation

		Reiger & Dempsey 2008 Reuters 2008 Halloran 2008	Health Sociology Sports journalism High Performance	Performativity/Theatre/Sport Sport Sport/Human capacity
Strategic	Performances 'are a living social activity, by necessity assertive, strategic and not fully predictable' (Schieffelin 1998: 198).	K. Burke 1945 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Brecht 1964 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Skinner 1971 Pocock 1973 Kapferer 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Boyett & Conn 1988 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Honig 1992 Fuoss 1993 Pineau 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Worthen 1998 Lawton 1998 Kulynych 1998 Williams 1998 Papa 1999 Fitzpatrick 1999 MacGowan 2000 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002 Bleeker 2005 Taviani 2005 Giesen 2005	Rhetoric/Social Action Anthropology Theatre theory and practice Sociology Political philosophy Political Theory Anthropology Anthropology Performance Art Organizational Theory Anthropology Feminist Studies Political theory Political Activism Education Theatre research Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism English/Theatre/Dance Politics Political theory Organizational Theory Political Theatre Shakespearean Studies Anthropology Political Activism Political Activism Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre practice Political theory	Literature/Theatre/Communication Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Act Theory (Austin) Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Process (Turner) Theatre Auditing Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies Austin/Speech Act theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Performance Studies Honig/Butler Auditing Theatre Theatre/Dramaturgy Language theory/Social construction Theatre Theatre Theatre practice Theatre Theatre as metaphor

		Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Halloran 2008 Focus 2008 Sports Dietitians Australia 2008	Public Administration Sports journalism Sports journalism Sport Performance	Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Sport/Human capacity t Sport/Human capacity Health /Human capacity
Designed/expected to meet a standard (either explicit or implicit): subject to expectations	Performance involves assessment, measurement, judgment, accountability: what is being performed is an image of perfection in the head (Blau 1989: 265);	E. Burke (1729-1797) Taylor 1911 Hymes 1975 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 New Republic 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 Butler 1990, 1993 Sartori 1991 Lijphart 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Welsh & Cassquero 1995 Myers 1995 Schachter 1995 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Sadono 1999 Greene 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Barrett 2001, 2002 Giardinelli 2001 Schmidt 2002 Dobell 2003 Hamilton 2005 Burke & Haynes 2005	Politics Scientific Management Folk practices Political Science Politics Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Ethnology Gender/Power Gender Studies Political Sociology Comparative Politics Theatre research Political Science Political Science Citizenship theory Public Administration Dance Education Social Policy Political Science Public Administration Political Science Comparative Politics Political Science Comparative Politics Public Administration	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Engineering Language competence (Chomsky) Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Political Science Theatre Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Accounting practices Auditing Auditing Accounting practices Democratic Theory/Accountability Accounting practices

		Mackenzie 2005 Wallace Ingraham 2005 West 2005 Brenton 2005 Radin 2006 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Tilbury 2006 Reed et al 2006 Roche 2006 Durant et al 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Mallard 2007 Urban 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008 Andrews et al 2008 Bourdeaux & Chikoto 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008 Cox 2008 TIS 2008	Computer technology Public Administration Digital Government Political Science Public Administration Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration Public Administration Performance training Human Resources/Motivation Public Policy Public Administration Consumer Politics Business Public Administration Political Theory Public Management Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education Sport journalism Human Performance	Performativity (Butler) Accounting practices Technology/mechanical capacity Accounting practices Accounting practices Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Evaluation/Auditing Theatre Goal setting/auditing Economics Auditing Product Evaluation Accounting/Auditing/Economics Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Sport Physiology/Human Capacity
Purposeful	There is in any performance the universal question, spoken or unspoken, of ' what are we performing for? ' (Blau 1989: 263), which determines the means and content of the performance (258, 271). 'There is no performance without performance' (MacAloon 1984: 9).	E. Burke (1729-1797) Taylor 1911 K. Burke 1945 Austin 1955 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Singer 1959 Brecht 1964 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967,	Politics Scientific Management Rhetoric/Social Action Speech Act Theory Anthropology Anthropology Theatre theory and practice Sociology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Engineering Literature/Theatre/Communication Language theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Symbolic Action Theatre Theatre as metaphor

	1971 Sandifer 1971 Poirier 1971 Pocock 1973 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Kapferer 1984 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Sartori 1991 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Dyer 1992 Kershaw 1992 Benton 1993 De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Taylor & Felton 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Pineau 1994 Aiges 1995 Hughes 1996 States 1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Hinckley 1998 Kulynych 1998	Readers Theatre Literature Political Theory Folk practices Folklore research Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance Analysis Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Anthropology Performance Art Ethnology Political Sociology Anthropology Feminist Studies Popular Entertainment Social Change/Community Performance Ethics Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science Organizational Theory Theatre research Education Music Performance Art Theatre practice Theatre history/practice Subjectivity Political Science Music Education Political theory	Oral Interpretation/theatre Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre Anthropology (Scheffelin) Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies Popular Culture Theatre Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Systems Theory Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre as metaphor Music performance Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Butler) Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre Honig/Butler
--	--	--	---

		Sanders 1999 Greene 1999 Lawton 1998 Papa 1999 Warren 1999 Madison 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Godard 2000 Guss 2000 MacGowan 2000 Giardinelli 2001 Dolan 2001 McKenzie 2001 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Meadmore et al 2004 Mackenzie 2005 Bleeker 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Taviani 2005 Giesen 2005 West 2005 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007 Urban 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008	Writing as performance Social Policy Politics Political Theatre Education Performance Studies Anthropology Political Science Translation Cultural performance Anthropology Political Science Theatre Education Performance Theory Political Activism Political Activism Theatre theory/history Education Computer technology Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre Anthropology Theatre practice Political theory Digital government Identity politics/journalism Performance training Public Policy Business Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration	Queer Theory/Theatre as metaphor Democratic Theory/Accountability Performance Studies Theatre Performativity (Butler) Communication Anthropology (Herzfeld) Auditing Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Anthropology Language theory/Social construction Auditing Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre Theatre Theatre practice Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre practice Theatre practice Theatre Theatre as metaphor Technology/mechanical capacity Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Economics Accounting/Auditing/Economics Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing
--	--	---	---	--

		McKinsey 2008 Chapple 2008	Education Performance Art	Auditing Theatre
A form of challenge	‘[A]lmost any contemporary performance project [involves] challenges of gender, race, and ethnicity, to name only some of the most visible’ (Carlson 1996: 7). All ‘performance is a mode of power [which] challenges forth the world to perform – or else’ (McKenzie 2001: 25)	Reinelt & Roach 1992 Phelan 1993 Carlson 1996/2004 McKenzie 2001	Theatre research Representation/visibility Theatre theory/history/practice Performance Theory	Theatre/Anthropology Theatre Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology is site specific and context dependent
Contextualised	Performance is site-specific appearance (Blau 1989: 271). ‘Performance has no existence or meaning per se – it must refer to a specific application ... what is meant is ... effectiveness in a given task’ (Borovits & Neumann 1979: 3)	K. Burke 1945 Austin 1955 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Singer 1959 Poirier 1971 Burns 1972 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Long 1974 Ben-Amos 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Borovits & Neumann 1979 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Brenneis 1987 McLaren 1988 Calkowski 1991 De Marinis 1993 Curtin 1994 Ward 1994 Aiges 1995	Rhetoric/Social Action Speech Act Theory Anthropology Anthropology Literature Sociology of theatre Performance Studies Oral interpretation Folklore research Ethnography Oral Interpretation Technology/mechanical capacity Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Ethnology Education Anthropology Semiotic analysis Education African theatre	Literature/Theatre/Communication Language theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Symbolic Action Oral Communication Theatre/Goffman Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Goffman/Burke Sociolinguistics/Hymes Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Information Technology/Systems Theory Theatre Theatre as metaphor Anthropology (Schieffelin) Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Music performance

		Hughes 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Fleche 1997 Worthen 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 McKenzie 2001 Street 2004 Clarke & Chenoweth 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Music Performance Art Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice Subjectivity Psychology/Autism English/Theatre/Dance Performance Studies Performance Theory Political Representation Politics Public Administration Health Sociology	Theatre Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Butler) Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Public Policy Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Performativity/Theatre/Sport
Contingent	Any performance is inherently a contingent process because: - others may not see what we intend - others may see what we do not intend - it is interactive and relational and therefore fundamentally risky (Schieffelin 1998: 197-8): '[t]o agree to perform is to agree to take a chance' (MacAloon 1984: 9). Not all story-telling 'breaks through into performance' (Hymes 1975). The performer has to make a decision to take responsibility for the telling. Time is also contingent: 'it is the visitor who creates the duration time of the performance, which lasts as long as s/he remains ... spectating' (States 1996: 17).	Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Hymes 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 MacAloon 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Fuoss 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994 Curtin 1994 Hughes 1996 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Fleche 1997 Pollock 1998 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000	Anthropology Sociology Folk practices Oral interpretation Anthropology Anthropology Political Activism Theatre research African theatre Education Performance Art Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice Subjectivity Psychology/Autism Writing Anthropology	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Language competence (Chomsky) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre as metaphor Process (Turner) Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Butler) Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Performance art Anthropology (Herzfeld)

		MacGowan 2000 McKenzie 2001 Alexander 2003, 2005 West 2005 Clarke & Chenoweth 2006 Andrews et al 2008 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Anthropology Performance Theory Cultural Sociology Digital government Politics Public Administration Public Administration	Language theory/Social construction Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Technology/mechanical capacity Public Policy Auditing Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Risky	Performances may fail because they depend on interaction with an audience; others may not see what we intend; others may see what we do not intend; it is interactive and relational and therefore fundamentally risky (Schieffelin 1998: 197-8). Performances 'are a living social activity, by necessity assertive, strategic and not fully predictable' (Schieffelin 1998: 198); '[t]o agree to perform is to agree to take a chance' (MacAloon 1984: 9).	E. Burke (1729-1797) Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Arendt 1958, 1963 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Calkowski 1991 Kershaw 1992 Crease 1993, 2003 Fuoss 1993 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Hinckley 1998 Langellier 1999 Erickson 2000 Dolan 2001 Alexander 2003, 2005 Hughes-Freeland 2004	Politics Anthropology Political Philosophy Sociology Performance analysis Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Anthropology Performance Art Anthropology Social Change/Community Philosophy of science Political Activism Representation/Visibility Theatre research Literature Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Music Education Personal Narrative Political communication Theatre Education Cultural Sociology Anthropology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Philosophy/Speech Act Theory Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre Theatre as metaphor Process (Turner) Theatre Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Austin/Butler/Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Rhetoric Theatre Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/

		Street 2004 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Thompson 2006 Growden 2008 Prichard 2008 Pandaram 2008 Hanlon 2008	Political Representation Gender/Subjectivity Drama Education Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism	Communication Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butler/Austin) Theatre Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity
Ephemeral	‘[P]erformances are ephemeral. They create their effects and then are gone ... they exist only in the present’ (Schieffelin 1998: 198).	Singer 1959 Fine & Speer 1977 Passow & Strauss 1981 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Dolan 1993 De Marinis 1993 Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Worthen 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Khee 2004	Anthropology Oral interpretation Performance analysis Anthropology Theatre Studies Semiotic analysis Education Theatre research Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice English/Theatre/Dance Performance Studies Performance Studies	Symbolic Action Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre/Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Performativity (Austin)/Theatre and is visible/about visibility
About visibility	Performance is about appearance/showing. The performer cannot escape appearance or ‘the splitting infinitives of representation’ ‘appearance is universal to performance’ (Blau 1989: 259), and performance ‘reveals something ... about the actor and the situation’ (Schieffelin 1998) although others may not see what we intend; others may see what we do not intend	K. Burke 1945 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988	Rhetoric/Social Action Anthropology Sociology Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Performance Art Ethnology Gender/Power Education	Literature/Theatre/Communication Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner)

	(Schieffelin 1998: 197-8); ‘the performance takes place in order to be looked upon’ (Bell 1996: 93). Performance constitutes ‘the performing self as an object for itself as well as for others’ (Bauman 1992: 48). How this works out depends on the constituting power of the audience and is therefore susceptible to dominant discourses and structural positions outside the control of the performer (Langellier 1999: 133). Performance is ‘all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers’ (Goffman 1959: 22). It is ‘of the nature of performance to be seen’ (Blau 1989: 255) ... ‘the boundary of performance is a specular boundary’ (256).	Martin 1989 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Bauman 1992 Artnews 1993 Benton 1993 De Marinis 1993 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Watrous 1994 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Bell 1996 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Fleche 1997 Isbell 1998 Lawton 1998 Fusco 1998 Sadono 1999 Kochhar-Lingren 1999 Fraser 1999 Langellier 1999 Schauble 2000 Erickson 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Giardinelli 2001	Dance theory Gender Studies Anthropology Feminist Studies Ethnography Theatre Performance Ethics Semiotic analysis Representation/Visibility Theatre Research Education Education Theatre practice Literature Political Sociology Gender practices/history Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice Psychology/Autism Anthropology Politics Performance Art Dance Education Law Social Science Personal Narrative Journalism Political communication Anthropology Political Science Political Science	Performing arts/performativity Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies Theatre as metaphor Theatre Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Austin/Butler/Theatre Foucault/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Anthropology/Performance Studies Performance Studies Theatre Theatre Democratic Theory/Accountability Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor/accountability Rhetoric Anthropology (Herzfeld) Auditing Auditing
--	--	---	--	---

		Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002 Paget 2002 Mackinley 2003 Walker 2003 Street 2004 Tang 2005 Bleeker 2005 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Political Activism Political Activism Media Studies Indigenous Australia Studies Performance/cultural theory Political Representation Ethnomusicology Ethnomusicology Persuasion Performance training Public Policy Public Administration	Theatre Theatre Theatre Education Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Anthropology/Theatre Theatre practice Theatre Economics Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
What remains/is made invisible		McLaren 1988 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Curtin 1994	Education Representation Theatre research Education	Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism
A form of 'presencing' (making present); presentational	Performance is action in 'the "here and now"' (Alexander 2005); 'a performance which one goes to see again is not the same as yesterday's' (Schieffelin 1998: 199). Performance 'materializes performativity' (Langellier 1999: 129). Performance is 'all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers' (Goffman 1959: 22). Performances 'are presentational in the sense that they aim at being original, disclosive, and revelatory rather	E. Burke (1729-1797) Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 K. Burke 1945 Arendt 1958, 1963 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Parry 1967 Roloff 1973 Hymes 1975 Bacon 1975 Bourdieu 1990 Laclau 1989 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 De Man 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Bartky 1988	Politics Dramatic literature Rhetoric/Social Action Political Philosophy Sociology Political theory Oral interpretation Folk practices Oral interpretation Ethnography/Sociology Political theory Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance analysis Language Anthropology Gender/Power	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Oral performance Literature/Theatre/Communication Philosophy/Speech Act Theory Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Goffman/Burke Language competence (Chomsky) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Speech Act Theory Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Austin/Rhetoric/Semiotics Process (Turner) Foucault than imitative or echoing [otherwise they] would be superfluous' (Crease 2003: 268). 'The body believes in what it plays at: it weeps if it mimes grief. It does not represent what it performs, it does not memorize the past, it enacts the past, bringing it back to life' (Bourdieu 1990: 73)	Butler 1990, 1993 Calkowski 1991 Dyer 1992 Phelan 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Worthen 1998 Papa 1999 Langellier 1999 Lee 1999 Kane 2000 MacGowan 2000 Dolan 2001 Gray 2001 Crane 2002 Alexander 2003, 2005 Street 2004 Buckner 2004 Meadmore et al 2004 Noble 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Thompson 2006 Shand 2006	Gender Studies Anthropology Popular Entertainment Representation/Visibility Philosophy of Science Theatre research African theatre Gender practices/history Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Speech Communication Subjectivity English/Theatre/Dance Political Theatre Personal Narrative Literary Studies Personal Narrative Anthropology Theatre Studies Political Activism Theatre History Cultural Sociology Political representation Cultural politics Education Mental Health Theatre Anthropology Drama Education Identity politics/journalism	Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Popular Culture Theatre/performance art Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Oral Interpretation Speech Act Theory/Theatre Language Theory/Social Construction Theatre Theatre Theatre Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Anthropology Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre practice Theatre Performativity (Butlerian)

A form of objectification	Performance constitutes 'the performing self as an object for itself as well as for others'	MacAloon 1984 Bartky 1988 Laclau 1989	Anthropology Gender/Power Political theory	Theatre as metaphor Foucault Speech act theory/sociolinguistics

	(1992: 48). How this works out depends on the constituting power of the audience and is therefore susceptible to dominant discourses and structural positions outside the control of the performer (Langellier 1999: 133). 'The essentially performative character of naming is the precondition of all hegemony and politics' (Laclau 1989: xiv).	Bauman 1992 Benton 1993 Phelan 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Curtin 1994 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Langellier 1999 Sadono 1999 Cheng 2004 Bleeker 2005 Radin 2006 USC 2008 TIS	Ethnography Performance Ethics Representation/Visibility Philosophy of Science Education Subjectivity Personal Narrative Dance Education Performance Studies Ethnomusicology Persuasion Public Administration Sport Performance Human Sports Performance	Theatre as metaphor Communication/Ethnography Theatre/performance art Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre Theatre practice Accounting practices Sport/Physiology/Human capacity Physiology/Human Capacity
Semiotic/Signifying		Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 States 1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Fleche 1997 Fitzpatrick 1999 Godard 2000 MacGowan 2000 Walker 2003	Performance Studies Performance analysis Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science Theatre practice Theatre history/practice Subjectivity Psychology/Autism Shakespearean Studies Translation Anthropology Performance/cultural theory	Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Butler) Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Dramaturgy Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Language theory/Social construction Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler
Representational	The performer cannot escape appearance or 'the splitting infinitives of representation' (Blau 1989: 259)	Blau 1983, 1989 Crease 1993, 2003 Steadman 1992 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Fleche 1997 Cheng 2004	Theatre theory/practice Philosophy of Science African theatre & politics Theatre research Theatre history/practice Psychology/Autism Performance Studies	Theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Semiotics Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre

Not representation/anti-representation		Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002	Theatre research	Theatre/Performance Theory and practice
Occurs within a social space	‘Through performance, meanings are formulated in a social rather than a cognitive space’ (Schieffelin 1985: 707) i.e. performances are social rather than psychological. Performance is ‘all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers’ (Goffman 1959: 22)	Austin 1955 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Singer 1959 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Burns 1972 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 Butler 1990, 1993 Dyer 1992 Jackson 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Benton 1993 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Curtin 1994 Ward 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Aiges 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Lee 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos	Speech Act Theory Anthropology Anthropology Sociology Sociology of theatre Folk practices Folklore research Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance Studies Anthropology Ethnology Gender Studies Popular Entertainment Ethnography Gender Studies Performance Ethics Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Education African theatre Theatre research Music Literature Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Subjectivity Literary Studies Anthropology	Language theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Symbolic Action Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Goffman Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Popular Culture Theatre Performativity (Butler) Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Music performance Austin/Butler/Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butler) Oral Interpretation Anthropology (Herzfeld)

		2000 Guss 2000 Gray 2001 McKenzie 2001 Scalmer 2002 Hughes-Freeland 2004 Street 2004 Mackenzie 2005 Giesen 2005 Reed et al 2006 Shand 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Cultural performance Political Activism Performance Theory Political Activism Anthropology Political Representation Computer technology Political theory Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Public Administration	Anthropology Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor Evaluation/auditing Performativity (Butlerian) Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Noticeable when it fails	Successful performance can be taken for granted	E. Burke (1729-1797) Taylor 1911 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Hymes 1975 MacAloon 1984 States 1996 Sadono 1999 Erickson 2000 Street 2004 Bleeker 2005 Taviani 2005 Wallace-Ingraham 2005 Roche 2006	Politics Scientific Management Sociology Folk practices Anthropology Theatre practice Dance Education Political communication Political Representation Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre practice Public Administration Performance training	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Engineering Theatre as metaphor Language competence (Chomsky) Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Rhetoric Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre practice Theatre Accounting practices Theatre and is conventional
Rule or convention governed (even when transgressive)	The test of a successful performance is how well a convention has been observed (even in the breaking). Unless conventions are acknowledged, audiences cannot constitute a public action as a performance	Burns 1972 Blau 1983, 1989 Bourdieu 1990 Kershaw 1992 Crease 1993, 2003 Ward 1994 Godard 2000	Sociology of theatre Theatre theory and practice Ethnography/Sociology Social Change/Community Philosophy of Science African theatre Translation	Theatre/Goffman Theatre Speech Act Theory Theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre Linguistics/Austin/Schechner

	(Godard 2000). '[A] performance must somehow connect with [it's] audience's ideology or ideologies' even if it wants to change them (Kershaw 1992: 21). Rhetorical conventions allow the actors 'to conjure up a fictitious world' while authenticating conventions 'model' social conventions in use at a specific time ... place and milieu', connecting the play to its 'world of human action' (Burns 1972: 31-2)	Ahmed 2002 Walker 2003 Khee 2004	Political History Performance/cultural theory Performance Studies	Civility Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Performativity (Austin)/Theatre
Reiterative	There is no performance which is non-mimetic since what is being performed is an image of perfection in the head (Blau 1989: 265); a performance is experienced as a 'recurrence' (258). Repetition is fundamental to performance; it is through reiteration that one constructs reality (Butler 1993).	Pocock 1973 Hymes 1975 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Anderson 1998 Hinckley 1998 Worthen 1998 Sadono 1999 Sanders 1999 Langellier 1999	Political Theory Folk practices Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Gender Studies Philosophy of Science Theatre research Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Speech Communication Feminist/Critical Sociology Music Education English/Theatre/Dance Dance Education Writing as performance Personal Narrative	Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler)/Communicative Ethics (Habermas) Theatre Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Queer Theory/Theatre as metaphor Ethnography/Performativity (Butler)

		Madison 1999 Godard 2000 Guss 2000 MacGowan 2000 Harrop 2004, 2007 Mackenzie 2005 Thompson 2006 Shand 2006	Performance Studies Translation Cultural performance Anthropology Folk Theatre Computer Technology Drama Education Identity politics/journalism	Communication Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Anthropology Language theory/Social construction Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Butler) Theatre Performativity (Butlerian)
Citational	Performance cites its social, cultural, political and experiential context; it may require ‘an ethics’ which takes account of its appropriations of people’s lives (Benton 1993). (It is not however merely the citation of a pre-existing text) (Worthen 1998).	Fine & Speer 1977 Robinson 1987 McLaren 1988 Butler 1990, 1993 Benton 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Fleche 1997 Worthen 1998 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Langellier 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Paget 2002 Cheng 2004	Oral Interpretation Performance Art Education Gender Studies Performance Ethics Theatre research Psychology/Autism English/Theatre/Dance Subjectivity Personal Narrative Anthropology Media Studies Performance Studies	Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre Theatre
Framed as ‘special’/ ‘announced’	Performance is a ‘frame’ which ‘encourages and intensifies a kind of decontextualization’ (Langellier 1999: 134).	Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Stoeltje 1978 Blau 1983, 1989 Kershaw 1992 De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003	Sociology Performance Studies Ethnography Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Ethnology Theatre theory/practice Social Change/Community Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science	Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Anthropology (Turner) Theatre Theatre Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics

		States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Langellier 1999 Cheng 2004 Barba & Savarese 2005	Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Personal Narrative Performance Studies Theatre Anthropology	Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre practice
Recognized as performance	‘[P]erformances are staged in front of an audience suitably prepared to recognise phenomena in it’ (Crease 2003: 268)	Crease 1993, 2003 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Paget 2002	Philosophy of Science Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Theatre research Media Studies	Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre
Subject to expectations	What is being performed is an image of perfection in the head (Blau 1989: 265);	E. Burke (1729-1797) Taylor 1911 Hymes 1975 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 New Republic 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 Butler 1990, 1993 Sartori 1991 Lijphart 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Welsh & Cassquero 1995 Myers 1995 Schachter 1995 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Sadono 1999 Greene 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003	Politics Scientific Management Folk practices Political Science Politics Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Ethnology Gender/Power Gender Studies Political Sociology Comparative Politics Theatre research Political Science Political Science Citizenship theory Public Administration Dance Education Social Policy Political Science	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Engineering Language competence (Chomsky) Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Political Science Theatre Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing

		Barrett 2001, 2002 Giardinelli 2001 Schmidt 2002 Dobell 2003 Hamilton 2005 Burke & Haynes 2005 Mackenzie 2005 Wallace Ingraham 2005 West 2005 Brenton 2005 Radin 2006 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Tilbury 2006 Reed et al 2006 Roche 2006 Durant et al 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Mallard 2007 Urban 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008 Andrews et al 2008 Bourdeaux & Chikoto 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008 Cox 2008 TIS 2008	Public Administration Political Science Comparative Politics Political Science Comparative Politics Public Administration Computer technology Public Administration Digital Government Political Science Public Administration Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration Public Administration Performance training Human Resources/Motivation Public Policy Public Administration Consumer Politics Business Public Administration Political Theory Public Management Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education Sport journalism Human Performance	Accounting practices Auditing Auditing Accounting practices Democratic Theory/Accountability Accounting practices Performativity (Butler) Accounting practices Technology/mechanical capacity Democratic Theory/Accountability Accounting practices Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Evaluation/Auditing Theatre Goal setting/auditing Economics Auditing Product Evaluation Economics Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Sport Physiology/Human Capacity
Subject to regulation	Well-behaved audiences ensure peaceful performances; performance is about 'controlled	Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977,	Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance Studies	Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman)

	expressivity' (Schieffelin 1998: 197; Hinckley 1998)	1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 Artnews 1993 Curtin 1994 Bell 1996 Hinckley 1998 Hawes 1998 Sadono 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Barrett 2001, 2002 Giardinelli 2001 Cheng 2004 Burke & Haynes 2005 Mackenzie 2005 West 2005 Brenton 2005 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Andrews et al 2008 Bourdeaux & Chikoto 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Anthropology Ethnology Gender/Power Theatre Education Political Sociology Music Education Conversation Dance Education Political Science Public Administration Political Science Performance Studies Public Administration Computer Technology Digital government Political Science Identity politics/journalism Performance training Public Policy Public Administration Public Administration Public Management Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education Health Sociology	Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Theatre Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Foucault/Postmodernism Theatre Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Theatre Auditing Accounting practices Auditing Theatre Accounting practices Performativity (Butler) Technology/mechanical capacity Democratic Theory/Accountability Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Economics Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Performativity/Theatre/Sport and entails a relationship with an audience/spectator/observer
A relationship with an audience/spectator (either the self or others)	All performances move between expectancy and observance (Blau 1989: 264). Because	E. Burke (1729-1797) Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971	Politics Sociology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Theatre as metaphor

(A KEY ISSUE OF PERFORMANCE – who is watching)	repetition is fundamental to performance, all who ‘attend upon’ the performance are spectators of a sort (260). ‘The process of performance ... turns crucially on its interactive edge, and hence on the nature of the relationship between ‘performers’ and others’ (Schieffelin 1998: 2000). Performance entails a variety of relationships between performers and spectators (204). No audience, no performance (Goffman 1986: 125). Performance is ‘cultural behavior for which a person assumes responsibility to an audience’ (Hymes 1975: 18). ‘[A]ny performance ... is incomplete until it is shared’ (Goodman 2000: 294). Performance is ‘all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers’ (Goffman 1959: 22). ‘Intention and attention are indissolubly bound’ in performance (MacAloon 1984: 10). Performances ‘are addressed to specific communities’ (Crease 1993:	Campbell 1971 Sandifer 1971 Burns 1972 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 Kapferer 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Roach 1985, 1995, 1996 Pelias & VanOosting 1987 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 Dyer 1992 Kershaw 1992 Benton 1993 De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Curtin 1994 Ward 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Aiges 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Hinckley 1998	Communication Aesthetics Readers Theatre Sociology of theatre Folk practices Folklore research Ethnography Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance Performance analysis Theatre Anthropology Anthropology Anthropology Performance studies Oral Communication Performance Art Ethnology Gender/Power Popular Entertainment Oppositional theatre Performance Ethics Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Education African theatre Theatre research Music Literature Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Music Education	Oral communication Oral interpretation/theatre Theatre/Goffman Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Oral Communication Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre (theory and practice) Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Process (Turner) Anthropology Communication Aesthetics Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Popular Culture Theatre Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Music performance Austin/Butler/Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre
---	--	--	---	---

	96). Performance constitutes ‘the performing self as an object for itself as well as for others’ (Bauman 1992: 48). How this works out depends on the constituting power of the audience and is therefore susceptible to dominant discourses and structural positions outside the control of the performer (Langellier 1999: 133). However, ‘who exactly is doing the discerning – and whether inside or outside – is so critical an issue in performance that the problem itself can be considered a universal’ (Blau 1989: 251).	Langellier 1999 Warren 1999 Fitzpatrick 1999 Lawton 1999 Lee 1999 Madison 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Goodman 2000 Giardinelli 2001 Dolan 2001 Paget 2002 Hughes-Freeland 2004 Street 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Cheng 2004 Bleeker 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Taviani 2005 Wallace Ingraham 2005 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Waterford 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Personal Narrative Education Shakespearean Studies Literary Studies Literary Studies Performance Studies Political Science Theatre/Gender Studies Political Science Theatre Studies Media Studies Anthropology Political Representation Folk Theatre Performance Studies Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre Anthropology Theatre practice Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Performance training Public Policy Public Administration	Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Dramaturgy Theatre Oral Interpretation Communication Auditing Theatre/Performativity Auditing Theatre Theatre Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/Communication Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Theatre Theatre practice Theatre practice Theatre Accounting practices Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Economics Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre which may be:
Interactive	‘The process of performance ... turns crucially on its interactive edge, and hence on the nature of the relationship between ‘performers’ and others’ (Schieffelin 1998: 2000); ‘[S]omething is “essentially performative” when the spectator and the work interact’	Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Campbell 1971 Burns 1972 Pocock 1973 Ben-Amos 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992	Anthropology Sociology Communication Aesthetics Sociology of theatre Political Theory Folklore Research Ethnography	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Theatre/Goffman Speech Act Theory (Austin) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Theatre as metaphor

	(States 1996: 12). Performance occurs on two levels simultaneously: 'interaction between performers and spectators and interaction between characters' (Burns 1972: 31).	Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Calkowski 1991 Honig 1992 Fuoss 1993 Stern & Henderson 1993 De Marinis 1993 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Ward 1994 Jarmon 1996 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Orbuch 1997 Hinckley 1998 Hawes 1998 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Lee 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Dolan 2001 McKenzie 2001 Street 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Chapple 2008	Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance analysis Anthropology Performance Art Ethnology Anthropology Political theory Political Activism Performance Studies Semiotic analysis Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms African theatre Conversation Analysis Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Social accountability Music Education Conversation Anthropology Literary Studies Anthropology Theatre Studies Performance Theory Political Representation Folk Theatre Gender/Subjectivity Performance Art	Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Austin/Speech Act theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Anthropology/Theatre/Schechner Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre Performance Studies/Performativity Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Sociology (Goffman/Symbolic Interaction) Theatre Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/Communication Oral Interpretation Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Butler/Austin) Theatre
Negotiated	Different publics produce	Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967,	Sociology	Theatre as metaphor

	different kinds of negotiation. Performance is 'a site of cultural negotiation' (Carlson 2004: 214)	1971 Campbell 1971 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Abrahams 1976 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Honig 1992, 1993 Fuoss 1993 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Bell 1996 Hawes 1998 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 McKenzie 2001 Tang 2005 Bleeker 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Durant et al 2006	Communication Aesthetics Ethnography Folklore/Literature Anthropology Performance Art Political theory Political Activism Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Political Sociology Conversation Anthropology Performance Theory Ethnomusicology Ethnomusicology Persuasion Gender/Subjectivity Human Resources/Motivation	Oral Communication Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Process (Turner) Theatre Austin/Speech Act theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Foucault/Postmodernism Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre/organizational theory/technology Anthropology/Theatre Theatre practice Performativity (Butler/Austin) Goal Setting/auditing
Transactional	'[P]erformance can be most usefully described as an ideological transaction between a company of performers and the community of their audience ... performance is 'about' the transaction of meaning' (Kershaw 1992: 16).	Kershaw 1992 Paget 2002	Social Change/Community Media Studies	Theatre Theatre
Participatory	'The focus on performance allows us to understand situations interactively, not in terms of communication models, but in terms of participatory ones' (Hughes-Freeland 1998: 15).	Campbell 1971 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 Kapferer 1984 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988	Communication Aesthetics Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance analysis Theatre Anthropology Ethnology Gender/Power	Oral Communication Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Theatre (theory and practice) Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault

		Calkowski 1991 Dyer 1992 Honig 1992 Ward 1994 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Kulynych 1998 Lee 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Guss 2000 Dolan 2001 Roms 2004	Anthropology Popular Entertainment Political theory African theatre Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Anthropology Political theory Literary Studies Anthropology Cultural performance Theatre Studies Political theatre	Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Popular Culture Austin/Speech Act theory Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/Communication Honig/Butler Oral Interpretation Anthropology (Herzfeld) Anthropology Theatre Theatre
Co-operative	‘The actor’s trained ‘as if’ reflex is matched by a sophisticated audience’s ‘what if’ reflex, in a mutual seeking of understanding’ (Paget 2002).	Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Passow & Strauss 1981 Benneis 1987 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Watrous 1994 States 1996 Rice & Sumberg 1998 Paget 2002	Sociology Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Performance analysis Ethnology Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Theatre practice Theatre practice Political Science Media Studies	Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Auditing Theatre
Coercive	‘Whatever performances do, or are meant to do, they do by creating the conditions for, and by coercing the participants into paying attention’ (MacAloon 1984: 10); ‘performance is a “manipulation” of imagery’ (States 1996: 11). ‘Performing a	Bauman 1976, 1986, 1992 MacAloon 1984 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988 Butler 1990, 1993 Kershaw 1992 Foster-Dixon 1993 Benton 1993	Ethnography Anthropology Gender/Power Education Gender Studies Social Change/Community Gender Studies Performance Ethics	Theatre as metaphor Theatre as metaphor Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech Act Theory Theatre Performativity (Butler) Communication/Ethnography

	‘situation’ is imposing your definition of reality onto others’ (Hajer & Uttermark 2008: 7). Performers have ‘ideological designs on their audiences’ (Kershaw 1992: 21).	Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 States 1996 Sadono 1999 Warren 1999 Papa 1999 Bleeker 2005 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Education Theatre research Literature Theatre practice Dance Education Education Political Theatre Ethnomusicology Persuasion Public Administration	Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Austin/Butler/Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre practice Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Mediated	Performance is mediated even when it creates the illusion of being unmediated (Blau 1989); mediated performance can be ‘just as effective a focal point for the gathering of a social group as live performance’ (Auslander 1999: 55)	Blau 1983, 1989 Butler 1990, 1993 Aiges 1995 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Auslander 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Goodman 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Scalmer 2002 Street 2004 Cheng 2004 Taviani 2005 Reed et al 2006	Theatre theory/practice Gender Studies Music Subjectivity Performance Studies Performance Studies Theatre/Gender Studies Anthropology Political Activism Political Representation Performance Studies Theatre practice Public Administration	Theatre Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Music performance Performativity (Butler) Theatre theory Theatre Theatre/Performativity Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre Evaluation/auditing
A mode of communication	‘to engage in communication is to create a work of art, an enactment, a performance’ (Rosenfeld, Hayes & Frentz 1976: 29)	Campbell 1971 Hymes 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Abrahams 1976 Rosenfeld, Hayes & Frentz 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 McLaren 1988 Kershaw 1992 De Marinis 1993 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993	Communication Aesthetics Folk practices Ethnography Folklore/Literature Communication Oral interpretation Education Social Change/Community Semiotic analysis Recognition/Circulation of	Oral Communication Language competence (Chomsky) Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere

		Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Ball 1995 Orbuch 1997 Fusco 1998 Pollock 1998 Madison 1999 Erickson 2000 MacGowan 2000	Cultural Forms Education Education Political philosophy Social accountability Performance Art Writing Performance Studies Political communication Anthropology	Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Sociology (Goffman/Symbolic Interaction) Theatre Theatre/performance art Communication Rhetoric Language theory/Social construction which is:
Affective		Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Poirier 1971 Long 1974 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Bacon 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 De Marinis 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Ball 1995 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Walker 2003 Barba & Savarese 2005 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Sociology Literature Oral interpretation Ethnography Oral interpretation Oral interpretation Semiotic analysis Philosophy of Science Political Philosophy Subjectivity Performance/cultural theory Theatre Anthropology Public Administration	Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Goffman/Burke Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Performativity (Butler) Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Theatre practice Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Integrative		Hymes 1975 Vaill 1989 Pineau 1994 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Williams 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Guss 2000	Folk practices Management Theory Education Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Organizational Theory Performance Studies Cultural performance	Language competence (Chomsky) Theatre as metaphor Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Auditing Theatre Anthropology

		Buckner 2004 Taviani 2005 Giesen 2005 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Cultural politics Theatre practice Political theory Public Administration	Anthropology Theatre Theatre as metaphor Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Inclusive	‘Performance is a very inclusive notion of action’ (Schechner 1977: 1).	Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Pelias & VanOostling 1987 McLaren 1988 Curtin 1994 Phelan & Lane 1998 Giesen 2005	Performance Studies Oral Communication Education Education Performance Studies Political theory	Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Communication Aesthetics Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Theatre as metaphor
Gives the illusion of inclusion		Phelan & Lane 1998 MacGowan 2000 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Performance Studies Anthropology Public Administration	Theatre Language theory/Social construction Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Possibly transformative (for either/both performer and audience)	Performance has the capacity to transform (but our understanding of this capacity is being lost through the current ‘galactic’ application of performance (Blau 270)	Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Arendt 1958, 1963 Poirier 1971 Pocock 1973 Roloff 1973 Hymes 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Blau 1983, 1989 Kapferer 1984 Dyer 1992 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Aiges 1995	Dramatic Literature Anthropology Political philosophy Literature Political Theory Oral interpretation Folk practices Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance analysis Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Popular Entertainment Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Theatre research Music	Oral performance Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Philosophy/Speech Act Theory Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Goffman/Burke Language competence (Chomsky) Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Popular Culture Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Music performance

		States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Worthen 1998 Langellier 1999 Papa 1999 Lee 1999 Madison 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 MacGowan 2000 Dolan 2001 McKenzie 2001 Street 2004 Giesen 2005 Noble 2005 Thompson 2006 Chapple 2008	Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism English/Theatre/Dance Personal Narrative Political Theatre Literary Studies Performance Studies Anthropology Anthropology Theatre Studies Performance Theory Political Representation Political theory Mental Health Drama Education Performance Art	Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Oral Interpretation Communication Anthropology (Herzfeld) Language theory/Social construction Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre Theatre
Pleasurable	Performance has a 'giddiness' which gives pleasure (Rothenberg & Valente 1997)	Blau 1983, 1989 Vaill 1989 Kershaw 1992 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Madison 1999	Theatre theory and practice Management Theory Social Change/Community Subjectivity Performance Studies	Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre Performativity (Butler) Communication
May be transgressive		Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Robinson 1987 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Honig 1992 Kershaw 1992 Jackson 1993 Fuoss 1993	Anthropology Sociology Performance Art Anthropology Feminist Studies Political theory Social Change/Community Ethnography Political Activism	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies Austin/Speech Act theory Theatre Theatre Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics

		Dolan 1993, 2001 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Isbell 1998 Kulynych 1998 Papa 1999 Stone 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 MacGowan 2000 McKenzie 2001 Friedman 2002 Scalmer 2002 Alexander 2003, 2005 Street 2004 Shand 2006 Mallard 2007	Theatre Studies Representation/Visibility Theatre research Theatre theory/history/practice Anthropology Political theory Political Theatre Education Anthropology Anthropology Performance Theory Cultural Theory Political Activism Cultural Sociology Political Representation Identity politics/journalism Consumer Politics	Theatre Theatre/performance art Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Anthropology/Performance Studies Honig/Butler Theatre Lyotard/Austin/Language Theory Anthropology (Herzfeld) Language theory/Social construction Theatre/organizational theory/technology Language Theatre Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butlerian) Product Evaluation
Or may be normative (reaffirming)	Performance has the potential to uphold societal arrangements as much as challenge and change them (McKenzie 2001: 30).	Marcuse 1955 Lyotard 1979 Butler 1993 McKenzie 2001	Critical Theory Knowledge/Postmodernity Gender/Power Performance Theory	Wittgenstein/Austin/Psychoanalysis Language theory/Austin Austin/Derrida Theatre/organizational theory/technology
It can be considered a form of behaviour:
A particular sub-set of behaviour	Performance is a particular class or subset of behaviour 'in which one or more persons assumes responsibility to an audience' (Hymes 1975)	Hymes 1975 Harrop 2004, 2007	Folk practices Folk Theatre	Language competence (Chomsky) Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner
Lies somewhere along a continuum of human activity between behaviour and action	Performance is part of 'the older philosophical conception of human activity as a continuum stretching from "behavior" – relatively routine, habitual, unselfconscious, even "natural"	Arendt 1958, 1963 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 MacAloon 1984 Kapferer 1984 Roach 1985, 1995, 1996	Political Philosophy Performance Studies Anthropology Anthropology Performance Studies	Philosophy/Speech Act theory Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Anthropology

	activity in which agency predominates over agent – to “action” (relatively spontaneous, atypical, self-conscious, creative activity in which agent predominates over agency’ (MacAloon 1984: 8). Performance ‘incorporates a whole field of human activity’ (Stern & Henderson 1993: 3).	Stern & Henderson 1993 States 1996 Lawton 1998	Performance Studies Theatre practice Politics	Anthropology/Theatre/Schechner Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Performance Studies
An act or action in public	Performance is ‘an ado’ (Blau 1989: 250); Performance is ‘all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers’ (Goffman 1959: 22). Performance ‘is an activity done by an individual or group in the presence of and for another individual or group’ (Schechner 2003: 22n10)	E. Burke (1729-1797) K. Burke 1945 Austin 1955 Arendt 1958, 1963 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Singer 1959 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Parry 1967 Poirier 1971 Skinner 1971 Burns 1972 Pocock 1973 Hymes 1975 Bacon 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Blau 1983, 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 Calkowski 1991	Politics Rhetoric/Social Action Speech Act Theory Political philosophy Anthropology Anthropology Sociology Political theory Literature Political philosophy Sociology of theatre Political Theory Folk practices Oral interpretation Folklore research Performance Studies Ethnography Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Ethnology Gender/Power Anthropology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Literature/Theatre/Communication Language Theory Philosophy/Speech Act Theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Symbolic Action Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Theatre/Goffman Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Sociolinguistics/Hymes Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre as metaphor Theatre Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory

	Case & Reinelt 1991 Stern & Henderson 1993 Fuoss 1993 Phelan 1993 Gaonkar & Povinelli 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Aiges 1995 Ball 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Huxley & Witts 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Kulynych 1998 Isbell 1998 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Lawton 1998 Sadono 1999 Fraser 1999 Kochhar-Lindgren 1999 Stone 1999 Schauble 2000 Erickson 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Guss 2000 MacGowan 2000 Dolan 2001 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002	Feminist Studies Performance Studies Political Activism Representation/Visibility Recognition/Circulation of Cultural Forms Theatre research Education Education Music Political philosophy Literature Gender practices/history Theatre practice Performance practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Psychology/Autism Political theory Anthropology Anthropology Politics Dance Education Social sciences Law Education Journalism Political communication Anthropology Cultural performance Anthropology Theatre Studies Political Activism Political Activism	Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Anthropology/Theatre/Schechner Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre/performance art Theatre/Austin/Public Sphere Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Music performance Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Austin/Butler/Theatre Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Performing arts Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Honig/Butler Anthropology/Performance Studies Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/Communication Performance Studies Theatre Performativity (Butler) Democratic Theory/Accountability Lyotard/Austin/Language Theory Theatre as metaphor/accountability Rhetoric Anthropology (Herzfeld) Anthropology Language theory/Social construction Theatre Theatre Theatre
--	---	---	---

		Ahmed 2002 Alexander 2003, 2005 Roms 2004 Tang 2005 Giesen 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Lynn 2006 Thompson 2006 Shand 2006 Barker 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Political History Cultural Sociology Political theatre Ethnomusicology Political theory Gender/Subjectivity Public Administration Drama Education Identity politics/journalism Politics Health Sociology	Civility Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Theatre Anthropology/Theatre Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butler/Austin) Auditing/accounting practices Theatre Performativity (Butlerian) Civility Performativity/Theatre/Sport
Perhaps the ‘natural’ way human beings express themselves and their culture	Homo performans ; performance becomes visible when theatre disappears (Goodman 2000): ‘there is a sense in which performance is an attribute of any behaviour, if the doer accepts or has imputed to him responsibility for being evaluated in regard to it’ (Hymes 1975: 18).	Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Burns 1972 Hymes 1975 Abrahams 1976 Blau 1983, 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Roach 1985, 1995, 1996 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Goodman 2000 Goldhill and Osborne 2001 Reinelt 2002 Harrop 2004, 2007	Anthropology Sociology Sociology of theatre Folk practices Folklore/Literature Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Performance Studies Anthropology Theatre/Gender Studies Ancient History/Political theory Theatre Folk Theatre	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Goffman Language competence (Chomsky) Oral Communication Theatre Process (Turner) Anthropology Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre/Performativity Theatre/Rhetoric Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner
Gestural	Performance is gestural – which may be political and transgression (Alexander 2005)	Fine & Speer 1977 Passow & Strauss 1981 Martin 1989 Aiges 1995 Bell 1996 Rothenberg & Valente 1997	Oral interpretation Performance analysis Dance theory Music Political Sociology Subjectivity	Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Performing arts/performativity Music performance Foucault/Postmodernism Performativity (Butler)

		Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Godard 2000 MacGowan 2000 Scalmer 2002 Walker 2003 Alexander 2003, 2005 Street 2004 Taviani 2005 Giesen 2005 Shand 2006	Anthropology Translation Anthropology Political Activism Performance/cultural theory Cultural Sociology Political Representation Theatre practice Political theory Identity politics/journalism	Anthropology (Herzfeld) Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Language theory/Social construction Theatre Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butlerian)
Dramatic		Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 K. Burke 1945 Turner 1957, 1974, 1984, 1988, 1990 Fuoss 1993 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002	Dramatic Literature Rhetoric/Social Action Anthropology Political Activism Political Activism Political Activism	Oral performance Literature/Theatre/Communication Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Theatre
May be utopian	Performance can provide an experience of utopia ‘in small incremental moments’ (Dolan 2001: 460)	MacAloon 1984 Dyer 1992 Carlson 2004/1996 Dolan 2001 Walker 2003	Anthropology Popular Entertainment Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre Studies Performance/cultural theory	Theatre as metaphor Popular Culture Theatre Theatre Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler
Dramatized oral presentation (words) which may include theatre	‘ Performance is the term used to describe a certain type of particularly involved and dramatized oral narrative’ (Langellier 1999: 127); ‘Performance is central to our discipline [oral interpretation]’ (Fine & Speer 1977: 375).	Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 Poirier 1971 Sandifer 1971 Roloff 1973 Long 1974 Bacon 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977,	Dramatic Literature Literature Readers Theatre Oral interpretation Oral interpretation Oral interpretation Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies	Oral performance Oral Communication Oral interpretation/theatre Goffman/Burke Goffman/Burke Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman)

		1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Ward 1994 Reinelt 1994 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Carlson 1996/2004 Lawton 1998 Papa 1999 Langellier 1999 Lee 1999 Kane 2000 Scalmer 2002 Walker 2003	African theatre Theatre Research Rhetoric Theatre theory/practice/theory Politics Political Theatre Personal Narrative Literary Studies Personal Narrative Political Activism Performance/cultural theory	Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Performativity Theatre Performance Studies Theatre Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Oral Interpretation Speech Act Theory/Theatre Theatre Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler
Social ritual	Genres of performance include carnival, processions, parades, games, rites, festivals, spectacles, parties, rituals. A 'Broadway musical is entertainment if one concentrates on what happens onstage and in the house. But if the point of view expands – to include ...the function of the roles in the careers of each performer, the money invested ... the arrival of the audience, their social status, how they paid for their tickets ... and how this indicates the use they are making of the performance ... then the Broadway musical is more than entertainment; it reveals many ritual elements' (Schechner 1988: 75).	Singer 1959 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Ben-Amos 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 MacAloon 1984 Brenneis 1987 Bourdieu 1990 Hawes 1998 Langellier 1999 Harrop 2004, 2007 Giesen 2005 Shand 2006	Anthropology Sociology Folklore research Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies Anthropology Ethnology Ethnography/Sociology Conversation Personal Narrative Folk Theatre Political theory Identity politics/journalism	Symbolic Action Theatre as metaphor Sociolinguistics/Hymes Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre as metaphor Anthropology (Schieffelin) Speech Act Theory Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butlerian) and is therefore a practice
A practice		Campbell 1971	Communication Aesthetics	Oral Communication

		Sandifer 1971 Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Huxley & Witt 1996 Kulynych 1998 Goldhill & Osborne 1999 Meadmore et al 2004 Cheng 2004 Roche 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Readers Theatre Philosophy of Science Theatre research Performance practice Political theory Ancient History/Political theory Education Performance Studies Performance training Public Administration	Oral interpretation/theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/performing arts Honig/Butler Theatre/Rhetoric Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Embodied (poetics) (praxis)	'[P]erformance embodies the expressive dimension of the strategic articulation of practice ' (Schieffelin 1998: 199); it 'materializes performativity' (Langellier 1999: 129). Performance is a form of 'social poetics' (Herzfeld 1985). 'The body believes in what it plays at: it weeps if it mimes grief. It does not represent what it performs, it does not memorize the past, it enacts the past, bringing it back to life' (Bourdieu 1990: 73).	E. Burke (1729-1797) Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Singer 1959 Poirier 1971 Burns 1972 Roloff 1973 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Bacon 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Herzfeld 1985 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 Bourdieu 1990 Bartky 1988 Martin 1989 Butler 1990, 1993, 1999 Calkowski 1991	Politics Anthropology Sociology Anthropology Literature Sociology of theatre Oral interpretation Folk practices Folklore research Oral interpretation Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance analysis Anthropology Anthropology Ethnography Ethnography/Sociology Gender/Power Dance theory Gender Studies Anthropology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Symbolic Action Oral Communication Theatre/Goffman Goffman/Burke Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Process (Turner) Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Speech Act Theory Foucault Performing Arts/performativity Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory

		Case & Reinelt 1991 Steadman 1992 Dyer 1992 Dolan 1993, 2001 Jackson 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Jarmon 1996 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Walker 2003 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Hinckley 1998 Fusco 1998 Kulynych 1998 Sadono 1999 Warren 1999 Lee 1999 Madison 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Langellier 1999 Kane 2000 McKenzie 2001 Crane 2002	Feminist Studies African theatre & politics Popular Entertainment Theatre Studies Ethnography Gender Studies Theatre research African theatre Education Education Rhetoric Literature Conversation Analysis Gender practices/history Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Speech Communication Subjectivity Performance/cultural theory Anthropology Music Education Performance Art Political theory Dance Education Education Literary Studies Performance Studies Performance Studies Personal Narrative Personal Narrative Performance Theory Theatre History	Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Popular Culture Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Performativity Austin/Butler/Theatre Performance Studies/Performativity Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler) Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Theatre Theatre Honig/Butler Theatre Performativity (Butler) Oral Interpretation Communication Theatre Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Speech Act Theory/Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre
--	--	---	---	--

		Street 2004 Barba & Savarese 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 HGSA 2007 Reiger & Dempsey 2008 Chapple 2008 TIS 2008	Political Representation Theatre Anthropology Gender/Subjectivity Identity politics/journalism Performance training Human Performance Health Sociology Performance Art Human Sports Performance	Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre practice Performativity (Butler/Austin) Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Genetics Performativity/Theatre/Sport Theatre Physiology/Human Capacity
Not about text	‘[P]erformance can never be text ... its unique strategic properties are destroyed when it is considered as, or reduced to, text ... it is precisely the performativity of performance for which there is no analogue in text ... performances are ephemeral’ (Worthen 1998: 198). Performance is ‘all the activity of an individual which occurs during a period marked by his continuous presence before a particular set of observers and which has some effect on the observers’ (Goffman 1959: 22). The contemporary rise of interest in performance is an attempt to get out of the linguistic turn which reduces culture to text, thereby obliterating the body (Martin 1989; Walker 2003) NB: none of the auditing literature sees performance in	E. Burke (1729-1797) Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Singer 1959 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Parry 1967 Skinner 1971 Campbell 1971 Sandifer 1971 Burns 1972 Pocock 1973 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Laclau 1989 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988 Martin 1989 Bourdieu 1990	Politics Anthropology Anthropology Sociology Political theory Political philosophy Communication Aesthetics Readers Theatre Sociology of theatre Political Theory Folk practices Folk research Political Science Performance Studies Performance Art Performance Art Ethnology Political theory Gender/Power Education Dance theory Ethnography/Sociology	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Symbolic Action Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Act Theory (Austin) Oral Communication Oral Interpretation/theatre Theatre/Goffman Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Performing arts/performativity Speech Act Theory

	terms of text	Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Calkowski 1991 Steadman 1992 Dyer 1992 Honig 1992, 1993 Jackson 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Fuoss 1993 Dolan 1993, 2001 Phelan 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Ward 1994 Aiges 1995 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Myers 1995 Schachter 1995 Ball 1995 Bell 1996 Jarmon 1996 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Huxley & Witts 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Worthen 1998 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Lawton 1998	Gender Studies Anthropology African theatre & politics Popular Entertainment Political theory Ethnography Gender Studies Political Activism Theatre Studies Representation/Visibility Philosophy of Science Theatre research Education Education African theatre Music Rhetoric Political Science Citizenship theory Political Philosophy Conversation Analysis Conversation Analysis Gender practices/history Theatre practice Performance practice Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Subjectivity English/Theatre/Dance Political Science Public Administration Politics	Speech Act Theory/Derrida/Foucault Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Theatre Popular Culture Austin/Speech Act theory Theatre Theatre Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Theatre Theatre/performance art Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Music performance Performativity Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Foucault/Postmodernism Performativity/drama Performance Studies/Performativity Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Performing Arts Theatre/performing arts Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Democratic Theory/Accountability Political Science Performance Studies
--	---------------	--	---	--

		Hawes 1998 Kulynych 1998 Lee 1999 Sadono 1999 Warren 1999 Fraser 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Schauble 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Pharr & Putnam 2000 Gray 2001 McKenzie 2001 Barrett 2002a, 2002b Walker 2003 Street 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Meadmore et al 2004 Cheng 2004 Mackenzie 2005 Bleeker 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Giesen 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Burke & Haynes 2006 Durant et al 2006 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Radin 2006 Thompson 2006 Shand 2006 Roche 2006 Mallard 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Conversation Political Theory Literary Studies Dance Education Education Social Sciences Performance Studies Journalism Anthropology Political Science Political Activism Performance Theory Public Administration Performance/cultural theory Political Representation Folk Theatre Education Performance Studies Computer Technology Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre Anthropology Political theory Gender/Subjectivity Public Administration Human Resources/Motivation Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration Drama Education Identity politics/journalism Performance training Consumer Politics Public Administration	Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Honig/Butler Oral Interpretation Theatre Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre Theatre as metaphor/accountability Anthropology (Herzfeld) Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Accounting practices Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Butler) Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre practice Theatre practice Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butler/Austin) Accounting practices Goal setting/auditing Auditing Auditing Accounting practices Theatre Performativity (Butlerian) Theatre Product Evaluation Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
But can be read as text		De Marinis 1993	Semiotic analysis	Theatre/Speech Act Theory

		Fischer-Lichte 1997 Khee 2004	Theatre history/practice Performance Studies	Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Austin)/Theatre
Exemplary	Performance is exemplary – often an exemplary model of teamwork or ensemble playing (Blau 271)	E. Burke (1729-1797) Burns 1972 Fine & Speer 1977 Blau 1983, 1989 Brenneis 1987 Vaill 1989 Sedgwick 1993 Watrous 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Fusco 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 MacGowan 2000 Newton 2008	Politics Sociology of theatre Oral interpretation Theatre theory/practice Ethnology Management Theory Queer Theory Theatre practice Theatre research Theatre theory/history/practice Performance Art Performance Studies Anthropology Political Theory	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Theatre/Goffman Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Theatre as metaphor Austin Theatre Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre Theatre Theatre Language theory/Social construction Democratic Theory/Accountability and can be held accountable
Subject to evaluation/judgment	‘[T]here is a sense in which performance is an attribute of any behaviour, if the doer accepts or has imputed to him responsibility for being evaluated in regard to it’ (Hymes 1975).	E. Burke (1729-1797) Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Hymes 1975 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Bartky 1988 Crease 1993, 2003 Curtin 1994 Sartori 1991 Myers 1995	Politics Sociology Folk practices Political Science Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies Performance analysis Anthropology Performance Art Gender/Power Philosophy of Science Education Political Sociology Political Science	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Theatre as metaphor Language competence (Chomsky) Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre Foucault Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability

		Schachter 1995 Denning 1996 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Hinckley 1998 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Rice & Sumberg 1998 Langellier 1999 Sadono 1999 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Pharr & Putnam 2000 Goodman 2000 Barrett 2001, 2002 Dolan 2001 Giardinelli 2001 Dobell 2003 Street 2004 Burke & Haynes 2005 Wallace Ingraham 2005 Mackenzie 2005 West 2005 Brenton 2005 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Tilbury 2006 Radin 2006 Lynn 2006 Roche 2006 Durant et al 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008 Andrews et al 2008	Citizenship theory Anthropology Public Administration Music Education Political Science Political Science Personal Narrative Dance Education Political Science Political Science Theatre/Gender Studies Public Administration Theatre Studies Political Science Political Science Political Representation Public Administration Public Administration Computer Technology Digital government Political Science Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Performance training Human Resources/Motivation Public Policy Public Administration Public Administration Political Theory Public Administration	Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre as metaphor Political Science Theatre Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Auditing Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre/Performativity Accounting practices Theatre Auditing Accounting Practices Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Accounting practices Performativity (Butler) Technology/mechanical capacity Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Accounting practices Auditing/accounting practices Theatre Goal setting/auditing Economics Auditing Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing
--	--	---	--	--

		Bourdeaux & Chikoto 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008 Lapinski 2008 Cox 2008 Prichard 2008 Pandaram 2008 Lawton 2008 Hanlon 2008 Growden 2008 Reuters 2008 Focus 2008 Halloran 2008	Public Management Public Management Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education Political Science Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism Sports journalism	Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Sport Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity Sport/Human capacity
Measurable		Lyotard 1979 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 New Republic 1977 Economist 1990, 1991 Curtin 1994 Myers 1995 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Rice & Sumberg 1998 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Pharr & Putnam 2000 McKenzie 2001 Barrett 2001, 2002 Giardinelli 2001 Burke & Haynes 2005 Mackenzie 2005	Knowledge/Postmodernity Political Science Economics Economic Education Political Science Public Administration Political Science Political Science Political Science Political Science Performance Theory Public Administration Political Science Public Administration Computer Technology	Language theory/Austin Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Democratic Theory/Accountability Political Science Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre/organizational theory/technology Accounting practices Auditing Accounting practices Performativity (Butler)

		West 2005 Brenton 2005 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Tilbury 2006 Durant et al 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Mallard 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008 Andrews et al 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008	Digital government Political Science Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration Human Resources/Motivation Public Policy Public Administration Consumer politics Public Administration Political Theory Political Theory Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education	Technology/mechanical capacity Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Goal setting/auditing Economics Auditing Product Evaluation Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing
Accountable	Self-presentations are performances and are ‘socially constructed for a public audience’ (Goffman 1971) as a way of accounting for oneself (Orbuch 1997: 455).	E. Burke (1729-1797) Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Hymes 1975 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 Sartori 1991 Welsh & Carrasquero 1995 Myers 1995 Orbuch 1997 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Kochhar-Lindgren 1999 Pharr & Putnam 2000 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006 Tilbury 2006	Politics Sociology Folk practices Anthropology Ethnology Political Sociology Political Science Political Science Social Accountability Public Administration Law Political Science Political Science Public Sector Communication Public Administration	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Theatre as metaphor Language competence (Chomsky) Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Sociology (Goffman/Symbolic Interaction) Political Science Democratic Theory/Accountability Democratic Theory/Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability

		Durant et al 2006 ANAO 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008 Kassel 2008	Human Resources/Motivation Public Administration Public Administration Political Theory Public Administration	Goal setting/auditing Auditing Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing
Concerned with democratic government		E. Burke (1729-1797) Jackman 1973 Farnsworth & Fleming 1975 Brenneis 1987 Honig 1992, 1993 Lijphart 1994 Schachter 1995 Bell 1996 Thompson & Riccucci 1998 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Rice & Sumberg 1998 Kulynych 1998 Kochhar-Lindgren 1999 Goldhill & Osborne 1999 Lawton 1998 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Pharr & Putnam 2000 Dolan 2001 Barrett 2001, 2002 Giardinelli 2001 Gray 2001 Street 2004 Burke & Haynes 2005 Wallace Inghram 2005 Brenton 2005 Yang & Holzer 2006 Pandey & Garnett 2006	Politics Political Science Political Science Ethnology Political theory Comparative Politics Citizenship theory Political Sociology Public Administration Political Science Political Science Political theory Law Ancient History/Political theory Politics Political Science Political Science Theatre Studies Public Administration Political Science Political Activism Political Representation Public Administration Public Administration Political Science Political Science Public Sector Communication	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Economics/Comparative Research Democratic Theory/Accountability Anthropology (Scheffelin) Austin/Speech Act theory Democratic Theory/Auditing Democratic Theory/Accountability Foucault/Postmodernism Political Science Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Honig/Butler Democratic Theory/Accountability Theatre/Rhetoric Performance Studies Auditing Democratic Theory/Auditing Theatre Accounting practices Auditing Theatre Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Accounting practices Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing

		Radin 2006 Waterford 2007 ANAO 2007 Mallard 2007 Sodhi 2008 Newton 2008	Public Administration Public Policy Public Administration Consumer politics Public Administration Political Theory	Accounting practices Economics Auditing Product Evaluation Auditing/Accountability Democratic Theory/Accountability
It concerns power
A form of power	Performance is ‘an emergent stratum of power and knowledge ... performance will be to the twentieth and twenty-first centuries what discipline was to the eighteenth and nineteenth, that is, an onto-historical formation of power and knowledge ’ McKenzie 2001: 18). ³	Phelan 1993 McKenzie 2001	Representation/Visibility Performance Theory	Theatre/performance art Theatre/organizational theory/technology
A form of politics	‘Reiterated acting ... is power in its persistence and instability’ (Butler 1993: 9). Thinking of an activity as ‘performance art’ reveals the ideological implications of that activity (Chin 1998). Performance can be used to compel others to think/see in particular ways (Langellier 1999: 138)	E. Burke (1729-1797) Brecht 1964 Pocock 1973 Blau 1983 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 McLaren 1988 Laclau 1989 Martin 1989 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Honig 1992, 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Fuoss 1993 Phelan 1993 Dolan 1993, 2001	Politics Theatre theory and practice Political Theory Theatre theory/practice Performance Art Ethnology Education Political theory Dance theory Gender Studies Anthropology Feminist Studies Political theory Gender Studies Political Activism Representation/Visibility Theatre Studies	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Theatre Speech Act Theory (Austin) Theatre Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Performing arts/performativity Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Austin/Speech Act theory Performativity (Butler) Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre/performance art Theatre

		 Benton 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Curtin 1994 Aiges 1995 Diamond 1995, 1996 Bell 1996 Chin 1998 Isbell 1998 Lawton 1998 Hawes 1998 Kulynych 1998 Papa 1999 Langellier 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Fraser 1999 Schauble 2000 Goodman 2000 MacGowan 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002 Walker 2003 Alexander 2003, 2005 Street 2004 Cheng 2004 Roms 2004 Buckner 2004 McKee 2005 Giesen 2005 Radin 2006 Shand 2006 Mallard 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 	 Performance Ethics Theatre research Education Music Feminist/Performance Theory Political Sociology Performance Art/Ideology Anthropology Politics Conversation Political theory Political Theatre Personal Narrative Performance Studies Social Sciences Journalism Theatre/Gender Studies Anthropology Anthropology Political Activism Political Activism Performance/cultural theory Cultural Sociology Political Representation Performance Studies Political theatre Cultural politics Media Studies Political theory Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Consumer politics Public Administration 	 Communication/Ethnography Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Music performance Lacan/Butler Foucault/Postmodernism Performance Studies Anthropology/Performance Studies Performance Studies Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Honig/Butler Theatre Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor/accountability Theatre/Performativity Language theory/Social construction Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre Theatre Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre Anthropology Theatre as metaphor Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Performativity (Butlerian) Product evaluation Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
--	--	--	--	--

Configurations of power and authority	(These may not become visible without situating performance into performativity, according to Langellier 1999: 135). State power, for example, 'is performed through seemingly innocuous red tape, how the state speaks through its citizens' (Cheng 2004)	K. Burke 1945 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Poirier 1971 Pocock 1973 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Blau 1983, 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Brenneis 1987 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988 Laclau 1989 Bourdieu 1990 Butler 1990, 1993 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Honig 1992, 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Curtin 1994 Bell 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Lawton 1998 Pollock 1998 Papa 1999 Sadono 1999	Rhetoric/Social Action Anthropology Sociology Literature Political Theory Ethnography Oral Interpretation Theatre theory and practice Anthropology Performance Art Ethnology Gender/Power Education Political theory Ethnography/Sociology Gender Studies Anthropology Feminist Studies Political theory Gender Studies Representation/Visibility Theatre research Education Political Sociology Theatre theory/history/practice Speech Communication Subjectivity Political Science Politics Writing Political Theatre Dance Education	Literature/Theatre/Communication Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Process (Turner) Theatre Anthropology (Schieffelin) Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Speech Act Theory Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Austin Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance art Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Foucault/Postmodernism Theatre Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler) Democratic Theory/Accountability Performance Studies Theatre/performance art Theatre Theatre
---------------------------------------	--	---	--	---

		Langellier 1999 Warren 1999 Benton 1993 Schauble 2000 Erickson 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Guss 2000 Gray 2001 Scalmer 2002 Mackinley 2003 Street 2004 Cheng 2004 Meadmore et al 2004 Giesen 2005 Radin 2006 Reed et al 2006 Shand 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Personal Narrative Education Performance Ethics Journalism Political communication Anthropology Cultural performance Political Activism Political Activism Indigenous Australia Studies Political Representation Performance Studies Education Political theory Public Administration Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Public Administration	Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Communication/Ethnography Theatre as metaphor/accountability Rhetoric Anthropology (Herzfeld) Anthropology Theatre Theatre Education Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Evaluation/auditing Performativity (Butlerian) Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Appropriative	‘When we script, adapt, stage, and critique enacted lives and worlds, are we above suspicion?’ (Benton 1993: 98)	Benton 1993 Fleche 1997 McKenzie 2001 ⁴ Cheng 2004	Performance ethics Psychology/Autism Performance Theory Performance Studies	Communication/Ethnography Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre
Appropriates the lives of others	‘[P]erformance is in the business of getting into people’s lives with the intent to show these lives (texts) for audience presentation. We not only gather texts but ... have the power to decide what is told and how texts are represented’ (Benton 1993: 99). Performance has ‘a mirroring as well as a shaping function’ (Carlson 2004/1996) and ‘can affect a kind of	Benton 1993 Phelan 1993 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Carlson 2004/1996 Cheng 2004	Performance Ethics Representation/Visibility Literature Theatre theory/history/practice Performance Studies	Communication/Ethnography Theatre/performance art Austin/Butler/Theatre Theatre Theatre violence on reality' (Cheng 2004). Performance constitutes a compulsory 'community of witness' (Parker & Sedgwick 1995: 10).

and which:
Constructs reality/the world - social reality - political reality - individual identity - individual bodies - collective identity - collective bodies	Performance is a mode of social construction. The 'reality' it constructs may be truthful or may be aimed at deception (Lehmann-Haupt 1996). 'There is no performance without pre-performance' (MacAloon 1984: 9). 'The central issue of performativity ... is the imaginative creation of a human world' (Schieffelin 1998: 205). 'With language we perform actions and create worlds' (Ball 1995: 85). 'Performing a 'situation' is imposing your definition of reality onto others' (Hajer & Uttermark 2008: 7). Self-presentations are performances which are 'socially constructed for a public audience' (Goffman 1959, 1971).	K. Burke 1945 Austin 1955 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Parry 1967 Poirier 1971 Pocock 1973 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1989 MacAloon 1984 De Man 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Robinson 1987 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988 Laclau 1989 Bourdieu 1990 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Kershaw 1992 Dolan 1993, 2001 Jackson 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Benton 1993 Pineau 1994	Rhetoric/Social Action Speech Act Theory Anthropology Sociology Political theory Literature Political Theory Oral Interpretation Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Anthropology Language Anthropology Performance Art Gender/Power Education Political theory Ethnography/Sociology Theatre Gender/Performativity Social Change/Community Theatre Studies Ethnography Gender Studies Performance Ethics Education	Literature/Theatre/Communication Language theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory (Austin) Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre as metaphor Austin/Rhetoric/Semiotics Process (Turner) Theatre Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Speech Act Theory Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butler) Communication/Ethnography Theatre as metaphor

		Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Aiges 1995 Schachter 1995 Ball 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Bell 1996 Peiss 1996 States 1996 Lehmann-Haupt 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Orbuch 1997 Fleche 1997 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Worthen 1998 Hinckley 1998 Pollock 1998 Kulynych 1998 Sadono 1999 Warren 1999 Langellier 1999 Madison 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Fraser 1999 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Godard 2000 Guss 2000 MacGowan 2000 Goldhill and Osborne 2001 McKenzie 2001 Street 2004	Education Theatre research Music Citizenship theory Political Philosophy Literature Political Sociology Gender practices/history Theatre practice Journalism Theatre theory/history/practice Social Accountability Psychology/Autism Speech Communication Subjectivity English/Theatre/Dance Music Education Writing Political theory Dance Education Education Personal Narrative Performance Studies Performance Studies Social Sciences Anthropology Translation Cultural performance Anthropology Ancient History/Political theory Performance Theory Political Representation	Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Music performance Democratic Theory/Accountability Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Austin/Butler/Theatre Foucault/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre/Performance Art Theatre Sociology (Goffman/Symbolic Interaction) Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Theatre Theatre/Performance art Honig/Butler Theatre Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Communication Theatre Performativity (Butler) Anthropology (Herzfeld) Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Anthropology Language theory/Social construction Theatre/Rhetoric Theatre/organizational theory/technology Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor
--	--	---	---	--

		Carlson 2004/1996 Buckner 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Meadmore et al 2004 Giesen 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Radin 2006 Shand 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Theatre theory/history Cultural politics Folk Theatre Education Political theory Gender/Subjectivity Public Administration Identity politics/journalism Public Administration Health Sociology	Theatre practice Anthropology Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor Performativity (Butler/Austin) Accounting practices Performativity (Butlerian) Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Performativity/Theatre/Sport
Related to discourse	Performance is ‘a rhetoric of identity’ (Friedman 2002); performance may be grouped according to ‘forms of discourse’ known as genres (MacAloon 1084: 11).	K. Burke 1945 MacAloon 1984 Laclau 1989 Butler 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Calkowski 1991 Foster-Dixon 1993 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Bell 1996 Diamond 1995, 1996 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Langellier 1999 Friedman 2002 Meadmore et al 2004 Mackenzie 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Shand 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Rhetoric/Social Action Anthropology Political theory Gender Studies Anthropology Gender Studies Rhetoric Political Sociology Feminist/Performance Theory Subjectivity Personal Narrative Cultural Theory Education Computer Technology Gender/Subjectivity Identity politics/journalism Public Administration	Literature/Theatre/Communication Theatre as metaphor Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performativity (Butler) Performativity Foucault/Postmodernism Lacan/Butler Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Language Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler/Austin) Performativity (Butlerian) Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Meaning-generating		Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Erickson 2000 Guss 2000 MacGowan 2000	Philosophy of Science Theatre research Theatre history/practice Political communication Cultural performance Anthropology	Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Semiotics Rhetoric Anthropology Language theory/Social construction

		McKenzie 2001 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Performance Theory Public Administration	Theatre/organizational theory/technology Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre which is functional
Functional	Performance ‘has a mirroring as well as a shaping function’. It is ‘a laboratory for possible cultural negotiations and interventions’ (Carlson 2004: 214). ‘[O]ne could deconstruct everything from church prayers to Pak Loh’s gestures to the war in Iraq – they are all performances’ (Khee 2004)	Adorno & Horkheimer 1944 Marcuse 1955 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Sandifer 1971 Burns 1972 Pocock 1973 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Fine & Speer 1977 Laclau 1989 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Brenneis 1987 McLaren 1988 Calkowski 1991 Crease 1993, 2003 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Bell 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fleche 1997 Gibson & Harmel 1998 Hawes 1998 Kulynych 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Schauble 2000	Critical Theory Critical Theory Anthropology Sociology Readers Theatre Sociology of theatre Political Theory Folk practices Folklore research Oral interpretation Political theory Anthropology Ethnology Education Anthropology Philosophy of Science Education Education Theatre research Political Sociology Theatre theory/history/practice Psychology/Autism Political Science Conversation Political theory Performance Studies Anthropology Journalism	Social Economics/Theatre as metaphor Wittenstein/Austin/Psychoanalysis Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre as metaphor Oral interpretation/theatre Theatre/Goffman Speech Act Theory (Austin) Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Process (Turner) Anthropology (Schieffelin) Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Foucault/Postmodernism Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Democratic Theory/Accountability Speech Act Theory/Anthropology Honig/Butler Theatre Symbolic Action/Socio-linguistics/ Communication Theatre as metaphor/accountability

		Erickson 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Foweraker & Krznaric 2000, 2001, 2003 Dolan 2001 Giardinelli 2001 Gray 2001 McKenzie 2001 Barrett 2002 Dimple 2004 Street 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Khee 2004 Mackenzie 2005 Giesen 2005 Radin 2006 Durant et al 2006 Shand 2006 Waterford 2007 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Political communication Anthropology Political Science Theatre Studies Political Science Political Activism Performance Theory Public Administration Literary Studies Political Representation Folk Theatre Performance Studies Computer Technology Political theory Public Administration Human Resources/Motivation Identity politics/journalism Public Policy Public Administration	Rhetoric Anthropology (Herzfeld) Auditing Theatre Auditing Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Accounting practices Theatre as metaphor/performativity Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Goal setting/auditing Performativity (Butlerian) Economics Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre and can be used and abused as a theoretical instrument
A way of seeing/looking	Performance is ' a way of seeing ' (States 1996: 13).	Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 Brecht 1964 Campbell 1971 Sandifer 1971 Ben-Amos 1975 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Blau 1983, 1987 Robinson 1987 Pelias & VanOosting 1987 Calkowski 1991 Dolan 1993, 2001	Dramatic literature Theatre theory and practice Communication Aesthetics Readers Theatre Folklore research Performance Studies Theatre theory/practice Performance Art Oral Communication Anthropology Theatre Studies	Oral performance Theatre Oral Communication Oral interpretation/theatre Sociolinguistics/Hymes Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre Communication Aesthetics Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Theatre

		Jackson 1993 Benton 1993 Phelan 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Curtin 1994 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Langellier 1999 Lee 1999 Fraser 1999 Madison 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Godard 2000 Hughes-Freeland 2004 Dimple 2004 Khee 2004 Bleeker 2005 Taviani 2005 Radin 2006 Lynn 2006	Ethnography Performance Ethics Representation/Visibility Philosophy of Science Theatre research Education Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice Personal Narrative Literary Studies Social Sciences Performance Studies Performance Studies Translation Anthropology Literary Studies Performance Studies Ethnomusicology Persuasion Theatre practice Public Administration Public Administration	Theatre Communication/Ethnography Theatre/performance art Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Oral Interpretation Performativity (Butler) Communication Theatre Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Theatre as metaphor/performativity Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Theatre practice Theatre Accounting practices Auditing/accounting practices
and a way of knowing		Turner 1957, 1974, 1984, 1988, 1990, 1990 Kapferer 1984 Crease 1993, 2003 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 States 1996 Fleche 1997 MacGowan 2000 Harrop 2004, 2007 Noble 2005	Anthropology Anthropology Philosophy of Science Education Education Theatre practice Psychology/Autism Anthropology Folk Theatre Mental Health	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Theatre/Anthropology (Turner) Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Language theory/Social construction Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Theatre
A theory		Carlson 2004/1996	Theatre theory/history/practice	Theatre

		McKenzie 2001 Cheng 2004	Performance Theory Performance Studies	Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre
A theory of action	Performance is a ‘theory of action’ (Hughes-Freeland 1998: 13). Performance is ‘an action that makes [something] appear’ (Dolan 2001: 470).	Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Austin 1955 Skinner 1971 Pocock 1973 Fuoss 1993 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Honig 1992 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Kulynych 1998 Fraser 1999 MacGowan 2000 Dolan 2001 Dimple 2004 Street 2004	Anthropology Speech Act Theory Political philosophy Political Theory Political Activism Performance Studies Political theory Anthropology Political theory Social Sciences Anthropology Theatre Studies Literary Studies Political Representation	Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Language Theory Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Act Theory (Austin) Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Austin/Speech Act theory Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Honig/Butler Performativity (Butler) Language theory/Social construction Theatre Theatre as metaphor/performativity Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor
A concept	Performance is ‘a critical new concept in the humanities and social sciences’. It indicates ‘the contingent and creative dimensions of social, cultural, and artistic action’ (Alexander 2005); ‘the idea of performance or performativity has emerged as a possible organizing concept for a wider range of cultural, social, and political activities’ (Postlewait and Davis 2003). The failure to consider performance in anthropology indicates ‘how much we tend to appropriate the traditions [of	E. Burke (1729-1797) Matthews 1907, 1910, 1917 Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988 Parry 1967 Campbell 1971 Skinner 1971 Long 1974 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Bacon 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003	Politics Dramatic Literature Anthropology Political theory Communication Aesthetics Political philosophy Oral interpretation Folk practices Folklore research Oral interpretation Ethnography Oral interpretation Performance Studies	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Oral performance Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Speech Act Theory (Austin) Oral Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Goffman/Burke Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre as metaphor Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman)

	non-literate cultures] as objets d'art or as documents [made] for scholarship [and] how little we have attended to the persons whose traditions they are [yet] the nature of the performance affects what is known' (Hymes 1975: 70). 'Performance is a responsive concept ... an organizing concept' which is 'under revisions in light of the many activities to which it is addressed' (Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999)	Laclau 1989 MacAloon 1984 Pelias & VanOosting 1987 Brenneis 1987 McLaren 1988 Foster-Dixon 1993 Fuoss 1993 Dolan 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Jarmon 1998 Lawton 1998 Kulynych 1998 Lee 1999 Madison 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Fraser 1999 Goodman 2000 Godard 2000 McKenzie 2001 Alexander 2003, 2005 Hughes-Freeland 2004 Dimple 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007	Political theory Anthropology Oral Communication Ethnology Education Gender Studies Political Activism Theatre Studies Philosophy of Science Education Education Theatre research Rhetoric Literature Theatre practice Theatre theory/history/practice Theatre history/practice Subjectivity Conversation Analysis Politics Political theory Literary Studies Performance Studies Performance Studies Social Sciences Theatre/Gender Studies Translation Performance Theory Cultural Sociology Anthropology Literary Studies Folk Theatre	Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Theatre as metaphor Communication Aesthetics Anthropology (Schieffelin) Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Performativity (Butler) Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Performativity Austin/Butler/Theatre Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Performativity (Butler) Performance Studies/Performativity Performance Studies Honig/Butler Oral Interpretation Communication Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Performativity Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre/Symbolic Action/Speech Act Theory (Burke, Turner, Stanislavski) Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Theatre as metaphor/performativity Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner
--	--	--	---	--

		Khee 2004 Street 2004 Radin 2006 Lynn 2006 Thompson 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008	Performance Studies Political Representation Public Administration Public Administration Drama Education Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education	Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Accounting practices Auditing/accounting practices Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing
A tool		Sandifer 1971 Crease 1993, 2003 Carlson 2004/1996 Godard 2000 Harrop 2004, 2007 Khee 2004 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Readers Theatre Philosophy of Science Theatre theory/history/practice Translation Folk Theatre Performance Studies Public Administration	Oral interpretation/theatre Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Theatre Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Performance Studies/Hymes/Schechner Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
A vehicle	Performance is a vehicle for cultural memory and catharsis	Roach 1985, 1995, 1995 Richards 1995 Diamond 1995, 1996	Performance Studies Cultural Studies Feminist/Performance Theory	Anthropology Theatre/Literature Lacan/Butler
A movement	The performance movement relates to accountability. ‘Concern about the performance of organizations has become a pervasive element in the world we live in’ (Radin 2006: 1). ‘The rhetoric of performance ... focuses on the achievement of program outcomes’ (Radin 2006: 2)	Radin 2006	Public administration	Accounting practices
‘Anti-disciplinary’	Performance is not a new discipline but an ‘anti-discipline’ which ‘by its nature resists conclusions [and] the sort	Roach 1985, 1995, 1996 Carlson 2004/1996	Performance studies Theatre theory/history/practice	Anthropology Theatre practice of definitions, boundaries, and limits so useful to traditional academic writing and academic structures' (Carlson 2004: 206).

A zeitgeist	Performance is likely to become 'the dominating intellectual trope' for 20 th -21 st centuries (Postlewait & Davis 2003; Walker 2003: 149)	Carlson 2004/1996 McKenzie 2001 Postlewait & Davis 2003 Walker 2003	Theatre theory/history/practice Performance Theory Theatre theory/history Performance/cultural theory	Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre practice Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler
A 'cult'	Managers and organizational theorists are engaged in a 'peak performance cult' (McKenzie 2001: 60).	Vaill 1989	Management Theory	Theatre as metaphor
A western concept	'[F]or people to use the term to describe these events [photos taken by US soldiers at Abu Ghraib prison] shows a critical distance that comes with privilege (the privilege of liberal white academics who are not involved in ... direct struggle ... [there is] "an area of blindness" in the study and theorising of people performing' (Cheng 2004)	Walker 2003 Khee 2004 Cheng 2004	Performance/cultural theory Performance Studies Performance Studies	Oral Communication/Theatre/Butler Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Theatre
Essentially contested	Performance is an "essentially contested concept" (Strine, Long and Hopkins 1990: 183); this contestation takes place both within performance and 'along its borders' (Worthen 1998: 1100). 'Performance is a responsive concept ... an organizing concept' which is 'under revisions in light of the	Fine & Speer 1977 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 2002, 2003 Pelias & VanOosting 1987 McLaren 1988 Strine, Long & Hopkins 1990 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Curtin 1994 Parker & Sedgwick 1995	Oral interpretation Performance Studies Oral Communication Education Performance Studies Theatre research Education Theatre practice	Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Communication Aesthetics Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Oral Communication Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre

	many activities to which it is addressed' (Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999)	States 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Worthen 1998 Lee 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 McKenzie 2001 Postlewait & Davis 2003 Mounsef 2003 Radin 2006	Literature Theatre theory/history/practice Subjectivity English/Theatre/Dance Literary Studies Performance Studies Performance Theory Theatre theory/history Performance studies Public Administration	Austin/Butler/Theatre Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Literature (dramatic text) Oral Interpretation Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre practice Theatre Accounting practices and is derived from:
From theatre: a term of the theatre	'The notion of 'performance' encompasses all elements of theatre' (Kershaw 1992: 17). However, performance has 'floated free of theater precincts' (Diamond 1996: 2); 'the adaptation of the idea of performance to the study of human behaviour and social order has been energetically taken up, in decidedly positive and comprehensive terms... the idea of performance or performativity has emerged as a possible organizing concept for a wider range of cultural, social, and political activities' (Postlewait and Davis 2003); performance is swiftly becoming 'the dominant intellectual trope of the period' (Carlson 2004: 213).	Goffman 1959, 1963, 1967, 1971 Brecht 1964 Campbell 1971 Sandifer 1971 Burns 1972 Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Passow & Strauss 1981 MacAloon 1984 Schieffelin 1985, 1998 Roach 1985, 1995, 1996 Bauman 1986a Robinson 1987 Marranca 1987 Bartky 1988 McLaren 1988 Calkowski 1991 Case & Reinelt 1991 Kershaw 1992 Steadman 1992 Fuoss 1993 Dolan 1993, 2001	Sociology Theatre theory and practice Communication Aesthetics Readers Theatre Sociology of theatre Performance Studies Performance analysis Anthropology Anthropology Performance Ethnography Performance Art Theatre Studies Gender/Power Education Anthropology Feminist Studies Social Change/Community African theatre & politics Political Activism Theatre Studies	Theatre as metaphor Theatre Oral Communication Oral interpretation/theatre Theatre/Goffman Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Theatre Theatre as metaphor Process (Turner) Anthropology Theatre as metaphor Theatre Theatre (practice and theory) Foucault Language Arts/Anthropology (Turner) Theatre (Brechtian)/Speech Act Theory Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre Theatre Performance Studies/Agonistic Politics Theatre

		De Marinis 1993 Phelan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Pineau 1994 Curtin 1994 Ward 1994 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Diamond 1995, 1996 Jarmon 1996 Peiss 1996 Huxley & Witt 1996 Carlson 2004/1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Fleche 1997 Rothenberg & Valente 1997 Anderson 1998 Joseph 1998 Chin 1998 Isbell 1998 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Lawton 1998 Fusco 1998 Sadono 1999 Papa 1999 Madison 1999 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Schauble 2000 Goodman 2000 Godard 2000 Gray 2001 McKenzie 2001 Crane 2002	Semiotic analysis Representation/Visibility Theatre research Education Education African theatre Literature Feminist/Performance Theory Conversation Analysis Gender practices/history Performance practice Theatre theory/practice/history Theatre history/practice Psychology/Autism Subjectivity Feminist/Critical Sociology Marx (production) Performance Art/Ideology Anthropology Anthropology Politics Performance Art Dance Education Political Theatre Performance Studies Performance Studies Journalism Theatre/Gender Studies Translation Political Activism Performance Theory Theatre History	Theatre/Speech Act Theory Theatre/performance art Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Theatre as metaphor Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism Theatre Austin/Butler/Theatre Lacan/Butler Performance Studies/Performativity Theatre as metaphor Theatre/performing arts Theatre Theatre/Semiotics Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler)/Communicative Ethics (Habermas) Performativity (Butler) Performance Studies Anthropology/Performance Studies Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication Performance Studies Theatre Theatre Theatre Communication Theatre Theatre as metaphor/accountability Theatre/Performativity Theatre/Performativity Theatre Theatre/organizational theory/technology Theatre
--	--	---	--	---

		Scalmer 2002 Mackinley 2003 Postlewait and Davis 2003 Dimple 2004 Roms 2004 Harrop 2004, 2007 Khee 2004 Street 2004 Cheng 2004 Bleeker 2005 Noble 2005 Barba & Savarese 2005 Taviani 2005 Thompson 2006 Roche 2006 Hajer & Uttermark 2008	Political Activism Indigenous Australia Studies Theatre theory/history Literary Studies Political Theatre Folk Theatre Performance Studies Political Representation Performance Studies Ethnomusicology Persuasion Mental Health Theatre Anthropology Theatre practice Drama Education Performance training Public Administration	Theatre Education Theatre practice Theatre Theatre Theatre practice Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Speech Speech Act Theory/Theatre as metaphor Speech Act Theory Theatre Theatre Theatre practice Theatre Theatre Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre
Not a theatre term	Performance is a mode of action/process which occurs both inside and outside theatre and which theatre also uses. It may have an appearance of theatricality, though (Butler 1993). NB: none of the Auditing/Accountancy literature sees performance as a theatre metaphor, but they do not specify that it isn't.	E. Burke (1729-1797) La Perouse 1799 Austin 1955 ⁵ Turner 1957, 1974, 1977, 1984, 1988, 1990 ⁶ Arendt 1958, 1963 Parry 1967 Campbell 1971 Skinner 1971 Pocock 1973 Long 1974 Hymes 1975 Ben-Amos 1975 Bacon 1975 Bauman 1975, 1986, 1992 Abrahams 1976 Fine & Speer 1977 Blau 1983, 1989 De Man 1984	Politics Exploration Speech Act Theory Anthropology Political philosophy Political theory Communication Aesthetics Political philosophy Political Theory Oral interpretation Folk practices Folklore research Oral interpretation Ethnography Folklore/Literature Oral interpretation Theatre theory/practice Language	Public Action/Aesthetics/Rhetoric Public Achievement Language theory Anthropology/ Literature/Law/ Linguistics/Theatre/Postmodernism Philosophy/Speech Act Theory Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Communication Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Act Theory (Austin) Goffman/Burke Language competence (Chomsky) Sociolinguistics/Hymes Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre as metaphor Oral Communication Goffman/Burke/Hymes/Burns Theatre Austin/Rhetoric/Semiotics

		Laclau 1989 Pelias & VanOosting 1987 Butler 1990, 1993⁷ Honig 1992 Foster-Dixon 1993 Crease 1993, 2003 Schachter 1995 Ball 1995 States 1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Lee 1999 Langellier 1999 Warren 1999 Goodman 2000 Brown & Theodossopoulos 2000 Reinelt 2002⁸ Khee 2004 Mackenzie 2005 West 2005 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Newton 2008 Darnall & Sides 2008 Garnett et al 2008 Kassel 2008 May 2008 McKinsey 2008	Political theory Oral Communication Gender Studies Political theory Gender Studies Philosophy of Science Citizenship theory Political philosophy Theatre practice Speech Communication Literary Studies Personal Narrative Education Theatre/Gender Studies Anthropology Theatre research Performance Studies Computer Technology Digital government Gender/Subjectivity Political Theory Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Public Administration Education	Speech act theory/sociolinguistics Communication Aesthetics Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Austin/Speech Act theory Performativity (Butler) Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Democratic Theory/Accountability Phenomenology/Hermeneutics/pragmatics Semiotics/Anthropology/Theatre Austin/Butler Oral Interpretation Ethnography/Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Performativity Anthropology (Herzfeld) Theatre/Performance Theory and practice Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Performativity (Butler) Technology/mechanical capacity Performativity (Butler/Austin) Democratic Theory/Accountability Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing Auditing
--	--	---	---	--

Bibliography

- Abrahams, Roger 1976, 'In and Out of Performance', unpub. Ms, Austin, University of Texas; cited in Fine and Speer 1977: 379.
- Adorno, Theodor and Max Horkheimer 1997/1944, Dialectic of Enlightenment, London and New York, Verso.
- Ahmed, Siraj 2002, 'The Theater of the Civilized Self: Edmund Burke and the East India Trials', Representations 78, pp. 28-55.
- Aiges 1995, 'Bandstand democracy in China' Downbeat 62(9), pp. 10-12.
- Alexander, Jeffrey 2005, 'Understanding the Art of performance: New Perspectives', At The Whitney, Yale University, The Whitney Humanities Center, www.yale.edu/whc January 2005.
- Alexander, Jeffrey 2003a, 'The Cultural Pragmatics of Social Performance: Between Ritual and Rationality', Paper presented at Blurred Boundaries: Rethinking 'Culture' in the Context of Interdisciplinary Practices Academia Sinica, Taipei, Taiwan, December 13-14, 2003.
- Alexander, Jeffrey 2003b, The Meanings of Social Life: A Cultural Sociology, Oxford, Oxford University Press.
- ANAO (Australian National Audit Office), 2007, 'Performance audit of the regional partnerships programmes: Volumes 1,2 and 3', APO, www.apo.org.au 16/11/2007.
- Anderson, Amanda 1998, 'Debatable Performances: Restaging Contentious Feminisms', Social Text 54 (Spring), pp. 1-24.
- Andrews, Rhys, George Boyne, Jennifer Law, Richard Walker 2008, 'Organizational Strategy, External Regulation and Public Service Performance', Public Administration 86(1), pp. 185-203.
- Arendt, Hannah 1963, On Revolution, New York, Penguin Books.
- Arendt, Hannah 1958/1950, The Human Condition, Chicago and London, The University of Chicago Press.
- ARTnews 1993, 'Peaceful performance', Vol 92(2), pp. 52; 61.
- Auslander, Philip 1999, Liveness: Performance in a Mediatized Culture, New York, Routledge.
- Ausport 2008, 'High Performance', The Australian Sports Commission www.ausport.gov.au/participating/coaches/high_performance accessed 12/4/2008.
- Austin, John 1955, How To Do Things With Words, J.O. Urmson and Marina Sbisa (eds), Cambridge Mass., Harvard University Press. (NB: most references give 1962 as the year of publication. The 1955 version is cited by Judith Butler. Austin's work did take place in the 1950's, although much of it was not published until after his death. I have retained 1955 in order to indicate the earlier date of Austin's use of 'performative').
- Bacon, Wallace 1975, 'The Dangerous Shores a Decade Later', in Richard Haas and David Williams (ed), The Study of Interpretation: Theory and Comment, Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill; cited in Fine & Speer 1977: 374.
- Ball, Terence 1995, 'Hobbes's Linguistic Turn', in Reappraising Political Theory, Oxford, Clarendon Press.
- Barba, Eugenio and Nicola Savarese 2005, A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer, 2nd Ed., London and New York, Routledge.
- Barker, Geoffrey 2008, 'Politics: Not up to export quality', Australian Policy Online 07.03.2008, www.apo.org.au, accessed 13/03/2008.
- Barrett, Pat 2002, 'The Role of Performance Auditing in Strengthening Democracies' Address to University of Canberra students – Graduate Certificate in Performance Audit, ANAO.
- Barrett, Pat 2001, 'Evaluation and Performance Auditing: Shared Ground' Canberra Bulletin of Public Administration 102, pp. 42-48.
- Bartky, Sandra Lee 1988, 'Foucault, Femininity, and the Modernization of Patriarchal Power', in Diamond and Quinby (eds), Feminism and Foucault, Boston, Northeastern University press.
- Bauman, Richard 1992, 'Performance', in Bauman (ed), Folklore, Cultural Performances, and Popular Entertainments: A Communication-Centered Handbook, New York, Oxford University Press, pp. 41-9.

- Bauman, Richard 1986a, Story, Performance, and Event: Contextual Studies of Oral Narratives, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press.
- Bauman, Richard 1986b, 'Performance and Honor in 13th-Century Iceland', Journal of American Folklore 99, pp. 131-150.
- Bauman, Richard 1975, 'Verbal Art as Performance', American Anthropologist 77.
- Bell, Vicki 1996, 'The Promise of Liberalism and the Performance of Freedom' in A. Barry, T. Osborne and N. Rose (eds), Foucault and political reason: Liberalism, neo-liberalism and rationalities of government, London, UCL Press.
- Ben-Amos, Dan 1975, 'Introduction', in Dan Ben-Amos and Kenneth Goldstein (eds), Folklore: Performance and Communication, The Hague, Paris, Mouton, pp. 1-7.
- Benton, Carol 1993, 'Performance: Ethical Concerns and Moral Dilemmas' (Review Essay) in Text and Performance Quarterly 15, pp. 97-111.
- Blau, Herbert 1989, 'Universals of performance; or amortizing play'. In By Means of Performance: Intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, R. Schechner and W. Appel (eds), Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 250-272.
- Blau, Herbert 1983, 'Ideology and Performance', Theatre Journal 35(4), pp. 441-460.
- Bleeker, Maaïke 2005, 'Absorption and Focalization Performance and its double', Performance Research 10(1), pp. 48-60.
- Borovits, Israel and Seev Neumann 1979, Computer Systems Performance Evaluation: Criteria, Measurements, Techniques, and Costs, Lexington MA, Lexington Books (in McKenzie 2001: 97).
- Bourdeaux, Carolyn and Grace Chikoto 2008, 'Legislative Influences on Performance Management Reform', Public Administration Review 68(2), pp. 253-265.
- Bourdieu, Pierre 1990, 'Belief and the Body', The Logic of Practice, Stanford, Stanford University Press; cited in Butler 1999: 115.
- Boyett, J.H. and H.P. Conn 1988, Maximum Performance Management: How to Manage and Compensate People to Meet World Competition, Lakewood CO: Glenbridge Publishing (in McKenzie 2001: 60).
- Brecht, Bertold 1964, 'A Short Organum for the Theatre' in Brecht on Theatre, trans. John Willett, New York, Hill and Wang, pp. 179-205.
- Brenneis, Donald 1987, 'Performing Passions: Aesthetics and Politics in an Occasionally Egalitarian Community', American Ethnologist 14(2), pp. 236-250.
- Brenton, Scott 2005, 'Public Confidence in Australian Democracy'. Democratic Audit of Australia May 2005.
- Brown, Keith and Dimitrios Theodossopoulos 2000, 'The Performance of Anxiety: Greek Narratives of War in Kosovo', Anthropology Today 16(1), pp. 3-8.
- Buckner, Margaret 2004, 'Performing the Nation: Swahili Music and Cultural Politics in Tanzania (review)', Anthropological Quarterly 77(2), pp. 395-401.
- Burke, Brendan and Wendy Haynes 2005, 'Performance Audits', Encyclopedia of Public Administration and Public Policy, 1(1) July, pp. 1-5.
- Burke, Edmund 1808/1756, 'A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, with an Introductory Discourse concerning Taste, and several other Additions', The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, Church-yard, London, Law and Gilbert, for F.C. and J. Rivington, St Paul's. (Burke also uses the term in many of his letters, invariably in terms of writing as a public action).
- Burke, Kenneth 1945, A Grammar of Motives, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.
- Butler, Judith 1999, 'Performativity's Social Magic', in Richard Shusterman (ed), Bourdieu: a Critical Reader, Oxford, Blackwell, pp. 113-119.
- Butler, Judith 1995, 'For A Careful Reading' in L. Nicholson (ed), Feminist Contentions: A Philosophical Exchange, New York, Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1993, Bodies That Matter: On the Discursive Limits of 'Sex', London, Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1990, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, New York, Routledge.
- Burns, Elizabeth 1972, Theatricality, London, Longman.
- Calkowski, Marcia S. 1991, 'A Day at the Tibetan Opera: Actualized Performance and Spectacular Discourse', American Ethnologist 18(4), pp. 643-657.
- Campbell, Patrick 1971a, 'Performance: The Pursuit of Folly', The Speech Teacher 20(4), 263-274.
- Campbell, Patrick 1971b, 'Communication Aesthetics', Today's Speech 19, pp. 7-18.
- Carlson, Marvin 2004/1996, Performance: a critical introduction, 2nd ed., New York and London, Routledge.

Case, Sue-Ellen and Janelle Reinelt 1991, The Performance of Power, Iowa City, University of Iowa Press.

Chapple, Boo 2008, 'Bicycle', Australia adlib Australian Broadcasting Commission, <http://www.abc.net.au/arts/adlib/stories/s877535.htm> accessed 12/4/2008

Cheng, Khoo Gaik 2004, 'Perform, State, Interrogate – Then What?', Is Everything a Performance? Are prisoners of war performing? Are torturers performing? Can Performance Studies academics save us? Kakiseni.com Sdn. Bhd, accessed 28/02/2008.

Cherwitz, Richard and Thomas Darwin 1995, 'Why the 'Epistemic' in Epistemic Rhetoric? The Paradox of Rhetoric as Performance' Text and Performance Quarterly 15(3), pp. 189-206.

Chin, Daryl 1998, 'Models of Fashion', PAJ: Journal of Performance & Art 20(3), pp. 22-25.

Clarke, Susan and Erica Chenoweth 2006, 'The Politics of Vulnerability: Constructing Local Performance Regimes for Homeland Security', Review of Policy Research 23(1), p.95ff.

CMIIF 1995, Measuring and Improving Infrastructure Performance, Committee on Measuring and Improving Infrastructure Performance (CMIIF), National Research Council, Washington DC, National Academy Press (in McKenzie 2001: 117).

Cox, Karena 2008, 'Waterman red faced after poor performance', The Mandurah Mail 9 April, <http://mandurah.yourguide.com.au> accessed 12/4/2008

Crane, Mary Thomas 2002, 'What Was Performance?', Criticism 43(2), pp. 169-187.

Crease, Robert 2003, 'Inquiry and performance: analogies and identities between the arts and the sciences', Interdisciplinary Science Reviews, 28(4), pp. 266-272.

Crease, Robert 1993, The Play of Nature: Experimentation as Performance, Bloomington, Indiana University Press.

Curtin, Pamela 1994, 'Performance Theory and Education: Locating the Teacher-Performer in Postmodern Times', Paper presented at the annual conference of the Australian Association for Research in Education, University of Newcastle 28 November-1st December 1994, accessed 12/6/2005.

Darnall, Nicole and Stephen Sides 2008, 'Assessing the Performance of Voluntary Environment Programs: Does Certification Matter?' Policy Studies Journal 36(1), pp. 95-117.

De Man, Paul 1984, 'The Epistemology of Metaphor', in M. Shapiro (ed), Language and Politics, Oxford, Basil Blackwell, pp. 13-30.

De Marinis, Marco 1993, The Semiotics of Performance, Bloomington & Indianapolis, Indiana University Press.

Dening, Greg 1996, Performances, Carlton South, Victoria, Melbourne University Press.

Derrida, Jacques 1976, Of Grammatology, John Hopkins University Press, in Blau 1989.

Diamond, Elin (ed), 1996, Performance and Cultural Politics, London, Routledge.

Diamond, Elin 1995, 'The Shudder of Catharsis in Twentieth-Century Performance', in Andrew Parker and Eve Kosofsky-Sedgwick (eds), Performativity and Performance, New York, Routledge.

Dimple, Godiwala 2004, 'The performativity of the dramatic text': domestic colonialism and Caryl Churchill's Cloud Nine', Studies in Theatre and Performance 24(1), pp. 5-22.

Dobell, Rod 2003, 'The Role of Government and the Government's Role in Evaluating Government: Insider Information and Outside Beliefs', Panel on the Role of Government, University of Victoria www.law-lib.utoronto.ca/investing/reports/rp47.pdf 12th August, 2003; accessed 19/11/2007

Dolan, Jill 2001, 'Performance, Utopia, and the "Utopian Performative"', Theatre Journal 53(3), pp. 455-479.

Dolan, Jill 1993, 'Geographies of Learning: theatre studies, performance and the "performative"', Theatre Journal 45(4), pp. 417-441.

Dredge, Peter 2007, 'Black Line Fever', The Bulletin 25 September 2007, pp. 32-35.

Durant, Robert, Robert Kramer, James Perry, Debra Mesch and Laurie Paarlberg 2006, 'Motivating Employees in a New Government Era: The Performance Paradigm Revisited', Public Administration Review 66(4), pp. 505-514.

Dyer, Richard 1992, Only Entertainment, New York, Routledge.

Economist 1991, 'Yes, they do march together, but sometimes out of step', Economist 29th June, Issue 7713, pp. 15-18.

Economist 1990, 'An impromptu performance', Economist 18th August, Issue 7668, pp. 5-7.

Erickson, Keith 2000, 'Presidential Rhetoric's Visual Turn: Performance Fragments and the Politics of Illusionism', Communication Monographs 67(2), pp. 138-158.

Farnsworth, David and James Fleming 1975, 'Quantitative Dimensions of Congressional Performance in the Twentieth Century', Quality and Quantity 9(3), pp. 265-276.

Fine, Elizabeth and Jean Speer 1977, 'A New Look at Performance', Communication Monographs 44, pp. 374-389.

Fischer-Lichte, Erika 1997, The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective, Iowa City, University of Iowa Press.

Fitzpatrick, Tim 1999, 'Stage Management, Dramaturgy and Spatial Semiotics', Theatre Research International 24(1), <http://global.factiva.com> accessed 17/01/2008.

Fleche, Anne 1997, 'Echoing Autism: Performance, Performativity, and the Writing of Donna Williams', TDR 41(3), pp. 107-121.

Focus 2008, 'Ulrich pays out', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 15.

Foster-Dixon, Gwendolyn 1993, 'Troping the Body: Etiquette Texts and Performance', Text and Performance Quarterly 13(1), pp. 79-97.

Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2003, 'Differentiating the democratic performance of the West', European Journal of Political Research 42(3), pp. 313-340.

Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2001, 'How To Construct a Database of Liberal Democratic Performance', Democratization 8(3), pp. 1-26.

Foweraker, Joe and Roman Krznaric 2000, 'Measuring Liberal Democratic Performance: an Empirical and Conceptual Critique', Political Studies 48(4), pp. 759-788.

Fraser, Mariam 1999, 'Classing Queer: Politics in Competition', Theory, Culture and Society 16(2), pp. 107-131.

Friedman, Susan Stanford 2002, "'Border Talk", Hybridity, and Performativity', Eurozine, <http://www.eurozine.com/articles/2002-06-07-friedman-en.html> accessed 16/11/2005.

Fuoss, Kirk 1993, 'Performance as Contestation: An Agonistic Perspective on the Insurgent Assembly', Text and Performance Quarterly 13(4), pp. 331-350.

Fusco, Coco 1998, presentation at Duke University; discussed in Madison 1999: 122n1.

Gaonkar, Dilip Parameshwar and Elizabeth Povinelli 1993, 'Technologies of Public Forms: Circulation, Transfiguration, Recognition', Public Culture 15(3), pp. 385-397.

Garnett, James, Justin Marlowe and Sanjay Pandey 2008, 'Penetrating the Performance Predicament: Communication as a Mediator or Moderator of organizational Culture's Impact on Public Organizational Performance', Public Administration Review 68(2), pp. 266-281.

Giardinelli, Mempo 2001, 'It's the Democracy, Stupid!', World Press Review 48(10), p. 47.

Gibson, Rachel and Robert Harmel 1998, 'Party families and democratic performance: Extraparliamentary vs parliamentary group power', Political Studies 46(3), pp. 633-651.

Giesen, Bernhard 2005, 'Performing Transcendence in Politics: Sovereignty, Deviance, and the Void of Meaning', Sociological Theory 23(3).

Gingrich-Philbrook, Craig 1997, 'Review Essay: The Unnatural Performative: Resisting Phenomenal Closure', Text and Performance Quarterly 17, pp. 123-133.

Godard, Barbara 2000, 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context', Modern Drama 43, pp. 327-358.

Goffman, Erving 1971, Relations in Public, New York, Basic Books.

Goffman, Erving 1967, Interaction Ritual, New York, Doubleday Anchor.

Goffman, Erving 1963, Behavior in Public Places, Garden City New York, Doubleday Anchor.

Goffman, Erving 1959, The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life, Garden City New York, Doubleday Anchor.

Goldhill, Simon and Robin Osborne 1999, Performance Culture and Athenian Democracy, Cambridge UK, New York, Cambridge University Press.

Goodman, Lizbeth 2000, 'The Politics of Performativity in the Age of Replay Culture' in Lizbeth Goodman and Jane De Gay (eds) The Routledge Reader in Politics and Performance, London, Routledge, pp. 288-294.

Gray, Jonathan 2001, 'Striking Social Dramas, Image Events, and Meme Warfare: Performance and Social Activism – Past, Present and Future', Text and Performance Quarterly 21(1), pp. 64-76.

- Greene, Jennifer 1999, 'The Inequality of Performance Measurements', Evaluation 5(2), pp. 160-173.
- Growden, Greg 2008, 'Giteau to sit out the Reds', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 14.
- Guss, David 2000, The festive state: race, ethnicity, and nationalism as cultural performance, Berkeley California, University of California Press.
- Hajer, Maarten and Justus Uttermark 2008, 'Performing Authority: Discursive Politics After the Assassination of Theo Van Gogh', Public Administration 86(1), pp. 5-19.
- Halloran, Jessica 2008, 'Sally's bid stutters', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 15
- Hamilton, Jennifer 2005, 'Comparative Democratic Institutions in Fourteen African Regimes: The Implications for Democratic Performance', paper read at the Annual Meeting, Midwestern Political Science Association, Chicago.
- Hanlon, Peter 2008, 'Blues win the game Pies couldn't lose', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 9.
- Harrop, Peter 2007, 'This Play Was Acted Here Before Stream Repetition and Embodiment', paper presented at the Repeat Repeat Conference 2007, Centre for Practice as Research in the Arts, University of Chester, www.cpara.co.uk/events/repeatrepeat/embodiment/harrop.html accessed 7/03/2008.
- Harrop, Peter 2004, 'Performance and Civility: The making and unmaking of strangers', Performance Research 9(4), pp. 134-138.
- Hawes, Leonard 1998, 'Becoming-Other-Wise: Conversational Performance and the Politics of Experience', Text and Performance Quarterly 18(4), pp. 273-300.
- Herzfeld, Michael 1985, The Poetics of Manhood: Contest and Identity in a Cretan Mountain Village, Princeton, Princeton University Press.
- Hinckley, June 1998, 'Beyond Performance', Music Educators Journal 85(2), pp. 6-8.
- Honig, B. 1992, 'Toward an Agonistic Feminism: Hannah Arendt and the Politics of Identity', in J. Butler and Joan Scott (eds), Feminists Theorize the Political, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 215-235.
- Honig, B. 1993, 'Declarations of Independence: Arendt and Derrida on the Problem of Founding a Republic', in Frederick Dolan and Thomas Dunn (eds), Rhetorical Republic, Amherst, University of Massachusetts Press, pp. 201-225.
- Hughes, Holly 1996, 'Introduction', Clit Notes: A Sapphic Sampler, New York, Grove Press.
- Hughes-Freeland, Felicity 2004, 'Performance: Anthropological Aspects', International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, Elsevier, pp. 11231-11236.
- Hughes-Freeland, Felicity 1998, 'Introduction' in Felicity Hughes-Freeland (ed), Ritual, Performance, Media, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 1-28.
- Huxley, Michael and Noel Witts (eds) 1996, The Twentieth-Century Performance Reader, London, Routledge.
- Hymes, Dell 1975, 'Breakthrough into Performance' in Dan Ben-Amos and Kenneth Goldstein (eds), Folklore: Performance and Communication, The Hague, Paris, Mouton, pp. 11-74.
- Isbell, Billie Jean 1998, 'Violence in Peru: Performances or Dialogues?' American Anthropologist 100(2), pp. 282-293.
- Jackman, R. 1973, 'On the relation of economic development to democratic performance', American Journal of Political Science 17, pp. 611-621.
- Jackson, Shannon 1993, 'Ethnography and the Audition: Performance as Ideological Critique', Text and Performance Quarterly 13(1), pp. 21-44.
- Jarmon, Leslie 1996, 'Performance as a Resource in the Practice of Conversational Analysis', Text and Performance Quarterly 16(4), pp. 336-356.
- Joseph, Miranda 1998, 'The Performance of Production and Consumption', Social Text 54, pp. 25-61.
- Kane, Peter 2000, 'Performing Absence: The Staged Personal Narrative as Testimony', Text and Performance Quarterly 20(1), pp. 20-43.
- Kao, John 1996, Jamming: The Art and Discipline of Business Creativity, NY, HarperBusiness, (in McKenzie 2001: 63-4).
- Kapferer, Bruce 1984, 'The Ritual Process and the Problem of Reflexivity in Sinhalese Demon Exorcisms', in J.J. MacAloon (ed), Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, Philadelphia, The Institute for the Study of Human Issues.
- Kassel David 2008, 'Performance, Accountability, and the Debate over Rules', Public Administration Review 68(2), pp. 241-252.
- Kershaw, Baz 1992, 'Performance, community, culture' in The Politics of Performance, London, Routledge, pp. 15-40.

Khee, Pang 2004, 'Foreword', in Khee (ed), Is Everything a Performance? Are prisoners of war performing? Are torturers performing? Can Performance Studies academics save us? Kakiseni.com Sdn. Bhd, accessed 28/02/2008.

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, Barbara 1999, 'Performance Studies', acciones y lugares, www.eldesptador.info/accionylugar.htm accessed 8/8/2005.

Kochhar-Lindgren, Gray 1999, 'Naming the Abyss: Aeschylus, the law, and the future of democracy', Angelaki: Journal of the Theoretical Humanities 4(1), pp. 127-135.

Kulynych, Jessica 1998, 'Performing Politics: Foucault, Habermas, and Postmodern Participation', Polity 30(2), pp. 315-346.

Laclau, Ernesto 1989, 'Preface', in Slavoj Zizek, The Sublime Object of Ideology, London and New York, Verso; cited in Butler 1999: 119.

Langellier, Kristin 1999, 'Personal Narrative, Performance, Performativity: Two or Three Things I Know For Sure', Text and Performance Quarterly 19, pp. 125-144.

La Pérouse, Jean Francois de 1799, A Voyage Round the World Performed in the Years 1785-1788 by the Boussole and Astrolable, London, J. Stockdale; in Denning 1996: xii.

Lapinski, John 2008, 'Policy Substance and Performance in American Lawmaking, 1877-1994', American Journal of Political Science 52(2), pp. 235-251.

Lawton, John Brooks III, 1998, 'Performing Politics: A Theatre-Based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions', www.sanestorm.com/performing_politics.pdf accessed 14/9/2007.

Lawton, Aaron 2008, 'Warriors pass the test', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 6

Lee, Josephine 1999, 'Disciplining Theater and Drama in the English Department: Some Reflections on 'Performance' and Institutional History', Text and Performance Quarterly 19, pp. 145-158.

Lehmann-Haupt, Christopher 1996, 'Press coverage as performance art', New York Times, Vol 145(50314).

Lijphart, A. 1994, 'Democracies: forms, performance, constitutional engineering', European Journal of Political Research 25, pp. 1-17.

Long, Chester 1974, The Liberal Art of Interpretation, New York, Harper and Row.

Lynn, Laurence E. Jr 2006, 'The Performance of Performance', Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory 16, pp. 633-642.

Lyotard, J-F 1984/1979, The Post-Modern Condition: A Report on Knowledge, trans. G. Bennington & B. Massumi, Manchester, Manchester University Press.

MacAloon, J. 'Introduction', in J. MacAloon (ed), Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, Philadelphia, The Institute for the Study of Human Issues, pp. 1-15.

Mackenzie, Adrian 2005, 'The Performativity of Code: Software and Cultures of Circulation' Theory, Culture & Society 22(1), pp. 71-93.

Mackinley, Elizabeth 2003, 'Performing race, culture, and gender in an indigenous Australian women's music and dance classroom', Communication Education Vol 52(3-4), pp. 258-273.

Madison, D. Soyini 1999, 'Performing Theory/Embodied Writing', Text and Performance Quarterly 19(2), pp. 107-125.

MacGowan, Fiona 2000, 'Dancing with a Difference: Reconfiguring the Poetic Politics of Aboriginal Ritual as National Spectacle', The Australian Journal of Anthropology 11(3), pp. 308-321.

Mallard, Alexandre 2007, 'Performance testing: dissection of a consumerist experience', Sociological Review 2007, pp. 152-172

Marcuse, Herbert 1955, Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud, New York, Vintage.

Martin, Randy 1989, Performance as Political Act: the Embodied Self, Mass., Bergin and Garvey Publishers.

Marranca, Bonnie 1987, 'Performance World, Performance Culture', Performing Arts Journal 10(3), pp. 21-29.

Maserati 2007, 'The New Quattroporte Automatic', The Bulletin 25 September, p. 5.

Matthews, Brander 1917, These Many Years: Recollections of a New Yorker, New York, Charles Scribner's Sons.

Matthews, Brander 1910, A Study of the Drama, New York, Houghton Mifflin.

Matthews, Brander 1907, Inquiries and Opinions, New York, Charles Scribner's Sons.

May, Peter 2008, 'Performance-Based Regulation and Regulatory Regimes: The Saga of Leaky Buildings', Law and Policy 30 (v1Virtual Issue), pp. 381-401.

McKee, Alan, 2005, The Public Sphere: An Introduction, Cambridge University Press.

McKenzie, Jon 2001, Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance, London, Routledge.

McKinsey and company 2008, 'How the best performing school systems come out on top', Australian Policy Online 28/02/2008, www.apo.org.au accessed 28/02/2008.

McLaren, P. 1988, 'The liminal servant and the roots of critical pedagogy', Language Arts 65(2), pp. 164-179.

Meadmore, Daphne and Peter Meadmore 2004, 'The Boundlessness of Performativity in Elite Australian Schools', Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education, 25(3), pp. 375-388.

Mounsef, Donia 2003, 'Introduction: Performing the Text, Performing the Self', The Yale Journal of Criticism 16(1), pp. 147-148.

Myers, David 1995, 'Institutional performance, political culture and political change', Studies in Comparative International Development 30(1), pp. 84-102.

New Republic 1977, 'Democracy's Other Component', New Republic 29th January, 176(5), pp. 7-10.

Newton, Kenneth 2008, 'Political Support: Social Capital, Civil Society and Political and Economic Performance', Political Studies, 56 (Virtual Issue), pp. 846-864.

Noble, Stephen E. 2005, 'Mental Illness Through Popular Theater: Performing (In)Sanely', in Randee Lipson Lawrence (ed), Artistic Ways of Knowing: Expanded Opportunities for Teaching and Learning: New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education, No 107, A Print on Demand title from Jossey-Bass, John Wiley and Sons, www.josseybass.com/WileyCDA/Wiley Title/.

Orbuch, Terri 1997, 'People's accounts count: the Sociology of Accounts', Annual Review of Sociology 23, pp. 455-478.

Paget, Derek 2002, 'Acting a part: performing docudramas', MIA 104 (August),

Pandaram, Jamie 2008a, 'Wallace blew chance: Locky', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 5

Pandaram, Jamie 2008b, 'Ennis is poultry in motion as Broncs cheer', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 5

Papa. Lee 1999, '"We gotta make up our minds": Waiting for Lefty, Workers' Theatre Performance and Audience Identification', Text and Performance Quarterly 19(1), pp. 57-74.

Parker, Andrew and Eva Kosofsky Sedgwick (eds), 1995 Performativity and Performance New York, Routledge.

Passow, Wilfried and R. Strauss 1981, 'The Analysis of Theatrical Performance: The State of the Art', Poetics Today 2(3), pp. 237-254.

Pharr, Susan and Robert Putnam 2000, 'A quarter-century of declining confidence', Journal of Democracy 11(2), pp 5-26.

Pandey, Sanjay and James Garnett 2006, 'Exploring Public Sector Communication Performance: Testing a Model and Drawing Implication', Public Administration Review 66(1), p. 37ff.

Parry, Geraint 1967, 'Performative Utterances and Obligation in Hobbes', Philosophical Quarterly 17, pp. 246-252.

Peiss, Kathy 1996, 'Making Up, Making Over: Cosmetics, Consumer Culture, and Women's Identity', in Victoria de Grazia (ed), The sex of things: gender and consumption in historical perspective, University of California Press.

Pelias, Ronald and James VanOosting 1987, 'A Paradigm for Performance Studies', Quarterly Journal of Speech 73, pp. 219-231.

Phelan, Peggy 1993, Unmarked: The Politics of Performance, New York, Routledge.

Phelan, Peggy and Jill Lane 1998, The Ends of Performance, New York, New York University Press.

Pineau, E. 1994, 'Teaching is performance: Reconceptualising a problematic metaphor', American Educational Research Journal (31(1), pp. 3-25.

Pocock, J.G.A. 1973, 'Verbalizing a Political Act: Towards a Politics of Speech', Political Theory 1(1), pp. 27-45.

Poirier, Richard 1971, The Performing Self, New York, Oxford University Press; in Fine and Speer 1977: 380.

Pollock, Della 1998, 'Performing Writing', in Peggy Phelan and Jill Lane (eds), The ends of performance, New York, New York University Press, pp. 73-103.

Postlewait, Thomas and Tracy Davis 2003, 'Theatricality: an Introduction', in Davis and Postlewait (eds), Theatricality, Cambridge University Press.

Prichard, Greg 2008, 'Prince a worthy heir but Thurston still halfback king', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 4.

- Radin 2006, Challenging the Performance Movement: Accountability, Complexity and Democratic Values, Washington DC, Georgetown University Press.
- Reed, Cheryl, David Spicer, Darren Harris and Timothy Haslett 2006, 'Australian Government health program evaluation: Who are the evaluators?' Paper presented at the 2006 International Conference of the Australasian Evaluation Society, Darwin, 4 – 7 September, www.aes.asn.au/conferences/2006/papers/113%20Cheryl%20Reed.pdf accessed October 2007.
- Reiger, Kerreen and Rhea Dempsey 2008, 'Performing Birth in a Culture of Fear: An embodied crisis of late modernity', Health Sociology Review 2008, eContent Management Pty Ltd., accessed 12/4/2008.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2002, 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality', SubStance 31(2&3), pp. 201-215.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2001, 'Performing Europe: Identity Formation for a "New" Europe', Theatre Journal 53(3), pp. 365-387.
- Reinelt, Janelle 1994, 'Staging the Invisible: The Crisis of Visibility in Theatrical Representation', Text and Performance Quarterly 14(2), pp. 97-118.
- Reinelt, Janelle and Joseph Roach (eds) 1992, Critical Theory and Performance, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press.
- Reuters 2008, 'We're still underdogs: Hackett', in Sport, The Sydney Morning Herald 14 April, p. 14
- Rice, Tom and Alexander Sumberg 1998, 'Civic culture and Public Administration performance in the American states', Publius 28(1), pp. 99-115.
- Richards, Sandra 1995, 'Writing the Absent Potential: Drama, Performance, and the Canon of African-American Literature', in Andrew Parker and Eve Kosofsky-Sedgwick (eds), Performativity and Performance, New York, Routledge.
- Roach, Joseph 1996, Cities of the Dead, New York, Columbia University.
- Roach, Joseph 1995, 'Culture and Performance in the Circum-Atlantic World', in Andrew Parker and Eve Kosofsky-Sedgwick (eds), Performativity and Performance, New York, Routledge.
- Roach, Joseph 1985, The Player's Passion, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press.
- Robinson, Marc et al 1987, 'Performance Strategies', Performing Arts Journal 10(3), pp. 31-55.
- Roche, Colleen 2006, 'How to Perform', Official HSC Guide, The Sydney Morning Herald June 2006, pp. 36-38.
- Roloff, Leland 1973, The Perception and Evocation of Literature, Glenview, Scott, Foresman.
- Roms, Heike 2004, 'Performing Polis: theatre, nationness and civic identity in post-devolution Wales', Studies in Theatre & Performance 24(3), pp. 177-192.
- Rosenfeld, Lawrence, Lauries Hayes and Thomas Frentz 1976, The Communicative Experience, Boston, Allyn and Bacon; in Fine and Speer 1977: 387.
- Rothenberg, Molly Anne and Joseph Valente 1997, 'Performative Chic: The Fantasy of a Performative Politics', College Literature 24(1), pp. 295-305.
- Sadono, Regina Fletcher 1999, 'Performing Symptoms', Text and Performance Quarterly 19, pp. 159-171.
- Sanders III, James 1999, 'Dissertation as Performance', International Journal of Qualitative Studies in Education (QSE), Vol 12(5).
- Sandifer, Charles 1971, 'From Print to Rehearsal: A Study of Principles for Adapting Literature to Readers Theatre', The Speech Teacher 20(2), pp. 115-120.
- Sartori, Giovanni 1991, 'Rethinking democracy: bad polity and bad politics', International Social Science Journal 43(3), pp. 437-451.
- Scalmer, Sean 2002, Dissent Events: Protest, The Media and the Political Gimmick in Australia, University of New South Wales Press.
- Schachter, Hindy Lauer 1995, 'Reinventing government or reinventing ourselves: two models for improving government performance', Public Administration Review 55(6), pp. 530-537.
- Schauble, John 2000, 'Wooden performances in courts owe more to the theatre than the law', Sydney Morning Herald 14th October.
- Schechner, Richard 2003, Performance Theory, New York, Routledge.
- Schechner, Richard 2002, Performance Studies: An Introduction, London and New York, Routledge.
- Schechner, Richard 1988, Performance Theory, New York, Routledge; see also Kershaw 1992: 23.
- Schechner, Richard 1985, Between Theater and Anthropology, Philadelphia, Pa, University of Pennsylvania Press.

- Schechner, Richard 1977, Essays on Performance Theory 1970-1976, New York, Drama Book Specialists.
- Schechner, Richard 1973, 'Performance and the Social Sciences' The Drama Review 17, pp. 5-36.
- Schieffelin, Edward 1985, 'Performance and the Cultural Construction of Reality', American Ethnologist, 12, pp. 707-724.
- Schieffelin, Edward 1998, 'Problematizing Performance' in Felicity Hughes-Freeland (ed), Ritual, Performance, Media, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 194-207.
- Schmidt, Manfred 2002, 'Political performance and types of democracy: findings from comparative studies' European Journal of Political Research 41(1), pp. 147-164.
- Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky 1993, 'Queer Performativity: Henry James' The Art of the Novel, glq: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies 1(1), pp. 1-16.
- Shand, Adam 2006, 'The Outsiders', The Bulletin November 14, 2006, pp. 20-25.
- Singer, Milton 1959, Traditional India: Structure and Change, Philadelphia.
- Skinner, Quentin 1971, 'On Performing and Explaining Linguistic Actions', The Philosophical Quarterly 21(82), pp. 1-21.
- Sodhi, Gaurav 2008, 'Five out of ten: a performance report on the Regional Assistance Mission to the Solomon Islands (RAMSI)', Australian Policy Online 3rd February 2008, www.apo.org.au/linkboard/print-version.chtml?filename_num=191804 accessed 7/2/2008.
- Sports Dietitians Australia 2008, 'Creatine Supplementation and Sports Performance', www.sportsdietitians.com.au/www/html/1940-creatine-supplementation-and-sports-performance accessed 12/4/2008.
- States, Bert 1996, 'Performance as Metaphor'. Theatre Journal 48(1), pp. 1-26.
- Steadman, Ian 1992, 'Performance and politics in process: practices of representation in South African Theatre', Theatre Survey 33(2), pp. 188-211.
- Stern, Carol S. and Bruce Henderson 1993, Performance: Texts and Contexts, London, Routledge.
- Stoeltje, Beverly 1978, 'Cultural Frames and Reflections: Ritual, Drama, and Spectacle' Current Anthropology 19(2), pp. 450-451.
- Stone, Lynda 1999a, 'Educational Reform through an Ethic of Performativity: Introducing the Special Issue', Studies in Philosophy and Education 18, pp. 299-307.
- Stone, Lynda 1999b, 'Experience and Performance: Contrasting 'Identity' in Feminist Theorizings', Studies in Philosophy and Education 18, pp. 327-337.
- Street, John 2004 'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation', BJPIR 6, pp. 435-452.
- Strine, Mary, Beverly Whitaker Long and Mary Frances Hopkins 1990, 'Research in Interpretation and Performance Studies: Trends, Issues, Priorities', in Gerald Phillips and Julia Wood (eds) Speech Communication: Essays to Commemorate the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Speech Communication Association, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, pp. 181-204.
- Tang, Patricia 2005, 'Negotiating Performance in Senegalese Popular Music: Sound, Image, and the Ethnomusicologist as Exoticized "Other"', Journal of Popular Music Studies 17(3).
- Taviani, Ferdinando 2005, 'Views: The view of the performer and the view of the spectator' in Barba, Eugenio and Nicola Savarese (eds), A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer, 2nd Ed., London and New York, Routledge.
- Taylor, Frederick Winslow 1967/1911, The Principles of Scientific Management, New York, W.W. Norton & Company.
- Taylor, James and David Felten 1993, Performance by Design: Sociotechnical Systems in North America, Englewood Cliffs NJ, Prentice-Hall (in McKenzie 2001: 70).
- Thompson, Frank and Norma Riccucci 1998, 'Reinventing Public Administration', Annual Review of Political Science 1(1), pp. 231-258.
- Thompson, James 2006, 'Performance of pain, performance of beauty' Research in Drama Education 11(1), pp. 47-58.
- Tilbury, Clare 2006, 'Accountability via Performance Measurement: The Case of Child Protection Services', Australian Journal of Public Administration 65(3), p. 48ff.
- TIS 2008, 'Sports Performance', The Sports Performance Unit of the Tasmanian Institute of Sport, www.tis.tas.gov.au/pages/sportperformance.html accessed 12/4/2008.
- Turner, Victor 1990, 'Are there universals of performance in myth, ritual, and drama?', in R. Schechner & W. Appel (eds), By means of performance: intercultural studies of theatre and ritual, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press.
- Turner, Victor 1988, 'The Anthropology of Performance', The Anthropology of Performance, New York, PAJ Publications, pp. 72-98.

Turner, Victor 1984, 'Liminality and the Performance Genre', in J. MacAloon (ed), Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, Philadelphia, The Institute for the Study of Human Issues, pp. 19-41.

Turner, Victor 1977, 'Cultural Frames and Reflections' Conference, Austria, Wenner-Gren Foundation August 27 – September 5; reported by Stoeltje 1978.

Turner, Victor 1974, Dramas, Fields and Metaphors: Symbolic Action in Human Society, Ithaca, London, Cornell University Press.

Turner, Victor 1957, Schism and Continuity in an African Society: a Study of Ndembu Village Life, Manchester University Press.

Urban, Rebecca 2007, '50 Most Influential in Business', The Bulletin 25 September 2007, p. 45.

USC 2008, 'Understanding and enhancing sports performance', University of the Sunshine Coast, Queensland www.usc.edu.au/Research/Centres/CHASE/Strengths/SportsPerformance.htm accessed 12/4/2008.

Vaill, Peter 1989, Managing as a Performing Art: New Ideas for a World of Chaotic Change, San Francisco CA, Jossey-Bass Publishers (in McKenzie 2001: 60).

Walker, Julia 2003, 'Why Performance? Why Now? Textuality and the Rearticulation of Human Presence', The Yale Journal of Criticism, 16(1), pp. 149-175.

Wallace Ingraham, Patricia 2005, 'Performance: Promises to Keep and Miles to Go', Public Administration Review 65(4), pp. 390-395.

Ward, Cynthia 1994, 'Twins Separated at Birth? West African Vernacular and Western Avant Garde Performativity in Theory and Practice', Text and Performance Quarterly 14(4), pp. 269-288.

Ward, James and Diana Winstanley 2005, 'Coming out at work: performativity and the recognition and renegotiation of identity', The Sociological Review 2005.

Warren, John T. 1999, 'The Body Politic: Performance, Pedagogy, and the Power of Enfleshment', Text and Performance Quarterly 19(3), pp.

Waterford, Jack 2007, 'Performance pay is a trickier idea than it might first seem', Australian Policy Online 13-06-2007, www.apo.org.au/webboard/print-version.chtml?filename_num=153771 accessed 18/06/2007.

Watrous, Peter 1994, 'Young players cooperate and democracy works', New York Times 15th October, Vol 144(49850), p.17.

Welsh, Friedrich and José Carrasquero 1995, 'Democratic deconsolidation in Venezuela? Performance and normative legitimacy', International Social Science Journal 146.

West, Darrell 2005, Digital Government: Technology and Public Sector Performance, Princeton University Press.

Williams, Richard 1998, Performance Management: Perspectives on Employee Performance, London, International Thomson Business Press (in McKenzie 2001: 59).

Worthen, W.B. 1998, 'Drama, Performativity, and Performance', PMLA 113(5), pp. 1093-1107.

Yang, Kaifeng and Marc Holzer 2006, 'The Performance-Trust Link: Implications for Performance Measurement', Public Administration Review 66(1), p. 114ff

¹ Initial characteristics based on Blau's 1989 article 'The Universals of Performance' and supplemented with material from other theorists and authors.

² Blau is sympathetic to anthropological uses of performance as a means of generating trans-cultural communitas (Turner 1982) but believes this 'admirable mission' is doomed to fail because the performer is always the 'other': this is the only thing which crosses cultures: 'the sense of removal or distance ... is the precondition of [the performer's] charm' (269).

³ McKenzie stresses that performance power does not replace disciplinary; rather it displaces it, and uses it.

⁴ McKenzie stresses that performance need not be appropriative.

⁵ Austin regarded theatrical language as derived from everyday language.

⁶ MacAloon argues that Turner began with a theatre metaphor (social drama) but subsequently came to argue that theatre was derived from social drama (MacAloon 1984: 3). Although Turner argued in 1957 that 'social drama' was 'a useful description and analytical tool ... [for] social anthropology' (Turner 1957: 92) it was not really clear that he was using the term metaphorically. The only reference to theatre was an analogy between Greek tragedy and the way individuals in his social dramas seemed to be tempting but ultimately always overwhelmed by Fate (1957: 38-41), and the term ‘principal characters’ (1957: 94). If anything, he uses the metaphor of a boxing ring: individuals ‘fight[] their own corner’ (1957: 41). He later said that ‘a cultural form was the model for a social scientific concept’ (Turner 1974: 32) because he came to see performance as processual: ‘in our daily life, social dramas ... continue to emerge ... but the cultural ways we have of becoming aware of them – rituals, stage plays, carnival, anthropological monographs, pictorial exhibitions, films – vary with culture, climate, technology, group history, and the demography of individual genius’ (1984: 20), yet even here, it is far from clear that it is a theatre metaphor. For Turner, ‘the social drama form is ... universal ... It is not yet an aesthetic mode, for it is fully embodied in daily living’ (MacAloon 1984: 25). By 1988, Turner was explicitly denying that his idea of ‘social drama’ was metaphoric and was critical of people who imputed ‘theatricality’ into the idea as if it involved a distinction between ‘appearance’ and ‘reality’. This distinction may not be applicable outside Western culture (MacAloon 1984: 6-7). It seems that Turner may have thought of drama in its original Greek sense, as related to doing. Stoeltje reports that Turner insisted that ‘public reflexivity takes the shape of performance and communicates through “dramatic, that is doing codes”’ (Turner 1977 quoted in Stoeltje 1978). Drama was about doing, and could take the form of social drama or aesthetic drama. The potential for misunderstanding seems to have arisen very early. In the Foreword to the 1968 reprinting of Schism and Continuity, Max Gluckman said ‘I hope no-one will turn away from his [Turner’s] analysis in dislike of the phrase “social drama”. Several of us have tried, with Turner, to find another phrase ... we have failed to, and he would be grateful for suggestions’ (Gluckman 1968: xii). Turner suggests in Schism and Continuity that ‘social drama’ might be a useful concept for sociological analyses because it reveals social structure (Turner 1957: 231). He does not elaborate on this, but this suggests that he was not familiar at the time with the work of Goffman.

⁷ Critics of Butler contend that Butler’s concept of performativity is essentially theatrical. (See Rothenberg and Valente 1997).

⁸ Reinelt appears to have gone through a period of using performance in a fairly loose way prior to 2002, when she specifically confronted the relationship between theatricality and performativity and in the process clarified performance and performative as well, at least in terms of her take on their intersection with theatre. See Reinelt 2001 and 2002.

Appendix E Table 2: Defining Performativity

PERFORMATIVITY
PERFORMATIVITY IS:		THEORIST	FIELD	SOURCE
About signification		Lyotard 1979 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Fleche 1997 Reinelt 2002 Godard 2000 Walker 2003 Curtin 2005	Language/Postmodernity/ Capitalism Theatre history/practice Psychology/Autism Theatre research Translation Performance/cultural theory Teaching	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology Theatre/Semiotics Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Language/Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism
A form of optimization	‘Performativity is legitimation defined as the maximization of a system’s output and the minimization of its input. It normalizes activities by optimizing a system’s performance’ (McKenzie 2001: 163) and operates at ‘a certain level of terror ... be operational ... or disappear’ (Lyotard 1979: xxiv)	Lyotard 1979 Marshall 1999 McKenzie 2001 MacKenzie 2005 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Language/Postmodernity/ Capitalism Education Performance Theory Economic Sociology Health Sociology	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology Lyotard/Foucault/Austin/Searle Lyotard/System Theory Butler/Austin Butler/Feminist Writing/Sport Theory
A rhetoric of identity	One of three currently popular ‘rhetorics’ aimed at overcoming/blurring boundaries in conceptions of multiculturalism and diversity	Honig 1992 Reinelt 2001, 2002 Friedman 2002 Carlson 2004/1996	Political theory Theatre research Cultural Theory Theatre theory/history	Austin/Speech Act theory Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Language Austin/Butler/Dolan
The discursive construction of (socially inscribed) identities	‘Performativity [is] not ... a singular or deliberate “act”, but ... the reiterative and citational practice by which discourse produces the effects that it names’ (Butler 1993: 2): ‘a performative	Bourdieu 1990 Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Honig 1992, 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Dolan 1993	Ethnography/Sociology Gender Studies Political Theory Gender Studies Theatre Studies	Speech Act Theory Austin/Foucault/Derrida Austin Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler)

	is that discursive practice that enacts or produces that which it names' (13) through authoritative citation underpinned by 'historically revisable' identificatory practices (14). Performativity extends speech act theory: words not only act but they do so within structural, social, political and cultural contexts. Performance therefore produces identities, power relationships and experience, it does not merely report or enact it (Langellier 1999: 128).	Sedgwick 1993 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Carlson 2004/1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Fleche 1997 Kulynych 1998 Fraser 1999 Langellier 1999 Warren 1999 Kohli 1999 Reinelt 2001, 2002 Walker 2003 Street 2004 Cowlshaw 2004 Conlon 2004 B. Alexander 2004 Jackson 2004 Meadmore et al 2004 Law & Urry 2004 Ward & Winstanley 2005 duGay 2005 Brickell 2005 Muñoz 2005 Feldman 2005 Shand 2006	Queer theory Literature Theatre theory/history/practice Speech Communication Psychology/Autism Political theory Social Sciences Personal Narrative Education Education Theatre research Performance/cultural theory Political Representation Anthropology Gender/Queer theory Race/ethnicity Feminism Education Sociology Gender/Subjectivity Sociology Gender (masculinity) Gender/Queer theory Migration/ethnic relations Identity politics	Austin/Butler Austin/Butler/Theatre Theatre/Austin/Butler/Dolan Austin/Butler Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Honig/Butler Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Speech Act Theory Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Language/Performativity (Butler) Speech Act Theory Butler Butler Butler Butler Austin/Butler/Theatre Butler/Austin Language theory Butler/Goffman Butler Butler Performativity (Butler)
which may also apply to objects	Computer codes can take on 'a social existence' through the same discursive processes Butler proposes for humans (Mackenzie 2005)	McKenzie 2001 Law & Urry 2004 MacKenzie 2004 Mackenzie 2005	Performance Theory Sociology Economic Sociology Computer software	Theatre/organizational theory/technology Austin/Butler/Theatre Butler/Austin Performativity (Butler)
Embodied/Material		Schieffelin 1985, 1998	Anthropology	Process (Turner)

		Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Foster-Dixon 1993 Dolan 1993, 2001 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Carlson 2004/1996 Jarmon 1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Worthen 1998 Kulynych 1998 Warren 1999 Madison 1999 Fraser 1999 McKenzie 2001 B. Alexander 2004 Jackson 2004 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Shand 2006 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Gender Studies Gender Studies Theatre Studies Theatre research African theatre Rhetoric Theatre theory/history Conversation Analysis Speech Communication English/Dance Political theory Education Performance Studies Social Sciences Performance Theory Race/Ethnicity Feminism Gender/Subjectivity Identity politics Health Sociology	Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Theatre Performativity Austin/Butler/Dolan Performativity/drama Austin/Butler Theatre Honig/Butler Austin/Butler Performativity (Butler) Communication Theatre/organizational theory/ technology Butler Butler Performativity (Butler/Austin) Performativity (Butler) Butler/Feminist Writing/Sport Theory
Reiterative	'Performativity ... is always a reiteration of a norm or set of norms (Butler 1993: 12)	Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Fleche 1997 Goodman 2000 Godard 2000 McKenzie 2001 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Feldman 2005	Gender Studies Theatre research Speech Communication Psychology/Autism Theatre/Gender Studies Translation Performance Theory Gender/Subjectivity Migration/ethnic	Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Austin/Butler Theatre (Brecht)/Butler/Austin Theatre/Performativity Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Theatre/organizational theory /technology Performativity (Butler/Austin) Butler

		Shand 2006	relations Identity politics	Performativity (Butler)
Inherent in human expressivity	Expressivity is inherent in any human activity, therefore performativity is inherent in any human activity (Schieffelin 1998)	Schieffelin 1985, 1998	Anthropology	Theatre (as metaphor)/Process (Turner)
A theory of language		Austin 1955 Parry 1967 Honig 1992, 1993 Sedgwick 1993 Walker 2003 duGay 2005	Speech Act Theory Political theory Political theory Anthropology Performance/cultural theory Sociology	Language theory Speech Act Theory (Austin) Austin Austin/Butler Language/Performativity (Butler) Language theory
A theory of action	‘Within speech act theory, a performative is that discursive practice that enacts or produces that which it names’ (Butler 1993: 13).	Austin 1955 Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Honig 1992, 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Kulynych 1998 Hughes-Freeland 1998, 2004 Fraser 1999 Dimple 2004 Street 2004 Law & Urry 2004 Brickell 2005 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	Speech Act Theory Gender Studies Political theory Theatre research Literature Political theory Anthropology Social Sciences Literary Studies Political Representation Sociology Gender (masculinity) Health Sociology	Language theory Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Austin Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Austin/Butler/Theatre Honig/Butler Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/Communication Performativity (Butler) Theatre (as metaphor)/performativity Speech Act Theory Austin/Butler/Theatre Butler/Goffman Butler/Feminist Writing/Sport Theory
A theory about performance		Diamond 1995, 1996 Dolan 1993, 2001 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994	Feminist/Performance theory Theatre Studies Theatre research African theatre	Lacan/Butler Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Theatre

		Worthen 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Street 2004 Khee 2004 Hajer & Uttermark 2008 Reiger & Dempsey 2008	English/Dance Performance Studies Political Representation Performance Studies Public Administration Health Sociology	Theatre Theatre Speech Act Theory Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Bourdieu/Dramaturgy/Theatre/Theatre Butler/Feminist Writing/Sport Theory
A theory about communication		K. Burke 1945 Lyotard 1979 Cherwitz & Darwin 1995 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Jarmon 1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Lawton 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Curtin 2005	Rhetoric/Social Action Language/Postmodernity Rhetoric Literature Conversation Analysis Speech Communication Politics Performance Studies Teaching	Literature/Theatre/Communication Language theory/Austin Performativity Austin/Butler/Theatre Performativity/drama Austin/Butler Performance Studies Theatre Theatre/Anthropology/Postmodernism
A theory about identity		Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Dolan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Carlson 2004/1996 Kulynych 1998 Kohli 1999 Cowlishaw 2004 B. Alexander 2004 Jackson 2004 Meadmore et al 2004 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Muñoz 2005 Feldman 2005	Gender Studies Theatre Studies Theatre research Theatre theory/history/practice Political theory Education Anthropology Race/Ethnicity Feminism Education Gender/Subjectivity Gender/Queer theory Migration/ethnic relations	Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Butler Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Theatre/Austin/Butler/Dolan Honig/Butler Butler Butler Butler Butler Butler/Austin Butler Butler
A theory about power	‘Without performativity ... personal narrative risks being a performance practice without a	Lyotard 1979 Bourdieu 1990	Language/Postmodernity/ Capitalism Ethnography/Sociology	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology Speech Act Theory theory of power to interrogate what subject positions are culturally available, what texts and narrative forms and practices are privileged, and what discursive contexts prevail in interpreting experience. Without it we are vulnerable to the charge that performance makes no difference, that it leaves all material and social conditions unchanged ... Performativity asks us to recognize and realize the potential of the performance paradigm ... to show [performativity]' (Langellier 1999: 135).	Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Dolan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Lawton 1999 Warren 1999 Langellier 1999 Lloyd 1999 Kohli 1999 Marshall 1999 Goodman 2000 McKenzie 2001 Street 2004 B. Alexander 2004 Jackson 2004 Meadmore et al 2004 Shand 2006	Gender Studies Theatre Studies Theatre research Speech Communication Politics Education Personal Narrative Politics Education Education Theatre Studies Performance Theory Political Representation Race/Ethnicity Feminism Education Identity politics	Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Austin/Butler Performance Studies Performativity (Butler) Ethnography/Performativity Butler Butler Lyotard/Foucault/Austin/Searle Theatre/Performativity Theatre/organizational theory /technology Speech Act Theory Butler Butler Butler Butler

A theory about knowledge	Performativity is 'a working principle of knowledge' (Carlson 2004: 151). In postmodernity, knowledge is legitimated by 'optimizing the system's performance – efficiency' (Lyotard 1979: xxiv).	Lyotard 1979 Law & Urry 2004 MacKenzie 2004	Language/Postmodernity/ Capitalism Sociology Economic Sociology	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology Austin/Butler/Theatre Austin/Butler
A model of spectatorship	The idea of performance can 'promote wider understanding about the different ways of acting human within the constraints of the group' and how those constraints might be challenged (Hughes-Freeland 2004: 11235)	Hughes-Freeland 2004	Anthropology	Symbolic Action/Sociolinguistics/ Communication
An organizing concept	'the idea of performance or	Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985,	Performance	Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, performativity has emerged as a possible organizing concept for a wider range of cultural, social, and political activities’ (Postlewait and Davis 2003)	1988, 2002, 2003 MacAloon 1984 Calkowski 1991 Dolan 1993 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Parker & Sedgwick 1995 Lawton 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Fraser 1999 Goodman 2000 Godard 2000 Postlewait and Davis 2003 Dimple 2004 Khee 2004 Conlon 2004 Muñoz 2005 Avis 2005 Feldman 2005	Anthropology Anthropology Theatre Studies Theatre research Literature Politics Performance Studies Social Sciences Theatre/Gender Studies Translation Theatre Literary Studies Performance Studies Gender/Queer theory Gender/Queer theory Education Migration/ethnic relations	Goffman) Theatre (as metaphor) Theatre (Brecht)/Speech Act Theory Performativity (Butler) Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Austin/Butler/Theatre Performance Studies Theatre Performativity (Butler) Theatre/Performativity Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Theatre Theatre (as metaphor)/performativity Performativity (Austin)/Theatre Butler Butler Butler Butler

A category	The ‘performative mode’ is a ‘fundamental category’ in contemporary interdisciplinary arts studies (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 15)	Fischer-Lichte 1997	Theatre history/practice	Theatre/Semiotics
A condition (postmodern)	Performativity ‘is the postmodern condition: it demands that all knowledge be evaluated in terms of operational efficiency’ (McKenzie 2001: 14).	Lyotard 1979 McKenzie 2001	Language/Postmodernity/ Capitalism Performance theory	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology Theatre/organizational theory/technology
A challenge	Performativity issues ‘a certain challenge ... a certain level of terror, whether soft or hard: be operational (that is commensurable) or disappear’	Lyotard 1979	Language/Postmodernity	Language theory/Austin/Marx/ technology

	(Lyotard 1979: xxiv)
A term from theatre	Performativity is 'one of the elements of theatricality' (Féral 2002: 5)	Schechner 1973, 1977, 1985, 1988, 2002, 2003 Dolan 1993, 2001 Reinelt 1994, 2001, 2002 Ward 1994 Jarmon 1996 Fischer-Lichte 1997 Worthen 1998 Lawton 1998 Kirshenblatt-Gimblett 1999 Féral 2002 Postlewait and Davis 2003 Dimple 2004 Street 2004	Performance Theatre Studies Theatre research African theatre Conversation Analysis Theatre history/practice English/Dance Politics Performance Studies Theatre Performance Studies Literary Studies Political Representation	Theatre/Anthropology (Turner, Goffman) Performativity (Butler)/Theatre Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Theatre Performativity/drama Theatre/Semiotics Theatre Performance Studies Theatre Theatre Theatre Theatre (as metaphor)/performativity Speech Act Theory
Not a theatre term	The acts of performativity are 'not primarily theatrical' (Butler 1993: 12) although a single performance 'act' may appear theatrical in that it 'hyperboliz[es] existing signifiers' (Lloyd 1999: 202)	Parry 1967 Butler 1988, 1990, 1993, 1995, 1999 Honig 1992, 1993 Foster-Dixon 1993 Dolan 1993 Carlson 2004/1996 Gingrich-Philbrook 1997 Godard 2000 Reinelt 2002 Cowlishaw 2004 Ward & Winstanley 2005 Feldman 2005	Political theory Gender Studies Political theory Gender Studies Theatre Studies Theatre theory/history/practice Speech Communication Translation Theatre research Anthropology Gender/Subjectivity Migration/ethnic relations	Speech Act Theory (Austin) Speech Act Theory/Foucault/Derrida Austin Performativity (Butler) Performativity (Butler) Theatre Austin/Butler Linguistics/Austin/Schechner Theatre/performance theory/practice (Anthropology/Derrida/Austin/Butler) Butler Performativity (Butler/Austin) Butler

Bibliography

- Alexander, Bryant 2004, 'Black Skin/White Masks: The Performative Sustainability of Whiteness (With Apologies to Frantz Fanon)', Qualitative Inquiry 10(5), pp. 647-672.
- Austin, John 1955/1962, How To Do Things With Words, J.O. Urmson and Marina Sbisa (eds), Cambridge Mass., Harvard University Press. (NB: most references give 1962 as the year of publication. The 1955 version is cited by Judith Butler. Austin's work took place in the 1950's, but was not published until after his death. I have retained 1955 in order to indicate the earlier date of Austin's use of 'performative'.
- Avis, James 2005, 'Beyond performativity: reflections on activist professionalism and the labour process in further education', Journal of Education Policy 20(2), pp. 209-222.
- Bourdieu, Pierre 1990, 'Belief and the Body', The Logic of Practice, Stanford, Stanford University Press; cited in Butler 1999: 115.
- Brickell, Chris 2005, 'Masculinities, Performativity, and Subversion', Men & Masculinities 8(1), pp. 24-43.
- Burke, Kenneth 1945, A Grammar of Motives, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.
- Butler, Judith 1999, 'Performativity's Social Magic', in Richard Shusterman (ed), Bourdieu: a Critical Reader, Oxford, Blackwell, pp. 113-119.
- Butler, Judith 1995, 'For A Careful Reading' in L. Nicholson (ed), Feminist Contentions: A Philosophical Exchange, New York, Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1993, Bodies That Matter: On the Discursive Limits of 'Sex', London, Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1990, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, New York, Routledge.
- Butler, Judith 1988, 'Performative Acts and Gender Constitution: An Essay in Phenomenology and Feminist Theory', Theatre Journal 40(4), pp. 519-531.
- Calkowski, Marcia S. 1991, 'A Day at the Tibetan Opera: Actualized Performance and Spectacular Discourse', American Ethnologist 18(4), pp. 643-657.
- Carlson, Marvin 2004/1996, Performance: a critical introduction, 2nd ed., New York and London, Routledge.
- Cherwitz, Richard and Thomas Darwin 1995, 'Why the 'Epistemic' in Epistemic Rhetoric? The Paradox of Rhetoric as Performance' Text and Performance Quarterly 15(3), pp. 189-206.
- Conlon, Deirdre 2004, 'Productive Bodies, Performative Spaces: Everyday Life in Christopher Park', Sexualities 7(4), pp. 462-479.
- Cowlshaw, Gillian 2004, Blackfellas, Whitefellas and the Hidden Injuries of Race, Oxford, Blackwell Publishing.
- Curtin, Pamela 1994, 'Performance Theory and Education: Locating the Teacher-Performer in Postmodern Times', Paper presented at the annual conference of the Australian Association for Research in Education, University of Newcastle 28 November-1st December 1994, accessed 12/6/2005.
- Diamond, Elin (ed), 1996, Performance and Cultural Politics, London, Routledge.
- Diamond, Elin 1995, 'The Shudder of Catharsis in Twentieth-Century Performance', in Andrew Parker and Eve Kosofsky-Sedgwick (eds), Performativity and Performance, New York, Routledge.
- Dimple, Godiwala 2004, '"The performativity of the dramatic text': domestic colonialism and Caryl Churchill's Cloud Nine', Studies in Theatre and Performance 24(1), pp. 5-22.
- Dolan, Jill 1993, 'Geographies of Learning: theatre studies, performance and the "performative"', Theatre Journal 45(4), pp. 417-441.
- duGay 2005, Paul 'Which is the 'self' in 'self-interest'?', Sociological Review 2005, pp. 391-410.
- Feldman, Gregory 2005, 'Essential Crises: A Performative Approach to Migrants, Minorities, and the European Nation-state' Anthropological Quarterly 78(1), pp. 213-246.
- Féral, Josette 2002, 'Foreword', SubStance #98/99, 31(2&3); pp. 3-16.
- Fischer-Lichte, Erika 1997, The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective, Iowa City, University of Iowa Press.
- Fleche, Anne 1997, 'Echoing Autism: Performance, Performativity, and the Writing of Donna Williams', TDR 41(3), pp. 107-121.

Fraser, Mariam 1999, 'Classing Queer: Politics in Competition', Theory, Culture and Society 16(2), pp. 107-131.

Friedman, Susan Stanford 2002, "'Border Talk", Hybridity, and Performativity', Eurozine, <http://www.eurozine.com/articles/2002-06-07-friedman-en.html> accessed 16/11/2005.

Foster-Dixon, Gwendolyn 1993, 'Troping the Body: Etiquette Texts and Performance', Text and Performance Quarterly 13(1), pp. 79-97.

Gingrich-Philbrook, Craig 1997, 'Review Essay: The Unnatural Performative: Resisting Phenomenal Closure', Text and Performance Quarterly 17, pp. 123-133.

Godard, Barbara 2000, 'Between Performative and Performance: Translation and Theatre in the Canadian/Quebec Context', Modern Drama 43, pp. 327-358.

Goodman, Lizbeth 2000, 'The Politics of Performativity in the Age of Replay Culture' in Lizbeth Goodman and Jane De Gay (eds) The Routledge Reader in Politics and Performance, London, Routledge, pp. 288-294.

Hajer, Maarten and Justus Uttermark 2008, 'Performing Authority: Discursive Politics After the Assassination of Theo Van Gogh', Public Administration 86(1), pp. 5-19.

Honig, B. 1992, 'Toward an Agonistic Feminism: Hannah Arendt and the Politics of Identity', in J. Butler and Joan Scott (eds), Feminists Theorize the Political, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 215-235.

Honig, B. 1993, 'Declarations of Independence: Arendt and Derrida on the Problem of Founding a Republic', in Frederick Dolan and Thomas Dunn (eds), Rhetorical Republic, Amherst, University of Massachusetts Press, pp. 201-225.

Hughes-Freeland, Felicity 2004, 'Performance: Anthropological Aspects', International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, Elsevier, pp. 11231-11236.

Hughes-Freeland, Felicity 1998, 'Introduction' in Felicity Hughes-Freeland (ed), Ritual, Performance, Media, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 1-28.

Jackson, Alecia 2004, 'Performativity Identified', Qualitative Inquiry 10(5), pp. 673-690.

Jarmon, Leslie 1996, 'Performance as a Resource in the Practice of Conversational Analysis', Text and Performance Quarterly 16(4), pp. 336-356.

Khee, Pang 2004, 'Foreword', in Khee (ed), Is Everything a Performance? Are prisoners of war performing? Are torturers performing? Can Performance Studies academics save us? Kakiseni.com Sdn. Bhd, accessed 28/02/2008.

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, Barbara 1999, 'Performance Studies', acciones y lugares, www.eldesptador.info/accionylugar.htm accessed 8/8/2005.

Kohli, Wendy 1999, 'Performativity and Pedagogy: The Making of Educational Subjects', Studies in Philosophy and Education 18(5), pp. 319-327.

Kulynych, Jessica 1998, 'Performing Politics: Foucault, Habermas, and Postmodern Participation', Polity 30(2), pp. 315-346.

Langellier, Kristin 1999, 'Personal Narrative, Performance, Performativity: Two or Three Things I Know For Sure', Text and Performance Quarterly 19, pp. 125-144.

Law, John and John Urry 2004, 'Enacting the Social', Economy and Society 33(3), pp. 390-410.

Lawton, John Brooks III, 1998, 'Performing Politics: A Theatre-Based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions', www.sanestorm.com/performing_politics.pdf accessed 14/9/2007.

Lloyd, Moya 1999, 'Performativity, Parody, Politics', Theory, Culture and Society 16(2), pp. 195-213.

Lyotard, J-F 1984/1979, The Post-Modern Condition: A Report on Knowledge, trans. G. Bennington & B. Massumi, Manchester, Manchester University Press.

MacAloon, J. 'Introduction', in J. MacAloon (ed), Rite, Drama, Festival, Spectacle: Rehearsals Toward a Theory of Cultural Performance, Philadelphia, The Institute for the Study of Human Issues, pp. 1-15.

Mackenzie, Adrian 2005, 'The Performativity of Code: Software and Cultures of Circulation' Theory, Culture & Society 22(1), pp. 71-93.

MacKenzie, Donald 2004, 'The big, bad wolf and the rational market: portfolio insurance, the 1987 crash and the performativity of economics', Economy and Society 33(3), pp. 303-334.

Madison, D. Soyini 1999, 'Performing Theory/Embodied Writing', Text and Performance Quarterly 19(2), pp. 107-125.

Marshall, James 1999, 'Performativity: Lyotard and Foucault Through Searle and Austin', Studies in Philosophy and Education 18, pp. 309-317.

McKenzie, Jon 2001, Perform or Else: From Discipline to Performance, London, Routledge.

- Meadmore, Daphne and Peter Meadmore 2004, 'The Boundlessness of Performativity in Elite Australian Schools', Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education, 25(3), pp. 375-388.
- Muñoz, José Esteban 2005, 'Impossible Spaces', GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies, 11(3), pp. 427-436.
- Parker, Andrew and Eva Kosofsky Sedgwick (eds), 1995 Performativity and Performance New York, Routledge.
- Parry, Geraint 1967, 'Performative Utterances and Obligation in Hobbes', Philosophical Quarterly 17, pp. 246-252.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2002, 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality', SubStance 31(2&3), pp. 201-215.
- Reinelt, Janelle 2001, 'Performing Europe: Identity Formation for a "New" Europe', Theatre Journal 53(3), pp. 365-387.
- Reiger, Kerreen and Rhea Dempsey 2008, 'Performing Birth in a Culture of Fear: An embodied crisis of late modernity', Health Sociology Review 2008, eContent Management Pty Ltd., accessed 12/4/2008.
- Schieffelin, Edward 1985, 'Performance and the Cultural Construction of Reality', American Ethnologist, 12, pp. 707-724.
- Schieffelin, Edward 1998, 'Problematizing Performance' in Felicity Hughes-Freeland (ed), Ritual, Performance, Media, New York and London, Routledge, pp. 194-207.
- Sedgwick, Eve Kosofsky 1993, 'Queer Performativity: Henry James' The Art of the Novel, glq: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies 1(1), pp. 1-16.
- Shand, Adam 2006, 'The Outsiders', The Bulletin November 14, 2006, pp. 20-25.
- Street, John 2004 'Celebrity Politicians: Popular Culture and Political Representation', BJPIR 6, pp. 435-452.
- Walker, Julia 2003, 'Why Performance? Why Now? Textuality and the Rearticulation of Human Presence', The Yale Journal of Criticism, 16(1), pp. 149-175.
- Ward, James and Diana Winstanley 2005, 'Coming out at work: performativity and the recognition and renegotiation of identity', The Sociological Review 2005.
- Warren, John T. 1999, 'The Body Politic: Performance, Pedagogy, and the Power of Enfleshment', Text and Performance Quarterly 19(3), pp.
- Worthen, W.B. 1998, 'Drama, Performativity, and Performance', PMLA 113(5), pp. 1093-1107.

Appendix F: Theatricality Tables (CD files)

Table 1/3 Defining Theatricality 1837-1995

Table 2/3 Defining Theatricality 1995-2002a

Table 3/3 Defining Theatricality 2002b-2007

The tables summarise the findings of a literature review of the fields in which the term theatricality is used. The study was conducted in 2008. The purpose of the study was to try and establish whether or not the concept should be considered a theatre metaphor.

Although the concept is now widely seen as a theatre metaphor, there are some theorists who do not see it that way, including theorists engaged in theatre.

Referencing: Referencing system used for these tables is based on the Harvard name/year system. A full bibliography is provided at the end of each detailed table.

Appendix F Table 1/3: Defining Theatricality 1837-1994

THEORIST	PUBLICATION	Definition of theatricality	Theatricality is: is against	Source	Position of Spectator
‘There is ... a remarkable consistency to the positioning of theatricality as definitionally indistinct ... the thing which no-one can define but which, all the same, can still be written about in a range of discourses ’ (McGillivray 2005: 105, 110).
Thomas Carlyle	The French Revolution (1837) Heroes and Hero-worship (1840)	Carlyle uses theatricality in a number of ways: in opposition to sincerity (as artifice); as an expression of the human spirit; as mere show. In each case, however, he seems to be preserving for himself the position of a spectator above and over the fray and consequently with a more complete view of an event, one which allows him to put it into a cultural and historical context. Apart from the view that theatricality offered, for Carlyle, what constituted ‘being theatrical’ was the expression of temperament, whether it was the ‘naturally passionate’ expression of the French or the Stoicism of the Scottish, or an extended plea for clemency by a man pleading for his life. It could be both natural and artificial, sincere and insincere (although sincerity would always trump insincerity). Things, too, could be theatrical: such as the sight of fifty to sixty thousand people in one place. Carlyle seemed to see theatre in terms of artifice – an art which could be used in a variety of ways including to pretend sincerity if required. It also made a useful way to frame a narrative, to give it a sense of vibrancy or presence.	a way of seeing; a technique of expression; a metaphor (vs limited view of a participant; vs linear narrative)	from theatre as a seeing-place; from theatre as an art (artifice)	Outside the event; a better view than participants can have
Nikolai Evreinov 1908	Apologia of Theatricality (1908)	Theatricality is ‘a pre-aesthetic instinct’, a way of doing things, ‘a dynamic force in all human beings’ (Féral 2002a: 8). For Evreinov ‘the more people came to neglect theatricality, the more they turned from art to life, the more tedious it became to live. We lost our taste for life. Without seasoning, without the salt of theatricality, life was a dish we would only eat by compulsion’ (in McGillivray 2005: 92).	an instinct which adds spice to mundane life	to theatre (from theatre)	Theatre allows us to see things differently
Georg Fuchs	Revolution in the Theatre: Conclusions Concerning the Munich Artists’ Theatre (1909)	Theatricality is ‘the sum total of materials or sign systems used in a theatrical performance beyond the literary text of the drama which define the theatrical performance as such: movements, voice, sounds, music, light, colour, and so on’ (Fischer-Lichte 1995).	to do with theatre production (vs non-theatrical)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Avant-garde theorists such as Fuchs and Craig, Marinetti, Evreinov, Meyerhold and Artaud activated an aesthetic concept of theatricality ‘in order to acknowledge an essence of theatre, the truth of which, they believed, lay both in its materiality as well as in its constructedness’ (McGillivray 2005: 93). For them, theatricality was ‘self-conscious stylisation’ (ibid) and in particular featured a downgrading of the reliance on the written text and language. Most importantly, ‘the essence of theatre lay in the artifice, its “false reality”’. These characteristics are still evident in contemporary Performance Studies theorists such as Schechner.

Roland Barthes	'Baudelaire's Theater' (1964)	Theatricality 'is theater-minus-text, it is a density of signs and sensations built up on stage starting from the written argument; it is that ecumenical perception of sensuous artifice – gesture, tone, distance, substance, light – which submerges the text beneath the profusion of its external language' (Barthes 1970: 26). Theatricality thus would seem to be theatre's 'external' or visual language. Féral argues that theatricality thus 'has to do with the materiality of the actors' bodies' – their 'troubling corporeality' (Féral 2002: 8) but McGillivray argues that Barthes uses 'theatricality as a metaphor to describe certain textual devices used by Baudelaire' (McGillivray 2005: 11) and therefore privilege a particular [Platonic] view of performance. Theatricality 'originates in the text but only reaches its full potential in [an imagined] performance' in Barthes' mind' (McGillivray 2005: 11).	a metaphor (vs text)	from theatre as an art form
Peter Brook	The Empty Space (1968)	Theatricality is 'a mode of excess'(Brook 1982/1968: ix).	a mode of excess	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Elizabeth Burns	Theatricality (1972)	A sociological analysis of theatricality as a convention of behaviour, Burns is 'specifically concerned with the conventions of Western drama and, in particular, how those conventions formed in England' (McGillivray 2005: 123). Conventions are both instrumental and expressive. It is the expressiveness of convention that comprises human performance. According to McGillivray, Burns' thesis 'hinges on two fundamental ideas: first, that social and theatrical conventions are formed by, depend upon, and interact with each other; and second, that the fundamental requirement of theatre (and therefore theatricality) is the separation of spectators and performance' (McGillivray 2005: 123). Theatricality is 'a mode of perception' which depends on knowledge of social conventions. It can be attached 'to any kind of behaviour perceived and interpreted by others and described in theatrical terms' but seems to be primarily concerned with extraordinary behaviour because it specifically recognizes the 'composed' aspect of someone's behaviour (Burns 1972: 12-13). Theatricality 'is an audience term' (12). It depends on knowledge of theatre and its conventions, and is ascribed by a spectator (12): 'Behaviour is not theatrical because it is of a certain kind but because the observer recognizes certain patterns and sequences which are	a mode of perception which is dependent on the separation of spectators and performers (vs non-theatrical; authentic)	from theatre	Spectators are separate from performers; theatricality is a mode of perception employed by spectators; spectators determine what is theatrical according to social conventions

		analogous to those [seen] in the theatre' (12). Degrees of theatricality are culturally determined. [Theatricality seems, for Burns, to provide a way of thinking about extraordinary action]. Theatricality is 'a mode of recognition. It belongs to the critical, judging, assessing 'I' that stands aside from the ... 'ego'. But its function is enriched by theatrical awareness and theatrical insights that take into account the self as a social being' [what can this mean? It seems to contradict her earlier definitions – theatricality is a mode of recognition which comes into play when we 'stand aside' from ourselves. If we know about theatre, it is expressed in theatre terms – and if we don't? What are we recognizing?]: 'Theatricality is not ... a mode of behaviour or expression, but attaches to any kind of behaviour perceived and interpreted by others and described (mentally or explicitly) in theatrical terms ... theatricality itself is determined by a particular viewpoint, a mode of perception' (Burns 1972: 12-13). We do not have moments when we think we are on stage. Rather we have 'moments of self-consciousness' coupled with the placing of 'an ontological value on not playing a part in everyday life' (McGillivray 2005: 126). Awareness of being observed makes us feel self-conscious and we equate this to playing a part because of our social and historical knowledge of theatre. [This explains the ubiquity of the metaphor in modern times in which much of what we experience is mediated]. Theatricality is 'a perceptual process which requires, first, a spectator who is competent to identify and interpret what is being seen as theatrical [and] [second], this perceptual process requires an intention on the part of the onlooker to place him or herself in a spectatorial relationship to what is being viewed ... a person must know how to, and be willing to, view any action or object in theatrical terms' (McGillivray 2005: 127). Theatricality, although derived from theatre, is not synonymous with theatrical. Something which is theatrical is 'composed': 'The fictive worlds of the novel and drama are not mirrors of action. They are compositions' whose resemblance to 'the real' world give them a sense of authenticity (Burns and Burns 1973: 22). This suggests that it is composition we recognize in theatricality.
Peter Melvin	'Burke on Theatricality and Revolution' (1975)	According to Melvin, Burke believed that theatricality was a mode of excess which appealed to both the sublime and the terrible. Its use had to be within social conventions which privileged rationality because otherwise it would produce terror, destroy civil society and return man to a Hobbesian state of	a mode of excess (vs the rational, the	from aesthetics nature and perpetual suspicion in which he felt nothing for the fate of others (Melvin 1975).	controlled, civility)

Michael Fried	Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot (1980)	Art works of theatricality ‘consciously open[] themselves to the gaze and interpretation of a spectator’. They could not be autonomous as art because they were concerned with reception (Carlson 2002: 241). Gran claims that Fried ‘despises theatricality because he believes it disturbs the autonomy of art’ (Gran 2002: 256): ‘The success, even the survival, of the arts, has become increasingly to depend on their ability to defeat theater’ (Fried 1967: 139 in Gran 2002: 257). “Theatricality is what art must rid itself of, in order to become modern – in other words, autonomous’ (Gran 2002: 259), although this is not evident in Absorption and Theatricality . Rather, for critics of the period such as Diderot, theatricality for Diderot and his contemporaries (the awareness of being looked at) alienated the beholder and interfered with his response to the work of art (the theatre was also a target for this complaint during the C18th), according to French theorists of the C18th. Theatricality was not defined against authenticity but against absorption . The figures in a work of art were to be totally absorbed in what they were doing, so as to free the beholder to also be totally absorbed so that he could read into the painting or drama whatever he thought he could see (including motivations) without worrying about the effect this might have on the work of art.	is an awareness of the beholder; a condition which continues to be problematic and which acts to alienate or estrange the beholder from the work of art (vs absorption: the artwork or the beholder as autonomous)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Art works of theatricality ‘consciously open[] themselves to the gaze and interpretation of a spectator’.
Stephen Greenblatt	‘Invisible Bullets: Renaissance Authority and its Subversion’ (1981)	Theatricality is ‘one of power’s essential modes’ (Greenblatt 1981: 56)	a theatre metaphor	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Patrice Pavis	Dictionnaire du théâtre: Termes et Concepts de l’analyse théâtrale (1980)	Theatricality is ‘ce qui, dans la representation ou dans le texte dramatique, est specifiquement theatral’ (Pavis 1980: 395 in Fischer-Lichte 1995).	what makes theatre what it is: visual representation of a dramatic text (vs not theatre)	from theatre
Josette Féral	‘Performance and Theatricality: The Subject Demystified’	Theatricality and performativity are opposing terms – theatricality is about signifying (showing) while the second is about ‘networks of impulses’ (doing) (Féral 1982).	about showing (signification) (vs	from theatre, an extension of theatrical	theatricality is about signifying

	(1982)		performance)		(showing)
	'Foreword' (2002)	1. Theatricality is an 'idea used in many different disciplines' in many different ways, usually without explanation, either as a metaphor or as 'an operative concept'. 2. 'The beholder is fundamental to the definition of theatricality, since the theatrical phenomenon is acknowledged and rendered operational by the spectator's presence alone' (Féral 2002a: 3). Theatricality is 'a process that has to do with a 'gaze'' (Féral 2002a) [although she does not elaborate on this, unlike Burns]. 3. Definitions of theatricality will change as theatre is redefined (2002: 4) 4. Theatricality includes performativity (2002a: 5, 8); both are about representation and can help us understand representation better and both are embodied. Performativity is a mode of theatricality 5. Any spectacle is 'an interplay of both performativity and theatricality' in a dialectic relationship which produces a performance: 'both [performativity and theatricality] are necessarily enmeshed within performance ... any performance ... calls upon these two elements'. 6. Theatricality is 'what makes a performance recognizable and meaningful within a certain set of references and codes'. 7. There are two main approaches being taken to theatricality in the literature: (a) theatricality is limited to the artistic world i.e. it is from and about theatre; and (b) theatricality is a dominant structure present in all social manifestations. As such it is either a mode of behaviour or expression or a mode of perception which is seen as either manifested in the arts (i.e. a mode of production) or becomes manifest via the spectator (i.e. a mode of reception). 8. Theatricality is a theoretical device (2002a: 3) 9. Theatricality 'is the result of an act of recognition on the part of the spectator' (2002a: 10). 10. theatricality is the result of a series of cleavages (inscribed by the artist and recognized by the spectator) aimed at making a disjunction in systems of signification, in order to substitute other, more fluid ones' (Féral 2002a: 10). It appears theatricality is a conceptual muddle!	includes performativity	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Theatre is 'rendered operational by the spectator's presence alone' (Féral 2002a: 3).
	'Theatricality: The Specificity of	Theatricality is 'the specificity of theater' – what makes theatre what it is. It is also a dynamic between object and spectator which can be initiated by either.	what makes theatre theatre;	from theatre as an art	It is also a dynamic

	Theatrical Language' (2002/1988)	It is not necessarily in or from theatre but theatre is the best place for its occurrence. Theatricality can go beyond theatre because it is not a property: 'theatricality is the result of a perceptual dynamics linking the onlooker with someone or something that is looked at. This relationship can be initiated either by the actor who declares his intention to act, or by the spectator who, of his own initiative, transforms the other into a spectacular object ... Theatricality produces spectacular events for the spectator' (Féral 2002b: 105).	a dynamic interaction between onlooker and object (vs not theatre)	form, an extension of theatrical	between object and spectator which can be initiated by either
Wladimir Krysinski	'Changed Textual Signs in Modern Theatricality: Gombrowicz and Handke' (1982)	Krysinski uses 'the definitional ambiguity of theatricality to reassert certain claims for the written text' (McGillivray 2005: 105): 'the status of the theory of theatricality is equivocal and perhaps incapable of resolution' (Krysinski 1982: 3 in McGillivray 2007: 106). Theatricality is related to theatre in the same way that literariness is related to literature but 'theatricality is a concretization of the theatrical fact ... it is performance minus the text' (Krysinski 1982: 3). For Krysinski 'theatricality is a quality that is generated by either a particular director's production or by a text' and is associated with 'playfulness, process and contingency' (McGillivray 2005: 106).	a quality arising from the playfulness of avant-garde productions (vs text)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Howard Fox	Metaphor: New Projects by Contemporary Sculptors (1982)	Theatricality is a characteristic of postmodernism: 'Theatricality may be the single most pervasive property of post-Modern art' (cited in Ward 1994: 269). Theatricality is 'that propensity in the visual arts for a work to reveal itself within the mind of the beholder as something other than what it is known empirically to be. This is precisely antithetical to the Modern ideal of the wholly manifest, self-sufficient object' (Fox 1982: 16 in Ward 1994: 270). This position reverses that of Diderot (see Fried 1980).	postmodern; spectator derived (vs objective reality)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Spectator as contemporary beholder
David Marshall	'Adam Smith and the Theatricality of Moral Sentiments' (1984)	Marshall takes theatricality from Fried (1980); he uses it to denote 'the problematic relation between spectators and spectacles' (Marshall 1984: 610n1). In Smith's The Theory of Moral Sentiments , 'sympathy comes to mean both theater and the only means of defeating theater' in which we are both actors and spectators placed in the impossible position of wanting the sympathy of others but conscious of the conditions under which it is likely to be offered or withheld because we have internalized the theatrical relationship between actor and spectator which we also apply to others. This produces a dédoublement – an endless backwards and forwards of spectatorship.	a condition resembling theatre, created by the condition of being under the gaze of others	from theatre, an extension of theatrical	Spectator as moral force
	The Figure of Theater: Shaftesbury,	Theatricality for C18th writers (Shaftesbury, Defoe, Adam Smith, George Eliot) is 'the intolerable position of appearing as a spectacle before	a condition created by	from theatre, an extension	Spectators as a moral force

	Defoe, Adam Smith, and George Eliot (1986)	spectators' (Marshall 1986: 66). Marshall sees it as a characteristic of the period to be anxious 'about theatrical relations' (Marshall 1984: 611), or at least about aspects of public living which seemed theatre-like. It is crucially related to sympathy by Adam Smith. The presence of the public 'casts a situation as theatrical' (15) and 'calls for the instatement of theater' (66) a situation which we 'either dread or desire ... depending upon the point of view of the spectators who represent the eyes of the world' (187). They can treat us sympathetically, as fellow actors and spectators, or they can 'theatricalize' us, by turning us into actors seeking approbation from an audience: 'our greatest fear [according to Adam Smith] is that they will remain spectators' (1986: 192). All the writers surveyed by Marshall use the theatre metaphor as an 'organizing principle'; all express ambivalence towards theatre as an institutions, and all are concerned about the effect on the self and others of being observed. All 'are deeply concerned, even obsessed with the conditions of theater' (Marshall 1986: 5).	spectators (vs privacy, anonymity)	of theatrical
Joseph Roach	The Player's Passion (1985)	Roach situates theatricality in the Greek root thea (to see): theatricality relates to 'a certain kind of spectatorial participation in a certain kind of event' (Roach 1985: 46). However, ' performance , by contrast ... frequently makes reference to theatricality as the most fecund metaphor for the social dimensions of cultural production' (1985: 46).	to do with spectatorship; also a metaphor used by performance	from thea to see	Spectators participate in events through theatricality
Bonnie Marranca	'Performance World, Performance Culture' (1987)	'Theatricality is a primary human activity, even need' (Marranca 1987: 24). (Marranca sees this need in terms of role-playing on an individual level but socially, it is related to spectacle especially with regard to seeing history: 'The growth of the media and communications in the evolution of society has made theatricalism into the twentieth-century political/art form' subsuming both ideology and individuality (25).	a human activity	to theatre
Joshua Sobol	'Theatricality of Political Theater' (1987)	'Theatricality is the reverse of the usual order of things' (Sobol 1987: 110 in Gran 2002: 255). It is epitomised by the carnival in which 'freedom exists solely in relationship to a normal order where laws and taboos are intact' (Gran 2002: 255). Sobol 'appreciates theatricality because he believes it makes political theater possible' (Gran 2002: 256).	The reversal of normal relationships; carnival (vs the norm)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Richard Schechner	Performance Theory (1988)	Theatricality is the smallest 'bit' of self-conscious behaviour (Schechner 1988: 282).	self-conscious behaviour (vs non-	from theatre	Self as spectator reflective behaviour)

Gautam Dasgupta	'The Theatrics of Politics' (1988)	Theatricality is based on our capacity for mimicry (Dasgupta 1988): 'the urge to imitate is a universal trait common to us all ... the mimetic faculty is not the same as the incorporation of theatre as an aesthetic phenomenon in our daily lives ... To confuse the elements of theatricality as they appertain to the human condition with the formal elements that constitute theatre is dangerous' (Dasgupta 1988: 78-9). Dasgupta also argues that theatricality is an aspect of the human condition, associated with our universal 'urge to imitate' (Dasgupta 1988: 78). Theatre is an aesthetic form derived from theatricality. To confuse the two is 'dangerous' because it leads to the abrogation of responsibility through the loss of the recognition that 'our very existence is predicated on our being witnessed by others' (1988: 79) who may imitate us. Instead, we can 'perform our roles' without taking anything other than aesthetic responsibility, for we are to be judged only on our 'thespian skills' (1988: 80). This has consequences for both theatre and politics for neither are recognized as arts or crafts with their own techniques and skills. Instead, politics becomes aestheticised, which makes it easy for it to be used to 'augment' consumerism in such a way that politics is 'reduced to a level of sheer consumption'. In the end, all we demand of our political candidates is that they be 'desirable in their roles'. Dasgupta believes that President Reagan epitomised this collapse between the sociopolitical and aesthetic realms and as a consequence, marginalised and reconstituted the office of the presidency into a 'mere representation' (1988: 80) which was not obliged to take responsibility for 'blatant political misjudgments' (1988: 79).	mimicry (vs the theatrical)	to theatre	We learn through watching
Michel Bernard	'Esthétique et théâtralité du corps. Entretien avec Michel Bernard' (1988)	Theatricality is at the heart of any form of expression, including language. Theatricality 'is the manifestation of an energetic process on the part of the subject, a pulsating dynamics, it is part of human uniqueness ... one of the matrices that constitutes corporeality'. This makes the body 'the foundation of theatricality ... it is ... theatricality which makes playacting possible' because we realise that 'the body cannot not simulate'. Theatricality inscribes 'a profound duality' upon the body (in Féral 2002: 9). Theatricality is 'that which enables a body, at a particular moment in a particular place, to enact theater without realizing it, and which is destroyed by the ulterior motive of enacting theater' (Bernard 1988: 11). Theatricality arises prior to the creative	the foundation of expression; the facticity of appearance (vs the invisible)	to theatre	The condition of being visible as a body automa- tically generates theatricality work, as its founding principle' (Féral 2002: 9).

Nina Auerbach	Private Theatricals: The Lives of the Victorian (1990)	'Theatricality is such a rich and fearful word in Victorian culture that it is most accurately defined ... in relation to what it is not. Sincerity is sanctified and it is not sincere' (Auerbach 1990: 4).	Insincerity (vs sincerity)	from theatre; as metaphor
Barbara Freedman	Staging the Gaze: Postmodernism, Psychoanalysis and Shakespearean Comedy (1991)	When we say someone is 'theatrical' '[w]hat we mean is that such a person is aware that she is seen, reflects that awareness, and so deflects our look. We refer to a fractured reciprocity whereby beholder and beheld reverse positions in a way that renders steady spectatorship impossible. Theatricality evokes an uncanny sense that the given to be seen has the power both to position us and to displace us' (Freedman 1991: 1 in McGillivray 2005: 12). Self-awareness turns a 'given' object into a performance so that it can no longer be seen as given: theatricality is the name of this power of the given which is used to position the beholder and to displace them from their superior position. She sees this as emancipatory but it need not be.	a form of power: a 'force for emancipation' (vs lack of awareness)	to theatre?	Self-awareness
Michel Corvin	Dictionnaire Encyclopédique du Théâtre (1991)	'In Western theater history, theatricality is both a value which one must aspire to and a pitfall of which one must beware ... 'theatricality [either] does not pertain to the thing represented but to the written dramatic movement through which it is represented ... [or] ... is ... nothing more than the undeniable sign of [theatre's] falsifying and deluding nature' (Corvin 1991: 820 in Magnat 2002: 148).	a value (vs the genuine, the real)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Deluded
Erika Fischer-Lichte	The Semiotics of Theatre (1992)	Theatricality may be defined as a particular mode of using signs or as a particular kind of semiotic process in which particular signs ... are employed as signs of signs – by their producers, or their recipients ... When the semiotic function of using signs as signs of signs in a behavioural, situational or communication process is perceived and received as dominant, the behavioural, situational or communication process may be regarded as theatrical (discussed in Fischer-Lichte 1995: 88).	a mode of signification (vs non-signifying processes)	to theatre but an extension of theatrical	Respond to symbols
	'Theatricality Introduction: Theatricality: A key Concept in Theatre and Cultural Studies' (1995)	Theatricality could be 'a potentially useful strategy' to use to distinguish theatre as an art form from other applications of theatre as a metaphor or heuristic device. Theatricality involves 'signs of signs' (Fischer-Lichte 1995: 88).	a strategy (vs the non-visible, non-strategic)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
	'From Theater to Theatricality: How to	Theatricality is a capacity to trigger 'processes of construction' in the spectator (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 70). This capacity can apply to anything but	a capacity to stimulate the	from theatre as an art

	Construct Reality' (1997/1995)	is explicitly marked in the arts.	spectator (vs non- signifying)	form
	'All the World's a Stage: The Theatrical Metaphor in the Baroque and Postmodernism' (1997)	'The gaze of the other is shown to be the origin and also the condition of the possibility of theatre and of theatricality' (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 199).	is dependent on the 'constitutive function' of the audience	from theatre as an art form	constitutive
Art Borreca	'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View' (1993)	Theatricality is 'mediated action' (Borreca 1993: 59). Theatricality as a stand-alone concept with its own historical trajectory renders null the ahistorical dramaturgical question of whether reality is inherently theatrical or becoming theatricalized as a result of the mass media (Borreca 1993: 59).	mediated action (vs unmediated action)	to theatre but an extension of theatrical
Peggy Phelan	Unmarked: The Politics of Performance (1993)	Theatricality for Phelan is 'a form of signification' which is transgressive or at least less co-optable; it is opposed to representation: 'theatricality frees political subjects from representation altogether' (Joseph 1998: 52).	a form of signification (vs representation)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Susceptible to the power of represent- ation
Cynthia Ward	'Twins Separated at Birth? West African Vernacular and Western Avant Garde Performativity in Theory and Practice' (1994)	Theatricality is performed differently in different cultures; West African theatricality is evaluated according to the degree of audience participation it invites and encourages, something which gives some insight into the problems western avant-garde theatre has in its attempts to instigate more participation from their audiences (Ward 1994).	is culturally specific (vs universal)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical

Bibliography

- Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press.
- Alter, Jean. 1990. A Sociosemiotic Theory of Theatre. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Auerbach, Nina. 1990. Private Theatricals: The Lives of the Victorians. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

- Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.
- Barthes, Roland. 1970. 'Baudelaire's Theater'. In Critical Essays Evanston: Northwestern University Press
- Bernard, Michel. 1988. 'Esthétique et théatralité du corps. Entretien avec Michel Bernard'. Quel Corps? 34/35 (May):pp. 2-21.
- Borreca, Art. 1993. 'Political Dramaturgy: A Dramaturg's (Re)View'. The Drama Review 37 (2):pp. 56-79.
- Brook, Peter. 1982/1968. The Empty Space. Harmondsworth, Middlesex: Penguin Books Ltd.
- Burgett, Bruce. 1996. 'Spectacular Politics: Theatrical Power and Mass Culture in Early Modern England; Theater enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage'. The William and Mary Quarterly 53 (1):pp. 204-208.
- Burns, Elizabeth. 1972. Theatricality: A Study of Convention in the Theatre and in Social Life. London: Longman.
- Burns, Elizabeth, and Tom Burns. 1973. 'Introduction'. In Sociology of Literature and Drama, edited by E. Burns and T. Burns London: Penguin Books
- Carlson, Marvin. 1995. 'Theatre History, Methodology and Distinctive Features'. Theatre Research International 20 (2):pp. 90-96.
- Carlson, Marvin. 2002. 'The Resistance to Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2-3):pp. 238-250.
- Case, Sue-Ellen. 2002. 'The Emperor's New Clothes: The Naked Body and Theories of Performance'. SubStance 31 ((2&3)).
- Dasgupta, Gautam. 1988. 'The Theatricals of Politics'. Performing Arts Journal 11 (2):pp. 77-83.
- Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.
- Enders, Jody. 2003. 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 40-64
- Erickson, Jon. 2003. 'Defining political performance with Foucault and Habermas: strategic and communicative action'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 156-185
- Féral, Josette. 1982. 'Performance and Theatricality: The Subject Demystified'. Modern Drama 25 (March):pp. 170-181.
- Féral, Josette. 2002a. 'Foreword'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2&3):pp. 3-16.
- Féral, Josette. 2002b. 'Theatricality: The Specificity of Theatrical Language'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2&3):pp. 94-108.
- Fiebach, Joachim. 2002. 'Theatricality: From Oral Traditions to Televised "Realities"'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2 and 3):pp. 17-32.
- Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1995. 'Introduction: theatricality: a key concept in theatre and cultural studies'. Theatre Research International 20 (2):pp. 85-90.
- Fischer-Lichte, Erika. 1997. The Show and the Gaze of Theatre: a European Perspective. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.
- Fox, Howard. 1982. Metaphor: New Projects by Contemporary Sculptors (Acconci, Armajani, Aycock, Ewing, Morris, Oppenheim). Washington DC: Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden, Smithsonian Institution Press.

- Fraser, Mariam. 1999. 'Classing Queer: Politics in Competition'. Theory, Culture and Society 16 (2):pp. 107-131.
- Freedman, Barbara. 1991. Staging the Gaze: Postmodernism, Psychoanalysis and Shakespearean Comedy. Ithaca NY.
- Fried, Michael. 1980. Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and Beholder in the Age of Diderot. Berkeley: California University Press.
- Friedland, Paul. 2002. Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press.
- Gallasch, Keith. 2005/1999. 'Review of Customs by Josephine Wilson, directed by Glen McGillivray, Theatre of Desire'. In Theatricality: A Critical Genealogy McGillivray, Glen James, 2004, Sydney: Sydney eScholarship Repository, The University of Sydney Library <http://hdl.handle.net/2123/1428> accessed 27/04/2008. pp. 234-235 (original review published by Gallasch in www.rtimearts.com/~opencity/rt228/customs.html 1998; reproduced in full in McGillivray)
- Gran, Anne-Britt. 2002. 'The Fall of Theatricality in the Age of Modernity'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 251-264.
- Greenblatt, Stephen. 1981. 'Invisible Bullets: Renaissance Authority and its Subversion'. Glyph 8.
- Huxley, John. 2007. 'Behind the lens: a brushman's inspiration'. The Sydney Morning Herald 24th September p. 5.
- Jankovljevic, Branislav. 2006. 'Book Review: Theatricality As Medium by Samuel Weber [and] Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames by Cremona et al'. The Drama Review 50 (1):pp. 179-183.
- Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Jervis, John. 1999. Transgressing the Modern: Explorations in the Western Experience of Otherness. Oxford and Massachusetts: Blackwell.
- Joseph, Miranda. 1998. 'The Performance of Production and Consumption'. Social Text 54 (Spring):pp. 25-61.
- Kruger, Loren. 2001. 'Book Review: Dictionary of the Theatre: Terms, Concepts, and Analysis [and] Mimesis, Masochism, and Mime: The Politics of Theatricality in Contemporary French Thought'. Theatre Journal 53 (1):pp. 185-188.
- Krysinski, Wladimir 1982. 'Changed Textual Signs in Modern Theatricality: Gombrowicz and Handke'. Modern Drama 25 (March).
- Lawton, John Brooks III. 1998. Performing Politics: A Theatre-Based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions www.sanestorm.com/performing_politics.pdf, 1998 [cited 14th September 2007].
- Magnat, Virginie. 2002. 'Theatricality from the Performative Perspective'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 147-166.
- Marranca, Bonnie. 1987. 'Performance World, Performance Culture'. Performing Arts Journal 10 (3):pp. 21-29.
- Marshall, David. 1984. 'Adam Smith and the Theatricality of Moral Sentiments'. Critical Inquiry 10 (4):pp. 592-613.
- Marshall, David. 1986. The Figure of Theater: Shaftesbury, Defoe, Adam Smith and George Eliot. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Maslan, Susan. 2005. Revolutionary Acts: Theatre, Democracy, and the French Revolution. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press.
- McGillivray, Glen James. 2007. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008].
- Melvin, Peter. 1975. 'Burke on Theatricality and Revolution'. Journal of the History of Ideas 36 (3):pp. 447-468.

- Montrose, Louis A. 1995. 'A Kingdom of Shadows'. In The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, edited by D. L. Smith, R. Strier and D. Bevington. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 68-86
- Murray, Timothy, ed. 1997. Mimesis, Masochism, and Mime: The Politics of Theatricality in Contemporary French Thought. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Murray, Timothy. 2002. 'The Theatrical Event: Dynamics of Performance and Perception'. SubStance 31 ((2&3)).
- Parker, Andrew, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick. 1995. 'Introduction'. In Performativity and Performance, edited by A. Parker and E. K. Sedgwick. New York: Routledge. pp. 1-18
- Pavis, Patrice. 1980. Dictionnaire du théâtre: Termes et Concepts de l'analyse théâtrale. Paris: Editions Sociales.
- Phelan, Peggy. 1993. Unmarked: The Politics of Performance. New York: Routledge.
- Pilkington, Lionel. 2001. Theatre and State in Twentieth-Century Ireland: Cultivating the People. London: Routledge.
- Postlewait, Thomas. 2003. 'Theatricality and antitheatricality in renaissance London'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. pp. 90-126
- Postlewait, Thomas, and Tracy C. Davis. 2003. 'Theatricality: an introduction'. In Theatricality, edited by T. C. Davis and T. Postlewait. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 1-39
- Quinn, Michael. 1995. 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History'. Theatre Research International 20 (2):pp. 106-114.
- Quinn, Michael. 2006. 'Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press. pp. 301-316
- Reinelt, Janelle. 2002. 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 201-215.
- Roach, Joseph. 1985. The Player's Passion. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Rozik, Eli. 2002. 'Acting: The Quintessence of Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 110-124.
- Sarrazac, Jean-Pierre. 2002. 'The Invention of "Theatricality": Rereading Bernard Dort and Roland Barthes'. SubStance 31 (2&3).
- Sauter, Willmar. 2000. The Theatrical Event: Dynamics of Performance and Perception. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.
- Scalmer, Sean. 1999. 'The Production of a Founding Event: The Case of Pauline Hanson's Maiden Parliamentary Speech'. Theory and Event 3 (2).
- Schechner, Richard. 1988. Performance Theory. revised ed. New York: Routledge.
- Schoch, Richard W. 1999. "'We Do Nothing but Enact History": Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 54 (1):pp. 27-52.
- Schramm, Helmar. 1995. 'The surveying of hell. On theatricality and styles of thinking'. Theatre Research International 20 (2):PP. 114-119.
- Smith, David L., Richard Strier, and David Bevington, eds. 1995. The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Sobol, Joshua. 1987. 'Theatricality of Political Theater'. Maske und Kothurn: Internationale Beitrage zur Theaterwissenschaft 33 (3-4):pp. 107-112.
- Sugiera, Malgorzata. 2002. 'Theatricality and Cognitive Science: The Audience's Perception and Reception'. SubStance 31 (2-3):225-235.
- Tronstad, Ragnhild. 2002. 'Could the World become a Stage? Theatricality and Metaphorical Structures'. SubStance 31 (2-3):216-224.
- Ward, Cynthia. 1994. 'Twins Separated at Birth? West African Vernacular and Western Avant Garde Performativity in Theory and Practice'. Text and Performance Quarterly 14 (4):pp. 269-288.
- Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Yan, Haiping. 2003. 'Theatricality in classical Chinese drama'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 65-89

Appendix F Table 2/3: Defining Theatricality 1995-2002a

THEORIST	PUBLICATION	Definition of theatricality	Theatricality is: is against	Source	Position on Spectator
Helmar Schramm	‘The surveying of hell. On theatricality and styles of thinking’ (1995)	Theatricality ‘may be understood and defined simply as an element functioning in different discourses within a range of disciplines that are devoted to cultural studies’ (Fischer-Lichte 1995). It will change according to the discourse, the discipline and the conception of theatre	a concept used in a variety of ways	from theatre
Michael Quinn	‘Concepts of theatricality in contemporary art history’ (1995)	An opposition between theatricality and authenticity dominates art history and reflects a narrow view of theatre as essentially inauthentic (Quinn 1995)	subject to ideology (vs authenticity)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
	‘Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity’ (2006)	Theatricality is ‘the shared consciousness of performance’ (Quinn 2006: 312) – we ‘agree’ that this is a performance, and therefore theatricality is in operation. We agree because the performer signals to his audience that he is engaged in a performance and the audience, under the principle of charity, agrees to understand what the performer does as a performance, at least for the moment. The principle of charity is the only convention which is required for theatricality. We do not need to derive theatrical conventions from a complex set of pre-existing social conventions, as Burns suggests: a play does not have to be built ‘from the ground up’ every time. Quinn bases his analysis on ‘the simple theory of truth’, derived from Alfred Tarski, a correspondence theory of truth based on ‘a sign’s claim to its object’ however constituted (Quinn 2006: 307).	the shared consciousness of performance	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	The relationship between performer and audience is based on the common shared convention of the principle of charity: we believe what we are told at least for the time being.
Marvin Carlson	‘Theatre History, Methodology and Distinctive Features’ (1995)	A critique of Bruce Wilshire’s Role Playing and Identity (1982). Attempts to develop an ethics based on theatricality depend on the conception of theatre which underpins it (Carlson 1995)	changes over time and circumstance	from theatre
	‘The Resistance to Theatricality’ (2002)	Theatricality, like mimesis , contains a ‘doubleness’ or ‘a play between two types of reality’ (Carlson 2002: 243). This usually manifests as a play	a play between two types of	from theatre as an art

		between life/reality and theatre/illusion/deception in which life/reality as life off-stage is given positive value and theatre/illusion is seen negatively, in terms of artifice and deception. This suggests that theatricality is ‘a flaw’ – something to be avoided, even in the theatre. Although Féral tries to give a more positive view of theatricality, she continues this negative conception because she, like Burns, sees theatricality in terms of structure or ‘codes and competencies’ which performance tries to undo. In other words she simply places the tension between theatricality and its positive other on-stage rather than between stage and life. Carlson suggests we see theatricality as a celebration of the life process and its possibilities rather than as a ‘pale, inadequate, or artificially abstract copy’ (244). One way of doing this is suggested by Jean Alter’s view of theatricality as involving virtuosity in ‘arts of the theater’ other than the skill of the actor: ‘the visual display of dazzling costume, striking lighting or scenic effects, or the director’s particular manipulation of any or all of these for virtuosic display’ (Carlson 2002: 246). The tension of doubleness here is between ‘signs that aim at imparting information’ and the ‘performant function’ which seeks ‘to please or amaze an audience by a display of exceptional achievement (Alter 1990: 32). Carlson suggests that we should embrace theatricality’s relationship with the theatre and see it more positively as a ‘display of creativity’ (2002: 246).	reality (vs life/reality)	form, an extension of theatrical
David Smith et al	The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649 (1995)	Smith et al use theatrical ‘in a flexible sense ... applied to the civic rituals and public spectacles’ of London between 1576 (when theatres were opened) and 1649 (when they were closed by government decree). They also apply it to the elite and popular theatre of the time. Theatricality is taken as a straightforward extension of theatrical, which is not defined. They characterize the period as theatrical because of the ‘sheer range of spectacles’ enacted in London [which raises the question of why not call it the ‘spectacular’ city]. The presence of spectacle during the period indicates to them that ‘a theatrical culture of conscious dramatisation’ existed ‘on all of the public stages’, including theatre (Smith, Strier, and Bevington 1995: 14). This is despite the Elizabethan government being actively engaged in suppressing traditional forms of popular control (Montrose 1995: 72).	a way of describing the spectacular; a metaphor	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Louis Montrose	‘A Kingdom of Shadows’ (1995)	Theatricality is ‘a mode of human cognition and human agency’ (Montrose 1995: 86). It is foregrounded by Shakespeare, especially in A Midsummer Night’s Dream. The suppression of popular theatre by the government	a mode of cognition; a mode of	from theatre as an art form, an changed theatre from being a popular, largely amateur form of amusement, or a church run form of religious education and became instead a tool of government. Under these conditions, exemplary playwrights like Shakespeare were able to use the theatre differently – as a means to explore the ‘human’ condition in ways which revealed the human condition as theatrical (Montrose 1995: 86).	agency; a metaphor	extension of theatrical

Andrew Parker & Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick	Performativity and Performance (1995)	Derrida demonstrated that Austin’s performative was parasitic on ‘a pervasive theatricality common to stage and world alike’ – a ‘generalized iterability’ which structures both ordinary speech-act performances and an actor’s ‘citational practices’ (Parker and Sedgwick 1995: 4). Theatre conditions ‘the possibility of any and all performatives’ (4) contrary to Austin’s belief that theatre is parasitic on language in general and therefore not under consideration in his use of performative (3). Austin reveals a negative view of the theatre (5). Theatricality for Austin was related to ‘the perverted, the artificial, the unnatural, the abnormal, the decadent, the effete, the diseased ... a normatively homophobic thematics of the “peculiar,” “anomalous, exceptional, ‘nonserious’” (5).	iterability	to theatre
Elizabeth Wright	‘Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance’ (1996)	Theatricality is to do with ‘disreal spaces’, something which both theatre and psychoanalysis share. Theatricality is ‘the operating principle’ for both. Postmodern performance and post-Freudian psychoanalysis have both revealed the constructed nature of the subject: the subject ‘is theatrical, through and through’ (Wright 1996: 189).	An essentialist view of the subject	Psychoanalysis	Psycho-analytically aware spectator of theatre
Bruce Burgett	Review (1996)	‘Theatricality is a voracious figure ... a metaphor descriptive of nearly any form of political and social relations’ (Burgett 1996: 204).	a metaphor	from theatre, an extension of theatrical
Timothy Murray	Mimesis, Masochism, and Mime: The Politics of Theatricality in Contemporary French Thought (1997)	Murray edits this collection of texts on theatricality ‘and associated terms, such as scene and role, performance, and representation’ (Kruger 2001: 187). Theatricality is a term ‘called on by French theory’ to theorise about theatre as an art form and as a metaphor applied to social and political life in which theorising is seen as a kind of ‘performance’ (Murray 1997: 2). In particular, theatricality is used to explore issues of presence and representation across a range of fields by both theatre and non-theatre theorists.	a theoretical concept denoting performativity of some kind	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
	‘Digital Baroque: Via Viola on the Passage of Theatricality’	Murray equates theatricality with the actor’s body, which he considers no longer to be a feature of the cutting edge of avant-garde theatre – if anything, the body threatens ‘the integrity of the art work’ (McGillivray 2005: 100-	the use of images as texts (vs	from theatre as an art form, an	ignored

	(2002)	101). In his analysis of Bill Viola's work, Murray focuses on the video images Viola uses, as if they were texts. He thereby 'never really engages with the spectator's relationship to the event' (McGillivray 2005: 101).	authenticity)	extension of theatrical
James Lawton	Performing Politics: A Theatre-Based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions (1998)	Theatricality relates to the theatrical nature of an event or phenomenon, the way in which it shares theatrical properties. Political conventions are theatrical performances because they 'share specific qualities inherent to theatre' (Lawton 1998: 5). These characteristics include: 'an ever-transitory present' which is shared between actor and audience; it occurs in public, is about signification: 'the actor shows' (Lawton 1998: 6); is understood as a theatrical performance by both actors and audience and the aesthetics and the signification of the performance are more important than its reality and utility	denotes theatrical (performable) properties (vs reality, utility)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Miranda Joseph	'The Performance of Production and Consumption' (1998)	Critical of Phelan's position. Theatricality for Phelan (1993) is 'a form of signification' which is transgressive or at least less co-optable; it is opposed to representation: according to Phelan 'theatricality frees political subjects from representation altogether' (Joseph 1998: 52). Joseph questions this possibility. She claims that Phelan can only hold this position by ignoring the audience. In the end her performativity is related to language theory rather than theatre theory.	a form of signification (vs representation)	from theatre as an art form; an extension of theatrical	Audiences are crucially involved in the completion of production through their consumption
Keith Gallasch	Review of Customs by Josephine Wilson, directed by Glen McGillivray, Theatre of Desire (1998)	A review of a performance of the play Customs in which Gallasch compares performance with theatre. Performance is repetition, minimal staging, time slips breaking up the unity of the performance, the incorporation of dance-like movement and disjunctive action. Theatre, on the other hand, exhibits theatricality , which means it is conventional, 'loaded', 'too little distanced from itself', over-wrought and strained in manner (Gallasch 2005/1999)(Gallasch 1998). Paradoxically, given that he finds 'the performances conventionally theatrical', he finds that the audience for this production has to do a lot of the work of the performance. McGillivray calls this a 'discourse of theatricality' based on an anti-theatrical prejudice (McGillivray 2005: 9).	conventional theatre	from theatre as an art form; an extension of theatrical	(Implied: the spectator fills in the gaps in an inadequate performance)
John Jervis	Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization (1998)	* Theatricality is 'the very texture' of modern social life (Jervis 1998: 23). * theatricality is inauthenticity (42) * theatricality could be seen 'as an appreciation of vision and visibility ... transforming panopticism into a kind of reflexive playfulness' (57) [i.e. a	a mode of existence for the modern self; a form of	from theatre as an art form, an extension of	Self-awareness is crippling; theatricality

		positive thing]. * Theatricality is ‘a key mode of existence for the self’ in the modern world. ‘It means whereby one can try on the mask of otherness, experience the world as other, while actively participating in it; and respond to the novelty of situations, in a context of endless flux and change, by drawing on a repertoire of rules and conventions. Through this, the passivity of experience can be fused with the active rehearsal and transformation of images and roles. Thus can the self learn to be multi-dimensional, adaptable, open to the variety of experiences made possible by modernity’ (9). This sounds like theatricality offers a way to manage the uneasy combination between spectatorship and action which makes up one’s life – but no. Jervis distinguishes between ‘modernity as experience’ and modernity as project’. The above quote is a description of how we experience modernity – what modernity does to us. It is opposite to action – to what we can do with modernity. Modernity as experience ‘does not ... sit easily with the self of project, in its emphasis on rational self-control and an instrumental attitude towards the world’ (9). In other words, experience and project pull ‘in different directions’. Consequently we find ourselves simultaneously involved and detached, immersed and distanced, fascinated and repulsed, leaving us alienated and ‘homeless’. The primary examples for this are Oscar Wilde, Lawrence of Arabia, Sir Richard Burton. This is a story of modernity which is almost cliché now – and is underpinned by the anti-theatrical bias that sets authenticity against theatricality such that what seems at first like a useful description of how we might manage in a world where we are simultaneously onlookers and looked at ‘presents problems ... of commitment, belief and consistency’ (9) as if there was a ‘real’ world somewhere which was eternal, believable and consistent. In effect, Jervis is using theatricality to justify his own ironic or reflexive stance towards his subject matter of modernity in his attempt to ‘uncover the peculiarities of the modern experience’ (1). It seems a very long-winded way of saying that the facticity of the world will always impinge on our desire to act. * Theatricality is the way the imagination grasps both self and other: ‘The self becomes both spectator at, and actor in, its own performance, and this constitutes the fantasy structures of interpersonal experience and communication in the world of modernity’ (27). This makes theatricality ‘a mode of imaginative appropriation and construction ... the process whereby	copied with the alienation that a theatrical way of thinking about life creates (vs authentic)	theatrical	allows the possibility for experiment- ation
--	--	---	---	--------------------------	---

		the self can become a fluid, changing, yet continuous creation' (27). Theatricality is a central thread for Jervis in both books, in which he hangs the development of the modern 'self' as reflexive, alienated and requiring civility to get on with others but aware that his civil self is not 'himself' but a 'role' he plays – and aware that others are aware of this too – consequently any interaction is always theatrical, never 'real' or authentic – this constitutes the problem of the modern self [and nearly drove Sartre mad!]. It 'emerged in a context where traditional social positions, conventions and rituals no longer conveyed a clear meaning and where, in the new social conditions of rapid change and the emergence of the market, a degree of flexibility and adaptability became part of the very constitution of the self' (20). By C18th, theatricality 'had come to serve as a bridge that linked the theatre and the street' and public life was 'theatrical in its very essence' (24). As a result the distinctions which occur in theatre (script/performance; stage/audience, actor/role) become 'troublesome' for society as well. The consequences of the failure to maintain these distinctions became apparent in the French Revolution. The continuing presence of theatricality produces the need for civility, which involves 'donning the mask of otherness, a 'taking on' and 'acting out' of identity as a public construct ... in relation to others' (328). Theatricality is one form of a positive engagement with otherness, one in which we see public life in terms of scenarios. Theatricality as a 'key term' for Jervis is defined in his glossary: 'presents identity as a play of masks [through which] the self emerges as multiple, always other to itself. Social interaction becomes an 'acting out' of identity, an exploration of the artifice at the heart of modern culture ... In the age of spectacle and mass media, theatricality becomes an essential component of self-identity through 'personality', the rehearsal of individuality as a distinctive attribute of each person' (Jervis 1998: 343; 1999). [This all seems very circular: if one already sees life through the theatre metaphor then one will be inclined to see it theatrically].
	Transgressing the Modern: Explorations in the Western Experience of Otherness (1999)	Theatricality 'embodies the transgressive potential of vicarious experience' (Jervis 1999: 212). It is the way we experience 'otherness', which is 'grasped in the theatrical relation of the sublime and the abject' (216) – a relationship itself based on the view of theatre as inauthentic, artificial and deceptive. Theatricality is the mode of approach taken by the west to other cultures, and	the way we experience others (vs authentic, genuine,	from theatre as an art form; an extension of theatrical	We experience others theatrically

		‘others’ in general.	truthful)
Richard Schoch	“‘We Do Nothing but Enact History’”: Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past’ (1999)	Theatricality has become ‘a critical commonplace’ to describe Victorian literature and culture. Many critics point to the ‘theatricality’ in writers such as Jane Austen, Charlotte Bronte and George Eliot. In these discourses, theatricality may be about the theatre or about a mode of being or acting, and can be pejorative (e.g. anti-sincerity). Carlyle also contrasts theatricality with sincerity. Although he used the theatre metaphor prolifically, he had a barely concealed disdain for the theatre itself. However, Schoch argues that Carlyle wrote theatrically. Theatricality occurs when the presence of both performers and spectators are established and the focus is on action (Schoch 1999: 34n19).	is a mode which involves consciousness of the audience and action (vs sincerity; vs dramatic; vs history as transparent reportage)	from theatre as an aesthetic practice	Awareness of spectators is what distinguishes the theatrical from the dramatic
Sean Scalmer	‘The Production of a Founding Event: The Case of Pauline Hanson’s Maiden Parliamentary Speech’ (1999)	Suggests that what creates theatricality is the need to draw attention, especially at times when there are a lot of things clamouring for attention; theatricality is a way of presenting oneself in ways which are visual and arresting (Scalmer 1999). Protest groups in the 1960s found that to get attention (a) they had to be on TV, since TV was what everyone was watching and (b) in order to get on TV, they had to present themselves in ways which attracted attention. This led to the ‘manufactured event’ (Scalmer 1999: S51): ‘the development of increasingly novel, theatrical protest forms, likely to attain newsworthiness and therefore to draw public attention to the cause’ (S48). This was a two-step process, suggesting it was deliberate and reflexive. (Arguably, the same process occurred in Elizabethan England with the use of spectacle to draw attention to the monarch. It was accompanied by the government suppression of alternative and perhaps oppositional forms of spectacle. Both sides can play at Scalmer’s game).	a strategy for attracting attention	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	mediated
Mariam Fraser	‘Classing Queer: Politics in Competition’ (1999)	Theatricality makes things visible hence activists use theatre techniques to make issues visible. The theatrical is not opposed to the political; it draws attention to theatricality being politicized (Fraser 1999: 115).	techniques which make things visible	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Observation
Alan Ackerman	The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage (1999)	‘The application of the metaphor of theatricality to forms of social experience that appear highly self-conscious, imitative, or self-reflexive has been characteristic of widely ranging critical studies in the humanities and social sciences for the past fifty years’. This has led to ‘the status of theatrical art [to be] either diminished or unaccounted for’ (Ackerman 1999: xv)	a theatre metaphor (vs natural, spontaneous)	from theatre as an art form

Willmar Sauter	The Theatrical Event: Dynamics of Performance and Perception (2000)	1. Theatricality is a form of interaction; it is ‘what performers and what spectators do in the making of a theatrical event’ (Sauter 2000). It includes ‘both actions which become signs and reactions through which these signs are perceived in a special way. [It] is not restricted to the production and perception of signs; it also includes the performer as person and artist, and it includes the spectator, who enjoys and understands the presentation’ (Sauter 2000: 70). It represents ‘the essential or possible characteristics of theatre as an art form and as a cultural form’ (Sauter 2000: 50). Theatricality is about stageability . 2. Theatricality is ‘a way of describing ..’ (2) which provides an historically grounded methodology which can be applied to individual theatrical performances. Jankocljjevic (2006) says Sauter is still locked into a functionalist view of theatre which can be understood semiotically, largely because his perception of theatricality is based on the ‘perspective of a multiple number of spectators’ (Postlewait and Davis 2003: 23). ¹	a form of interaction; a concept, a description of the arts of theatre	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Interactive relationship
Lionel Pilkington	Theatre and State in Twentieth-Century Ireland: Cultivating the People (2001)	‘It was Ireland’s regular recourse to a kind of theatricality’ that kept the ‘acute cultural and political problem’ of militancy alive (Pilkington 2001: 86). Many political events were routinely described in theatrical terms – as stage plays or Greek tragedies. Pilkington’s observation of the effects of theatricality , of looking at life in ways which separate observer and actors, highlights the power involved in this mode of perception. Seeing life as theatrical and therefore outside of oneself allows the continuation of dramatic situations, even ones as destructive as militant unionism. When the parliament can be described as ‘a stage play at the Mansion House’ and a political proclamation as ‘a Greek tragedy’ (Pilkington 2001: 86), the need to take either as serious or consequential is waived	a metaphor (vs moral responsibility)	from theatre	Separate from actors and from the action and therefore not responsible
Janelle Reinelt	‘The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality’ (2002)	Both theatricality and performativity are currently contested terms. There are marked differences in the way they are debated, and this offers opportunities to re-envision both concepts. Anglo-American theorists privilege performance over theatricality, partly because an anti-theatrical heritage and partly because of their connections with cultural studies. They see performance as allowing the incorporation of broader forms of cultural performance, especially from oral cultures, which in turn allows challenges to be mounted for the political implications of performances. European theorists on the other hand, who tend to come from semiotics, privilege theatricality over performance, and insist on the difference between theatre and activities	a contested term, often used pejoratively in order to privilege performance, but it provides the space for performance	from theatre as the space of performance	spectators need help to be able to create their own meanings when confronted with performance which are theatre-like. For them, theatricality is a mode of perception which is ‘the essence’ of theatre but which can encompass more than theatre (as an institutional art form). Reinelt wants to argue for a combination of the best of both. Since performance ‘refuses representation’ so that audiences can create their own meanings rather than have them forced on them, it offers ‘a model for the emergence of novelty’. Nevertheless, theatricality offers the conventions by which audiences may be able to do this – it offers ‘the space’ for the emergence of novelty. If performance ‘makes visible’, then it does so on stage theatrically (Reinelt 2002)			as novelty; theatricality offers such help because of the conventions which surround it as a space.

Paul Friedland	Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution (2002)	Theatricality ‘describes the conscious staging of an event for the purposes of producing a particular effect [through] the intentional grafting of theatrical elements onto “real” life’ (Friedland 2002: 301n4). The quality of theatricality ‘is as different from drama as artifice is different from truth’.	artifice (vs naturalness, truth)	from theatre as an art form

Bibliography

- Ackerman, Jr., Alan. 1999. The Portable Theater: American Literature and the Nineteenth-Century Stage. Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press.
- Alter, Jean. 1990. A Sociosemiotic Theory of Theatre. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Burgett, Bruce. 1996. 'Spectacular Politics: Theatrical Power and Mass Culture in Early Modern England; Theater enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage'. The William and Mary Quarterly 53 (1) pp. 204-208.
- Carlson, Marvin. 1995. 'Theatre History, Methodology and Distinctive Features'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 90-96.
- Carlson, Marvin. 2002. 'The Resistance to Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2-3) pp. 238-250.
- Fraser, Mariam. 1999. 'Classing Queer: Politics in Competition'. Theory, Culture and Society 16 (2) pp. 107-131.
- Friedland, Paul. 2002. Political Actors: Representative Bodies and Theatricality in the Age of the French Revolution. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press.
- Gallasch, Keith. 2005/1999. 'Review of Customs by Josephine Wilson, directed by Glen McGillivray, Theatre of Desire'. In Theatricality: A Critical Genealogy. McGillivray, Glen James, 2004, Sydney: Sydney eScholarship Repository, The University of Sydney Library <http://hdl.handle.net/2123/1428> accessed 27/04/2008, pp. 234-235 (original review published by Gallasch in www.rtimearts.com/~opencity/rt228/customs.html 1998; reproduced in full in McGillivray).
- Jervis, John. 1998. Exploring the Modern: Patterns of Western Culture and Civilization. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Jervis, John. 1999. Transgressing the Modern: Explorations in the Western Experience of Otherness. Oxford and Massachusetts: Blackwell.
- Joseph, Miranda. 1998. 'The Performance of Production and Consumption'. Social Text 54 (Spring) pp. 25-61.
- Kruger, Loren. 2001. 'Book Review: Dictionary of the Theatre: Terms, Concepts, and Analysis [and] Mimesis, Masochism, and Mime: The Politics of Theatricality in Contemporary French Thought'. Theatre Journal 53 (1) pp. 185-188.
- Lawton, John Brooks III. 2007. Performing Politics: A Theatre-Based Analysis of the 1996 National Nominating Conventions www.sanestorm.com/performing_politics.pdf, 1998 [cited 14th September 2007].
- Montrose, Louis A. 1995. 'A Kingdom of Shadows'. In The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649, edited by D. L. Smith, R. Strier and D. Bevington. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press, pp. 68-86.
- Murray, Timothy, ed. 1997. Mimesis, Masochism, and Mime: The Politics of Theatricality in Contemporary French Thought. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Murray, Timothy. 2002. 'The Theatrical Event: Dynamics of Performance and Perception'. SubStance 31 ((2&3)).

- Parker, Andrew, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick. 1995. 'Introduction'. In Performativity and Performance, edited by A. Parker and E. K. Sedgwick. New York: Routledge, pp. 1-18.
- Pilkington, Lionel. 2001. Theatre and State in Twentieth-Century Ireland: Cultivating the People. London: Routledge.
- Quinn, Michael. 1995. 'Concepts of Theatricality in Contemporary Art History'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) pp. 106-114.
- Quinn, Michael. 2006. 'Theatricality, Convention, and the Principle of Charity'. In Staging Philosophy: Intersections of Theater, Performance, and Philosophy, edited by D. Krasner and D. Saltz. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, pp. 301-316.
- Reinelt, Janelle. 2002. 'The Politics of Discourse: Performativity meets Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3) pp. 201-215.
- Sauter, Willmar. 2000. The Theatrical Event: Dynamics of Performance and Perception. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press.
- Scalmer, Sean. 1999. 'The Production of a Founding Event: The Case of Pauline Hanson's Maiden Parliamentary Speech'. Theory and Event 3 (2).
- Schoch, Richard W. 1999. "'We Do Nothing but Enact History": Thomas Carlyle Stages the Past'. Nineteenth-Century Literature 54 (1) pp. 27-52.
- Schramm, Helmar. 1995. 'The surveying of hell. On theatricality and styles of thinking'. Theatre Research International 20 (2) PP. 114-119.
- Smith, David L., Richard Strier, and David Bevington, eds. 1995. The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London 1576-1649. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wright, Elizabeth. 1996. 'Psychoanalysis and the theatrical: analysing performance'. In Analysing Performance: A Critical Reader, edited by P. Campbell. Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, pp. 175-199.

¹ Semiotics has 'made the most significant attempt to construct an interpretive model for understanding theatricality' (Postlewait and Davis 2003: 23), conceived as stageability revealed through a comparison between the written text and performed 'text'. Generally the 'interpretant' is seen in an ideal way (represented by the analyst) or simply ignored. Postlewait and Davis argue that semiosis 'stretches the meaning of the concept of theatricality to breaking point' because it can be applied to any sign (2003: 24).

Appendix F Table 3/3: Defining Theatricality 2002b-2007

THEORIST	PUBLICATION	Definition of theatricality	Theatricality is: is against	Source	Position on Spectator
The following material all dated 2002 featured in a special edition of SubStance 31(2&3). McGillivray is particularly critical of the way theatricality, although supposedly the themes of this edition, is both vaguely defined and differently applied. In particular he detects an undercurrent of anti-theatricality in the way theatricality is so often opposed to the supposedly more transgressive contemporary concept of performance (2006: 104-112). In part this was because of an imperative set up by the editor Josette F��ral to discuss the relationship between theatricality and performativity. McGillivray finds that ‘contemporary discourses of theatricality ... replicate the thematic concerns of the avant-garde’ and define the field of theatricality accordingly (McGillivray 2005: 114-5). The problem he sees is of how to shift the terms of debate about theatricality without simply re-inscribing the anti-theatricality he has detected both in avant-garde theory and contemporary discourses of theatricality which follow the same path: ‘the romanticism of the avant-garde continues to seduce ... who does not yearn for plenitudinous union with the One? (McGillivray 2005: 117).
Joachim Fiebach	‘Theatricality: From Oral Traditions to Televised “Realities” (2002)	Theatricality is a principle which underlies most human interaction which is ‘theatrically structured’ [a circular argument]: “‘theatricality” should be taken, and consequently used, as a concept that relates to virtually any type of socially communicative , constructed (“dramatized”) movements and attitudes of one or more bodies and/or their audio-visual “replicants” – of their representations, such as masks or technologically objectified images ... the notion of theatricality encompasses any societal activities that are theatrically structured’ (Fiebach 2002: 19-20). McGillivray calls this definition an example of ‘metaphoric encroachment’ – ‘the metaphor used by a writer (“theatricality”) is allowed to grow to become a foundational concept that defines a broad range of other phenomena ... Looking for such “theatrically structured” activities Fiebach, of course, finds them everywhere’ (McGillivray 2005: 121). Fiebach unproblematically equates all symbolic communicative behaviour with theatricality, ignoring the constitutive role of the interpreter (McGillivray 2005: 122). In other words, he interprets theatre-like phenomena as theatre. Basically a circular argument: ‘The notion of theatricality encompasses any societal activities that are theatrically structured’. An unproblematic collapse of theatre into performance e.g. quotes Turner on performance but reads it as ‘theatrically structured practices’. All symbolic behaviour and actions are ‘theatrically structured’. Theatricality and performance ‘are to a large degree overlapping or even interchangeable’ (Fiebach 2002: 20-21).	a principle of communication; a metaphor	from theatre as an art form	passive reception
Virginie Magnat	‘Theatricality from the Performative Perspective’ (2002)	An extended rant against Diderot by a performer steeped in Grotowski. Theatricality and performativity are theatre terms and are more or less interchangeable. It is grounded in presence and perception: ‘the one who	the process of performance for the	from theatre as an art form, an	ignored

		watched and the one who performs become one' (Magnat 2002: 153). Basically theatricality arises from the process of performance which leads to a heightened level of awareness (163). Although Magnat talks about the spectator in a variety of ways, the spectator remains at the edge of the theatrical experience: 'I have argued that theatricality is grounded in a quality of presence and perception, which originates in the performer's process' (162). The heightening of awareness arose 'in the consciousness of the "doer"' (163): 'theatricality can be perceived as a process providing "a way of life and cognition", the result being at once inherent in and comprised by the act of performing' (165).	performer	extension of theatrical
Anne-Britt Gran	'The Fall of Theatricality in the Age of Modernity' (2002)	Theatricality is 'a sort of relationship' which is historically, socially and philosophically contingent: 'all theater metaphors and perceptions of theatricality are, to a large extent, indebted to the actual theater upon which they are built' (Gran 2002: 253). Theatricality is therefore employed differently in Modernity (e.g. in Fried where it is opposed to the autonomy of the art work) and Postmodernity (e.g. in Sennett in which it is seen as a lost characteristic of Modernity). Gran sees theatricality and 'the theatrical' as synonymous (see Gran 2002: 255). Different theorists express the relationships within theatricality differently, but all entail some kind of binary: between two spaces (Féral); between two worlds (Sobol), between metaphoric/literal language (Trongstad); between role and self (Sennett); between actors' space and spectator space; between beholder and work of art (Fried). Modernity was anti-theatrical because it valued authenticity and autonomy; postmodernism is theatrical because it values performance, game, irony, pastiche, simulacrum, seduction, masquerade, the staging of the body and the subject. Basically theatricality has 'fallen': 'For Fried, the fall of theatricality is positive because it saves autonomous modern art.' He is subsequently unhappy about the revival of theatricality in postmodernity. 'For Sennett, it is negative, because it makes sociality impossible, both on the street and in the theater' (2002: 261). He should be happy about postmodernity. Either way, the 'fall of theatricality' led to social change. The revival of theatricality under postmodernity, though, will be a different kind of theatricality to that which concerned either Fried or Sennett.	a relationship (vs autonomy)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	theatricality always involves a binary relationship
Eli Rozik	'Acting: The Quintessence of	'[I]t is acting or enacting a fictional entity coupled with similarity on the material level, that constitutes the essential quality of theater or theatricality'	About theatre as a fictional	from theatre as an art

	Theatricality' (2002)	(Rozik 2002: 123). Theatre = theatricality. Theatre is 'an iconic medium' (111).	entity (vs non-fiction, the real)	form
Jean-Pierre Sarrazac	'The Invention of "Theatricality": Rereading Bernard Dort and Roland Barthes' (2002)	Theatricality was 'invented' by Barthes as a way of describing the 'present-ness' of objects in the theatre and the way 'the dramatic text [was] an incomplete object that could only be completed by performance' (McGillivray 2005: 109). In Sarrazac, theatricality is 'an essence of theatre that is rare, indefinable, unknowable and impossible ... [standing] for absence and loss' (McGillivray 2005: 110). Theatricality reappeared with the abolition of 'realist' theatre and 'the red curtain' which separated the audience from the empty space of the stage; it invited spectators 'to become interested ... in the advent, within the performance, of theatre itself' (58). This focus on 'the art' of theatre occurred explicitly in the work of Brecht and Pirandello and revealed the art of theatre to be based in action (66).	about present-ness (vs presence)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Malgorzata Sugiera	'Theatricality and Cognitive Science: The Audience's Perception and Reception' (2002)	Theatricality is the concept of theatre which arose amongst the avant-garde during the early C20th in reaction to realism in particular in terms of semiotics. It involves 'real, material actions' (Sugiera 2002: 227). Contemporary performance has however indicated that a semiotic approach is one-sided and unable to take in the actual interaction between performance and spectators since it posits only an idealized spectator (226). Theatricality 'defines that which is characteristic of, or specific to, the art form, "theatre"' (McGillivray 2005: 110). It is defined in opposition to 'performance'. Sugiera sees theatrical phenomena at one end and performative phenomena at the other end of a continuum within theatricality as a model or prototype of communication, one which is based on nineteenth century ideas of what structurally constitutes theatre. Such prototypes are useful, according to Sugiera, because they provide bench-marks against which other kinds of theatre can be analysed and understood. McGillivray argues that her attempt 'to graft terms such as "theatricality" and "performance" ... onto an analytic model derived from cognitive science' merely leaves theatricality even more obscure (2006: 111). Nevertheless, it seems clear that she sees it as 'a model of communication' which contains both theatre and performance. Audiences use prototypes to interpret phenomena such as theatre and performance. Theatricality is one such prototype.	that which is characteristic of theatre as an art form; a 'mode of communication' (Sugiera 2002: 228). (vs Realism)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical

Ragnhild Tronstad	‘Could the World become a Stage? Theatricality and Metaphorical Structures’ (2002)	‘[T]heatricality relates to real life in the same way that the metaphor relates to literal language’ (216) ... it is ‘a relational structure analogous to metaphor’ (222) although in ‘modern times [it] has often been defined in opposition to something else’ (Tronstad 2002: 216). It is a relational concept which is dependent on a ‘gap’ between the fictitious and the real. ‘a gap that is fundamental in the theater’ (223). ‘Theatricality is unthinkable without an idea of something not-theatrical’ (218). That the theatre metaphor works at all indicates that there is some difference between theatre and ‘real life’ as well as some similarities. ‘The world is not really a theatre’ (218) although it resembles it in some ways. ‘The point of the theatrical departure is always reality – “real life”’ (220). Tronstad draws a distinction between theatricality and ‘performativeness’ based on representation: ‘To perform is not necessarily to perform outside the realm of “reality”’. In theatricality, we have such a demand’ (222). If anything, performativeness ‘tries to escape theatricality’. Theatricality is ‘the victory of representation ... The theatrical sign points at itself as representation . Thus, implicitly it points somewhere else.’ (222). Furthermore, theatricality ‘requires creativity from the spectator’ (222). Theatricality doesn’t happen unless the spectator recognizes a theatrical frame (either imposed by himself or by others).	a relational concept (vs real life, not theatre, performative-ness)	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Depends on the spectator to activate either through the imposition of a theatrical frame or through recognition that a theatrical frame has been imposed
Sue-Ellen Case	‘The Emperor’s New Clothes: The Naked Body and Theories of Performance’ (2002)	Reactionary performances of the 1960’s in America which featured the naked body were examples of theatricality, as opposed to contemporary ‘performance’ which is more reflexive. Theatricality is thus set up against performativity (McGillivray 2005: 112).	reactionary, exaggerated behaviour (vs performativity (genuine performance))	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Silvija Jestrovic	‘Theatricality as Estrangement of Art and Life in the Russian Avant-garde’ (2002)	Theatricality is a phenomenon which changes both stage and life into spectacle. It is a ‘distancing device’ which provides a way of making things strange and which can be applied both within theatre (e.g. Meyerhold) and outside theatre (e.g. Evreinov). When applied within theatre, it highlights theatre as artifice. When it is applied outside theatre, as, for instance, by Evreinov, it re-awakens ‘our “will to play”’ (Jestrovic 2002: 44). When the ‘strategies of defamiliarization and theatricalization’ are appropriated by ‘real-life politics’, however, this will to play must be hidden for one’s own safety: ‘When theatricalization of life becomes a device of political	A transformative phenomenon	from theatre as an art form manipulation it no longer encourages our “will to play;” rather, it becomes deadly’ (55).

Thomas Postlewait & Tracy Davis	Theatricality (2003)	Theatricality ‘obviously derives its meaning from the world of theatre (p. 1) from which it has been ‘abstracted ... and then applied to any and all aspects of human life’. Theatricality can be described as a type of performance style or ‘as all the semiotic codes of theatrical representation’ (Postlewait and Davis 2003: 1). Postlewait and Davis’ book aims to establish ‘the terms of debates for theatricality’s place within performance theory’ (frontispiece). Theatricality is a descriptive term denoting stageability: ‘the concept of theatricality [is used] to assess the performance qualities [stageability] of all kinds of plays’ (Postlewait & David 2003: 22). ‘Theatricality is meant to represent the essential or possible characteristics of theatre as an art form and as a cultural phenomenon’ (Postlewait & Davis 2003: 50).	a metaphor; a technical term	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical
Thomas Postlewait	‘Theatricality and antitheatricality in renaissance London’ (2003)	Theatricality is seductive. Scholars of history see it everywhere, forgetting they have framed what they see as theatre. They apply it to whole societies and cultures. This leads them to make more of antitheatricality that they should, basing a conviction that antitheatricality was also a pervasive feature of the same society, based on a handful of pamphlets with limited distribution within populations which were generally illiterate (Postlewait 2003).	a metaphor	from theatre as an art form, an extension of theatrical	Obscured by theatre (as metaphor)
Tracy Davis	‘Theatricality and civil society’ (2003)	Theatricality has to do with the process of spectatorship. It occurs when the spectator withholds empathy. It can occur in the theatre or outside the theatre and has nothing to do with the theatrical per se.	A term related to seeing (vs sympathy)	An extension of theatre as a seeing place	Alienated
Jody Enders	‘Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)’ (2003)	Theatricality is a form of ‘revealing’ (Enders 2003: 45). It is a trick of the stage. (Enders discusses the performance of a passion play in Valenciennes in 1547 in which audiences members recorded that they had seen the miracle of the loaves and fishes enacted: several thousand people in the audience had received food and there baskets of left-overs).	the form of revealing utilised by the art of the theatre	From theatre; an extension of theatrical	Possibly deluded
Haiping Yan	‘Theatricality in classical Chinese drama’ (2003)	Theatricality is the essence of theatre; it is culturally distinct and it depends on audience to occur (Yan 2003: 66). Chinese audiences engage actively with performances. Their presence is integral to the acting process and indispensable to the production of theatricality. In particular, Chinese audiences choose ‘how to feel’ (87).	the essence of theatre, generated during performance in interaction with the	From theatre; an extension of theatrical	Integral to the performance; actively engaged audience

Jon Erickson	'Defining political performance with Foucault and Habermas: strategic and communicative action' (2003)	Fischer-Lichte argues that fundamentally, theatre is a site of cultural exchange , like a market (Fischer-Lichte 1997: 1). Influences move both ways, and have consequences e.g. the introduction of perspective to theatre positioned and limited spectatorship in fundamental ways. It is this exchange understanding of theatre which suggests to Erickson that there should be a reinsertion of the dialogic aspect of theatricality into politics, along the lines of Habermas' communication ethics. Theatricality, like rhetoric, has a way of opening up multiple perspectives such that theatre becomes 'a mediating process' (P&D 2003: 37) rather than a 'monological', and silencing argument (Erickson 2003).	as dialogic; as strategic communication	From theatre; an extension of theatrical
William Egginton	How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality, and the Question of Modernity (2003)	Egginton (2003) argues that modernity can better be described under the concept of theatricality rather than subjectivity, and on similar historical grounds as Jervis. His history, however, begins with Descartes, and the fifteenth century's interest in optics. Theatricality is a 'spectator-dependent system' which arose in the fifteenth century, developed in the sixteenth century and now offers a way out of the cul-de-sac of subjectivity because it offers 'a model of self' in which the self is simultaneously 'virtual and corporeal' (31) because it exists in space. Although the term theatricality is derived from the theatre, it can now be used as a 'phenomenological notion' because it, like theatre, is inherently spatial. Both are anchored in 'the space of presence' as well as in the institutional space of theatre. Theatricality recognizes 'the experience of space as being structured by a series of frames distinguishing the real from the imaginary, actors from characters, and spectators from those being watched'. It therefore necessarily invokes 'the ineradicable suspicion that one's own lived reality might, at any time, be the object of, and therefore exist for, the gazes of other' (Egginton 2003: 79-80), itself a spatial conception of social life. Theatricality is 'that medium of interaction whose conventions structure and reveal to us our sense of space or spatiality'(3). The modern self can be conceived as both individual and social because of this. 'We are still theatrical' (107) because we live under the gaze of others. This gaze is both internal and external to us.	a phenomenological notion from which can be derived a theory of the modern self as both 'virtual and corporeal' (vs subjectivity, autonomy)	from theatre, an extension of theatrical	We live under the gaze of others because we exist in space.
Glen McGillivray	Theatricality: A Critical Genealogy (2004)	McGillivray sees theatricality as a straightforward extension of the word theatrical : 'there is nothing that is ambiguous about theatricality. Theatricality refers to a constellation of ideas and practices associated with	a discourse (often pejorative	from theatre, an extension of

		theatre as an art form, and can operate either descriptively or as a value. More specifically, the term has a genealogy that is fundamentally grounded in the discourse of aesthetic modernity and, therefore, it is inflected with the values of the historical avant-garde, defined by their practices and by their theoretical usages. Theatricality is not an “essence” of theatre ... but is in fact a discourse, a way of thinking and writing about certain phenomena related to a certain performing art’ (McGillivray 2007: 117). It was ‘carefully framed and rigorously worked through’ by Burns in 1972 (118) who demonstrated ‘how the concept has been taken up by wider cultural discourse’ (123). Theatricality ‘is not a thing to be discovered/uncovered, to be analysed and have attributes assigned to it. Rather, it is a term, a particular discursive marker that stands for attributes, qualities or values that can be associated with the art form, theatre. As such, theatricality circulates in discourse as a kind of shorthand ... the meanings of which can be assumed ... commonsense usages, in everyday and noncritical contexts, are relatively unproblematic. Theatricality, in these quotidian settings, is invoked as a metaphor in order to comment on particular behaviours [in] more specialised [contemporary] uses ... a discourse based on an interpretive premise in which certain practices understood as “theatrical” were considered less than desirable than certain other practices interpreted as “performance” (McGillivray 2005: 229-230). In these discourses theatricality is also being used pejoratively. With regard to the spectator, although McGillivray uses Burns extensively, and recognises her conception of theatricality as ‘a spectator operation: it depends upon a spectator, who is both culturally competent to interpret and who chooses to do so’ (2005: i), he does not pursue spectatorship as an aspect of theatricality himself. His focus is performer/performance oriented.	when used to support ‘truth claims’ for discourses about theatre)	theatrical , however, the definition of theatre is taken to be more than the art form, based on a study of Renaissance uses of the term which essentially saw theatre as a place for seeing or looking, even attentive looking.
Samuel Weber	Theatricality as Medium (2004)	‘Theatricality is a medium that redefines activity as reactivity, and that makes its peace, if even provisionally, with separation’ (Weber 2004: 28-9). Theatre is theatrical, it has theatricality. Theatre too is ‘a powerful medium of the arrivant’ (29). ‘What we call “theater” and, even more, “theatricality” provides an instructive arena for the examination of [media]’, including new media because theatricality is all the strategies, techniques, practices and methods of staging which bring together an image. Theatricality is the unique ability of theatre to disturb the stability of a site as a concrete place so that we	a medium for theatrical practice (vs unmediated experience)	from theatre, an extension of theatrical	Spectators are grouped by the spatiality of theatricality

		can experience or ‘bear witness to’ an event which we do not actually see (Jankovljevic 2006: 181). Theatre is a place of destabilization (Weber 2004: 43); its medium of destabilization is theatricality. Since televisual and other electronic media also destabilize, they too partake of theatricality. Theatricality is the medium by which destabilization occurs. It is used in many different ways to invoke aspects of theatre as an explanatory metaphor or analogy. Freud’s theory of psychoanalysis draws on theatricality when Freud suggests that the ego is like a circus clown who continually tries to suggest to the audience that he is in control of events. Theatricality here lies in the ‘attempt to create the appearance of being in control’ (Weber 2004: 254). Other psychoanalytical uses of theatricality use it to explain the ‘invention and imagination’ required by the ego to impose control on all the elements which affect it. Weber wants to advance a new theory of theatre ‘in which the distinctively scenic medium [subordinated by Aristotle] is no longer merely a means to an end, but, rather, is the spatio-temporal condition of ... “the exposing of the present”’ which also, simultaneously ‘contributes to the definition of [its] audience’ because it generates “groupings”, generally by interests (Weber 2004: 103, 118-9).
Christopher Balme	‘Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific’ (2005)	Theatricality ‘is a mode of perception and representation that either merges verbal, visual and corporeal dimensions or forms a bridge between them’. Things, actions, peoples, places ‘are not in themselves theatrical .. but ... are rendered such by a combination of aesthetic conventions and discursive practices’ which ‘intersect theatre ... with wider cultural contexts’ (Balme 2005). Theatricality is thus historically and culturally determined. It is also a form of power. Balme wants to argue that theatricality is more than a mere metaphor as contemporary uses in sociology, cultural anthropology and media studies seem to have it, it is a mode of perception. Things described as theatrical are not in themselves theatrical ‘but rather are rendered such by a combination of aesthetic conventions and discursive practices’ intersecting theatre as an institution and art form (Balme 2005). This construction of theatricality was a fundamental part of the turn to the visual in Europe in the C18th when the idea of theatrical encompassed at least three modes: metaphorical (phenomena were theatrical because of their ‘extreme concentration and focus’, like drama); perceptual (the privileging of the visual) and normative (theatricality was ‘a moral and/or epistemological	a mode of perception and representation which acts as a mode of power by producing a ‘closed field’ for observation; a form of appropriation (vs first-hand perception, unlimited i.e. opposite to Carlyle)	from theatre as an aesthetic and institutional form	The discourse of theatricality give unprecedented power to the observer to distort ‘nature’

		problem' because of the possibility of deception and duplicity. Theatricality was thought to be 'second-hand' perception. Following Denning, Balme sees the beach as 'a theatrical place' in Pacific history, however none of the material he quotes from either Bougainville's or Cook's voyages use theatrical terms, although there may be evidence of composition. Nevertheless, he argues that theatricality 'designates a particularly Western style of thought' which sees the other (women, Asia, the colonized world) as a 'closed field' which 'reduces and defines it, rendering it observable'. Theatricality is therefore a mode of power which acts as a 'form of containment and circumscription, 'the essential perceptual prerequisites for power and control' (Balme 2005). Accounts of the voyages combined all three modes of theatrical perception which were a feature of C18th. Theatricality was a mode of perception which had three aspects in C18th; all three aspects allowed the perception of the newly discovered world to be appropriated in a variety of ways: through staging for dramatic effect; through the use of the rules of aesthetic perception and through the discourse of duplicity. The use of the theatre metaphor is not just a 'stylistic embellishment' but a symptom of 'deeper-seated fundamental categories of perception' which can be termed theatricality. Such metaphors are particularly characteristic of 'transition periods' (Balme 2005).
Susan Maslan	Revolutionary Acts: Theater, Democracy, and the French Revolution (2005)	Theatricality is 'the production of opaque, alienating relations between performers and spectators' (Maslan 2005: ix), the lack of transparency which allows power to be hidden behind display. It was a central preoccupation for Robespierre, for whom the solution was increased surveillance and publicity.	A lack of transparency (vs the natural, the open, the transparent)	From theatrical	Obscured, isolated and subject to manipulation
John Huxley	'Behind the lens: a brushman's inspiration' (2007)	An interview with artist Tim Storrier who sees his art as a kind of 'artistic theatre, or theatrical, installation art'. A particularly flamboyant early photograph was criticised as being 'unashamedly theatrical'. It was a '[p]ortrait of the young artist as a wanker', according to Storrier (Huxley 2007: 5)	Inauthentic, over-the-top and self-indulgent behaviour (vs authenticity)	from theatre as an art form

Bibliography

- Balme, Christopher. 2005. 'Metaphors of Spectacle: Theatricality, Perception and Performative Encounters in the Pacific'. metaphorik.de August www.metaphorik.de/aufsaeetze/balme-theatricality.htm accessed 22/07/2005.
- Case, Sue-Ellen. 2002. 'The Emperor's New Clothes: The Naked Body and Theories of Performance'. SubStance 31 ((2&3)).
- Egginton, William. 2003. How the World Became a Stage: Presence, Theatricality and the Question of Modernity. New York: State University of New York Press.
- Enders, Jody. 2003. 'Performing miracles: the mysterious mimesis of Valenciennes (1547)'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 40-64
- Erickson, Jon. 2003. 'Defining political performance with Foucault and Habermas: strategic and communicative action'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 156-185
- Fiebach, Joachim. 2002. 'Theatricality: From Oral Traditions to Televised "Realities"'. SubStance #98/99 31 (2 and 3):pp. 17-32.
- Gran, Anne-Britt. 2002. 'The Fall of Theatricality in the Age of Modernity'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 251-264.
- Huxley, John. 2007. 'Behind the lens: a brushman's inspiration'. The Sydney Morning Herald 24th September p. 5.
- Jankovljevic, Branislav. 2006. 'Book Review: Theatricality As Medium by Samuel Weber [and] Theatrical Events: Borders, Dynamics, Frames by Cremona et al'. The Drama Review 50 (1):pp. 179-183.
- Magnat, Virginie. 2002. 'Theatricality from the Performative Perspective'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 147-166.
- Maslan, Susan. 2005. Revolutionary Acts: Theatre, Democracy, and the French Revolution. Baltimore: The John Hopkins University Press.
- McGillivray, Glen James. 2007. Theatricality. A Critical Genealogy [PhD Thesis 2004]. Department of Performance Studies, The University of Sydney, Sydney eScholarship Repository <http://ses.library.usyd.edu.au/handle/2123/1428>, 2007 [cited 27/04/2008].
- Postlewait, Thomas. 2003. 'Theatricality and antitheatricality in renaissance London'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. pp. 90-126
- Postlewait, Thomas, and Tracy C. Davis. 2003. 'Theatricality: an introduction'. In Theatricality, edited by T. C. Davis and T. Postlewait. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 1-39
- Rozik, Eli. 2002. 'Acting: The Quintessence of Theatricality'. SubStance 31 (2&3):pp. 110-124.
- Sarrazac, Jean-Pierre. 2002. 'The Invention of "Theatricality": Rereading Bernard Dort and Roland Barthes'. SubStance 31 (2&3).
- Sugiera, Malgorzata. 2002. 'Theatricality and Cognitive Science: The Audience's Perception and Reception'. SubStance 31 (2-3):225-235.
- Tronstad, Ragnhild. 2002. 'Could the World become a Stage? Theatricality and Metaphorical Structures'. SubStance 31 (2-3):216-224.
- Weber, Samuel. 2004. Theatricality as Medium. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Yan, Haiping. 2003. 'Theatricality in classical Chinese drama'. In Theatricality, edited by T. Postlewait and T. C. Davis. Cambridge UK: Cambridge University Press. pp. 65-89